Should the board want to report special cases to the attention of my department, I hope it will immediately communicate with it and give particulars about them.

REQUEST FOR INCREASED SAMPLING OF MEAT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary on a question of national urgency. In view of the importance of this question to the health and peace of mind of Canadians will the minister now undertake to carry out the recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board and at least increase the amount of sampling that is being done across the country, bearing in mind the lack of inspection capability. In that way at least we would be able to get a clearer picture of just how serious this matter is.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have already given such directives and they are being put into effect. But one must retain some sense of perspective in all this. As indicated, consumption of ground beef runs in the hundreds of million pounds a year. The government cannot possibly inspect each and every pound nor even every hundred pounds of meat before it is sold.

There are limits to what can reasonably be done. Directives have been given to increase the quantity and quality of inspection, but I repeat that one should retain a sense of perspective in all this. I would like to repeat the answer I gave the hon. member yesterday, which is that all the information we have now shows that this high level of bacterial elements in ground beef does not itself represent any danger for Canadians.

I hope all those making remarks about this now will keep this sense of perspectives, because excessive statements on this cannot be of any help to Canadians.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGATION PROSTITUTES FROM UNITED STATES COMING TO VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that three summer legal students who worked for the Vancouver police department reported yesterday on the Jack Webster show that truckloads of prostitutes and their salesmen were coming across the border from Washington state to Gastown in Vancouver—

An hon. Member: More bad beef!

Mr. Whittaker: —on a regular basis can the minister report on this and what is he going to do about it?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): How do they vote?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have no personal knowledge of the situation to which the hon. members refers but I shall take it up immediately with my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Andras: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Neither am I an expert.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I think either one or both of us should go to Vancouver to investigate. I will of course confer with my colleague. He administers the immigration policy and I the customs policy. We will endeavour to ensure, so far as inspection procedures allow, that there is no influx of American criminals into Canada.

Mr. Hees: Trudeau will use his famous phrase to tell them what to do.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO CONTROL INFLATION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Since according to Statistics Canada the cost of living increased 15 per cent in the last few months and that it keeps on climbing, that the cost of living adjustment index seems to be levelling between 7 and 8 per cent, does the minister intend to take the necessary measures to adjust the purchasing power to present inflationary costs?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the throne speech, the government announced a series of measures to fight inflation.

FINANCE

INSTRUCTIONS TO COMMERCIAL BANKS CONCERNING DEALINGS IN FOREIGN EXCHANGE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that since the introduction of floating exchange rates around the world several banks in major countries have failed, what conversations has the minister and the Bank of Canada had with the commercial banks of Canada with respect to their dealings in foreign exchange markets.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have had conversations dating back at least six months with the chartered banks, through the Canadian Banking Association. Both the governor of the bank and I have had these conversations. We were assured that Canadian chartered banks have taken very strict surveillance procedures to ensure that the Canadian banking system remains in its current sound condition.

INSTRUCTIONS TO COMMERCIAL BANKS CONCERNING OPERATIONS IN EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman directed a question to me, through the Acting Prime Minister, on October 21 relating to the Eurodollar market, perhaps you will allow me to reply at this time. I assume the hon. member at that time was referring to the Eurodollar market. The Bank Act states that Canadian banks must maintain adequate and sufficient assets against liabilities incurred in foreign currencies. It does not, however, give to the governor of the Bank of Canada, the Department of Finance or the Minister of Finance authority to regulate borrowing activity of commercial banks abroad or in foreign money markets. I assure the hon. member that the operations of our banks in foreign currencies are closely followed both by the Bank of Canada and the federal Department of Finance.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that foreign exchange reserves of Canadian banks and their dealings in the common market have increased to an enormous extent, does the minister not feel that he can use moral suasion, particularly as common market activities are having such an impact on international inflation, with Canadian banks and ask the chartered banks to operate less substantially in those markets?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is also in the interest of the country that our banks operate abroad. Actually, we now have the third largest international banking system. It is because of that growth that there have been consultations between the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON DEALING WITH INTERNATIONAL INFLATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): May I ask a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister take the position that, in international inflation as with domestic inflation, we will not be able to do anything about these problems without taking action of a specific nature along the lines I have suggested.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the thrust behind the hon. member's question. The problem we must deal with on an international basis is that of total international liquidity, particularly in the Eurodollar market. That will be one of the subjects to be discussed at the next meeting of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund.

TREFANN COURT—AGREEMENT WITH CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In light of the fact that housing units in Trefann Court in Toronto have been awaiting a decision by Central Mortgage and Housing since mid-July, could the minister indicate to the House when an agreement might be made to settle this matter and allow the houses to be filled.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am also disturbed about the delay with relation to Trefann Court. Active discussions have been going on. I think there should be an announcement either this week or next week which will provide a satisfactory resolution of problems for all the parties concerned and will ensure that the management of the Trefann Court project will achieve its aims. I particularly want this excellent project to be an exemplary one. Arrangements have been made to make it a good ongoing project and I hope to announce something soon.

GRAIN

WHEAT—TIMING OF REQUEST FOR RETURN OF OVERPAYMENT UNDER TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. During the recent election campaign the minister in charge of the Wheat Board mailed cheques to western farmers covering their share of the two-price wheat payment. Now, his department claims that 80 per cent of the farmers were overpaid and they have been asked to return the money. Will the minister tell the House if this was another election bribe or is he seriously thinking he can recover this overpayment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the cheques in question were only mailed to special permit holders. I want to make that clear so that there is no misunderstanding about the breadth of the distribution. The cheques were mailed as soon as the full amount could be calculated and the money voted some months before the election. The letters which were mailed immediately before the election were letters indicating overpayment which had regrettably happened as a result of computer error. Of course, it is still our obligation to collect money which was paid in error in that fashion. A good deal of it has already been returned.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House, if a mistake was made, how come 80 per cent of the farmers received overpayments and none received underpayments, and how is it that the cheques were mailed out over one month before the election and none of the farmers received letters notifying them of the overpayment until after the election?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that it was computer mistake which led to overpayments. Let me say most emphatically to the hon. member that many farmers received their letters requesting repayment before the election, and it was brought to my attention directly at that time.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CONTRACTING RESEARCH TO PRIVATE INDUSTRY—REASON FOR FAILURE TO IMPLEMENT GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. According to data just released by Statistics Canada, the proportion of federal government funds for scientific activities which are contracted to private industry has remained essentially stagnant for the last few years. Since this is in direct contradiction to government policy as stated by the minister's predecessor once removed and repeated by his immediate predecessor, what steps is the minister taking to ensure that government policy will finally be implemented?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the effectiveness of the contracting-out measures is the result of a number of causes. Also, there has not been entire success in the private sector in continuing previously started initiatives. The result has been a balance. We are continuing to contract out, in preference to executing work within government establishments, and the results in the next few years will show that this has been successful.

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF FULL-TIME MINISTER

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. As current federal government policies respecting science and technology are not being implemented and as the last two throne speeches contained reference to enhanced activity for this ministry, can the Acting Prime Minister indicate when the government will appoint a competent full-time minister who will be responsible for the ministry.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no more competent colleague than the one sitting to my right.

GRAIN

WHEAT—TIMING OF REQUEST FOR RETURN OF OVERPAYMENT UNDER TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the answer given by the Minister of Justice. I wonder whether that computer was directed in any way from the Liberal organization head office, because the letters asking for repayment were dated some two weeks before the election and none, that I know, were received until about two weeks after, when they would no longer affect the government vote in western Canada.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, since there is considerable interest on the part of hon. members, I will obtain the actual dates and make them available to hon. members. As I indicated before, it was brought vey forcibly to my attention before the election that the letters were in fact being received. The first instance which came to my attention of letters being received was when I happened to be in Assiniboia constituency.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about Humboldt?

Mr. Lang: That did not affect the voting results, as we have a very good Liberal member in the constituency. I will also check on the exact date the cheques were mailed. I know, however, that they were mailed about one month before the election being called. As you will recall, there was a movable feast at that point.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in connection with the statement just made by the minister concerning the movable feast that the western farmers had. He said that the cheques were mailed out at least two or three months, was it, before the election was even called. Let me give the answer to the minister, for apparently the production adviser has not informed him. The production adviser states in this letter that the cheques were dated May 27—this would be about 17 to 18 days after the election was called—and that they were mailed between that date and June 3. I point out that this was simply an election bribe that did not work.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED CLOSING OF HAMILTON BANKS DURING SPAWNING SEASON

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. As fish landings in Atlantic Canada, particularly off Newfoundland and the northeast coast of Labrador have declined this year and in recent years, can the minister tell the House if he will act on the recommendations which were made to his predecessor by the Newfoundland government and the private sector with respect to the need to close the Hamilton Banks during the spawning season? Scientists, including people in the minister's own department, have stated that this is probably the main reason that fish landings have declined in that area in recent years.

● (1140)

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, this is one question that I intend to discuss with the new minister of fisheries for Newfoundland. I am hoping that he and I can get together within the next 10 days. One of the problems in this area, as the hon. member knows, is that this has to be done by international agreement. We shall be looking into the matter at the next ICNAF meetings but, like many other things, they move much too slowly for our satisfaction.

ALLEGED INABILITY OF CANADA TO ENFORCE ICNAF AGREEMENTS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made to the parliamentary committee on fisheries by Mr. Levelton, who I believe is the director general of the fisheries and marine service in the Department of Fisheries, to the effect that Canada is unable at the present time properly to inspect and enforce ICNAF agreements respecting ships fishing on the Hamilton Banks, can the minister tell the House whether there are any plans in his department to increase our inspection capability to ensure that the ICNAF agreements, and quotas under the agreements, are adhered to by foreign ships fishing in the area?

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check the exact words that the director general used, though I am not quarrelling with what the hon. member has said. Obviously, there is a limitation when you are operating under an international agreement. We are trying to improve control and inspection in this area. I would also remind the House that cost is one factor we have to consider. There are many programs that are very important to the fisheries, and I would hate to see them sacrificed to surveillance costs only.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister should bear in mind that the cost to the economy of the areas in question is considerable. I do not think that costs should be the over-riding factor.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ABORTION

ALLEGATION MINISTER OF JUSTICE IMPOSING PERSONAL VIEWS ON HOSPITAL COMMITTEES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the recent memo that the minister forwarded to many hospitals setting forth his personal view on the subject of abortion and his personal interpretation of the Criminal Code, and in view of the minister's implied threat with respect to prosecutions of legally constituted hospital abortion committees and his obvious lack of confidence in the medical profession, would the minister advise the House whether he considers it to be part of his role as Minister of Justice not only to administer the laws of Canada but also to interpret those laws, and thereby usurp the function of our courts?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to make it clear that the only hospital committee to which I addressed myself in a way that I was aware of was the hospital committee in the Territories for which I am Attorney General, as though I were a provincial attorney general. In the case of other provinces, I drew to the attention of the attorneys general the nature of the 1969 law and the problem that can exist if the hospital committees are not in fact reading that law appropriately. It did seem to me that it was quite appropriate for an attorney general, before launching a prosecution against a hospital committee, to indicate to the hospital committee the problem that exists in regard to applying the law, and this is what I did in the case of the Northern Territories.

It is indeed an important role for an attorney general, in the particular circumstances of the 1969 law, to attempt to see that it is being applied in the way parliament intended. For after all, if we had intended a broader, wide open form of law we would have passed one, but we did not so intend. We put responsibilities upon hospital committees, and I think it is a proper role for attorneys general in this country to make sure that those responsibilities are carried out.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER OF JUSTICE NOT INTERFERE WITH GRANTS TO WOMEN'S GROUPS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is this. First of all, the previous minister of justice, the present Minister of Finance, on June 2, 1970 stated that this act is deliberately left open to medical judgment in order to give doctors some latitude. That interpretation the minister has refused to apply or even to indicate to hospital committees. In view of the fact that the minister has now interfered with the Department of the Secretary of State in the granting of funds to women's groups, particularly the women's centre in Regina which has collapsed as a result of the minister's interference, and in view of his recent interference in Saskatoon's women's group, where I understand a decision has not been made, would the minister give the House some assurance that he will no longer interfere in grants that have been properly approved by the director of this women's program in the Department of the Secretary of State? In other words, will he presume someone to be innocent rather than proven guilty without a trial?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, since in principle that was more a speech than a question, I hope I may have a little latitude to deal with the points raised by the hon. member. First of all, I share completely the view of my predecessor, the present Minister of Finance, that the law in 1969 did in fact leave the medical judgment to hospital committees. But what I also insist on is that they in fact legitimately and rationally exercise their medical judgment and not do something without exercising any medical judgment at all.

As far as grants by the government to organizations or people in this country and my role as Minister of Justice are concerned, in this regard I feel it incumbent upon me to give advice to my colleagues as the legal adviser to the government when there may be a danger that grants may be used in a way that furthers or promotes an illegal purpose. Indeed, I should think I would be in serious breach of my position, even as a minister of the Crown, if I saw any grants going to organizations for illegal purposes and did not do something about it. The government would be under severe criticism from gentlemen opposite in any case if any kind of public money went to an organization which was or might be involved in an illegal activity. I think that is clear.

SUGGESTION MINISTER OF JUSTICE ENCOURAGE FORMATION OF ABORTION COMMITTEES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The minister has indicated that he would like to see the laws of this country applied consistently across this country. In view of that, Mr. Minister, would you therefore encourage the establishment of abortion committees so that a decent percentage of women will have those facilities made available in regularly constituted hospitals and the law at least applied consistently in this country? Because in most of this country there are no such abortion committees available to the residents of those communities.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I hope hon. members will see the distinction in my function as Minister of Justice in trying to see that the criminal law is in fact properly applied. The criminal law makes the killing of an unborn child, generally speaking, an offence, though there is a narrow exception to that.

● (1150)

The criminal law is not the mechanism through which hospitals are required specifically to do positively a particular kind of medical care or technique of care, and if the hon. member wants to make submissions in relation to hospitals and what they should be doing he should be making them, not even to my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but to provincial ministers of health throughout this country.

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Justice agree that since the vague wording of the present legislation originally introduced by the present Prime Minister lends itself to diversity of interpretation, it is the responsibility of this House and not of individual therapeutic committees to effect whatever changes he and the government consider necessary, and he should have the moral courage to bring this matter before the House for debate rather than trying to give effect to his views or his interpretation of the law by back door methods?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated on other occasions that I would in due course be prepared to consider bringing this matter again before the House, specifically if it were to appear that the will of parliament, as indicated in 1969, was not in fact being carried out. I should say, however, that I do not agree with the hon. member that the wording is indeed so vague as to be impossible or difficult in its application. The wording does allow for certain medical judgment and if that medical judgment is exercised responsibly, and if hospital committees fairly and properly address themselves to the question of whether the health or the life of a mother is endangered before issuing a certificate, then the 1969 law can work, and perhaps can be the best solution to this problem that this country can in fact have.

AIR CANADA

REASON FOR DELAY IN ANNOUNCING SERVICE TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport perhaps I should direct my question to that distinguished son of Prince Edward Island, his parliamentary secretary. It is prompted by a front page story in the Charlottetown Guardian to the effect that an announcement of the inauguration of Air Canada service to Prince Edward Island is being delayed because of an argument between the Minister of Veterans Affairs and Air Canada as to who should make the announcement. Will the minister break this fearful deadlock and make the announcement himself, and also accept my long-standing invitation to announce the provision of a new and modern air terminal for the capital city of my province?

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to convey the feelings of the hon. member to my minister.

An hon. Member: To both of them.

Mr. McIsaac: I sure that either he or the Minister of Veterans Affairs will be pleased to make a formal announcement.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put to the hon. Minister of Justice a question that is supplementary to the one that has just been asked.

Since in most hospitals doctors are reluctant to become members of the famous therapeutic committee that must examine abortion cases, could the minister say whether he will introduce in the House amendments to the Criminal Code in that regard?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must say I have no jurisdiction whatsoever on that decision, which is provincial responsibility. Hon. John N. ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—ESCAPE OF FIVE INMATES—DISCIPLINARY ACTION AGAINST EMPLOYEES RESPONSIBLE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a question arising out of the very alarming escape yesterday from the Laval maximum security institution of five extremely dangerous inmates, three of whom have past records of escape. The minister said yesterday he was disgusted. Can he now tell us what he has done about it, whether there has been any progress in the pursuit of these dangerous criminals and whether any disciplinary action has been taken at the institution?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the investigation into the escape is still underway. I spoke this morning with the Commissioner of Penitentiaries who is on the site and is investigating the matter as well. Of course, disciplinary measures will be taken once we find out exactly who is responsible for what has taken place. In my opinion there has been negligence, but I have not as yet been able to accuse those people responsible. When I receive a report I will do so. I might say that we had put out special orders in respect of these men sometime ago. They were supposed to be given special attention and watched particularly closely.

An hon. Member: That makes it worse.

Mr. Allmand: For some reason or other these orders I had given, and which had been given by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries, were not followed.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, the minister says he is still unable to indicate who is responsible, and yesterday he said he was disgusted. I should like to ask with whom he is disgusted, those of the institution, the Commissioner of Penitentiaries or has the Solicitor General now joined the opposition in its disgust at the lack of leadership shown by the Solicitor General of Canada?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am disgusted by the fact that we had issued special instructions in respect of men who had escaped before and who had threatened to escape again, that they were supposed to be watched in a very close way but they still escaped. I am disgusted with this particular thing. I intend to get to the bottom of it and apply disciplinary measures.

● (1200)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there have been none with myself. I do not know whether my colleague is in a position to respond to that.

Mr. Crouse: Then, Mr. Speaker, I would direct the question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of recent discussions which took place in Halifax between the government and Shaheen interests. To this moment the federal authorities have not been involved except in a peripheral way as to the development of Harbour facilities at Canso. That is the limit at the present time of any overtures made to us by the government of Nova Scotia, and these were quite general.

Oral Questions

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

HAZARD CREATED BY KRAZY GLUE—REQUEST FOR CONTROL OF SALE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the darling of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the serious hazard to children of a glue called "Krazy Glue" which is a very powerful sealer and is advertised as "Krazy Glue", and in view of the fact that it is on sale to children and one eight-year old child had his eyes sealed shut by this material, will the minister ban its sale to children?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that my department controls the labelling of such products. I am informed that the label indicating it was a dangerous product did appear on the product in question; the company did not infringe regulations.

Unfortunately, I must recognize that the product did cause serious damage and that it can be very dangerous for the eyes. I hope any consumer who will buy this kind of dangerous product will be extremely careful.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Again I find great difficulty in respect of some of the answers given here. In view of the fact that the label contains the words "not intended for the use of children" in type about the size of one millionth of a milligram, and is such that any seven-year old or ten-year old would find it very difficult to read, would the minister consider instructing the manufacturer of this product to use large print and instruct the retailers not to place this material in the toy department section of their stores?

Hon. COLD STORAGE FACILITIES—INSPECTION BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he requested or will he be requesting officials of his department to carry out an inspection in respect of the quality of storage and storage equipment facilities containing what has been reported as a fairly large turkey stock in this country. I emphasize that I am referring to the storage facilities themselves and not their contents.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the authority we have under the Department of Agriculture for cold storage I am sure is being exercised, but I will double check to make sure that what authority we have is followed. If we have authority to check these cold storage facilities to see that they reach a certain standard, I will do so.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 23 consideration in committee of Bill C-31 for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31 March, 1975—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: When the House concluded its considerations yesterday, Schedule A of the bill was being discussed. In accordance with the understanding of yesterday the committee will now proceed to the estimates of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs whose estimates are listed at pages 29 and 30 of the bill.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rises on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order in the hope that we may have some understanding about the division of our time for today. It is in accordance with the understanding we have had that we are now starting the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I think we should have an understanding concerning how long that discussion continues. The other department we are to deal with today is the Department of National Defence. If we were to finish our consideration of that department, we could then move to the Department of Indian Affairs. There are almost eight hours left for debate today. I would offer the suggestion that the committee agree that discussion of Urban Affairs end not later than five o'clock.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I think five o'clock would be a good time at which to cut off the proceedings. If that is agreed I should like to speak to another small point of order if I may.

The Chairman: Perhaps we should solve one point at a time. Does the committee agree that the proceedings on the consideration of the estimates of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs continue until not later than five o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, may I say with the greatest respect that last evening we ran into some difficulty in connection with procedure. I want to bring it to your attention so that various members who have various ideas on housing will have twenty minutes in which to express them. I ask you to take into account that if a member chooses to take up his twenty minutes in putting questions to the minister regarding his program or chooses to make a speech, or a combination of questions and answers and speeches, the time allotted to him will be twenty minutes. That is the agreement we reached last evening and to which the President of the Privy Council agreed. I hope that we can proceed on that basis because if we get into another procedural argument, we will lose time.

● (1210)

The Chairman: Order, please. Am I to understand that a member should be allowed either to make a speech or ask questions but that no member should have the floor for more than twenty minutes including questions, speech and answers? Of course, enough latitude will be given to the Chair so that if a question requires a fairly long answer the Chair can be lenient so far as the twenty minutes are concerned. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On Schedule A—Urban Affairs

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the agreement on procedure, and I am quite happy to go along with anything that the House decides—indeed, I have to do so. I welcome this opportunity, particularly as a new minister and especially as I am new to this portfolio, to discuss the portfolio and its various aspects as well as its estimates with hon. members today. I think that if we can look at it in that light, we can achieve a great deal by finding out what the ministry and its three facets are attempting to do, what the objectives of this House are, and what are the concerns of members of both sides of this House. We have here the blue book. I must say that in the six years I have been a member of parliament I have not really learned how to master that impressive document. However, I am blessed with excellent officials who will be of great assistance.

As hon. members know, there are three principal hats within my portfolio: first, the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs; second, the National Capital Commission, and third, CMHC. I have not recited them in any particular order of importance; they are all equally important, but I have put them in that order because I intend to deal with them in that way.

The Minister of State for Urban Affairs is concerned with urban growth and the pattern and quality of that growth in this country. If we look at the projections for this nation, we see that 90 per cent of all Canadians will be living in urban centres by the end of the century. If the present trends are permitted to continue, one third of all Canadians will be living in three major centres around Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal. As great as those cities are, our concern is that such a trend is not desirable, but I think it would be unrealistic to pretend that we can reverse it. However, if we can shape it and manage it in some way, even divert it by as little as 3 per cent, 5 per cent or 7 per cent, that would represent a massive shift. But, more important is that we should decentralize the concentration in these areas to make sure that the quality of the development and of the growth is of a kind that is acceptable and one to which we as Canadians would aspire.

As minister I have great difficulty in determining where "urban" begins and ends because I think it starts on the farm and in the smallest community. Unless these are vibrant and good places in which to live, people will flock to our cities. Cities are great places in which to live, but I think they should be places of choice and people should not be pressured into moving into those centres. There are different ways of approaching this matter. We are concerned about the quality of life both in the smaller communities and in the larger centres, but especially in the cores of those communities.

The Ministry of State for Urban Affairs set up some three years ago is relatively new. My two distinguished predecessors have been experienced, able and sensitive ministers and they have established the trilevel process which means that all levels of government confer together about problems of mutual interest in relation to the urban fact in this country. This is not an easy process. The provinces and municipalities have their jurisdictions which they guard jealously. It is not by accident that they are there. I think there is something valuable in our system of government which allows each of us to deal on a priority basis with those matters which we can best handle. I reject the term "senior and junior levels of government" because I do not think they are really applicable. They are just different levels of government, and a case could be made for each level being the most important. They are all important and different, and the trilevel process helps to bring us together in a mutual cause to discuss matters of mutual interest and learn where each fits and can help the other.

Perhaps one of the most significant moves as a result of the second trilevel conference in Edmonton was the establishment of an independent trilevel task force on municipal finances headed by Dr. Deutsch. This is very important because municipalities themselves have been deeply concerned about their tax base. I do not think anyone acknowledges that a proper tax base is the most equitable, the best that can be devised, but we do not know what the answers are. Some people suggest federal tax transfers or provincial tax transfers, but I think we all recognize the fact that it is very easy to spend money that someone else provides. It is the very essence of our democratic system that we are elected to carry out the trust of the people. In some ways I think we should be called trustees rather than members of parliament. We initiate programs and tax people for the money to implement those programs. We take responsibility for that at election time or, conversely, we do not implement programs and we do not tax people, and we take the responsibility for that also.

I feel deeply, therefore, that it is important that the level of government which spends should also take the responsibility for that taxation. I could go on to give examples of other jurisdictions with other municipal income taxes. Strangely enough, they have not been all that successful, as I have found in speaking to the mayor of one of our major cities this morning. The municipalities have the responsibility for taxing, but it becomes a very different thing when you leave that responsibility to someone else and you just have the responsibility for spending. That is fundamental to our system of responsible government.

An hon. Member: Then, why don't you bring the estimates back to the House?

[Mr. Danson.]

Mr. Danson: There are other things in the ministry which are of particular interest. One is the railroad relocation and crossing act which offers a unique opportunity to the provinces and municipalities to join us in redeveloping, particularly central cores, regenerating them where they have been blighted by railways, and making them into better communities in which to live. Certainly, we must co-ordinate the federal presence which is considerable in most urban centres. Federal land holdings are considerable. There are some 200,000 acres of federally owned land in urban centres across Canada which are not usable for housing but which could be strategic land if used for recreation in the development of cities and towns. We have established a special policy of land management in the federal government and hon. members might be interested in this.

● (1220)

First, the federal government will, by and large, no longer sell its land holdings which are surplus to needs of government departments. Public lands will remain as much as possible in the public domain so the public has a basic decision to make on that land use.

Second, when a government property is no longer required by the department which is using it, a rapid examination will be made by the urban affairs ministry to determine what should be the best use of that land in urban terms. This will ensure that the redevelopment of federal properties takes place in the light of urban rather than purely narrow financial considerations.

Third, all important federal land holdings in major cities will be systematically reviewed on a cyclical basis to ensure they are being put to best urban use. I could go on at great length, Mr. Chairman, on the urban affairs aspect of my portfolio which is included in the estimates today and this may come out in my discussions.

I should like to mention the National Capital Commission because it is of special interest to members of parliament and to all Canadians. In my list of priorities, the capital city must first of all be a good place in which to live and work; that is the primary function of an urban centre. Second, it must be the capital city for all Canadians. All Canadians must feel at home here, must feel comfortable here, no matter what region they come from or what their mother tongue. We have development plans for the core area and the linking of the Ottawa and Hull regions. We have a regional plan as well for the greater national capital region.

I hope all hon. members have read the annual report issued last week by the National Capital Commission. It suggests some very interesting things and puts forward some good ideas for the national capital region. We will shortly be issuing the concept plan of the National Capital Commission. This looks at the development of the area for the next three decades. It follows the Greber plan which has been used over the last 20 years. We now have an opportunity for a new approach. We also have the Fullerton approach which deals with the governmental structure for the region. These present a unique opportunity to examine the reports and the expertise that have accumulated, and it is for that reason that in the Speech from the Throne we proposed a joint committee of federal houses to study the national capital plan, the concept plan, the Fullerton report and any other information that comes to hand. I think we all have a special interest in this.

I strongly suspect that hon. members are primarily concerned with the housing situation today, although I hope it is not their only concern. I think the record of this government gives us reason for pride as Canadians, though not for complacency, of course. The Economic Council of Canada said that over a five-year period, from 1968 to 1973, it would be necessary to build millions of homes in Canada. That was quite a challenge. As a matter of fact, as a candidate in 1968 I said that if we did not achieve that objective I would not stand again as a candidate for my party.

Mr. Woolliams: Then, you had better sit down.

Mr. Danson: No, we have exceeded that goal year by year. We have exceeded 200,000 homes every single year and have established records one after the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Relate that to population change.

Mr. Danson: This is quite a good rate of progress. In the six years there have been 1,350,000 homes and in the same period there have been 700,000 new family formations. Quality of housing has also improved, although there are naturally areas of concern. We still have a long way to go with those who are socially deprived, who have financial and economic problems, and with the native peoples and others.

Quantity itself is not enough. There must be quality of housing and good distribution in all regions and at all economic levels. Our concern must be for those who are most vulnerable and not able to afford housing. Some people suggest housing has been used as an economic tool, but if you look at the budget you will find that each year more money has gone into housing.

The new program which came into being in 1973 was in operation for only half of that year and our capital commitments for that year were $923 million. The capital budget for 1974, the first full year of the revised act, is $1,262 million. Of this budget, 77 per cent is committed to housing programs and the balance for land, sewage facilities and other operations considered as infrastructure. Of the housing budget, 95 per cent has gone into low cost housing for people who cannot normally afford it and some of the 5 per cent balance has gone in CMHC's role as lender of last resort in regions where lending institutions are not normally active. A high proportion of the 5 per cent has also gone into low and moderate priced housing.

One of the most interesting innovations of my predecessor was the Assisted Home Ownership Plan, or AHOP. Some people said it would not work because the price limits were not realistic, that they were too low. But a funny thing happened on the way to the forum, Mr. Chairman. People started to look for housing in the price range and, because of tight money, builders realized this was where they could get funds so they started to build houses within the price range. It has had the effect of supplying homes and bringing down the price. We know that in many major centres prices were set at what the traffic would bear and not necessarily related to the cost. In 1974, $300 million was budgeted for that program and its success resulted in a substantial increase of the budget. It produced some 20,000 homes for 80,000 or 90,000 Canadians. Part of that was for existing housing and part of it for new housing.

It soon became apparent that the success of this program was one of its greatest problems, and that we would have to increase the supply of funds. In effect, we had to make a trade-off. Rather than have the program work simply for people getting housing, we wanted to use what funds were left to increase the housing stock. I know it is a disappointment to some people that it was not continued for existing housing but I felt that we had to conserve our resources and use them where they would be most effective. During my term as minister, this is the approach I will be taking—to get the maximum leverage out of the taxpayer's dollar.

Public housing in this country has been a great success. In the last six years the stock has been increased substantially and more housing has been produced in this period than in the previous 22 years. That is not a bad record.

Mr. Gilbert: It is still only one per cent of the total housing stock.

Mr. Danson: My hon. friend mentions the one per cent figure. I understand his concern, as I know the constituency he represents. We need new housing. We are not producing old new houses, if I may use that term. We need new houses. As far as we are concerned, 95 per cent will go to those income groups we have mentioned.

I am concerned about the reluctance of municipalities to accept public housing. I think politicians can give leadership in this field. People must not be gun-shy and say "No, we do not want these people in public housing in our area". Some people respond too quickly this way, and the solution requires leadership.

You cannot lead people who do not want to be led. Through leadership we must provide a voice which will be responded to in the community, so that we may develop a cohesive housing policy for the betterment of society. This will not come about by itself. It needs people to do it. We must recognize that this is a problem we must all face. We must also realize that there is a need for public housing. The attitude of people should not be, "Let them build public housing in an area other than mine." We cannot approach our problems in that fashion. On the other hand, if we accept our responsibilities we will become mutually enriched.

I could talk about non-profit and cooperative housing, which is a relatively new national force in the housing picture and deserves attention. The program is not increasing housing stock very much, but it is an important factor.

Let me say this, Mr. Chairman. In the field of housing the government of Canada is not standing still. We have an immense number of programs at work. There is no simple solution to our problems. We can talk about lending guarantees, public housing, senior citizens' houses, student housing, land assembly programs and services, AHOP, our limited dividend rental programs, our cooperative housing, our mortgage investment corporation, the registered home ownership savings plan, of which I will speak more later, programs like NIP, RRAP, programs for rural housing, and so on. As I say there is an immense number of programs which can help us do the job and which we have modified and improved as we go along. I welcome hon. members' questions, so that we can discuss these things together.

Mr. Woclliams: Mr. Chairman, may I congratulate the minister on his new position. I have known him since he came to the House. I think all will agree with me when I say he is an affable person. He will do the best he can in the circumstances, as all will agree, I think.

The minister faces vast problems. The previous minister, to whom I was not quite so kind, was full of puffery but little came of it. That is what prompted us at the beginning of the session to ask questions about housing.

In the 20 minutes allotted to me I will talk about the housing crisis and see if we cannot arrive at some solutions. I will ask the minister some questions and expect short answers. So many questions need to be answered and only the minister and his departmental officials can help us.

First, the minister must accept that there is a crisis in housing. Why is there a crisis in housing? In responding to a question asked on October 2, the minister implied that there is no housing crisis, even though housing starts this year are down by 24.3 per cent. Although the minister said in the House that there is no housing crisis, he said the contrary when interviewed by Southam News Services on October 21. According to the article by Guy Demarino:

> Danson says he's 'about to present new ideas to cabinet' to help solve the housing mess. But any new ideas will take considerable time to be explained, developed, discussed, accepted, and financed—
> Danson also wants his cabinet colleagues to support a plan, under which public subsidies would be linked to private capital and lead to more homebuilding. The government would, under the plan, subsidize private lenders to bring the effective mortgage rate down to AHOP levels.

Clearly, the minister thinks there is a housing mess. It is no use talking about AHOP. Of the $500 million allocated, $437 million has been spent. The minister must go to the Minister of Finance and others who control the economy for more money. But they say "no, we are cutting back; we are in a tight money situation." So, I understand his moaning. The problem is truly great.

How many wage earners are buying new houses? According to the Toronto Star, about five per cent of wage earners at one time bought new houses. That figure has now sunk to zero. Wage earners cannot afford high-priced housing and the highest mortgage interest rate in history. In Vancouver, for example, because the vacancy rate has dropped almost to nil, rents are going up. Wage earners are going to the boss and saying, "Give us more money; we need it to pay higher rents."

Houses are not selling. Why? According to law firms across the country, CMHC and conventional mortgage loans are running at better than 11 per cent. If you lack the full down payment and need a second mortgage, you will pay between 18 per cent and 20 per cent. I foresee a decline in our economy and there will be more foreclosures in housing than this country has ever seen. Without exaggerating, what happened in the '30s will look like prosperity. The minister does not control money. The real demons are his colleagues who will do nothing about inflation. So, when he spoke today, it was like sneezing in a dust storm. It meant nothing.

[Mr. Danson.]

Now, let me ask some questions. Housing starts in 1974, compared with 1973, are down by 24.3 per cent, according to Statistics Canada. Why are these housing starts down? The chairman of the Conference Board of Canada looked forward to one million extra houses being built by this year. Yet housing starts have fallen below 200,000. That figure was picked out five or six years ago by the Economic Council of Canada. I want to ask the minister why housing starts are down and what action is being taken to meet this situation outside AHOP. Incidentally, I hope the hon. gentleman does not mention that word while he is replying to my questions, because it means nothing—he cannot get any money out of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Danson: The hon. member obviously recognizes that the basic problem is inflation, and he does not accept that the record of the present government compares more than favourably with that of any other government in the world in this regard. As I say, the real problem is inflation, which brings us to high interest rates. Despite this, our completions this year will be in the range of 250,000. Understandably, the hon. member is concerned about next year.

The admonition not to mention AHOP is unfortunately, I think, because the program has been highly successful. It would be unfair to exclude it when it is providing something like 20,000 units. Incidentally, the decline is not in new dwellings; the real concern is for rental accommodation in the coming year—multiple unit structures. This is where the emphasis will be placed, and I would draw attention to Section 15 of the National Housing Act which brings in the private sector. Possibly new methods will be required so that the immense resources in private funds available for housing can be directed to that field at lower rates. If we are to bring these rates down, it will be by subsidy. That is my objective—to bring the private lending institutions into the field. They have the funds, but cannot get them out working today because of the high interest rates.

Mr. Woolliams: I notice that according to the newspaper article the minister talked about subsidizing interest rates. I also noted, in the same article, that the Minister of Finance had said that in no way are there to be any subsidies. So, we are locked in.

I should like to ask the minister two questions. The first relates to the $100 million a year for land acquisition about which the former minister used to spread his chest. How much of that sum has been allocated and where were the land banks established—if anything was done at all? Has a further $100 million been allocated for this year? As we all know, the cost of land is the demon when we get into the realm of housing. In brief, how much was spent, where was it spent and does the minister have another $100 million this year?

Mr. Danson: This is a new program and I appreciate the hon. member's recognition of its importance. It is being applied right across Canada. It is not the intention to fund strictly $100 million a year; the program calls for $500 million over five years. I believe we have exceeded the $100 million in the last couple of years. In reply to the hon. member's question, perhaps I should begin by giving the figure for Alberta, which is $690,000. Then, Newfoundland... This can't be right surely—$6,910,000. Yes, that makes up the total. Newfoundland, $6,910,000. I didn't believe what I saw. But it shows what a Liberal government can do when there is a strong opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: Ontario, $19 million; British Columbia, $3 million. And so on. So this money is going out. The program is going on stream and we are just beginning to see the results. There is a terrific time lag here, as I am sure the hon. member would appreciate. But the program is going on stream.

Mr. Woolliams: The list the minister gave is still far short of $100 million. Alberta, $6 million, British Columbia $6 million, Ontario, $19 million—that is a long way from a $100 million. But is $100 million set aside this year?

I want to turn now, to the demonstration program. This involved $100 million to be spread over five years to finance what we call innovative programs. The intention was to look at new technological methods of cutting housing costs. As I pointed out in the House this scheme would cost more than $54,000 a day for every day it was in operation. I should like to know what experimental project has been carried out with that $100 million and where it has been built, outside one situated in the former minister's constituency, perhaps, to impress the voters.

Mr. Danson: First, as to the land assembly program. If the provinces respond there will certainly be another $100 million available this year for that purpose. As to the urban demonstration program, nothing as yet has been spent out of this fund. It is a very serious program. As the hon. member implied when one is spending $54,000 plus change a day it has to be treated seriously. This program extends over a five year period. An advisory committee consisting of highly qualified professionals has been set up, not to build any sort of gimmickry, or to build in any particular constituencies, but to put in concrete form real responses to urban problems. The committee knows I intend to be rather tough in this connection because I have the ultimate responsibility. This is to result not in any great schemes which will benefit mankind but in specific projects in Canadian urban centres or around them, for the benefit of Canadians. Purely theoretical exercises will not be considered. I know this is the feeling of the advisory committee as well. The first funding will be next year.

Mr. Woolliams: So nothing has yet been spent out of this $100 million. It has not built one house. It seems to me that this money should have been spent to help people build houses.

Let me draw the minister's attention to some figures I have here—these are put out by Statistics Canada. The cost of new houses in Canada has risen by 60.7 per cent in the last five years compared with 38 per cent in the United States. Mortgage interest rates in Canada have gone up by 76.9 per cent compared with 18.4 per cent in the United States. The cost of property insurance rose by 130 per cent in Canada though it rose by only 13 per cent in the United States. I could go on and on to show how inflation in Canada has eaten away the resources of the little man until he can no longer afford proper shelter.

Mr. Danson: Would the hon. member permit an observation in relation to those statistics?

Mr. Woolliams: I want to put one more question. The minister can comment then, if he wishes, at the same time as he replies to what I have to say. I am far from happy about the Prime Minister telling us he intended to give people $500 in lieu of not abolishing the 11 per cent sales tax. Then, during the election campaign, he said that the government would do it in the next four years. I ask the minister, how many Canadians have yet received these $500 cheques? I suggest not one. It is like an innovative program. Let me ask the minister whether he has any legislation ready yet to carry out this promise, or is this another election bluff like the promise to curb inflation?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman, I think it is worth observing, though I have not checked the statistics in this regard, that United States housing starts have dropped 50 per cent, compared with 23 per cent or 24 per cent in this country. I think that is of particular significance. Our policies have produced housing, theirs have not. I am not suggesting that we do not have problems, but I do not think that the situation is a crisis. Rather it is a problem, but a problem with which we can cope. Obviously, with housing starts dropping off south of the border almost 50 per cent, in what is one of the most advanced nations of the world, this is an indication that we are doing better. With regard to the $500 in lieu of sales tax, this is something that we have under active consideration. It was a commitment.

An hon. Member: It was a promise.

Mr. Danson: Yes, and I hope to be making an announcement within the next several days in this regard.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I have a few minutes left so may I just say this. I could go on all day asking the minister questions, but they all add up to one thing. The government has been full of words not deeds. In light of the fact that Canadians are now unable to get proper shelter, and in light of the fact that real estate agents are not selling houses, would the minister look into an outfit called Rentex. People looking for a home pay this outfit $50 to find a home for them and they have a monopoly all across the nation. I would ask that action be taken under the Combines Investigation Act.

I should also like to see an investigation in connection with a certain development around Calgary concerning the amalgamation of four or five companies. Not only is this happening in Calgary but it is happening in other cities, too. I did receive a letter from the president of a company in my area who complained about what was going on. Therefore, I ask the minister to look into this situation for the good of Canada and Canadians. I will now sit down since my time is up, and may I say I appreciate the courtesy of the minister for taking the time with me, even though he was unable to give me all the answers.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, last July and August I would have had no difficulty complimenting the Minister of State for Urban Affairs on his appointment. He is a very affable, likeable and competent type of person. But he has been a cabinet minister now for almost four months, and on the basis of his performance in that short period, and also the attitude of the government to one of the most serious problems facing the country today, the serious housing shortage, I am convinced he is really trying to smile and bluff, certainly from having listened to him for 20 minutes this morning. The housing crisis has rather serious consequences for most Canadians. I think that instead of becoming minister of housing he is becoming minister of hoaxing. He is pulling a cruel hoax so far as his attitude to, and inaction in, the housing field is concerned.

Why do I say that, Mr. Chairman? First of all, let me look at the Liberal promises made during the election. First was the $500 tax free grant to first time purchasers of new homes. The answer of the minister in the last five minutes was that this matter was still under active consideration. An amount of $500 is very small in light of the dramatic increase that has taken place in the cost of housing during the last few years. In fact, in the year 1973 the increase in the cost of lumber and wood products amounted to $800 for the average home. The minister now says he has under active consideration a $500 grant to first time purchasers of new homes.

May I mention to the minister that if he were to remove the 11 per cent sales tax, not on all homes but particularly on homes priced in the moderate to middle income bracket, there would be a saving of $1,300 on the average home. From the minister's answer to the hon. member for Huron yesterday in regard to this grant, I have come to the conclusion that the minister is trying to bluff and smile his way through this serious problem.

Secondly, I remind the minister of another election promise of the Liberal party, namely that they would direct more national housing mortgage moneys into moderately priced homes with low down payments. This was given great thrust when the Prime Minister made his western trip. May I tell the minister that the limits set were so low that they would exclude virtually every house now on sale in our cities. That was the second promise of the Liberal party.

Thirdly, they said there would be a provision to allow homeowners to pay off mortgages in the first five years without excessive pre-payment penalty. The Prime Minister and speakers for the Liberal party made sure not to define the word "excessive". The question now arises, why should the average homeowner have to pay a penalty because he wants to pay off his mortgage within the first five years? This indicates the cruel attitude of the minister to people who are struggling to pay off their mortgages.

May I continue at two o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The Chairman: Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose at one o'clock the estimates of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs were under consideration, as found at pages 29 and 30 of schedule A of the bill.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, at the time of the adjournment I had stated that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs had changed his concept from that of minister of housing to that of minister of hoaxing. I suggest the reason for that is inaction by the government respecting the serious housing problem across the country. I gave as examples of inaction of the government the lack of action on the $500 grant for first-time purchasers of homes, and the government's attitude regarding NHA participating more in the mortgage field across the country, especially in respect of low-income families. The government set the limit so low that virtually no one in a city could take advantage of the program set forth by the Prime Minister during the election campaign. I also said that the government's idea of allowing home owners to pay for mortgages in the first five years without excessive prepayment penalty had not been put into effect by the government.

The fourth Liberal promise during the election campaign was a change in the NHA regulations permitting CMHC to buy land and lease it to co-operative and non-profit housing organizations. The record in respect of this promise has been dismal failure. The president of CMHC said there is reluctance to provide funds, on the basis that projects could be unprofitable. The question of profit is hardly a criterion for co-operative housing. We have witnessed Toronto city officials and officials of the Ontario Federation of Labour coming to Ottawa to persuade the minister to become more active in supplying funds for non-profit housing and co-operatives. That action has been very slow.

The fifth Liberal promise during the election campaign was in respect of regional and local ceilings on NHA mortgages. This was to be done by regulation, but there has been no action to adjust the rates of NHA mortgages pertaining to different regions across the country. Those were the election promises.

Let me now come to the performance of the Liberal government and the lack of action by the minister of hoaxing. Regarding the supply of housing, there has been a dramatic decrease in the number of house completions and it is now almost certain, as the hon. member for Calgary North said, that in 1974 there will be a drop of approximately 20 to 25 per cent in house completions. This means a loss of $1.5 billion in wages and salaries to Canadian workers. Goodness knows, we have a serious unemployment situation especially in the forest products industry of British Columbia and Quebec where these men could be employed.

I am sure the minister knows that developers in large cities said in the spring of 1974 they would not build multiple units because their return did not compare with the return on land speculation or on the construction of single-family dwellings. We experienced a dramatic drop in housing starts because developers found they could make more profit on land speculation and building single-family houses. We have a serious crisis in housing rental units, especially in the large cities.

Today the minister pounded his chest as he talked about the Assisted Home Ownership Program.

An hon. Member: Not too hard, I hope.

Mr. Gilbert: The minister failed to mention that the substance of the proposal made during the election campaign was to raise the subsidy from $25 to $50 and that the eligibility limit for the subsidy was to be even lower for NHA mortgages. The limit in British Columbia was $32,000 before one became eligible for AHOP, and $30,000 in Ottawa, yet experience has shown that you can hardly buy the necessary land in our larger cities for that amount of money.

With respect to the cost of housing the record of this government is even more miserable and dismal. The cost of land and the cost of mortgage money have risen at a tremendous rate. Last year we heard what the Liberals and the Tories said when the Residential Mortgages Financing Act was passed. It was supposed to stabilize the flow of money by making mortgages more attractive. That was the purpose of the bill. Since the passage of that bill last year we have seen the conventional mortgage interest rate increase from 9.5 per cent to 13 per cent. This is what the Tories and Liberals did when they brought in the act to make mortgages more attractive.

In respect of the price of homes we have seen a slight drop because of buyer resistance to the cost of homes and the high interest rate. There has been a drop in Toronto from $57,000 to $55,000 for the average house. When I travelled through my constituency during the election campaign I was amazed at the number of empty houses owned by speculators which had "For sale" signs on them. The reason was that most of these houses were in the $45,000 range and required a mortgage of at least $35,000. To obtain a $35,000 mortgage on a 25-year basis, at a rate of interest of 11 per cent, would require monthly payments of principal and interest of $336.89. In other words, if you take yearly payments of $4042.68 for a period of 25 years, it totals $100,670.

Is it not obvious why there is such resistance to buying homes in our large cities? I now refer to the minister's attitude toward housing. We in the New Democratic Party say that every person is entitled to decent housing at reasonable cost. This has also been stated by the Social Development Council and, as the hon. member for Don Valley reminds me, by the federal task force. Let us consider the attitude of the minister. He suggests that people must choose whether to buy a house or have extras such as a car, boat, or other luxuries. He says that they cannot have both. I would remind the minister that many Canadians cannot have either; they cannot have a house or the luxuries he speaks about. I am amazed at his philosophy.

What is the minister's solution? He said he would encourage developers, through tax incentives, to build houses. He has the limited dividend section of the act through which he hopes to encourage them to build. I would remind the minister that in the last six years limited dividend housing has never passed 5 per cent of the total housing for the year. There was one exception, in 1970, when the sum of $200 million was directed toward smaller lots with smaller homes for Canadians.

This is the second part of the minister's philosophy. He has taken no action with regard to interest rate increases. He has done nothing in respect of a land bank. He has done nothing with regard to the $500 bonus plan. He has done nothing regarding the 11 per cent sales tax on certain housing. He has taken no action in respect of the 50 per cent capital gains tax, which should be at least 100 per cent. He has done nothing with regard to Indian and Metis housing in Canada. This is a very disgraceful performance.

My time is limited, but I must tell the minister what we in the New Democratic Party would do if we were facing the problems he faces. I shall sum it up in five sentences. First, we would bring land under public ownership and development through a $3 billion revolving fund for the acquisition of development land around our major cities. Second, we would institute a 100 per cent capital gains tax on land sales, with an additional surtax on speculative holdings of less than five years, in order to bring down the cost of acquisitions. Third, we would provide 100 per cent funding to provinces and municipalities to service land holdings. Fourth, we would provide 6 per cent mortgages for low and moderate income families. Fifth, there would be direct government intervention to ensure an adequate supply of moderately priced housing either through contracting out to private builders or, where necessary, construction by a government agency.

Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to take the initiative and change his philosophy so there would be a major thrust toward having Canadians decently housed at reasonable cost. I would rather call him a minister of housing than a minister of hoaxing. At the moment I would say he is perpetrating a cruel hoax on many Canadians.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, when one considers the responsibilities of the Minister of State in the field of housing and urban affairs, and the cheerful responses the minister offers the House, one is tempted to ask the popular question: Why is that man smiling? I have nothing but good wishes for the new minister. I would not want him to misunderstand me. I respect his talent and his good humour. I am very much afraid, however, that he is already falling very quickly into the complacent attitude that many of his senior colleagues in the administration have made a hallmark of this administration. If he could be redeemed from that fate before the cement sets hard around him, I would be very happy. This is one of the main reasons for my intervention today. It would be a shame to see a new minister, particularly one in this portfolio, become lost in the attitude that everything must be right after all because the Liberals are still in power.

There is much to be disturbed about in this country's affairs. A good portion of what disturbs me revolves around the government's cynicism, and repeated examples of it, in the realm of housing. Over the last couple of years the government frequently has said one thing and done another. It has promised, then deferred, and then done nothing more. Now we have a new minister along with the most recent flock of unfulfilled promises.

It seems to me that the minister and the government expect us and the Canadian people to sit around and wait for something to happen at some time in the future. I do not think that is good enough. The Prime Minister might well like us to believe that he is keeping his word when he states that the housing program promised during the election campaign will be implemented in the course of the life of this parliament—some four or five years—but his government will not in fact be meeting its responsibilities if it does not show determined leadership in bringing forward a housing policy at least to attack the immediate problems.

It seems to me the kind of policy required must be comprehensive and must involve more than simply some inventions by CMHC. It will require the co-ordinated effort of every department of government including, of course, housing, urban affairs, manpower, immigration, Indian Affairs and certainly finance. The minister may say we are not in a housing crisis—as he is fond of saying—but certainly we face a crisis in housing right now, a compounded crisis both in terms of cost and supply, because housing starts are down significantly and costs are up very dramatically. In five years—I think my figures are right—the cost of new housing has increased by over 60 per cent, according to Statistics Canada. That is just in respect of houses. If you include land costs, the increase over a period of five years for a new property including land is almost 110 per cent on average. Over the same period, mortgage interest rates have increased by almost 77 per cent.

A year ago we could see that housing prices and mortgage interest rates were increasing beyond the reach of most Canadians. One did not have to be very smart to see that. We could see, also that the housing market was becoming more and more an inflation shelter for those who could afford that kind of investment as hedge against inflationary expectations. The NDP member who just finished speaking said that in many instances it became a source of speculation and a hedge against inflation. Over and over again we and others warned the government that this was happening and that the little guy was being crushed in the process. There was no appropriate response from the government. Indeed, it was months before the government even conceded that our analysis was accurate.

Then, of course, we had the election campaign, bringing forth a flurry of activity, a basket of promises and AHOP. AHOP was made more generous. It had to be, because it certainly had become a rather sick joke the way it was operating. But now AHOP is all the minister talks about. Ask the minister the time of day and he will tell you about AHOP. The government's tactics, so far as defence is concerned, are "A HOP" a skip and a jump.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister appeared on the television program "Question Period" and said that in order to deliver houses and apartments at an economic price we must accept some compromises; that there are certain trade-offs which we might have to accept—for instance, green spaces. On October 7, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton asked the minister to clarify what this meant. The minister replied, in one of his more illuminating statements, as follows:

> This is an ongoing discussion with provincial and municipal officials as well as other people in Canada. Certainly, we have to treat this with great sensitivity, and I put as high a priority on parks and recreation as on any other element in the housing field.

An hon. Member: He made it sound better.

Mr. Stanfield: He may have made it sound better, but there was no more substance to it. I do not believe that the minister's answer clarified his earlier statement, and I say very frankly to him through you, Mr. Chairman, that I do not like what seems to be the general direction of the minister's thinking in this regard. I do not accept the position that provision of adequate serviced land will require the diminution or the reduction of green spaces in our cities. I say this as emphatically as I can, because it is very hard to get green spaces in cities. I do not know of any city in Canada which has too many of them, and I do not want to see green spaces lost through some alleged short gain.

To put it another way, I do not believe that the preservation of green spaces in existence precludes the adequate provision of land for home or apartment construction. The green spaces we now enjoy in our urban areas in no way caused the severe housing problems that we are now facing, and they must not be compromised as part of some half-baked solution to our problem of making available enough serviced land. I say, sir, that in this country there is no excuse for that kind of trade-off. The open spaces we have to do something about are not the green, open spaces in our cities but, rather, the gaping holes in the policies of the minister and the government. Who knows what the housing policy of this government really is? Is there any contingency planning to meet the crisis? There does not seem to be, from any evidence that I have seen. We are geared to conditions which generally do not apply now, if they ever did. Take the explosion in the price of land for residential development. It stands directly in the way of tens of thousands of ordinary, hard working families who want to own their own homes. I believe these people are justified in not viewing such prices as a necessary or acceptable burden.

The president of CMHC stated recently that the government is using all the devices that are available to increase the supply of serviced land. He said that the government could intervene heavily if housing starts fall much below 200,000 next year, but not before. Mr. Teron expressed the view that this number of starts is enough to allow us to hold our own without making any substantial improvement in the general living conditions of Canadians.

Does this government now believe that times are so good with respect to housing that it should do nothing more than make certain that things do not get any worse? Is that the attitude of the minister and of the government? I say that this country has every right to expect something better. For far too many low and middle income Canadians, the situation is quite intolerable. The government has, indeed, a moral obligation to avert shortages and another escalation, in prices next year and to improve vastly the situation which we are already experiencing.

With regard to land prices in particular, I believe that a major thrust is necessary to improve this situation and to ensure an orderly and adequate expansion of our housing stocks. The government, in conjunction with the provinces, must provide the resources to do that job, and provide them now. I say to the minister that this would be an investment in social and urban progress and, furthermore, it would both moderate inflationary pressures in this field and generate employment. The minister responsible for housing and urban affairs and the Minister of Finance should be launching such an initiative without delay. We will be looking for comprehensive responses and answers.

Mr. Marshall: It will come in the budget.

Mr. Stanfield: I will not wait for the budget. I am tired of sitting around waiting for the budget and I dare say the Canadian people are also darned tired of waiting for the budget. The Conference Board in Canada has predicted that if the government continues with its present approach—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: The windbag over there can just settle down. I don't know whether he was moved down to that corner so as not to disturb the House too much.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We are getting a draught here.

Mr. Stanfield: The Conference Board has predicted that if the government continues its present policy, we will witness a further decline in housing starts next year. If nothing is done quickly, and if the present trend continues, a severe housing shortage will develop by mid-1975, according to the board, and as we move into 1975 completions will begin to fall off unless the decline in new housing starts is reversed. Without such reversal the supply of new housing will be very tight after mid-1975, and that will inevitably lead to further upward pressures on rents and on housing prices. I suppose that is the government's anti-inflationary program. If we now had more adequate inventories of shelter in major areas, this restriction in supply would not be too drastic in its effects. But on the contrary, inventories in most urban areas are at extremely low levels.

A recent report of the Economic Council of Canada, entitled "Toward more stable growth in construction", contains the following words:

> Our analysis indicates that more stable growth in housing starts would significantly retard future increases in housing costs.

That is something which any government with the slightest interest in fighting inflation and helping the people should bear in mind. I continue reading from the report:

> With increased stability in residential construction, therefore, more and better housing could be financially accessible to the poor, and all participants in housing construction itself would probably also benefit.

I would hope that this government would at least do something to help housing and fight inflation apart from talking about the problem being international. Here is a lead for the minister. The report went on to say its findings indicate that a good part of the instability in housing construction stems from over-all instability in the economy and the instability of government monetary policies in particular. The Minister of Finance himself recognized this relationship when he said in the memorable May 6 budget address:

> Rates of interest are high, but the way to bring them down is to slow the rate of inflation. This will take time. Meanwhile, I expect the banks to continue to give preference in their lending to small business, mortgage finance for housing and borrowers in the less-favoured regions of the country.

However, sir, expectations are not policy and the Minister of Finance's management of the Canadian economy has led us, among other things, into another classic boom and bust cycle in housing construction. The severity of the problem and its impact on our society calls for effective action and we are not getting it. One reason the mortgage market is so difficult for someone trying to build a new home is apparent. In August, 1971, the percentage of NHA guaranteed mortgages being used to finance the purchase of existing homes was 5.6 per cent; in August, 1972, it was 8.5 per cent. In August, 1974, the percentage of NHA approved guaranteed mortgages being utilized for the purchase of existing homes, rather than building new homes, was 45.4 per cent. That was 45.4 per cent, Mr. Chairman, of NHA guaranteed mortgages being used, not to help purchase new homes but to help purchase existing homes. That is easy to understand, because the old mortgages which might have been on the existing homes were completely inadequate in view of inflated prices when the homes came on the market. This indicates the scope of the problem which the minister faces, and he just seems to be trying to smile it away.

Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister talks about leadership, and the Minister of Finance tells us time and time again that supply is the cornerstone of the government's anti-inflation program. Where is the supply policy for housing? It does not exist. Where is the comprehensive, anti-inflationary policy which is necessary to stabilize prices and mortgage interest rates? Where is the great leadership we heard so much about?

An hon. Member: In France.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I hope the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will himself seek some answers to these questions and that he will seek some other answers from his leader, the Minister of Finance and his other cabinet colleagues. I hope he will face up to these problems, because there is no time to waste.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I must intervene in this debate—

An hon. Member: Why regret?

Mrs. Holt: —and delay our brilliant Minister of State for Urban Affairs, but I must correct the record of this morning and enlighten the hon. member for Calgary North.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Did you set her up, Barney?

Mrs. Holt: I should like to advise the hon. member, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House and any more of their ilk, that I am not here because I am a pretty girl.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: I am not here because I am an ugly girl. I am not here because I am nice, and I am not here to please or displease. I am here because I am competent enough to detect the intellectual sham of the hon. member for Calgary North.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What has this got to do with housing?

An hon. Member: Who printed that for you?

Mrs. Holt: Also, I have the intellectual depth and training to know that he started out on the wrong premise. When he started discussing British Columbia, he was into my territory and did not know what he was talking about. Had he not spent so much time absorbed in his own eloquence and what is happening in this House, he might have known that the socialist hordes have taken over in British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That's why you are here.

Mrs. Holt: There is another one of the same ilk. I should like to suggest that the reason there are no housing starts there, and why there are zero rentals, is that there are rental freezes in British Columbia—in case the hon. member did not know about it. As far as building rental units is concerned, they are turning them into condominiums. Housing has gone out of reach; it has doubled since February because of rental freezes. As to the formula put forward by the hon. member for Broadview, we had a taste of it and I hope it never happens in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: Is British Columbia not part of Canada?

Mrs. Holt: Before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be appropriate to recognize that the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member sitting beside him have the same Neanderthal attitude.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Author!

[The Deputy Chairman.]

An hon. Member: Barney Danson.

Mrs. Holt: Because of that Neanderthal attitude—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I think we want to hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Because of their attitude, I should like to move that their salaries be reduced to one dollar per year.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the minister upon his appointment and hope he discharges his tremendous responsibilities with the courage needed to meet them. Before I speak about housing, I want to comment on what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said yesterday in suggesting that the condemnation of government spending should not be too great. He lectured us and said civilizations progress by spending money.

Let me say this. The times when civilizations have not made progress have been those when people have lacked confidence in the ability of their elected members to spend their money wisely and effectively. Unless we deal with estimates responsibly and effectively, we shall run into serious problems. Anyone who thinks that the estimates are handled properly in House of Commons committees obviously has never attended a committee meeting. Until the opposition is given proper staff, and until estimates are considered in the House of Commons, we shall see uncontrolled and improper spending, not because of fraud but because the estimates are not examined as people have every right to expect they will be.

I am delighted to have this opportunity to speak on schedule B concerning Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, found on page 30 of the bill. I am speaking on vote 10 which has to do with our total housing program and policy. I was astonished to hear the minister say this morning that there is no serious problem in housing. I should not have been surprised, however, because that is how members of the government talk about any difficult situation. We are getting to the stage with this government where there are no standards, no goals with respect to inflation and housing.

I cannot understand a minister who comes from the Toronto area suggesting that there is no housing problem in the urban areas of our country. I cannot understand other senior ministers suggesting that. Today the apartment vacancy rate in metropolitan Toronto is probably below 1 per cent, and everyone knows that unless a vacancy rate is 5 per cent, the rental market will not function properly. Allowing a vacancy rate that low to develop means that the housing problems of those in the rental market will be particularly severe this winter. Rents are rising. The standard rule of thumb used to be that one should not spend more than 20 per cent of one's income on rent. Today in Toronto people are paying 30 per cent, 40 per cent and, in the case of low income groups, up to 50 per cent of income for rent. That is a shameful situation. It brings degradation and real hardship to people with low incomes.

It has always been argued that people should not spend more than 2½ times their income on housing. The average family income in Toronto is about $12,000, which means that the average house should sell for $30,000. There are no houses for $30,000 in the area. People can no longer afford a home. Housing for middle income groups is not being built. It does not exist in our metropolitan areas.

At one time in this country people could choose their type of accommodation. Some like to rent, some to own. They cannot choose today. The difficulty is that they cannot find accommodation at all which is commensurate with their income. Considering our low density of population and the fact that we have all the things we need to build houses, the present situation is puzzling. How can one explain this very serious situation? I suppose the minister will blame it on inflation. Why should inflation cause our housing problems? Has inflation created the present housing situation? Even though the Minister of Finance thinks that inflation exists somewhere in the upper atmosphere, it is clear that not all inflation is imported.

If we want housing, we have all the land and materials we need. So why should we see in Toronto the highest housing prices on the north American continent? It makes no sense. You cannot blame our difficulties on inflation. Indeed, the reverse is probably true. The lack of housing starts and the fact that the supply of housing has not been growing adequately has contributed greatly to inflation. The increase in costs in the housing sector is responsible for much of the increase in the cost of living. The increase in housing costs obviously has been a major factor in workers asking for more income, which in turn brings more inflation. If we had a housing policy which worked, there would not be as much inflation in this country as there is today.

Housing starts are down 24 per cent this year. I want the minister to tell us why, if we must solve inflation by increasing supply, the supply of housing in Canada is dropping and therefore contributing to inflation. It cannot be suggested with any reality that our housing problem stems from inflation created abroad, but it may be argued that we have a serious housing problem because of the amount of inflation we have created domestically and the way we have tried to fight that inflation. Does the minister suggest that a major way to fight inflation is to raise interest rates? The government has followed this policy. High interest rates do not stem inflation. They contribute to it. Obviously, high interest rates do not slow consumer spending or capital investment, but high interest rates stop mortgage lending and the construction of apartment houses. I want the minister to tell us if he thinks you can slow down inflation by cutting down the supply of houses and whether raising interest rates will solve the problem.

The other day the minister said in the House—I do not want to misquote him—that we are moving away from boom and bust in housing in this country. We have not done that. The whole history of housing construction in Canada since 1946 shows a cyclical pattern involving high interest rates. The government follows a high interest policy and housing starts drop; it cuts down interest rates when the economy goes into a slump and housing starts go up. As a consequence, ever since 1946 we have had no sustained housing program.

We shall never cope with the housing problem until we eliminate this interrelationship between a monetary policy and housing. You see, all the programs the minister has put forward, in respect of which we are asked to appropriate some several hundred million dollars, will not accomplish very much at all; they will work only at the periphery of the difficuties. I support moves toward income-geared rental programs. I think we perhaps need land banks. I think we need more sewers, and so on. But these things do not really go to the heart of the issue. The real issue is whether we are to have a sustained building program which is unaffected by aberrations which may occur because of changes in general monetary policy. We have never, in this country, developed a well separated pool of funds to flow into the mortgage market, such as has been done through the building societies and savings associations in other countries. I do not know whether or not this is the answer for Canada; there are some drawbacks attached to it. But it is evident we shall never make progress until we tackle this basic issue.

The challenge to the new minister—and we all wish him great success—is to act with courage to face the fundamental issue. He must come to grips with the situation which has faced Canada ever since 1946, that is, the interrelationship between housing and general monetary policy. Does the government have any plan to partially isolate the mortgage market from the general monetary market, operating as it is? If not, no success can be expected in dealing with the housing problem as a whole. The only way in which people belonging to low income groups will ever get the housing they need lies in the industry increasing the supply of housing faster than the increase in demand over a sustained period in the metro areas. This can only happen if we devise a way of getting mortgage funds flowing into the market in a regular pattern.

I do not know whether the Minister of State for Urban Affairs wishes to adopt the same position as that taken by the Minister of Finance, namely, that inflation can be cured without causing any dislocation or trouble. No one who has studied the housing market since 1946 can help realizing that until there is some way of isolating the mortgage market more effectively we will not achieve the sustained pattern of housing construction needed to meet the needs of those living in urban areas.

Mr. Danson: Would the hon. gentleman like me to answer some of the questions he raised?

Mr. Gillies: I should like the minister to answer them all.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that a man as distinguished as the hon. member for Don Valley, a man with an academic background of some prominence before he came here, should now talk about isolating mortgage funds from reality. This is a government which deals in reality. We do not set interest rates in isolation from the real world in which we live. Any time we do that, we must do it through a form of subsidy in one way or another. It is better to understand this fact. If the hon. member is trying to hoodwink the people of this country, or even the members of this committee, along the lines that the government has set, or can set interest rates in isolation to reality, I think it is unfortunate. To suggest that we use it as a method of affecting the economy—

Mr. Stanfield: He did not suggest that.

Mr. Danson: Let me say this, then. We have consistently put more money into the housing market each and every year. In 1973 the figure was $923 million. In 1974 it is $1,262 million. There has been a constant pattern of increases of this nature. We have built more social housing in the past six years than was built in the previous 22 years combined. Members of the opposition ask, "Why don't you do something about it?" Evidently they were not listening when I listed 17 or 18 specific programs. When the Leader of the Opposition says we should do something about assembling land, I can only wonder where he has been. We have established a fund of half a billion dollars which is being used effectively and to which the provinces and the municipalities are responding. These are the things we are doing.

The hon. member for Don Valley raised a good point when he talked about the flow of mortgage funds. I am directing a great deal of my attention to this subject. However, I cannot come up with magical solutions because I have responsibility for taking action rather than criticizing. We must maintain the flow of these funds, but we cannot do it in isolation from world interest rates. We must do it in the real world in which we have to live. Most people recognize this fact. You cannot fool the people of Canada. Hon. members opposite could not do it in the last election, and they are not going to fool them again by this distortion of economics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: Consider what has been accomplished through the programs to which I have referred. Consider the limited dividend program. Members across the way said builders would not go along with it. But the money is there and the proposals are coming forward. We are prepared to break these funds loose. This is the way in which to use the taxpayers' dollars to the maximum advantage and break the money loose for low income housing. For the same reason, we have set up the mortgage exchange corporation. We cannot deny there is a problem, but every time there is a problem the opposition tries to turn it into a crisis. The people are not fooled by that any more. They know that life is not easy; that it is full of problems. And the government is here to deal with problems as they arise.

I feel there is a big market for investment of mortgage funds from outside this country. Many are interested in investing their money in Canada because, thanks to good government and the state of our economy, we provide a safe haven for it. I should like to see more aggressive methods used, perhaps by CMHC, to secure a greater share of this money for housing. If people abroad wish to invest a great deal of their money with financial security, they can easily find a safe investment and a productive return in this area. We will not get money into the mortgage market unless people respond to the real world. People will not invest in that kind of situation any more than builders will build buildings when there are rent controls.

I think I have answered a few of the points that have been raised. The question of supply is fundamental. This is why, when we talk about completion of houses, the fact that we will have completed 250,000 by the end of this year—the second highest in our history—is not a bad record for a crisis situation. However, the amount that the private sector is putting into existing housing does disturb me, especially in the hon. member's beautiful city of Halifax. I would urge the private sector to put a higher ratio of their lending into new, low cost housing rather than into existing housing.

Mr. Stanfield: That is the "real world" you are talking about?

Mr. Danson: Yes, that is the real world. In the program for which I am responsible, a great percentage of the funding is going into existing housing and is doing a job, namely, helping people to buy homes. This is the kind of trade-off that we have to face. Do we use this money to help people buy homes, or for the twofold purpose of buying homes and increasing the housing stock? I made that decision knowing that it would affect people adversely, but in the belief that the ultimate benefit of all is best served by concentrating taxpayers' money into new housing. Certainly, the thrust is to increase that supply and to use it with maximum leverage to improve housing standards for Canadians.

As a matter of interest, I might mention to the hon. member for Don Valley and to the Leader of the Opposition who also spoke about supply, that there were 130,000 new family formations, 30,000 household non-family formations—a new phenomenon, I suppose, in our society—and 25,000 vacancies or losses of older homes that had deteriorated, making a total of 185,000. So the total requirement to keep up with growth amounts to 185,000 starts or completions, whichever way you wish to put it. This compares with our record last year of 268,000 starts and 250,000 starts this year.

I recognize as a valid point that there will be difficulties next year. We are down 23 per cent to 24 per cent this year, compared with our American friends who are close to 50 per cent down. So there is a problem. Nevertheless, I suggest we are doing better at controlling inflation than almost any other nation in the world, and we can do even better. Hon. members will soon hear of the new programs that I propose to introduce into the House, or modifications of existing programs from which we have learned a great deal. These will improve the situation materially.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Don Valley has a few more minutes.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Chairman, I am astonished at the response given by the minister to the position that I have presented. Let me tell him that I am sure the people cannot be fooled all of the time. If the minister has the time, I ask him to look at the mail from his constituents who are trying to cope with the rising price of houses and higher rents in Toronto. In view of the statements he has made, how does he account for the fact that there is such a terrific housing problem in the metropolitan area of Toronto? People do not manufacture problems. Rents are going up as never before. Prices are so high because supply is down. There is no new construction because interest rates are so high.

I hope the minister is not suggesting that the government of Canada does not influence interest rates in this country. I was trying to suggest to the minister—this is a point that he missed—that he is dead wrong if he thinks that this government has not used, either directly or indirectly, housing as a stabilizing factor on the economy. It always has, and it is doing so now.

As minister responsible for housing, should he not now be putting forth a policy or program to remove once and for all the concept that we are always going to use housing, riding on the backs of people who can least afford it, as a stabilizing factor on the economy? Obviously, interest rates are influenced by many factors, but in 1946 the government of the day was able to bring in a direct loans program which moderated the impact of general monetary policy on the mortgage market.

What I urge this new minister, a man with the respect of every member of the House, to do is try to find a way to eliminate the use of housing as a stabilizing factor. It means nothing that there will be 240,000 house completions next year, if the year after the number is going to go down and then up again like a yo-yo, always in response to monetary policy. What we need, if we are going to solve the housing problem in this country, is a well organized and well oriented construction industry that knows there is going to be a continuous flow of mortgage funds.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Gillies: That is the real problem. These other considerations are just peripheral.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but he was given a little extra time since the minister's reply was at some length. May I also remind the hon. member for Hamilton West that if he wants to ask a question at this point, he will be using up his time; and there are other members who rose ahead of the hon. member for Hamilton West and who should be recognized first.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, I listened very closely to the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson). To my mind, he may be going in the right direction, but the way strikes me as slightly foggy. The government has certainly done much to encourage the building of single-family units in the last few years. Still, much remains to be done.

I feel that the main problem homebuilders, private or professional, must face is that of the exorbitant cost of water and sewer mains.

In 1968, it cost $45 a linear foot to install sewers and water mains in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver. The cost has now gone up to $90 a foot in those same four cities. Add to that the problems created by the persisting misundertandings between the province of Quebec and the federal government.

The Quebec Department of Municipal Affairs does not decide early enough with the federal government where grants will be made for the installation of water and sewer services to allow the interested parties to pay the cost. At a cost of $90 a foot, those services are much too expensive, in the case of a 100-foot lot, for a private citizen to ever hope to own his home.

To service costs must be added the excessive interest rates, the rise in building costs over the past three years, so that for a $20,000 investment, that is, an ordinary 4-room house, the monthly payment amounts to $325, that is, $250 for mortgage and $75 for services. Once you add to this the water and school taxes, you reach a dead-end. No citizen can afford to pay $325 a month in addition to taxes for a house. He is therefore compelled to look for an apartment to rent.

In the Sherbrooke area, the situation is not so critical as elsewhere, but in such large centres as Toronto and Vancouver, where land prices have increased threefold over the past two years, it has become impossible. In these cities, people cannot build their own houses, nor avail themselves of the benefits available from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which lends low rate money to those whose annual income is less than $10,000. These people must therefore look for apartments to rent. They are willing to pay excessive rents, as in Toronto for instance.

This creates decidedly an interesting situation. Therefore, I suggest that the minister should make it possible to have better coordination between municipal, provincial and federal governments. For the sake of those who want to buy land, it should be known once and for all where the provincial government will grant subsidies to provide services.

In his contribution to the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the throne, the minister said:

So far this year CMHC has made direct loans amounting to more than $568 million to finance more than 27,000 homes—about two-thirds of them new construction. I announced a few weeks ago that we were prepared to put $50 million at 8 per cent if builders in some of the larger cities would build housing for rent at agreed-upon moderate rates.

I would point out to the minister that builders are willing to build low-cost housing. But in view of the investment cost and the lack of cooperation from municipalities which do not have the means to help them, one has to realize that the contractor has built 40-, 50- or 60-unit building whose rent he estimated at $225 or $235 a month but for which he now has to charge $300 a month because prices are changing too fast. Such a project takes six or seven months or even a year to finish. The prices have changed so much that it is impossible for the developer to rent his apartments for a reasonable price. The minister also said that:

Earlier this year we secured the co-operation of private mortgage lenders who agreed that high ratio loans should be available only for housing in the middle and lower price range.

In my opinion, this is applicable to projects around a small town like Quebec city, Sherbrooke or Granby because, in or around those places nobody, except for a few isolated cases, thought of acquiring land and waiting until the municipality or the province decided to go ahead with development. Generally, the land was not bought by people with a view to taking advantage of the situation.

I am sure that in my area, Mr. Chairman, houses can still be built for $22,000 or $25,000. Of course, this would not be possible in Toronto or Vancouver. I had the opportunity to visit housing projects in Toronto, big construction projects for what was supposed to be moderately priced housing, but actually the apartments are renting out at $300 or $400 a month. This housing was built for people whose income is less than $12,000 a year. They just cannot afford them. The builders keep them empty for one or two years or often go bankrupt. and the CMHC only has a small amount to pay and has to have houses finished in order for them to have some sort of value.

If the minister has low cost housing in mind, he still has a long way to go in the future to manage it. The minister also told us that the government will establish for next year, as it did last year, a general classification for people who buy a moderately priced house for the first time. They have suggested that a $500 subsidy be granted as a form of compensation to those who are particularly in need of help to pay sales taxes on building materials. That matter was dealt with in the last estimates and I think that suggestion will be put forward again as soon as it can possibly be.

I urge the minister to go on in that way, but I think the $500 subsidy which would lower the cost of buying a house should be raised to $1,000. Most of all, the CMHC should ensure that the subsidy would really be used to buy the house. It would otherwise profit the contractor or the intermediaries.

I think the minister seems to go in the right direction, and I believe that this amount of $500 should be paid to the home buyer.

Mr. Chairman, the minister has also announced that he would relieve of a part of his income tax the buyer of a first house, whether it be a young couple or the individual who buys a single family home for the first time. I did not go thoroughly into his speech and I do not know whether the matter concerns only a single family home or a duplex, but I think it is the former. If his intention is such, I am convinced that we will pass a worthy legislation. That could contribute to relieve the congestion of large cities, and eventually allow everybody to own a house.

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter I would like to bring to the minister's attention. It concerns the scale used in respect of the salary which must be earned by the individual who wants to get a mortgage loan at a low interest rate.

Anyone who now earns less than $7,400 a year is not entitled to the annual $500 grant. I would like to suggest to the minister to increase the grant to $1,000 a year since, at the present time, according to the established scale, the person who really needs a house and supports a small family is generally the one who earns the lowest salary. Those who earn high annual salaries of $20,000 or $25,000 do not worry at all because they can easily buy a house.

On the other hand, for the one whose annual income ranges from $5,500 to $8,000, there is a difference of $2,000 which should be taken into consideration by the minister.

The minister said later that the year 1975 would be fruitful for the low wage earner who will want to acquire a house. As for me, I am not as optimistic as the minister, because I believe that the rate of interest must stop increasing or stay at the present level for at least one year.

On the basis of my personal experience, I can say that in 1974 my company built houses at an interest rate of 9¾, 10¼ and 11½ per cent. This is a significant change if we think about a $19,000 mortgage on a single family dwelling. It makes all the difference, and, finally, the person who was interested yesterday in buying a house will not be able to afford it tomorrow, because his salary will not have changed while his obligations and purchasing power will.

I believe that the minister would be making some progress if he could tell us when the interest rates of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will stop changing every three, four or six months and will finally be stabilized. In my opinion, this would be helpful.

I would also like to point out to the minister that to set the construction industry back on its feet, or at least to maintain it, it is essential that the person in charge of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation meet more often with the Minister of Municipal Affairs of each province so that cities can develop harmoniously. More land should also be made available to those who want to build a house.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We are now engaged in a debate involving individual members, but perhaps the House will bear with me for a moment. I have not heard the minister say one word about senior citizens. With all due respect, I think this is one of the most important aspects of the housing industry. I know the minister receives letters, just as other members do. I remember during the election, as I am sure the minister does, knocking on the doors of senior citizens on the third floor of buildings. I want to know what effort is being made by the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities working together to relieve this very serious situation.

Ever since I have been here the situation has been that the supply is nowhere near the demand. I want to know what we can expect from this department to give some relief to our senior citizens. I heard the minister emphasize the young and the middle-aged. I go along with him to a point, but I think the priority should be in terms of the senior citizens. What is his department doing in respect of this very serious problem?

Mr. Danson: Certainly, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has heard me speak about the young and the middle-aged. I think it is important that we be concerned about everyone. I believe my hon. friend has also heard me speak about my personal priority in the social field, which happens to relate to senior citizens. Because I do not wish to create any false hopes, build up expectations or play a game with the senior citizens, to whom we have great responsibility and for whom we have great respect, I want to make certain that I have the exact figures so that I may be specific. There are many programs involving the municipalities and the provinces. There is the limited dividend program. Some are non-profit programs and some are co-operative programs.

Mr. Alexander: They are not working, and you know it.

Mr. Danson: I want to make sure that I give the hon. member and the senior citizens an accurate answer in this regard. I hope the hon. gentleman will bear with me, and perhaps at the next opportunity to intervene I will give these figures precisely. I think, in all fairness, there have been improvements in some constituencies. Many members from all sides of the House have spoken to me about senior citizens' housing and are aware of the responses that have been made. There have been improvements; it is almost a minor miracle. I am not saying, however, that we have solved the problem. If the hon. member wishes to play games, that is up to him, but I intend to give an honest answer.

Mr. Alexander: On a question of privilege, as a member of the class of '68 I am a little surprised at the minister. At no time have I implied that I was playing games. I am shocked to think that the minister would look at the hon. member for Hamilton West and think he is playing games in this important area. He may talk about other constituencies, but I know that in Hamilton West, if I do not receive three or four letters a week from senior citizens in this regard, something is wrong. The supply is not there. It does not look as if the situation is changing at all. The situation may be different in some other constituency. But I want to know whether these people can expect relief. It is a shame that they should have to live in this standard of housing. The minister knows this as well as I do. He should not be bombastic about this problem.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member for Hamilton West, I must remind him that he took the floor first on a point of order and next on a question of privilege. I do not believe that in fact he had a point of order or a question of privilege; he rose to intervene in the debate. That would be acceptable except for the fact that the Chair had recognized another member of his party. If that hon. member is prepared to yield to the hon. member for Hamilton West, then the hon. member for Hamilton West may proceed.

Mr. McKenzie: I so yield, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I certainly accept the remonstrance given me and I shall now sit down, because I know I have made the point with the minister.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman, I rise on another point of order. Since this question was raised on a point of order, I would like to answer it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It is not a point of order at all. The minister is rising to speak to a point of order which was not, in fact, a point of order under the rules. At the next opportunity the minister has to rise, he may incorporate the answer in his remarks. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on the urban affairs estimates I wish to devote my time to Canada's housing problems and the need to assist Canadians in obtaining decent shelter at reasonable cost. It is a time for action, not reports, studies and statistics like the $100 million urban demonstration program that the Liberal government proposed last March. This $100 million study is nothing but a diversionary tactic and is clearly ineffective to assist in solving the existing housing crisis. The $100 million could be spent much more wisely, such as in providing serviced lots and reducing interest rates.

To say there is a national housing crisis in Canada is the understatement of the century. Housing costs are rising at a rapid rate. We must now look to new programs and approaches to provide more housing, and more economical housing. One area to which we must give careful consideration is the provision of more mobile homes and trailer parks. Mobile homes can be made permanent as they are a kind of prefabricated housing. Today I wish to present a new horizon for housing, namely, satellite towns and attractive residential parks. The popularity of mobile homes is increasing steadily. An estimated 25,000 new units were used in 1972 in Canada. More people are turning to mobile homes than to other more conventional types of residences.

Today I will speak of a more community-oriented type of mobile home area, with proper fire protection and facilities. Today, the lifetime family home has all but disappeared due to a wide variety of social and economic causes. People move about with mounting frequency. This factor of mobility in modern family life has reached the point where it warrants due consideration in every urban study. I should like to quote from a recent news release entitled "Canadian families are moving more". It reads:

> More Canadian families moved from one city to another last year than in 1972, says the Coast to Coast Real Estate Service.
> A survey of long distance moves shows that 21,777 households were relocated in another city during 1973 compared with 17,493 a year earlier.
> More than half the trips originated in Toronto, Montreal or Ottawa, about 20 per cent in Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver and 10 per cent in Halifax and Quebec city. The balance of the long distance transfer business was shared by other major urban centres such as Hamilton, Regina, Saskatoon and Victoria.
> Coast to Coast Real Estate Service is an association of more than 100 realtors in 187 offices across Canada.
> Frank Hodges, vice-president and manager of corporate relations for A. E. LePage Limited, Toronto, a real estate company, said recently nearly 750,000 families changed their place of residence last year, the vast majority within the same city or to nearby communities in the same province.
> If the trend in the mobility rate, as indicated by family allowance statistics, continues, he said, Canadian families a few years from now will be moving once every three years.
> "Being moved has become a way of life for certain occupations", he said. "Our own experience would seem to show that the number of household relocations is evenly split between government departments and agencies and private business".

A typical case is that of a head of family transferred by his company to another city. Commonly, the wife and family stay behind until the house is sold and the current school term is finished. Houses take time to sell. As the holiday time draws near, the wife becomes increasingly anxious to sell. Far too often it happens that in order to resolve the long uncertainty and rejoin her husband, she takes a beating on the sale. At the other end, the husband is unfamiliar with the prices of houses in the city to which he has moved. He also has a deadline in the purchase of a home, and it is quite possible for him also to take a beating on the price he agrees to pay. At both ends someone pays a substantial real estate commission. Excellent jobs in faraway places are constantly presented by Manpower, but they are often beyond the reach of the man who owns his home. This type of situation works to the disadvantage of both employer and employee.

Circumstances such as these, together with the rising cost of houses, have created booming trailer sales across the country. But trailers have their limitations. In many ways they are a poor substitute for a conventional home. But the market continues to expend and where sufficient need exists, development will follow. It may well be that mobile homes will evolve in ways that have not yet been considered. A possibility with a seemingly great potential is that of a combination of the old and the new. Why not have basic mobile units with supplemental stationary living space available, on a rental basis, in designated residential areas in every major population centre of the country?

The two sections of the mobile home would be readily attachable. This is the only part of either unit that would need to be standard. The mobile unit is not too large, as trailer sizes go, but it is completely self-contained. It would make a practical, low-cost home for several years for a newly married couple. Any time they wish, they can obtain a supplementary unit on a rental basis, and if and when they want to move all they have to do is move their furniture out of the rental unit into their mobile home and they are ready to go. They can turn their mobile unit progressively into a two, three or four-bedroom house complete with basement, in any part of the country, as the family's needs expand, and when the children have grown up and moved away the parents are not faced with the costly problem of disposing of a house that has become too large for their needs. They can go back to their original trailer unit and in retirement or old age move anywhere they wish.

This type of combination unit lends itself to satellite towns, slum clearance projects, new mining towns in out-of-the-way places, and especially to armed forces personnel. Both the supplementary and the mobile unit are within a wide price range, and also there is a wide choice in the type of lot on which they can be located. Spacious lots with lawns and gardens, or modest lots at a minimum price may be available. A sufficient number of lots would have to be available for unattached trailers as well as combination units. Mobile units will have to be somewhat wider than highway regulations now permit, but if the need arises both the legislation and the highways will adjust.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

There is an opportunity for radical change in both the design and methods of construction of mobile units. Not only the mobile unit, but the relatively small and simple stationary section could be built in a centrally located factory on a mass-production basis and easily moved to the desired location. The plumbing facilities will all be in the mobile unit, the heating will be electric, with the panel located in the mobile unit. The mobile unit will tend to become more like a conventional house and less like the present type of trailer.

The wheels could be eliminated and the chassis redesigned in such a way as to allow for ready transportation on a low-bed unit. The present practice is to move the trailer with a rented tractor, so why not have the tractor supply the wheels also and carry the mobile unit instead of pulling it? This would save a great many sets of wheels which are seldom used and it would reduce construction costs. The mobile unit will have to be placed on some type of surface foundation with a heated crawl-space. It will have to be sufficiently light and rigid to lend itself to moving.

The mobile unit plan I propose takes up an area of 488 square feet. The construction cost of conventional homes today is approximately $22 or more per square foot, exclusive of the price of the lot. At that price, the cost of a dwelling of this size would be approximately $9,900. This price, however, includes a basement, installed sewer and water lines, and municipal fees, which altogether would amount to at least $2,800. This would reduce the cost to $7,100. Add $300 to this price for selling costs, and we have a round figure of $7,400. With the economy of large-scale, mass-production methods, this is a realistic figure. With a down payment of $500 and a subsidized rate of 8 per cent, a monthly payment of $78.87 would pay off the balance owing in 12 years. The three-bedroom supplementary rental unit has 390 square feet of floor space. At $20 per square foot, construction costs will amount to $7,800. This figure includes complete plumbing and kitchen and bathroom cabinetwork, but these are in the mobile unit. The control panel for the electrical heating and lighting is also located in the mobile unit. There is also the factor of centralized mass-production methods of construction. Altogether, the saving per square foot could amount to as much as $2,600. Building lots in developments specifically designed for the purpose, beyond the scope of the land speculators, might start at a minimum price of $2,500, with larger and more expensive lots available. We thus arrive at a minimum cost of approximately $7,700.

If the residential park is owned by a Crown corporation and operated on a non-profit basis, the basic cost to the tenant would be taxes, interest on the investment, depreciation and administration. Interest at 8 per cent on $7,700 amounts to $56 per month. Taxes on a dwelling of this value should not run over $25 per month. Let us say a minimum rental of $85 per month for the three-bedroom unit, with four bedrooms costing a little more and two bedrooms a little less. The rent on parking space for the trailer alone would run from $5 per month up, depending upon the area required and the number, if any, of school-age children. It thus appears that payments on the mobile unit, plus the rental on a supplementary unit, could be held to a minimum of $110 per month.

In the time it would take for a newly married couple to reach the point where a supplementary unit became necessary, the monthly payment could be held to a minimum of $55 to $60. With the addition of the supplementary rental unit, the price would go up to $110, where it would remain until the mobile unit was paid for, at which time it would drop back to the $65, more or less, rental for the supplementary unit. When the children grew up and moved away, the rent could be reduced to the price of a parking lot for the mobile unit alone on the basis of a childless couple, perhaps not over $10 per month.

This is a housing concept of a truly revolutionary nature. It may have sufficient merit to become a major factor in the building industry. Five hundred residential parks, with an average capacity of 1,000 dwellings, including both single and combination units, might not be too much to look for in the first five or six years of operation. The provision of so many low-cost homes of this type could not fail to have a profound effect upon all other types of housing. It would have a powerful effect upon the currently inflated prices obtainable for every type of older home.

The type of residential development required could be designed to be aesthetically acceptable. There would be trees and lawns and boulevards and playgrounds for the children, as in any modern suburb. In every case, the supplementary unit would be in front and the mobile unit hidden from view at the rear. In the residential parks, there also could be variations in exterior design. Many variations and improvements would be sure to follow if the project is put into operation.

No doubt there will be criticism of my proposal, but I hope it is constructive and perhaps others will have new ideas and innovations to put forward. But mainly, we must take drastic measures to lower housing costs. I believe my satellite town proposal is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I want to begin by congratulating the minister on the portfolio which he now holds. When he and I came to this House in 1968, we were seatmates. I did not think he would go so far to get away from me. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Don Valley and the Leader of the Opposition refer to the minister as affable and say that he was seemingly trying to smile away his problems. I would suggest to them that they not underestimate the tenacity and competitiveness of the minister. They should not be misled by his affability or smile, because the minister has a very enviable war record. He came through the war and established a business, making a huge success of it. He has fought three successful election campaigns and now sits on the treasury benches. All this should be an indication of the toughness and tenacity of the minister. I would say, if they need to be reminded on the other side, that they should speak to the gentleman who spent almost a quarter of a million dollars in two elections trying to take the seat away from the minister.

Mr. Alexander: Let's get into the housing problem.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Hamilton West thought the only way he could get into this debate was by bootlegging a point of order and a question of privilege. He indicated his concern for social housing, and I know he has that concern.

Mr. Alexander: You betcha.

Mr. Cullen: The problem is that when his party was in power, unhappily they did not have that concern. Can you imagine how many senior citizen housing units we would have today if they had come up with the idea in 1957-58? Now we have to catch up because of the failure of that party.

Mr. Chairman, I, too, was sitting as a backbencher and considering the AHOP program and listening to the opposition's criticism that it would never be used. Not only is it working, but funds are running out and in some areas they ran out because of its success. I think the former minister is to be congratulated for this and I hope the present minister will be successful in obtaining more funds for the program.

The members who have addressed the committee today, Mr. Chairman, have been mainly from our larger centres, such as Halifax, Don Valley, Toronto, Broadview, Vancouver and Hamilton West—with his bootleg comment.

Mr. Alexander: That's all right. I made my point.

Mr. Cullen: We have not heard as much from the smaller areas and I should like to make a representation on behalf of the Sarnia-Lambton area. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent is not present, but I know he shares my concern over the impact of the expansion of the petrochemical industry in the Sarnia-Lambton area. There is going to be a desperate need for housing there.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has suggested a program. Perhaps that is the way we will have to handle the problem of many people moving into a particular area, because of construction, who will ultimately leave the area. That is the kind of positive response that I like to hear from members of the opposition; not just criticism but positive suggestions. I do not know whether the hon. member's idea has merit, but I think it warrants study.

The mayor of Sarnia has written to the minister on behalf of the city and its environs, indicating that in the next five or six years 6,000 or 7,000 people will be in the area at one time. This is a matter of serious concern, not so much to the city of Sarnia but to the townships, because there is no more room to build within the city boundaries. The township have the problem of becoming dormitories only, because they have to rely on a real estate tax base that has not much industry. This problem should be resolved by the federal government, the provincial government and the municipal governments working in co-operation.

I am happy that the deputy minister of housing for the province of Ontario met with the mayor of Sarnia. They have announced that there will be an area housing study. I would ask the minister to give consideration to lending some personnel from his department to participate in this study. The minister speaks primarily of ten critical market areas, but it seems to me that one more should be added—the Sarnia-Lambton area. I do not think municipalities can handle a problem of this scope, because they do not have the tax money available. It should not be left entirely to the provinces, either. This is a situation where the three levels of government should get together.

Why are we so sensitive about this problem, Mr. Chairman. People in the Sarnia area remember when the Polymer Corporation moved in during the war; they remember the emergency that resulted from the construction which took place. There was an influx of people and we ended up with a section of the community called Blue Water. Houses were just thrown up. Then 15 or 20 years ago we had the expense of clearing out that area, expropriating and compensating people for their substandard homes and moving them to other parts of the city.

There is a little time left, and we want to avoid problems. Therefore, I hope the minister will consider the representations of the mayor which were set out in a letter he wrote the minister and the Minister of Finance. This project concerns an area larger than Sarnia. If the kind of expansion Alberta is embarking upon takes place, such a program could form a pilot project which could affect people who are required to move out of an area once construction work has ceased. I think in this way light could be shed on how to cope with a serious problem.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I join my colleagues in congratulating the minister upon his appointment, and wish him well. Considering the poor act he is following, he cannot help but look good. From what the minister said in the House and in committee, one would think there is no housing problem, that talk of slums and inadequate housing is nothing more than a rumour started by 200,000 or 300,000 Canadians who live in substandard houses. Some of the programs the minister announced are not performing the function intended for them. With all these intials, NIP, LIP, LEAP, AHOP, and so on, I expect that in ten years we shall have a third official language in Canada.

The neighbourhood Improvement Program is not working as well as it should. It discriminates against the poor provinces because, although the government agrees to make funds available under the program, the balance must be made up by the municipality or province, which may not be financially capable of providing the required equity. For example, under the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, the government gives as a grant 50 per cent of the cost of a project and lends 75 per cent of the rest. This must be paid back by the municipality, and the province must also come up with a substantial amount of equity. It is no use providing, say, $.5 million to St. John's, a city of which I can speak with some authority, because the city cannot match the government's offer and cannot undertake the program.

What is the minister's motive in restricting assisted home ownership for new houses? I suggest the reasons given by him justify a continuation of the application of the program in the purchase of older houses. Not everybody who can qualify for AHOP can afford or wants to buy a new house. I suppose the minister thinks that if AHOP applies to new housing, it will boost the building industry and result in increased starts and completions. Obviously, his plan is failing. In September of this year housing starts were 34 per cent below those of the previous year. The program is not proving effective in providing new homes, and the results are apparent with the lumber industry and with trades connected with the building industry.

I join my colleague from Hamilton West in saying that we must treat our citizens more fairly. Like the hon. member, I have received many inquiries from senior citizens in my constituency who have begged me to intercede on their behalf and find for them a decent place in which they can live their last few years. Is it not a sad commentary on our government and on our society that our senior people who gave so much in the service of this country, who raised families and contributed so much to the development of this country, should spend their last few years pinching pennies, trying to make ends meet, and often paying rents which are totally unacceptable, considering their meagre incomes. In many cases their only source of income is their old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement.

I draw the minister's attention to the situation existing in my riding. I suspect the same conditions prevail elsewhere in Canada. I am talking about the raw deal we have given our senior citizens. Some senior citizens' apartments are in complexes that were built under the limited dividend section of the act—section 16, I believe. I think the minister is familiar with this question. I gave him copies of letters which I had sent to his predecessor. It turns out that the occupants of these homes are now in their sixties and seventies and are not eligible for government assistance or subsidy to offset the increasingly high rents they must pay. I suggest the government must help old people living in these complexes to qualify for some type of assistance, some type of subsidy similar to that given to people in apartments which were built under section 44 of the National Housing Act. Under that section, the federal government provides 50 per cent of the subsidy and the province and municipality the other 50 per cent.

I want the minister to tell us what steps are being taken to alleviate the harsh burden being carried by so many of our senior citizens. I have evidence that the people who live in these homes—which, by the way, were built through public financing under the limited dividend section of the act—are paying as much as 70 per cent of their total income in rent. This makes a mockery of the income formula which has been adopted by the government and by CMHC and has been used by them in computing mortgage payments, and so on. A further interesting aspect is this that one of the conditions under which these apartments were built is as follows:

The rentals to be charged shall be rentals which the corporation deems to be fair and reasonable having regard to the probable family income of the occupants of each family housing unit.

So I contend that the government has a serious responsibility to the people who occupy homes which were built under that section of the National Housing Act, a solemn responsibility to ensure that the rents being charged are fair and reasonable and bear a reasonable relationship to the family income of those occupying the units. I could continue, but there is not much I can say that has not already been said in the course of this debate. I wish to impress upon the minister the importance of doing something for our senior citizens. It would not cost a great deal of money; I am sure we could trim the fat off some of the government departments to help these people who have done so much for us and who must spend the last years of their lives in near poverty, trying to balance an impossible budget. I should like the minister to tell me what plans he has, especially for those who live in these complexes which were built under the section of the National Housing Act to which I have referred.

Mr. Danson: In view of the concern expressed by the hon. member for Hamilton West and by the hon. member for St. John's West, I think the committee might be interested in figures relating to senior citizens' housing. None of us would ever agree that we have enough, but out of a $400 million budget for non-profit housing over 50 per cent goes to senior citizens. That is a bias in favour of senior citizens by comparison with the rest of the population.

Moreover, in the public housing sector of the senior citizens' housing program the existing stock totals 32,895. Currently under construction across Canada are 16,400 units. So the stock presently under construction represents an increase of almost 50 per cent. This is being done in accordance with programs which hon. members opposite find inadequate. I agree they are inadequate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: I should like to double that number, or triple it. We talk of problems, and there are problems. But we are meeting them head on. And this does not include the non-profit housing, in which sector another 6,000 units came on this year, that is between January and September.

An hon. Member: And the people are still waiting for houses.

Mr. Danson: Well, I expect some rational approach from hon. members opposite. We would like to do everything at one time, but even Liberals cannot do that. I am not satisfied. We want to do more. I see the hon. member for Hamilton West has just returned to the chamber. I am sure he heard the figures from behind the curtain. I have been very impressed by the quality of the debate this afternoon. Hon. members have referred to me as being affable and smiling. That is one of my problems. I refuse to carry the world on my back as a burden, but I take my job deadly seriously. I always have. Whatever I have accomplished in life has been through working extremely hard and never giving in.

Mr. Alexander: True to the class of '68.

Mr. Danson: The important thing is not to take oneself too seriously. I see a lot of people here who take themselves so deadly seriously that it is frightening. But they do not accomplish anything. However, as hon. members pointed out, we do have problems. Some of them are being managed quite well, though there are others which perhaps are not being managed to our own satisfaction. We have made mistakes, but they have been mistakes of comission. We have some excellent programs in force now.

We have been talking here—some will say ad nauseam—about AHOP. The fact is that AHOP has been very highly successful, and since it has been so successful I want to find out whether we can stretch it still further, even though it may not be perfect. As to limited dividend rental housing, it is important for us to realize that the rental housing situation is probably the closest thing approaching a crisis which confronts us unless we fail to act quickly, particularly in the major centres.

Mr. Woolliams: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Danson: This is why we have used a section of the National Housing Act, section 15, in order to secure funds which would normally have been used in other programs—programs which for one reason or another were not moving quickly. So we found $50 million for the last quarter of this year. Everyone said it could not be done, that nobody would respond. Well, they are responding right across the country. Sixteen developers have shown interest in St. John's, Newfoundland, alone, and 53 in Toronto alone. Yet the hon. member for Broadview was saying, I believe, that these were unrealistic levels. They were unrealistic, he said, because no one could buy a house at that price at that time. What has happened? I have the figure here of the number of AHOP units built in Toronto. It is 1,080. The fact is the price of housing was not related to costs, and when we provided money to purchase houses they were available at those prices. This is what we are achieving, and this is the success we intend to exploit.

An hon. Member: That is like giving a peanut to a starving elephant.

Mr. Danson: If the hon. member were to go to areas of the country in which his party's policies were in force, and saw what is happening there, he might not be too enamored, though I must say some of the provinces have taken great advantage of federal funding for limited dividend and senior citizens programs, and so on. I regret, sometimes, that it is not quite clear where this money is coming from.

An hon. Member: Answer the question put to you.

Mr. Danson: I think it is important to members in all parties to make certain our constituents know where these funds are coming from, because if our provincial counterparts do not let them know, they may think that you and I are not concerned or are not interested.

Mr. Dick: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. On this specific point I happen to agree with the minister that it is most important that people in our constituencies should know where the funding is coming from. However, I was wondering whether the minister would explain his policy as to when an urban affairs program is being opened up.

● (1610)

An hon. Member: What is the point of order?

Mr. Dick: If the hon. member will just listen, I will tell him.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but he is seeking the floor on a point of order and in fact is asking a question of the minister. That is legitimate, but the hon. member must do it when he is recognized for that purpose, not at this particular moment.

Mr. Dick: If the minister would not take so long, we would have time.

Mr. Carter: The minister did not answer my question. I appreciate that the minister is not taking himself too seriously, and I suspect that if we have any more statements like the one he made a moment ago the people of Canada will not take him too seriously, which would be unfortunate. The point I wanted the minister to clarify had to do with people living in senior citizens' apartment complexes which were built prior to the amendment to the section of the act under which they were built.

Would the minister try to find some way whereby these people can qualify for a subsidy, in conjunction with the province, similar to that now given people who live in apartments constructed pursuant to section 44 of the act? Would the minister answer that question?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the problem to which the hon. member has alluded, and it does disturb me. There is an inequity here. Although programs are improved as they go along, people who took advantage of a program which seemed very attractive at the time are now finding them less attractive than newer programs. I cannot promise anything definite. In some respects this problem is in the same category as perpetual bonds, old annuities. When do you start making them retroactive? But I recognize the problem. It is something we must look into, perhaps in conjunction with my provincial counterparts, to find ways to make the programs more equitable so they assist these people.

Mr. Carter: One final, short question, Mr. Chairman. In view of the fact that these apartments are financed by the federal government under the National Housing Act, would the minister undertake to commence consultation with his provincial counterparts—I ask this question because the federal government has a vested interest in these apartments—with a view to working out some kind of arrangement under which people living in such apartments will qualify for a subsidy which will bring their rents down, hopefully, to an acceptable amount?

Mr. Danson: I understand the hon. member's concern. We are presently in touch with the provincial authorities. Some programs apply to fixed rents, older ones to low rents. Others are geared to income. But the whole subject is under review. I assure the hon. member it is a problem I take seriously, and I shall take a special interest in these consultations.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I could not help listening with wonderment to the glowing words of the minister in charge of housing. Last year we built about 280,000 houses, and ministers of the government at that time were very proud of that number. This year, although we are down 25 per cent from that number, they are still proud and are still boasting, even though there is no evidence at all that we have come anywhere near to meeting the needs of the people of Canada. There is no reason for the decline in housing starts except for the fact that the price of building a house and the interest rate at which houses have to be financed have risen to the extent that people cannot afford to purchase a home.

One of our criticisms of the AHOP program of which the minister is so proud is that it is insufficiently funded. The minister always tries to deny that fact, yet today he has told the committee that 1,000 homes, approximately, have been financed under the AHOP program in the city of Toronto—1,000 homes in a metropolitan area now populated by about two million people! Surely even this government recognizes how far short of meeting our housing needs this program falls.

People want to buy houses, but the cannot afford them. The minister ignores the fact that in many countries, including the United States to the south of us, governments have instructed banks and mortgage companies to lend money for mortgage purposes at regulated rates substantially lower than the commercial rate. I am not sure what the rate is in the United States at the present time, but it is substantially less than the 12½ to 13 per cent people in Canada pay. Countries such as Sweden and many western European countries have similar programs.

Thousands of families in this country cannot afford, and are not likely ever to be able to afford, a home. Thousands of our native people are without adequate shelter. It has been estimated that there are 10,000 Indian families who need new homes right now, but there is no program to meet their need. Large numbers of native people move into cities, particularly in western Canada—Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary and Vancouver—and even if they have a skill, they cannot find a job and do not have even the smallest of down payments under any program of the Canadian government that assists people to purchase a home.

What these people need is rental housing. The minister says we are building a substantial number of units, but this is like telling a person who wants to buy a bicycle that there are no bicycles but lots of Cadillacs being built, so he should buy a Cadillac. It was once said of the people of France that all citizens were equal and had the right to sleep under a bridge over the Seine, and this is what the minister is saying to those who are looking for housing. Just whom are we building houses for? Would the minister tell us when we are going to start meeting the needs of the people of Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal who are living in dilapidated houses, houses that simply do not meet the standards of a country as wealthy as Canada?

Mr. Danson: Is the hon. member asking me a question?

Mr. Orlikow: I have been watching the minister answer questions, and I have the fear that if I sit down the minister will use up the rest of my time answering me, so I should like to ask him two more questions in his capacity as minister in charge of urban affairs, not in connection with housing. Before I get off the subject of housing, would the minister explain what he is doing about the reorganization of his department? I have the feeling that housing decisions and housing policies are still being made in that tremendous bureaucracy we have built up over the years known as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Are questions of housing policy and housing needs still being dealt with by people who are responsible to the minister, and therefore to the House, or are these decisions still being made essentially by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? In my view, and in the view of many people in the province who are interested in housing for the poor and middle income people, this arrangement is completely inadequate.

I should like to ask several questions about which I think the department of urban affairs should be concerned. Within the next 25 years, 90 per cent of the population of this country will be living in our cities.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Eighty-five per cent.

Mr. Orlikow: Someone suggests 85 per cent. However, the exact figure is not important.

An hon. Member: And that is sad.

Mr. Orlikow: It may be sad, but it is a fact of life. I should like to know whether the minister and his department are really looking at the problems that will flow from this urban growth. What are the minister and his department doing about developing land? Let me give two illustrations—and I do not want to get into the same bind I got into last night with the Minister of Transport. I will refer to the metropolitan Toronto and metropolitan Montreal areas. Another airport in the Montreal area has already been started at Mirabel. In the not too distant future another airport will be constructed in the Toronto area. The estimated cost of providing rapid transit from the new Montreal airport is $450 million. I am not aware of what it will cost to provide rapid transit to the Pickering airport, but I am certain it will be as much if not more.

Following the construction of a new airport, we find new factories, new housing developments and new commercial developments. Is the minister's department involved with the provincial and municipal governments in planning ahead for these things, or will we wake up one morning with a new airport at Mirabel, only to find it takes two hours to fly from Montreal to Winnipeg but two hours to get from the airport to downtown Montreal, and the same situation at Pickering? I should like the minister to deal with that problem.

What role is the minister's department playing in the movement of railway terminals from their present locations in the major cities, with all their assets, to new locations? Are we going to allow the CPR and the CNR, which is theoretically a publicly-owned corporation, to move from their present locations, as they did in Montreal, to new locations, selling their present locations, incuding yards and stations which are often extremely valuable properties, to the highest bidder in order to obtain as much money as possible?

That is what happened in Montreal. Tens of thousands of people were then brought into the area without any consideration given to how they were to be transported. Is the minister's department, the Department of Transport, the Department of the Environment, or any federal department going to get in on the ground floor in advance of these developments to see that things are done according to an orderly plan which will meet the social and economic needs of the people in the areas, or are we to permit these grandiose developments without the benefit of order, as we have in past years?

Mr. Danson: To answer the specific question, I should mention that I was in the hon. member's city last Monday and met with the distinguished mayor—who I presume was re-elected yesterday—and the premier of the province. As to what we are doing in that city under the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, let me remind the hon. member of the Selkirk Park project involving a commitment of over $4 million; the Midland housing project, which I understand is to involve another $2 million, along with the cultural centre which is to cost some $600,000. In so far as housing starts are concerned, I can only repeat again what is being done under AHOP. There are 900 units being built in metropolitan Winnipeg. That should not be related to what is being done in Toronto because one must realize that many of the housing starts in Toronto are not really within the metropolitan area.

In this group which is being served, the average family income is $6,852 per annum, with some 30 per cent having a family income of less than $6,000. Those are figures that apply across Canada and I think that is a pretty good indication that we are serving the right people. I am delighted that the member has raised these questions. I was also interested in the hon. member's comment about providing Cadillacs to people who are riding bicycles. But it is interesting to note that when money is available at low cost, housing starts increase. Having regard to urban policy, I am deeply involved and interested in such a policy relating to housing per se for individual communities. This is still a very active policy on the part of CMHC, requiring a great deal of intergovernmental coordination on a trilevel basis. The ministry itself is actively interested in this area.

The hon. member raised an interesting question regarding the Mirabel airport. The construction of such an airport has a major influence on urban development, particularly in the case of the largest city in Canada. It involves 80,000 acres under federal control. There is what is known as the Tram study specifically in relation to a transportation plan such as the hon. member mentions. I believe Mr. Douglas Fullerton is chairing that committee for the province of Quebec. Our representative is Mr. Douglas Ryan, a senior member of the ministry. So we are actively involved. This is a perfect example of co-ordination in these areas of government. These people are extremely interested in transportation.

When you think of the amount of planning required in respect of major transportation systems, such as the one between the Mirabel airport and downtown Montreal, and the acreage involved, you can imagine the amount of urban planning that must take place at three levels of government. This is of tremendous importance and I am sure these people are working seriously on the problem. The question of railway relocations is under active consideration and an announcement on this program will be made shortly. There is a time lag because there must be urban planning, agreements with the provinces, and other things. But the question of railway profiteering is eliminated by the nature of the act. These companies cannot profit as a result of land transfers, but under the act they do not lose money.

We have to watch the situation very closely, and it is one of the matters that I believe will be covered in the proceedings of the CTC, the group that is monitoring these things. I do not think the CTC should be making policy decisions, but technical decisions are being made by it. So we are watching the situation very carefully.

Mr. Marshall: I should like to make a couple of comments and then follow with several questions of the minister.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I think I have a few minutes still at my disposal.

An hon. Member: Give it up.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair assumed the hon. member had concluded, but perhaps he might be allowed an additional two minutes to finish his remarks.

Mr. Orlikow: I have another question I should like to direct to the minister. If he cannot answer it immediately, I hope he will do so soon. One of the worst problems faced by this country is the shortage of housing. Certainly in Winnipeg this presents a problem. What I have in mind now is the problem as it relates to housing for native people. Some months ago—I think, in fact, it was two years—a proposal was sent to CMHC involving the construction of a native village to include housing, a cultural centre and other buildings. This is not to be located in my constituency but in the constituency of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I understand it involves the old Royal Alexander hotel site. I think it has been approved, but there has been no recent discussion between those who made the proposal and officials of CMHC or the minister's department.

I wonder whether the minister could give me any information on that matter now, or whether he would undertake to discuss it with me or my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and, more importantly, with the people who made the proposal to his predecessor.

Mr. Danson: Madam Chairman, the projects of which I am aware in Winnipeg relating to the native people are Camew and Neeginan. It is a problem which I know the premier has taken seriously. This is a problem which he spoke about to me and my colleagues. It is an area I should like to explore further. It is of particular interest. I think the problems are rather serious. I should be pleased to go into this question further with the hon. member, together with my officials. I should be glad to arrange as complete and up to date a briefing as possible, and I assure him of the greatest consultation with the people involved.

[Mr. Danson.]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Perhaps hon. members will pardon my interruption. In view of the very limited time remaining, in respect of this department, between now and five o'clock, perhaps it would be the desire of hon. members to limit themselves to question and answers of the minister. Is that agreed?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We will do our best.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marshall: Madam Chairman, since you are so agreeable I will go along with you on this. I have just a few points which I shall put in the form of questions and, hopefully, the minister will do his best to answer them. First of all, following the subject raised by my colleagues in respect of senior citizens' housing, the minister indicated that another 6,000 units were in the process of being built. I wonder whether consideration is being given, in the design of senior citizens' homes under the non-profit sector, to providing for people who are disabled and physically handicapped. I could dwell on this matter for many moments. I wonder whether the minister would ask his officials if consideration is being given to this matter, or what their plans are.

The minister indicated that in order to meet the need, 185,000 homes are required. Those provided over the past two or three years and this year represent a quarter of a million. I wonder whether the minister is aware of the increasing need because of the baby boom since World War II and DREE incentive grants which have caused expansion in places that were not industrialized before, thus creating the movement of people such as technicians and others in specialty trades. It would seem that because of this situation some infrastructure should be provided beyond the 250,000 homes, in order to cope with the problem.

If I might be a little parochial, I wish to say that through the investment of DREE funds, the district I represent on the west coast of Newfoundland is in the process of spending hundreds of millions of dollars to bring power across from Labrador to Newfoundland by way of cable. This is an isolated area and because of the jobs created there will be a need for water and sewage services as well as housing, because many people will have to move there.

Then moving down my coast, just recently a zinc mine was started which employs 300 people. This situation should also be taken into consideration. A program should be developed through DREE to work out a solution to these problems and to ensure that the money is found for places where it is needed. I could point out places where the minister could find $100 million.

I did not listen to the first speaker, so perhaps this question has been answered, but under the urban demonstration program I understand there is $100 million allocated. I do not think this is required. I wonder if the minister would consider taking this $100 million and transferring it to programs such as AHOP, NIP and RRAP. The other thing on which the minister might comment concerns the $100 million rural native housing program. This program would fulfil a great need in rural Canada, particularly in rural Newfoundland. In the release of the minister's predecessor I believe it was suggested that 100,000 homes should be built for rural and native people over the next five years. There are not too many native people in my area, although there are many rural people who do not have the necessary funds to build homes.

Another way in which I suggest the minister could save money to help overcome the emergency would be to expand the $10 million NIP and RRAP programs. I am sure there are thousands of substandard homes in Canada. Many of these people wish to build new homes. In the meantime, however, we could relieve the emergency if more funds were found to provide these $5,000 loans with $2,500 forgiveness so that these people could bring their homes up to standard. At the same time, this would contribute to one of the most important things which should be insisted upon, that is, giving municipal building standards and insulation standards priority. This would mean a saving of hundreds of millions of gallons of home-heating fuel.

I should like the minister to give us an indication of his relationship with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in providing housing to support industry, and also his relationship with the Minister of Veterans Affairs in respect of overcoming the housing needs of veterans who cannot acquire homes through the limited funds available under part II of the act.

I would dwell now on another matter. I have been talking to a person from Corner Brook. A university is being built there. I was told that in order to provide homes for students, the cost of the land involved would be $18,000. I am not talking about Toronto or Montreal but about Newfoundland. This is the amount required to provide a serviced lot for the many students who would be coming into this medium-sized city. In order to allow other members to have an opportunity to speak, I will leave those questions with the minister and hope he will reply to them.

Mr. Danson: Madam Chairman, there are standards and special provisions for senior citizens, such as the wide door program and things of that nature. Another program which is under way is housing for the handicapped. This should be ready shortly. We are looking for revision of the present program and are working with various departments involved with the handicapped. This should be ready shortly, and perhaps there will be legislation to deal with it. In so far as Corner Brook is concerned, this matter comes under the NIP and RRAP programs. Almost $639,000 has been accumulated.

As to rural and native housing, we have agreements with Alberta, British Columbia and Manitoba and we are looking forward to agreements with other provinces so that we can get those going. Our relations with DREE are very close, both in the housing field and in urban affairs, particularly in the Atlantic provinces. The Minister of Veterans Affairs and myself have a very close relationship and we have been having discussions. We happen, both of us, to be veterans. I have to be careful with my words now. At one time no one listened to me, but now I have to be careful of what I say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: Some of the programs which we veterans honestly and in our hearts understand were designed for us when we were young veterans after the war and are not applicable now. We are trying to develop types of programs that are really relevant to veterans today. I believe the hon. member has some conception of the fact that the real need of veterans now is not the same as it was for young, vigorous veterans coming out of the army and trying to raise families on half-acre lots. They have other needs now, and we must respond sensibly to those needs rather than with gimmicks.

Mr. Dick: I should like to put a couple of questions to the minister. One refers to a matter he raised in his speech in reply to an hon. member, namely, that he wants people in the constituencies to know that federal funds are being made available. I suggest that if he happens to finance a building in a constituency represented by someone other than a member of the Liberal Party, he can still make the announcement, rather than send a Liberal from the far end of the province to represent him. The constituents would at least know that it is a federal member who is representing the government. I wonder whether the minister is prepared to use that tactic, rather than trying to find a Liberal senator or Liberal member far away from the area to go in the minister's stead if he is not able to make it, and if he is prepared to use the present member of parliament for that purpose.

Mr. Danson: Madam Chairman, I am already working on procedures that will be automatic and will involve the local member, because we all have an interest in showing the federal presence. We represent the federal government and it will be the local member, regardless of his party, who will undertake this work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: May I say, on a point of order, "his or her party", because there are women involved too.

Mr. Dick: I have a couple of short questions to put. The feeling throughout the country of people who live in constituencies consisting of small towns and rural areas is that CMHC funding is not available for their housing needs. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture can provide the Minister of State for Urban Affairs with information regarding that point. Would the minister like to respond to this attitude of people in towns of less than 10,000?

Mr. Danson: NHA guarantees are applicable. There are some very remote areas where private lenders will not service such loans; we move in as lenders of last resort in such situations. But as regards smaller communities, if we are not being active and are not serving a purpose, I wish the hon. member would provide me or the corporation with the information. However, I do not think that that is often the case.

Mr. Dick: Is it not a fact that CMHC will not assist with mortgages where there are no sewage facilities?

Mr. Danson: Yes, it is not a fact.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: The proper answer is that it is not a fact in the sense that we do assist where no sewage facilities are available in the normal trunk services. But we do have a sewage tank policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: Where the installation meets certain standards, where the size of the lot is adequate and meets local standards, this is the case. We are trying to avoid strip development. This is an area where we might have centralized tanks or lagoons. Aerated lagoons are of particular interest to CMHC. These are not very appetizing subjects, in fact no more than hamburgers to which we referred earlier today, but these are the facts of life. Sewers and sewage treatment are an extremely important part of the operation. We want to make certain that the development is good and we do not want to be overrestrictive, but we have to protect both the public interest and the client's interest, as well as the corporation's interest, in that regard. So this program is available, but we are being careful and we do not want to be overrestrictive either.

Mr. Reynolds: I have a rather long speech, Madam Chairman, but I think I will put my questions to the minister one at a time. They are very short. The first question involves interest on first mortgages. I have had a question on the order paper for a long time asking whether the government has figures as to cost if we were to allow people to deduct interest on their first mortgages from income before calculating taxes.

Mr. Danson: I am sorry, I have not seen the question. I do try to answer those questions as rapidly as possible. This would be more properly a question for the Minister of Finance. It is one of the options at which the minister responsible for housing must look at all times. There are obvious inequities and obvious benefits in the situation. We see it happening in other jurisdictions. All I can say is that I look at this as one of the options with less priority.

Mr. Reynolds: My second question involves the 11 per cent federal sales tax. Again, I have had this question on the order paper for a long time. Can government officials figure out what it would cost the government of Canada if the 11 per cent sales tax was removed? The first and second questions involve the Minister of Finance, but I think this is important policy which should be looked into by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Whether or not he agrees with the policy—this is certainly the policy in other countries of the free western world—it is a matter that should be looked into. I wonder if the minister's officials have figured out how much it would cost the country to eliminate the 11 per cent sales tax.

Mr. Danson: On dwellings it would be somewhere in the area of $450 million to $500 million. Taking it off all building materials, the figure would be well in excess of $1 billion which would have to be compensated.

Mr. Reynolds: My final question concerns the 1 per cent premium that is charged on total loans as mortgage insurance which is held in trust and managed by CMHC. I am wondering who that 1 per cent is benefiting. It benefits the mortgage lender, but he already has the mortgage on the building in these days when the value of mortgages on homes has certainly not gone down. So we find we have well in excess of $300 million sitting in trust with CMHC. Since the consumer pays that 1 per cent, it would be a saving right off the top if the minister could eliminate it. The mortgage lender does not need the extra protection since he has the protection of the mortgage, and certainly there is no mortgage in this country that would not pay itself out.

My final point before the minister answers my questions is to congratulate him upon his appointment. I have been sitting here all day listening to the minister answer questions. I wish we had had the same type of co-operation yesterday from the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Danson: Madam Chairman, with reference to mortgage insurance, the 1 per cent charge has been a standard charge which, incidentally, applies to private insurers also. It is profitable for the corporation, but there are losses, I was surprised to hear that. This gives them a sense of security, and it also enables the lender to lower preferred rates. There are advantages that way, too. I might have more to say about this in relation to other matters and warranties at a future date—not too far in the future, I hope.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I will recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, followed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Chairman, as the minister is aware, there are several questions that I have been discussing with him. One relates to factory relocation. The minister is aware of the issue in my riding of Surrey-White Rock. I should like to ask him what kind of funding is available under Bill C-27. What kind of budgetary allotment has been made in that bill?

Mr. Danson: There are no specific limits on funds. Of course, it has to be approved by the provinces and submitted to the federal government, but generally speaking we will fund a reasonable program. For the study it is 50-50; that is, 50 per cent between the federal government and the province and/or municipalities who have a great stake in it. Some provinces may accept that or may want to share it with the municipalities. It would vary depending on what costs the municipality had that were not directly related. There are no limits on it, depending on the scope of the program, but there is responsibility on both sides.

Mr. Friesen: If we hurry this up we will have the department "danson" well. Maybe not barn dancing, but "danson". On this side of the House we are not very intellectual, so we will have to try harder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: Honesty is always the best policy.

Mr. Friesen: How would you know? Madam Chairman, there is another problem and that is the administration of CMHC. First, we are all aware that there are several regulations that are imperative if the low dividend program is to work. One is that there is a limitation on lending; another is that it is supposed to be ascribed to low income families—and each of those words is operative in that term. Officially, there is supposed to be an affidavit of earnings given by the people who will make use of the program.

I recognize that it is difficult to police all the areas that are making use of this program. As a matter of fact, the chairman of CMHC in Vancouver, who is directing his attention to the limited dividend program, said the program is open to abuse by developers and that proper policing would take "an army of inspectors". I suggest this man has adopted the same attrition policy that the Minister of National Defence has been using.

I am concerned because I thought there was an oversight. I investigated on my own and found that the only question being asked was, "Do you have a family?" No question was asked about income. The only restriction was whether or not one had a family. If one had a family, there were no apartments available. And that was supposed to be for low income families. If one did not have a family, they had an apartment available right away, especially on the second and third floors because there were two and three-bedroom apartments there. I asked how this could be, if they were restricting families to the lower floors, and what did people with the two and three-bedroom apartments on the second and third floors do with them, and I was told that they could convert one room into a den. This is housing for low income families in Surrey, where there is a zero vacancy rate. People are waiting for two and three-bedroom apartments, and this sort of thing is going on.

At the time this situation was discovered the former minister said he would initiate an investigation. I recognize that the present minister was not the cause of this problem, but he has responsibility for it now. I should like to ask him whether that investigation has been conducted, and if it has, what was discovered? Then I have some more questions, Madam Chairman.

Mr. Danson: Madam Chairman, I understand an investigation has taken place in relation to rental property. I do not have the full details but I will be pleased to get them for the hon. member. In general, I share the concern that some of the limited dividend projects could be abused. We have a continuing screening and auditing procedure which we are watching very carefully. I know that Mr. Teron, president of CMHC, is also especially concerned. These things are being watched and there will be more regular review procedures on some of the programs we are entering into now. Because they are related to income, virtually all our programs are targeted at people who should not spend more than 22 per cent of their income on shelter. The rates under AHOP and other programs are set to accomplish this. We want to make sure that this provision is adhered to and as people move into different economic brackets there should be a regular review procedure.

It is as fair as possible, but I am sure there will be occasional abuses. When they are brought to our attention we will look into them. You cannot operate a program of $1 million or $1¼ million every year without some mistakes occuring. We will be vigilant, without developing a police force or a procedure that would be inappropriate in our country.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Chairman, I suggest that if we take the former minister's statement as accurate, we will find there are as many as 500 former CMHC officials now working in the private development sector. As a matter of fact, in the particular project that I visited, Imperial Parkside Freeholds Limited, the directors are Donald, Gerald and Ruby Gales. One of the leading appointments is a Mr. Zitzerman of Imperial Developments of Winnipeg, who was formerly with the law firm of the Liberal leader in Manitoba, Mr. Izzy Asper. Another company which this family has is Beacon Hill Lodges. Mr. William Hignett, formerly president of CMHC, is a member of the board of directors of Beacon Hill Lodges.

Madam Chairman, I wonder if the reason there has not been further investigation is the close relationship between CMHC and former members of CMHC who are working in the private sector. I would ask the minister to make a special effort to investigate this question. Maybe we can do something to solve the housing situation, particularly where the senior citizens are concerned.

Mr. Danson: Madam Chairman, I have not counted the number of people who came from the corporation, but I would say that as long as there is nothing improper, it is highly desirable that the expertise built up within the corporation is used in the private sector. By the same token, the expertise in the private sector comes into Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The best example of this is the president, Mr. Teron. I welcome the fluidity between the public and the private sector but, of course, if there is nothing wrong. Mr. Hignett, former president of CMHC, is now a consultant with the Ontario government on mortgage programs. This is a development we should welcome but, of course, if there is anything wrong it should be examined.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Before we go on to another department I should like to recognize the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Chairman, I have one question for the minister. I apologize for taking him away from housing matters, but I think at least one question should be directed at some of the other duties of his portfolio. Before I, for one, give my consent to passage of his estimates I should like to have his views on the record. We are entering into what might be a new round of federal-provincial conferences respecting the constitution, and I should like to know the minister's views on the representation of urban areas at such conferences.

Mr. Danson: Madam Chairman, I am not quite sure how to answer that question. I am not trying to evade it. I believe this area is the prime responsibility of the Prime Minister. I pointed out in my opening remarks that I put emphasis on the division of responsibility, and certainly in dealings with the provinces under such circumstances the Prime Minister would take the urban impact into consideration. I wish I could give a better answer, but it is not my area of responsibility.

We cannot forget that the provinces, too, are involved; they have their area of jurisdiction to protect. Indeed, I should be presumptuous if I said anything without discussing it first with the provinces, with whom I work closely. Actually, I am almost late, in leaving for a meeting in Sudbury with the hon. member's former colleagues in the provincial cabinet. There is to be a trilevel meeting.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings in accordance with an order made this day and to proceed with the consideration of the National Defence estimates.

[English]

These estimates are to be found on pages 15 and 16 of the bill.

On schedule A—Department of National Defence

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): On a point of order, Madam Chairman, at what hour is consideration of the Department of National Defence estimates to end?

Mr. Lefebvre: Madam Chairman, this is all included in the agreement announced by the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the same point of order, Madam Chairman, I understand that consideration of these estimates is to end at ten o'clock. Is that correct?

Mr. Lefebvre: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I understood the National Defence estimates will be considered until ten o'clock tonight, after which the committee will consider the next item until the agreed time of adjournment. Is that correct?

Mr. Lefebvre: That is correct.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to discuss the estimates of the Department of National Defence for 1974-75 and to discuss with members of the committee the outstanding service provided by the Canadian armed forces. It might be helpful if I outlined the over-all financial position for the current year now under review. I also want to share with members of the committee my thoughts about the financing of the defence program.

First, may I emphasize that in dollar terms the defence budget has not been cut. It has been increased substantially. The blue book of estimates will show that we were to spend this year, the year under consideration, $2,360 million, or some $144 million more than last year. That $144 million represents approximately the 7 per cent increase which was approved in the financing formula we started on last year.

In addition—this is even more significant—we expect before the end of this year to have approval from the government to spend another $140 million on top of that 7 per cent increase. This means that the defence budget for the current year will be more than one quarter of a billion dollars, almost $300 million, greater than last year. It must be evident, therefore, that the defence budget has not been cut.

We in National Defence are aware, as are all other departments and all citizens, that rapidly rising prices are a major problem. We saw, when planning early in the fiscal year, that if we had adopted the over-all program, if we had got everything we wanted, we would have been another $100 million over even an expanded budget, one that was up by more than a quarter of a billion dollars. In order to reduce expenditures and prevent that almost uncontrolled expansion of expenditure, we took the steps I shall describe.

Essentially, we reduced expenses in four areas. First, by natural attrition the strength of the force in numbers went from about 82,000 to about 79,000. Through that attrition process we achieved an expenditure saving of more than $50 million. Second, we made reductions in operations, that is, in areas such as fuel consumption and travel. The reduction in operations for the current year represents a saving of $12 million. Third, we stretched out the procurement process and in that way, while trying to maintain all essential capital requirements, cut expenditures by $23 million. Finally and fourthly, we took a hard look at the purchasing program. As hon. members know, we have a very big inventory. We found that by better inventory management, by not having more then we need on our shelves and by introducing a new system, we were actually able to save this year $13 million.

These figures add up to about $98 million, or approximately the $100 million by which we would have been over even an expanded budget if we had not taken these steps. These reduced expenditures have enabled us to stay within the budget, even though it is up almost $300 million. We have stayed within a budget which is not out of control and which is reasonable for the current year.

The strength of the force has declined, as I said, to 79,000 personnel. With that number we cannot expect to perform the same tasks as we could perform with a larger force. Therefore, it will be necessary for us to balance the tasks and commitments of the armed forces with the smaller numbers available to perform those tasks.

I now want to speak about the important work the Canadian armed forces have been asked to do by the government. I think that when we consider all these tasks and commitments we will realize that little we will discuss in this debate on the estimates is more important to the armed forces and to Canada than the issues involved in the four central tasks of the Canadian armed forces.

The first task, and the one to which we give the highest priority, is nothing less than the defence of our sovereignty, the maintenance of Canadian independence. I have spoken of this in some detail on other occasions and I do not intend to elaborate on it at this point. Everyone will agree that this role is vital.

The second task is to participate with the United States in the defence of North America. In this connection we think of the very important and close relationship we have with the great neighbour who shares this continent with us. This is a most important subject and one which really goes beyond the role of the forces themselves.

The third task of the armed forces is to work with our NATO partners to carry forward the concept of collective security and to participate in the collective defence of the free world. When we conceive of our various relationships with Europe, can we think of another which is closer or more important than the fact that more than 5,000 members of the Canadian armed forces live in western Europe—their families are with them; their children go to school there? That is a link of measureless importance to our relationship with those countries.

The fourth great task is our new and vital role in trying to help achieve international stability, the role called peacekeeping, one in which Canada has demonstrated not only leadership moral but very practical leadership to the world. Those are our four great tasks, and when hon. members stop to think of them they will realize they are among the most important issues which can come before this committee.

I want to point out that when we are thinking about defence policy, when we are thinking of the taxpayers' money being spent on defence, there is very much more than the more apparent benefit to be considered. Indeed, the taxpayer gets double value for money spent on national defence—sometimes more than double value. There are other benefits; perhaps they could be described as hidden benefits, but they are nevertheless very real. I need hardly remind the committee of the great economic benefit which results from the payroll to communities directly affected. We only have to try to close, not a base but a small station somewhere and immediately we begin to hear about the great impact this would have on the economy of the region. We do not hear so much when everything is going along normally, but when we try to close a base we soon find out the benefit which it has brought to the community. But more important than the payroll or even the economic benefit is the benefit to industry which accrues from the expenditure of tax dollars for defence. I refer to the new technology which is being developed and to the jobs which are provided in advanced technology particularly in the electronics industry. This is of great significance to Canada.

There is yet another area, one which is not so well recognized by the public. A significant portion of the tax dollars used for defence are used to meet the cost of training. We in National Defence are the largest vocational training and educational institute in Canada. We have some 90 trades, and today there are literally tens of thousands of men and women in Canada who are doing better for themselves and for their country as a result of the training they received because we spent National Defence dollars on their training. This is a hidden benefit which should be remembered when considering defence expenditures.

I could go on to give a long list of other benefits which are sometimes overlooked, but I shall not go into detail. All hon. members are aware of our youth program, the cadets. They are aware of our work in opening the north, in establishing airports there. They know that we are involved in the protection of the environment, that we have a responsibility not only for identifying oil slicks but for clearing them up when they occur. For these tasks, we have both the expertise and the equipment.

Hon. members are aware of the support we are given—perhaps not as much as some who sit across the way would like—in identifying foreign vessels which have entered our fishing waters. These are all ways in which the defence dollar is spent for the benefit of Canada. Canadian forces are involved in assisting at major sporting events such as the PanAmerican Games and the Olympic Games. Then there are ceremonial events. Some of these go almost unnoticed, but they are wanted by the Canadian people. Search and rescue is another example.

I could go on to list other benefits Canada is receiving when we spend defence dollars. However, what I want to say is that the real question, the simple question facing us today in National Defence is this: how do we continue to perform those four important tasks and provide the other benefits I have described in days when the cost of everything we require is rising rapidly, and still manage to stay within a budget which does not reach uncontrolled limits?

There are some answers which will have to be considered by this committee and by my colleagues in cabinet. One answer is, of course, to provide a great deal more money. But there are limits. Important as it is that we should have more money, there are clearly limits in days when we want to restrain our expenditure. The answer of granting unlimited funds is not possible in today's world. The other thing to do is to balance our tasks with the tax dollars we can obtain.

Whatever amount of money we finally spend in the future, one thing is certain: we will have to change the ratio between our expenditures for personnel, operations and capital. We will have to increase the percentage spent for capital and new equipment and for operations. At the present time, as I believe most hon. members know, we are spending 67 per cent of our budget for pay and allowances, 22 per cent for operations and 11 per cent for new equipment.

If I may conclude very briefly, Madam Chairman, it is against this background that I believe the estimates should be considered this evening. I have simply tried to point out to the committee that the defence budget has not been cut in dollar terms, but substantially increased. The four central tasks of national defence are important to Canada and all of us here are involved. I look for hon. members' help in deciding what to do with these really big issues—big issues, not just for defence but for all of us in Canada. There are other benefits accruing to the taxpayer that must be considered.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Chairman, I should first like to say a word about the last two days in this House and the benefits of the committee of supply. I have been here for about two years and I have heard a great deal of discussion about the committee of supply and what a boon it was to the House in keeping the power of debate and decision-making within the House. I had never realized how much cabinet ministers are protected during the question period by the rules and customs applicable to that period. Last night was quite a change for ministers from the usual question period, with the routine of one question, two supplementaries and then a question from a different member to a different minister. I suggest that those who believe parliament to be the supreme authority in the land now realize more than ever just what the Liberals took away from parliament by the rule changes in 1968 which they enforced by the use of closure.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the presentation of the Minister of National Defence. Since I was not in the House on October 15, 1974, it was very gracious of the minister to repeat tonight what he said then. I was hoping that he was going to answer the important question that is before all Canadians now, and that is: can the armed forces cope with its current roles and tasks? There is a great divergence of opinion on this subject.

I knew the minister was going to say, before he said it, that he would increase expenditure on capital equipment. I do not want to say that the minister has deliberately misled the House or the nation. I did not say that he was doing it deliberately last October when he said that there was a 7 per cent increase in his budget, and that this annual increase would allow for a substantial increase in capital expenditure. I did not say that he was deliberately misleading the House the other day, when he said, "We will use the payroll which would have been used to pay someone not now a member of the armed forces to buy equipment." I do not know whether he was deliberately misleading the House when he said, "What we must aim at is an elite force made up of well equipped and well motivated personnel."

To illustrate my cynicism and the cynicism of the forces themselves to this kind of statement, I should like to go over a few previous statements by Liberal ministers in this regard. I quote from the white paper on defence of 1964:

> The total savings to be effected as a result of such reductions will make available funds for capital equipment purchases, and eventually make possible more equitable distribution of the defence dollar between equipment and housekeeping costs.

Does that sound familiar, Madam Chairman? Again, a Liberal Minister of National Defence, on May 8, 1964 said:

> This reduction ... will assist us in the difficult task of getting our defence expenditures back in balance. We must increase the proportion of funds available for new equipment if we are to have a viable and effective force in the years to come. The present proportion of about 14 per cent for equipment is unacceptably low and must be increased to something in the order of 25 per cent in the years ahead. Even this proportion is not high compared to other forces.

I think the minister said our present proportion is about 11 per cent, though I think he has "upped" it by about .8 per cent, according to the reference I have. Again, in July of 1964 a Liberal minister promised as follows:

> We are going to make whatever savings we can in other areas, in logistics, training and area commands so we will have the maximum savings available for the purchase of new equipment for our armed forces.

Then in February, 1966, this was said by a Liberal cabinet minister:

> Program changes had to go through the whole system and the amount of time consumed was so great that the project momentum was often lost and the initial Canadian advantage overtaken by development projects in other countries.
> The classic example is the armoured personnel carrier, the Bobcat V.C.

Then he went on to say, believe it or not:

> An example of the improved flexibility is in respect to the interesting development of a full scale prototype of an ocean-going hydrofoil vessel.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

What an improvement! Then may I quote another authority, who in this House said in 1966:

> We have heard statements emanating from the minister's office to the effect ... that the savings to be derived from the new policy can be devoted to the acquisition, as the minister likes to put it, of military hardware. On the other hand, having listened to members of the opposition such as the hon. member for Calgary North—

That was the Hon. D. S. Harkness, a former minister.

> —it becomes clear that the government has not in fact succeeded in diverting any of these rumoured savings into the acquisition of better and more modern weaponry.
> I am of the opinion that the public relations efforts that went into this ... have been very expensive and I am not sure that this has not succeeded in giving the people of this country ... an entirely misleading and false impression of the reality of the situation. It seems that we are looking at a hoax of epic proportions because it does not appear possible that Canada's defence capability has been improved—

That was said by Mr. Ed Schreyer. The following quotation sounds exactly like the one in the statement of the minister tonight. This is what a former Liberal minister said in 1967:

> One of the stated intentions of the savings that could be made was to use those savings for new equipment for the armed forces. No one regrets more than I do that last year we were not able to increase the amount of money being spent ... I hope that there will be a very substantial improvement in the coming fiscal year—

A question was put on the order paper in October, 1967, by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. He asked:

> In view of the information revealed by an answer tabled in this House last Monday, which indicated that Canada's armed forces have suffered a reduction in personnel from 123,000 to 105,000 over the past three years, could the minister indicate whether this process of attrition is to continue indefinitely or whether there is an absolute floor; and if so, what that floor is?

This was the answer by the Hon. Léo Cadieux, the then minister of national defence:

> This is a very broad question. I prefer to answer by saying I hope we can have adequate forces to meet our commitments.

Then on March 1, 1968, the same minister said this:

> We have fixed the floor at 100,000 and I hope we can stay there. This is what I consider a minimum to meet the commitments that we have.

There has not been one commitment involving more than 300 to 400 men lifted from the armed forces from that day to this. Then, again, he said in June of 1969:

> We have concluded that a regular force of 80,000 to 85,000 will be needed to meet Canada's defence requirements ... Basic to our planning was a firm decision to concentrate wherever possible, on reducing administrative and support activities, to provide us with a higher ratio of operational to non-operational forces than in the past.

Then on October 10, 1973, the present minister had this to say:

> This annual increase will allow for substantial increases in capital expenditure, particularly for greatly needed new equipment.

● (1730)

After 10 years of Liberal ministers cutting back personnel and buying new equipment the minister last October found himself repeating the same old song, that at the present time National Defence is spending approximately 11 per cent of its budget for new equipment and facilities. He said that under the modernization and renewal program almost 20 per cent of the total budget would be spent for new equipment by the end of the 1970's. He now announces that this plan, which was supposed to last until the end of the 70's, is now as dead as the dodo. The minister stated that the new formula would solve this problem which has plagued the department for so many years, that is, too low a percentage of the defence budget being used for capital equipment.

On October 15 of this year the minister said:

> The only way we can improve the military capability and the conditions of the present members of the armed forces is to reduce the number of recruits taken in and put on the payroll. To state the equation in the simplest possible way—we are going to use the payroll that would have been used to pay someone not now a member of the armed forces to buy equipment and improve conditions for the people now in the armed forces.

It is no wonder the minister is unwittingly deceiving the people of Canada. The record is there. This is the same speech made once a year for about 10 years by Liberal ministers of national defence, yet the result has been exactly the same in every year. A person could look through the estimates here and spend hours talking about various items. Let me try to get two or three questions answered by the minister.

The present situation is, in my mind, so serious it has led to hitherto unheard of protests from senior serving officers. General Garton said the other day that we will have to reduce instruction and flying time. Admiral Boyle said that he cannot carry out our roles with fewer men and will need to cancel training exercises.

General Dextraze said in a news letter in September that he knew that rumours have been circulating to the effect that we are about to have our staff reduced again, but these rumours are untrue. It does not seem to me that the Chief of the Defence Staff would put his signature to such a statement to counter the rumour if he had not previously consulted with the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister tell us what consultation took place in September before the Chief of Defence Staff wrote that letter denying any cutback in personnel?

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, I should first of all like to say to the hon. member for Victoria that in his recounting of the history of statements of past ministers of defence he has not really been stating the facts as they appear in the blue books. I would draw his attention to what we are studying, that is, pages 15-6 and 15-7 of the estimates, where he will see that the expenditures for capital equipment increased from $172 million in the year 1972-73, to $228 million in the year 1973-74, and up to $270 million for 1974-75, after the economies mentioned previously. This constitutes an increase of more than $100 million in that two year period.

An hon. Member: What did you buy?

Mr. Richardson: We could give you the full list. We have been moving in the direction I have stated; in my judgment perhaps not moving as rapidly as we would like, but certainly moving in that direction.

I was looking at these figures when the hon. member referred to a statement by the chief of staff. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would ask the question again if he wishes me to comment on it.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Chairman, I hesitate to ask the question again because the minister has used up three or four of my allotted minutes not answering my question. I was curious to know whether there was any consultation between the Minister of National Defence and the Chief of the Defence Staff before he issued the statement in September denying the rumour that the forces were to be cut down.

Mr. Richardson: I assume that the hon. member is referring to the personal message the chief of staff wrote to the armed forces. He writes in a very personal way, and naturally what he says reflects conversations he has had with me. As I have said here in this House and in committee, I am in complete agreement with the chief of staff on the fact that if the number of personnel is to be reduced the tasks must be reduced, and that is what the chief of staff said in that letter.

Mr. McKinnon: I take it there was consultation between the minister and the Chief of Defence Staff, and the minister agreed to the sending out of that message which gave the impression that the forces were not to be cut, yet the minister is telling us that there are defence cuts, and that the force is to be reduced by the process of attrition. The minister has put the Chief of the Defence Staff in an absolutely impossible situation. I do not know whether the minister believed, at the time he was consulting with the Chief of Defence Staff, that there were to be no cuts in personnel, but if he did he must then have been misled by somebody else, possibly the cabinet. I should like to have more detail on this if the minister can give it.

Mr. Richardson: There are two points involved here. First, at the time of that letter in September, the strength of the armed forces was at 79,000 and, secondly, that type of letter is not one in respect of which the chief of staff would consult with me regarding every sentence and paragraph. I will say, however, that he certainly has reflected the policy of the department as I have outlined it.

Mr. McKinnon: Then I can only assume that the betrayal goes one level higher, and that the minister has been suffering under the delusion that he was going to get funds which the cabinet is not now willing to give. My time is just about up, and I would hate to sit down without trying to be a little more constructive about defence than one could possibly be in this milieu.

I have been getting more concerned each year about the way the money is going out from the minister's office and department, and particularly the small amount being apportioned to the purchase of equipment. What is really needed is for the minister to decide on a plan which is not based on dollars, because under this Liberal administration the dollar is the least reliable measure of any, with the value of the dollar going down each year. Anyone who suggests that last year the 7 per cent increase in the budget would look after things simply does not know the facts of life.

The minister must come up with a plan based on how big a force he wants, how he wants it armed and equipped, and then if it is based on five years he should say to his masters: "If you do not agree to this, fire me. If you do agree, don't welsh on it later".

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, there is in our view nothing sacrosanct about military spending as such. It is often highly inflationary. Indeed, the immense U.S. military spending in Viet Nam was probably responsible, as much as anything else, for the worldwide inflation which has caused and is causing such tremendous difficulties for many Canadians as well as others.

Let us not forget that a measure of the insanity of the world today is the expenditure of over $2 billion on military preparations at a time when we cannot find the resources to deal with destitution and starvation throughout the world.

No one need apologize for trying to cut down, or at least hold the line on defence expenditures. I am somewhat surprised to find there are members of this House who call for the reduction of government expenditure when they are unready, apparently, to reduce defence expenditures and, indeed, urge that this sort of expenditure be increased. This does not mean that we do not need armed services. Nor does it mean that we should try to meet the inflationary pressures by reducing the payroll of the armed forces, or by failing to maintain up-to-date and efficient equipment. To do either of these things would be false economics. It would mean that the armed forces of Canada could not perform adequately the roles assigned to them.

The dilemma of the minister, which he explained in his speech, is caused by the fact that inflation cuts down the purchasing power of the defence budget or, as it is called, the defence dollar. I think the minister knows there is only one way to hold the defence budget in line and that is by cutting out any roles or other tasks assigned to the other armed services which have become obsolete or unnecessary. This seems to be one of the most difficult things for any defence organization to do. There seems to be the feeling that once a system is established it must go on forever.

There is one obvious place where there is need for a reduction in our role. I refer to NORAD, the North American Air Defence Command. This joint command with the United States was set up, I emphasize, for one purpose. It was supposed to defend North America against an attack by manned bombers, presumably coming from the USSR, by means of interceptors and missiles so that when the bombers entered American air space they could be cut down.

This particular form of defence became obsolete even before the treaty came into effect. What made it obsolete was the development of the early warning lines and the advent of the missile age. A Russian bomber striking at North America would take at least two or three hours to reach its targets in North America. Its main target would probably be the American strategic air forces, and possibly also the population centres. The early warning lines would give ample time for the strategic air bombers to be off the ground, and protective measures could be taken. A massive missile retaliatory blow could be struck at the invader's homeland.

As General Simmonds told the Defence Committee more than ten years ago, the Russians would have to be crazy to use manned bombers to attack North America in the missile age. He hastened to add that they were not crazy. It is now abundantly clear to anyone who studies the subject that there is no defence against the ICBM except the mutual deterrent provided by the invulnerable strategic missile power possessed by both super-powers. This is clear to myself and members of my party.

Since 1962 at least we have consistently asked that we negotiate our way out of NORAD. The cost of NORAD is difficult to assess in the way the estimates are arranged. However, I have estimated that at least $100 million a year has been spent on that particular obsolete defence system. I am aware that if we did not have NORAD to police our air space we might have a different expenditure to replace it, but we have spent $1 billion in ten years on a form of active air defence against manned bombers.

It is ironic that when we in this party tried to get some interest in this matter from either of the older parties or the press, and when we proposed to cut out a wasteful, obsolete and inflation-producing role year after year, we received only condescending smiles in reply to our simplicity in making such a suggestion.

It used to be said that it was necessary to maintain NORAD because otherwise the United States would be offended. I do not know what could be said about the theory that we should continue a billion dollar expenditure on a useless project because the Americans would be offended. Nowadays it is absolutely ridiculous to suggest that the Americans could possibly be offended, because the Secretary of Defence of the United States in presenting his 1975 budget before the armed forces committee said this:

> We will decrease our active air defence of the continental United States, reducing the number of air defence fighter squadrons and SAM batteries. Without an effective anti-missile defence, precluded to both the United States and the USSR by the ICBM Treaty of 1972, a defence against Soviet bombers is of little practical value.

He said exactly what I said in slightly different language. I have never been able to understand why we should continue spending this money in this way.

It is not a good answer when some people finally after ten years grasp the point that this is a wasteful way of doing things and that this active air defence makes no sense, then in typical fashion invent some new role that can be carried out. They decide to spend the money anyway. They say they will find something new for NORAD to do.

I appreciate the fact that we must be prepared to act in the defence of the sovereignty of Canada's air space and territorial waters against incidental incursions. As I say, in that particular field there is no reason that we should not co-operate with the United States. We are part of the same continent. It makes sense that we should do so. However, in order to do that there is no need whatever for the joint control at Colorado Springs. We can look after that job ourselves without spending the same amount we have been spending on this other role.

Indeed if we wanted, we could expand and defend every square inch of Canada, but that is not what is required. What we require is to have sufficient interceptors and other equipment available to deal with that, in the natural course of things, would be only a more or less incidental incursion of our sovereignty.

We talk about co-operation with the United States. We seem to forget that it was the United States Secretary of Defence who told us in plain words that this form of defence is no longer practical. I should like the minister to grasp the nettle now and, instead of being slightly evasive, frankly say that this form of defence is not good and we will not proceed with it. He should say that there will be some expenditures for the defence of our sovereignty, and he should mention what he believes is necessary so that we can examine that on its own merit, without pretending that it has something to do with NORAD.

So far as NORAD is concerned I think there would be a sigh of relief by the Canadian people if we showed the gumption to get out of something that has made no sense at any time, or at least not for the past ten years or so.

There is one other matter I should like to raise. I know others wish to speak and I shall therefore be brief. This subject was raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, in a question a day or so ago. I want to ask the minister about a certain report. I have it from a magazine called Latin America of October 18, 1974, to the effect that a Canadian mission from the Department of Supply and Services and the Department of National Defence, headed by Colonel Basil Collett went, to Brazil in order to look over the purchase of an armoured car which would replace what I understand to be completely worn out armoured cars that we have now. I would like to know whether they want to do that and whether the figures are in the neighbourhood of $200 million or $300 million.

I should like to ask the minister whether he has consulted the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the impact of such a purchase. Is he aware that Brazil is governed by a military dictatorship, and that many other countries in South America would view such purchases with very grave apprehension? We cannot do these things in one department without taking account of what should be happening in another. I think that Canadians are aware of this because this magazine tells me that Colonel Collett was instructed to maintain a non military profile during his tour of Brazil. I do not know whether or not that is so, but there will be strong political opposition at home and among our NATO allied, as well as in South America, to this sort of purchase.

I hope that the minister will be able to tell us that that will not be the source. How are we going to pay for them? Will we pay bolstering up the present regime in Brazil with other military supplies? That is what Brazil's neighbours in South America feel. I ask the minister to tell us whether these facts are reasonably outlined. I can give him the name of the company with which we are supposed to be dealing, and I could give him more details if he is interested in seeing them. But I would like to hear how far we have proceeded toward this particular purchase, and I want to suggeest to him that it has political implications that should be examined before any such purchase is concluded.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Chairman, let me say in answer to the last question raised that this is just a matter of what we call sourcing, or finding the areas where we might be able to acquire the kind of equipment that we need, and to make comparisons with what is available in other countries. The negotiations in this respect are not far advanced, and are not at a stage at which it would be necessary for me to consult the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Now, if I may, I should like to comment briefly on the earlier remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood because he has expressed his views to me very clearly a number of times on NORAD. I would like to suggest to him that we are not in as fixed a situation as he implies—we do make changes from time to time. We have closed down three radar stations this year that were part of the NORAD set up. We have reduced the number of our CF 100's to nine. We are certainly following closely the changes that the Americans are making in their reduction of interceptor aircraft. We are quite capable of making adjustments in NORAD. As I have said before, we do not have to make changes in the agreement because, as the hon. member knows, the NORAD agreement does not specify any equipment. I can assure him that we have an open mind, and we pay very careful attention to his views.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Chairman, it is hardly worth while for me even to take a deep breath because it is almost six o'clock. I have some remarks that I would like to make through you to the minister and, after I make them I should like to put some questions to him as well. I think that at this time I will spin it out until six o'clock, if I may, because I do not think it is worth starting now and then trying to break off my remarks.

Generally speaking, I sympathize very much with the problem the minister has with his budget. I support a strong military force in this country, a well equipped and well trained military force, and I am in favour of seeing them have the best possible equipment. I hope that we will be able to maintain a force in the order of 90,000 to 100,000—not the much scaled down force we have now.

I am afraid that if this scaling down continues, as my colleague has illustrated for us, we will arrive at a point in time, five, six or ten years from today, when we will be looking at a force of perhaps 35,000 or 40,000. I recognize that there are people in this country who would like to see our armed forces reduced to nothing more than a national police force, but I am not one who supports that idea. So I can tell the minister that if he is in favour of improving the position of our armed forces, of equipping them adequately to do a proper job and of maintaining a good strong presence, then I will support him.

May I call it six o'clock.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the House rose at six o'clock, the committee was considering Bill C-31, more specifically the votes for the Department of National Defence which appear on page 16 of the bill.

Estimates

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, I had just started my remarks about five minutes to six so I have some time left. I was saying to the minister, through you, that I am a very great supporter of the armed forces and I hope the plan for the future would be to increase their number rather than reduce it. I would like to see the level at 90,000 or 100,000, rather than see it cut to about 70,000 as is the suggestion now. If we keep changing ministers of national defence as we have done in the last few years, I suppose in a few years time we will see a different minister here telling us that we can get along with 50,000 but that they will be better fed, better clothed, better paid and they will still do the job we want.

I am very disturbed at the prospect of a cut in the armed forces, and I do not accept that we have actually increased the dollar amount of the defence budget. The fact is that its share of the GNP has gone down considerably between 1968 and 1974. In the 1968-69 budget it was allocated 16.4 per cent, and today it gets 11 per cent of the federal budget. Inflation is eating away our armed forces, and their equipment in particular in a very disastrous way.

In the last four or five years we have had four ministers of national defence and, as one of my colleagues mentioned already, each has come to us with the same story. I get pretty upset about the attitude toward the portfolio of national defence and its position in the cabinet. I am not one who likes to take personal shots at individuals but I feel that the national defence portfolio is a sort of catch-all—a place where they drop people when they do not know where else to put them. This is the inference we have to draw in light of so many changes over the years.

Surely if there is a good minister in the portfolio they should leave him there and let him carry their plans through. We will have one minister who will expound a theory or lay down some procedure, and then another one will come along and say it cannot be done. This appears to be a sort of game, but a dangerous one.

If we should continue with the present defence policy I am afraid that in an emergency, national or international, we could not respond adequately. When I see that we have destroyers but no crews, that we have tanks that we cannibalize to keep other tanks going, that we have aircraft that we cannibalize for other aircraft, and obsolete motor vehicles procured in 1952, I must conclude that we are in pretty bad shape. My colleague says some of the motor vehicles could be sold as antiques, and perhaps if we keep them for another 20 years they could. The danger is that the longer we delay procurement the more it is going to cost. I am sure the minister realizes this.

When the minister says that we are going to cut this capital expenditure and that capital expenditure and thus will be able to cut $100 million or so out of our estimates, he is really saying that these aircraft, trucks, tanks and naval vessels that we are going to procure some time in the future will cost maybe 50 per cent more than they would today.

The other matter that concerns me is our northern sovereignty. I have read a great deal about this, and a lot of passionate words have been spoken on the subject. I have read the views of the United States. I wonder what is happening when I see that they have commissioned two of the largest icebreakers in the world, larger than anything afloat today even in Russia or Finland. These are certainly not going to be used in the Caribbean; they are going to be used in the Arctic. Do we have the capability of defending our northern sovereignty? I do not think so. I do not think we have either the equipment or the personnel to do very much about it.

[The Chairman.]

I have about five minutes left, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to ask the minister a few short questions and I would appreciate short answers.

First, what have we done regarding the replacement of motor vehicles? Are we going to let contracts, have they been let, and for how many vehicles?

• (2010)

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, we have started to replace our vehicles, having purchased about 500 new trucks. We need many more. We are negotiating for the purchase of more than 2,000 1¼ ton trucks. Our truck procurement program is just starting and is not far advanced.

May I comment about the hon. member's statement. He said that the portfolio of national defence was a catch-all. I think those were his words. May I reply?

Mr. Kempling: I meant nothing personal.

Mr. Richardson: I realize that. Because many dedicated men and women serve in the armed forces, and because I am responsible for spending more than 10 per cent of the federal budget my portfolio is—and I am not saying this because I am the minister—one of the most important portfolios in the government. On behalf of the armed forces that should be recorded.

Mr. Kempling: I accept that. I did not mean anything personal. I made the observation because one minister comes in, lasts about 18 months, and is replaced by another, and so on. This, I think, is a downgrading of the armed forces. I made my comment in all sincerity, without wishing to make a personal comment about the minister himself.

I am concerned about the procurement program for the 1¼ ton vehicles, but I am also concerned about tracked vehicles. How are negotiations for these 1¼ ton vehicles proceeding? How close are we to procurement? Where do we stand with regard to the tracked over-the-snow vehicle so desperately required in the north?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, we have conducted negociations in both of these areas for many months, and those involving tracked and over-the-snow vehicles are close to completion. As soon as we resolve some money questions which, as you know, are under discussion, we hope to go ahead with both programs.

Mr. Kempling: Will the government procure these in 1975 or 1976? When will we have some of these vehicles in our possession?

Mr. Richardson: I hope to have them early in 1975. That is my intention.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, does the Department of National Defence intend to expand the role of our armed forces in northern Canada? I am particularly concerned about the north in view of the remarks the minister made about the environment, roadbuilding, and our position in northern Canada. I assume that the plan to procure tracked vehicles is part of an over-all plan to increase our presence in northern Canada. Would the minister comment on that?

The minister spoke about cutting $100 million from our defence budget. Last week, according to Newsweek magazine, we lent $100 million to Iran. That country, in turn, bought from the United States tremendous quantities of military hardware. It spent almost twice as much as we spent on our national defence budget. The people of Canada would have been served better if we had not lent Iran $100 million at 7 per cent but kept the money for our defence budget. That was only a comment. Would the minister care to speak on the northern aspect I mentioned earlier?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, as I said in the statement I made at the beginning of our examination of my estimates, one of the important roles for the Canadian armed forces is that of participating in the opening of the Canadian north. We are proceeding with what we call the new Viking program, under which 125 men go north, live, and work under northern conditions, and test equipment. Within the last year we opened the Arctic training centre at Churchill, Manitoba, and our forces will train there regularly from now onwards. May I mention that ships of the fleet sailed into Hudson Bay this summer for the first time on training exercises, demonstrating that Canada is not bounded by two oceans but by the three oceans. We are doing a number of things, as I have mentioned, to make our presence felt in the north, and this, I believe, will increase rather than diminish as we proceed.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Chairman, it is a great pleasure to address this august assembly for the first time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anderson: Defence policy has been much criticized in the past. People say that we spend too much, that we have not spent enough, that our forces are underequipped or they are overequipped, that we should increase our commitment to NORAD, and that we should get out of NORAD.

The minister said that in these inflationary times he will try to keep his budget within reason, because the government is committed to showing restraint in its dealings; otherwise, how can it expect the Canadian people to follow its example if it throws money away as if money were going out of style?

Let me reminisce about defence policy during the time when the Liberals were not in power. It interests me, because I was in the Royal Canadian Air Force at the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anderson: During the period 1956-1962 we needed a new long-range patrol aircraft. Air Defence Command needed a new high performance aircraft. That new aircraft was on the drawing board. It was known as the Arrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anderson: That piece of new equipment was killed deader than a dormouse by those who now sit across the floor from me. There was a need for new equipment then also.

The matter of personnel, discussed in great detail recently, also concerned us then. In 1962 three permanent commissions were granted in Air Defence Command—Mr.Chairman, that was three in all Canada! You may think morale is low now. Let me say that morale today is pretty good when compared with what it was during that period.

During that period people who had been trained as air crew were put on flying duties for a three year term and then transferred automatically to ground duties—this after many thousands of dollars had been spent on their training. That practice has now been changed.

Then again, during the last real crisis we experienced, the Cuban missile crisis, the airforce was using an aircraft the C101, which had been accepted from the United States to replace the Arrow. It was an aircraft in no way comparable to the Arrow. However, at that time we did not possess a single effective weapon in Canada. If bombers came over Canada there was no way of striking at them since National Defence policy had failed to provide us with the necessary weapons.

There has been talk regarding NORAD. Certain hon. members feel we should leave this organization and that Canada should not defend its territory. I say we have a duty to take part in the defence of Canadian sovereignty, regardless of the cost of that commitment. The theory appears to be that there is no menace from Russian aircraft at the present time. I would be happy to believe this if I saw evidence that the Russians were dismantling their bombing fleet, but since this is not the case, and since their bombers are carrying atomic weapons, I think there must be a threat from that direction.

It was not missiles which delivered the bombs in Korea or in Viet Nam; it was conventional bombers. For this reasons I shall support NORAD until I see that the other side is reducing its own force. It seems odd that we should have to stand here and defend our position. Why should we have to feel guilty about protecting our country? We think it is right, and that we have a duty to maintain these defences.

There has been some debate regarding our membership in NATO. I think that over the years NATO has been the deterrent which has kept Europe free.

Some hon. Members: Tell the Prime Minister!

Mr. Anderson: As long as I have some say in it we shall continue our present posture toward NATO.

With regard to our commitments as a peacekeeping force, I believe the world recognizes the contribution Canada has made. We are in a special position as a nation whose forces can operate on the soil of other nations because we do not seek to increase our territory; we are not a warring nation. The respect which we enjoy among other countries in the world bodes well for Canada.

The primary objective of our defence policy must be the maintenance of Canadian sovereignty. There is no disagreement about that. As a nation of 22 million people we cannot compete with the United States or with the U.S.S.R. in defence research and multi-billion dollar defence projects. Modern armaments are expensive, and by the time new projects leave the drawing board they are obsolete. At the present time our defence posture requires new ships, new planes and other new military equipment, but we cannot get all these things at once, especially during a period of inflation when we must all show restraint. I support the position taken by the minister when he says we are trying to live within our budget and restrain our spending.

Mr. Brewin: Would the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Anderson: By all means.

Mr. Brewin: May I congratulate the hon. member who has just spoken, if this was his first speech in this chamber, as I understand it to have been. It was delivered with great capability. My question is this—

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to raise a point of order in the middle of a question by the hon. member for Greenwood. I do so because I was informed by the Chair that, having exhausted 20 minutes of my first opportunity to speak, I would not be allowed to take part in the debate again. I have no objection to the hon. member for Greenwood being allowed to ask a question, provided I am given a similar courtesy.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni took only about eight minutes of his time, after which he allowed a question. A question is normally allowed by the Chair in those circumstances.

Mr. Brewin: I do not know if the hon. member was in the chamber when the question of NORAD was discussed this afternoon. I referred to a statement made by the Secretary of Defence Schlesinger which referred to the air defence conducted through NORAD—he did not actually use the word "NORAD"—and in that statement he said: "Because there is no defence against missiles, defence against manned bombers is not practicable". If the hon. member is not prepared to accept my advice—and I would not blame him for that—is he not prepared to give some weight to the words of the Secretary of Defence in the United States?

Mr. Anderson: I am aware of that statement, but I am also aware of the fact that the United States has not dismantled its NORAD equipment. So I can only assume that the capability is still there. Then again, Mr. Schlesinger is but a person; I should like to have the opportunity to question him about the point of view he has expressed. I should like to know the context in which he made that statement. What does the defence staff think of it? What do the joint chiefs of staff think about that opinion? At any rate they have not put it into practice. Until such time as that friendly nation, which is still carrying a tremendous stock of manned bombers, takes action to cut its fleet I think it is mandatory that we give our support to NORAD.

Mr. McKinnon: Would the hon. member accept one more question? In the course of his speech he said that some people were complaining about the forces being over-equipped. Could he identify the people who made that particular claim?

Mr. Anderson: The hon. member is quite correct. We have all recently emerged from an election campaign. This matter was raised in my area—some people were saying there is too much of this and too much of that. It is inevitable that people will take sides. I was referring, really, to the money we were spending. This particular point was not made here in this chamber but during the election campaign.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate, and I should like to tell the minister that I intend to express a few frank views about the situation in defence as I see it. Anything that I say is to the minister in his capacity as minister and in no way reflects on any personal friendship I had with the minister before my remarks, and I hope will have when I have finished my remarks.

In light of some of the things occurring today as well as some of the matters the minister has under study, I would say the situation is so serious that, even though I should like to ask a multiplicity of questions, as others have, this is not time to talk tamely but to talk frankly.

I was disappointed in the extreme that the minister, in presenting his estimates to this committee, gave an apologia, as he did also last time he presented his estimates, as well as in the statement he gave the committee a week or two ago. He sounded more like a stockbroker flipping coupons and juggling figures than a minister expressing the concern of all of those who have a sincere interest in the defence of this country.

He justified a saving of $100 million, and yet when we look at the LIP program some $90 million has been spent. No one suggests that the budget has been cut, but some budgets have been cut by the government in the last few years. The minister could have said some substantive things about defence when he dealt with the four priority tasks of our forces, but he got involved in this semantic debate about figures, taking $17 million here and $14 million there, and ending up with $100 million. If he wants to be Auditor General I think he should move on to other pastures and not confuse serious issues.

The issues are serious because we have had a defence freeze for four years. We have also had a galloping rate of inflation of 15 per cent in terms of service procurement, not 7 per cent which was the yardstick in the formula introduced last year. It is a futile exercise to talk about a cut in the budget, because we know that due to inflation and the freeze the budget has been effectively cut. More important, the effectiveness of the forces has been substantially reduced.

In all kindness, Mr. Chairman, I say to the minister that the vacillation, not only of himself but of his four predecessors in the last five years, the indecision in leadership still evident in his department, and the retreats from decisions that have been made, have all compounded the problem, so that members of the forces of this land, be they private, corporal or general, are in a state of despair, bewilderment and downright depression, as has seldom been the case in peacetime history.

I say peacetime advisedly, because what a peace it is! For example, look at Cyprus. The minister knows more about Cyprus than I because he has been there. Then there is the Middle East. Those are two hot spots in the world that are tinder dry. Yet the Warsaw pact commitment is getting bigger and bigger every year, at a time when our stature as a component part of NATO is shrinking, as indeed is NATO itself. So one cannot describe conditions today ideally as peacetime conditions.

I am sure Confucius or Joseph Howe would have said that if a country cannot patrol or protect its own borders it will not survive as a state. As far as Canada is concerned, I think the capacity of the forces to patrol our borders, and protect the sovereignty of which we are all so proud, is somewhat limited.

Developing a Canadian identity through cultural programs using the broadcasting media are all to the good. Yet when it comes to being bosses of our own territory, a fundamental function of a sovereign state, I suggest we are missing out. By sovereignty, I mean sovereignty over our own borders and the three seas that surround us.

It is a strange paradox, and a sad commentary, that the cutbacks which the minister talked about, but which he did not define in terms of the four functions, are being made at a time when there is increased emphasis on sovereignty, be it in the Arctic, off our shores, both in connection with the fisheries and the 200 mile limit, or our responsibility to NATO to patrol certain sections of the North Atlantic.

The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth would be the last person to show any disrespect for the services, and quite frankly, I thought the minister was indulging in a little political partisanship by casting some reflection on the hon. member. He would be the first to admit, as I think the minister would also, that the peacetime serviceman, even in this sort of pseudo-peace we are in today, is the most maligned and misrepresented individual in the public service. The fact that there have been five ministers since 1968 in this important department, which the minister took pride in today, does not give members of the forces much opportunity to find out who their current minister is, so how can he defend the interests of servicemen and officers?

It is time that the Minister of National Defence did start to defend the forces and to fight for the forces, rather than being an apologist for a government that has no interest in the forces, does not care about the forces, and thinks in the abstract terms of the Prime Minister that some are bad, others are worse, so let us not get involved at all. This is not the kind of leadership that we deserve from a minister of national defence. The minister must become the advocate of the forces.

The minister should tell Canadians the way it is. There are problems in defence, and they should not all rest on the shoulders of the minister. Let him tell Canadians about our contribution to NATO. In the statement that the minister filed before the committee in 1973, he told Canadians that we are thirteenth out of fourteen nations in terms of gross national product contribution. The only country below Canada was, as most members know, Luxembourg, and it can hardly be counted because it has only one battalion which serves in Belgium. So we are really last. Is that the kind of commitment of which the Prime Minister is proud? How can he say, as he said in Brussels today, that Canada is proud to continue playing an important part in NATO, when our percentage support is the lowest on the totem pole? Let the minister tell Canadians that.

Let him also tell Canadians about our responsibilities in the north, about how our air patrols and numbers of men have been substantially cut back, and how the option is open to him to cut them back even further. Let me tell the minister that if one of the options that he is considering becomes reality, then I will do my darndest to make sure that either I leave the House or the minister does. Certainly one of us should go if the minister is serious about one of his options respecting the north.

There must be a presence if you want to have sovereignty. If the minister thinks you can cut back overflights for six months at a time without our presence in the area suffering, then he is more naïve than I thought.

Let the minister tell Canadians about NATO. I am not talking just about forces in the north, because that is only one facet of defence. Tell Canadians that this night, and every night for the last month, our aircraft have not been flying as far out into the Atlantic, or as often as they used to do. In fact they are staying pretty close to home. The minister knows that cutbacks have affected Maritime command flights. He should start levelling with Canadians.

Someone recently talked about banana republics. I am sure I could compare the military budgets for 1972-73 of most of the banana republics of South America and would find that they spend more proportionately of their national production on defence than we do here. Tell Canadians what we are doing in respect of NATO. Why is this all shrouded in mystery and secrecy?

If Canadians are not prepared to pay the price of defence then the minister will have the understanding of this House. He cannot have things both ways. The minister cannot make statement after statement, as referred to by the hon. member for Victoria today, in the face of shifts, changes, retreats and reversals in our defence policy—and this has been going on since 1958,—with complete despondency and depression in the service.

The minister said that defence of North America is one of our priorities. One of the reasons we are not sharing and joining in exercises in the north with our American cousins is because of cuts in finances. We can spend $2.5 billion on unemployment insurance and $750 million for consultants' reports, but now we have the minister taking the time of the House telling us what a grand fellow he is because he saved $100 million in the estimates today.

In all seriousness, some poeple in the forces are thinking today that this minister is a fraud if he pretends that we are fulfilling the minister's own four stated objectives.

An hon. Member: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not sure who said that but he should stand up. The minister may not have time to answer my questions as I will likely take up my entire 20 minutes, but let me repeat that the minister is a fraud if he stands in this House tonight and suggests we are presently discharging the four commitments to which he referred—and that was true even before any cutbacks.

There has been some reference to cutbacks to the extent of 30 per cent. Having relation to the four stated objectives, I should like to know where those cutbacks will take place. Surely this is the time for the minister to indicate what are the problems and what he considers should be done. He should let us know if we are going to get out of NATO, cut back on our sovereignty expenditures in the north, cut back on our peacekeeping role, or cut back on our Norad commitments. These are the things we should be hearing about here today rather than references to a savings of $100 million in the over-all defence spending.

An hon. Member: What about Cyprus and the Middle East?

Mr. Nowlan: I suggest that the President of the Treasury Board knows more about Indians than he does about defence. In any event I have the floor at this time. I do not know how much he knows about Indians, but I think they have scalped him a couple of times.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Nowlan: An hon. member shouts "shame". It may have been the hon. member for Vaudreville. He is ashamed everytime he speaks. The minister talks glibly about cutting back 30 per cent.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. On a number of occasions I have had to correct members of the opposition. I did not at this time interject, but in any event the county is the county of Vaudreuil.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to chase after muskrat tracks, I am going after something a little bigger.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Chairman, we have heard some reference to the fact that this government does not care about the armed forces, and this affects me because I am in this government. I would have hon. members understand that there are many of us who have served, who care about the forces, and who will not accept that kind of criticism.

An hon. Member: You have a lot to learn.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Baker: Take it to your caucus.

Mr. Hees: You are not a member of the government and the way you are carrying on you never will be, Buster.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I would suggest to the hon. member that what he is raising is an argument and not a question which relates to his own privilege or the privileges of this House.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I do not have time to indulge in these frivolities and indiscretions of hon. members opposite. If they do not know the difference between the cabinet and a member of parliament they have a great deal to learn about political science. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is a very delightful gentleman, and I know that after he sits and listen to the contributions of various members he will realize that I am directing my remarks to the government and not to Liberal backbenchers, NDP backbenchers or Conservative backbenchers.

With all due respect his own Prime Minister called members of parliament nobodies.

An hon. Member: And he isn't even a somebody.

Mr. Nowlan: In any event I will ignore these interventions tonight because I am not going to run through the swamp after muskrat tracks when I can go after the Minister of National Defence.

The minister and his officials talk about cutting back to the extent of 30 per cent. I should like to know how you cut back 30 per cent in respect of a foot soldier. Is he supposed to walk only one mile instead of three?

An hon. Member: You cut off part of a leg.

Mr. Nowlan: That is about as naïve as some of the things the department has done. Obviously when you have moving parts, as you do in the mobile or Maritime commands, you have extra costs for aviation fuel and the like. The minister says we are going to have a well fed, well equipped and well motivated Praetorian Guard. Incidentally, my latin is as good as my French, and my French is not too good.

Let me become serious, Mr. Chairman, as I know I am reaching the end of my time. How can you have such a guard when the forces have no purpose? They cannot have a purpose if the minister makes no commitment.

How can any member of the service, especially one in Maritime Command, believe that this minister has a commitment to the force when the largest single problem the minister has is in terms of the capital cost necessary to replace the LRPA? I will not get into that, but the command most affected by that replacement has never even seen the minister. Its members have never seen even his shadow. Since the hon. member became a minister of the Crown he has not taken it upon himself to get out of Ottawa to make an official visit to Maritime Command. Certainly that alone has not done much for Maritime Command.

Let me conclude by saying that we heard a great deal during the election campaign about leadership. The government received a mandate to lead. It is time the minister started to lead by making some decisions about the forces.

Perhaps before he makes those decisions it would be a good idea, both for the minister and the forces, if he moved around the country speaking to service clubs, explaining the problems and the limitations.

Perhaps I could refer to the Minister of Agriculture as an example. I have disagreed with him on many occasions and on many issue, but I respect his energy. He deserves some kudos for his commitments to farmers. I think it is time the Minister of National Defence took a leaf from that minister's book. He should become the spokesman for the armed services just as the egg monster has become the self-styled spokesman for the farmers. Perhaps then he would become known to the servicemen as the Minister of Defence, no longer dominated by his cabinet colleagues or restricted in his activities. Let him start now by meeting his men in the different commands. The minister has been all around the world, but he has not visited his own men in Maritime Command.

I do not know about Mobile Command or Air Transport Command, but Maritime Command, as the minister knows, is one of the biggest problems. It is obvious, because of its moving parts which are involved in the sea or air aspect, that that command is most concerned about the cutbacks in operations. I had intended to read a beautiful speech by Churchill given in 1938 about the annexation of Czechoslovakia but I am afraid that my time is just about up, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stanfield: No.

Mr. Nowlan: All right. Then by popular request I shall read these words of Mr. Churchill spoken in th House of Commons in England on October 5, 1938. He was the first person who said that Neville Chamberlain came back with an unmitigated defeat. I want to read this seriously because of the problems the minister has and the narrow focus he has on these problems. We are getting close to the same situation.

In talking about Czechoslovakia Mr. Churchill said:

> But we cannot consider the abandonment and ruin of Czechoslovakia in the light only of what happened only last month.

I stress that because it is not just a decision about the Argus that is involved; it is the over-all thing.

> It is the most grievous consequence which we have yet experienced of what we have done and of what we have left undone in the last five years—five years of futile good intention, five years of eager search for the line of least resistance, five years of uninterrupted retreat of British power, five years of neglect of our air defences. Those are the features which I stand here to declare and which marked an improvident stewardship for which Great Britain and France have dearly to pay.

That was in 1938. All I can say in closing, especially to my friends to the left, is that men have not died peacefully in their beds since civilization dawned. There has always been some type of war. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that we can get out of that situation, but we are not out of it and we will not get out of it by not protecting ourselves.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, some of the remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley do not require comment. However, it always comes as a surprise to me, and as a surprise for those of us who are working in the interests of the Canadian armed forces, to find that it is usually the members of the opposition who refer to the Canadian armed forces in the kind of language that I wrote down and which was used by the hon. member—downhearted, ill-equipped and with low morale. I do not know why they seem to want to degrade the Canadian armed forces in that way.

Mr. Nowlan: Visit them.

Mr. Richardson: I do visit the armed forces. I talk frequently with members of the forces and I do not find them downhearted. I find them dedicated. I find them highly professional, efficient and proud of the work they are doing for Canada. I think that if the hon. member for Annapolis Valley had been in the House earlier today he would have heard the importance which I attach to the roles played by the armed forces. I do not intend to repeat my statement now. However, may I say with your indulgence, Mr. Chairman, that if everything was as bad as the hon. member and other hon. members suggest in the past ten years—

Mr. Nowlan: I said since 1968.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I want to read not from an old paper but from something which appeared in an Ottawa paper this afternoon. This may be an indication of whether things are as bad as they are made out to be.

Mr. Nowlan: Who wrote it?

Mr. Richardson: The name is Robert P. Rothschild. He says:

> There is no question but that the Canadian armed forces are about the best-trained and most professional military organizations in the world.

Mr. Hees: He is a general. He was one of your boys who is now retired. We used to call him the baron, Baron Rothschild.

Mr. Richardson: The last sentence I wish to read states:

> Their record of achievement has few, if any, equals. The Canadian people have every right to be, and should be, extremely proud of them.

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh! Oh!

The Chairman: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Annapolis Valley wishes to raise a point of order, if hon. members will allow me to hear it.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I must say I have been here ever since the debate started. I listened to the minister. So far as General Rothschild, who just retired from defence headquarters, is concerned, the reference to him accentuates my point. How many sergeants messes and corporals messes has the minister visited, and did he get out in the field?

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, through you I should like to put some questions to the minister. The first question relates to the air-sea rescue squadron on the west coast, Squadron 442. A year ago I had occasion to ask the minister questions related to the difficulties that squadron was having in maintaining its equipment and keeping all its aircraft in the air for an optimum period of time. The questions I asked and the subsequent debate which took place made it clear—and I know there is no disagreement on this point—that there was no criticism of the squadron and that in fact the men operated as efficiently as possible.

As recorded at page 7213 of Hansard for October 25, 1973, I asked the minister the following question:

Will the minister either replace these worn-out aircraft or increase the number available, and when will this be done?

The minister answered in part:

In the new modernization and renewal program that I have announced there are funds for new equipment which will be going into search and rescue, as well as into other areas.

Would the minister tell us exactly what has been done with regard to 442 Squadron further to the comment he made a year ago.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, broadly speaking the equipment for search and rescue has been maintained and improved. I cannot bring forward the details at this moment to tell you exactly what equipment has been added to 442 Squadron.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister if he has any knowledge whether there has been any change in the basic equipment of Squadron 442 in the past year, or whether there has been any change in the procedure of supplying that squadron with replacement parts on a more efficient basis than was the case a year ago?

The minister understands that at the time the problem was to try to take spare parts from a base somewhere in central Canada to British Columbia, and there was a further difficulty in that civil aircraft flying into Comox did not have the capacity to carry many of the parts. Can the minister tell us whether he has any knowledge of any change in the basic equipment, or in the parts replacement system that was in effect at that time?

Mr. Richardson: I can understand the hon. member for Vancouver South being interested and concerned about the question of spare parts for the squadron in his region, and I will undertake to provide that information in detail. As I have said earlier, however, I cannot do it at this time.

Mr. Fraser: I thank the minister for his answer. I want to state unequivocally—because there are some members on the government side of the House who seem to think that any criticism coming from this side indicates lack of interest or respect for the armed forces of this country—that, as the minister may know, I served modestly in the armed forces of my country some years ago and I am extremely proud of it. Any comments I have to make are made because I think the armed forces in the country fulfill a very necessary function, and that we are served by dedicated men.

[Mr. Fraser.]

However, I am concerned when I find that cuts are taking place. Also, when I talk to people in the armed forces and we hear unfortunate descriptions of the situation, I find that that can only lead to low morale if it remains uncorrected. I may say to some hon. members who have spoken tonight that I served with the Canadian brigade in Germany in 1953, at which time the government said it was the finest and best equipped brigade that had ever left Canada.

This does not concern the minister, but that sort of statement was made at the time when we served in the infantry brigade in Germany, when we had no web belts and no steel helmets, we were short of munitions, and in fact could not have fought our way out of a wet paper bag because of a basic breakdown in supply and communications. Yet I remember, as a young soldier, the government telling me that it was a marvellous brigade. But I was there and saw things that the then minister of national defence, when he came to visit, never saw because he had no chance to look at men in the line, or to talk to the people who could have told him what was the trouble. So I urge the minister to be sure in all his travels to talk to everyone in the forces, and not just to those who may feel they have to be apologists for him.

I ask the minister to let us know exactly how many front line battalions are stationed presently in Canada. I believe there are nine infantry battalions, and I take it the minister agrees.

Mr. Richardson: That is the correct number.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister tell me what is the strength of those battalions? If he cannot tell me the exact number of men, can he give me the approximate strength?

Mr. Richardson: A battalion is in the order of 600 to 700 men.

Mr. Fraser: Unless battalion strength has been changed drastically since I was in the forces, at which time a battalion at full strength was substantially more than that, is the minister saying that battalions are now running at around 500 or 600 men?

Mr. Richardson: I said 600 to 700 men.

Mr. Fraser: Is that the answer?

Mr. Richardson: That is the figure that I have used and understand to be substantially the right figure for the strength of our battalions at present.

Mr. Fraser: May I then ask the minister whether, from a military point of view, looking at what is a full strength battalion on the Canadian battle order, whether these battalions are under strength or up to strength?

Mr. Richardson: Compared with their wartime or fully authorized strength, they are undermanned.

Mr. Fraser: That is the point I am trying to make. I understand that in NATO we have 2,800 ground troops. I should like the minister to tell me how many of that number are actually front line combat troops. I am not talking about medical personnel or other support troops.

In other words, have we one full strength battalion that could go into action in Europe?

Mr. Richardson: I understand that the correct figure for the land troops in Europe is 3,000.

Mr. Fraser: Of the 3,000, how many are front line combat troops?

Mr. Richardson: All of the 3,000 are front line troops.

Mr. Fraser: Where else do we have front line combat troops—how many in Cyprus and how many in the Middle East?

Mr. Richardson: In Cyprus we have front line troops numbering 950. Our forces in the Middle East are involved in logistics and are not considered front line in the same sense.

Mr. Fraser: Doing some very rough arithmetic it seems to me that Canada is in a situation of having total front line combat troops numbering less than 11,000 or 12,000 men. I understand that this is less than a division. What I am asking the minister—and I am not asking this in a pejorative sense but in the hope that some support from this side may make it easier for the government in terms of public opinion and in terms of the government's own deliberations—is whether he is satisfied that on a budget of $2.5 million the best Canada can do is to put less than 10,000 men into the front line as combat troops? Is that good enough on that budget?

Mr. Richardson: It does not really help us to look at only one part of the Canadian armed forces and ask about our whole budget. The hon. member has not mentioned the air or the sea personnel, and yet part of the budget goes to them.

Mr. Fraser: I am quite aware of the other branches of the armed forces, and I am not trying to say that the budget does not cover them, but I am saying that our armed forces are consolidated. Is the minister satisfied that that is all we can do with that budget?

We have 22 million people, we have an annual budget of $24 million, and we have a total of 79,000 men in the armed forces. Is that good enough, and is the minister satisfied with that?

Mr. Richardson: I think we would never be satisfied if we only considered the sharp end unrelated to the support side. We want to increase the sharp end, and I believe this is what the hon. member is talking about. I know something of his background to which he referred, and also his active participation in the militia, and I think he has a good point. We should put as much emphasis as we can on the sharp end. However, we cannot get along without the support forces, and in coming to the conclusion that he may be trying to reach, he should give consideration to the equipment that is in use. This is something that I have tried to emphasize. Very clearly it is not just the numbers that should be considered, whether they are infantry or sea or air forces. It is not just the numbers that determine the military capability, but numbers with equipment. You have to measure numbers and equipment in order to assess military capability, which is the central objective.

Mr. Fraser: I could not agree more with the minister that one cannot measure military capability only in terms of numbers. My colleague says that our front line troops number about 10,000. I assume that when the minister refers to those troops he means troops with equipment and with back up. My question is: how much lower can the armed forces decrease before the land component of the Canadian armed forces reaches militarily a negligible number of men? Can we sink any lower?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, this is the issue we are facing. We have our commitments in Canada for internal security; we have our commitments to NATO of 5,000 men; we have our commitment for peacekeeping, and we have to achieve a rotation of those personnel. There have to be training programs. The hon. member is correct. We have reached the level where it is difficult for us to carry out all the tasks we are required to undertake. The forces are double tasked and in some cases, triple tasked in order to carry out the duties expected of them.

Mr. Fraser: I thank the minister for his answer, and I think we have got to the heart of the matter. I hope he will remind his colleagues tomorrow that he has support on this side of the House for the difficulty he is in, and he has a lot of support from the public. I might just end my remarks by reminding the House of a verse quoted back at the time of the Napoleonic wars, Mr. Chairman. It goes like this:

God and the soldier we alike adore
In times of danger—not before
The danger gone—and all things righted
God is forgotten, the soldier slighted.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, I am going to participate in this debate a little late, and so I am sure a good deal of what I wanted to say has already been said, but I should like to ask the minister to clarify something.

On page 15-18 of the estimates in the section headed "Contribution to NATO Collective Defence Measures", a rough addition of the figures produces something under $1 billion for capital expenditure. This would presumably be hardware of various kinds, ships, etc. May I ask the minister if this is a budgetary item or a phased purchase program which has been hidden in the $2.36 billion total defence budget, or should I consider that item, something over $800 million, to be part of the total $2.36 billion defence budget for this year?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. member is looking at the first column on page 15-18 headed "Currently Estimated Total Cost", rather than the actual estimates, but I would have to get clarification from him before I fully understand his point.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, it is a case of straightening it out in my own mind. Page 15-18 of the estimates deals with capital expenditures, and under the heading "Contribution to NATO Collective Defence Measures" in the column "Currently Estimated Total Cost" the total comes to over $800 million. I should like to ask the minister whether that is a budgetary estimate for a year, or are we talking about a phased projects program in terms of capital expenditure in the NATO program?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, if I understand the hon. member's question correctly, I would say it is a phased program. The first column gives the total that we intend to spend over a number of years; the second column indicates what has been spent up to March 31, 1974, on that program; the third column shows how much we expect to spend on that program this year, and the fourth column shows what we have still to spend in future years.

Mr. Leggatt: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, that clarifies the matter. I have heard a considerable amount of debate about whether we should leave this budget as is, Mr. Chairman. It has been an interesting debate because my friends in the Conservative Party have reacted fairly predictably. When we talk about public expenditures there is a tremendous hue and cry, but when we get to the subject of defence they say we are not spending enough money.

If we want to save the taxpayers' money this is the place to do it. I congratulate the government on having gone part way by reducing some of these expenditures. If it would really like to save money, however, it could start with the contribution this country makes to the NATO defence alliance and the 5,200 troops committed to that alliance. If we were to bring the troops home and withdraw that $800 million capital expenditure it would save my constituents a pretty significant amount of money which could go a long way toward increasing pensions and improving social services.

The usefulness of NATO to this country is over, Mr. Chairman, and it is time that this House entered into a serious debate on that subject, instead of a debate about the Sherman tank we are about to purchase.

Mr. Woolliams: Ramsey MacDonald talked like that and they all nearly lost their lives.

Mr. Leggatt: In reply to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley who suggested that World Federalists were just dreamers, Mr. Chairman, I must say that if we do not start dreaming about world federalism and world order, this kind of debate we are having is pretty futile. We will not have a world.

I should like to commend the government on the contribution the Canadian armed forces have made to the cause of world peace. I think it is time we honoured those men who died in the cause of peace both in the Middle East and on Cyprus, while performing a very difficult role. I hope on Remembrance Day some special tribute will be paid to the soldiers who have the difficult job of being unprotected from both sides in a war. We should pay them the honour that is their due, especially those men who died in the service of world peace.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich raised the matter of the Law of the Sea Conference and I should like to ask the minister a question on that subject. It is very likely that this conference will result in at least a 200 mile limit, plus the continental shelf. That could be a difficult problem for this country, Mr. Chairman, because we will have to patrol that area. May I ask the minister what plans there are for patrolling the 200 mile limit off the coast of British Columbia? Our naval equipment is probably inadequate, and possibly the wrong type to service a very large area.

Mr. Richardson: I thank the hon. member for New Westminster for referring to the greatest cost of our peacekeeping. I have said this before. Our greatest loss is the loss of life and the number of men who have been wounded in peacekeeping service. I felt that strongly when I attended the funeral of Private Berger in Rimouski. I will be in Lahr, Germany, on Armistice Day, and I will recall there the sentiments which have been expressed here tonight.

Concerning the Law of the Sea Conference, we know that a final decision has not been made. The next conference is ahead of us, and we are preparing to do what we can to implement any new understandings and protect Canadian Interests within the limits finally determined at that conference.

Mr. Leggatt: My last point concerns the approximate $54 million being spent on defence research. We should examine the effects of grants given for defence research. When you develop a defence industry which depends on these grants, and admittedly in Canada the risk is small at present, you can run into the sort of thing which happened with the Arrow in Toronto. That aircraft was developed directly because a military-industrial complex was in existence. We know the agony of the decision to scrap the aircraft.

Let me ask the minister if some of that $54 million which is used for defence research has been responsible for a device known as the sound disorientation device. It is used in the interrogation of prisoners, and is now being used in northern Ireland. Is my information accurate? Are our defence research people making this kind of device, which can be classified as a device of military intelligence rather than military hardware.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I have no knowledge of that device. I can confirm the hon. member's figures. We spend about $4.5 million on grants to industry and $3 million to universities. That is part of the total of $54 million which we spend on defence research. The remainder is used to operate our own defence research establishments.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, we spend $54 million on defence research but not a penny on peace research. Some organizations in this country do effective and useful work in determining the real causes of war, instead of rattling sabres as some of our friends do. I suggest that we should consider seriously giving grants to organizations which do research into the historical causes of war. If you want to spend money effectively, that would be a good start. Most countries of northern Europe spend money on peace research. It would be a useful change if we spent money on peace instead of on war.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence commented about an article in this evening's Ottawa Journal by Robert P. Rothschild. May I continue quoting from that same article:

> The sad fact is that they are almost reduced to skin and bones. Muscle in the form of modern equipment is lacking. Increased costs and inflation have meant that there is an ever-decreasing portion of the defence budget that can be devoted to new equipment.
> Reducing the strength of the forces without cutting out complete commitments will only mean that they will not be able to carry out their tasks properly. This will inevitably breed frustration with a consequent lowering of morale in all ranks, no matter how well paid the serviceman will be—> —government spending is on the increase. The percentage allotted to national defence is on the decrease. One can hardly escape the feeling that the government does not believe in its own announced defence policy.

Last week I asked if the money for overhauling the Boeing 707 at Winnipeg would be allotted under CAE. As the fund is not mentioned in the estimates, will the minister seek the fund next year? Will these funds come under the defence budget, or will the minister apply to Treasury Board?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, these funds have been approved by Treasury Board. Of course they were not approved when these estimates were prepared. The figures only appear in the estimates after they have been approved by Treasury Board.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, some months ago the minister said that his department would go into partnership with Air Canada for transporting military personnel. Has that procedure begun?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I understand we have not entered into charter arrangements with Air Canada.

Mr. McKenzie: Is the department planning to enter into an agreement with Air Canada? The minister made a public announcement on that. May I bring to the minister's attention a brief presented to the government in February, 1972, by the Air Transport Association of Canada about the commercial-military partnership which would conduct air transport operations? Even if the minister faces some difficulties, would he consider reviewing that document again and consulting those people about transporting troops and cargo? Also, can the minister explain what his department's relationship will be with Air Canada?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, we have discussed contingency plans with Air Canada but we have not entered into any contract for the carriage of our personnel or supplies. From time to time we make use of commercial airlines, but we have no contractual arrangement on a regular basis.

● (2130)

Mr. McKenzie: One further question. Does the Department of National Defence have a program to translate all existing technical documents, training and instructional documents, and schematic drawings into the French language? If there is such a program, may we have a description of what is involved?

Mr. Richardson: That is a very long-term program. We are implementing the B and B policy in the department but the program to which the hon. member referred is not actively under way at the present time. It is long term.

Mr. McKenzie: Does the minister have any idea what the overall cost will be for Canada? Will these documents be translated in each province, in each depot, and also in our overseas bases?

Mr. Richardson: I am certain that the figure for the whole of Canada has not been determined. It has not been determined by us.

Mr. McKenzie: Is there any sum included in the estimates this year to provide for translation services? How far back will the department be going in its translation procedure? Will the department be ordering bilingual documents in connection with any new equipment that is required?

Mr. Richardson: There is provision in the estimates for the translating of manuals and of information relating to new equipment.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the proceedings today, an opportunity which allows us to make comments and pass judgment on departmental activities, or perhaps, more appropriately, inactivities and expenditures within the Department of National Defence.

The main thrust of concern, care and criticism dealt with has been, and no doubt will continue to be the very obvious attempts by the government to reduce the priority of the National Defence Department in relation to other government departments.

Last weekend I had the pleasure of attending a portion of the annual conference, held in St. Thomas, of District A, Royal Canadian Legion. This conference was attended by over 300 delegates representing the many legion branches in southwestern Ontario.

Countless numbers of members expressed concern, disgust, disappointment and disapproval over recent announcements by the government with respect to present and future programs. This group of highly distinguished citizens expresses a well qualified view that must not go unheard. It is a view for which I have the highest respect and regard, and theirs is a concern that I share.

Let me cite in part a resolution presented and passed at that conference. It reads as follows:

> Canada has not the military strength to live up to her present commitments. We of the Legion advocate the maintenance of defence on sea-land-air by virtue of our partnership in the commonwealth, the United Nations and NATO. We strongly object to the cut in Canada's armed forces strength.

This statement accurately reflects the mood of that segment of our society, and no doubt reflects the mood of a great number of Canadians.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having expressed the views of a segment of our society to which we owe a tremendous amount of gratitude, indeed for our whole freedom and democratic way of life, I want to turn to another group of people who are close to the beginning of their lifespan, and upon whose shoulders our future and Canada's future rests. I refer to the youth of Canada. It has often been said, and rightly so, that the most valuable of all resources in our country is our youth.

I will deal, in particular, with the air cadet league of Canada, without a doubt a most neglected group, whose extreme misfortune it is to be placed at the mercy of a defence department that does so little and appears to be planning to do even less for such a worthwhile sector of our Canadian society.

I am in receipt of a recent letter from Mr. Art Jordon, general manager of the St. Thomas YMCA, and the commanding officer of an air cadet squadron. Some of his remarks are pertinent to this debate. He says:

> Your are aware that for the past 11 years our YMCA together with the Air Cadet League of Canada, and the Department of National Defence has sponsored an air cadet squadron in St. Thomas.
> It has been and we believe still can be a potent force for good among our young citizens.
> Unfortunately, in recent years, about the last three to be exact, we have detected what appears to be diminishing interest in cadets by the Department of National Defence. Promises have been made regarding new training aids, films, uniforms, and the support of girl cadets, yet nothing has happened.
> We can readily understand the need to curtail expenses at the government level, but seriously question these curtailments being made at the expense of a program that has proven its value over many years.
> Some of our squadron's accomplishments are as follows: 27 private pilots, three glider pilots, 14 senior leaders, three athletic leaders, seven to military college, five to police forces, and 19 to regular armed forces. No less than 1,011 different individuals have served one year or more in the squadron.
> This record of service can no doubt be multiplied many times across our country.
> It is difficult to believe that we are still attempting to outfit the young people in World War II uniforms and using training aids such as ancient .303 rifles with .22 bores.
> Our board of directors want to continue this program but if the senior partner, the Department of National Defence, does not soon take some steps to modernize its part of the operation, then there will not be any way we will be able to continue to interest the young men and women who could well be our leaders of the future.

Some of these criticisms require elaboration. Anyone who has seen an air cadet squadron, a navy or army cadet squadron on recent parade could not help but be aware of the deplorable condition of the cadet uniforms. At this time the cadets are wearing the old blue uniforms, many of them are shabby and most of them ill-fitting.

One can easily imagine the difficulty of trying to recruit young people into an air cadet squadron when candidates see the members trooping around in a finely disciplined manner, yet dressed like refugees from a Sad Sack comic strip.

Poor as they are, the supply of these blue uniforms is running out and there is no existing contract to produce more. So the discouraging problems of dress worsen year by year until, I suppose, cadets are left with no working military uniform at all.

The Department of National Defence must take responsibility for outfitting these cadets in a more reasonable manner. Past promises in this regard have not been kept, so one tends to be suspicious of promises made now or in the future. What is required is action, and the sooner the better, before it is too late.

Let me be more specific. A trial uniform, similar to the one used by the permanent force, came out in 1971. Each cadet squadron was given one new green uniform on a trial basis. However, by the end of the 1972 cadet year it was decided by the Department of National Defence that the cost of this clothing was too great and that a cheaper model had to be found.

After more vacillation, a new uniform concept was presented two years later, in May of 1974, at Montebello. Present was Captain N. McPhee, director of cadets, and representatives of cadet organizations from each province. The tone of the meeting was that although the uniform could have been much better, it should be produced immediately in any case, due to the fact that it was so badly needed. The Defence Department said it could not provide the new uniform for at least another year. Now the thinking appears to be that no new uniform will be available before 1977 or 1978. There have been rumblings in fact that the uniform may not even be acceptable to the Department of National Defence after all, and that still another will have to be found.

It has also come to my attention that rank badges are not available and that they are no longer being made. One commanding officer of a cadet squadron here in the capital city of Ottawa told me that if there were many more officer and NCO changes, rank badges would soon have to be made from odd cloth or scraps of material that might be available. If this is the state of cadets and their uniforms in Ontario, where cadets are considered relatively well off, I do not know what must be happening in some of the less fortunate areas of the western provinces and the maritimes.

Another contentious issue is that concerning girl cadets. I should like to take the opportunity of enumerating some of the problems encountered by these girls, because they are not officially recognized by the Department of National Defence. They have no uniform whatever, unless the squadron not only designs one of its own but is successful in persuading an already overtaxed sponsor to pay for it.

If new uniforms could eventually be produced, will there be one suitable for girls as well? Undoubtedly this will bring about longer delay and will probably result in more expense. The minister must be aware of this. More important, he must be prepared to do something about it.

I have a number of items that I wished to comment on, but in view of the time I shall conclude by saying that I trust the Minister of National Defence and his department will give serious consideration to rethinking their position regarding young cadets in Canada.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member for Elgin for his remarks, and particularly for bringing the views of the Legion concerning national defence policy to the floor of the House. With regard to girl cadets I draw his attention to the order paper. If he would look at today's order paper, on page 6, item No. 16 is an act to amend certain statutes to provide equality of status thereunder for male and female persons. Perhaps he has read the bill. It gives official recognition to girl cadets.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I should like to pursue a line of questioning initiated in part by the hon. member for Vancouver South. How many operational tanks are available to the armed forces in Canada?

Mr. Richardson: From memory, Mr. Chairman, a total of 72 Centurions. I believe there are 32 that are operational in Europe, the balance are in Gagetown. There is a total number in Europe of 51; of that number that are operational, I believe my figure of 32 is correct.

Mr. MacKay: With all respect to the minister, I have been informed that in Wainwright, Alberta, there are about 60 Centurion tanks, housed in hangars, which have been largely cannibalized but which could usefully perhaps, through a program like the Israelis use called Retrofit, be restored to first class fighting machines for considerably less money than it costs to buy a new modern battle tank. Can the minister say how much it would cost to refit one of these Centurion tanks to put it in the kind of condition that the armed forces of Israel have been refitting their tanks to with great success—tanks of American, German and Russian design?

Mr. Richardson: The Retrofit that the Israelis have undertaken is, I believe, on the Mark XI Centurions, which is a newer model than the one to which the hon. member referred. Although there may be a possibility of refitting them, I think that is very unlikely. The hon. member should identify the date of the tank and its age, before suggesting that we could do the same thing with older tanks as is done with newer models.

Mr. MacKay: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I put it to the minister that he is the one who should be able to date these tanks that are available to the armed forces of the country. I ask him what vintage are these tanks? Are they the same that the minister of national defence for Australia, Mr. L. H. Barnard, referred to in his very interesting speech in April of this year, which is reported in the Australian Foreign Affairs Record? Are they the same type as the type that the Australians are finding obsolete, or are they still older models than the ones referred to by the Australian defence minister?

Mr. Richardson: I believe the hon. member is referring to the Mark V tank, which is much older than the Mark XI, the Centurion tank we are using in Europe.

Mr. MacKay: I put it to the minister that if we have a tank that is older than a newer tank that the Australians have found to be obsolete, then why is it that a country with half of our population but with substantially larger armed forces is increasing its military budget substantially and we are not matching them? They find it necessary to replace tanks and long range patrol aircraft, while we are still muddling along with equipment that is older and more obsolete than theirs. What is the reason for this?

Mr. Richardson: I have talked with the minister of defence for Australia, Mr. Barnard, and I know we are well ahead of Australia in terms of replacement of long range patrol aircraft.

Mr. MacKay: That we are well ahead of Australia is certainly a revelation. Is it not true that we are still seriously considering replacing the Argus with 707s, which are nothing but converted passenger airliners but without the low level surveillance capability of the Argus?

Speaking of the Argus, I am informed by Canadair, manufacturer of the Argus, that the useful life of these aircraft, which is 20,000 hours, has not yet been reached. I remind the minister that these large and heavy aircraft have been flown for some of their operational hours under very heavy operational conditions, 200 feet over the Atlantic in bad weather. A couple of years ago these aircraft were showing signs of metal fatigue and they had to be grounded for a while. In view of the fact that it was only superb flying skill on the part of our air crew that got us by with the loss of only one aircraft, is it not time that we decided what we were going to do in this regard?

Again I draw a parallel with the Australian situation. They are talking of replacing their aircraft, which I think is the Orion. The minister says we are ahead of Australia in the replacement of equipment of this sort, but just how far ahead are we? How can we be when there has still been no decision from the government about replacing the Argus?

Mr. Richardson: The Australians have not, to my knowledge, made any purchases. When I spoke with them over a year ago our studies were well advanced, and they were interested in learning from us, from our knowledge and studies of long range patrol aircraft. We were ahead of them in our investigations. As hon. members know, we have entered into the contract definition phase with Lockheed and with Boeing, and that program is on schedule. We will be reaching the end of this phase in the spring of 1975.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the Minister of National Defence would not want to mislead the House intentionally. It is my understanding that according to "The Military Balance" in 1973-74 they had one NR squadron with 10 P-3B Orions and 1 MR squadron with 12 SP-2H Neptune. I certainly think he must have been misinformed as it is unthinkable that the International Institute for Strategic Studies had been misinformed.

Mr. Richardson: There is certainly no intent on our part to mislead one another. I am simply aware of the conversations I had, and I know that the Australians were, as we were also, considering the Boeing as one of the aircraft they might use for long range patrol aircraft. I do not believe they have made a purchase. The figures that you have referred to are, no doubt, in reference to the aircraft with which they were already equipped.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I realize that there is not much time left. I should like to leave a little time for the hon. member for Victoria, and I know the House leader of the NDP would like a few moments, but I should like to conclude with one brief comment. It seems to me, from what the minister has said about the decision making process involving the replacement of our LRPA service, that this is engaging in a decision to make a decision to make a decision. I would hope that very soon, in view of the increasing inflationary pressures and the obvious need for some decisions to be made quickly, the minister will get on with this job.

I should also like to state to the minister that I am disappointed, if I can rely on statistics I have been able to obtain, that our defence budget as a percentage of our total federal budget has been steadily decreasing from 16.4 per cent in 1968-69 down through various stages until it is now 11 per cent, and as a percentage of our gross national product from 2.4 per cent in 1968 to 1.8 per cent at this time. This, coupled with increasing military costs, makes the situation very serious. I am sure the minister will find that the people of Canada in general, and the members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in particular, will support him in trying to get more funds for the vital task of defending our country.

I would remind the minister that there is no point in vacillating, and I would ask him to consider seriously the idea of leasing some heavy hardware and exploring the cost of amortizing the same. We have to equip our troops with proper armament or, in my opinion, we will be doing them and our country a great disservice.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I would simply like to thank the hon. member for his support for a larger budget, and for his suggestions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I shall take only two or three minutes. One of the pieces of legislation which the Minister of National Defence administers is the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act. This is the act under which long-service members of the armed forces receive their pensions. It is similar to the Public Service Superannuation Act, although there are some differences. Another act which is almost parallel to the Canadian Armed Forces Superannuation Act is the RCMP Superannuation Act.

I am not going to launch into a discussion of the various things that might be at fault in the armed forces pension legislation, but there is one point that is very annoying to many retired servicemen. It has to do with the annual escalation of pensions which applies to retired public servants, retired members of the RCMP, and retired armed forces personnel. There is a stipulation that, no matter what one's age when he retires, he cannot draw the escalation until he reaches age 60.

There is a slight qualification in that if one is 55 years of age or over and has 30 years of service he can qualify right away. As the lower ranks have pointed out, this favours those in the higher ranks and discriminates against those in the lower ranks, because those in the lower ranks are forced to retire early.

This is a broad subject and I know that one superannuation plan cannot get out of step with another, but I implore the Minister of National Defence to lock arms with his colleague, the Solicitor General, who is responsible for the RCMP, and for the two of them to have a conference with the President of the Treasury Board. He is new, and this is a good time for him to do something worthwhile. This is a good time for him to make the necessary adjustments so that when servicemen and RCMP personnel are retired in the normal course they might draw their annual escalation without having to wait until age 60. May I ask the minister if he will consider this in concert with the Solicitor General and make the necessary representations to the President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Richardson: Yes, I will be glad to do that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, along the lines of the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I should like to ask a question regarding the thousands of members of the Canadian armed forces who have retired and entered the Public Service of Canada immediately upon retirement. Many of them find themselves now in the position of having worked their entire lives in the Public Service, one part in the armed services and the other part on the civilian side, and are unable to count their service for leave purposes in the Public Service of Canada.

Again, in the same vein as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I ask if the minister would undertake that he will bring to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board the inequity which seems to exist in respect of these people who have served Canada in another capacity and are now continuing their service in the Public Service? I merely ask for that undertaking from the minister.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I have been advised by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, that this matter has been of interest to him and that he has consulted with the President of the Treasury Board, and the Solicitor General who is responsible for the RCMP. He is involved with all of us, and I think I can give an assurance that the matter the hon. member has raised is being given serious consideration.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for recognizing me, though I regret the indication that I only have enough time for one question. Perhaps I might cite one case that has come to my attention recently. It involves the widow of a serviceman who spent almost his entire adult life in the armed forces. He died, and left her to fend for herself against continuing and rising inflation. She was advised that his military pension had been cut in half. Surely the minister recognizes, as do the officials of his department, that one person cannot get by adequately on half a pension. I am wondering whether the minister is causing this to be reviewed, particularly on behalf of widows with dependents. We all look forward to some positive measures to assist persons in such a predicament.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, the circumstances described by the hon. member are difficult, but they result from a law which was passed by this parliament. Probably there are circumstances which require examination by all of us.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to the agreement reached earlier this day, to interrupt the proceedings and call now the estimates for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to be found in Schedule A at page 10, 11 and 12 of the bill.

On Schedule A—Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few moments to briefly discuss some of the problems and interests of the three branches which comprise the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. These are the Indian and Eskimo Affairs Program, the Conservation Program, and the Northern Development Program.

First, I would like to deal with some aspects of the Indian and Eskimo Affairs Program. At the forefront of Indian problems is housing. It is painfully obvious that the program of direct subsidy which the department has been pursuing for some time is simply not keeping up with the demand for housing, especially on reserves.

Many of the houses are substandard, others are rapidly deteriorating. The root of the problem is that virtually all Indian bands and individuals are trying to build houses with only the subsidy money, without making any contribution of their own. This contribution would provide the wherewithal to build better houses and the incentive to keep them in good repair. Good housing lies at the heart of progressive community development because of its total effect on peoples' lives.

Because of the high priority I attach to housing, I was glad to find that housing policy was urgently under review in the department. The National Indian Brotherhood had input into the review through its housing brief, which it presented last April. I was personally disappointed in this proposal by the National Indian Brotherhood because its virtually exclusive thrust was to seek a substantial increase in direct subsidies from the federal government. It seems to me that the subsidy system has demonstrated its weaknesses.

Not only do the funds fall short of its actual need but, even more important, there is absolutely no incentive for the Indian occupant to maintain or improve the home when he does not have one cent of his funds invested in it. My response to the National Indian Brotherhood has, therefore, been to emphasize the co-operative aspects needed for a sound Indian program. They have requested a meeting with me later in November to review thoroughly this whole area. I look forward to meeting with the executive of the National Indian Brotherhood at that time.

However, I do believe that full use should be made of all government programs which are available to assist in the housing area. This has not been done in the past. These programs—whether we are talking about senior citizens housing, low income rental housing, or home improvement programs—all provide alternative sources of assistance for the Indian people. These should be combined with assets the bands have to contribute, and with the individual Indian's ability to pay as well. I look forward to developing jointly proposals for a program along those lines, a program that will be largely under the control of the Indians themselves at the band level.

In the area of economic development my approach has been to follow the same line of reasoning. I am all in favour of deploying government funds so that much needed economic activity can be generated in the Indian communities, in line with the aims and needs of the people concerned and largely under their control. But the government's contribution to this activity should be combined with contributions the Indian people can make themselves. The government's contribution should be used as a catalyst, or to provide missing components in schemes of development devised by the bands.

I might also mention here that more needs to be done, and is being done, to ensure that the full range of government program—from all departments and agencies, and at the provincial level—are made available to the Indian people, and that the total federal effort relates to services and programs provided by the provinces. There is a growing awareness on the part of Indian leaders at all levels that they are not taking full advantage of the government approved opportunities that are open to them as Canadians for social and economic advancement. I intend to encourage them by all means to seek to use these benefits for their people.

Viewed in the perspective of the whole country, the Indian people as a group exercise control over substantial assets. This applies to their land base particularly, which is increasingly in demand in this country. Some bands have put their land to productive use and thereby increased their assets. But their example has not been followed by all bands, even those who are occupying lands of significant economic value.

Hon. members, particularly Albertans, my have noticed the development of the Enoch Band. This is a proposed development involving half a million dollars on five square miles of band land. It is my view that Indian bands and Indian individuals should be fully prepared to help themselves by making optimum use of any assets they control. The government and the department can, and will play their part in providing seed funds, technical advice and managerial training. But the objectives of neither the Indian people nor the government will be achieved unless the emphasis on self-help is sustained.

I am seriously concerned about our making rapid progress toward self-reliance whether in the field of Indian housing, economic development, local government or education. It will not be achieved in any of these fields unless or until there is a diminished dependency on direct government subsidy.

In the area of claims, in the past year and particularly during the past few months we have been hearing a lot about land claims. We can expect to hear a lot more about them in the years to come. Most of these claims are the subject of longstanding grievance on the part of native groups, but the fact that they are emerging now in concrete form is the direct fruit of the government's policy of funding research on rights and treaties. That program began in earnest in 1970 and has resulted in comprehensive proposals for land settlement in those areas where native title was not previously extinguished and in a growing number of specific claims relating to certain treaties and the administration of the Indian Act.

To deal with this rapidly expanding activity the department has established an office of claims negotiation, as a branch separated from the Indian and Eskimo Affairs Program and the Northern Affairs Program. The executive director of this office, the Indian Claims Commissioner, and other government representatives concerned with claims questions, during recent months have had intensive discussions with various native groups.

In the Yukon negotiations are continuing with the Council for Yukon Indians representing both status and non-status Indians there; in British Columbia there have been separate consultations with both the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs and with the Nishga Tribal Council about their land claims; in the Northwest Territories there have been separate ongoing discussions with the N.W.T. Indian Brotherhood and Innuit Tapirisat about how to approach land settlements there; in northern Quebec representatives of the department have sat in on negotiations between the Quebec authorities and representatives of the Indian and Innuit groups of the James Bay area.

The specific claims have given rise to discussions as well, and some of the issues are very difficult indeed because of the various interests involved. The department is currently reviewing the whole situation with a view to making certain changes in the claims process. I have already expressed my willingness and desire to discuss that process with authorized representatives of the native people.

In the area of relations with native associations, the government continues to attach the greatest importance to its relations with the native associations at national and regional levels. It was for this reason that on October 9 a group of ministers met with members of the executive council of the National Indian Brotherhood to discuss a number of questions of current interest. There will be additional meetings of this kind with the brotherhood—the next one is scheduled for early February. In the interim we are jointly considering the need for supportive services, perhaps in the form of a secretariat, to strengthen this consultative mechanism.

I am confident that improved communication will result from these efforts. Our initial meeting can be regarded as a prototype and forerunner of future consultations at ministerial level with the executive of the National Indian Brotherhood.

The government will be engaged in full consultation on all levels with the native people as we begin to work out the revisions to the Indian Act needed to bring it into line with the current needs and wishes of the people concerned. As you know, the government has funded the National Indian Brotherhood to prepare their recommendations on revisions to the Indian Act. We are looking forward to receiving recommendations in the near future. The government sees these consultations on the Indian Act as the major preoccupation and main focus of its efforts to develop mutually satisfactory relations with the native people, for their benefit and the benefit of Canadians generally.

During the first two months in my portfolio I have been greatly occupied with Indian affairs, but I have tried not to ignore the other areas of major responsibility. During the week of September 28 I made a wide ranging tour of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories where I welcomed the opportunity to meet members of the Territorial government and councils, representatives of native groups, hamlet councils, the press, and the public at large. In part this was a familiarization tour, but I also wished to learn at first hand about the major preoccupations of northerners at present.

In both territories there was a keen interest and some uneasiness about the major land claims that have been advanced. The native peoples have their own anxieties about the pace and direction of resource development, but other northern residents are just as concerned about possible adverse consequences of putting too much emphasis on native interests in land.

These concerns are linked to other impending events in the territories—the constitutional changes that were brought about during the last session of parliament, the forthcoming elections for the territorial councils, and the public inquiry which Judge Berger is carrying out for the federal government into the Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Limited application for pipeline right of way. All these developments are somewhat unsettling perhaps, but in the next year or so they should have the combined effect of setting both territories on a firm course toward a balanced development, based more than ever on the needs and aspirations of northerners themselves.

With regard to the matter of parks I should assure hon. members that the solid progress achieved in recent years in the development of national and historic parks and sites is continuing. New program initiatives for Parks Canada, introduced as "Byways and Special Places", have now been organized as the ARC program, Agreements for Recreation and Conservation. These initiatives complement the traditional national parks and national historic sites programs by introducing a system of linear parks based upon land or water routes important to Canada's history and displaying the best of our scenic resources.

The historic canals, for which my department assumed responsibility during the last two years, are the most obvious initial components of the ARC program in which the federal government has an existing responsibility. Initial reaction has been almost exclusively positive, and two programs will become realities shortly. I expect to bring an agreement to cabinet shortly which will provide for the development of the Rideau and Trent-Severn waterways jointly and co-operatively with Ontario. Other provinces are evaluating the program's concepts according to provincial priorities, and the interest is most encouraging.

Finally, I would mention that it is my intention, so far as resources permit, to accelerate the development of our national historic parks system over the next few years. Like my predecessor I regard the parks policy as one of the major elements in the expanding relationship between the federal and provincial governments, and as one that can contribute heavily to the furtherance of Canada's national wellbeing. In my view there is perhaps no better way to safeguard Canada's future than by doing all we can to conserve our natural and historic heritage from the past.

There is one final comment that I should like to make. I should like to put to rest some of the misconceptions and misunderstandings that various people seem to have about the departmental budget. Before assuming responsibility for Indian Affairs and Northern Development I had heard, as I am sure many hon. members had, that Indian Affairs spent 60 per cent to 70 per cent of its budget on administration costs. I investigated these allegations and I can assure you that there is absolutely no foundation to them. I find that Indian and Eskimo affairs administrative costs represent approximately 7 per cent of the budget, and this figure compares favourably with that of the government as a whole.

Moreover, while Indian and Eskimo affairs expenditures have risen more than threefold in the past six years, the program's staff has remained almost at the same level it was six years ago. This means that our budget increases have not gone to hiring more civil servants but directly to expanding programs which benefit the Indian people. For 1974-75, 31 per cent of the budget was for education expenditures, 14 per cent for social services, 24 per cent for economic and community development—this includes $60 million which was managed directly by the bands themselves—and 23 per cent for capital expenditures on housing, schools, roads, etc. The final per cent is made up of treaty payments and payments to the superannuation account. The 93 per cent of the budget which is not spent on administration is spent on programs which directly benefit the Indian people.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is a complex and interesting one and there are many other aspects upon which I could make additional comments this evening, but I believe these remarks will give some indication of the areas of interest and concern, and I will be interested at this point in hearing the comments and questions of my colleagues.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Chairman, I rise to say a few words in place of my colleague, the hon. member for the Northwest Territories, who had to fulfill some speaking engagements in his constituency for which he had made arrangements a month or so ago, and which he could not change when we found out yesterday that this debate would take place today.

I was trying to calculate how many ministers in charge of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I have heard making Ministerial Maiden speeches since I came to this House 12 years ago, and it seemed to me that, with the exception of the six years that the former minister held this portfolio, we have had just about one minister each year. The same speech has been made, with very few changes, by every minister we have had. We have been told of the improvement each year, how much money was being spent, and that around some mythical corner most of the problems will disappear.

By coincidence, Madam Chairman, just today the House Leader of my party received a telegram from Grand Council Treaty No. 3 Indians at Kenora. I should like to read it into the record, not that what they say is necessarily correct but it is representative of what native people across Canada believe, and of what is true in general if not in this particular case. The telegram reads:

> —demand a no vote in tonight's vote to cut our capital projects. We wish to remind you that poor housing has been a factor creating unrest in our area for a number of years as recently as the occupation at Kenora this summer. Unless our requests are realized this discontentment will grow and grow until not a day will go by without violence and terror in northwestern Ontario. We will not be the victims of inflation fighting for the government. Our conditions must be improved not ignored. We look to you to support our people by defeating the government's motion tonight.

I believe they are wrong in thinking that the capital moneys to be provided for housing will be cut tonight or any other time, but they are not wrong in their feelings that Indian housing programs in this country have been and are a disaster.

A publication put out within the last month or so by Statistics Canada called "Perspective Canada" was the subject of an article in the Winnipeg Free Press on October 2, 1974, which read in part:

> Housing, one of the biggest concerns in recent Indian representations, seems to have actually shown a decline based on a three-fold rating of reserve homes as poor, fair or good.
> In 1971, Statistics Canada found that 25.4 per cent of families on reserves needed new houses. In 1965, 19.7 per cent were said to need new homes.
> Statistics also show that in 1971, 15.9 per cent of occupied houses needed major repairs. In 1960, 6.8 per cent were found to be in that state.
> The agency found that in 1971 51.7 per cent of frame houses and those other than log were good while 20.8 per cent were rated poor. Eight years earlier, 59.4 per cent were rated good and 12.9 per cent were considered poor.

The statistics showing the percentage of Indian houses without electric power and running water are even more sad to relate, Madam Chairman. Tonight the minister lectured us on how he was ready to co-operate and consult with the native people and their associations. If he would refer to the representations made to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development by the National Indian Brotherhood a short time ago, he would find that they complain that they have little if any say in the kind of housing programs developed for the reserves.

In a statement made to the cabinet last April they pointed out that up until now government programs have failed because of inadequate funding, a piecemeal approach, and the historical and still present paternalistic approach. They pointed out that there was a backlog of at least 10,000 housing units in the Indian community, and that in the next five years this will increase to about 15,000 units. They asked that the department or Central Mortgage and Housing develop a program and allocate funds which they would use themselves, deciding where, how and when to build the houses required. They suggested a program spread over the next five years at a cost of something like 400 million.

What they are saying, Madam Chairman, is that they have had enough of the department telling them what to do, when to do it, and how to do it. They want to make the decisions themselves. I should like to hear the minister tell us what his department intends to do for the Indians of this country along these lines.

Having spent the bulk of my time speaking of the need for improved housing on the reserves, I want to spend a minute or two speaking about conditions in the city I represent. I am sure the minister knows that, according to Statistics Canada, the Indian population of my city has grown from 210 people in 1951 to over 5,000 in 1971.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre says that this has made the slum landlords happy and wealthy, and that is true. I would be happy to take the minister and his deputy around the city of Winnipeg and show them how the native people live there. They would see the slums and hovels still in the core of the city, despite the efforts of the former minister and his officials.

There is a rapid influx of native people to the cities and they are living in the worst conditions imaginable. I should like to ask the minister what he proposes to do about native housing and when the native people will have something to say about the type of housing they are to get?

Mr. Buchanan: Madam Chairman, I should like the hon. member to know that I share his concern. I do not like the paternalistic approach, and in my opening remarks I tried to emphasize that the approach has to be a co-operative one.

There is no way that the direct grant subsidy housing is going to meet the housing needs of the Indian people. Madam Chairman, but there are many programs available that are not being capitalized on by the Indian people. The figure mentioned of $400 million over the next five years is not going to be realized through a direct grant program. On the other hand I do not find it a frightening figure if you tie it in with other programs. The hon. member mentioned substandard housing, that lacked plumbing and so on.

I have tried to visit all the reserves. I will try to visit those in the four western provinces, B.C. and northern Ontario on the next long week-end. I have already arranged a meeting with the band council of the Treaty 3 people to whom the hon. member referred.

The point is we must use other programs. Under one upgrading program we pay up to $5,000 for family homes if the family income is less than $6,000. Half that is forgiven as a grant, the other $2,500 must be repaid over about 20 years, I think. I discussed this program at one reserve I visited a couple of weeks ago. I was told that 60 out of 65 houses on the reserve did not have indoor plumbing. When I said that this program would be useful, and that repayments would be only $15 or $20 for the next 15 or 20 years, I was told, "This is not the customary way to do it". Somehow or other we must change these ideas, because there is no way we can help these people with straight grant in aid programs. If we want to help them, we must do it through consultation. Our approach must be cooperative and not paternalistic.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Chairman, I have heard some of the things the minister said ever since coming here. I put a question on the order paper which was answered last week. If my memory serves me right, I asked how many people engaged by the Department of Indian Affairs are employed as teachers in secondary schools, in elementary schools and as teachers' aides. As I remember, the answer was 1576 people are so employed. Yesterday I entered a question on the order paper which has not yet been answered. It asks what percentage of those people are of Indian origin. I have not been given the answer, but if there are more than 50 I will buy the minister the best dinner one can buy in Ottawa.

Last week the hon. member for the Northwest Territories put on the order paper a detailed series of questions about the number of people employed by the department in the Northwest Territories at various levels, from senior specialist down to casual labourer. He also asked how many people are of native origin. The answer was a shocker, a disgrace. Excluding the people in the lowest paid category, those who are unskilled and untrained, the percentage is less than 5 per cent. That is an optimistic classification.

In short, less than 5 per cent of workers in any category are of native origin. If these people are not discriminated against, and I do not think they are, what an indictment this is of our educational system and of our attempt to bring these people into our society. If the minister really means what he says, let us see some action and hear less of the sort of preaching I have heard in my 12 years here.

Mr. Buchanan: Madam Chairman, I look forward to eating a steak dinner at the expense of the hon. member opposite.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Watch out, it may be hamburger with staphylococci.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Take him to McDonald's.

Mr. Buchanan: I intend to run over a few figures. In the federal schools there are 1,480 elementary school teachers of which 151 are Indian people, so we are well above the hon. member's 50. There are 172 teacher aids, of whom 160 are Indian people. There are 2,064 other staff employed, of whom 603 are Indian people. In the band and school board employ, there are 175 social counsellors, assistant counsellors and home and school co-ordinators of whom 151 are Indian. Of child care workers, 26 out of 27 are Indian. Of teacher aides, 383 of 383 are Indian. Of native language instructors, 19 out of 19 are Indian. This means that of 4,320 people employed in the school system, 1,493 are Indian people.

Mr. Orlikow: I will stand by my promise. I will buy the minister his dinner.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why don't you let Marc Lalonde cook it?

Mr. Orlikow: But I want to say this: I was not too far wrong. I never doubted for a moment that the caretakers in the school would be native people or that the untrained social workers would be native people or that the teachers' aides would be native people. I said there would not be more than 50 out of 1,500 teachers. The minister tells me there are 150, and so technically I am wrong.

I want to say, however, that if one takes into account the large number of Indian students who are now attending schools in all parts of Canada, not on reserves but in school divisions where there are virtually no native teachers, my percentage would not be too far wrong. Even to the extent that I was wrong, if we have one in 10 native teachers on the reserves, not in Winnipeg, not in LePas, not in Kenora, not in Regina or Vancouver where large numbers of native children are going to school, that is not a hell of a thing to be proud of.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Perhaps you'd better buy him a smoked meat on rye.

Mr. Buchanan: I share the hon. member's concern, and I think we are moving in the desired direction. I recall there were roughly 400 Indian students receiving university education when I was working as parliamentary secretary to my predecessor. Today the figure is in excess of 1,200. I am optimistic that, as many of these young people work their way through university, we shall find the ratio moving up very substantially. I look forward to the day when we can say that 100 per cent of the total represents native teachers.

Mr. Orlikow: Of course we are all happy that more Indian people are attending universities. Let me just summarize the statistics and I shall be finished. Among Indians and Inuits only 1.7 per cent are receiving a university education compared with 11.9 per cent nationally. So we have done one-tenth as well as for the rest of the population.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Chairman, may I say at the outset that I appreciated some of the new ventures that seem to accompany the new minister as he takes on this portfolio. Some of the statements he made certainly lead us to hope that there will be a new line of action within the department, one that is long overdue. We welcome his plans for integration of programs and incentives, and approve of them. I might say that at this point in time an effort is being made to place an emphasis on incentive and self-help, which is very commendable. But it has an underlying note to it which, as far as I am concerned, is questionable, that is, that it would be very easy to take a hard line and say that the native people have to help themselves to resolve their own difficulties, that if they just do that everything will be well.

That is not going to happen, and I should like to warn the minister that such an approach, carried to the extreme, could be detrimental to the cause of the native people, and that a heavy emphasis on incentives should not imply that unless they meet such and such a requirement they will not get any help from the government.

For example, the minister mentioned the Enoch band and the value of the land base that the Indians hold across the country. The fact is that the economic opportunities to develop the land base are not the same for all Indians across this country, just as they are not the same for all other Canadians. One cannot expect a band in northwestern Ontario, or in some northern community in the prairie provinces or Northwest Territories, to have the same economic opportunities as the Enoch band have possessed. They should not be placed in the same category, or even considered in this way.

While the minister assured us that the administration of his department accounts for only 7 per cent of the over-all estimates of his department, he will have to do a much better P.R. job in getting this story across not only to the native community but to Canadians as a whole. In view of the tremendous bureaucratic structure that the minister ranges over, 7 per cent of the over-all expenditure on administration seems to us to be somewhat out of context.

I want to raise a few questions in regard to housing. The housing situation has been mentioned on many occasions by native people who lack even the most basic amenities and shelter, by Indian leaders who have submitted countless briefs and proposals with little sign of response, by concerned Canadians everywhere who feel that the native housing situation constitutes a blatant act of discrimination in this country, and finally by officials of the department. The following quotation is not from the brief of the National Indian Brotherhood but are the words of the assistant deputy minister at a committee hearing on October 15. He said:

> We do know that the need exists in forthcoming years for somewhere in the vicinity of 20,000 homes for Indian people—20,000 houses in roughly the next five years.

He went on to comment on the amount allocated per house, and he said:

> Firstly, the quality of the shelter is not adequate because it is virtually an impossibility to build an adequate house for $10,000; and secondly, to cope with the quantum of the need it would be necessary for the government to appropriate a sum of money far in excess of the $27 million per annum which is voted today.

He went on to explain two other points. He said that "in the current fiscal year approximately 2,000 new units will be built and a further 900 renovated. A simple extrapolation would indicate that at this rate it is not a catching-up, it is a falling-behind situation". He also estimated the figure needed at $400 million to bring the housing situation up to par. So we are talking about an estimated need of 20,000 units, whereas this year we are building 2,000. We are talking about a total expenditure need of $400 million, whereas this year we are allocating $27 million, or approximately one-twentieth of the total need.

I know the minister said he is engaged in long-range building proposals and discussion with native leaders, but the situation is such that I do not believe we can rely on long-term planning solely on that basis. There is an emergency, a crisis situation, which exists now. This crisis situation is going to build bitterness, frustration and anger on the part of the native people; this will not be a long-term buildup, we will see it breaking out in the next few weeks, months or a year.

What emergency steps is the minister planning for this winter to cope with this crisis situation? What is he going to do now, in addition to these long-term programs, in the immediate weeks and months ahead to meet the demand of the people who will not have adequate housing this coming winter?

Mr. Buchanan: In relation to the earlier remarks of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, I hope I did not leave the impression that I was suggesting a sort of abandonment, because that certainly was not my thought. The emphasis I hope I made was on the idea of co-operation, jointly solving the problems of the Indian people.

On the question of priorities, I made myself rather unpopular with a group of Indians from northern Ontario who were down recently asking for additional funds for their lunch program. This is a band which, according to my information, finds itself in the top 10 per cent economically of bands throughout the country. I suggested that I did not see how I could justify giving them additional funds in that area when there were so many other bands in the country who found themselves in very destitute conditions—bands in areas such as northern Saskatchewan and other parts of northern Ontario.

I feel strongly that we in this department should be moving in the direction of establishing priorities. There are some bands relatively well to do, and I do not think we should be providing them with anything like the same funding we are giving the more poor bands. This is the sort of rearranging of priorities I would like to see.

In regard to housing I think the 20,000 figure the hon. lady mentioned compares very closely with the figure suggested by the National Indian Brotherhood. As I said in my earlier remarks, I do not find that figure shocking if you look at it in combination with other programs. The hon. member mentioned 2,000 this year, and 700 or 800—I have forgotten the figure—for upgrading. The program of the native brotherhood proposed 4,000 over the next five years, or a total of 20,000. The 2,000 figure represents roughly half, so we are looking at a little better than double the funding.

If one looks outside the straight grants for housing at other programs, for instance we have been discussing senior citizens' homes, I think he will not find the construction of 4,000 units per annum over the next five years as being unreasonable or out of reach at all. This is something that I should like to move toward. This is the approach we should be taking.

Similarly in upgrading, I think we should be following the program of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I am convinced that the meld of these programs, plus the grants given in our department, will go a long way in the next five years in an attempt to bring the Indian housing program into reasonable condition.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I asked what is to be done to provide for this winter to cover special necessities. That has not been answered. Can the minister tell me how this figure of $27 million for housing has been determined? Why is the amount limited to $27 million? Also can he tell me how the need has been established? On what basis are we to accept a figure of 20,000, 10,000 or 2,000 houses that are to be built this year and in the year ahead? To what areas are these to be allocated? Who makes that decision? How can we be sure that some of the areas most in need of housing will not be overlooked? How are these decisions reached?

In the remarks of the minister I have not heard anything about an adult training program which, it seems to me, would be of great help to the native people themselves. I wonder whether the minister has had discussions with his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, with regard to the whole question of an on-site adult training program on every reservation where needed, so that the native people may be trained not only as carpenters—not everybody should be trained as carpenters if there is no work for them—but also as electricians, plumbers, and bookkeepers to keep the accounts in respect of everything that goes on in the band.

These people should be trained in all these fields, not only so that they may be able to carry on construction work on the reserves in order to make themselves more self-sufficient, but also to provide a pool of employment which could be used in other areas.

We have already heard that there is a shortage of 40,000 employees in Alberta. What has the department been doing in this past year to help the native people equip themselves for those 40,000 jobs? What is the department planning in the coming winter months to train the native people, so that they will be ready and available for jobs in the Athabasca oil sands when development starts next spring? The minister can talk about CMHC and the senior citizens' program, but what about integration with departments which train people to be self-employed and make a contribution both on the reserves and outside?

Mr. Buchanan: I was asked where these funds come from. The $27 million figure literally evolved as it was increased. Originally I think the amount was $1,500 per unit, then $5,000 per unit, then $8,500 per unit and now $10,000 odd. I should like to move away from the question of so much per unit.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Apart from the concept of so much per subsidy, how do you determine the need each year? For instance when you say that 20,000 units are required, how do you determine in any one year that there will be only 2,000 built? How do you arrive at the 2,000 figures?

Mr. Buchanan: There have been studies on this, but basically I think the major restraint is financial, how much in additional funds can be squeezed out of my predecessor now the president of the Treasury Board, to be allocated to this program. I am hopeful that we can squeeze out something above the $27 million figure to which the hon. member referred a few moments ago, for the coming year.

As I said, I want to get away from this concept of so much per unit. We should be looking more in terms of funds going to band councils as regional housing authorities that are assuming more and more responsibility of the kind which the hon. member was asking about, for allocating priorities within their area. This is the direction in which I would like us to move so that it is the Indian people themselves who will be taking the responsibility in this regard. This is being done now in some areas. As I mentioned earlier, this is a subject on which I want to canvass later this month—and I am sure it will take many meetings—the representatives of the National Indian Brotherhood.

Let me get back for a moment to the way in which some of the Indian bands apply this program. The other day I was signing documents for the Fort Alexander band in Alberta, in the riding of the hon. member for Provencher. They had received an allocation of some $30,000. Instead of building three $10,000 homes they divided the whole amount. Six of their members came to me and asked me to sign their guarantee documents with CMHC because they want to borrow $12,000 per unit. A $10,000 house is simply not adequate, and instead of building three inadequate $10,000 houses they will build six $17,000 houses. This is the direction which I would like to see more Indian bands and housing authorities taking.

The hon. member asked about manpower and what we are doing in the area of the oil sands. There is a program currently under way with the Great Canadian Oil Sands operation in McMurray where they are putting a group of people through a 16 week program. In addition, in combination with Alberta manpower, native students are being enrolled in the Alberta vocational centre in Fort McMurray so as to assist in training these people for jobs in the tar sands operation.

I mentioned earlier, when replying to the previous questioner, that there are roughly 1,200 native students taking university courses, and roughly another 8,800 in other forms of post secondary education, a lot of it vocational training of various kinds in community colleges, and so forth. We are not making the progress we would like to see, but we are certainly making far better progress than we made half a dozen years ago, and I hope that half a dozen years from now we will be infinitely better than we are doing now.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being eleven o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being eleven o'clock, I leave the chair until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 11 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE ON STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in the House order under which we are considering supply during these three days it was provided that there should be no ministerial statements on motions. I have had some discussions with representatives of the other parties, and because of the particular circumstances affecting the health of the Canadian people it was agreed unanimously that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) should be given the opportunity of making a statement, followed by the usual responses from the other parties. I would ask whether this is agreeable in order that the minister might make his statement now?

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week in answer to questions put by the opposition in respect of this very serious matter the minister saw fit to give some fairly flippant replies. Now, after he has given us a cooking lesson and got his fingers burned in the process, he has decided to become serious.

● (1110)

An hon. Member: Yes, or no!

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of the special order under which we are considering supply, the operation of Standing Order 52 is suspended. Accordingly, if a statement on motions is to be made it would have to be on the basis of unanimous consent. Either there is, or there is not such consent; the matter cannot be debated.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The statement the minister proposed to make was delivered to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) at 10.50 this morning and, quite frankly, we have had no opportunity to study this matter, one which we believe to be serious and which the minister is finally treating as serious. However, we are prepared to give consent to this statement being made at two o'clock this afternoon, which would give us an opportunity to study the matter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because of the importance of this issue we in this party were prepared to hear the statement now and to make a response from this side right away. But of course, if the official opposition is not willing that this be done now but is disposed to give unanimous consent to the statement being made at two o'clock we will agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): If this motion has received the unanimous consent of the House, Mr. Speaker, it is because we feel that this issue, which concerns the public health area, is of tremendous importance. We are willing to let the hon. minister make his statement.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the House shall revert to motions at two o'clock in order to allow the minister to make a statement on motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lalonde: On a question of privilege. I should like to point out to the hon. member who is speaking for the opposition that after the discussion took place between the representatives of the parties I sought to get in touch with the hon. member immediately by telephone to read over the text of the statement. I instructed my office to do this and they did so but the hon. member was not in his office. We did everything we could to reach him and read the statement over to his secretary. That was at 10.30.

Some hon. Members: Big deal!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the question of privilege, if the minister really regards this matter as being a serious one he ought not to have any untoward objection to the opposition taking time for the study which the minister himself seems to feel the subject deserves. I think the House and the country owes a vote of thanks to Mrs. Plumptre who finally brought the minister to his senses.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That's a real switch!

Mr. Speaker: The House has now agreed that this matter be proceeded with at two o'clock. We really should refrain from commenting on the subject matter.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There seems to be some discrepancy between the minister's version and the one on this side. A call was received by my office at twenty minutes to eleven. I was not present when the call came in. The statement arrived in my office at ten minutes to eleven. It is customary in this House for ministers to give at least an hour's notice of statements. All I can say is that we wanted an opportunity to examine the statements made during the question period since last Monday and to examine the minister's statement in the context of his replies, some of which were flippant and irresponsible.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I draw the attention of Your Honour and this House to a distinguished Canadian in our gallery, the mayor of Oak Bay. He is sitting in the gallery opposite.

An hon. Member: On the wrong side of the House.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Hon. Donald S. Motion agreed to bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—ESCAPE OF FIVE INMATES—ALLEGED WARNING OF ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): My question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Solicitor General and arises out of the reply given in this chamber yesterday by the minister when I asked him about the escape of five extremely dangerous inmates from Laval security institution. The minister said at that time:

> I might say that we had put out special orders in respect of these men some time ago . . . For some reason or other these orders I had given, and which had been given by the Commissioner of Penitentiaries, were not followed.

Can the Solicitor General advise us whether these special instructions concerning these extremely dangerous inmates were given by him, because as far back as three weeks ago the minister and his officials had been warned by the Quebec provincial police that these inmates, three of whom had already previously escaped, would make another attempt to do so?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I was never advised by the Quebec provincial police, nor was the Commissioner of Penitentiaries. When I heard yesterday that the Quebec provincial police had advised somebody in the service, I immediately checked to find out who in the Quebec provincial police advised the penitentiary service, and I want to know whom they advised. I only found that out yesterday afternoon. I am waiting for a report on that particular point. If in fact the Quebec provincial police did advise our officials, and it seems they did, this means that there is even more negligence on the part of someone in the system, but I was not advised, and the people in Ottawa were not advised.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the minister who speaks about negligence in the system. The minister has now admitted that the Quebec provincial police some three weeks ago warned that this escape would be attempted. The minister now admits he was not advised by his officials.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. O'Sullivan: Yesterday he admitted in the House that officials did not carry out his instructions to watch these men with extra caution. Now that the minister is not being advised by officials of the department about what is going on in his ministry and it is now clear that his instructions to his officials are not being carried out, is the minister going to do the honourable thing and submit his resignation?

● (1120)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is distorting what I said and also what he has been reading in the press. I said that I have been advised that the Quebec provincial police advised people in my department that there would be an escape. I checked into that. I want to know who gave the advice and who received the advice. I did not get that advice and the Commissioner of Penitentiaries did not get it. On the other point, Mr. Speaker, as with many things that happen I am waiting for a report on the whole issue before I accuse any particular individual of negligence. It seems to me there is negligence somewhere. There has to be when you have such flagrant violations of the ordinary regulations. We will get a report, Mr. Speaker, and then action will be taken.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—INQUIRY AS TO SECURITY CHECKS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. Is there a security check of visitors to the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary and, in particular, was there a security check with regard to the woman who is alleged to have smuggled guns into the prison to escapees from the penitentiary?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in general there are security checks of all visitors into the penitentiary. When I enter a penitentiary there is a check on me and people with me. For some reason, and this is the subject of the investigation, there was not a proper check or no check at all on the visitors who went into St. Vincent de Paul Laval maximum security institution the other day. I want to find out why that check was not made and why instructions were not properly given.

HEALTH

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF MEAT INSPECTORS—POSSIBILITY OF MORE SEVERE PENALTIES FOR OFFENCES AGAINST REGULATIONS CONCERNING MEAT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and is prompted by the growing body of evidence that individuals may very well be eating ground beef contaminated from coli or staphyloccocci.

My question is further prompted by the very startling revelation that of the 100 inspectors of the Food and Drug Division available to enforce 184 pages of regulations under the Food and Drug Act, less than ten man years of those inspectors are used in the meat inspection branch to examine the thousands of meat departments of supermarkets for infection in meat. May I ask the minister what he is doing to assure Canadians that he will either change the regulations, change the law or immediately increase the inspection capability?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. As I told him yesterday, I have given instructions to increase the inspection and improve the standards. I expect regulations to be promulgated to improve standards in the very near future. This will be the result of consultations that have already taken place with private industry and the various departments of the government. At the present time, over 245 people are assigned to food programs in the Field Operation Directorate of my department. I have given instructions to immediately assign 30 of these people in the field to work exclusively on meat samples across the country. This would be in addition to the 1,255 meat inspectors of the Department of Agriculture and the 195 inspectors in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs involved in various aspects of food inspection. It should also be noted that provincial and municipal governments also have inspectors who are involved in food inspection. This has all to be kept in perspective. Canada has a food inspection program that compares favourably with any other country and I intend to keep it that way.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, we were just given a sneak preview of the statement which the minister is going to give by consent at two o'clock. Even at that, he has further startled the country by telling us that we now have only 30 inspectors. That is not even enough for the city of Toronto. Notwithstanding the revelations contained in the minister's reply, will he now consult his colleague, the Minister of Justice, to bring in more severe penalties and wider publication of those penalties as a further means of ensuring that Canadians will not eat contaminated beef.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I remind hon. members that the total number of inspectors is not 30 but 1,255, plus 95, plus all those in the provinces and municipalities who are also doing inspection. As to the hon. member's question, I suggest he wait for the new regulations concerning standards, which I expect will soon be promulgated, and see what they contain. As far as publicity, court cases are not conducted in Star Chambers. They are conducted in open courts in this country. I am afraid we do not control the media. That coverage is provided by the media generally and is not something we do. We do not hold these court cases in Star Chambers.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister is not deliberately trying to mislead the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: —just as I am sure the minister did not deliberately mislead the House when he gave those misleading replies to questions earlier this week. The minister suggested that there are 1,255 inspectors in the Department of Agriculture, when he knows full well that they do not carry out inspection at the retail level but at the packing house level. The fact is, the minister has not assured the House—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest that we should revert to motions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The New Democratic Party, like the Conservative party got the statement at about 10.30. We were prepared to respond responsibly and seriously to what we regard as misadministration by the government. We had the information. We did not try to have it both ways, by calling for a delay in House proceedings until two o'clock and then proceeding with questions. I suggest that the Conservative party ought to agree to our reverting to motions so that the minister can finish making the statement he has half made already. Then, let the hon. member for St. John's East make his comments, if he is prepared. I think he could do that. Let us do that, instead of using up one hour this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is trying to extricate himself from an embarrassing position. He did not think this matter was sufficiently urgent to be raised in the House until yesterday. The opposition still suggests that we need adequate time to examine the minister's statement. Considering the replies he gave earlier this week, we feel that our original contention that the statement should be made at two o'clock should stand.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF CATTLE—REQUEST FOR AID TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I feel the House should forget about carcasses and proceed to live cattle.

I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. The minister is certainly aware of the extremely disastrous situation resulting from the fact that cattle producers are being offered for their production prices which amount to 25 per cent of their costs. Does the minister consider this matter as urgent and does he intend to introduce measures shortly to help these producers cope with their difficulties?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier this week we are considering doing something. The hon. member must be patient for a little longer. There are five provinces which now have programs. These are based on the federal stabilization program to assist the beef raisers in those provinces which have made the announcements. The programs are based on our stabilization program under which we guarantee 90 per cent of production costs over a five-year period. We are still being asked by the provinces to share in the programs they have initiated. Some of these programs are very different. It is very difficult to work out a cost sharing arrangement for some of the programs they have said they are going to use and, in fact, have put into force for the people in their provinces. We are trying to work out something for Canadian beef producers that will coincide with what the provinces are doing.

● (1130)

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): As Quebec cattle raisers seem to be completely dissatisfied with the proposals of the provincial Minister of Agriculture, does the minister consider these satisfactory or will he bring in alternative proposals so as to maintain this production and meet the country's requirements?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, one of the main concerns is that we must keep the production. If we lose that, it will cost the consumers much more in the months and years ahead. It takes four years to get back into beef production once you get out of it. We are all concerned about that. Some of the provincial programs are very good. The program which the province of Quebec has put in to supplement the beef stabilization program compares with that of any other province. If the hon. member will study the situation, he will see that it is one of the best initiated by any province. That does not mean we are not going to do anything. We will be making a proposal next week.

BEEF CATTLE—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): As this situation is serious, is the minister willing to revise the federal government compensation standards because of the high rise in production costs due to the increase not only in the cost of feed grain but also of various other similar products?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the stabilization program mainly because, as the hon. member has said, of the extra costs of feeding beef cattle and other livestock in this country.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CONTAMINATION OF WATER SUPPLY OF NORTHERN COMMUNITIES—LEAKAGE OF OIL FROM STORAGE TANKS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. I wish to bring to the minister's attention that most of the isolated communities in northern Manitoba are located on the shores of rivers and lakes. Most of these communities depend on the water in these lakes and rivers for their water supply, drawn mostly by pail from the shore. As there is no garbage disposal in any of these places garbage is dumped on the river and lake shore. What measures are being taken to correct this situation in most of our northern communities?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, that is a very general question. Possibly the hon. member can spell out the specific problems to which he is referring. There are plans whereby the Department of the Environment, in co-operation with the provinces, can undertake baseline studies of some of the environmental problems of certain regions. I would indeed be happy to look into anything about which the hon. member may want more information.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I will be more specific. The majority of the isolated communities in northern Manitoba have their fuel oil delivered in the winter which is stored in large tanks, in some cases up to 50,000 and 60,000 gallons. Many of these facilities are not handled in the proper way. There have been several large oil spills in many of the communities which have contaminated the water supply. Is any action being taken to protect these tanks with dykes which, I believe, is the law of this country?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, the transportation of oil and the security safeguards come under the Department of Transport. The environmental aspects are under general regulations which we have published in order to ensure that these activities are carried on in such a way that the environment is protected. We do, of course, have contingency plans for any kind of accident which might occur. If there is any new danger which the hon. member knows of, we will be glad to look into it in order to ascertain whether further regulations need to be considered.

COMBINES

REASON FOR FAILURE TO HAVE A COMMITTEE STUDY SUBJECT MATTER

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact this House has been and is again about to consider legislation and policy in respect of commercial matters in this country as well as such matters as competition policy and combines legislation, will the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the committee sitting in the other place to review combines legislation in Canada is doing so at the request of the government? If so, for what purpose?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have very little influence upon the other place. I think they have done this on their own initiative as being a matter of importance to the country. It certainly was not done at the behest of the government.

Mr. Lawrence: In the minister's role as Acting Prime Minister, can he indicate why it is preferable, if it is preferable, to have a committee of the other place review combines legislation and related subjects and not have such a deep seated subject matter, when we are dealing with such legislation, to have it referred to a committee of this House?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if the House will co-operate with the government, the combines investigation bill which is now before the House could be referred to the standing committee on Monday.

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF HIGH SPEED RAIL LINK BETWEEN OTTAWA AND MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Was the decision to build a high speed rail link between Ottawa and Montreal for the 1976 Olympic Games delayed because the matter was under review by his ministry? If so, does the minister not feel it is probably too late at this point to have this project completed on time?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I read something about that in this morning's Gazette. However, I must say that a formal proposal was never submitted to me for an LRC train between Montreal and Ottawa in relation to the Olympics. We have the turbo train, the ordinary train, STOL, other aircraft travelling between Ottawa and Montreal as well as highways. Therefore, I do not feel we are in a bad position as far as the Olympics are concerned.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. However, will he not agree that the existing rail link between Ottawa and Montreal is hardly efficient or fast enough for this modern day and age and there will be a lot of delay as well as a needless loss of revenue for the city of Ottawa because there is not a proper rail link between this city and Montreal?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I discussed the problem with CPR because they are interested in this new LRC; light, rapid and comfortable train. It was not at all in relationship to the Olympics. They are interested and I think we are going to support the project.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POSITION AND ATTITUDE TOWARDS WORLD FOOD BANK

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the great importance of, and the wide public interest in, the world food conference which begins, I think, on November 3 in Rome, would the minister undertake to make a statement to the House before he leaves for the conference setting out what initiatives the government proposes to put before the conference, and in particular what Canada's attitude is toward a world food bank?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member. I am torn between the dilemma of giving the greatest possible information to members of the House before going to the conference, and at the same time respecting the conference itself in regard to outlining our policies, keeping in mind also the possible impact they might have at the conference itself. However, I will certainly consider the suggestion of the hon. member and do my very best.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister is giving consideration to this matter, would he take into account that it is highly important that the whole public of Canada be aware of the importance of this conference, and that a statement by the minister in the House on the general principles that he will be advancing—we are not asking him for the details—should be put before the House prior to the conference taking place?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that suggestion and I will try and abide by it if at all possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INCARCERATION OF MR. FIEGER IN MEXICO—ALLEGATIONS OF BRUTALITY—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INVESTIGATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question but before doing so may I personally thank him for interviewing Mr. Fieger of Calgary regarding the situation in Mexico. May I preface my question by saying that in asking the question I am not endorsing what led to the alleged charges, but I am concerned to know whether Les Fieger has been charged with an offence, and if he has, whether if he was found guilty sentence has been passed. He has been held in custody since November 25, 1973.

The minister knows the facts. It was alleged that Mr. Fieger was held in Mexico without charge, without trial and without sentence. If he is found guilty of the charge it is a serious matter. I also wish the minister would give us some information about conditions because of alleged brutality which occurred while he was in custody.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to check out my memory on the state of the judicial proceedings and I will advise the hon. member later. With regard to the alleged maltreatment of Mr. Fieger in a Mexican jail, we brought this allegation to the attention of the Mexican authorities and at our request an investigation was held. It was reported that there was no evidence of maltreatment.

I did meet Mr. Fieger in September, I believe, and at that time I read a letter that his son had sent to his father whom I met. At that time, as I recollect, the letter stated that there was no evidence of maltreatment as attested to by the inmate himself. As for the other points, I will get the information and provide it to the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I put a further question to the minister. I have a copy of the letter he refers to, but the alleged brutality took place before the report was made to the former minister of external affairs. The minister says there was an investigation, but the investigation was conducted by Mexican authorities, not Canadian authorities. The right hon. member for Prince Albert also asked the minister about this matter, and in view of the conflict between the Mexican authorities, and in view of the fact that mail has to be smuggled out of the jail—the inmates pay for their own keep or they do not eat—would the minister agree that an independent group of Canadians should be allowed to investigate the whole matter? According to the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, whatever the facts are, if a Canadian is incarcerated in the jail of another country he should be treated with the same kind of dignity we would treat other citizens who found themselves in the same situation in Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe the standard that has to be applied, presumably in all institutions, is that inmates, regardless of origin, should be treated alike. It would not be possible for us to implant into another country practices that we have in this country. The suggestion that we have an independent inquiry into conditions in Mexican jails in order to satisfy ourselves would probably be resisted by any independent sovereign nation, including Canada if another country suggested the same thing. I hesitate to propose a policy or practice that would, by its very nature, be bound to fail.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may put a final supplementary.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; this matter is of importance. In some respects I agree with the minister that we should not interfere with a sovereign state, but Mexico belongs to the United Nations and should adhere to the Declaration of Human Rights. Since there is strong evidence of maltreatment in this case, with money being taken from the father to pay for lawyers and food, I would ask the minister whether he would take up the matter with the United Nations or with the appropriate department of external affairs in Mexico, so as to ensure that conditions are reasonable, dignified and humane.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there have been exchanges between my department and the ambassador of Mexico in Canada. I am sure that my hon. friend's representations will also be noted by the ambassador.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ECONOMIC STAGNATION IN CONSTITUENCY OF DRUMMOND—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you on your recent appointment.

I now wish to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The most recent federal statistics published by the Department of National Revenue reveal that the main cities in central Quebec, located on the Montreal, Quebec, Trois-Rivières and Sherbrooke axis, have the lowest income in Canada; more specifically, Drummondville, in the riding I have the honour of representing, ranks third, Granby fourth, Saint-Hyacinthe sixth and Victoriaville seventh. To enable those important cities to lose that dubious honour and to allow their citizens to fight inflation more successfully, does the department intend to take special measures in the near future to increase its help to that important area whose good industrial potential is great, and see that industries, as diversified as possible, and capable of paying better salaries, move in as soon as possible?

● (1150)

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think I got the question out of all that. The answer, of course, is that—

An hon. Member: Is the answer yes or no?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that something of the order of $4.5 million or so has been spent in that area already in addition to other support services. Of course, we will continue to recognize the facts the hon. member has stated with regard to the necessity of improving employment and increasing wages.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN FUNDING IN VIEW OF PROSPECTIVE HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. On October 22 the Minister of Manpower and Immigration admitted that the government forecast the possibility of having to attend to increasing unemployment this winter. Could the Acting Prime Minister advise whether the government is presently acting on a basis of urgency to determine how the $80 million LIP fund can be increased to help meet the expected widespread high unemployment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, could the Acting Prime Minister then explain why a confidential memo has been circulated to Canadian manpower regional headquarters asking for a most urgent response to an analysis of how many more local initiative programs are needed to counteract high unemployment?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a useful undertaking. I can assure the hon. member, however, that an increase in that amount is not now being considered by the government. It may be considered in the future but it is not being considered now.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the Acting Prime Minister's answer was meant to convey to this House that until reports come back from the manpower centres the government is not going to make a decision as to what extent, if at all, LIP will be increased, or is he telling this House now that there is not going to be any increase in the LIP allotment in the foreseeable future? I want the hon. gentleman to be completely clear with the House on this point.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that I cannot anticipate what policy changes may be made by the government. If they are made they will be announced. I would never say that we will never increase the appropriation for any program. The government is taking every measure it can to deal with present unemployment and the unemployment of the future. Whether LIP is going to be increased is a matter for decision. It may or may not be.

GARRISON DAM PROJECT—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement by the Minister of the Environment on October 18 in which she said that "Any matter which arises between Canada and the United States concerning trans-boundary waters is dealt with through the International Joint Commission", could the minister advise the House when the Garrison dispute will be referred to the International Joint Commission?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member probably knows that in the case of the Garrison diversion project Mr. Peterson of the United States has asked for a moratorium. The hon. member will realize, of course, that a moratorium does not mean the project will not take place, but Mr. Peterson's statement is of enormous moral value, and in light of this we are continuing to let the United States know that we are opposed to this project. We are asking a lot of technical questions concerning it.

ALLEGED ACTION BY UNITED STATES BORDER PATROL AGAINST CANADIAN CITIZEN—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, October 1, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs about an incident that occurred south of Estevan, Saskatchewan, in which a Canadian citizen, a resident of Saskatchewan, was apprehended on Canadian soil by a U.S. border patrol officer. Can the minister now give us a report on that incident?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my department has investigated this matter and has concluded that it may be that Mr. Gross may well have been improperly fined by the United States border patrol on September 29. It is our understanding that Mr. Gross landed his aircraft entirely on the Canadian side of a grass landing strip which was along the 49th parallel near Noonan, North Dakota. We understand that he was subsequently instructed to approach the United States border patrol vehicle, and in doing so he crossed into United States territory. He was then fined for having failed to follow United States landing regulations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: In our view the issue in this case is that, presuming Mr. Gross landed on the Canadian side of the strip which straddles the border, the United States authorities would not have the right to fine him for failure to comply with United States regulations. The only regulations that would be appropriate to apply to a Canadian aircraft piloted by a Canadian that had not entered United States territory and, in particular, which had landed on Canadian territory would be Canadian regulations. In these circumstances, I have instructed my department to deliver a formal note to the United States Embassy in Ottawa requesting that the United States authorities further investigate this matter.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in light of the report by the minister and information available to both of us and many others, will the minister in addition to asking the United States to make further investigation request the United States authorities to refund the fine levied against Mr. Gross and reimburse him for expenses incurred as a result of the incident, and request that an apology be given Mr. Gross by the border patrol officer concerned and the government of the United States? I would submit also that Canada is entitled to an apology from the government of the United States.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, assuming that the circumstances I have described are confirmed by further investigation I would expect that United States authorities would make appropriate redress to Mr. Gross.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS AND LOWER INTEREST RATES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

The minister admitted plainly yesterday during the debate on his estimates that the government cannot cope with the existing problems, which is no news, because it has been a long time since the Canadian people have known traditional parties cannot solve their economic problems. He went on to add that he would welcome all suggestions.

I have two questions. Is he prepared to abolish the 12 per cent tax on building materials and to reduce to 3 per cent the mortgage interest which is now around 13 or 14 per cent? If he heeds my suggestions, they might well be a great incentive in housing.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I note the hon. member's representations.

GOVERNMENT POLICY WITH REGARD TO INDEPENDENT GASOLINE RETAILERS—ASSURANCE OF SUPPLY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs aware of current pricing practices in the retail petroleum field which are making it increasingly difficult for many discount or non-brand firms to continue in business and, if so, is it government policy to aid and abet major oil companies in what may be a clean-up of the industry, to use terminology that is often used, is it in short, government policy to have fewer discount or non-brand firms active in the retail gasoline field?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. I would inform the hon. member that if he feels the Combines Investigation Act has been violated, I would appreciate his informing the director so that the latter may act according to law.

● (1200)

Mr. Stevens: With sales of discount or non-brand gasoline in Ontario having already been cut by half so that now they constitute 15 per cent of the retail market compared to 30 per cent a few months ago, would the minister tell us whether he has discussed this situation with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with a view to ensuring a continuing supply of fuel to the independent distributors at competitive wholesale prices?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the Combines Investigation Act provides that the director shall hold an inquiry every time he has reason to believe there has been a violation. I am convinced the hon. member's remarks will be brought to his attention, and he will act accordingly.

POST OFFICE

AUTOMATED PLANT AT CALGARY—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT MANPOWER CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. It arises from the opening of the new automated plant at Calgary last Tuesday. I thank the hon. gentleman for making it possible for me to be present on that occasion. In view of the obviously low level of morale in this plant and the minister's expressed concern for upgrading the role of manpower as opposed to the machine in these new postal units, would he use his authority both in this facility and in other automated offices as they go on stream to establish a permanent manpower consultative committee so that matters which give rise to irritation can be dealt with as they occur?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Yes,Mr. Speaker. I might say I enjoyed the company of the hon. gentleman. I am aware of the problems to which he referred. There was a maximum degree of consultation before the opening of the automated process in Calgary. There is some evidence that the results of that consultation were subsequently reduced. Instructions have already gone out to the post office to re-introduce the process of consultation to the same degree as it existed previously.

Mr. Dinsdale: One of the obvious causes of complaint was the refusal to open the cafeteria during the "graveyard shift" that is, from 12 p.m. to 8 a.m. and since the Treasury Board is involved in this decision would the hon. gentleman speak to his deskmate to see whether he can persuade him to join the Postmaster General's crusade to upgrade the quality of life and service in these new automated plants?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, having known the President of the Treasury Board for ten years I can say that one of his characteristics is that he is always hungry. He would be very receptive, I think, to the concept of continuing to keep the cafeteria open during the "graveyard shift", provided, of course, there are not good reasons for not having done so. I might say the most pressing problem we have in Calgary is that of increasing the staff. We have, in consultation with my hon. friend, arrived at a streamlined procedure in order to meet this difficulty.

NATURAL GAS DISCOVERY OFF COAST OF LABRADOR—INQUIRY AS TO COMMERCIAL POSSIBILITIES

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): A question through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Very recently there was a second discovery of natural gas off the coast of Labrador reported by Eastcan. I should like the minister to inform the House how important this discovery is and whether it is of commercial significance?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I confirm that there has indeed been a find between 40 and 60 miles from the Labrador coast off the Hamilton Inlet. It would be too early at this stage to describe either this or the earlier find as being commercial in themselves, but they do indicate extensive shows of hydrocarbon and a great possibility of a gas field there. We are anticipating a further announcement of good news from the east coast in the near future.

What progress is being made in consultation with the provinces with regard to the development of the Lower Churchill and particularly the funding with regard to the possible excavation of a tunnel to bring the cable from Labrador to Newfoundland.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I talked with the the new minister of intergovernmental affairs in Newfoundland two weeks ago. I expect that he and some of his colleagues will be in Ottawa next week for meetings between myself and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The whole question of the feasibility study involving the Lower Churchill should be completed by the federal-provincial committee within a couple of weeks. SUGAR—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PRICING POLICIES OF COMPANIES

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): My question was intended for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but I think he has left the chamber. I will direct it, instead, to his parliamentary secretary. In the light of reports that the profits of some United States sugar companies have increased in excess of 1200 per cent over the past year, and that world supplies of sugar are low, is the minister prepared to order an immediate study into the pricing policies of Canadian sugar companies to ascertain whether there is evidence of excessive profits, gouging or price fixing in Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Perhaps I might take notice of that question and inform the hon. member that there are cases already before the courts.

I rose specifically because the hon. member asked me a question yesterday and I wanted, further to my answer then, to inform him that while my investigation is continuing I am not yet able to give him any names or addresses.

In the light of statements made by the minister on October 10 that the study of the feasibility of an Arctic railroad carried out by CN-CP is still under review jointly with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and noting that this study has been in the minister's department for six months, may I ask the minister whether he will table this report immediately as the information contained in it could have a direct bearing on current National Energy Board and right-of-way pipeline hearings?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the report is not yet completed; it is still under consideration by the department. A summary will be prepared and tabled as soon as possible.

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE AT FIRESTONE PLANT IN HAMILTON—EFFECT OF TIRE IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour on a serious matter involving a multinational corporation, Firestone, in Hamilton. Has the minister received a telegram from local 113 of the United Rubber Workers of America asking for government action to eliminate the import of United States made tires? The telegram states that tire imports have soared 80 per cent since the strike by the 1,300 Hamilton workers began, and that these imports have countered all the bargaining pressure the local union could muster.

If so, could the minister advise the House, the country, and Hamiltonians in particular, what his answer is in this regard?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I can indicate what the answer is in terms of any corrective action in the import field. Discussions have been held with the officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce previously and with myself, and I indicated that if we ever start to break our trade agreements with the United States and impose any type of import quotas, they can do the same to Canadian steel going into the United States. I think the hon. member would agree that this would have had repercussions on employment. I think the hon. member would agree but I have also suggested to the union in question that there is, perhaps based on the arguments they are prepared to submit, other action that the federal government could take with respect to this particular strike.

Mr. Alexander: Seeing that the minister has opened up the door with respect to action I wonder if he could give us a little hint as to what he has implied in this regard. I do not see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce here, so it is up to the minister to let us know what he is talking about.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I can. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce together with myself in our respective departments have authority to look into the question generally of the domination by parent corporations of their subsidiaries here in Canada in terms of their industrial relations, perhaps to see whether the subsidiaries in question are acting in the best interests of Canada and Canadian employees.

POSSIBLE DUMPING OF TIRES BY FIRESTONE COMPANY IN THE UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Supplementary to the Minister of National Revenue. Since the minister can on his own authority initiate an investigation as to whether or not there has been any dumping on the part of the parent company in this regard on to the Canadian market, since I wrote to him about this about a month ago and asked him to conduct such an investigation, I wonder if the minister is in a position to inform the House as to whether or not he has done it yet.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Dereliction of duty.

COMBINES

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AMENDMENTS TO BILL C-2

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Further to the request of members on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week that the minister's proposed amendments to Bill C-2 be tabled, would the minister indicate if he now intends to table his amendments, and if so, when?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I announced that these amendments will be introduced when the bill is considered in committee.

GRAIN

APPLICATION OF BRACKEN FORMULA IN ALLOCATION OF BOXCARS—REQUEST FOR REVIEW

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as minister in charge of the Wheat Board. It has to do with the current application of the Bracken formula in allocation of boxcars. Having regard to the importance of the facilitating of grain movement and in the interests of equity to all competitive elevator companies, I wonder if the minister is reviewing the current application of the Bracken formula in that it now appears that the spirit enshrined within the Bracken formula is not truly being upheld.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the formula is not currently being reviewed, although it is reviewed certainly on an annual basis. I have no recent complaints about its operation, and I will of course be glad to receive any specific objections the hon. member has heard about it.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I wonder, since the current allocation of boxcars in effect locks in the status quo in that the allocation is made on the previous year's business rather than the current demands, if the minister would consider looking into this, particularly in view of the fact that we face the potential of large amounts of grain which is tough and damp which could cause undue elevator congestion.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the formula is based on the most recent deliveries. Regularly the previous months deliveries dropped and the most recent months are taken on. In addition there are steps taken to deal with particular congestion problems, and between these two measures the formula has been working well. As I indicated to the hon. member, I have received no complaints about it.

Mr. Nowlan: I will make my point of order short, Mr. Speaker, because I am about as tired as that clock. The clock looks as though it is a little behind schedule, and I am a little tired of jumping up and down during question period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: This government can at least take measures to fix the clock and get it in time, even though they are running behind in everything else.

In terms, Mr. Speaker, of the reality of members jumping up and down—obviously all cannot get recognized—I hope, Your Honour, that in future when a minister of the Crown does something in the House in which a member opposite is somewhat interested, that member is sometimes recognized.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not believe this was done yesterday, and I wonder if I might ask the government House leader what business we will be proceeding with later today and into next week.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as for the business today, the House order provides that we will be continuing with discussions of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, followed by the Minister of Public Works with all questions to be put at four o'clock. On Monday, the first order of business will be the continuation of the second reading debate on Bill C-2, the bill relating to the Combines Investigation Act, with the hope that the bill can be referred to the standing committee that day. We will then call the bill approved by the Senate amending the Trust and Loans Act. This is an extremely urgent matter because there are now unnecessary limitations upon the spending and borrowing powers of these various trust and loan companies. If this is approved in time, we will then call two bills, C-10 and C-19 standing in the name of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. I would like if possible to have this business completed before Wednesday, but if not as soon as it is competed and not later than Thursday we will call the petroleum administration bill.

Mr. Whittaker: I have a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. After a question today to which the Minister of National Revenue replied, part of his answer was an answer to a question that I asked yesterday. His remarks today were what I consider as offhand and almost bordering on being smart aleck. The question that I asked yesterday in this House I take very seriously. Also, since asking that question, I understand that the same situation exists in Toronto. I did not ask him that I be supplied with any names or addresses. I asked him to look into this matter and to report if he is going to do anything about it.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 24, consideration in committee of Bill 31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1975—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Penner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose last evening the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development were under consideration. They may be found on pages 10, 11 and 12 of the bill. I am prepared to recognize the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I would remind the hon. member that taking into account her time of last evening, she has about two minutes left for her presentation and questions.

On Schedule A—Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member will pardon me for raising a point of order at this time. Since the minister will be making a statement on hamburger at two o'clock this afternoon, we seem to have only forty minutes left for the consideration of Indian Affairs. I wonder whether, after the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has completed her remarks, there would be general agreement that for the remaining forty minutes hon. members be limited to ten minutes each.

● (1220)

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Is it agreed?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Chairman, has it been agreed that consideration of the Indian Affairs estimates will terminate at one o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that there is to be a statement on hamburger at two o'clock, and we will have to do Public Works and the consideration of estimates will end at four o'clock, I do not see how we can do much more than close off Indian Affairs at one o'clock. However, a ten-minute limit would give a few more members a chance to participate.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Chairman, there was no agreement, to my knowledge, that we would complete the discussion of these estimates in 40 minutes. I have no objection to the ten-minute limit on questions, but there has been no agreement that I know of that we would finish this department by one o'clock.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I am not aware of any agreement, other than the one which was read in the House, to spend 2½ to 3 hours on this department. I have asked the House leader to come back to the chamber and clarify the situation.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank hon. members for giving the Chair direction on this matter. The only agreement that the Chair has is that the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development shall constitute, in time, 2½ to 3 hours. If there is any change in that agreement, I think the Chair would have to be so advised following consultation among the House leaders. We will assume that discussion of this department's estimates will continue this afternoon unless the Chair receives direction otherwise.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In any case, Mr. Chairman, was it agreed that speeches be limited to ten minutes?

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair asked whether that was agreed. I understand that for the remainder of the time until one o'clock, speeches or questions will be limited to ten minutes. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding from the estimates that the allocation for purposes of research into Indian treaties and rights is exactly the same in this year's estimates as it was in the preceding year. I should like to ask the minister about the statement made yesterday in Yellowknife by Dr. Lloyd Barber, the Indian land claims commissioner, to the effect that settlement of Indian land claims is of emergency proportions and needs the highest priority, and that failure to act on it would lead to militancy and violence. Was the Indian land claims commissioner stating government policy when he made that statement?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Chairman, Dr. Barber is basically voicing his own opinions in this area. Our policy is to provide funding and a five-year program was set up with $7½ million to be used in this area. I believe we are in the third year of the program.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I have a final question. While Dr. Barber speaks as the Indian land claims commissioner, nevertheless he was appointed to that position by the government and I should like to know if his statement means there are to be new government initiatives in the recognition of aboriginal rights.

Mr. Buchanan: I apologize, Mr. Chairman, but I missed the question.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I should like to know if the statement of the Indian land claims commissioner means there are to be new government initiatives in the area of aboriginal rights.

Mr. Buchanan: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Chairman, let me begin by offering congratulations to the minister on the assumption of his responsibilities. I think it is agreed he has made an encouraging start in his portfolio, and it is well known that he comes to the department with a background of goodwill among its constituents. I want to point out to him, however, that while he has goodwill in the three areas of his responsibility, it is also a very clear fact that the mandate won by his government was denied him in each of the three areas of the north where the election returned members of this party and the New Democratic Party to represent the native people of Canada and certainly those within the national parks. I hope he will bear that fact in mind if there is ever temptation to carry too far the idea of upgrading the government's mandate as a result of the July election. I think the minister clearly has a special responsibility in that he is the first new minister to hold this portfolio for a long time. Many members of this House, and people who have to deal with the department, hope he will take advantage of his status as a new minister to change some of the people and some of the procedures that clearly were not working well in dealing with the problems of the native people and the northern territories. There has been no approval of the status quo as it relates to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. We hope the minister is aware of this as he assumes his responsibilities.

Mr. Chairman, I want to begin by referring to the statement made many times and repeated in the standing committee by the president of the National Indian Brotherhood, George Manuel, who expressed concern about the bureaucracy with which the native people have to deal. I recognize that the minister claimed last night that the bureaucratic proportion of his department amounts to only 7 per cent. I am not interested in arguing percentages, but I am interested in ensuring that the public servants involved in the administration of this department are helping to achieve the goals of native people, national parks and northern policy, and are not serving as obstructionists. I think it is recognized that it is the view of the National Indian Brotherhood that in many cases these public servants are obstructive.

I wonder, in view of the opinion recently articulated by the new parliamentary secretary to the minister, whether we may look forward to the day when the department will phase itself out, whether there is any concrete plan to reduce the number of public service employees in the department or the proportion of the budget that goes to administration costs.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member for the kind remarks that he made prior to bringing me down to earth with a thud through his caution. I do not accept the idea that people employed in this department serve as obstructionists. By and large, a great many dedicated people are employed in all aspects of the operation of the department. There is no question that there is a transition in progress in the role of many employees and administrators and managers are being moved more into the role of advisers as the programs are being taken on and administered by the Indian people.

I indicated last evening that roughly $60 million of the budget is now handled directly by the band councils and Indian associations. I think this is the basic thrust, and the role is changing. As I said last evening, the number of employees in the department who are concerned with Indian and Eskimo Affairs programs has remained static for the last half-dozen years, but the budget has gone up threefold. So there has been a substantial increase in the funds used on behalf of the clientele of this department.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Let me repeat my specific question. Does the department or the minister intend, over a stated period of time, say five or ten years, to wind down the department? Is there any such plan?

Mr. Buchanan: No, there is not. The hon. member may recall that in 1969 the federal government put out a policy statement dealing with Indian and Eskimo Affairs programs. This policy was put out for consideration. One of its proposals was precisely in line with the hon. member's suggestion. With few exceptions, there was strong reaction on the part of the Indian people against acceptance of the proposals in that document. The Prime Minister and my predecessor undertook, to a group of Indian people who came to a meeting, that the government would not unilaterally make the suggested changes. Again, I should mention that this proposed revision is now being conducted with regard to the Indian Act. We hope at some time in future to straighten this out and move ahead. But that undertaking was given.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Chairman, the minister knows as well as I do that the objection of the Indian people in this country was not related so much to the contents of that report as to the means by which the report was put together. It was done by virtually ignoring the undertaking given by the minister's predecessor to consult with the Indian people.

I do not want to rake over old coals, but the matter of consultation is one to which I shall return. Let me remind the minister of the repeated request of the president of the National Indian Brotherhood. That organization seeks a complete and detailed review of the structure and operation of the Indian and Eskimo Affairs branch of the department. Will the minister accede to that request and allow the National Indian Brotherhood unfettered access to the records of the department so that a complete and full review can be undertaken by the National Indian Brotherhood? In that way we shall allay the apprehension of the Indian people that the bureaucracy of the department is working against them. Will the minister give us that commitment? Will he say yes or no, because time is short.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Chairman, as I said last evening, a consultative mechanism was set up for discussions with the National Indian Brotherhood. If they make such a precise request at their next meeting in Feburary with the cabinet committee, I will be prepared to take a serious look at it.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): In other words, we have the commitment that when George Manuel repeats his specific request for a full, detailed and unfettered review of the operations of Indian and Eskimo Affairs programs, the minister may not accede to that request but he will give serious consideration to it.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Chairman, yes, more or less. The point is that George Manuel does not set the agenda. The executive of the National Indian Brotherhood does. If the National Indian Brotherhood wants to give that item top priority, it will be considered.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I regret that it may be less, not more. Let me point out that this kind of double-talk, this refusal to accede to the request of the democratically elected representatives of the Indian people of Canada, creates suspicion and difficulty among these people who deal with the department. Turning specifically to the question of consultation—

The Deputy Chairman: Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I remind him that the time allotted to him under the agreed ten-minute limitation of speeches has now expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I was very glad yesterday to note the great objectives that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) announced concerning the policies of his department. I was somewhat surprised after listening to the speech of the minister to hear some people come back and say that we should try to involve the Indians and the Inuits in the fields of education, housing and cultural affairs, since the minister had just told us that the main objective of his department was to give as much autonomy, freedom and independence as possible to the Indians as concerns the administration of their own affairs.

It is obvious, Mr. Chairman, since education concerns me particularly, that this is a field where the independence of individuals is extremely important. Indeed, the very aim of education is to achieve an independent status as an individual. However, education itself involves a contradiction since education also means training and training nearly always implies certain restrictions. Several years ago, we acted restrictively towards the Indians because we wanted to mold them or bring them to see things our way and to share our cultural, linguistic and other values.

I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, to see that the objective of the department is to give back to our native people, the Indians and the Inuits, through a grant of a few million dollars, the means to regain their own linguistic, cultural and educational independence.

Yesterday some comments referred to the number of Indians who take part in their own education, either by being teachers or in some other way. It is quite obvious that the restrictive action taken in the past has eliminated some native people from this process of education, particularly in the field of teaching.

If one looks at the progress made and characterized by statistics provided by the minister, one sees the movement is going in a positive way and towards ever increasing native involvement in that process at all levels.

I am quite happy to see that the votes allocated to the cultural and educational areas follow precisely that objective of involvement, and I am convinced that in a few years the minister's statistics will be higher. We will then see that for the larger part, Indians will be looking after their education, their other problems and dealing with them themselves.

I would like to point out another thing, Mr. Chairman, about the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with respect to Parks Canada. I think the minister went over an aspect of Parks Canada much too quickly yesterday and I am referring to the byways and historic sites. I find that program particularly interesting because a few years ago there was talk already that that program about byways and historic travel routes would help link the core of Ontario to Quebec City.

Mr. Chairman, that route would go through the whole riding of Portneuf where the sites are magnificent, the scenery beautiful and one could also find famous historic sites such as the old Jacques-Cartier Fort at Donnacona. That panoramic route on those byways would make it possible for the people of Quebec City to admire the beautiful scenery in a natural environment. That would also allow us to preserve our natural resources in their state of wilderness.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister intends to make a greater effort to have this special route built. I would also like to know whether the minister is still consulting with Ontario and Quebec so that those magnificent projects are achieved as soon as possible.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I want to express to the minister my best wishes for success in his new duties. I am very happy to see that on this side of the House there are a great many people as dynamic and intelligent as the minister who can be called upon to continue the good work of those who leave their posts.

● (1240)

[English]

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Chairman, to reply briefly to the hon. member for Portneuf, I share his concern as far as the parks and sites aspect is concerned. In fact, when I was making some remarks last evening I think the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre sort of jokingly asked what I meant by the term "linear parks". I think this program is becoming more and more effective in parts of our country which are heavily populated, such as the Windsor-Quebec City access. It is going to be more difficult to put together the large land assemblies we will need to create this type of park. We will have to look at other types of programs such as by-ways and canals to try to create ways for Canadians in heavily populated areas to gain some meaningful experience from our parks system.

An hon. Member: How about the Grand River?

Mr. Buchanan: Perhaps the Grand River as well, and your 66-foot footpath. For a good many people, even in our national parks such as Banff and Jasper the experience is pretty well limited to the road, interpretation centre and the visitors' centre. I think you can make a very strong case that canals, and so on, are areas to which we should be devoting a significant amount of attention.

I wish to report that nothing has been concluded; we are still very much in the negotiation stage. One of my first acts was to go, with Hon. Allan Grossman who has responsibility for this area in Ontario, to look at the Blueridge parkway in the United States to see whether it had any application for Canada. I wish to reassure the hon. member that while I cannot report anything substantive at this time, we are still very interested in a Laurentian parkway from Quebec City to the province of Ontario.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I join other members in congratulating the minister upon his ascension to this important and interesting portfolio. Unfortunately, he has arrived at this position when many of the long-standing problems have reached crisis proportions.

I was interested in the presentation of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the statement of the Indian land claims commissioner who until recent times has been a fairly moderate and mild man with regard to land claims. He is now reaching the point where he is becoming strongly critical.

Because of the shortage of time, I wish to zero in immediately on the subject I have in mind. In a recent interview with Joan Cohen, as reported in the October 15 issue of the Ottawa Citizen, Harold Cardinal made some pointed remarks on the deterioration of the Indian situation across Canada. Included in this article was the following interesting statement:

> And as serious as anything, the announced reform of the education system, which was to have put schools under the control of Indians, simply didn't materialize. The Department of Indian Affairs is running things, just as it always did.
> That is why he sees it as essential that economic and education reforms be separated from the long-term policy decisions that have to be made when discussions begin with the federal government.

I think the minister is much more sensitive on these matters because he has been chairman of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and has gone through the inevitable educational process of chairing that group of MPs. However, as recently as last week the National Indian Brotherhood made a statement which has been made repeatedly, that the white man speaks with a forked tongue. There is some justification for this with respect to education. We had a formal, staged press conference held on May 24, 1973, where the former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the president of the National Indian Brotherhood, George Manuel, announced the implementation of the new look in education which had been derived from the committee's report of June, 1971, and the Indian Brotherhood statement on Indian culture and education which was released, I believe, in 1972. On that occasion, the minister made this commitment, and I quote from his official statement:

> I have given the National Indian Brotherhood my assurance that I and my department are fully committed to realizing the educational goals for the Indian people which are set forth in the Brotherhood's proposal. In consultation and co-operation with the Indian organizations, my department will begin immediately to effect the educational changes for the Indian people that they have requested.

Obviously, this undertaking has not been discharged, if we are to accept the words of Harold Cardinal who has been a very responsible and discerning leader in matters affecting our Canadian Indians. I want to ask specific questions to see if we can get any information as to how far this program has gone. We might not have time to get all the answers. If the minister is not able to deal with them in the chamber this afternoon, perhaps he will send me written answers.

In order to implement the program, as Mr. Cardinal says, priorities must be given to economic and educational matters. I agree with that statement. As H. G. Wells said, civilization is a race between education and catastrophe. I think we can translate that into the critical situation facing our native people at the present time. How many staff members at the upper echelon in the education branch of the Department of Indian Affairs are native people? What are their positions? This information is essential if we are to implement the objective of the Indians themselves in regaining control over education. The priorities were expressed in their paper as parental responsibility and local control.

Second, how much do the funds amount to that are available for experimental and innovative projects? How have they been used? This is one of the points made in the minister's statement of 1973. Third, how far has the process of the provincial curriculum enrichment proceeded? What provinces have taken action? How far down into the local educational level has this program proceeded? Fourth, how many native cultural educational centres have been established under this specific program? Of the $40 million that was allocated, how much has been spent, and for what specific programs?

The next question concerns an item for professional and special services, the amount of which keeps going up. I notice from the current estimates it has increased by $4.5 million to a level of $82 million. What is this particular estimate used for, what reports have been produced, how many people have been involved in those reports, and who are they? Are Indian research projects funded from this item of special services amounting to $82 million? Is there not overlapping and duplication in making available this amount of money, a substantial sum that might be more directly funnelled into the educational process itself?

I think that will suffice for the moment. If the minister would start his answer, he could then perhaps send me a written reply.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member for his kind comments. I am more optimistic than the Indian claims commissioner regarding the matter of Indian land claims. I feel that we are reasonably close to some sort of significant breakthrough in Quebec. If that is accomplished, I think hon. members will find that a settlement there will more or less establish the parameters of claim settlements and that there will be faster movement in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and British Columbia. I am talking now basically in the area of comprehensive claims as opposed to the specific claims being made in the treaty areas. As I say, frankly I am more optimistic than is the Indian claims commissioner in this regard.

Moving on to the hon. member's next area of questioning, the basic commitment of the government to the undertaking made by the minister and Mr. Manuel when they appeared before our committee, the government is still committed in this area. Progress has not been as rapid as we would like, partly because—the hon. member will recall this statement being made in the committee—the government could not really walk away from the joint agreements that we had entered into throughout this country with provincial school boards. This could be one of the areas of greatest difficulty.

We have incurred very substantial capital costs in buying places for Indian children in schools, and we are locked into ongoing contracts for the provision of educational services. No doubt this creates a very awkward situation; the Indian people would like to terminate these things, move out and spend very significant sums on duplicating these facilities on the reserves. The cost implications of this, as Mr. Manuel appreciated when we were discussing the matter before the committee, are very great, so that progress has not been nearly as rapid so far as getting schools established is concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I very much regret interrupting the minister, but I want to recognize another hon. member before we adjourn for lunch. Since the time for this set of questions is over, perhaps the minister could adopt the suggestion of the hon. member and reply in writing to the remaining questions.

Mr. Buchanan: I will be happy to do so.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I am glad of the opportunity to take part in this debate, which is necessarily a brief one. I, too, heard what Dr. Lloyd Barber said as reported on CBC radio this morning. As Indian land claims commissioner, I assume he is not given to alarmist statements on this subject and knows what he is talking about. I was startled, and I think the people of Canada should be started, by his statement that the situation constituted an emergency. I am still not sure whether the department as a whole recognizes the gravity of the emergency.

He also spoke of the urgent necessity for a just, generous and fairly rapid settlement of Indian land claims. He spoke of the fact that if frustration continues as a result of the failure of the negotiations and discussions being held on Indian land claims, then we in Canada might find ourselves in a position similar to that in northern Ireland. I think we should take these warnings very, very seriously.

I wanted to call to the attention not only of the committee but of Canadians generally, a report that was made on Canada's Indians by a minority rights group, a very prestigious group of jurists, scholars and others, I think mostly in the United Kingdom though also in Europe and other areas. They carried out a thorough study and a report was prepared quite recently by James Wilson. I want to thank the minister for sending me a copy of the report, which I read and found extremely interesting. I think it constitutes as good a summary of the background of this situation as any I have read. Naturally, it does not deal with all the complex details, but I hope Canadians will read it and understand it. If they do it will contribute to a change in attitude that seems to be essential to the finding of a solution.

This report was referred to in the House by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, and I think it will become common knowledge. The report offers a fairly objective view of the Canadian scene and historical background. I do not have time to go into the report in detail, but there are one or two quotations I should like to make, First, the report begins:

> After a century of spiritual and physical isolation, during which time they were commonly considered a dying race, the Canadian Indians have recently begun to emerge from the shadows and claim attention for their chronic problems of poverty, neglect and cultural and social alienation.

The report continues:

> —the harsh facts of a poor and demoralized existence remain stubbornly unchanged for a majority of Canada's native people.

The report states that in spite of the complex efforts that have been made, the harsh facts remain the same. I see it is one o'clock, and I think I will have another five minutes or so when I have finished my hamburger.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock p.m., it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to consider this bill again later this day.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair till two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. By agreement reached in the House earlier this day, the House will revert to motions at this time to permit the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to make a statement.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ENSURE ADEQUATE INSPECTION OF MEAT

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my statement will be very short and it will be essentially a summary of the statements I have made this week in answer to questions asked in this House by hon. members. Contrary to allegations made in the House this morning that I misled the House, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) will realize that what I am about to say is for the most part what I have already said in this House.

In view of the current concerns expressed over the quality of meat products, I know that many consumers are alarmed and I thought it would be appropriate to take a short period of the time of the House to make a summary of the situation in this regard. As a matter of fact, as I said a few minutes ago to the hon. member for St. John's East, I am surprised he needed 3½ hours to read a two-page document, most of which covered points that have already been covered this week.

The recent CBC program "Market Place" reported on studies carried out at the University of Guelph. The program implied that most of the samples tested were not safe for human consumption. The present programs and activities of my department do not substantiate this. As I said in this House on Wednesday, there are at present no epidemiological data to associate ground meat with human illness in Canada. My department has not received a single report from a doctor or a hospital relating human illness to the consumption of ground meat.

In the regular surveys carried out by the government's health protection branch, tests were negative for the organism salmonella which would have posed a health hazard. In both our survey and the work recently carried out at Guelph, with some assistance from my department I might add, this organism was absent. The total bacteriological count reported by "Market Place" is not related to a health hazard since these organisms do not produce toxins and are very readily destroyed by cooking. The high total count of bacteria reported in the program does suggest, however, that inadequate storage conditions with regard to time and temperature, and possibly unsanitary handling, may have occurred.

Like all members of this House, I want the best quality of food possible for Canadians.

Mr. Alexander: That's a good idea.

Mr. Lalonde: To this end, the health protection branch is doing the following. As I said in this House yesterday, regulations governing the protein quality and content of meat products and meat substitutes have been discussed with the food industry, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs over the last few months. These regulations are being forwarded to the Department of Justice for promulgation within the very near future.

Ground Beef

The second aspect of my department's regular work includes spot-checking samples of all meats across the country. In the most recent survey, 100 samples from 50 outlets were examined in five regions of the country. We found a total bacterial count lower than that reported on the "Market Place" program. As with any independent report of this nature, we will be checking their data, and if further action is warranted hon. members may be assured we will take it.

Several months ago the health protection branch planned a workshop for November 4 to November 6, 1974, for personnel involved in food control at the federal, provincial and municipal levels. Ground meat will be one of the topics of these discussions. As I said in this House last Wednesday, a new laboratory of the health protection branch on the campus of Saint Mary's University in Halifax will be opening on November 1 and will have a staff of 22 people working in microbiology on programs associated with the quality of foods. These personnel will be augmented by the necessary field staff in the regions to support our monitoring program, for which the total staff involvement will therefore be 30 persons in Halifax.

In view of the recent concern, I have instructed officials of my department to expand their program on microbiological standards for meats. In total, there are 245 people assigned to food programs in the field operations directorate of the branch. We will immediately assign 30 of our technical and professional staff in the field to work exclusively on meat samples across the country. This, of course, as I said this morning in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for St. John's East, will be in addition to the work normally being carried out by the 1,255 meat inspectors in the Department of Agriculture and by the 195 inspectors of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs involved in various aspects of food inspection.

It should also be noted that provincial and municipal governments are involved in food inspection. For provinces alone, for instance, there are over 1,500 inspectors associated with food programs across this country. The analyses that will come from the services to be carried out will help us to establish baseline levels of micro-organisms in meat on the Canadian market. From these results we will develop guidelines for use by the health protection branch and guidelines for provincial and municipal agencies in improving the sanitary aspects of meat processing. From this base, future regulatory programs will be developed. If substantiated cases of health hazards associated with ground meat are discovered, we shall not hesitate to take legal or regulatory action.

As I said in the House this morning, Canada has a food inspection program which compares favourably with that of any country in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: There has been increasing emphasis in the last two years in my department on the improvement of food standards, and this work will be continued at an accelerated rate. I want to assure the House and the people of Canada that as their minister of health I shall ensure that my department makes every effort to provide consumers with the best possible quality of meat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I say that the minister's statement, with all its shortcomings, would have saved us all a great deal of trouble had it been made last Monday. At least he would have been expressing his concern, instead of giving us the flippant and irresponsible answers we have experienced during the past week. Now we are being told there is no need to worry about bacteria and waste organisms in meat products. Indeed, typhoid and hepatitis, diseases which result from eating unclean food, are things of the past. However, in reality the decline of these diseases can only be attributed to the work of previous ministers of health who recognized the dire implications of the presence of bacteria in food and who enforced the regulations.

The physical symptoms which result from consuming food with a high bacterial content can range from mild diarrhoea to violent stomach upset. The absence of reported incidents in no way implies that sickness caused by poisonous ground beef does not exist. It may well be the case that these symptoms were attributed to some other cause. Does the minister prefer to wait until there is evidence of this type before taking action? Does somebody have to become seriously ill, as happened in the case of electric kettles and the lead poisoning which was uncovered by a very attentive nurse in Toronto who diagnosed lead poisoning contracted by a baby? Does the minister dispute the findings of the University of Guelph, that their samples contained human and animal waste; and does he not regard the existence of this foreign matter as constituting a health hazard? Would the minister serve meat infected by this kind of bacteria to his own children?

It is not uncommon for Canadians to prefer to eat their meat rare or in slightly cooked form. Does the minister feel that these people should change their eating habits because his department is incapable of instituting and enforcing regulations which would protect them from a potential health hazard? The minister told us that a high bacterial count could result from inadequate storage facilities. But he did not say what he intended to do about it. What steps does he intend to take to improve storage conditions at the supermarket level?

On Wednesday, the minister said the presence of coli bacteria does not constitute a health hazard if the meat is well cooked. He further stated that cooking at 160 degrees Fahrenheit would kill the bacteria. In other words, the secret is in the cooking. Now we are told, in a Canadian Press dispatch written after checking with an Ottawa hospital, that meat would have to be cooked for at least an hour at 172 degrees Fahrenheit to kill staph bacteria. Mr. Speaker, not even the minister would eat hamburger which had been cooked for an hour. He couldn't eat it; it would be too tough. Moreover, the Canadian Medical Association, according to the same dispatch, said to day that even cooking the meat at these higher temperatures would not necessarily ensure that all the bacteria were destroyed.

I know the minister would not want to mislead the House on a matter of such importance. We can only conclude, Mr. Speaker, that he is getting bad advice. The hon. gentleman has told us how much he has grown to like powdered milk. This was in response to our concern over the removal of the 5 per cent subsidy and the effect it would have upon the health of the country. He even went so far as to tell us that powdered milk improved if, after mixing, it was left in the refrigerator overnight. But hamburger cooked for an hour is stretching even the minister's credibility.

On Monday, when the subject was first raised in the House following the release by the CBC of the University of Guelph studies, the minister, instead of taking his responsibilities seriously and making a statement at the first opportunity, replied in a flippant and irresponsible manner. As a result of this flippancy and arrogance he now finds himself in hot water. This question, affecting as it does the health of Canadians, should have been treated by the minister as a matter of the utmost urgency and importance.

Now we turn to the presentation by the Food Prices Review Board. We saw the spectacle of the chairman of that board having to call a press conference to remind the Canadian public that the government was dragging its feet on the recommendations contained in the board's report on ground beef which has been in the hands of the government and, presumably, of the minister, since June 6. Lest anyone should doubt that, the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board made a formal statement. The response from the minister's department was that there were higher priorities within the department. That, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, was a most irresponsible reply. This is a most urgent matter and it directly affects Canadians because we are consuming more than 400 million pounds of ground beef. As a result of inflation the price of other cuts has risen beyond the reach of most Canadians.

Mr. Lalonde: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, did I understand the hon. member to say I declared that this was not a matter of priority? Did he impute that statement to me? If so, I ask him to withdraw such a statement because I never made any statement of that kind. Also, I have checked with my officials and they advise me that no such statement was made by spokesmen of my department at any time.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. McGrath: Well, I will read now from the press release issued by the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board. This is what it says:

> In contrast to the positive response of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the director of the health protection branch of Health and Welfare Canada termed as nonsense the board's recommendation for more inspection for bacterial content in ground beef. He is reported to have said that food poisoning bacteria are rare in ground beef, and that food spoilage bacteria which frequently occur in this meat are harmless to humans. He also maintained his inspection division had higher priorities.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member has indeed corrected his statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I would like to point out that that statement was made in June and that action has been taken since.

Mr. McGrath: In fact, Mr. Speaker, this statement was made on October 23, 1974, by the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: The minister's statement today is not enough, when so many Canadians are concerned; and I suggest the reason for their concern is the irresponsible and flippant response given by the minister when he told us that coli bacteria are harmless if we cook our meat well.

● (1420)

We are now told we will have 30 inspectors seconded from other areas of responsibility. For how long? Is this to be temporary, or is it to be a permanent, new feature of the health inspection branch of the minister's department? I suggest that the time has come when we must change the regulations. We may even have to change the law. We may have to come up with stiffer penalties. We may even have to change the minister.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my comments I should like to pay public tribute to two institutions in Canada which have done an excellent job in bringing this serious matter to the attention of the public and contributing in some way to getting the minister to act. I refer, first, to the CBC who did a good job of coverage in raising an important issue on a political program. It was responsible journalism of the finest kind. I refer, also, to the good work done in this respect by the Food Prices Review Board. It is good to see some public agencies performing well.

I turn now to another public agency, namely, the minister's department. I want to refer to a number of important omissions in the minister's statement. First, it is worth noting that for the first time, if one can find it in a statement a page and a half long, the minister actually says there is something wrong with our meat inspection procedures. He says there are some real hazards in this area and therefore he has taken steps to bring in new regulations and to increase the number of inspectors. At least, he has started to act and has acknowledged that a potentially dangerous situation exists. But what is missing? I would like to know when these important new regulations will be brought in. The minister did not give us a date, but he did acknowledge that he is finally going to move in that regard, and I hope it will be soon.

What about the action that the government will take if someone is found to be derelict in his responsibilities? What if it is discovered that people who keep the meat are not meeting the regulations laid down by his department? Are we going simply to have the maximum $50 fine, which I understand is the highest fine ever imposed upon someone who has not complied with the regulations? There is nothing in the minister's statement to say that the punitive aspect, in dealing with this situation, is to be considered. Surely that is a crucial matter, given the price of meat in Canada today. If you are caught neglecting your legal responsibilities, $50 is a negligible amount—perhaps only a very small part of an afternoon's sales in a store. Surely this is an inadequate fine for such a potentially serious offence.

The minister said there will be 30 full-time meat inspectors. My understanding—and the minister might clarify this—from the information we have been able to get, is that at least the equivalent of ten inspectors are working full time now, so we have an increase, presumably, of 20. I would like to know what the minister's criterion is. He has not said why we are going to have 30 inspectors now, as opposed to 50 or 500 or 1,500. Was it just guesswork? Was he simply saying, "Well, people are legitimately upset about this matter. We had better move in some direction. Let's increase it to 30"? Or was some rational criterion applied?

The minister did not indicate—and I think he should do so—why he thinks 30 is a reasonable number. Some people might think that 30 is a reasonable number for one city alone. I do not know the answer to that question; I will be candid about it. It might be a reasonable figure. But the minister, surely, has an obligation to say how the number was determined and to assure us that it was not simply a political response in the House of Commons to a critical situation.

There is another point I wish to make. It has a direct bearing on the number of inspectors who are now being put to work, but more broadly it has a direct bearing on the entire health protection program of the minister's department. Meat may be just one example of a potentially dangerous situation in the health field. Therefore, a very important part of the minister's department is the health protection program. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the budget for this program has been virtually frozen for the last few years, with a very slight fluctuation. If the minister checks the figures he will find there has been no significant variation in the number of dollars allocated to this program. Given the rate of inflation in recent years, this means that real spending in the health protection program of his department has gone down in the past few years.

Surely if we are to deal with medical matters in a serious way, it would make much more sense to spend a lot of money before people become sick—to avoid illness; to avoid problems—than to pay for doctors after medical problems occur. I cannot forgo the opportunity of saying to my Conservative friends who are always complaining about government spending that this, surely, is an area where there should be more government spending to ensure that the people of Canada are protected and to avoid medical expenses, even if we are putting it on a dollars and cents basis.

I conclude my observations on the minister's statement with this point. It seems to me that the minister has displayed a totally unacceptable air of complacency. This is why he has been criticized by the Food Prices Review Board, by the opposition parties and by others. It arose from the statement in which he told the people of Canada, "You can drink powdered milk, if the price of milk is too high." I say to the minister that that is unacceptable. It is unacceptable, not only coming from a minister but from any Canadian whose income happens to be not particularly high, to tell people, "Drink powdered milk". The second illustration of this, which I mentioned in the House the other day and the hon. member for St. John's East mentioned it today, is in saying to the people of Canada, "Well, cook your hamburger a long time and then you don't have to worry. If you cook it at 160 degrees, you don't have to worry about bacteria."

I say to the minister that we should not have bacteria in our meat at any significant level, and we should not have to cook it at 160 degrees for up to an hour. If the minister or anyone in Canada wants to eat hamburger raw, we should be able to do so with complete safety.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I hope this situation will shock that minister out of his state of complacency, because if there is one field where complacency should be totally inacceptable, it is that of the health and welfare of Canadians. We need a totally new approach to this problem.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I shall indicate first of all that the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) certainly contradicts the one made by the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board. Even if this board is concerned with reviewing food prices, I seriously feel that, to be effective, it must also supervise not only the application of the Weights and Measures Act, but also make sure that food products are of satisfactory quality. This is the reason for the position adopted by the Chairman of this board concerning ground meat.

Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that producers are not to blame when consumers do not get good quality meat. Cattle producers do their utmost to deliver healthy animals. At the slaughterhouses, the inspectors do an excellent job of protecting consumers, and I suggest that this is an important stage of meat marketing.

I have often had the opportunity of visiting slaughterhouses and I can bear witness to the efficiency of their inspections. Still, I am not so sure that the ground meat sold in supermarkets is always of top quality. It may be the result of unsanitary handling as well as aging of the meat.

The minister has stated that 240 persons are employed on food programs in various areas. In the future, he said, 30 technicians and professionals will devote all their time, from sea to sea, sampling meats, this, naturally, in addition to the work normally performed by the 1,255 inspectors from the Department of Agriculture and 195 others from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who are responsible for the various aspects of food inspection.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the large number of people who, right across the country, supervise the quality of the meat offered the consumer in commercial establishments, in addition to provincial and municipal inspectors, I cannot understand that with such an army out in the field some firms should still break the law, at the present time by taking the risk of offering consumers meat of dubious quality.

Mr. Speaker, we agree that there is nothing better than good meat. On the other hand, nothing is so hard to digest, so harmful for one's health than bad meat, meat that even dogs would eat with little enjoyment.

I feel strongly that, in addition to the steps to be taken by the various departments to ensure quality meat to the consumer, we should see to it immediately that the producers get sufficient profits and income to enable them to live decently and to continue producing enough to meet the needs of the domestic market.

Otherwise, they would have to import meat from somewhere else, and then the consumers might be entitled to complain louder about meat's bad quality.

So it is a very serious problem, and I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), with the help of the Cabinet, will introduce measures likely to improve the situation.

In conclusion, I hope the minister will have the courage to deal severely when necessary with the big corporations which deal in meat and do not comply with the legislation and regulations, in the same way he will deal severely if necessary with smaller businesses.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While we are on motions, I believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has had discussions and there is agreement that he file a document pursuant to Standing Order 41(2).

ENERGY

TABLING OF INTERNATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM AGREEMENT—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions about the international energy program agreement which was arrived at in Brussels on September 27, 1974. I made the suggestion that if the House permitted, I might lay it on the table. The House might agree to an order in the following terms:

That the agreement on international energy program tabled this day be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works for consideration and report back to the House.

If the House is agreeable, I wonder if that could be made an order.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, we are quite agreeable to the motion. However, we should like to have from the minister or from the acting prime minister, in light of the very serious implications for Canada, the assurance that this agreement will not be signed by the government until the report of the committee has been dealt with in the House.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to give that undertaking.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 24 consideration in committee of Bill C-31 for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31 March, 1975.—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: I rise on a point of order, Madam Chairman. Because of the time remaining until four o'clock, there has been an informal agreement which I should like to have expressed more formally in order to avoid any problems. It was agreed that the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should be considered until 3.15 p.m., at which time the estimates of the Department of Public Works would be before the committee. If I may make a suggestion, since the Department of Public Works is being considered at the specific request of the Social Credit Party, Your Honour might give their spokesman priority.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed? The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We concur, Madam Chairman, although I am a little concerned about the government House leader's attempt to direct the Chair with respect to the order in which speakers will be recognized. I presume you will consider this caveat which I file.

An hon. Member: It was a suggestion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Chairman, we agree to the suggestion. I think the government House leader was speaking on behalf of all of us.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Madam Chairman, I agree with pleasure to the suggestion made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), all the more so, because it is obvious we have had consultations on this matter. I should thank my colleagues for their generosity. I believe this is due to the fact that we have not abused our right to speak during the debate on the Estimates.

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that at 3.15 p.m. we shall move to the estimates of the Department of Public Works?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On Schedule A—Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Chairman, before lunch I used up five of the ten allotted minutes, so I shall now continue my bisected remarks. I was referring to the report of the minority rights group regarding Canadian Indians. I read a few excerpts from the report because I find it particularly worth while and interesting. I should like to read further from page 7 of the report:

> The simple fact is that successive governments have found it easier and cheaper to keep the Indians dependent on welfare than to make the enormous capital investment required to enable them to stand on their own feet.

● (1440)

> The economic effects of this policy can be easily measured: unemployment among Canadians as a whole is 6 per cent, among Indians it is 50 per cent. In 1969 the average income of a Canadian family was $8,874; while 88 per cent of all Indian families made less than $3,000, and about 50 per cent made less than $1,000 . . . including all welfare payments.

I continue reading from the report:

> Despite these encouraging signs there has still not been a major transformation of Indian life. The Department of Indian Affairs is still a huge and costly vested interest and may, wittingly or unwittingly, obstruct the movement of power and resources to the Indians . . . There is a long history of failure, parsimony and neglect to be made up for.

I draw this matter to the minister's attention, not because he condones or wills that this should be so but because he should recognize how difficult is the task he has undertaken.

Finally, the document reads:

> In order to make this more trusting atmosphere possible, and give the Indians the best chance of success in finding solutions to their chronic ills, the government will have to act in good faith and make available to them adequate resources for a long period of experiment and development, and Canadians as a whole must abdicate the responsibility they assumed for deciding whether "their" Indians should be "preserved" or assimilated. Whatever paths the Indians decide to follow, and however unwise they may appear to outsiders, the choice must now be made by the Indians themselves. White Canadians are not being asked to determine what the Indian was or is or could become; they are being asked to do something far more difficult; accept him as he is.

May I say a few words about property and land claims. This is a difficult and complex matter and I want to sound a note of warning. If it is dealt with in a purely legalistic manner, it will not succeed. It must be dealt with in a statesmanlike manner. These problems need political judgment and probably legislation. I wish to ask the minister some questions on this matter. He has told us of some of the negotiations and has expressed optimism about the negotiations relating to northern Quebec. I understand these are being conducted primarily with the Quebec government.

I ask about the other negotiations. How are they getting on. Are they progressing? Are adequate funds being made available to enable Indians to carry out adequate research for the presentation of their cases? I stress the need for adequate funds. Are they being made available? Is the process of negotiation being used with regard to aboriginal claims, and also respecting those who have had settlement of their treaty rights but claim that their treaty rights are being disregarded? This needs to be rectified because the treaties were totally unfair when first entered into.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Estimates

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Chairman, the procedure in committee of the whole is somewhat strange to me. Nevertheless, I am pleased to have this opportunity to explain my views during the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I am interested in many aspects of the department, particularly the parks branch and the branch concerned with Indian affairs. Most of the national park known as Kouchibouguac is in my constituency. Actually, I share the honour with the Minister of State (Fisheries). A new national park, known as Beaubear's Island, is being constructed in my area because of the generosity of the late Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, Hon. J. Leonard O'Brien, who donated the island to the people of Canada for that purpose.

Today I shall speak about education, particularly as it relates to the Indian people of Canada. I hope to see the day when the department will no longer be necessary and the Indian people of this nation will not look to departments of government but will rely on their own competence to accomplish their goals and attain their destinies. It is to be regretted that there is a so-called Indian problem today. If there is a problem, the responsibility cannot be laid at the feet of any one government but must be shared collectively by all governments and by all white people, as this process has gone on since the white man began colonizing this continent. On the day the first white man set foot on the shores of North America, the so-called Indian problem began. I am not sure that we cannot call it the white man's problem. I am sure the Indians would.

In the beginning, white men attempted to solve the problem by confronting the Indians. White men tried to make the Indian adopt the white man's culture. I will not quarrel with our ancestors, who I believe were sincere in their efforts. However, they were not completely successful. Some Indians resisted and the white man used his traditional method of solving problems, that is, the gun. For several generations we perpetuated the notion that we came here to convert savages but they resisted our efforts. Any battle with Indians which the white man won, was won by superior tactics and incredible bravery. On the other hand, if we lost to the Indians it was through treachery and sneak attacks and we subsequently set it down as a massacre. In my view, any battle is a massacre. However, the bias of the historian makes a great difference.

Fortunately, our attitude in recent years has changed. We want to see Indians take their rightful place in the fabric of society and of Canadian life. In the past half-dozen years the consultative process has begun to function to the benefit of the Indian people and the Canadian government. I hope that this consultative process will continue and will be enshrined in the spirit of departmental operations. I am sure the minister shares this view.

If the Indian people of Canada are to achieve their goals, it will be necessary for us to introduce improved educational programs. A very high proportion of Indian children drop out of school because the education they receive has no relevance to their lives. We need education which will help the Indian people meet their aims. It is not necessary that curriculums for Indian children should be the same as those for whites. Such a program is not logical. Indian education should be designed around the traditional skills, culture and heritage of the Indian peoples because these are the skills they will find useful.

I do not think we should educate the native peoples of Canada in such a way that they will lose their heritage and culture. It is imperative that they acquire skills which will enable them to live independently and in keeping with the dignity which is so necessary to the nature of man. When Indians attend public schools because of arrangements with provincial departments of education, we must be particularly careful to make sure they retain their culture and heritage. In my limited experience of teaching Indian children, I have found they are not capable of coping with our system, because it is largely irrelevant to them. So when we force them to undergo our sort of education we are not keeping in tune with their interests.

I have seen parents take their children out of school to hunt caribou or look after trap lines. Some people have expressed despair that this should be so. Personally, I think this kind of activity can have significant educational value if the system is designed to fit this kind of learning experience into the over-all pattern of native education. That is not to suggest that we should keep our native people as hunters, fishermen and trappers. However, there is nothing wrong with that if it is what some of them want to do.

I want to state as firmly as I can that education of the native people must improve both quantitatively and qualitatively. I am confident the minister shares this view and will make every effort to ensure our native children the best possible educational opportunities. However, all our efforts to improve their education will go for naught unless employment opportunity is available and accompanies the improving educational opportunity which we provide. I look forward to the day when the native peoples of Canada will take their place alongside the rest of us in whatever walk of life they choose.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Madam Chairman, I shall deal with no more than two of the major problems in northern Manitoba, the area with which I am most familiar. However, I feel these two subjects affect the entire country. In the past three weeks we have heard a great deal about Indian and native housing. I admit it is a problem. I travelled with the minister into several parts of my constituency where we saw the situation at first-hand.

Housing in many parts of our reserves is one of the most needed commodities. However, we seem to have the idea that housing must be built to our standard. If the Indians do not accept the standard we have set for them, there just does not seem to be any housing available. Professors say that everyone must have so many feet of air space. Let me assure you, Madam Chairman, that the rate at which we are building houses on reserves today cannot keep up with the population explosion taking place on the reserves. I am sure all hon. members are aware of that fact.

My idea to eliminate some of the problems in housing is this. A certain percentage of houses should be built each year on any given reserve. I am not sure how they are allocated. However, there are still many people on the reserves who would be very happy to have a roof over their heads. With the oncoming winter, we still face the problem of having two or three families living in one home. I wish to emphasize to the minister that there are ways in which we can accommodate people on the reserves. We can go right back to the old log home. In most cases the timber is in the area and the people are skilled in the construction of this type of home; they do not need training programs in order to build them. I am not talking about a 12 by 14 foot log home but about a home in which a family can survive.

The unemployment rate in my constituency is 12.8 per cent. We have LIP and a step, "A HOP" and a jump programs to do all kinds of things to create employment. These people in my constituency could be employed and housing could be provided for them at the same time. This is what is wanted by the people in many of the communities which I represent. They would be very happy to be able to move into a small home: let's call it a transitional type of home. The log home was the traditional until a few years ago when we stepped in and told the Indians they needed gyproc on the inside and something else on the outside. A good log home can be built by the people in the community at one third of the cost of today's traditional home.

The biggest problem facing people in the north is the high cost of transporting materials to the reserves. Half the money is used for that. I next want to speak about the alcohol problem which faces our Indian people. It is a problem which we, along with the Indian people, must overcome or the whole system will break down. Neither we nor the Indian people can cope with the alcohol problem. I am not a world traveller; I am only talking of my constituency. The chiefs and the people in my area admit there is a problem and they are trying to do something about it.

I cannot find in the estimates the amount of money which will help these people overcome this serious problem. Is it included in the $82 million set aside for professional help? Sending professional people to help them will not solve the problem. Someone comes in with a theory that if you all get together, hold hands and talk about the problem, it will go away. That theory should go out the window. The problem has to be dealt with by the people on the reserves. We can provide some expertise, but they must recognize that it is their problem. I would like to see an effort made to help them.

I understand that the community development program will be, or has been cut back to some extent. I do not believe I have been a strong promoter of community development programs, but I feel there must be a continuing program to help educate the people living on reserves.

This morning the minister referred to the transfer of funds to the band level. I support that idea. However, the necessary training must accompany this program. In many areas the native people want to have funds. There is no doubt about that. They should have them. However, they also need training so they do not end up with pie all over their faces. This is what has happened in many cases. Indian Affairs have been in too much of a rush to turn everything over to the band and let them go it on their own. Some of the bands have fallen down badly. Indian Affairs have been forced to return and take over these services because of the mess some bands made of it. That is why I want a community development program which will ensure that the bands are trained to carry on their own programs. They would then be much happier in handling their own programs.

The minister spoke this morning about utilizing reserves land, and so on. I am in favour of this. However, there is one problem in my constituency. At The Pas reserve a large complex is now being built. I admit that I am not up to date on everything that is happening there. However, I do not believe many of the people in the adjoining communities are in tune with just what is happening at that complex. There should be more communication between the adjoining town of The Pas and Indian Affairs so each can be apprised of where the other stands in this regard.

I say that because The Pas stands to lose a lot of tax money with a facility like this on the reserve. There should therefore be a little more consultation between Indian Affairs and the people of The Pas so as to let everyone know exactly where they stand.

Another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the committee is the alcohol problem. I am sure all hon. members are aware of the statistic that 85 per cent of the Indian people who fill our jails today have been convicted of alcohol offences. I should like to see the Department of Indian Affairs, through its educational programs, work very closely with the bands and help them overcome this very serious problem which is going to be the backbreaker of every reserve in northern Canada.

Mr. Buchanan: Madam Chairman, so I do not transgress upon the desire of several hon. members who wish to speak, all I shall say at this point is that I am very sympathetic to the remarks made by the hon. member. He dealt with several areas, and the first was the provision of log homes. As a youngster I spent some time in one in Athabasca, and one of the first things that I did when I came to this department was to look into that possibility.

As hon. members know, our most critical housing areas are northern Quebec and Ontario, across the northern part of the three prairie provinces into B.C. and down the Mackenzie valley, all areas where, as far as I and, it seems, as far as the hon. member is concerned, there is potential to build log homes. He is quite right in drawing that to our attention.

Mr. Cyr: Madam Chairman, during the few minutes at my disposal, I should like to talk about the estimates for Parks Canada.

National parks contain characteristics of great beauty which are protected for the benefit of Canadians and future generations.

Canada is a young country where a large part of the population lived not so long ago in or near the wilderness.

Today, most Canadians are within easy reach of areas which are still suited for outdoor activities. However, Canadians do not care for these outdoor activities. They will have to learn from the experience of densely populated countries respecting the preservation and conservation of areas which can be converted into national parks.

As the population and urban development increase, it will be increasingly imperative to keep these areas in their natural state and it will cost more and more money. Madam Chairman, this brings me to call your attention to an article in yesterday's issue of La Presse to the effect that Kuwait is purchasing an American island with $17.4 million of its oil profits. Kuwait has just added to its territory a small island called Kiawah in the Atlantic, only 30 kilometers from Charleston, South Carolina.

The developer chosen by the Kuwaiti to convert this wooded island into a large and highly profitable amusement park believes that this purchase could be the first of a series of investments by Kuwait in American holiday spots. This small island, sold for $17.4 million, was bought in 1955 by an American promoter for $125,000. This week's transaction in South Carolina should make us think about preserving our historical sites, of our enchanting sites in Canada, so that they do not become foreign-owned.

Thus, Madam Chairman, it is important to recognize from now on the wilderness areas in Canada and to take them into account when putting forward a policy on the national parks purpose, and thus provide for the development of the system. Speaking of the development of the park system, I must pay tribute to the president of the Privy Council (Mr. Chrétien) who established ten national parks in Canada between 1970 and 1974. I think this House should pay tribute to this great Canadian for his great concern for preservation.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Madam Chairman. Our understanding, and the understanding held by the House leaders, with respect to this particular series of estimates in committee of the whole was that this was going to be primarily a committee hearing for the use of the opposition, to enable them to examine ministers on the government spending estimates for the year 1974-75. As a result of that understanding, and in view of the importance of these three days, we agreed with this procedure.

In the House this afternoon we have, for some reason or other, government members rising in their places; there was one over there a few minutes ago and now we have my hon. friend. They have been making speeches that laud ministers. This is not the purpose of the committee of the whole on estimates, and I must protest. I do so reluctantly, Madam Chairman, but I must protest. If this is allowed to continue—I say this with great respect—through the rest of the afternoon, then we are destroying what is a very important experiment in parliamentary procedure, this operation upon which we are engaged.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Chairman, I do not want in any way to detract from my colleagues' right to speak. But I would ask you, Madam Chairman, and my hon. friends on the other side of the House to remember the understanding reached between the government House leader, the opposition House leader and, as I understand it, the House leader for the New Democratic Party. If government members continue to pay homage to ministers—we know they all pay homage to their own—then we are destroying the purpose of this experiment, which frankly we think is a very valuable one in the course of the reform of parliament that the Prime Minister himself mentioned. I say this with respect, but in the circumstances I felt I could not sit here any longer and not say anything.

Mr. Reid: On the same point of order, Madam Chairman, I do not think it is possible for members on this side of the House to accept the principle that the House of Commons belongs to members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: The agreement reached between the House leaders was that we would revert to the old system of committee of supply as an experiment. That we have done. In committee of supply in my time in the House of Commons—before the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton came here—government members used to speak in the same way as opposition members, and this has been going on today. There are members on this side who represent large numbers of Indians and who have not spoken; I am one of them. There are a large number who would like to speak. My point of order is that, to my knowledge, there was no agreement that Liberal members would not participate in debate; and I reject wholly the proposition that the House of Commons belongs only to members of the opposition.

● (1510)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Chairman, the parliamentary secretary is quite right if he says there is no House order in that regard. The government House leader indicated that perhaps it might become inflexible if there were a House order, and I agree with him. Nonetheless, there was an understanding that, because of the experimental nature of this, and the circumstances under which this agreement was reached, government members would not over-extend their time.

Right now we are standing at a point with three speakers from the government side and we have had three speakers from the opposition side. I think the undertaking and the understanding have now been breached, and I continue my protest with regard to the understanding that was reached. Since we are trying an experiment in the course of the consideration of these estimates I think things are being badly affected by the attitude of the government, and by the parliamentary secretary who spoke for the government on this matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: On a point of order, Madam Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Gaspé on a point of order.

Mr. Cyr: Madam Chairman, if the hon. member had allowed me to ask my question, which I wanted to explain, I would have yielded to another member and we could have had five minutes more for debate. I believe we should stop raising points of order. I have been a member of the House of Commons for many years and I am entitled to speak just as well as hon. opposition members.

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: There being only a few minutes left perhaps I should recognize the hon. member for—

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): On a point of order, Madam Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Laurier rises on a point of order.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Madam Chairman, it was agreed three days ago between party leaders that the estimates would be discussed, but the discussion is now on something else. Members are talking about personal problems in their constituencies. I heard but few remarks on estimates.

If it is actually intended to allow opposition members to talk about their ridings' problems, may I remind that the Standing Orders already provide 29 days for that purpose. We should therefore have been debating estimates for the last three days. In my opinion, such has not been the case, and I am in disagreement with members of the opposition who submit that the government does not allow them sufficient time to debate what they call extravagant sums of money reguired for this country's administration.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. As it is now 3.15 p.m., it is my duty, according to our understanding earlier today—

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Chairman, I rise on a point of order, and I do so because of the time we have lost on this one. May I say in this regard that the second statement by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton was more accurate than his first statement. It was undertaken that government members would not abuse the time. There was no understanding that they could not take part.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is now 3.15 o'clock and we are supposed to go on to Public Works estimates for 45 minutes. I will take the liberty of speaking for my party in saying that we are prepared to forgo our time in respect of Public Works in order that we might have another 15 minutes on Indian Affairs.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Chairman, I am wondering if the House and yourself would be good enough to agree that, because the last six or seven minutes of time allotted for the consideration of the estimates of Indian Affairs have been taken up on points of order, the hon. member for Brant, whom I think you were about to recognize, and who has only two questions he wants to ask, might be given the opportunity to do so now. Perhaps you would be good enough not to see the clock for two or three minutes in order that he might ask those questions.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that I should recognize the hon. member for Brant?

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Madam Chairman, I rise on a point or order. On the same point of order I had a question for the minister. I believe I have the right to speak as members on the other side. If not, let us turn to Public Works estimates.

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: There being no agreement, and it being 3.15 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to the agreement reached earlier today, to interrupt the proceedings and call the estimates for the Department of Public Works to be found in Schedule A at pages 19 and 20 of the bill.

On Schedule A—Department of Public Works

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Madam Chairman, I should like to avail myself of the opportunity of this debate on the estimates of the Department of Public Works to make certain representations to the Minister on the urgent needs of the area in connection with wharves and channels.

Even if a member is elected to represent the Canadian people as a whole, he must nevertheless have a greater concern for the problems of his constituency.

As far as the ministers are concerned, namely the executive members, I suggest they must administer the funds entrusted to them by Parliament so that every area of this country gets its fair share. Therefore, I wish to call the attention of the minister on very important matters that concern all the South Shore people, namely Montmagny and its suburban area. In the 1974-75 estimates, one can see that the department's objectives concerning the marine program is to provide and maintain at the most economical cost marine facilities as required by federal programs for the development and support of industry and for water level control. Secondly, this program provides for the construction, improvement and maintenance of marine structures, the planning and establishment of channels, wharves and harbours to facilitate the transportation of passengers and bulk and general cargo. That is a very clear objective.

For a number of years, representations have been made to the federal government by the municipal authorities of the city of Montmagny, middle officials and people in general through petitions to have dredging operations carried out in the channel leading to the wharf in Montmagny, but so far in vain.

All members who have represented that area in Parliament made representations to the various levels of government. Liberal and Conservative members, and even the Hon. Jean Lesage, when he was the hon. member for Montmagny-l'Islet, made representations to that effect. Whether the governments were Liberal or Conservative, the answer was always no. I do not think that the authorities were motivated by partisanship in their refusal. However, there is an extensive record on the channel to Montmagny, It is not because the various ministers who were in charge of the department of Public Works and the department of Transport are unaware of the unfavourable situation of Montmagny that the problem has remained unsolved. On the contrary, the problem is quite clear to them. However, I think more and more that it is the bureaucracy that ill-advises the ministers and tells them that the nature of the work to be done would be extremely expensive and would not be viable. In support of that I will quote a paragraph of the letter from the director of the Quebec district:

The answers boil down to that: the department agrees that this project could improve the tourist industry and promote trade traffic. However, quayage revenues would not warrant the cost of the improvements which would reach over half a million dollars and for those reasons, the department would not be justified in authorizing that project.

That is one version, but there are others. Looking very closely at that record, one can realize that the various civil servants who studied the matter do not agree about costs. Some speak in terms of $500,000 and others in terms of $750,000. I have come to the conclusion that if we really wish to contribute to the development of the South Shore area, we should not hesitate to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars to do the necessary works and to exploit those vast touristic resources which are natural but which need man's intervention to become profitable. Furthermore, it would create many jobs. If we were ready to spend one tenth of the money wasted on the refitting of the Bonaventure, all the people of the South Shore would be very proud of it and this would make us forget the unfortunate case of the Bonaventure.

In Montmagny and the vicinity, there are many islands, especially l'Île aux Grues, opposite Montmagny, that is inhabited by many brave people eager to develop this island further and who would wish to go on living there, but with means of communication which would be adequate in 1974. The transportation system available to them is inadequate. It would be necessary to make major improvements to the island dock, and I ask the minister to take note of that so that an amount be provided for that purpose in the next estimates of 1975-76.

I spoke some time ago of the benefits that the dredging of the channel would bring to the South Shore.

But there would also be many advantages for the islands because the tourists would find access much easier.

The government calls on local initiatives to stimulate our economy. That is all well and good. But I think we should make more use of the natural advantages to be found in our area. One of them is the tourist industry with all the developments it can bring in this area.

For several years, a lot has been said about industrial decentralization. I, for one, suggest that decentralization is urgent but talking is not enough: action must follow and the faster the better.

Dragging the channel and repairing the Montmagny wharf would greatly help the region. In my opinion Montmagny is the capital of the south shore. If industry is to be attracted a centre of attraction must be created and to do this the co-operation of government authorities at all levels is needed. And as the federal government swells its offers with the greater part of what the taxpayers must part with it is normal that the federal government should be responsible for the work of dragging the channel and repairing the wharf.

May I be allowed, Madam Chairman, to take this opportunity to thank the ex-minister of public works, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Dubé), for having accepted to put on the 1975-76 program an amount of $¼ million towards the rebuilding of the Montmagny wharf. I am asking the new minister to consider continuing his predecessor's program and I am confident of the minister's understanding and I congratulate him on his new post. I am also asking the minister to take into account the representations made to his department by the authorities of the city of Montmagny concerning the damages done each year by the spring break-up on the South River, near the Rivard bridge, in Montmagny. To prevent a recurrence of these damages, it would be absolutely necessary that a wall be built from the Rivard bridge towards the falls to eliminate the right angle which is the main cause of the damages suffered.

I also take this opportunity to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) to review legislation and regulations dealing with retaining walls along the St. Lawrence River. It is regrettable that retaining walls built some years ago are now in a deplorable state because they are not regularly repaired. They are in particularly bad shape along the coast opposite the Saint-Michel-de-Bellechasse municipality in Montmagny. The municipal authorities have often made representations for restoration or repairs to these retaining walls, but department employees always found the right answer to free themselves from that responsibility. Nevertheless, if the department feels that it must allocate too much money for maintenance, may we seriously—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allocated to him has now expired. There was agreement in the committee to limit speeches to 10 minutes. His 10 minutes have expired.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

I have never understood that there was an agreement on the votes of the department. There was an agreement on the others but not on this one, and I do not think I abused the time of the House this week on the votes; I would like to take a couple of minutes to conclude my speech.

[English]

Mr. Ellis: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. My understanding is that the agreement did not include any limitation with regard to speeches on Public Works.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think the agreement to limit speeches to ten minutes was for the balance of the time we were on Indian Affairs. I do not think we made any change regarding Public Works.

The Chairman: The Chair has no objection. The hon. member may complete his remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will bear in mind the representations I just made, and will find a way out of the embankment walls' lack of maintenance as soon as possible, so that the existing walls at least can be kept up.

I would also request the up-grading of the breakwater of the community of Berthier-sur-mer, which used to be called Berthier-en-Bas. In 1970, the department spent several thousands of dollars for repairs on that breakwater, which is of very great historical value. I know that won't earn people a living, but they value it a lot! I do think it is worth being maintained. That breakwater has been entered lately as a ruin on marine charts. I feel sorry about that. The hon. member for Bellechasse, who lives in Berthier-sur-Mer, deserves no credit for it. Moreover, the waters are quite deep in that area, and if the breakwater was upgraded, it could be put to a very practical use.

There is more and more talk about a Canadian merchant navy. If it becomes a reality some day, and the sooner the better, we shall be glad then to use that wharf. Finally, I thank the Minister for the upgrading work under way at the Montmagny federal building. I am sure the people will welcome it, and the civil servants who work in that building will feel more at ease and, consequently, will be more efficient in their work.

Those, Mr. Chairman, were the remarks I wanted to make on the occasion of the examination of these estimates. In the name of the South Shore people, I hope the Minister will see those representations in a favourable eye so that jobs be created in our area which experiences an unemployment rate of 11.3 per cent and so that our skilled workers be put to a better use for everyone's well being and in order to fight inflation efficiently.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to have the opportunity to participate in the discussion on the estimates this afternoon. Recently I spent a fair length of time on the same subject in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. I join many members on this side of the House who claim that we do not have enough time to scrutinize the accounts.

A Public Works project was before the standing committee for only one meeting. Given the usual delays, that meant we had only eighty minutes. Given the make up of the committee, this meant that my colleague and I had only a total of 28 minutes in which to examine the estimates of $522,747,000. If you break that down, approval had to come at approximately $315,000 per second.

It is bad enough that these huge amounts have to be considered with lightning speed, but the one man responsible for this budget, the Minister of Public Works, felt it was beneath him and did not bother to show up at the meeting at all. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River had the audacity on Wednesday to stand up in the House and lecture us, with his arrogant and insolent finger waving in the air, telling us that a careful examination of the estimates was needed. Of all the unmitigated gall!

Not only did he utter the most senseless drivel I have ever heard, but he did it from the Prime Minister's chair. He must have been swept away by delusions of grandeur. The minister did send along his deputy to the committee meeting together with his staff who, I guess, all told probably collect a few thousand dollars an hour. The deputy minister, Mr. MacDonald, is a very competent fellow. I found him to be knowledgeable and willing to co-operate. His answers sometimes contained that loquacious multisyllabic nomenclature typical of all senior civil servants.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Say that again.

Mr. Ellis: I am sure I can say it better the second time than I did the first. On the whole, he is an excellent administrator. However, I am sure he would be the first to admit that the responsibility must lie with the minister who has been elected and is responsible to this House. Nevertheless, the minister felt it was beneath him to attend the meeting. Perhaps he will understand that I am delighted to be here to put some questions on the record. I say "on the record" because I will put my questions in a list, and frankly I want the minister to answer them, but I expect I will run out of time. Perhaps he will have a chance to answer them later.

Coupled with the unwillingness of the minister to attend the meeting and be questioned is the matter of the annual report of the Public Works Department, which is usually the basis for a good deal of questioning. Although the minister may have inserted the document in the record somewhere, it was described by the deputy minister as an advance copy on October 15, and I did not see the document publicly placed on the record after that date. In fact the report must have been around for quite some time since it was over the signature of the former minister, the hon. member for Restigouche. Many of my questions will relate to that report.

But first I must question the sanity of a department which, even in these inflationary times, allows its budget to gallop along at the rate of 38 per cent in two years, from $375 million in 1972-73 to $520 million in 1974-75. Is it any wonder we have inflation? Can there be any question of who is feeding the most fuel on the fires of inflation? Some of the questions which I wish to put forward have to do with some comparisons that I have made.

In the annual report estimates, Place Guy Favreau in Montreal, Quebec, is shown at $173 million. The estimated total cost, however, in the 1973-74 estimates is shown at only $87 million. The previously estimated total cost was only $42 million. Is this building now going to cost four times what it was supposed to cost originally?

Also in Montreal is the M.A.P.P. building, which shows in the annual report at $184 million. It is placed in the estimates at which we are looking right now, at $53 million, and before that, for some unknown reason, a year earlier it was $3 million more, or $56 million. Again, is that building going to cost us three and a half times the price at which it was estimated originally?

There is a small building in Ottawa at which I look with real concern, namely, the building for the Department of Urban Affairs, the former LaSalle Academy. The annual report estimates it at $7 million. The estimates that we are given show it at only $5 million, and a year ago it was estimated at only $4.3 million. I strongly suspect this will be extremely expensive housing for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

The Toronto, Ontario, M.A.P.P. building presents an even stranger picture. The annual report estimates show it at $140 million. The estimate before us today shows it at $121 million, but the previous estimate shows it at $200 million. The previous year that same building was estimated at $80 million. From $80 million to $200 million, down to $121 million, and then back up to $140 million—surely someone must have a reasonable idea what this building will cost, but obviously it is not the Department of Public Works.

We do not have to restrict ourselves to these large buildings. We could consider a small government of Canada building in Nova Scotia which, two years ago, was estimated at $850,000. Now it is up to $2.4 million. Again there is one million dollars difference in what the estimates show. In Calgary, Alberta, we have a government of Canada building estimated at $25 million in the annual report. The previous estimates show it at only $18.5 million. There is one other government of Canada building on Sparks Street in Ottawa that is now listed at $56 million in the annual report. It is only $49 million in the estimates before us, and in last year's estimates it was to be only $36.7 million.

If we take those seven buildings we find that the difference between the estimates that we are asked to scrutinize and the estimates that are in the annual report vary by a total of $251.6 million. How are we supposed to make a reasonable scrutiny of two documents put out by the same department, supposedly at the same time, with a discrepancy of a quarter of a billion dollars? We cannot possibly come up with reasonable and sensible answers if this is the case.

I took a look at some of the other discrepancies. I was interested because members of parliament receive other documents besides the estimates. We also receive the Public Accounts books, and I thought it might be interesting to look at them to see what they had to say about some of the estimates. For example, we find at Acton Vale, which is somewhere in Quebec—I do not even know where—a little government of Canada building there for which there is a tender for $316,000. That may be a reasonable amount for that building; I do not know. The estimates say it was going to be $338,000. So, for a change, it appears to be within the budget.

The estimates for 1973-74 say $338,000, but the Public Accounts books say that a contract was let for $324,000, or a difference of $8,000. In addition, the Public Accounts estimate for 1973-74 was only $228,000. Public Accounts do not dream up those figures, they must get them from somewhere. I suggest they come from the department. If the department gives Public Accounts an estimate of $228,000 on the one hand and puts before the House of Commons a figure of $338,000 in the annual estimates, obviously something is wrong.

I am going to take a few more minutes to go through similar examples. At Beloeil, Quebec, a government of Canada building was shown, finally, at $599,900. That sounds like a good deal, but the estimates for 1974-75 showed $652,000, and the estimates for 1973-74 showed $814,000. While some of us might be accused of being gullible we do not believe that this building can have depreciated by 25 per cent while everything else has gone up in cost. So, I looked back at the Public Accounts estimate and found that their report for 1973-74 was $350,000. I wonder where Public Accounts got that estimate. If the Department of Public Works is giving out two sets of figures I should like to know why.

In Stouffville, Ontario, there is a little post office at $257,800 with the estimates showing previously at $342,000 and $325,000, while Public Accounts show $195,000. These figures vary too much for us to take reasonable cognizance of them, Mr. Chairman, yet we are told by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council that we have enough time to scrutinize them in committee.

There is one last thing that I want to bring to the attention of the committee. Assuming that the estimates given to us by the department are valid, let me just report four items that I have picked out across Canada.

The estimates show a renovation in Arvida, Quebec, at $281,000; the contract was let at $340,000, a considerable difference. In Downsview, Ontario, for a postal station the estimates show $290,000; the contract was $348,000. In St. John's, Newfoundland, another mail processing facility, the estimate was $3,700,000, and the actual contract $6,199,000. In Terrebonne, Quebec the estimates show $293,000, and the actual contract $343,000.

If this level of inflationary spending is to continue, I should like to know if the department is going ahead erecting every building it has on its drawing boards and inflating its budget completely out of reason. Would it not be better to slow down and look at government spending?

While I do not want to offend my friends in Alberta, nevertheless I find that a building is shown in Lethbridge, Alberta, for $22,159,885 and the contract let. I looked diligently but I could not find it anywhere in the estimates. I do not know where that one sprang from, Mr. Chairman. Somehow we dreamed up a building very quickly, but I could not find it in either book.

I merely want to say in closing that we have little enough time to scrutinize these estimates. The figures are stunning in size and complexity, and I think it is high time we had a different method of presenting them, and certainly a different method of studying them.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to abuse my privilege, but I would merely like to make a remark. I regret that, when we make claims for some retaining walls which were built a few years ago with the use of gabions—cylinders of wicker filled with stones—those gabions have completely deteriorated after decades and then we get to the department whose budget we are studying to find out that there is no money to provide for the maintenance and repair of those walls.

I think that if the government had retaining walls built, it is because they thought it was necessary to protect the banks, and it must act as any citizen would and provide for the upkeep of the property. And if it is left to individuals it would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian government should at least help them provide for the maintenance of those walls.

In the riding of Portneuf, Mr. Chairman, this problem is frequent and we are told there are no funds. I would like the Minister of Public Works to provide funds, at least to maintain the retaining walls already built in several places in the riding of Portneuf.

Mr. Chairman, I would also point out a certain lack of coherence which now and again becomes apparent in administrative decisions. In Cap-Santé, for example, also in the same electoral district, a boat landing has been built near the wharf. Unfortunately, there is no road from Cap-Santé to this wharf. Money has been invested for a boat landing but there is no road. If we ask for one, we are told there is no fund to solve this problem.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will now leave the floor to the next speaker.

[English]

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few questions for the minister. In the Department of Public Works annual report for the fiscal year April 1, 1973, to March 31, 1974, there is reference to the Enoch Indian Band Development Study. On October 22, 1973, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development invited the Department of Public Works property development branch to prepare a detailed feasibility study on the development of a native planned community for up to 40,000 people on the Enoch Indian reservation at Winterburn, Alberta.

This land was surrendered by the band for the purpose of generating revenues from leasehold developments. Indian Affairs set aside payment fees and expenses of $120,000. Has the Department of Public Works put any money into this project and, if so, how much?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I will not make a long speech because there is not time, but I shall try to reply briefly to some of the interventions.

The Chairman: Order, please. I wonder if the minister plans to take all the questions, or if I might recognize the hon. member for Chambly who indicated he had a question or two.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Chairman, a point of order—

The Chairman: I think I can foresee the point of order. Actually the hon. member sat down and the minister stood up thinking that the hon. member had completed his remarks.

Mr. Dick: It is question and answer. That is what this is all about.

The Chairman: Of course, but the Chair is not in a position to give the answer. That is up to the minister.

Mr. Elzinga: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I stated at the beginning of my comments that I had several questions.

The figures in the estimates indicate that 1,263 people are employed at the administrative level in the Department of Public Works. Is this total correct?

● (1550)

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, although I cannot answer completely accurately right away, the hon. gentleman was substantially correct. With respect to the project about which the hon. gentleman asked, the funds for it are provided entirely out of the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Chairman, I notice that the minister's budget provides for an expenditure of $520 million. Is the productivity of the department's administrative staff comparable with the productivity of people in the private sector, and I am excluding the building in which we are now speaking?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the building in which we are presently speaking comes under the jurisdiction of the Speaker; I will not comment on it. I can say that the productivity of the Department of Public Works is equal to and in many cases superior to that of the private sector.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question on behalf of a colleague who cannot be here. I understand that in the community of White Rock there is a breakwater type of harbour which is in serious disrepair. Does the Department of Public Works intend to bring that dock up to standard? Apparently it is dangerous right now. I gather there was some move to turn the facility over to the community, but the community cannot afford it.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, my answer will also interest the hon. member for Bellechasse. The development and, to some degree, maintenance of harbours, falls under two jurisdictions. Harbours devoted primarily to commercial purposes are the developmental responsibility of the Department of Transport, which determines priorities in this area and commissions the Department of Public Works to execute the necessary works.

With regard to fishing and pleasure or tourist harbours and marinas, development is the responsibility of the Department of the Environment. Funds available to the Department of the Environment are devoted to priorities established by that department. Again, the Department of Public Works is commissioned by either of those two departments to carry out the actual work. The Department of Public Works is responsible for the provision of technical advice. The responsibility for determining whether the work is to be carried out belongs either to the Minister of Transport or the Minister of the Environment.

Mr. Elzinga: Are projects carried out by the Department of Public Works on the basis of merit, or is there a formula under which the department allocates projects in accordance with some regional plan?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think the same question was asked in the standing committee, and the answer furnished by the deputy minister was substantially the same as the one I shall give. There is neither a cast iron nor rigid formula in the examination of any particular project. It is, however, looked at within a general framework. A variety of considerations have to be taken into account. Those considerations will vary with each project.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Chairman, I know this matter was brought up in committee but sometimes, as you know, there is a difference between what the minister says and what the individual appearing before the committee says. I thank the minister.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, some years ago, where retaining walls were concerned, the practice was that the Public Works Department was paying the cost when the channel was running within 2,000 feet of the shore line and if it was between 2,000 and 3,000 feet from it they paid 50 per cent of the cost and if it was 3,000 feet or more away from the shore, they paid one third of the cost.

I was surprised when after my election I came upon several reports on that subject. In my riding, many lots lie within 1,500 feet from the shore. I considered that problem with the officials of the department and the municipal authorities and yet there are no sustaining walls. The final answer that I received from the department was that they had not provided money in their budget for that purpose. I wonder if there is a policy on land ownership. Also they could have established a policy on the access to ownership. Maybe they could have also established a policy with respect to conservation of personal properties.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the question of sustaining walls is very interesting. Many years ago, a formula was devised concerning what we call water lots. There is also an alternative technique for retaining the ground. It seems that the method used in the water where water lots are concerned did not require any change while the method relating to ground is under current review. That is what I could answer now to the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Dick: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a question about the post office in the community of Kanata. When was the minister's department advised by the Post Office that they would not need the seventy linear feet in regard to lot boxes as door to door delivery is to be instituted?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's question demonstrates how unsatisfactory is this kind of colloquy, this questioning here. Neither I nor my officials have the specific information relating to the seventy feet not required by the post office at Kanata. We will have to get it. If that kind of question were asked in the standing committee, we could provide information on the spot because of the presence of sufficient numbers of officials with documentation.

Mr. Dick: I thank the minister for undertaking to provide that information. I bring this matter up because it raises a larger question. Since my election in January, 1973, I have written to the Post Office and been in communication with the Department of Public Works—

The Chairman: Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to the special order made on Thursday, October 3, 1974, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of Bill C-31.

Shall Schedule A carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether somebody could explain this phenomenon.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON VISIT

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to report to the House on my trip last week to western Europe. In doing so, I am very pleased to be able to say that in both Paris and Brussels I found evidence of considerable warmth towards Canada, considerable interest in Canadian attitudes, and considerable desire to seek a convergence of interests. I can assure this House, Mr. Speaker, that in those places and within the international organizations sited there, the reputation of Canada is high. I can assure the House equally that there exists within the governments of France, Belgium and Luxembourg a genuine and wholesome appreciation of the Canadian fact.

It goes without saying that the discussions in Paris with President Giscard d'Estaing and with Prime Minister Chirac and other ministers took place against a background of deep historical bonds and a shared culture of considerable richness. Of equal importance, however, they took place in an environment which acknowledged the distinctiveness of the Canadian entity and the modernity of Canadian accomplishments. There was evident in those meetings, a will to deal practically with issues; a desire to cooperate rather than compete, to participate rather than withdraw, to consult rather than assume.

We agreed while in Paris to launch two bilateral working groups each with an objective of identifying areas of fruitful cooperation in order to increase and diversify our volume of trade. Each is to conclude its work in time to report to the Canada-France Joint Economic Committee at its next meeting to be held in Ottawa in the first half of next year. One working group will concentrate on examining, without advance commitment, technological and trade investment possibilities with respect to petroleum, gas, coal and nuclear fuels, taking into account matters of interest to both sides. The other group will examine the rather broader area of trade potential in industrial sectors and in the first instance would concentrate on the transportation industry, dealing with French interests in railways and in helicopters and with Canadian interests in STOL aircraft and in all-terrain vehicles.

An indication of the importance attached to these decisions was the agreement that the next Joint Economic Committee meeting take place—for the first time—at the ministerial level.

Finally, it was recognized that the ultimate success of the work to be undertaken rested largely with private enterprise and that special efforts should be made to bring together French and Canadian businessmen in the coming months. In this connection, I have asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) to lead an official trade mission of Canadian businessmen to France in 1975.

[English]

In Brussels, where I profited from formal discussions with Prime Minister Tindemans and his cabinet colleagues, as well as with Prime Minister Thorn of Luxembourg, the same intensity of purpose was manifest: to build on the warm relations now existing with Canada, to intensify the contacts and exchanges now pursued, to support Canadian initiatives with the European community, to co-operate in multilateral sectors.

In Brussels too, as in Paris earlier in the week, there was broad agreement not simply on the identification of the major issues of global proportions but also on the postures which must be adopted with respect to them. We discussed, and agreed, that the dangers of nuclear proliferation demanded the design and implementation of more thorough and effective safeguards. We also agreed that the critical elements of the present state of the world economy—inflation, slow growth, balance of payments deficits, recycling, trade negotiations—demanded liberal and statesmanlike attitudes as distinct from cautious and protectionist ones. In this latter respect, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and I have now sought and received the views and understanding of no less than eight prime ministers and presidents in the last six weeks. We shall continue our efforts in weeks to come.

Western Europe is, of course, much more than the geographical location of several nation states. It is, as well, the site of a number of international organizations: in Paris, UNESCO and OECD; in Brussels, NATO, and others elsewhere. It is still something else; it is an evolving concept, a process, an idea to which dedicated men, in spite of formidable obstacles, are bending their efforts through the growing and ever maturing European community. This Europe is not the sum of the national parts; it exists of them and for them, yet it exists in addition to them. It is not enough, Jean Monnet was fond of saying, to add together the several sovereignties; men had to create the new Europe. They are now engaged slowly, sometimes painfully, in that creative process. This Europe, this entity of the future, is organic in nature. As yet, its potential size and strength and attitudes can only be conjectured. But one fails at one's peril to recognize the sense of destiny which fuels this evolution.

Our government recognizes that emerging fact, Mr. Speaker, and we applaud it. We applauded last week in Brussels, just as we applauded two years ago on the occasion of the entry into the community of Britain, Ireland and Denmark. And these expressions of understanding have coloured the way in which our current approach to the European community has been received. That initiative, Mr. Speaker, is no less and no more than to seek ways of engaging the community in a dynamic, co-operative enterprise.

We wish to add a new, yet parallel dimension to the expanding links we are already building with our partners among the nine member states; a relationship which will grow as the community itself moves from infancy through adolescence to full maturity; a relationship in which Canada's interests and its singular identity are recognized and reflected in decisions taken; a relationship in which consultation and reciprocal advice are accepted; a relationship, Mr. Speaker, of mutual respect, of give and take.

There is a degree of novelty to this exercise. The community, understandably, is as yet far from certain of the shape it will assume, the jurisdiction it will occupy, or the powers it will possess in years to come. Nor is it for Canada to say. This is a European exercise. Yet one thing is certain. It is that this new Europe—which already accounts for 20 per cent of world trade—will be an increasingly formidable actor on the world stage: in commerce, in science, in economic and financial activity, in technology and more. That being the case, it would be irresponsible for a Canadian government not to seek a distinctive relationship with it. Without question, such an exercise could be conducted along more familiar channels were we to wait a few years, as most other countries have apparently chosen to do. But that would ignore the advantages to be gained from engaging the community at an early stage; that would ignore the spirit of creativity which now permeates the community and to which we seek to contribute. Comfort and familiarity are not our criteria; benefit to Canada is.

This desire, this technique, this goal, is shared by the European commission, Mr. Speaker. Our discussions with President Ortoli, with Vice-President Soames and with other commissioners, left no doubt about this. There was a significant meeting of minds both on the concept of this new relationship and on the initial steps to set the process in motion. It is bound to be a lengthy process, but we must begin. As a result of my talks in Brussels, it was agreed that a new process would be initiated involving concrete steps to strengthen the links between Canada and the European community. The parties agreed to begin exploratory talks in the near future on the nature and scope of negotiations intended to define the form and content of the relationship between them.

For this purpose, Canadian and community officials have been instructed to schedule meetings without delay. In addition, the president of the commission has agreed to visit Ottawa at an early date. I am also pleased that a full delegation office will be opened in Ottawa in 1975, of the same nature as those already operating in Washington and Tokyo.

I invite all hon. members to share in this process. Happily, an increased opportunity to do so will soon exist as a result of a further agreement reached last week. While in Paris, I was able to announce, with the approval of the French Government, that the Canadian Government would open a Consulate General in Strasbourg. This office will permit a Canadian presence to be extended into an important region of France for the benefit of our commercial, cultural, information and immigration programs and for the extension of services to Canadian tourists and businessmen. It will also support an enhancement of present links between the Parliament of Canada and the Parliament of Europe, and with the Council of Europe. As Honourable Members are aware, the European Parliament is situated in Strasbourg, and is expected to perform an increasingly important role in the new European Community. I place great importance on such links and on the constructive contribution offered by Canadian parliamentarians. Again and again in Europe I was told of the respect and the high reputation which delegations from this Parliament have earned through their hard work when abroad. It was my good fortune to be in Paris while one such delegation was present and to note the great distinction with which it did its work.

I have already mentioned, Mr. Speaker, the presence in Paris and Brussels of several international bodies of considerable importance. I engaged in discussions with the principal officers of two of them—Secretary General Van Lennep of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and Secretary General Luns of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization—and gained from them assessments of the international situation as viewed from their special perspectives, as well as generous acknowledgements of the important contribution made by Canada to each. This opportunity extended, in the case of NATO, to a full working session with the North Atlantic Council in Brussels. I was able there to explore with the permanent representatives of the member countries the concepts enshrined in the Ottawa Declaration of Atlantic Principles and to provide assurance that Canadian commitment to those principles remained unimpaired. I was able as well to express Canada's distress that two NATO allies should be engaged in a dispute with respect to Cyprus, and Canada's interest in seeing an early and peaceful resolution of the conflict on that island, a conflict which has taken two Canadian lives and endangered many others.

[English]

A few years ago, Mr. Speaker, an experienced European commentator described Canada as "La dernière chance de l'Europe". It is not my place to comment on that observation. I do say, however, that Europe is une bonne chance, une grande chance, une chance très importante for Canada. That is why we have so studiously strengthened there our ties and our level of representation in recent years. In each of the cities I visited there are three Canadian embassies devoted to separate tasks, and three Canadian ambassadors of outstanding capabilities. I know, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will share with me my pride in the accomplishments of all of them and particularly, I am sure, of Canada's Ambassador to Belgium, our ex-colleague and your distinguished predecessor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should be less than gracious if I resumed my seat before paying tribute to the skill and dedication of those who accompanied me and who offered such valuable support in my discussions and negotiations. This group, comprised of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) and senior officials, functioned superbly. Representing, as they did, both of Canada's official linguistic communities and many regions of our country, these individuals demonstrated to me and to our hosts the advantages and the attainments of a bilingual government. I am proud of them and thank them in your presence.

I have not the slightest doubt that they and their colleagues will function equally as well during the several negotiations about to commence, and in the preparations for my return to Europe early in the new year. On that occasion, too, I trust I shall enjoy once again the pleasure of the company of the person who, without question, is Canada's fairest and foremost representative—my wife.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, let me begin my comments on a gracious note by saying how pleased we all are to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and Mrs. Trudeau back in Canada after their strenuous journey to Europe. I congratulate the Prime Minister on achieving the impression that this was a working trip. There were no bannisters, bobsleds or bugaloos getting attention on this foray. This in itself is progress. I understand there were attempts to whip up glitter and glamour as to what the trip was intended to accomplish.

An hon. Member: Weak.

Mr. Stanfield: My remarks are bound to be weak, coming after the lofty sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister a few moments ago. As I say, there was an attempt to whip up glamour as to what the trip was intended to accomplish. However, I understand the Prime Minister was pretty cool toward that approach to the extent of shooting down some of the most exuberant members of his entourage. For that I also congratulate him.

I say in all seriousness that it was unfortunate our general presentation, particularly that concerning the European common market, was not as thoroughly prepared as it might have been. It strikes me as strange that weaknesses in our presentation were not spotted, criticized and changed before we were on the firing line with them. The Prime Minister has to be subject to criticism in that regard. This was a highly personalized mission and the homework should have been better done before the fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

European Economic Community

Franco-Canadian relations are of particular significance to our country, both culturally and economically.

Beyond the warm welcome the French government extended to the Prime Minister, the setting up of two study groups in the fields of energy and industrial cooperation constitute tangible proof that our two countries are on the road to reconciliation, making up a seven year old breach.

Still, I deplore the fact that so few efforts were made in the past, and with such deliberation, with a view to taking much greater advantage of the European possibilities as a means of reducing Canada's dependence on foreign countries. I have now for a long time advocated the speedier development of our trade as a means of diversifying our economic relations.

[English]

After all, we in Canada have had a lot of time to look at Europe; a lot of time to formulate ideas and approaches. For far too long we neglected the European Economic Community, going along without diplomatic representation assigned specifically to the community. For most of the year 1970 we did not have an ambassador to Brussels or to the community. We created the impression in a good many circles that we were not really interested in the affairs of the European Economic Community. The government has recently made some efforts to correct that impression. The Prime Minister's visit was to be the culmination of those efforts. Therefore, there was a strong challenge to face in this aspect of the Prime Minister's European trip. There was more than ample time properly to prepare to meet the challenge.

I do not for a moment think that the Prime Minister should have been expected to come back with the Holy Grail, or anything like that. I am saying that our preparedness, in terms of presentation, was not up to scratch. With the time we had to prepare a solid case, there is no excuse for having presented something less than that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister spoke of a return visit to Europe early in the new year. I trust by that time our homework will be better done. There is some very real confusion about just what we were after and just what we were prepared to give in exchange. The Prime Minister's statement today does not clarify the matter to any degree of satisfaction. I hope he will be more frank and forthcoming in answering some questions on these points.

It seems the trip had three main areas of concern. First, to renew warm relations with the government of France. I certainly think this purpose was fully accomplished. Second, to touch base with regard to our commitment to collective security, NATO for example. Because of the Prime Minister's warm support for NATO over the years, there is no need for me to comment on that. Third, to explore possibilities of a contractual arrangement with the European Economic Community.

● (1430)

It is in relation to this third point that most of the confusion exists, and the Prime Minister does not really help to clear the air when he says things like this:

There was a significant meeting of minds on the concept of this new relationship and on the additional steps to set the process in motion.

If there was a significant meeting of minds on the concept, I wish the Prime Minister would tell us what the concept was.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Here is what the Prime Minister says they agreed on. Hon. members should listen to this with great care:

The parties agreed to begin exploratory talks in the near future on the nature and scope of negotiations intended to define the form and content of the relationship between them.

On page four of the Prime Minister's statement the word "posture" is used. It is not a word I would have chosen but perhaps it conveys more than it was intended to convey. I say this because the noun when it is verbalized indicates posturing. I have to say it looks to me like posturing as far as the EEC is concerned. Perhaps the Prime Minister would table the aide memoire sent to the EEC earlier in the year so that we can judge for ourselves.

I am disappointed that the Prime Minister did not take the House into his confidence today. I had hoped for an open review of the intentions of the government toward the EEC—a guide to the kind of association the government of Canada is seeking. We did not get that at all. If the Prime Minister would take this as coming from a native Nova Scotian, all we got today was a bag of fog.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party wish to join with other members in this chamber in extending a welcome to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on his return from his eventful journey. The trip the Prime Minister made did not produce any spectacular announcements. Nevertheless, the fact that the discussions took place was in itself worthwhile.

At this period in world history when we are faced with inflation on a global scale, when there is growing concern about the diminution of many of our basic natural resources, there is a great danger that many nations will resort to protectionism, a course which can only lead to trade wars. For a country such as Canada which is so dependent upon international trade, such a situation would be abhorrent. For this reason, any discussions in which the Prime Minister takes part with heads of other governments, whether in Europe or elsewhere, must be welcomed. The Prime Minister referred to his discussions with the high officials of the French government. I am somewhat concerned that he would say, on page two of his statement:

One working group will concentrate on examining, without advance commitment, technological and trade investment possibilities with respect to petroleum, gas, coal and nuclear fuels, taking into account matters of interest to both sides.

When one combines this statement with the statement which was attributed to the Prime Minister by the press while he was in Brussels to the effect that Canada is in the process of reviewing its resource policies, and that those who were interested in the development of resources had better get on the band wagon, it becomes apparent that there is at least some reason for our concern. This, to me, looks like an open invitation—an indication that we are prepared to allow our resources to be used as a bait to attract investment and enlarge our trading opportunities by trading them off in a process of quid pro quo. I want to suggest that this is a dangerous path. We have trodden it particularly in our relations with the United States and it will be no less abhorrent in our relations with Europe. The resources at our disposal in Canada are limited in quantity. Some of them are disappearing rapidly. It is likely we shall face difficult problems in future years, particularly with respect to energy supplies, and for us to suggest we are in a position to invite other countries to come in and share in the development of our petroleum, gas, coal and nuclear fuels will, it seems to me, start a trend for which future generations of Canadians will pay dearly.

On page four of the statement the Prime Minister refers to his discussions with the EEC in Brussels. He says:

We agreed that the dangers of nuclear proliferation demanded the design and implementation of more thorough and effective safeguards.

As to the record, I think all of us would agree. What is needed, however, is some statement from the government, particularly from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) as to any specific safeguards which are being implemented. The safeguards provided in the past have not proved to be effective. In any case, the situation has changed very radically because the by-products of nuclear plants generating electricity can now be used to make nuclear bombs. Consequently, the problem of safeguarding the use of our uranium is more complex than it was a few years ago. I believe the rhetoric of our Prime Minister, the meeting of minds in Brussels in respect of adequate safeguards, is something which ought now to reveal itself in terms of effective regulations so that we can be assured that Canadian uranium, or uranium from any other country if it comes to that, will not be used to enable irresponsible nations to produce atomic weapons which could very well destroy the world.

The Prime Minister is quite right when he says, on page seven of the statement, that it would be irresponsible for a Canadian government not to seek a definitive relationship with the EEC. The fact is that for at least the last ten years members of this party have repeatedly asked successive Liberal ministers of trade and commerce what they were doing with regard to seeking some type of associate membership in the EEC or some trading relationship with that organisation. It is true we were told that some discussions were going on between officials of our Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the governments of Europe and the EEC, but there had been no attempt until now by the head of a Canadian government, after more than 10 years of having Liberal governments occupy the treasury benches, to reach some agreement with the European Economic Council. If as the Prime Minister says it is irresponsible for a Canadian government not to have sought some distinctive relationship, then the blame for following an irresponsible policy must lie with the gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches.

The Prime Minister made some proposals to the EEC when he was in Brussels and press reports have said that the EEC representatives thought the proposals were banal. I should like to know what those proposals were or what type of proposals the government put before the EEC. What are we to envisage? Are we seeking some type of associate membership or are we seeking some type of trade agreement? What are the proposals the government put before them? They are 10 years late in making any kind of proposal, but surely now any proposal ought not to be so meaningless that it is described by the EEC as being banal.

If these proposals are not merely a public relations exercise, surely we ought to know what they are and the reason the members of the EEC were not prepared to accept them. Even though we have been late in recognizing the trade potential of the EEC that is no reason we should not press on now. I hope the government will be much more zealous in pursuing this matter now than it has been in recent years.

As far as this party is concerned I want to say that in pursuing agreements for increased trade it should be made abundantly clear that the natural resources of Canada which we so deeply need and which ought to be processed, and if possible turned into manufactured goods in this country, should not be put up for auction to the multinational corporations of Europe, the United States or anyplace else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must apologize for not having had the time to glance at the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who came back from France in perfect health. Still, I want to congratulate him and join my colleagues in welcoming him back.

The Prime Minister probably came back from France in six or seven hours. As for me, it took me 16 hours and a half to come back from the Lac-Saint-Jean.

Today, the matter of time is very relative over certain distances, since everything depends on the means of transportation. This is the reason why I did not have time to get prepared to answer the Prime Minister's statement.

I simply want to make a few comments on what he has just said as far as the proposed establishment of study groups on economic, trade and technical matters is concerned. I want to express all the happiness we, French Canadians, felt when we read in the newspapers that the Prime Minister of Canada would go to Paris. After waiting for several years, the French speaking people of Canada were glad to read that the Prime Minister would at last meet representatives of the second mother country, in order to renew old friendships. I think that meeting was logical and normal.

Following the Prime Minister's journey through the press, radio and television, I realized that this visit of the Prime Minister of Canada to France was of current interest. It was even eagerly awaited by the French government. Judging by the way the talks developed, I think everything went well. I hope the proposed working groups will take shape shortly, and that we will be able to say that Canada gets as much from its dealings with France as with Great Britain or any other country.

Today, in its international relations, it is imperative that Canada step up contacts with other countries, increase international agreements in order to lay the old myth to rest, namely that we must always deal first with a North American country. I believe that will be beneficial to Canada. That visit to France has enabled the Prime Minister to open a door to the European Common Market. European trade is developing more and more and I believe that Canada has to be part of it.

The Prime Minister also talked about his visit to NATO. He stated that Canada's contribution to NATO would continue. As for me, I hope that it will get larger, and I believe that all those who have had the opportunity to sit in at NATO conferences will agree with that. I already had the opportunity on three occasions to attend such meetings in Paris and in Brussels, and I realized then the need for such international associations for a country that wishes to play a part in this world and to keep pace with other countries.

I believe that all those agreements are necessary to Canada and I hope that this government and the Prime Minister will pursue such conversations with other industrialized countries so as to enable Canada to play a still greater part, so that we may feel more free, more independent and be able to live alongside great industrialized countries without any embarrasment whatsoever.

We are happy to welcome the Prime Minister back and I hope that the talks he has and the contacts he made in Europe will soon bear fruit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NEWSPAPER COLUMN BY PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek leave of the House to propose a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the venture into the field of journalism which appeared in the October 23 issue of the Lanark Era and other weeklies in Canada headed "Priorities for the Thirtieth Parliament, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Prime Minister". Seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) I seek leave to move:

That in the opinion of the House newspaper columns dealing with government policy, which are represented as written by the Prime Minister or by any member of cabinet, but which have actually been written by Liberal Party of Canada employees, constitute misleading the Canadian people, possible manipulation of the press for political purposes and they should cease forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the proposed motion. With all due respect to the hon. member I should re-read the provisions of Standing Order 43 which are as follows:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

Although I do not propose to frequently intervene in respect of the interpretation of urgent and pressing necessity, in this case I must say that the terms of the motion do not qualify in this regard.

Mr. Cossitt: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is basically this. I submit that under the rules it is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity when a form of fraud is committed on the Canadian people in an article purported to be written by the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

PUBLIC SERVICE

USE OF TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES AT TAXATION DATA CENTRE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I am prompted by the recent attempts by the Public Service of Canada to obtain, through newspaper advertisements and householder mailings, thousands of inexperienced temporary employees for the Taxation Data Centre in Ottawa, who will become eligible for unemployment insurance benefits at the end of the peak season. This situation exists, Mr. Speaker, because the Taxation Data Centre is a major employer of keypunch operators in Ottawa and the government has made inadequate attempts to spread the workload over the year or to use experienced people already on unemployment insurance or to disentitle part-time or seasonal workers from unemployment insurance benefits. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry-Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling)

That this House instruct the departments of National Revenue, Manpower and Immigration, and Finance, to co-operate in devising a method of filling the government's needs for temporary workers without imposing an unemployment insurance burden on the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion being proposed under Standing Order 43 which requires the unanimous consent of the House before debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent the motion cannot be put.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRANSPORT—TRANSOCEANIC LANDING FEES

Question No. 86—Mr. Marshall:

What schedule of landing fees has been established for overseas stops at Newfoundland airports (a) Stephenville (b) Gander (c) St. John's (d) Goose Bay (e) Deer Lake?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The following schedule of transoceanic landing fees is applicable at all airports operated by the Ministry with the exception of technical landings while on transoceanic flights at the Gander and Ottawa International Airports and the Goose Bay Airport: per 1,000 pounds or fraction thereof of the aircraft's weight: $1.33 for aircraft weighing not more than 90,000 pounds; $1.40 for aircraft weighing more than 90,000 pounds but not more than 125,000 pounds; $1.46 for aircraft weighing more than 125,000 pounds but not more than 150,000 pounds; $1.51 for aircraft weighing more than 150,000 pounds.

The landing fee for technical landings while on transoceanic flights at the three airports is 50 cents per 1000 pounds or fraction of the aircraft's weight, with a further reduction at the Gander International Airport as follows: Where arrangements are made in advance with the officer in charge of Gander International Airport by any person, the landing fee for technical landings during a twelve month period of all aircraft operated by that person and landed at that Airport is calculated on the accumulated weight of the aircraft landings as follows: 50 cents per 1000 lbs. on the first 65,000,000 pounds; 45 cents per 1000 lbs. on the next 16,250,000 pounds; 40 cents per 1000 lbs. on the next 16,250,000 pounds; 35 cents per 1000 lbs. on the next 16,250,000 pounds; and 30 cents per 1000 lbs. on excess of 113,750,000 pounds. A technical landing is for the purpose of obtaining ground service for aircraft on transoceanic flights. The special rate was introduced to develop revenue by attracting aircraft to those airports in Canada which are in a competitive position relative to airports in the United States situated within the flight path of aircraft on transoceanic flights.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—PROPOSALS MADE BY CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can or will give us a little clearer idea concerning the sort of relationship the government is seeking with the European Economic Community as this does not seem to be very clear from the statement he made today which indicated simply that there would be a study group established to study what kind of relationship Canada wanted with the European Economic Community.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in an aide mémoire of several months ago we proposed to the committee a general approach, declaration and eventually trade agreement between the community and Canada. At a later stage we talked about contractual relationships. Both these were discussed and envisaged during my discussions with the community. They put forward other types of formulae which they were trying out on us. We said we would be very glad to discuss any other approach they wanted to discuss bilaterally. Of course, it is not for me to say what the commission is thinking and doing. We can only speak for the Government of Canada. But I did indicate interest in looking at any other approach which would create this distinctive relationship between the community and Canada which we would be very glad to discuss.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AIDE MÉMOIRE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that negotiations must to some extent be confidential while going on but nevertheless in view of the importance of any such relationship to the people of this country and in view of the common practice of any country considering entering into an arrangement with the common market telling its own people what kind of arrangement generally it is seeking, would the Prime Minister table the aide mémoire indicating to the Common Market the kind of relationship Canada was seeking and also would the Prime Minister table any document indicating the kind of contractual relationship Canada is seeking in addition to or as an alternative to the trade proposals.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course the Leader of the Opposition is quite right. The people of Canada and members of the House of Commons are very closely concerned with what went on in these discussions. The Leader of the Opposition will remember that in this House two weeks ago in answer to a question, I believe by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, I indicated there would be nothing concluded at this stage, that we were discussing various approaches and that before anything was finalized certainly there would be discussion in this House.

As to the suggestion about tabling the aide mémoire and that trade agreement, I think it is a reasonable request. I have already discussed it with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We see no objection, but before giving a firm undertaking I want to make sure that the view I get from the department is that it can in no way harm the future round of discussions. I do not think they will say no. I think in a sense this is une étape, a stage, which has been overtaken. We put these propositions to the Community to put our foot in the door so to speak and so that we could have discussions with them. Now that the discussions are open and they have agreed to continuing them, I see no difficulty in tabling these documents. But, I repeat, I would like to assure myself that there is not some hidden reason which I do not know.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—POSITION ON ACCESS OF COMMUNITY TO CANADIAN RESOURCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I assume from the Prime Minister's reply that it has been agreed that discussions be continued but that nothing specific is being discussed at present, or rather that a number of alternatives are being discussed at present.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the report, the indication or the hint of the Prime Minister, or even, to state it more strongly than that, his statement was correct that if the European countries were to have access to our raw materials they would have to be prepared to enter into some appropriate arrangement with Canada; they could not just continue to take for granted reasonable access to these raw materials in Canada without entering into some bigger deal.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question I must say that the assumption is ill founded. It is not true to say that nothing precise was discussed. I repeat: several months ago the aide mémoire, and then the trade agreement were put before the Community, and in my discussion with Mr. Ortoli, Mr. Soames and other commissioners, it was obvious to me that our ambassador and officials have done a great deal of work because when I went to discuss the documents with them, they were obviously well known to them and they had thought about them and thought beyond that. So, concrete work has been done by our ambassador and officials.

On the second and unrelated part of the question, the view I took with regard to our raw materials is that we sell them to other countries but we have various policies as conditions to such sales. I mentioned, of course, our policy on upgrading, on control of export of energy, and on seeking greater benefit for Canada from all forms of foreign investment through our Foreign Investment Review Act. These are all explanations I put to the commission on the one hand and bilaterally to France, Belgium and Luxembourg on the other. Nothing was said there which is not already well known as being part of the policy of the government of Canada.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF SPECIFIC AGREEMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the Prime Minister's quest on behalf of Canada to obtain special trading arrangements with the European Economic Community, does he believe that during the past week in his conversations with the officials of the EEC he received anything more than a very polite brush off from these gentlemen, and if he did, could he indicate one specific agreement which he received which would lead to increased trade between Canada and the EEC in the future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member refers to the questions he asked me a couple of weeks ago, he will find I went to great pains and at great length to explain to him that we were not seeking any preferential arrangements. However, the hon. member chooses to ask questions and not to listen to answers, thus demonstrating each time that his ignorance of the whole thing is abysmal.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as it has been known for many months in the government and outside that what Canada had in mind, and what the Prime Minister originally had in mind, was to obtain such a special arrangement with the EEC and that he only came off that pitch within the last couple of weeks before his trip was made when it became evident that we could not get such an arrangement, I still ask him: did he obtain any specific agreement that would lead to greater Canada-EEC trade in the future? Just answer the question, if you please.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have ruled before and I will, if need be, again, that a question asked a second time cannot be regarded as a supplementary.

IMMIGRATION

HAITIANS—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION AS REFUGEES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the minister's reiteration of Canada's policy of concern for the persecuted and displaced, and of consideration for victims of oppression, will the minister look into the facts surrounding a group of Haitians who have been refused re-entry into their country, according to the Haitian secretary of state speaking for the president of their country, and will the minister invite the Immigration Appeal Board to exercise its humanitarian jurisdiction in favour of this group if he finds that they are indeed refugees and face reprisals if they return to their own country?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are applying the principles of compassion and humanitarian consideration to these applications. If my memory serves me right, we had about 28 specific applications from Haitians, who otherwise would be asked to leave the country, on the basis of being refugees. Such applications will continue to be dealt with on their merits. There is not a declaration of a mass refugee situation but each individual application is placed before either an interdepartmental committee on refugees or the Immigration Appeal Board.

Mr. Brewin: The minister, as the respondent for the cases before the board, has a right to make representations. If he finds these are proper cases and that they may be refugees, will he make representations that they be allowed to stay in this country?

Mr. Andras: We are giving these applications full consideration within the department, and we will take such appropriate measures as appear wise and justified.

FOODSTOCKS AND PRODUCERS' INCOME—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence I will direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister.

During the week-end we unfortunately witnessed incidents of some violence in the province of Quebec. Farm producers showed their discontent because of a lack of income.

Since a federal-provincial meeting requested by the Prime Minister of Canada is scheduled for this week, I would like to ask him whether the matter of food supply in particular will be discussed at that important meeting to ensure that Canada has adequate foodstocks and that food production in Canada is a viable operation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of the meeting to be held Wednesday at my request will be to discuss the problem of inflation in Canada. As the hon. member knows, the policy of the government is to ensure an adequate food supply. It is quite likely that the question referred to by the hon. member will somehow come up at that meeting.

EMPLOYMENT OF RENÉ MANTHA BY FIRM UNDER CIDA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs following upon a question I asked the other day. Is the minister now prepared to make a full report as to all the circumstances concerning the relation to the government of Canada of Mr. René Mantha who has been called back to testify before the Cliche Commission, has applied for federal pardon, and is now or has been recently working in Africa under the auspices of CIDA?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I undertook to report to the hon. gentleman when I receive information that I require in order to make an answer. I have not yet received satisfactory information. When I do, I will be happy to oblige.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBLE CONSULTATION WITH PRIME MINISTER ON PERSONS APPEARING BEFORE CLICHE COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, can I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister and ask if he personally was consulted regarding any relation to the federal government of any of the individuals who have appeared or are being called before the Cliche Commission and if so, can he advise by whom he was consulted and in regard to which individuals?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I was not consulted as to any individuals who might appear. Of course, the question is very vague. I do not know what individuals the hon. member is referring to but I have no memory of having been consulted on any appearance before the Cliche Commission.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, may I ask the indulgence of the House to revert to a question put by the hon. member for Rocky Mountain who has just left. I want to put on the record that I took his words literally; I have not been consulted. If he wanted to know if I had been advised of any people being involved in the hearings before the Cliche Commission, the answer would have been yes.

CYPRUS—POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF CANADIAN CONTINGENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the absence of the Minister of National Defence and ask whether the government has any intention of using the HMCS Preserver when it goes to Egypt to resupply, in a sense, the Canadian forces there for the purpose of removing the Canadian contingent in Cyprus?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no information on that.

INDUSTRY

LUMBER—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO IMPROVE MARKETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but in his absence I shall direct it to the right hon. the Prime Minister. With the decline in housing starts approaching something like 50 per cent in Canada, which is bringing about a disastrous situation in our production of lumber especially in Nova Scotia where Bowaters Mersey has announced the closing of its Bridgewater mill in December since they say they have no lumber sales for 1975, what steps is the Prime Minister taking to improve our lumber markets which appear to have gone to pieces all at once throughout the length and breadth of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to take notice of the question on behalf of the minister who is leading a trade mission to Brazil and who will be back very shortly.

CRASH OF ARMED FORCES PLANE IN MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I will put to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence and perhaps he will take it as notice. Has the minister yet received a report on the plane crash which resulted in the deaths of several Canadian members of the armed forces serving in UNEF in the Middle East? If there is such a report could it be made public? Was there evidence the crash occurred because the plane was fired upon?

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have no definite information on this yet but I shall look into the matter and give the information to the hon. member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NEWSPAPER COLUMNS BY CABINET MINISTERS—INQUIRY AS TO SOURCE OF MATERIAL AND RESPONSIBILITY FOR COST

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and refers to a statement in the Lanark Era which says members of the federal government intend to write a series of articles for weekly newspapers during this session of parliament for the purpose of keeping Canadians informed on government affairs. I should like to ask the Prime Minister who is producing these columns and if the production costs are coming from public funds?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment on what the Lanark Era said, but on the substance of the articles sent to various weeklies with which we feel it very important for the federal government to remain in contact, I would say it will probably depend on which minister. In my case, I am submitted a draft which I look through and sometimes modify. I would think in other cases the ministers themselves will write the articles or submit pieces based on excerpts from their speeches. I forgot the latter part of the question about whether public funds would be involved. The answer is, of course not.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that all government policies during the election campaign had to be cleared through Liberal campaign chairman, Senator Davey, and given the tendency of those opposite to confuse government statements with Liberal Party propaganda, will the Prime Minister take steps to correct the understanding that these columns are authorized government publications?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the misunderstanding is probably only in the mind of the hon. member.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): No, indeed.

POWDERED SKIM MILK—MEASURES TO ASSURE CONSUMERS BENEFIT FROM SUBSIDY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of a report by the Food Prices Review Board that powdered skim milk prices in stores in British Columbia, Manitoba, Quebec and Nickel Belt—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: —I am glad hon. members recognize the fine distinction—are not reflecting the full benefit of the 24 cents per pound government subsidy, and in view of the advice of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to consumers that they should switch to skim milk powder because it is much more economical now that the subsidy on liquid milk has been withdrawn, will the minister inform the House what measures he intends to take to ensure that processors and retailers comply with the subsidy program?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the long involved preamble to the question, but will say that our officials are aware of the situation and have been discussing it with the Dairy Council and the Retail Council of Canada. Some non-conforming outlets are being informed that unless prices are brought into line immediately the subsidy will be withdrawn from them.

In view of what appears to be fraudulent business practice by powdered skim milk processors and retailers in not passing on to consumers the benefit of the federal government's 24 cents per pound subsidy, will the minister inform the House what steps will be taken by his department to recover the money which has been stolen from the public treasury?

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise whether an ongoing watch is being kept in this regard?

METROCENTRE PLAN, TORONTO—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL SUPPORT

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The mayor of Toronto made a statement today in connection with the council of Toronto supporting the MetroCentre plan subject to certain conditions being honoured and certain co-operation being derived from the federal government. Can the minister advise that the government will be co-operating closely with the city of Toronto to ensure that this project goes forward?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the precise nature of the mayor's announcement but I have had discussions with him on several occasions relating to different programs. A very fruitful area for discussing the plan would seem to be the Railway Crossing Relocation Act, if the province of Ontario would agree that this is a program in which they wish to participate as other provinces have.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DEER LODGE HOSPITAL—POSSIBLE TRANSFER TO PROVINCE OF MANITOBA

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs with regard to the Deer Lodge Military Hospital in Winnipeg. On October 16, at the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs the minister stated that no negotiations were being held with regard to transferring the responsibility of Deer Lodge Hospital to the province of Manitoba because of the objections from the Canadian Legion. On October 22, the Deputy Minister, Dr. John Hodgson, stated he was not aware that negotiations had ended but, in fact, they were going very well. As there appears to be a lack of communication between the minister and his deputy on this subject, will he now clarify the transfer situation?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost there is no lack of communication in my department. Negotiations concerning Deer Lodge are the subject of discussion at any time. The statement I made to the hon. member in the Veterans Affairs committee was that the provincial command of the legion had passed a resolution expressing its desire that no transfer be made. That resolution still stands and my statement was to the effect that this resolution stands. That is still the situation, sir.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the chairman of Manitoba Health Services is as confused as everybody else. He has had negotiations with the deputy and has had correspondence with regard to the transfer. So, the minister has not clarified anything.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED BOYCOTT OF POSTAL CODE BY EMPLOYEES—MEASURES TO IMPROVE SERVICE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. What steps has the minister's department taken to end the ongoing boycott of the postal code by post office employees, or is he agreeing with the employees and considering some alterations to the postal code system?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no evidence that any such boycott or proposed boycott has any detrimental effect on the movement of mail.

Mr. Jelinek: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Boycott buttons are available. I will send the minister one after the question period. As most members of this House see daily examples of poor mail delivery from all parts of Canada and as some cases involving business mail delays in postal service bring financial setbacks—for example, in Toronto an important business document was mailed in that city on September 25 and received a few blocks away on October 8—can the minister tell the House what positive steps, if any, are being taken by his department to improve the totally unacceptable postal service Canadians are being asked to take for granted.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the first thing we are not doing is casting aspersions on the 53,000 postal workers who are doing their very best to provide service under existing conditions. Second, we are keeping an eye on the efficiency of the post office, which has been rising weekly for the last three months. Third, I suggest to the hon. member that he visit a branch with me as other hon. members have and he will be satisfied that the morale of the post office is quite high and that service is up to normal.

NATIONAL PARKS

ASSURANCE REQUESTED THAT GUIDES ARE BILINGUAL

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who is responsible for national parks.

Could the minister tell the House if information officers in national parks throughout Canada, whose mission is to offer guidance to people, have a sufficient knowledge of both official languages and, if not whether he intends to take any action to remedy the situation?

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I understand that efforts are made to provide brochures as far as possible in both official languages and personnel are on hand to deal with visitors in both official languages.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: I do not think the hon. Minister understood my question. It was as follows: do the tourist information officers in Canada's national parks have a knowledge of both official languages sufficient enough to be able to provide adequate information to tourists, whether they are Canadians or foreigners? If not, does he have the intention to take the necessary steps to correct the situation?

[English]

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I understand that personnel are available at every national park who can communicate with visitors in both official languages. For instance, yesterday I was at Point Pelee with a person from France. There were people at the interpretation centre who explained things in French and in English. The same is true of the guided tour. I think that is the policy in all our national parks.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MARITIME PROVINCES—ALLEGED GLOOMY ECONOMIC FORECAST BY PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT—PARTICIPATION BY DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. On Friday last the Montreal Gazette carried a streamer which read: "Good decade seen for all but the Maritimes." The story then went on to refer to a study undertaken by the federal Public Works Department—

An hon. Member: Come to the question.

Mr. Hogan: I am coming to the question—which came to the above gloomy conclusion concerning the development of the Atlantic provinces in the next decade. Will the minister tell us if he intends to table the study done by officials of his department.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen this particular study but will inquire and provide the hon. gentleman with the answer.

Mr. Hogan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House if the officials who did the study had the cooperation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in doing it? I ask this because it seems to me to indicate that the Atlantic region cannot expect in the next decade to improve its economic position under DREE policies.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I will take note of that question, too.

OIL SANDS—SUGGESTION SHELL OIL OF UNITED STATES DESIRES TO SELL ITS INTEREST—POSSIBLE CANADIAN BUYER

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, may I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As Shell Oil of the United States wants to dispose of its half interest in its oil sands property, is the minister aware of any other Canadian group, such as Canada Development Corporation, which is willing to pick up this valuable property.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any at the moment. The position of Shell Oil of the United States basically stemmed from the fact that there could be no assurance that the firm would obtain export permits for this oil or a tax write-off arising from the property. I am sure that, in addition to the CDC, the Ontario Energy Corporation or even the Alberta Energy Corporation might be interested in this particular development.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—ESCAPE OF FIVE INMATES—REASON FOR AVAILABILITY OF GUMS AND SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS ISSUED BY MINISTER

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Solicitor General concerns the continuing mystery surrounding the escape of five extremely dangerous inmates from Laval maximum security institution. Is the minister now in a position to advise the House how an accomplice was able to smuggle a bag with two guns and a rifle into that institution, why the special instructions of the minister to the commissioner concerning these inmates were not followed and why the minister was not advised of the warning given by the Quebec Provincial Police three weeks before that the escape would be attempted.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked several questions. I will try to deal with them all. First, it seems that the guns were smuggled into the visiting room of that penitentiary because the regular checks were not made. Why they were not made on that occasion I still do not know. I still have not obtained the answer. As to the second question asked by the hon. member, who asked why I was not advised about the letter from the Quebec Provincial Police saying that there might be an escape from the institution, I can only say that many letters are received of this nature from time to time, most of them turning out to be negative, not positive. It is not the custom of the penitentiary authorities to let the minister know about every letter which warns of an escape. I do not know if I dealt with all the hon. member's questions. There were three or four; I am not sure if I can remember the others.

Mr. O'Sullivan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Why did the minister take such a special interest in these inmates that he issued special instructions that they be guarded with extra care. Why did he issue special instructions if he did not think they were going to escape and if he was not warned that they would attempt to escape. Further, why were not these instructions carried out?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I issued special instructions with respect to some of the inmates because they had escaped last June, in the middle of the election campaign.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did they vote Liberal?

● (1530)

Mr. Allmand: Several of them had escaped previously. I felt this was a serious matter. I asked that these particular inmates be given additional surveillance because they were dangerous and known to be very adept at escaping from penitentiaries. It was for that reason I did this.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, is the minister advising there is a special policy for escapes that take place during election campaigns?

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker. There is a special policy for people who escape, are dangerous and have a record of escapes.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It adverts to a question asked him October 10. It is prompted by his remarks over the weekend regarding the World Food Conference in Rome. Has the government now decided what our contribution will be to this very, very important issue and when will the minister tell the House what Canada will be doing?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, very soon the final decisions will be taken. I did say I would consider making a statement in general terms about the attitude the government will take, although I did mention on Friday, I believe in response to a question from the hon. member for Greenwood, that it would be inappropriate at this point to disclose the details of specific responses or undertakings that might be made by the government. In my view, these undertakings ought to be made at the conference where they may have some impact on the attitude of other member states.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is working on a position or a posture.

Does he intend to accept the challenge from the hon. Jérôme Choquette, Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec, who asked that a televised debate be held on the matter of cost sharing as far as police forces are concerned?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I received a long letter from the attorney general of Quebec replying to my earlier letter to him regarding police costs in Quebec. At the end of his letter he challenged me to a debate on television with respect to this matter. I spoke to him by telephone soon after receiving the letter. He clarified some points in the letter. SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—ASSURANCE INTERPROVINCIAL PIPELINES WILL PROCEED WITH CONSTRUCTION—DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the present status of the proposed pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal. In view of the fact the hearings before the National Energy Board on this application were adjourned sine die at the request of Interprovincial Pipelines in order that they might seek assurance from the minister regarding a guarantee of throughput, I wish to ask the minister two short questions. First, has the minister met with the officials of Interprovincial Pipelines and has he reached some agreement that will ensure the pipeline will be proceeded with in the near future? Second, in view of these discussions with Inter-provincial, can he now give some date when he expects the pipeline will be completed?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, late last week my officials met with officials of the company who set out for government officials some of the financial circumstances causing them concern and some possible methods of overcoming these. A meeting which would have taken place has been adjourned until later this week so that my officials will have a chance to examine these proposals. I will then have an opportunity of considering them prior to meeting with the officials of the company. It is our wish to resolve as soon as possible this one remaining question with regard to the pipeline so that it can go ahead at the earliest possible date.

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONSTRUCTION OF ALTERNATIVE NORTHERN ROUTE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Sarnia to Montreal route was accepted in preference to an all-Canadian northern route merely because the former would be completed in 1975, and it appears that this will now be 1976, is the government considering reverting to the northern route in order that we might have oil supplied through that route which would give us security of supply?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): That might ultimately come, Mr. Speaker. With the greater security I agree. The time frame, of course, would still be extended beyond the time for completion of a Sarnia to Montreal connection. Of course, the financial exposure of all involved, whether the government of Canada or the company, would be very much greater. It would appear to be a thousand mile longer route than that which is proposed.

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF CONSTRUCTION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary. If there continues to be delay by Interprovincial, is the government willing to itself build a pipeline and put it under the jurisdiction of the proposed Canadian petroleum corporation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have taken very careful note of the cooling ardor of Interprovincial Pipelines in this regard. The possibility suggested by the hon. member is one we have indeed been considering.

INCOME TAX

EFFECT OF INDEXING PROVISION—NUMBER OF TAXPAYERS REMOVED FROM TAX ROLL

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's statement on Friday that he would be saving taxpayers' money in 1975 as a result of indexing of taxation, will he state if in fact an average taxpayer who simply preserves his buying power in 1975 through a wage increase or otherwise will pay less federal tax in 1975 than in 1974 or is it not correct the person who runs hard to stand still in buying power will have to pay more federal tax in 1975 than this year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of indexing is to attempt to restore to the taxpayer what inflation would have done to his income tax bracket by putting him into a higher bracket. It is true that indexing does not wholly compensate certain brackets for the total effects of inflation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, in the same press release the minister indicated he would remove 225,000 taxpayers from the tax roll. Can he indicate whether any of those 225,000 were included in the one million he dropped from the rolls in his May 8, 1972 budget speech or the three quarter million which he dropped February 19, 1973 and the many hundreds of thousands he dropped in his last budget speech, bearing in mind Department of National Revenue returns show that the number of Canadian taxpayers increase year by year or is the minister in fact recycling taxpayers for his own press blurbs?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): As the hon. member understands full well, Mr. Speaker, were it not for indexing, there would have been 225,000 more taxpayers on the roll than there would have been in 1975 without indexing. As a result of the indexing, 225,000 people will not be on the roll.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ENTITLEMENT TO BENEFITS OF TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES AT TAXATION DATA CENTRE—EFFECT ON BUDGET FOR PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. A number of days ago I asked him about the employment of key punch and other temporary workers at the Taxation Data Centre in Ottawa. His response was he would make an inquiry into the situation. Has the minister determined today that these temporary workers are in fact entitled to unemployment insurance benefits and is he going to have his department set to work to find a method of dealing with this problem which will remove this unnecessary burden from the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, our first consideration is whether these people qualify. They must qualify under the requirements of the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act like all other Canadians. Second, the answer to this question should really come from the minister responsible for the Public Service Commission. The Public Service Commission takes every possible step to hire as many people for the Data Centre as possible, including those presently on unemployment insurance, those presently unemployed, and those who traditionally come in and assist the Data Centre on a part-time basis year by year.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister aware of the situation that exists in this and other government departments as this will affect his budget for the unemployment insurance scheme?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am, of course, aware that other departments hire temporary help and we are in consultation with the Public Service Commission and other departments which require additional staff from time to time.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, POWERS OF INVESTIGATORS, OFFENCES

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate on this bill, one which is of vital concern to almost all Canadians whether they recognize it or not. The measure will certainly have a direct effect on a great many small businesses in this country and, though some people may not realize it, it will thus have a great bearing on the interests of consumers. By destroying competition, the legislation which has been brought before us is likely to have a harmful effect upon the future well-being and financial consideration of consumers, despite any short-term benefits which some may think it appears to offer.

This bill has been treated like a dirty shirt by the government. It has grey areas. It might even be referred to as a grey bill. It is moth-eaten, it is worm-infested, and it is an ill-conceived piece of hypocrisy. While the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) may think he has a problem trying to deal with bugs in hamburger, I suggest the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) will have a great deal more to deal with in the future if this bill passes in its present form. In order to describe this measure adequately, small businessmen might have to go to a former president of the United States and ask whether he has any unused expletives to spare.

I think Mr. Speaker should have the authority and the responsibility to order a minister to withdraw a piece of legislation which does not measure up to a certain standard. The piece of legislation before us today certainly does not measure up. I think it is arrogant of any minister to ask the House to receive legislation which, he says, will be amended during the committee stage. There is no reason why this bill should not be withdrawn. The amendments should be made, and only then should it be returned to the House for second reading. These proposals are not fair to businessmen, they are not fair to the consumers, and they are not fair to the House of Commons. The amendments are of great importance and we should have unlimited time in which to discuss them. Such is not the case during the committee stage, for everyone recognizes that committee members do not have unlimited time in which to enter into debate with the minister or to ask him questions. A question was asked on Friday by my hon. friend from Capilano (Mr. Huntington), as follows:

I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Further to the request of members from this side of the House on Tuesday of this week that the minister's proposed amendments to Bill C-2 be tabled, would the minister tell us if he now intends to table his amendments, and, if so, when?

The minister replied by saying the amendments would be introduced when the bill was considered in committee. This is not good enough: it is not fair and it is not just. In proposing this legislation, the government is being unfair to Canadians by creating bureaucratic regulations, purporting to be for the benefit of the people, which in the long run will cause more hardship and will ultimately hurt the vast majority of our people including, of course, consumers. I believe the bill to be a farce. No doubt to those who are adherents of socialism, "profit" is a dirty word. In a socialistic country a person does not need to worry about profit because there isn't any for anybody.

I must remind hon. members that, although there are two airlines operating within our borders, they both charge approximately the same rates. Air Canada, the government-owned airline, was the one which first requested permission to increase its rates—and there is no doubt in the mind of any person familiar with these airlines that Canadian Pacific is much more efficient than its competitor and that its service is better.

I believe, and I am confident that most hon. members and all Canadians will agree, that no segment of our society while holding a monopoly should have the right to deliberately gouge our people. There should be some guidelines. But the question is: should the profit margin be determined according to unspecified, arbitrary, government-established councils responsible to no one? When we are faced with a situation of this type, we have to ask ourselves: are we to surmise that all knowledge of industry and business is to be found within the cabinet or government departments? While some individuals in both sectors would perhaps like to give the impression that they have a monopoly on resource knowledge, I for one feel there is a greater supply of ability and know-how within business and industry. In view of this circumstance, why should a profit margin base be created by inexperienced technocrats and bureaucrats?

Mr. Speaker, what is the matter with proper competition? I want to make it abundantly clear, however, that I do not wish to protect the suppliers of the necessities of life at the expense of being unfair to consumers. This will definitely happen if we destroy competition within the business sector. Nothing can take the place of competition, and competition should come from competitive operations and not government restrictions.

I am wondering whether or not the minister has consulted his colleagues in cabinet about the operations of Information Canada. I have here an article which states that a government publication is a best-seller. It suggests that the federal government has a runaway 65-cent best-seller in its latest set of proposals for new business competition law. It goes on to state that this is one set of proposals that may soon be headed for critical review in parliament and in the business community. The reason it is a best-seller is that people in small business are very interested in the bill now before us. I should like to see whether the sales policy of Information Canada can stand up against the regulations in this bill.

Within this government there seems to be a tendency for each minister to set up his own private empire: each one appears to want to operate entirely unto himself. This situation is probably encouraged by bureaucrats who are well entrenched in their departments and have been dictating policy for so long that they are of the opinion it is their right to forge ahead without considering the consequences to this country and its citizens.

Are there to be provisions in this legislation to control government departments? All departments of government must realize their dependence one upon another—and this has to start with the minister. The Prime Minister, as head of the government, should be responsible for co-ordinating uniting programs and policies within all government departments and agencies. The government is not the place within which to construct personal ivory towers, to build egos or to enter a race to surpass another department or its minister.

The government is a body of people who are all public servants whether elected, appointed or placed in office by merit, and unless these employees of the people co-operate and consider the people—who, after all, pay the bills—no single department can efficiently reach its goal or render a useful service. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction among Canadians over the arbitrary action of governments and government departments. As I tried to point out earlier, this is why the book available from Information Canada is being so widely purchased by businessmen.

As was said by the minister, this bill is only window-dressing. When answering questions in this House about the action the government was going to take to allow reasonable profits without deliberately gouging the Canadian people in the area of manufacturing, the Prime Minister's pat answer has always been the same, namely, that the bill now before the House should be passed. How naive can the Prime Minister become, and how misleading is this statement? Does he honestly believe he can tell Canadians in general and members of this House that Bill C-2 will have any positive consequence? Instead of the bill being referred to as the competition bill, it should be referred to as the "get the government off the hook" bill. The only difficulty is that it will not get this government off the hook but will, instead, prove how inadequate government policy is and can be.

We must realize that at the speed governments function, it will take an extended period—maybe even years—for any action, and in the meantime legitimate business will suffer. I take particularly strong exception to the provision in this bill which allows the commission to make ultimate decisions in respect of prosecution. I have a terrible fear about putting unlimited power into the hands of any individual, no matter who he may be—and I would even include the minister in that statement. I refer to clause 5 of the bill wherein it is provided:

> One of the members may be appointed by the governor in council to be vice-chairman of the commission and any member so appointed shall, whenever the chairman is absent or unable to act or whenever there is a vacancy in the office of chairman, exercise the powers and perform the duties of the chairman.
> The governor in council may designate a member to exercise the powers and perform the duties of the chairman of the commission whenever the chairman and any vice-chairman are absent or unable to act or whenever the offices of chairman and vice-chairman are vacant.

The clause provides, further, that certain subsections of the act are to be repealed and the following substituted:

> Two members constitute a quorum. The commission may make rules for the regulation of its proceedings and the performance of its duties and functions under this act.

This is not the way in which a business should operate. Surely some responsibility should be placed on the government and on the House of Commons to establish a set of regulations that will be acceptable to the Canadian people and will get the required job done. I have faith in the justice of the courts in Canada, but I have doubts about the justice or judgment of some members on the opposite side of this House. Let us consider two government debts, the operations of the CBC and the Canada Council. I suggest neither one of these would establish faith in the minds of Canadians. Many honourable members on the other side of this House were saying, during an election campaign, that the land was strong. I should like to quote some figures about government increased debt including the year 1972.

The national debt of this country has increased rapidly in the last few years. It is my understanding that the increase from 1969 to 1972 was some $12 billion. How can anyone suggest that the land is strong with that kind of increase in our national debt? As was pointed out by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was originally expected to operate on a budget much less than the present cost of that department. The hon. member pointed out that there has been a cost to that department of $450 per phone inquiry and $1,250 per written complaint. I suggest this increase is paid by the consumer, the very person this bill purports to protect. Let us for a moment consider the statements made by members on the other side during the last election campaign. There was a promise in respect of $500 for each new home owner. There was a promise in respect of there being an Air Canada improvement in Winnipeg. Neither of these promises has been kept, and we have heard little or nothing more of them.

This bill is supposed to protect the consumer against false advertising. I am wondering if this government could be charged because of the false promises it has made in order to get elected. What has been done in respect of the present subsidy on beef? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) stated that the subsidy on beef would benefit the Canadian people. To the present time there has not been one dollar in the way of subsidy chargeable to the Canadian treasury, and at the present rate there never will be anything paid out under this policy. Catastrophe will have to strike the industry if anything is ever paid out. On top of this, the Minister of Agriculture has egg all over his face as a result of the destruction of some 28 million eggs. The whole situation does not smell too good. But it is useless for him to travel around the country telling the people he is protecting the beef industry, when actually that is not the case.

● (1600)

We find that most of the government's vote-getting promises are not being kept. Could this not be taken as false advertising or misrepresentation? This bill does not allow anyone to use false or misleading advertising. If a private individual or enterprise follows the same pattern, there could be prosecution. But can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, a governor in council appointee as provided for in clause 5 laying a charge against those who appointed him? Let us consider subclause 9 of clause 5: it provides as follows:

> The commission may make rules for the regulation of its proceedings and the performance of its duties and functions under this act.

As I said earlier, this House of Commons should ensure that these regulations are spelled out by the highest court in Canada, the House of Commons. This subclause spells out, to me, just one thing. The commission will not be required to take any action if it does not wish to do so; yet it is given devastating power that could be very detrimental to business. What kind of thinking is this? It certainly does not signify a good omen for those who are not in favour of this legislation. Palsy-walsyism is something which Canadians can ill-afford: it is not fair; it is not just; it is not necessary.

I would ask the minister what effect this bill will have on the franchise system that now protects small business and industry. Take, for example, a small Pepsi-Cola plant which employees 10, 12 or 15 people. Such a plant does not mind the competition it receives from another Coca-Cola or any other soft drink plant. But I assure you, Mr. Speaker that if this bill does allow a competitor to move in on it with a like franchise, taking over some of the business, such a company will inevitably go bankrupt; perhaps both, and, as one representative told me, welfare is the next step. So I wonder what the government and this minister are trying to bring about by placing before this House a bill that will have such an effect and does nothing to ensure supply of the product required by the consumer at a low price.

For instance, while one company might have its bottles out on a five-cent deposit, there is nothing to stop a competitor moving in and offering ten cents for the same bottles, because the value of the bottle might be anything between 12 cents and 15 cents. There is nothing in the bill to protect the industry in this way. If the system is destroyed, the result will be higher prices.

The present bill does little to help independent retailers who are being forced out of business by large chains and department stores. While the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission would be given jurisdiction over supply and sales practices, it would have no power to halt mergers, prevent underselling or any of the means by which large companies and chain stores eliminate their competitors. The minister has indicated that the legislation will be used to regulate the larger corporation and will not interfere with small business. If this is so, the minister should specify what size of corporation or business will be subject to the regulations under the legislation.

An amendment could be introduced to the effect that a business with assets and sales of less than a certain amount could not be said to be engaging in a restrictive trade practice. The question is important, because these people are spending a great deal of money in an effort to protect their interests. They do not know what they are actually up against. They are more or less shadow-boxing and are spending money they can ill afford. This money eventually will have to come from Canadian consumers.

Mr. Speaker, I have asked what is to be done about a political party which does not live up to its promises. Is the individual who made a specific promise to be held responsible, or will the officers of the political party be held responsible? Under the jail sentence provision, upon conviction, in respect of Bill C-2, the present Liberal government, by not fulfilling its election promises, would be faced with deciding whether its leader should be sentenced to jail, or whether the penalty should be paid by a section of the Liberal representatives in the other place who formed a large part of their party's organization in the recent election.

For a moment, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention the proposal of the federal take-over of Polymer last year by the CDC. If this corporation should be guilty of an infraction, would an arm of government be prosecuted? These are questions which should be answered in this House rather than in the committee. I have emphasized many times that communication between government departments is almost impossible to detect. I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) if he is prepared to live with this legislation of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is he willing to sell government bonds, under current advertisements, with proclamations of stability and a solid return on investment? The advertising might be fair if inflation were under control, but let us consider what actually happens to those who purchase government savings bonds in good faith. I think I should tell members opposite a fact of which everyone in Canada should be aware, although apparently they are not.

If an individual buys a government bond this year, at the present rate of inflation, in two years' time he will probably suffer a loss of 6 per cent in respect of the value of the bond. He will lose that much in actual net worth, yet the Minister of Finance says government savings bonds represent a stable operation, a stable commitment and a stable investment. We have this legislation which specifies that business must "do as I say, but don't do as I do". This bill is for those who produce, manufacture and develop. It does not apply to those who have the fun of spending—in this case the federal government. I am sure that the people of Canada during the recent election were not aware of the double standard this government was about to foist upon them.

What about large union organizations which rip off their members? Do they give a fair return for dues collected? What about the promises made to non-union employees to entice them to become union members, and what happens to large amounts of membership dues which are siphoned off for the benefit of the hierarchy of union administrations without any thought of return to benefit of their individual memberships? Clause 2 exempts authorized collective bargaining units from the restrictions of this bill. While it may be neither politically, socially nor economically desirable to regulate collective bargaining, unions clearly have an impact on competition and discussion should be initiated on the competitive legitimacy of some of their practices. Large unions are fighting for power and domination over the people.

I have serious doubts about other areas of the bill. There is nothing in this bill to give the consumer, the Canadian people, the protection which is necessary in the most vital area of our economy. While the commission has tremendous power, it is not obliged to consult an accused before prosecution. It should have to advise the respondent of the complaints made, and what are the alternatives. Such, however, is not the case.

It is often the case, when governments introduce complex legislation which has taken ministers and senior public servants months to prepare, that the average person sits back and thinks that these are matters which cannot affect him. But such is not so. This legislation will affect every Canadian. We in the opposition stress as strongly as possible that it is important Canadians know what is incorporated in this bill, and what the consequences might be. Many Canadians adopt the attitude that it does not matter. Although it must be conceded that this is a long and confusing bill, even big businessmen have difficulty in interpreting some of its provisions. It must be taken very seriously, because it involves sweeping changes in business and commercial activity across this country.

This is why I say—and I say it very sincerely—that the minister should have been honest and presented his amendments with the bill; otherwise he should have withdrawn the bill and presented it when it had been amended because, at present, although it has been said that the legislation does not conflict with marketing boards, by the same token the bill provides that an individual cannot withhold anything from the market. This is what marketing is all about, and there is a great deal to be explained to the Canadian people regarding this proposed legislation.

What about the Canadian Wheat Board? Will their selling procedures be considered legitimate? This is not explained in the bill. That is why the minister should rise in this House and state unequivocally what the amendments will be. One such amendment could incorporate legislation which would wipe out all the freedom that has been given to marketing boards, thereby destroying a surety of continuing production of basic products for the benefit of Canadians. The minister may say, "No, we do not intend to do that," but what guarantee do we have that once the legislation is passed and the toe is in the door, the Canadian people, the Canadian producer and the Canadian consumer will be protected?

I impress upon the House that we need increased production. While we may have a favourable trade balance, I should like to stress the fact that in 1972, 1973 and 1974 this favourable balance was brought about in respect of exporting our raw materials and basic agricultural products, but in every other area we were down. In no quarter did we export more manufactured products that we imported—and this is where we must build our economy; this is where the jobs are. What is the use of having a product in Canada to sell if we have no purchaser for it? If people do not have the income with which to pay for the product, it is useless to produce it.

The minister has been less than fair in presenting the bill in this form. He would do well to withdraw it and to bring it back in a form acceptable to the House, with the proposed amendments so that we know what we are debating.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time legislation of this type has come before the House, and it will not be the last time I will be critical of it. In my view, no single piece of mythology has been more persistent and more harmful to this country than the continuation of the idea that somehow or other we can solve the defects in our present economy and our market system by legislation dealing with combines or restrictive trade practices. In my view, aside from a few regulating suggestions which appear in the bill—which could be handled by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs without any difficulty—we should abandon such an approach to solving consumer and marketing problems in this country. I would like to give some reasons for saying that.

First, I would have some positive feeling for the legislation if I thought there was any chance that it might work. The evidence is that it has never worked in the past, and there is no real reason to believe it will work in the future. If you look at the number of convictions under the Combines Investigation Act, you will find almost none. There is good reason for this. It is almost impossible to obtain evidence of the kind that is necessary to get a conviction. Usually, when a conviction has been laid it should have been for stupidity, not for collusion, because you have to be very stupid to be convicted under the Combines Investigation Act.

One of the cases that I recall concerned cement, in Windsor. Some people were working in collusion in fixing the price of cement in the area. They kept minutes of the meetings and called in their lawyers because they did not trust each other. That is one way of fighting it. Another case was, I think, in Hull dealing with the construction industry. One firm had a brother-in-law there who made notes of the bids everyone was going to make, and in the course of opening the bids the brother-in-law's little memos fell on the floor. That is about the only kind of case in which you get convictions under the combines legislation. Often, even where it appears to work it does enormous harm to the extent that combines legislation is sometimes a restraint in the wrong way.

I think that the effective harm of the combines legislation is that it prevents our coming to grips with the real problem. It is a kind of camouflage, a pretence, a way of fooling the public and saying, "Oh, yes, we have the situation under control," when in fact nothing is being done, or nothing in fact can be done, with this kind of approach. The real problems continue. The government can say, "We brought in amended combines legislation, so you should be happy." It seems to me that combines legislation is the businessman's best friend. Despite all the crying that the businessman does about combines legislation, in fact he depends upon having legislation of this kind in order to take the heat off him to the extent that nobody will investigate him because, after all, one is protected against shennanigans.

If you ask a minister, in the House, what he is going to do about an instance that arises, such as when today my colleague the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) a question about the pricing of dry milk, the minister says he is sure his officials will consider the matter, and so will people in the combines branch. When? In five, six or a hundred years from now—which is to say never. The point was that an important question was asked in the House and the minister was able to duck it completely because he had the combines legislation to hide behind.

There is nothing in the present bill that will make the situation any better. Without that combines legislation, the minister would have been forced to give a decent answer—at least an answer that he would look at the situation and take some action. If he did not respond effectively within two or three days, there would have been another question until we did receive some kind of answer. At the moment it is shunted off. I am sure he will not get away with it, because the hon. member for Nickel Belt will not let him; but he will certainly make every attempt to pretend that some action will be taken under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act. I am not saying that the minister is doing it deliberately or that he wants to be less than a good minister; I am simply saying that this arrangement enables him, or perhaps forces him, to deal with questions of this type in the way he did.

Years ago we were talking about having a minister of consumer and corporate affairs. It did not look as though we were going to get one, because the government was dreadfully opposed to the idea. But when we finally got one, we said, "We will finally have a minister who will be responsible to the consumer and who will react to problems brought to his or her attention." Instead, all the minister does is shunt these matters on to the restrictive trade practices branch for investigation, which turns out to be no investigation at all.

In many ways, what the businessman does not want is a real inquiry into areas where he has an effective monopoly. Most businessmen do not have an effective monopoly, but there are some who do, and the way they prevent the heat being applied to them is by permitting some small competitors to stay alive so they can turn around and say they have competitors. They may have 95 per cent of the business in that field, but because they have one or two small competitors who live by the good will and acquiescence of the giant, they are not subject to investigation. If there were no combines legislation, and if the question of how many businesses are left was not involved, these matters might be investigated.

In 1966, in the food prices committee, we were looking into the price of glass jars for baby food and why baby food had risen in price. It turned out it was because glass jars cost two cents more than the other containers. Nevertheless, they were popular enough that the public was willing to pay. Only two firms, Gerber's and Heinz, were in the baby food industry at that time and both were charging exactly the same for their tinned goods. I found that difficult to understand because Gerber's, which was only in the central market, had 20 per cent of the total market while Heinz had 80 per cent. With 80 per cent of the market, why was it not possible for Heinz to reduce its price? They claimed their costs were not different from Gerber's. That just was not true. When we looked at the financial statements of both companies, it was apparent that Gerber's had been losing money for three years and was in danger of going broke.

Heinz had been using glass jars in the United States for years. When we asked why they were not using them in Canada, they said they did not know what the effect of glass jars would be. When we asked if they did not know about their American operations, they replied that they did not talk to them. But they did know that the consumers wanted glass jars and they knew that Gerber's were going broke. They did not want Gerber's to go broke, so they stayed out of the field for three years until Gerber's could break even. Then they went over to glass jars. That is the kind of competition we have in our society, Mr. Speaker. What we have is price leadership. Who competes with General Motors other than the imports?

An hon. Member: Ford.

Mr. Saltsman: Just consider the pricing policies. I remember one occasion when General Motors proposed a price increase and every car manufacturer followed with an equivalent increase. A few days later General Motors said it was a mistake and the increase was $30 too much. Everybody came down by $30. General Motors could drive Ford and Dodge out of business if they wanted to, but they probably would not do it because then somebody would look at their operation. It is more advantageous for a large corporation to keep its competitors alive and to have a little less volume, with more profit. Competition just does not exist in these large markets. General Motors does not have to sit down with Chrysler or the other corporations and suggest making a deal. They just step out and the others follow, because they know if they do not they are in serious trouble. It is "live and let live" in big business. It is not the competitor who is the enemy, but the customer—and combines legislation enables this kind of farce to continue.

In the steel industry, too, one company issues a price list and the other companies follow. There is no proof of collusion because their principals might just have spoken to each other at the golf club. They would not be stupid enough to sit down with their accountants and keep minutes. Perhaps they do not even talk to each other, but they have ways of signalling.

A society that has modern technology requires large corporations. I am not saying that you could break up General Motors and benefit from it; perhaps the technology of our times requires large firms. Large firms cannot afford to cut each other's throats. They will not fight each other on price; their fight will be on advertising, model changes or gimmicks. The small businessman has no choice but to fight in a kind of suicidal way, but the large corporations have to stick together because the public is their enemy, not their competitors.

I shall make some proposals later about what we could do if we did not have combines legislation, and how we could be protected. Another point about combines legislation, Mr. Speaker, is that it is as American as apple pie. It is not a Canadian idea. It may be pointed out that our combines legislation was introduced a year before the Sherman act in the United States, which is its equivalent. It was introduced with the Sherman act in mind, however. Combines legislation makes a lot of sense in a totally capitalistic society which does not have any ethic of public involvement or public regulation. In that case, you can inject this kind of approach to justify continuance of the sort of tooth and claw attitude that rampant capitalism has as its ethic. If that is why the Sherman act was brought in in the United States, in order to take some rough edges off as somebody on television said about somebody else why do we have to embark on it in an economy where it does not make any sense? The United States is ten or eleven times the size of Canada. This means that in order to attain the same level of efficiency, they can afford ten or 11 times the competition, given the same level of technology.

We should be asking our industries to co-operate, not to collude against the public; to co-operate for purposes of improving efficiency, wages and exports, without having them supervised and regulated by the public. That is the direction in which we should be going. Because we do not want to regulate, we do not want to supervise, and we do not even want to see what they are doing, we bring in something like this combines legislation in the faint hope that it will keep them honest, instead of having public involvement. The only thing that will do any good is public involvement and scrutiny of their activities.

The problem of foreign ownership arises from a number of sources, but one of the chief problems has been the presence of combines legislation which has encouraged the proliferation of branch plants in this country and prevented the normal rationalization of those plants into a Canadian package. I want to talk about famous villains on the Canadian scene. There are two men who have drawn their fair share of attention, and not because they are interested in the public welfare. Perhaps we should not expect big business tycoons to be concerned about that because, after all, that is the responsibility of parliament.

For their own reasons, they put together two industries in Canada which have remained Canadian. They pay high wages, charge low prices to the consumer, and are models in every way. I am sure that these industries were assembled in direct contravention of the combines legislation. Who are these two fellows? One is Lord Beaverbrook, the other E. P. Taylor. E. P. Taylor amalgamated some isolated beer companies into one of the finest beer producing companies in the world. So efficient is Canadian beer production that the Americans have threatened to pass legislation. This is because they are afraid Canadians will take over their beer industry. I think the government has treated that industry too generously with regard to taxation; but it has remained Canadian, and that is important.

The other industry is steel manufacturing. Ours is one of the most efficient steel industries of the world. Why, Mr. Speaker? I suggest the reason is this: a large number of steelmakers were brought together, probably in direct contravention of combines legislation, because they were threatened by Bethlehem steel and other American steel which was coming to Canada. Lord Beaverbrook, over the heads of Canadian bankers, put together the Steel Company of Canada and established in this country an industry which excels. We can outproduce the Americans in many ways and make steel as fine as theirs, often at lower prices. That industry enjoys little tariff protection. Its workers enjoy parity with similar workers in the United States. Both the industries I have mentioned have remained Canadian; both have been strong enough to withstand foreign ownership.

I do not say Lord Beaverbrook and E. P. Taylor, neither of whom I know, put together these industries from the kindness of their hearts. They are business buccaneers and I am sure their activities should have been regulated. The point is that what they did worked for the benefit of Canada.

An hon. Member: And for their own benefit.

Mr. Saltsman: Quite so. Over-all, their work brought advantage to Canada. I have been invited to meetings of chemical producers. Whenever they hold a convention or want to lobby here once a year, they invite people to address them. The chemical industry is well represented in my riding and I am interested in what goes on. I have talked to people in that industry. The conversation goes something like this. I say, "You guys are pretty inefficient. You have far too many plants trying to serve the market. You have almost as many branches in Canada as in the United States, and you are so inefficient that you need to be protected by tariffs; you go to the government for help." I think the Canadian market is big enough to support the production of many chemicals. That is why I say to these people, "Wouldn't it be better if you all got together?" After all, Mr. Speaker, the idea is not new. It has been tried in Germany. The British are amalgamating their industries. In some cases they come under private ownership, in some cases under public. Personally, I prefer public ownership.

The Swedes have not introduced combines legislation. They have rationalization boards which sit down with Swedish industries and try to make them more competitive in their own and world markets. Canada and the United States are probably the last countries in the world to support combines legislation. If the Americans want to be foolish, should we follow? Too often we have followed that pattern. I suggest it is time to break it.

Let me return to my conversations with chemical producers. When I say, "Why don't you people get together," they say, "We can't, because of the combines legislation." The truth is that if they want to get together, they will find a way to do it, combines legislation or not. The point is, they do not want to get together. They argue that if they do, they will be prosecuted in the United States under the Sherman act which has extraterritorial application. As these companies operate internationally, they will not do something in Canada which they are not prepared to do anywhere else in the world. They are integrated. If they co-operate with the government, they do it for their own reasons—not because such co-operation is beneficial for Canada. Such co-operation may disrupt their international actions. This situation is now changing. But for years combines legislation was used as an excuse for maintaining in this country one of the most inefficient industrial structures of the world.

We are worried about the high level of foreign ownership. Do people not realize that foreign ownership has a direct relationship to combines legislation? What can be done in the absence of combines legislation. First, we can adopt the recommendations of the MacQuarrie commission report. On page 16 of the bill, in proposed section 31.2, there is reference to tariffs, a matter covered by that commission. This proposal has been outstanding for almost 30 years. I am referring to the recommendation that those convicted of collusion or conspiring against the public interest should have their tariff protection removed. Mr. Speaker, this protection, so far as I know, has not been removed in a single instance—neither in the case of the glass industry nor the paper industry. These industries have continued in their own merry way. What is the biggest fine which has been handed down under our combines legislation?

An hon. Member: Twenty-five dollars.

Mr. Saltsman: It is a little more than that.

An hon. Member: I think it's about $50,000.

Mr. Saltsman: If it is $50,000, the fine represents a licence. In no instance has tariff protection been removed. Industry does not worry about a fine, because that can be recovered by increases in price. The government has the weapon but has not used it.

Neither has the government tried another approach. My remarks maybe pertinent to Petrocan; I do not know. Let me refer to what the Swedes have done under their co-ops. Swedish co-ops operate upon a different basis from Canadian co-ops. They go into the market with the specific purpose of driving down prices. If a manufacturer is taking too much from the market, instead of legislating the Swedes permit a co-op to compete with the manufacturer and drive down prices. That is what we should do. A lesson like that would not be lost on those who are raising prices unfairly. If prices are reduced under a system like that, the consumer cannot be asked to make up the difference. But the government is not prepared to do this; instead, it has brought in combines legislation which is meaningless. It is not interested in providing competition through the public sector. This is the area the government should enter.

There is the question of public ownership. If someone abuses this country in terms of ripping off the people, I see no reason why somebody should not step in and say, "Look, buddies; you are behaving very badly"—you always say "buddies" because you want to be nice about it—"and we think we will take you under public ownership. Here is your money; go home." Even if there were an indication the government would do something like that, it would be enough.

I would not want to see the government rush into public ownership at every point of contention. That is not what I am suggesting. However, if the manufacturers in this country, particularly those that are foreign-owned, had any indication that the government of Canada was prepared to take them over if they misbehaved, they would not misbehave. However, as long as there are pussycats there, the companies will go along doing what they are doing.

I want to deal with some of the provisions of this bill. Over the years my party has supported combines legislation because we have felt it is at least something. Perhaps we will do so again. Today I am voicing my own reservations. There comes a time when you have to stop being satisfied with these little tinkerings and do-nothings. Perhaps the time has come for us to call the legislation what it is. There is a clause in the bill on misleading advertising. The government is going to try to define misleading advertising. There will be penalties. A clause which provides it will be applied only to misleading advertising carries the same contradiction as talking about a virgin whore.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: What is wrong with advertising? It is not that it is misleading. It is that in many cases it is wasteful and immoral. People do not have to be huckstered into everything. They do not have to be pushed into consumption, consumption, consumption and have such huckstering subsidized by the tax system. The reason there is so much advertising is that 50 per cent of it is paid by the government, so why not spend all kinds of money on it? What is accomplished by having a clause on misleading advertising? It is not that the stuff in the spray can will not take the odour away from your armpit. I am sure it will. What is lewd is that they picture a world full of people judging each other by the smell of their armpits. The idea is how you smell.

An hon. Member: That is racist.

Mr. Saltsman: I would love to raise a discussion about what one sees on television. You see a picture of a charming girl, with marvellous teeth and a lovely personality. You see a boy look at her and then turn away in disgust: she has not used her underarm deodorant. A thousand years from now people will wonder what kind of a civilization we had, and whether this type of advertising represented our system of values. I do not think this misleading advertising clause will lead to very much. The advertising will become a little more sophisticated. It will be necessary to use real glass instead of artificial glass. A man will have to use his own razor blade instead of someone elses.

It will not accomplish anything. Misleading advertising is not the problem in our society.

There is also a clause on double-ticketing. The chief consequence of legislation saying you cannot double-ticket will be that the product is taken into the back room. Double-ticketing can now be done right on the shelf. In future the storekeeper will be put to extra trouble; it will be necessary to take the product into the back room. It will be done a little more neatly, similar to the way in which cattle brands are changed with branding-irons out west. The storekeeper may have to charge three or four cents more because the "3" will not turn into a "5". He must change it to an "8" to make it look better. That is not why food is so high in cost. When this happens, it is an abuse but it does not solve any basic problem in the way we distribute food. It does not solve the problem of overbuilding supermarkets and adding charges on to charges with the kind of merchandising methods we use. That is what we should really be looking at. I quote clause 38(1), found on page 38:

> No person who is engaged in the business of producing or supplying a product or who has the exclusive rights and privileges conferred by a patent, trade mark, copyright or registered industrial design shall, directly or indirectly,
> (a) by agreement, threat, promise or any like means, attempt to influence upward, or to discourage the reduction of, the price—

How can you prove that? We have tried before to include something about price maintenance. We have never succeeded. There is no way in which you can succeed. There is no need for that clause, because in many cases it is now being done. Someone discounts a job lot of a brand name product. By cutting the price, he creates all kinds of commotion. The same situation prevails. I presume this is supposed to be for the benefit of small businessmen. We do not have to worry about them. They have so much competition now that they do not know what to do with it. In fact, it is only the small businessman who has to compete; the large corporations do not have to do so.

I sometimes wonder why people stay in small business, considering the hours they have to put in and the knowledge they require in order to run a business. No one is going to tell them you have freed up the market for them. Unfortunately, the market is much too free for them. We can see the consequences of that situation. If you want to see good working conditions and good wages, look at big industry, not small business. Small business cannot afford such luxuries because of the situation in which they find themselves.

This bill attempts to do something about suggested retail prices. It does not say you cannot put on a suggested retail price. If someone wants to sell below that, he can. If he does that now, he can probably get away with it. No piece of legislation will really protect him. Let us take the example of someone who wants to sell below the suggested retail price. The law says the supplier must continue supplying him. Anyone with any practical experience knows what will happen. The supplier will suddenly decide he cannot produce enough to satisfy everyone. Either this person will receive a very low priority, his shipment will end up halfway across the country when he needs it for Christmas, or he will receive blue shirts when he orders grey. There are a dozen different ways to get the message across quickly that if you cut the price, you will be in trouble.

If you want effective competition, you must do it in some other way. If a manufacturer has built up his brand and is able to impose the kind of coercion that he does, it is because we have enabled him, through the tax system, to build up a brand name which has a monopoly. It is the monopoly, not the suggested retail price, that creates the problem. The man who has access to the monopoly is usually prepared to do what he is told. Indeed, that is probably what he wants to do; he is happy to see the manufacturer put on a standard price because it also protects him from his competitors.

These are some of the reservations which occur to me. I understand that the co-ops are looking forward to the legislation because proposed section 31.2 has something to do with refusal to deal. I do not believe this section will really force a manufacturer to sell to everyone, because there is a little word in here which could make a great deal of difference. It says a supplier has to sell if a buyer is willing to meet the usual trade terms of the supplier in respect of payment, units of purchase and "otherwise". What is covered by those words "and otherwise"? There are so many loopholes. And this one in particular is like a barn door. Suppose a supplier sells to only one store in a town. Is it suggested that he should be forced by legislation to sell to two, or more? I should be surprised if that were the case, since the effect of the section would then be to tell the manufacturers how to run their businesses.

Is it intended that the act should force manufacturers to sell to a particular store whether they want to or not? Are the Liberals ready to curtail economic freedom to that extent? I do not see how these provisions will work. Suppose a manufacturer says his policy is to sell only to "classy" stores and is withholding supplies simply because a prospective purchaser is running a "hole in the wall"? Will the manufacturer be forced to sell to such a store whether he wants to or not? There is also the suggestion that if one supplier refuses to deliver, a purchaser can go to someone else who will be obliged to deliver. I do not know who wrote this legislation. Perhaps the draftsmen are very good in the academic field or in the public service, but I do not believe they have had much experience in business. I doubt whether the legislation will be of much practical value either to the consumer or to small business.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). I am not sure whether he speaks entirely for the group he represents. He put forward some interesting propositions today, though I found it hard to follow him in one or two places. He talked about baby food and said Gerber's was kept in business for three years by its competitors because the competitors wanted only 80 per cent of the market; they did not want responsibility for 100 per cent.

Mr. Saltsman: The object was to make three times as much profit.

Mr. Francis: I could not quite follow the argument. Did he feel it would have been better for Gerber's to have been driven out of the market, and have only one manufacturer in Canada? The hon. member is nodding, but I do not think that is a line of argument which would be supported by all members of his party. It is certainly not one I am prepared to acknowledge.

Mr. Speaker, there is one particular matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the House. First let me say I believe, contrary to what the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge has said, that the principle of this bill is a good one.

An hon. Member: Surprise, surprise.

Mr. Francis: I am glad the minister has put it forward. More and more Canadian consumers are becoming aware that they need to be protected by legislation against unethical business practices, and it is our duty to listen to the complaints which are coming forward and to act to protect consumers, by legislation if necessary.

I should like to draw attention to the clause which relates to misleading advertising. Clause 36 recommends certain changes thought necessary to protect consumers. I should like to point out that there is an area involving deceitful practices which is not covered by this clause. By way of example, I refer to an advertisement which was used last year to promote the sale of a children's toy. The advertisement in question was aired on CFCF-TV in Montreal in November and December of 1973, having been cleared for use by the Canadian Advertising Advisory Board, a self-regulatory body of the advertising industry and Canadian broadcasting.

The advertisement embodied a technique which was intended to influence consumers, in this case children, to purchase a product without their being aware they were being influenced. The exhortive phrase "Get it" had been inserted four times in a 60-second commercial, in varied lengths of up to one-quarter of a second. The message was too short to be perceived by the rational, conscious mind.

This technique is, I understand, similar to that reputed to be used for brainwashing. I suggest this type of technique is not acceptable to hon. members who sit in this chamber, and it should be banned by parliament. It is generally called subliminal, because the appeal to purchase is made to the potential consumer below his threshold of awareness. I intend to propose an amendment to Bill C-2, proposed section 36(1), when it is studied by the standing committee, should I have the opportunity. Subclause (1) of proposed section 36 presently reads:

No person shall, for the purpose of promoting, directly or indirectly, the supply or use of a product or for the purpose of promoting, directly or indirectly, any business interest, by any means whatever—

I propose inserting paragraph (e), which would read:

—make a representation in an advertisement which contains any technical device which, by using images of very brief duration or by any other similar means, exploits the possibility of conveying a message to, or otherwise influencing the minds of consumers without their being aware, or fully aware, of what has been done.

An hon. Member: Will the minister support it?

Mr. Francis: I believe so. I believe this amendment will receive general support. I have discovered that this technique is reported to be used widely in the production of television and other advertising. I hope the committee will entertain the suggestion to call professional and technical witnesses who can give evidence to this effect. The advertisement to which I have referred was "discovered"—I put that word in quotation marks—by the Canadian Advertising Advisory Board and this discovery was made public on August 21, 1974, through a press release issued by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters.

No mention was made in the news release of the fact that the advertisement had actually been used. I found that it had been used, and also that it was banned only after the relevant contract had expired and the advertisement was no longer being televised. It was judged as containing subliminal content by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, the Canadian Radio—Television Commission, the Canadian Advertising Advisory Council in Canada, by the National Association of Broadcasters, the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Communications Commission in the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member in the midst of his speech, but it is five o'clock and further proceedings must now go forward.

I wonder whether the Chair might take a moment to refer to a matter which has arisen in the debate this afternoon. The Chair has noticed the practice of some speakers at this stage of the bill to refer to certain clauses within the measure. I do not wish to press the point at this time, but for the guidance of hon. members and their future reference I would refer to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 381, which reads as follows:

● (1700)

The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

I would draw attention particularly to this part of the citation:

On the motion for the second reading, it is out of order to discuss the clauses of the bill.

I thank hon. members for their indulgence in allowing the Chair to draw this matter to their attention.

RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED ROYAL COMMISSION STUDY TO IMPROVE SAFETY OF PASSENGERS AND EMPLOYEES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should study the advisability of establishing a Royal Commission on the notable shortcomings of Canadian railways and in particular CNR to increase the protection of the public in general and that of the employees in particular and to eliminate accidents and derailments of freight or passenger trains.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on several occasions during the last year and the previous one I asked under Standing Order 43 of the House of Commons that an investigation be made on the operations of Canadian railways and in particular of the CNR.

I would ask hon. members, and particularly those who have seen the big cars go by before, to lend an attentive ear in the few minutes available to me so that I may explain to them the reason for my request.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, I noted the numerous railway accidents, mainly derailments, across Canada. As a member for a riding which was more particularly affected and on several occasions by those numerous derailments, it is my duty to ask the House that a royal commission inquire into the management of railway companies, especially the CNR, in order to find the means to cope with the disadvantages of the shocking deterioration of this indispensable service of national interest.

Madam Speaker, we must know the cause of those disadvantages so that we may use that information and every governmental facility to remedy the situation. Moreover, we must try and find new ideas in order to meet not only the requirements but also the wishes of the Canadian people.

I should now like to make a few general remarks with regard to railway safety which is most unsatisfactory in some regions.

In the constituency of Rimouski which I have the pleasure and honour to represent, thousands of people have witnessed numerous derailments in the last few years. Here are a few examples.

Last year, a freight car went off the tracks in the Mont-Joli station and wrecked part of the station.

Some 75 miles from Mont-Joli, in the Matapédia valley, 24 cars carrying oil and various freight also went off the tracks in Routhierville.

The same year, between Mont-Joli and Rimouski, another derailment took place, involving this time passenger cars. Several cars, including the locomotive, ran off the line between Mont-Joli and Luceville. Fortunately, no one was fatally injured, but those cars lying in the fields were nevertheless a sorry sight.

Madam Speaker, I take this opportunity to inform the House that the traffic in Mont-Joli station is quite heavy owing to the operation about two miles away of a Price Brothers sawmill. All its lumber is shipped by railway, especially the Canadian National, as this is the only line in operation in the whole area.

The accidents which I referred to are quite important. They are very costly when we consider the number of CNR trains and derailments in Canada during 1972. The number of derailments and track breakage has tripled since 1959 and almost doubled since 1969.

It is obvious that one of the main reasons for those accidents and likely the worst, that is the railways do not maintain their trackage properly.

Madam Speaker, the government must make sure that the railways take their responsibilities and carry out their duties. In view of the fact that Canadians have given to them millions of dollars in subsidies, they should be made aware of the way the money made available to the railways is spent.

That is the reason why the CNR must be the subject of a thorough investigation and action must be taken so that the needs and aspirations of all Canadians can be met more adequately.

For a long time, Canadians, businessmen, officials and employees were proud of their railways. Today I note Madam Speaker that, instead of having a very futurist railway system, the CNR has a very deteriorated system and could not ensure the maintenance of neither their trackage nor their rolling stock.

Madam Speaker, I remember accidents used to be a rare occurrence, since maintenance was very good and the ballast rested on cinder. We now have the best ballast, that is crushed stone. But there is no sufficient inspection of broken rails or defective sleepers, and that is the reason for a good number of accidents.

As I said, four employees used to handle the inspection and maintenance of seven miles of trackage. Inspections were then made daily, and often after the passing of various passenger or freight trains. But now, it was deemed adequate to lengthen such sections to 20 miles approximately, while making sure to reduce track inspection and maintenance personnel.

There certainly exists mismanagement within CNR, considering that in order to replace say a window pane at the Rimouski station, one sends for an employee in Campbellton, approximately 150 miles away, in order to do the work.

This entails too much undue expense and blatant waste. So do indeed Canadian National executives. I was informed these people use automobiles belonging to Canadian National Railways, and also credit cards with unlimited credit. Such automobiles they use all year long, for the minimal cost to themselves of $50. Few members in this House are allowed such a bargain. As far as I am concerned, I would indeed sell my car in order to use one supplied by the government, if I had only $50 a year to pay to use it.

It is then easy to understand why Canadian National Railways' debt is around $1.8 billion, with notes bearing interest at 5 per cent. Nonetheless, Canadian National Railways, with assets of $4 billion, has an annual deficit around 25 millions.

Rather than engaging in subsidiary ventures as the building of towers, the developing of shopping centers and property such as luxury hotels, we should first and foremost secure assurance that railway facilities and services are satisfactory and that there are enough cars and locomotives in service.

A thorough inquiry by a royal commission would perhaps enable us to find out what are the failings of the present administration and to correct them.

Madam Speaker, it is important to be able to distinguish accidental and localized faults from fundamental, structural and characteristic defects which would necessitate a complete upheaval and reorganization.

This is a very important matter that requires our full attention and all our energy, if we want to keep in touch with present and future needs and, by the same token, to restore the international reputation and prestige our railways enjoyed in the past.

If the Transport Commission deemed it necessary to recommend to the Canadian National Railways they reduce the speed of their trains to 40 miles an hour, limit the loads and inspect the rails better, all year long, it was so there would be as few accidents as possible on those tracks. Those recommendations are in agreement with the purpose of my motion which is to find solutions to those many derailments.

The Transport Commission must bring pressure to bear, supervise and control, in order to see that the railways have an efficient and adequate rolling stock, take good care of their platforms and also take all necessary steps to provide a proper service for the people of Canada. Otherwise, the railways will keep on disregarding public safety. Transportation is an essential field in which we must develop better policies in the best interests of the national economy.

I feel that in some cases, this government has failed to use the powers granted to it under the act to bring in the necessary remedial measures. Under the actual system, I firmly believe that the CNR is not sufficiently responsible to Parliament. Therefore, I suggest, Madam Speaker, that steps should be taken in this regard.

● (1710)

[English]

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, at the outset may I say I support the spirit and thrust of the motion presented by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) to the extent that it recognizes the necessity to bring about a greater degree of safety and protection for passengers and employees in connection with Canada's railway system. I am not sure, however, I agree with the hon. member's proposal to establish a royal commission or inquiry.

[Mr. Allard.]

It seems to me there have been sufficient studies in this particular area and that another study would merely prolong the issue. There are been innumerable studies. One in particular is the report by the Railway Transport Committee on the Canadian Transport Commission. This adequately spells out the shortcomings of the railways in terms of maintaining adequate safety standards.

I believe it is firmly established in our minds, and in the minds of the members of the public, that Canada's railway system enjoys something less than a commendable safety record. This is obvious from the increasing frequency of accidents. In the Third Report of the Transport Committee released in December, 1973, it is indicated that the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways in 1972 had three times as many accidents as in 1959, and nearly double the number in 1969. The explanation by the railways is that they have been moving much more tonnage and that their freight capacity has increased tremendously.

We do not find the airlines using a similar argument. Their safety record has been very high, notwithstanding the fact that they have increased the movement of passengers and cargo by air transport. I do not think we should accept that particular argument of the railway companies. The annual report of the CTC also indicates that an innumerable number of accidents have occurred.

For example, at page 9, the 1973 report of the CTC states:

> District officers investigated 296 derailments and 58 collisions between trains. Four persons were killed and 252 injured in such accidents.

It goes on to give the breakdown. I do not believe further studies are required. I do not think that there is need for a royal commission. What is needed is government leadership and action in this area. The general inquiry launched in 1970 dealt quite extensively with trackage roadbed, with the maintenance of trackage, and with signal systems and slide detector fences. Approximately 6,000 pages of evidence were compiled.

That report is available to members and to the public. It was prepared for the Railway Transport Committee and, in my opinion, constitutes a damning indictment of the safety record of the railways. Perhaps I might quote again from that report, at page one of appendix 3 where it states:

> The number of derailments caused by track conditions on Canadian National and Canadian Pacific in 1972 is three times that in 1959 and nearly double that in 1969. Because of this continuing increase in derailments to date, it must be concluded that in the foreseeable future the number of derailments on account of track conditions will continue to increase with a continuing increase in the number of injuries and deaths as a result, unless immediate action is taken.

This is a pretty clear indication that the safety record is less than satisfactory. It is also evidence that something must be done immediately.

Furthermore, the report sets forth some positive recommendations and steps which could be followed during the interim period until such time as necessary, longer term, corrective measures are carried out. For example, we know from the report that current stress on trackage is beyond tolerable limits. In this regard we see a specific recommendation put forward by the Railway Transport Committee.

I quote again from appendix 3, page 1, as follows:

> Until such time as improvements are completed to strengthen the total track structure, it is obvious that the only way in which an immediate reduction in these derailments can be accomplished is to eliminate the overstressing of the existing track structure; that is, reduction of axle loadings. Therefore, since it is the duty of the Canadian Transport Commission to ensure that derailments on account of track conditions causing injuries and deaths be prevented, it will be necessary to require the railways under its jurisdiction to reduce the maximum net weight of carloads to 70 or 80 tons per car and to require the railways to reduce the height of high loads which now result in excessive lateral stresses, and to require the railways to reduce the speed of trains wherever the existing speeds are contributing to excessive stresses beyond the limit for which the present track structure was designed and is being maintained, unless improved programs and standards of track maintenance are immediately undertaken to eliminate the causes of such derailments.

So here again the steps that must be taken to correct and improve safety standards are clearly outlined in this report. We know that in terms of inspections, our lines have not been inspected on a frequent and regular basis. In this regard we might refer to page 5 of appendix 3 of the Third Report of the Railway Transport Committee, which states:

> More frequent inspection of track would very often result in the observance of conditions of this type developing which might cause derailments. If more staff, material and equipment were available, more prompt action could be taken to correct these conditions as they are developing and before they could result in derailments. In other words, more frequent inspections by qualified staff and more and better maintenance of track conditions would undoubtedly reduce the number of derailments in this category which so frequently result in personal injury and deaths.
> More frequent inspection would also result in observation of the development of other conditions, such as defective switches, conditions leading up to washouts and sunkinks, which would permit prompt corrective action to be taken and thus avoid the possibility of derailments as a result.

The report goes on to make recommendations and suggestions dealing with broken rails, which suggest the necessity of railways acquiring more sophisticated track testing equipment. We know what the problem is, and we know that the condition of the trackage has deteriorated to a standard which is far below that which can accommodate safely the loads which our present day boxcars are carrying. This has an effect on the over-all efficiency of the railways as well as on their safety performance. We know that in order to overcome this, a great deal of money will have to be spent. So what we need now is not a royal commission but government action and government leadership to compel the railways to honour the recommendations and conclusions in the report of the Railway Transport Committee.

Above all, we need a commitment from the federal government to work out some sort of agreement with the railways to provide the necessary funding for this very expensive undertaking. It seems to me that the government has been conspicuously silent on this report, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has been questioned on it in the House on many occasions. The only answer we can elicit from him is that he is discussing this matter with the railways, discussions which to date have led to nothing more than simple meetings. The minister's evasive and flippant answers can only lead us to believe that very little progress will be made so long as he is minister.

The CNR has indicated that in order to improve trackage to meet current requirements and the current projections of freight and payloads, something in the order of $5 billion will have to be spent over the next six year period. Our railways should be considered as a national asset and, if that is so, it behooves the government to take responsible leadership in this area.

The obligation of the government is clearly outlined in the National Transportation Act and in the Railway Act. The government has the power to compel the railways to maintain a safe and efficient railroad system. If the railways are short of funds, and since they are a vital asset, meaningful discussions should take place in an active way now to bring about a realistic program to upgrade our trackage and our roadbeds to meet our current requirements.

Furthermore, in addition to the infusion of funds and the requirement for a responsible and responsive government leadership, we need full public disclosure of all reports in connection with railroad accidents. In my opinion, the efficiency and safety of the railways is certainly a matter of public interest and public concern. That being the case, it follows that the public has the right to know what is going on in this important and vital area.

So, while I share the thrust and spirit of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Rimouski, I must say that I do not believe that we need a royal commission. I believe that we have sufficient facts and details before us to act upon them, and indeed to correct the substandard levels of operation and maintenance of railroading in Canada. It is not necessary at present to give the government something further behind which to hide. It has a clear responsibility and I urge it to act now. For this government talk is cheap at election time, but I tell its members that actions speak louder than words.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I will only intervene in this debate for a few minutes, because almost everything that can be said on the motion has been said by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), and I agree with almost everything they have said on the matter.

I was hoping that the hon. member for Vegreville would go slightly farther than he has been prone to do in the past toward a solution of this problem, among many others, in our transportation industry. The hon. member was correct when he said that the CTC has reported fully in the area of safety, regarding track maintenance, rolling stock and other kinds of equipment and facilities, but the government has not acted to any great extent. The CTC required implementation of some of its recommendations, but action to date has been totally insufficient.

May I say here that while there is a great deal to be critical about with regard to railways operations, the railways are still one of the safest ways to move people or goods, but at the rate railway accidents have increased, they will not keep up this good reputation. Since there is so little excuse for the increase in accident rates, it is incumbent on the government to require the railways to do better.

I wonder why the hon. member for Rimouski picked on the CNR. If he looked deeply enough he would find the CPR to be just as bad. Neither of them has anything to be proud of in the area about which the hon. member is complaining. In the whole area of track maintenance the railroads have done an abysmally bad job since the early 1960's. One has only to observe the ground from an aeroplane or a helicopter to see literally thousands of miles of trackage which still uses 65 and 85 pound rails made in 1910 or 1911, ties that are replaced at a rate of one third less than had been the practice previously, tracks grown over with weeds, and rails replaced with pieces of other rails once they are broken.

It is not unusual for maintenance and way crews to look after 40 miles of track, and I suggest much of that inspection is done by railway trucks running up and down the highway, parallel to the track.

When I worked for the railway the condition of the tracks was a matter of pride with the section foreman. He went over his track at least once a day, certainly prior to and after a train moving over it. He knew it like the back of his hand. I am not suggesting that crews today should look after five or six miles of track, but I am sure even with 15 or 16 miles to a crew it could be maintained and inspected.

Every year we get complaints from railway employees about lay-offs on rip tracks where small repairs to cars are done, or about lay-offs in railway repair shops. I believe that both railway companies are trying to get by on the cheap, and have reduced their priorities in regard to equipment, repair and maintenance. There has been evidence of understaffing for many years in maintenance and inspection of tracks and equipment.

Because of the railways' involvement in other enterprises there has been no increase in the budget for updating and maintenance of equipment and track. The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) mentioned the luxury hotels, the office buildings, apartment blocks and needles in which hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested while the railroads have deteriorated. The government has all the evidence it needs to deal with this problem. It has the authority, and if it needs any further authority it would be surprised at how quickly legislation would go through.

The government should look at transportation systems in the European countries on both sides of the iron curtain, and in Australia and Japan. All modes of transportation are treated as a public utility, owned, operated and regulated by a sort of public utilities board in these countries. Because of this they are operated as public utilities and they have to be maintained and kept up to date in the way that our municipalities control sewer and water systems, streets and sidewalks. Of course that may vary with the city. Some streets in the city of Ottawa look as if they are in the hands of private enterprise.

Publicly owned transportation systems get the priority they deserve. In our country, with its geography, climate and its widely scattered population, we should get rid of nineteenth century concepts in transportation. Our transportation needs today would be best fulfilled by a publicly owned and operated system. A system that is in the hands of the public would be more responsive to the public and to the needs of the economy, would provide adequate rail and other transportation, and certainly would be adequately maintained and updated.

It should not be necessary year after year for us to be concerned with something so obvious as the necessity of maintaining and updating plant and equipment. It is even being suggested now that the government should take over the road beds. I am sure the CPR would be happy about that, because they have deteriorated to the point that it would cost hundreds of millions of dollars to bring them up to standard. It would just be another way of bailing out the CPR. The government should tell the railroads to give a higher priority to capital expenditures on equipment, trackage, staff and inspection so that accidents and derailments can be reduced in number.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) who moved the motion has raised a matter that is of concern to all members of this House. I know it is of concern to western members because of the miles of track that go through that part of the country.

I was impressed with the argument put forward by the hon. member. In my part of Saskatchewan there have been several fairly major derailments in the last two or three years. I agree in principle with the point made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). The way to improve the safety performance of the railroads is not to appoint a royal commission, as the hon. member for Rimouski suggests, although there have been some tremendous ones in the past. The MacPherson Royal Commission looked into the question of railroads, and the Glassco Commission into government operations. They took a long time to prepare their reports. Royal commission recommendations are seldom implemented, because governments tend to put those reports on the shelves to gather dust, perhaps not intentionally.

I suggest that few royal commission recommendations are ever included in legislation or regulations. If they are included, usually this happens some years after a report is brought down. For that reason, I do not think that appointing a royal commission would expedite what the hon. member suggests in his motion, which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should study the advisability of establishing a Royal Commission on the notable shortcomings of Canadian railways and in particular CNR to increase the protection of the public in general and that of the employees in particular and to eliminate accidents and derailments of freight or passenger trains.

May I put on record figures relating to accidents over the past few years. The hon. member for Vegreville said that there has been a threefold increase in accidents and derailments but did not say what was his comparison base. According to figures provided to me, train derailments in 1970 totalled 276, in 1971, 265, in 1972, 323 and in 1973, 299. The increase has been slight, but not dramatic. Accidents involving car collisions and derailments totalled 53 in 1970, 66 in 1971, 76 in 1972 and 72 in 1973. The total number of accidents involving railroads as reported to the CBTC for 1970, 1971, 1972 and 1973 were 4,622, 4,721, 4,818 and 4,688 respectively. I know that such statistics do not mean much, but the mere fact they exist indicates we have a job to do with regard to safety.

I must point out that as our railways have been carrying more and more goods, the number of derailments has not increased to an alarming extent. As the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) said, if you look at what is happening in other modes of transport available for the movement of material you see that the record of the railways is very good. I suggest, therefore, that the route of the royal commission, which many governments have followed in the past, is not the route which the government ought to follow in this regard. It takes a long time before we see any benefit. I suggest it would be better to implement the recommendations which came out of the 1970 study.

We must make certain there is a good working relationship between the railway safety committee, which includes representations of unions, and the CTC and MOT officials. That route should be followed in order to ensure railway safety.

The government has chosen to go through a continuing process of improvement. Possibly in some areas the improvement is not as great as it might be. Many millions of dollars must be found to renew rail beds and ensure that goods carried by the railways are carried with greater safety. To this end the government provided money for the purchase of hopper cars used in the movement of grain. Unfortunately these cars cannot be loaded fully on all lines. That shows that we must upgrade the quality of our road beds so that we may use to the fullest extent these cars carrying grain and other commodities.

More money is to be available for CN capital acquisitions and for the upgrading of lines. Also, we need a railway monitoring system to identify specific problems as they arise, and to recommend solutions. The railways are meeting with shippers. Several studies are under way; they were initiated because of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference. The reports will be made available to the WEOC committee, some by the end of this year, and one early next year. They will deal with the condition of road beds across the west, primarily.

We are continuing our consultations with other provinces, as well as with the western provinces, on matters of this kind. As hon. members know, we are revising old policies and developing new policies in this area, as mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Without doubt, the job ahead of us is very big. It is one we must do if we are to make progress and go forward.

The government intends to influence and improve general railroad operations. I think the allegation made by the hon. member for Rimouski that the CNR does not perform as well as other railways is not borne out by evidence. I suggest that the CNR performs as well or as poorly—whichever way you want it—as any other railway. I could not help noting that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre included the CPR in his criticism. There is no reason why that company should not be included in this discussion.

Improvements have been and are being made in the CN system as a result of maintenance and other work carried out this year by CN. This will include the installation of 1,260 kilometres of new rail, which was more than was laid last year and the year before. In order to improve safety and capacity, CN is installing new signalling and communication facilities. Radio communications are being steadily improved. CN has been active in the search for and development of new techniques for several years, is seeking solutions for its own operating problems, and is involved in joint programs with the Department of Transport and CPR.

I assure the hon. member who moved the motion that the CNR reacts well to general government policies and is continuing to search for solutions to improve the safety of its operations.

In accordance with the duties imposed on the CTC by the Railway Act and the National Transportation Act, the commission is obliged to ensure that all railway operations in Canada are carried out in maximum safety. In order to isolate and identify factors involved in railway accidents and explore the effect on safety of the operation of longer and heavier trains, the commission undertook an inquiry into railway safety in 1970. Perhaps other hon. members are more familiar with it than I am. Some hon. members may have been involved in that inquiry. Public and general hearings were held, with the intention of designing measures which would promote and improve safety in this industry. I believe the hon. member for Vegreville said that about 6,000 pages of testimony were recorded at that time.

The initial report of the railway safety inquiry came out in April, 1972. This recorded the proceedings and hearings to do with causes and circumstances connected with specific accidents, and indicated that a dangerous commodities task force, an advisory committee on railway safety, and a new CTC accident investigation team would be established.

The third report came out in December, 1973, and contained the committee's findings and recommendations affecting specific areas such as signal systems, staff training, slide detector fences and other matters. This report indicated that the earlier formed railway safety advisory committee which consisted, as hon. members know, of representatives from CNR, CPR, commission experts and others, would work immediately on the conclusions and findings of the general inquiry, and provide a forum for discussions on matters affecting railway safety. The work of the advisory committee is on a continuing basis. As I say, if it is not doing the job I am the first to agree that pressure should be continually applied to ensure that indeed it does the job.

Between 20 and 25 per cent of all railway accidents occur at level crossings. I am sure that all hon. members can think back to not long ago when someone was killed at a level crossing. There again we are continually helping in the construction of signals and other protective devices for the safety and convenience of the public at level crossings.

However, as long as there are human beings we will encounter a certain number of accidents.

I do not know how low you can cut these accidents, but I can assure hon.members that the government and MOT will continue to strive to reduce the level, and to improve the safety and standards of our railroads. It will take a good deal of money to renew, rebuild and expand the rail network to accommodate the larger, heavier type of equipment that will be required in the next 10 or 15 years, but it must be done with an eye to the safety of people, both those operating the railroads and the general public. As I said, human error will always be with us.

I support the intent and principle of the motion, except that I believe we now have the necessary procedures. We have only to ensure they are working. I do not feel a royal commission would in any way help to resolve the problems outlined so well by the hon. member for Rimouski.

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, as this is my first occasion to speak in this House, may I personally extend my congratulations to you on your appointment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pearsall: I, too, wish to applaud the comments of the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard). However, I cannot in honesty support his desire or claim for a royal commission.

The hon. member's motion suggests that a royal commission could eliminate accidents, including derailments of freight and passenger trains. Despite its value I do not think any royal commission could stop a train, at a given position at a given time, if some crazy fool driver, such as a number we have in this country today, crosses a right of way.

I grew up in the west. At the age of three I travelled with my father from Vancouver to Calgary and back. I can recall the old steamers going through the various canyons of the Rockies. In those days our safety features left much to be desired. In that period we had some terrible times. Perhaps senior members of the House will recall some of the accidents that occurred, particularly in the Fraser Canyon.

In the past few years we have seen some remarkable changes take place in the Fraser Canyon. Many of the hazards that existed on both railroads have been practically eliminated. I agree they cannot all be eliminated in one or two years. I am sure hon. members who have spoken will agree with that.

We have a railway safety advisory committee which has been operative for a number of years. Hon. members know the people who are on this committee. But I do not know whether hon. members are aware of what this committee has been doing for the past few years. There are many places in British Columbia where the in-depth study, begun in 1970, has now become a reality, particularly in some of the more remote areas.

I do not know whether hon. members are aware that this committee has already looked into the design, installation, inspection and maintenance of railway signal systems. Many years ago this was undertaken "by guess and by golly" in some parts of the canyons and the Rockies. When the block system came in, it meant something.

We have now reached the electronic age. Because of the unit trains that have been brought in there is a desire for a more complete system of safety measures. This is what I am getting at in my comments.

The committee has studied the training of signal staff. Here we come to the human element. All too often this is the real cause of railroad accidents. We must not overlook this human factor, as it will always be with us.

I wish to deal with one area that was overlooked for many years, the hotbox and dragging equipment detectors. I do not know how many members watched trains go by at night with half a dozen hotboxes flaring like mad. No one seemed to bother. Today they have been eliminated. The railway safety committee has been doing its job.

The committee is also studying the identification and interpretation of signals by engine crews. There was a time when the crews had to work for hours and hours. The safety factor was not considered. The engineer and his fireman had to put in "X" number of hours before being relieved. I recall occasions in the early twenties when some of those men worked 23 or 24 hours without being relieved. Is it any wonder that accidents occurred?

Next I want to deal with the installation, operation and maintenance of slide detector fences. This is one of the finest jobs being done by our railroads. This work is being carried out in parts of my constituency by the B.C. railroad, CNR and CPR. It is being done to eliminate the dangers. We had one serious accident last winter. An inquiry was made into the matter, with the outcome that the situation has since been remedied. This came out of the railway safety committee.

I can understand the concern of the hon. member for Rimouski about these problems which exist in his part of the country, as they do also in mine. However, with the railway safety committee which we have, we do not need a royal commission. That would probably foul up everything. It would take over some of the work that is already in progress. In this case it is work which has been carried on for a number of years.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an Act to amend an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, just before five o'clock Your Honour called attention to the procedure to be followed on second reading and pointed out that our rules do not allow for detailed discussion of a bill clause by clause. My own remarks related to a general amendment which I hope will be incorporated in the bill. I merely indicated the clause at which it might be inserted. I had no intention of going through the bill clause by clause, because I knew it would be out of order to do so.

Just before the break for private members' hour I was about to quote from a public notice issued this year by the Federal Communications Commission in Washington, as follows:

> Whether effective or not, such broadcasts are clearly intended to be deceptive.

This House, Mr. Speaker, acting on behalf of the citizens of Canada, does not need to be convinced that these subliminal advertising techniques are effective. We have only to be convinced that they are intended to be deceptive in order to effect an amendment to Bill C-2. The Parliament of Britain took this decision ten years ago, in 1964, and I feel it is time for Canada to do the same in the interests of consumers.

Whether this is the appropriate bill in which to make this change in our law is open to question. However, I feel the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), as the minister responsible for the interests of all consumers in Canada, should be responsible for enforcing this regulation rather than the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier). As an alternative procedure I considered an amendment to a private member's bill sponsored by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) dealing specifically with children's advertising. The bill has been before the House already, on another occasion.

Criticism of my proposal has come from the advertising and broadcasting industries, suggesting that I propose to outlaw a myth. I respectfully suggest that the contention advanced by those who call the use of subliminal techniques "a myth" has been exploded. I have evidence that this technique has been used in Canada. I also have an assurance from the Canadian Advertising Advisory Board that it has no objection to parliament banning the use of this technique. In fact, it was the board which recommended to me that the easiest way in which to do this would be through an amendment to Bill C-2, now before us. I know the House has other pressing matters before it, but I trust hon. members will take time in which to review this proposal.

Since my endeavour to ban subliminal advertising became public a few months ago I have received letters and phone calls from consumers across Canada endorsing my position. The Canadian Civil Liberties Association and the Council of Women of Ottawa and Area are two groups I should like to mention in this regard.

As of August 21, 1974, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters has banned the use of subliminal techniques in children's advertising. No similar ban on commercials directed to adults has yet been effected by CAB. I would point out that a ban on the use of such techniques in all advertising was imposed by the National Association of Broadcasters in the United States in 1958. However, in 1974 this self-regulatory code was still being abused. I quote from public notice No.08055 dated January 24, 1974, issued by the Federal Communications Commission in Washington regarding the offending advertisement I cited earlier:

> Despite the Code Authority's action, some stations apparently continued to broadcast spots containing the "Get it" statement.

Surely the House should follow the much more effective example of the United Kingdom, rather than follow an approach by self-regulation which clearly does not work.

Parliament should put the responsibility for misleading and deceptive advertising where it truly belongs, that is to say, with the manufacturers of products who become clients of advertising agencies.

I have a letter from the advertising agency which produced the children's toy advertisement I cited earlier. The agency stated:

> We seriously questioned the advisability of using the subliminal "Get it" and so informed the client. The client, however, insisted that it be put in. Under such circumstances . . . we had no choice but to put it in.

This may not be an isolated situation. However, it is the only one which has been discovered. It was not discovered by the self-regulatory body, C.A.A.B.; it was discovered by Robert Choate in Washington who brought it to the attention of the FCC there. In Canada action was taken to amend the children's code of ethics nine months after the advertisement was used.

I respectfully submit that Bill C-2 is the legislative instrument which could be used to rid Canada of this dangerous and deceptive practice. I hope all members, especially those on the other side of the House who are apparently in agreement with what I have been saying, will support Bill C-2 on second reading so that it can be referred, at an early date, to the committee where these matters can be dealt with fully.

● (2010)

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, the fact that consumers need a more adequate voice has had the support of this parliament since 1967, and it has had the support of all balanced people I have met in the business community no matter in what scale of endeavour they are involved. The bill we are considering is "to overcome the bad effects of concentration and misleading advertising in the market place". That is a very well thought out and worded concept, and I agree with its thrust.

The purpose of the Combines Investigation Act, and again I quote "is to assist in maintaining effective competition as a prime stimulus to the achievement of maximum production, distribution and employment in a mixed system of public and private enterprise". Again this wording is concise, and I must compliment the work of the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs who served the twenty-ninth parliament. However, I seriously question the ability of this measure in its present form, unfinished, I must suggest, to achieve these desired goals.

I would seriously question the sincerity of the government in its repeated attempts to serve the consumer. Since October, 1967, this country has had four ministers and seven years' work leading up to the legislation we are debating now. I would ask the indulgence of the House to allow me to go back to Hansard of October 13,1967, in order to put a few things in perspective. Let me quote from what was said by the minister then in charge of the Department of the Registrar General. He said at that time, as reported at page 3068 of Hansard:

I believe, sir, that a significant step was taken earlier, when the Department of the Registrar General was established in 1966, at which time we brought together for the first time a number of functions relating to corporations, combines, patents, trade marks and bankruptcies, in order to ensure the better coordination of policy in these fields.

I would ask hon. members to remember the word coordination, which was part of the concept and concern of the minister at that time. I go on to quote the minister from the same page:

The consumer's association of Canada appealed to the government as early as 1960 and on numerous later occasions to create a department which would be responsible for the interests of consumers.

It is now 14 years since that initial request was made as stated that day. Let me refer again to the same speech where the minister stated:

The opinion that consumers need a more adequate voice in government has received parliamentary support.

That was said on October 13, 1967, and I believe that idea has had parliamentary support since. Let me continue to quote from the debate of that day, at page 3107 as follows:

The present Department of the Registrar General and the agencies now grouped within it will be continued under a department with a new name, the department of corporate and consumer affairs, to which will be added two further responsibilities; first, the responsibility to coordinate programs for consumer affairs at the federal level, initiate new programs, and so on; second, the responsibility for representing the federal government in the area of corporate securities.

Let me now quote an interesting sidelight to the debate of that date. This was the same minister speaking, and he was referring to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Neilsen) and the present hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). He said:

I should like to say to the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Bow River in particular, in answer to some of their suggestions, that this department will not be a bureaucratic monster. On one occasion I said that if you want to use the vocabulary of the octopus of government, this is not a new tentacle; it is a rearrangement of the existing tentacles, and no more.

Again during that debate, and for the second time in the same day, he referred to the responsibility for coordination of acts under this department by stating:

[Mr. Huntington.]

I should like to say also that this department will not involve more government spending. When I spoke on my estimates I said that this year the department would have an expenditure of $8 million, less $6 million by way of revenue in respect of patent applications, bankruptcies, incorporation applications, and so on; so, the cost to the Canadian taxpayer will be between $1.5 million and $2 million. There will be not additional cost of any significance because, as I said, aside from the hiring of certain specialists in the area of consumer affairs most of the staff is available in the various agencies of the federal government.

The minister at that time was extremely concerned as evidenced by those comments, but what has happened since 1967? We must look at the growth of this embryo reorganization or this rearrangement of the tentacles. The corporate and consumer affairs of 1967-68 involved a vote of $11,338,000. The consumer affairs' portion was $4 million. In the recent estimates for 1974-75 that $11 million has grown to more than $43,755,000, and the consumers' part involves over $17.5 million. I would ask you to remember the original estimate of the cost in 1967, namely $1.5 million to $2 million. I suggest the tentacle rearrangement has grown into an octopus.

The anti-business feeling in this country grows in almost direct proportion to the increase in government spending. If this rate of growth keeps up the bankruptcy branch of this department is going to be very busy.

This legislation has been debated for over seven years, and is now being presented to us in an unfinished state. We are now being asked by the minister to let a committee finish it. Why we are being asked to do that? As a backbencher my resources and time do not allow me to participate fully in this committee, yet my constituents and the people of that area of this country from which I come demand that I show an interest in this type of legislation.

The minister has a budget of $43,755,000. Has the government become tired and does it now admit it cannot do the job? Can it not give us a tidy presentation, properly researched, in order that we can vote on it in principle on second reading? Why are the amendments being kept in the wings? Why have they not been tabled for the consideration of members in caucus? I would ask why is there all this mystery?

We have seen rule by regulation, then rule by ministerial discretion, and now we are seeing rule by commission. This has all taken place since 1967, and I suggest it has left the business sector of Canada with a confused decision making base. I do not think that the problems we see today in Italy, Britain, Japan and in the United States will be easily solved, but one of our first steps must be an attack against this confusion of decision making based here in Canada.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) referred to our balance of payments. Let me remind the minister that 55 per cent of commercial activity in this country involves small business, and small businesses do not have the resources to handle the confusion and legislative load that are resulting from the change in the tax act.

Surely clean, tidy legislation under the control of parliament is the least the minister should offer the country and parliament at this time. Regulatory fever is rampant in this government. Business is starting to operate defensively. I mentioned the trouble other trading nations with which we deal are facing. Trivia and regulations are snuffing out the light and fire of Canadian business. The standard of living of the Canadian people is very dependent on a vital, aggressive business community.

The previous speaker mentioned the scale of business, and the fact that if people in the Canadian work force wish to have a decent standard of living they would have to work for large companies. That may be so, but a large portion of the community is the small business segment. It is this segment which suffers as a result of such self-imposed legislation.

It is a sad fact of life that people who abuse their freedom in the performance of business functions, through overzealous acts of self-interest, are the cause of this type of legislation. If these people had compassion for those who work with them, under them, and around them, there would not be a need for this type of legislation.

I have not noted in respect of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs any expenditure of talent or effort directed toward the business community, the present managers and new managers, so that they would have an awareness of the importance of their function and the importance of serving the people, the employees, the customers, the suppliers, the community and the country. Nowhere in Bill C-2, or in the work of the department, do I find any indication of effort in this direction. If there had been a move in this direction in 1968 I doubt very much if there would be need for such a bill being debated in this House today. Where is the corporate part of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in this area of educational need? I ask the minister to give this consideration because here is an area that is waiting to be serviced.

I should now like to turn to the aspect of the bill in respect of misleading statements and advertising. The minister in this bill, and in statements to the media, offers strict rules of conduct for private enterprise. He has threatened these sinister people with jail and fines. I agree. People who abuse these freedoms and privileges and the licence they are given, as well as the responsibility they have in the performance of their duties in the best interest of society, deserve to be punished.

But why does the minister apply these rules of his just society—if I may use that term—to only one minority group? What process of logic causes the minister to exclude other aspects of our community from his sanctions? What about political parties and politicians who use misleading statements or misleading advertising, or who are guilty of not having kept promises? Frankly, I would mention stuffed ballot boxes at both ends of the country. Why are there not fines and jail sentences for this group which lacks credibility in statements to the public?

In several speeches in this debate the government has been brought to task for misleading statements and promises, as well as misleading advertising. We had the example of the advertising in respect of the limited coin edition. We also had the example of the Canada Savings Bond being advertised as a safe vehicle. Surely this is misleading advertising.

The 1972-1973 report of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on page 11 exaggerates by 100,000 the caseload involved. Is this misleading or is it an honest mistake? Then we have the purchasing power of annuities and pensions, with continuing two digit inflation. Is this honest? I do not know of an easier way to steal.

Why are union monopolies, which have such a tremendous impact on competition and consumer prices, exempt under this legislation? Why are the "sweetheart" deals that we hear about not subject to the same sanctions in the minister's just society? Is the Inspector General of Banks to be kept on a continuing diet of budgetary want like the Auditor General, or are the banks to be denied their share in this just society the minister speaks about? Why does the minister pick on one small minority group? Does this bill interrelate properly with provincial legislation, or will it merely create a new set of problems.

We know what happened in respect of the marketing boards of this country. Does this bill co-ordinate and interrelate properly with other legislation which will be presented to us in this parliament by the same minister? Are we to be allowed any insight into this? What size of corporation does the minister suggest will be subject to regulation by the commission?

The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is given extremely wide powers over the distribution process in Canada. It will have power to regulate business under civil law, with criminal powers to back it up. It can make its own rules of proceedings. Here we have more arbitrary government, and more rule by regulation. Surely such a commission should be responsible to parliament through the minister, or will we in the future have to put up with another minister who does not have the power to answer because the commission or board is outside his jurisdiction? Where are the members of the commission to come from, Mr. Speaker? Will they be political appointees, or will they be men of experience and knowledge, with ability to regulate wisely without influence or favour. Am I being too idealistic in expecting that? How many members will be on the commission? I ask the minister to think again about some of the questions which I raise as a result of my reading and homework in respect of Bill C-2. It will eliminate some of the immoral conduct of the marketplace, and this is good. I sanction that aspect of the bill. It should be widened to include political activities, government activities and union activities.

Mr. Benjamin: Heil Hitler.

Mr. Huntingdon: Bill C-2, in the form in which it is presented, will not stop inflation; it will not stop rising prices; it will not increase competition; it will not hurt or impede the big guy; it will not improve the decision making base of Canada. I cannot see how the purpose will be achieved. I cannot see how the bill in its present form will provide a prime stimulus to the achievement of maximum production, distribution and employment in either the private or the public sector of the country. As it is presented to me, it would appear to be misleading advertising.

● (2030)

In closing may I say that if it is the wish of the House that this bill go to committee, instead of back to the drafting table where it belongs, where there are available the resources and the staff that the minister has at his disposal, then we have a lot of work ahead of us. Will we be given the time and the resources in committee to do the right job for our constituents, our country and this thirtieth parliament? The workload imposed on the members of this parliament in the less than 30 days that we have been sitting is almost unbelievable to me, a man off the street; it is almost insulting to intelligent people. In my opinion the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) should be moved over to the ministry in charge of railroads.

I will close with these remarks: legislation based on a broad, consistent philosophy should not arrive in pieces; it should be co-ordinated, as the minister in charge of the formation of this department said on October 13th, 1967.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate on this bill which has been called the competition bill, but which in effect does not deal with the problems of competition which are outside its scope. Nevertheless, I think this is a good opportunity to take part in a debate on the effects of competition on our economy and national life.

I agree with the aim of the bill, but it seems to me that there is serious doubt as to whether it will accomplish what it sets out to do. Also, I believe that perhaps its basic tenets should be questioned. We should ascertain at what level competition should exist, and in what manner.

We have entered into an era of consumer concern and consumer interest because of the modern philosophy that anyone who performs a service or manufactures an article is essentially considered to perform a poor service, or to do poor workmanship, unless the government is there to oversee it. The consumer, on the other hand, according to the current mode of thinking, must always have perfect service and perfect articles. We recognize that there are people in our society who think that the service that they receive is always poor, and the articles they purchase always defective. We recognize that such people are present in our society, and to provide a system of competition tailored to their needs would be almost impossible.

This attitude has been made worse by our present method of job creation. Many people are not producers either in the manufacturing or in the service areas, and often they have little concept of what is involved in providing a service or manufacturing an article. Similarly, as a result of automation the narrow scope of many jobs gives little opportunity to an individual to understand the complexity of many services, and the complexity of the manufacture of many products.

I believe that the attitude that service should be always perfect and manufactured articles flawless has been aggravated by the great difficulty of getting top rate people to fill executive positions. A classic example can be found in our hospitals where it is increasingly difficult to find well trained people to accept the top positions. There are many people in the lower categories of employment in hospitals who could take on more complicated executive posts, and yet they are content to work at lower levels because their take home pay is almost the same and they do not have to shoulder the heavier responsibilities.

I make these observations because I think they have a fundamental bearing on competition within our economy.

The rise of consumerism is very real, and much greater attention is being paid to it than in the past. At the same time consumers have been demanding a higher and higher level of service and quality of goods. Also at the same time many factors in our economy work against the provision of a high level of service. Some people would suggest that this is due to the profit motive, but I suggest that many other factors are working against providing the high level of service required in our society.

What about the aim of the bill before us, and what are some of the things it may do? So far as industrial strategy is concerned, this legislation grew out of the interim report on competition policy issued by the Economic Council of Canada in 1969. That was five years ago. No studies have been undertaken by the government, or by any other agency, on what the consequences have been since that time of a strict regulation of domestic competition on Canada's competitive position in the world markets. Since I came here six years ago it has always been the view of the government that we should have a Canadian industrial strategy, but it has never been clear what this should be, Mr. Speaker. Invariably it was considered to mean a reduction in the export of raw materials and an increase in the export of manufactured goods.

It has been known for a long time that in our foreign trade we have had a deficit in manufactured goods, and there are no signs of improvement. In 1972 we had a deficit of $1,505 million in fabricated and end products. In 1973 the deficit was $2,207 million, and in 1974 it could well go to $4 billion. If it were not for the strong position of our raw materials surplus we would be very badly off insofar as foreign trade is concerned.

This bill could have a profound effect on the industrial economy of the country. For instance, one of the great earners of foreign exchange for Canada has been prairie grain. In the six years that I have been here the government has made the productivity of that part of the country more difficult to achieve. Indeed, after the settlement of the west coast grain strike which has contributed to inflation, and the settlement of the maritime strike on the great lakes, farmers have been discouraged from producing more grain. This is partly due to the government's past actions in not ensuring the smooth flow of grain and in allowing a stoppage in grain handling by a small group of people.

This bill does not do anything about Crown corporations, or about the three levels of government that are often responsible for preventing competition. It is those three levels of government that have often been the culprits in preventing competition and, as a result, preventing services from being provided. I will outline how the government of Canada and its offshoot, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the Manitoba government and its offshoot, the Manitoba telephone system, have prevented my riding from receiving a second television channel, and this in the name of good government, although in reality it was interference in the broadcasting business.

For the number of years most of the riding that I represent has had only one TV channel from Yorkton, Saskatchewan, which was classified as a CBC Affiliate. Numerous efforts were made to try to get a second network, CTV, into the area. After long and extensive hearings, finally the CRTC approved the application of Moffatt Communications Ltd., to provide service for a second channel.

In the meantime CBC had bought the antenna situated on Baldy Mountain in the Duck Mountain Provincial Park. That was sold to it by the private station in Yorkton, the Skinner interest. The Baldy Mountain tower is the only spot that will cover the area with a proper TV signal. Moffatt Communications applied for permission to situate their tower on this Baldy Mountain spot, but were refused permission by the Manitoba government.

In negotiations the Canadian Broadcasting Company has demanded $15,000 to strengthen the present tower for the CTV antenna, plus $10,000 a year for rental. Privately, this could be made available through another broadcasting company for $10,000, and rental of $5,000 per year, just half of what the CBC is charging, but they are prevented from using this by the actions of the Manitoba government.

Now the federal government enters into it. Another park comes between the tower and the Brandon station. It is Riding Mountain National Park which is run very poorly. It would have been necessary to instal a microwave tower but this was vetoed by the federal government on the grounds that it would detract from the wilderness aspect of the park.

As well, the Manitoba government and Communications Canada have almost made it a policy that there will be no private microwave communications set up, at least in the province of Manitoba. The alternate way to carry the signal is through the Manitoba Telephone System but, here again, the prices quoted for carrying the signal have been high, and considered by the private company to be exorbitant. That is why Moffatt Communications have wanted to have their own private microwave system. Whether or not the Manitoba Telephone System, which is very much the arm of the Manitoba government, has made a fair quotation, I do not know. But the fact is that the Manitoba Telephone System is in a monopoly position, and there in not even an independent board to examine whether or not its quotation is reasonable.

I cannot see that this bill will be useful in preventing this kind of extortion. The federal government, the provincial government, the CBC which is a Crown corporation, and the Manitoba Telephone System are combining to prevent a second television channel. Will this bill prevent such a thing? The answer seems to be absolutely not. In this case it is not the huge private corporations that are preventing competition; it is our own two governments, our own public corporations.

I should now like to turn to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, which is an integral part of this bill. The aim of this commission will be to judge whether or not certain business practices are within the realm of fair competition or are restrictive. The government contends that it will be in the interests of small business. The commission itself is seemingly going to interpret the situations that come before it on a legal basis rather than a commercial basis.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what may seem like a legal discriminatory practice in the commercial world becomes not so clear in the legal world. Many small businesses are able to carry on because they have exclusive agencies in their area. But, if a supplier must sell to all people merchandising in that area, such as small chain stores, the small businessman is soon put at a disadvantage. Much merchandise in our society is not sold on a strictly price basis. Most small retail establishments are viable, not because they sell cheaper than large chain stores but because of the personality of their owner, or their manager, or their clerks, and because they have certain exclusive lines.

To do away completely with exclusive selling rights, at least in retailing, would probably do much more harm than good. I can give you an example that actually happened in my area. An individual retailing a certain brand of paint found that his competitor, a fairly large retail store, was able to retail the paint at less than his actual wholesale cost. He had no alternative but to cease carrying on his business.

There are many examples of where a small business would be put at a very decided disadvantage if this clause were completely carried out. There is no doubt that, on a strictly price basis, large chain stores have enormous advantages inherent in their structure over the small private business.

Then again I notice that when there are violations of various government regulations by business, it is invariably the small businessman who gets penalized. He has not the expertise or the legal help available that large corporations have. Furthermore, a conviction against him is much more damaging to him as his clientele know him, than it is to a countrywide retailing organization.

Government commissions that are expected to show some results for their efforts, have a tendency to clobber the easiest available victim. After all, most of these commissions have to show some evidence of earning their keep, and the small individual is the easiest to intimidate.

Again, many of the government's tests for a basis of measurement, are open to serious question. One I have heard of is that meat inspectors take only one gram of meat to test for fatty content. Mr. Speaker, this is far too small a sampling to arrive at any real assessment of the fat and lean content of the meat.

I think everyone is in favour of increasing competition, but the methods whereby we assess and lay down the guidelines are extremely important not just to competition but to the whole pattern of industrial life in this country. Under this bill the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission seems to be adopting a decidedly legal viewpoint. But the legal view of what industry and commerce should be doing as regards competition is vastly different from the practical aspects of business. The effect of this commission can be nationwide, and can shape the commercial activity of the country for decades to come.

Contrary to the stated aim the commission will be biased against the small individual businessman as opposed to the large corporations, and since the whole thrust of government is overwhelmingly against small business it makes one wonder if, for all its good intentions, the net effect will be a further curtailment and harassment of small business life. I hope that in committee we will get a few more of the answers, Mr. Speaker. I think it is unfortunate that the bill, which had extensive hearings in committee last time, was not reintroduced with the amendments that the minister has stated will be brought forward.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this bill, but since the hon. members from the opposition are so persistent, I deemed it proper to intervene and invite them to put an end to this discussion so that this bill may be referred to the committee. We are still at the second reading stage of a legislation dealing with combines investigation for the benefit of the consumers.

The main amendments, as stated by the minister, will especially deal with definitions, investigators' powers and infractions. This bill, the content of which is similar to that of bill C-227 tabled in the House on November 5, 1973, and to that of bill C-7 which was tabled on February 28, 1974 and died on the order paper because of the general election has had no luck at all, Mr. Speaker.

I think the opposition has kept very well in mind the recommendations of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in June 1971, while he insisted upon the fact this bill aimed, and I quote:

to promote discussion rather than enforcement—

For once the Minister was listened to. However, after having heard many opposition speakers, I am afraid that such discussion may drag on probably because of a lack of precision from the Minister regarding the proposed amendments.

I understand that the minister wants to put more bite into the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission which has certainly failed to do the job expected from it, but at the same time extremes must be avoided.

The first purpose of this bill is to specify certain prohibitions dealing with trade practices which are detrimental to the Canadian consumers, prohibitions creating offences, and to bring in desirable amendments to existing prohibitions.

On reading this bill clause by clause, we find that it deals with everything to give more scope to the definitions and to give the investigators more work to do; there will be more of them, and thus more summonses and steeper fines.

I sometimes wonder whether that will protect the small businessmen, including farmers, while offering the consumer one last hope. I doubt it, Mr. Speaker, for it is proved by experience that the big multi-national companies like the huge cartels, in production as well as in marketing, will always find a way to pay the accountants, economists and lawyers needed to evade the law or to avail themselves of some protection of which the people will be unaware.

In his statement, the minister listed the topics dealt with in the bill such as, for instance, advertising. He wants to be stricter and suggests that the committee should also be more severe with regard to advertising. Mr. Speaker, I agree with him on that point, and wonder why the bill was not introduced before the election: it would certainly have created a furore during the campaign.

As for "misleading advertising", I do not have to give many examples. A little while ago, we talked about bad advertising for children. I think that the Crown Corporation and private networks, like all news media, should come under the provisions of this legislation and cease misleading the Canadian people. I am confident that the members of the committee will be patient enough to listen and to implement the advice of those who will appear before them.

Then, the hon. Minister, speaking about "dual pricing", said and I quote:

Then any sale at a price other than the lower of two or several prices is prohibited in the case of double ticketed product.

In my opinion, if we dug deeper, we could get to the famous legislation on fraudulent bankruptcies. I have noticed it several times, because I have been in business for forty years and I know that the company or the fellow who goes bankrupt fraudulently comes out much richer than before.

After having establish two companies, a purchase company and a "resale" company, thus being able to sell at a price lower than the billing, causing prejudice to all other dealers and even threatening to make some honest dealers go bankrupt, the bankrupt will not be prepared, after a couple of weeks, to start a new business. That is sheer honesty. A section of the fraudulent bankruptcies legislation deals with that situation.

As far as "pyramid selling" is concerned, we agree that legislation should be more rigid. You can be assured of our support on this.

A little further, the bill deals with the "refusal to sell". On that matter, we must be very careful. I shall give a few examples, particularly that of a farmer who, almost every fall, will sell 2,000 to 3,000 bags of potatoes to a big supplier at $2 a bag and the remainder will be sold out to the retailer at $2.50 a bag.

If this bill were implemented, the farmer would be in serious trouble, because he sells to small dealers at $2.50 a bag potatoes which he sold for $2 to the big supplier. The committee will certainly have representations to make on this matter.

I think "gift selling" could be added to "tied selling". That is the big scheme today. Big companies try to sell second-quality goods by offering a gift of little value. The customer is mainly attracted by the gift, and she will buy the merchandise to get it. In my opinion, this clause of the bill will provide some protection to the consumer.

In our regions, and I assume that the same goes for all others, there is a "market restriction", that is territorial limitation in order to avoid competition from outside. I think that if this bill is accepted, it will outwit many companies that want to control each and every territory and maintain prices in all sectors.

As for proceedings for damages and losses resulting from conduct contrary to the legislation I wonder—I keep asking myself the same question—whether it is fair for the small businessman, distributor or producer who will be affected by this clause. I should like the clause to be broad enough to cover the big tradesmen.

Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of submitting the private enterprise to a healthy competition, since it was honest competition that normalized consumer prices in the past. To achieve this, we need laws. I say once again here tonight that lack of competition is as detrimental in production as it is in marketing.

Today we live in an era of large mergers, national and international cartels, absolute controls over marketing and, we must admit, over production.

Producers, I would say thousands of them, paid with the life of their business for the elimination of this competition under the false pretext of profitability.

If the government is really serious, it will have to come to grips with the most dictatorial of all since it is the cause of stagnation. Because of that, the legislation we pretend to improve today achieve nothing. I am referring to the monopoly of banks. I think that is the first that eliminated any competition among banks. It will be the first to re-establish order so that we finally control the discounts of the Bank of Canada and the freeze, if necessary.

Only with those basic controls shall he begin to work in the interest of consumers so that they no longer pay two, three or even five times the price of goods and services necessary for their survival.

I hope that the bill will be sent to the Standing Committee to give the public a chance to be heard, especially by the government.

The government was accused of not having detailed its amendments enough. Members of the committee should seize the opportunity to introduce amendments and invite regional bodies to appear before the committee.

I hope that this time, Bill C-2 will not "die" in committee but will be reported back to the House for third reading.

[English]

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister on his new portfolio. I wish him well in what is going to be a very difficult and, I am sure, exciting area of work.

I am sure all members of parliament, certainly those on this side, agree that the elements of this bill which have to do with consumer legislation need to be passed, and passed rapidly. I do not think anyone opposes legislation to restrict pyramid selling, subliminal advertising, misleading advertising and so forth. Such actions should have been prohibited long ago. The sooner they are dealt with, the better off we will be.

The fundamental thrust of this bill, especially certain parts of the legislation, are of great significance. In fact, I feel this legislation is as important to the ongoing economic development of the country as the budget which will be presented quite soon.

Not surprisingly we have had legislation to deal with competition for a long time. In fact we have had anti-combines legislation for almost 100 years, the first being introduced by the Conservative party, and so it is not unusual that we would support this type of bill. But we want it to be a bill responsive to the fundamental needs of the notion.

In the British tradition as a nation we have taken the position that the way in which the consumer is best protected is by the operation of truly competitive markets. Anyone who has followed the development of classical economic policy knows very well that it is difficult to dispute the fact that when you have competitive markets you have the optimum allocation of resources, and the greatest production possible in the economy. Indeed, for many years it also was argued that a competitive economy automatically assured levels of full employment.

In addition, and again in the British tradition, it was believed that with many small firms operating there was the maximum amount of political freedom. It is not a matter of accident that the great British libertarians such as Acton and John Stuart Mill believed in competitive markets.

Many of the arguments advanced for competition bills and competition legislation have not been economic. And it is not a coincidence that countries such as Germany and others on the European continent, which have never been interested in maintaining competitive markets, have had great difficulty in developing democratic processes such as we have in this country.

Underlying this legislation is therefore not only the whole question of effective markets but also the question of the concentration of power and, indeed, associated with that, the question of true economic freedom.

There was no challenge to the proposition that there was need for strong competition legislation until the 1930's when Lord Keynes introduced his general theory, which demonstrated that there was no automated guarantee that competitive markets alone assured full employment. As a consequence of the depression, emphasis on the goals of full employment and price stability have become so great that interest in competition legislation has dropped to a very considerable extent.

In fact since 1946 we have neglected competition policy to a very dangerous degree. Indeed, the adoption of a Keynesian philosophy, that we could get full employment and price stability by broad macro-economic policies led many to believe that competition policy really did not matter. Since 1946 we in this country have had no effective anti-competition policy at all.

Perhaps it was only by chance that the rise in interest in monetary and fiscal policy as the tools for attaining full employment and price stability came along at exactly the same time as great changes in technology, a large increase in transport facilities, great increases in communication systems, the possibility of serving larger markets, economies of scale, the development of multi-national firms, the development of agro-business and the change from the isolated local union to the great national unions, but the results of these changes also led to a decline in interest in competition policy.

In fact over the last 30 years the power and size of certain sectors of our economy have become so large it is really a fundamental question of whether traditional anti-combines policy makes any sense. I am sure everyone knows that some economists, particularly Professor Galbraith of Harvard, have taken the position that anti-combines policy is ineffective in many areas and that it is a waste of time to try and put it into effect. It is argued by such people that certain sectors of our society are so large they are not responsive to what is happening in the economy, but make the economy operate for their benefit. If this is true—and markets are not competitive and cannot be made competitive—will traditional economic policies designed to bring about price and employment stability, work?

Why is it, one has to ask, we have not been able to achieve full employment and price stability at the same time in recent years? Why is it that broad policies do not work in the way they are expected to work? Is it because of the structure of our markets? If so, is there any chance that anti-combines policy will be able to assure a structure that will permit broad policies to work more effectively? Perhaps more important, have we reached a stage at which we may have lost many individual freedoms which are associated with the competitive market structure? Again, it has been argued strongly that large concentrations of power do not really make much difference because they countervail each other. This is the Galbraith thesis—there is no point in trying to break up large economic units because they constitute an effective brake against each other. However, in an article by Richard Goodwin recently on the dilemma of the United States economy, the point was made that these forces are apparently no longer countervailing. It does not make sense in this day and age, according to this author, to argue that large business conglomerations are countervailed by large unions and big government when, in fact, they all work together.

All of us hear the argument advanced that things are happening to society and to people that nobody wants to happen, even those who bring these things about, because the economy and the bureaucracy are so large and complex.

Therefore, in assessing competition legislation we have to consider these things: first, has the structure of our economy changed so much as a result of the economics of scale that the economic policies we put into effect in order to cope with inflation or bring about full employment simply will not now work? The evidence indicates that this may be the case. The question then arises: why don't they? The answer may be that these measures cannot work because there are concentrations of economic and political power. If this is so, we must seek, when looking at this legislation, to try to reverse the tendencies which are now in effect, or at least to examine the implications of these changes.

In the second place, can we in fact maintain individual freedom and liberty amid such concentrations of power? If not, how do we deal with competitive market structures? Where this legislation is terribly lacking is that it does not recognize all large power segments in our society. The question to be considered is not the simplistic question of whether or not we need more competition. That is not the serious issue. The serious issue is whether or not, after two decades of no really effective anti-trust laws, does it make any sense to talk about this sort of legislation at all, and, if not, what are the alternative ways of protecting the consumer?

We know that what we are getting in terms of economic performance is very strange. We are astonished when interest rates rise and inflation does not slow down. The reason must be that the structure of the economy is changing dramatically, and the old techniques are no longer working.

In another sense, what does this legislation mean in terms of the retention of freedom in the economy as a whole? The essence of the competitive system is to bring a high degree of individual freedom, initiative and opportunity into economic performance. If we allow the concentration of power which has gone on for so long to continue, shall we be able to retain those freedoms which are so important to us?

Associated with all this is the fact that we are moving away from the dominance of the rule of law to the rule of men. In this legislation, just as in the Foreign Investment Review Act, a tribunal is being appointed with no clear or definite indication of what the tribunal is to do. Democracy cannot survive when the rule of men replaces the rule of law.

We have taken away from parliament in the past few years the function of being the trustee of the people's money. It is impossible for members of parliament to review the estimates in any effective fashion. It may be that sheer growth has done this. However, this does not remove from us the responsibility for looking carefully at the serious issues which are before the country and I suggest to the minister that the manner in which the legislation has been considered up to this stage makes it important that we go back to the committee, call witnesses and examine the fundamental issues involved. Today we are not really in a parliament which is the same as that of the last few years.

No observer of the economic forces which have been unleashed in the world today can be sanguine about the way in which the economic situation is developing. What will really destroy the system of democracy is a continued pretence that things have not changed. There is an unreadiness to face economic realities.

The reality of the Canadian economy is that we have developed large segments in which competition is not present. We have never acknowledged this in realistic fashion; we have always found reasons to exempt certain sections from the play of market forces. The net result is that policies which once worked, and which we hope will work, will not work any more.

Consequently I hope the minister who is responsible for this legislation will in fact agree that, when we go back to the committee, we should take a look at the legislation again in a broader sense, and that it be studied to see whether there are sectors in the economy that are fundamentally non-competitive that must be brought in to the bill, but which are not now in the bill simply because of the way our society and economy are organized. The problems for our economic system and our democratic government are indeed very serious.

The belief is growing on the part of more and more people in this country that governments are not able to deal with the problems which most people face. There is evidence to suggest that these people may be right. We have evidence over the last five years that would indicate that perhaps we cannot obtain relatively stable prices.

People are beginning to really believe that we cannot have stable prices. We have forgotten the proposition that people have the hope of owning their own homes, valued at about two and half times their annual income. Perhaps we do not believe that is possible any longer. We have forgotten the proposition that we can solve some of these national energy problems, and people are beginning to believe that governments cannot govern.

People are constantly being reinforced in the feeling that governments refuse to look at the reality of many issues. It seems to me that the real question is whether the government will have the courage and the conviction to look at the structure of the Canadian economy and assess whether the 19th century competition approach is valid, or whether the Canadian economy has changed to the degree that our learned contemporary fiscal and monetary policies will not now work. The government must decide whether our current policies will work or whether they are counterproductive.

Until these questions are answered, the bill in its present form is not ready to become law.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I am always a little hesitant when I follow the learned hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), particularly on a subject covering an area that has been grey for quite sometime, but an area that we are now trying to bring into sharp contrast. I should, in any event, like to add my congratulations to those already expressed to the minister in his new portfolio. I wish him well.

As has been pointed out, there are a number of good points in this legislation such as those in respect of referral and pyramid selling. Sometimes I feel that those areas have been looked after under provincial legislation. I wonder sometimes if we are not duplicating already existing legislation for the purpose of putting window dressing on a bill that is very difficult to sell to the people.

My concerns this evening are not in that very wide and general concept covered by the hon. member for Don Valley. My concerns this evening are in respect of that segment of industry with which I am reasonably familiar, namely, the construction industry.

The construction industry lives and thrives on competition. All construction type projects are subject to competitive bid, so that competition is not entirely new to the construction industry. Yet in the past we have found that some contractors run afoul of the combines legislation. I suppose it is fair to ask why they run afoul of this law.

If anyone who has been involved with a construction industry asks himself why this could happen he will immediately realize that pricing is tough in this industry and, when things are difficult, you cut back, and cut back again. This is the general situation in this segment of industry. People often have difficulty meeting overheads, and on occasion some contractors get together in order to avoid bankruptcy. In this way prices gradually work back up to the point where contractors can begin to survive again. It is in this way that these people can run afoul of combines legislation.

I see new dangers inherrent in this new legislation that I have not seen previously. There is a whole range of fees now being charged by realtors, engineers, architects and, while I normally do not have much sympathy for them, even lawyers. If these people happen to charge a fee which is exactly the same as the fee charged by a competitor I see the possibility of them running afoul of this legislation. Once again these people operate in an area that is generally considered to be covered by provincial legislation. I question the need of driving a tack with a sledgehammer, as we perhaps seem to be doing in this area.

We must also consider the small businessman who runs, for example, a little electric sub-contracting company, or perhaps a plumber, a forming company, or an erecting company, people who operate in that whole gambit of bits and pieces that make up the construction industry. I wonder how any of those individuals would feel one morning to wake up facing a lawsuit? Perhaps such an action would require a decision by the supreme court. When one considers the amount of cost involved he will immediately realize that such a thing could bankrupt the small businessman.

The lawsuit I have in mind is one that might arise from something the small businessman had been doing in the past, but because of the passage of this new legislation he could be in difficulty. I had in mind the situation that could arise if a supplier wanted to give a prime contractor a lower price than the price he would normally sell his product to the industry. Experience has shown us that combines legislation tends to go against the small contractor.

The bigger contractors usually have sufficient staff to keep them out of trouble. In most cases they have sufficient finances to keep them in business during a lengthy court action. Small contractors receive many questionnaires from people like Statistics Canada. They are often forced to hire accountants or auditors to look after that type of thing. They receive all kinds of requests from an ever-increasing bureaucracy, all of which makes it more difficult to stay in business. This situation tends to get even worse when the companies become a little bigger. Let me give you one example of what I have in mind.

We have cement being delivered in southern Ontario for exactly the same price from three or four different companies manufacturing in different parts of Ontario. It is transported by two or three different means, over small or large areas, with seemingly no real competitive aspect. Yet because these are particularly large companies they seem to get away with it. The price per barrel, as it was formerly, although it is now changed, was identical. In addition these cement companies try to tell us they are being competitive but at the same time they will not let the customer come to their plants and pick up the product. If a purchaser should have the equipment and wish to pick up the product he is not allowed to do so. He must purchase the product on their terms, and those terms are always alike.

Then we have the matter of shopping centres. Often builders and developers are involved in these shopping centres. In respect of this legislation I see a real problem, and it seems to me that shopping centres could be completely outlawed. The essence of a shopping centre is to prohibit another class of merchandise of exactly the same nature being sold on the premises. As I understand this legislation, that would not be allowed. There would not appear to be any competitive edge to the shopping centre.

I do not really think shopping centres are the big bogey man people once thought they would become. In my town there are three shopping centres, and the downtown area is thriving. I think they have proven to be an incentive. In other places in Ontario, such as Peterborough, there are huge shopping centres which have not hurt the downtown shopping area. However, I believe this legislation would prohibit shopping centres from doing what traditionally they have done.

As I see it, one of the most critical points in respect of this legislation is that it is the small businessman who will be hit. There is protection enough for the large businessman. Recently I ran into a situation which is indicative of what I have in mind.

In my riding there is a sheetmetal fabricator who produces a product in galvanized metal, which could be sold anywhere in southern Ontario. This company is unionized and pays union rates, which are less in this area than in metropolitan areas. Because this is a fairly effective and efficient operation the products of this company could be sold in Toronto, but the unions in Toronto to date have kept this company from doing business in Toronto. I see nothing in this legislation that would be of assistance in this case.

The union in Toronto is strong enough that it has been able to dictate to the manufacturers that none of this product is to be allowed into the metropolitan Toronto area, simply because the union rates paid by that company are lower than those paid in Toronto. This is an example of discrimination which should not be allowed. I have been unable to find anything in this legislation which would help that company.

Many things are covered by this legislation. There is the matter of the service industries. There are other radical changes being proposed. This legislation has been around now for two or three parliaments, under the direction of a couple of different ministers. I do not believe it would be harmful if we proceeded reasonably slowly.

I know there is a desire to get this bill before the standing committee, and I hope that in committee the minister will be receptive to a number of amendments and changes that will be proposed by his colleagues, on both sides of this House, who have business experience. Also I hope the bill, when brought back from the committee, will be changed quite drastically from its present form.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on a bill which is complicated and which will have far-reaching effects. The minister has indicated it is his intention to bring forward amendments when the bill goes to the committee.

Mr. Alexander: Get that in writing.

[Mr. Ellis.]

Mr. Neil: That is an excellent idea. This bill means more and more government involvement in the daily affairs of the businessman, yet the minister has called for its rapid passage. It covers three major areas. First it covers the consumer aspects such as misleading advertising, undesirable trading practices and undesirable retail practices. It covers certain regulatory aspects with regard to the restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The balance of the bill, of course, has to do with amateur and professional sports, and amendments to the Bank Act.

With regard to the sections of the bill dealing with the consumer I do not believe there is any real argument by members of the House. I think all members, particularly those who have practised law, will welcome the legislation dealing specifically with referral selling, pyramid selling, switch selling, and double ticketing, to mention a few matters. I have always been one who believed in the old Latin phrase used in English law, caveat emptor—let the buyer beware. This has been a rule I have always followed. Perhaps I have followed it because a number of years ago, when I first started work and was earning $30 a month, a very shrewd encyclopedia salesman visited me and sold me a set of encyclopedia. Since I was earning only $30 per month it took me some considerable time to pay for the books. Therefore I soon learned that one must be aware of salesmen and slick traders.

But after practising law for some 20 years I realize that many intelligent people never had an experience similar to mine, and were therefore taken in on occasion by slick salesmen who were involved in referral selling, in my area particularly in the field of roofing and siding for houses. Having met some of these slick salesmen, I can see how people were taken in by them. I believe that people must be protected from this sort of thing.

Regarding the regulatory aspects of the bill, the minister has indicated that this legislation will be used to regulate the larger corporations. But it does not specify what is a large corporation or a small business. Surely the bill could be amended to set forth in detail the definition of a large corporation and a small corporation, either on the basis of assets or on the basis of the volume of business.

Small businesses are the backbone of our economy. They are our largest employers. Yet we find more and more small businesses closing their doors every day. What is the reason for that? Basically the reason is increased government regulation, increased government controls. I spoke to several small businessmen in my constituency recently, very successful businessmen who are now due for retirement, and who would like to sell their businesses to some younger persons. However, they find that there are no young people interested, despite the fact that these are exceptionally good businesses.

When you speak to young people about taking over a business, what do they say? They say: "We do not want to get involved. We have no problem with borrowing money; there are such government sources as IDB, and so on, but we do not want to be shackled by government regulations and rules". What will happen to these small businesses? The people to whom I have spoken, in two cases of which I know, have tried to sell for some three years. Now they have reached the stage where it is their intention to gradually liquidate their stock, sell their property, and retire. This, to a relatively small community, means a loss of jobs, with the resultant loss to our economy.

Personally I have no respect for the practices of the larger corporations which, because of their size, are able to protect themselves from competition. But I do have respect for the small businessman who operates best in a competitive market.

I was interested in reading about the competition policy from the 1969 report of the Economic Council of Canada. I would like to quote from it. That report states in part:

> The institution and maintenance of a competition policy such as presently exists in Canada may be taken to reflect a belief that over a greater part of the economy, competitive market forces are potentially capable of allocating resources better and more cheaply with a less cumbersome administrative overhead than any alternative arrangement, such as wholesale public ownership and control, detailed government regulation of enterprise, or self-regulation by large industrial units within a corporate state. The function of competition policy is not to bring about a textbook regime of "perfect" competition in all the various markets making up the system, but rather to encourage the liberation of the system's maximum competitive potential, imperfect though this may be.
> The resulting competition is valued not for itself, but for what it can accomplish, in putting resources to work efficiently and effectively. Thus, the market does the job and the government's main responsibility, so far as efficiency in resource allocation is concerned, is to see that the market is free to do the best job of which it is capable. Competition is relied upon as the prime mechanism of social control . . . ; competition itself should not be the objective, but rather the most important single means by which efficiency is achieved.

We must not lose sight of the principles set forth in that statement. I believe that to rush through this bill on the understanding that it will be amended in committee is wrong. It seems to me that the bill should be withdrawn now and additional amendments brought in, so that the bill will fall within the principles outlined in the report of the Economic Council.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Before I recognize the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) may I remind the House that the minister's speech will close the debate on this stage of the bill. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I listened with much attention and interest to the remarks from many hon. members. I must say that their comments will surely help me to improve this bill along with the members of the parliamentary committee that will examine this bill, to improve this extremely important legislation which many Canadians have been expecting for such a long time.

I believe that in closing this debate, it is important for me to ensure the hon. members of my intention to move amendments to the legislation, amendments which are for the most part the result of briefs and requests presented by Canadian agencies when this bill was studied by the last Parliament.

I should like nevertheless to point out certain remarks made during the second reading debate and especially a question put by the hon. member for York Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), namely whether that legislation was really an improvement on the present one. I do not believe this House would question the real desire for progress, the unshaken wish to serve people in a better way, on the part of the government as well as of the Economic Council of Canada, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Combines Investigation Branch and the numerous experts who were consulted throughout the very difficult revision of our competition policy, which in fact began in 1966.

That the results are on a level with the efforts, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it will be generally agreed, as it was besides by a good number of members on both sides of the House, who spoke during this debate. They recognized the merits as well as the urgency of such a legislation.

But can one really refuse to recognize that we are greatly improving the present legislation by extending its implementation to services?

I believe it really should be said that Canada is almost the only country with a competition policy that does not apply to services. Among OECD countries, it seems that Ireland and Canada are the only countries that do not have any competition policy for services.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this House will agree that it is more than time that our country lose this unenviable status. The great number of Canadian consumers who have complained to my department about restrictive practices in the field of services are wondering why this extension to the Act was not passed long ago.

Mr. Speaker, I notice that my time is getting short, and I would have liked to cover several issues raised by the hon. members but I will not have time to do so tonight. I would however like to say one thing, that not so long ago the Canadian public was brutally reminded that no legislation prevented the application in Canada of judgments, legislation or directives from foreign countries which are not in the interest of the Canadian public.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that this situation should be rectified urgently. This is precisely the purpose of Bill C-2, which will give the Commission the power to issue orders appropriate to each case of this type.

I believe that one of the issues raised concerns the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada, and I would like to recall the remarks of the hon. member for York-Simcoe who stated in this House that there should be another report from the Economic Council of Canada. However, on page 2 of the third report of the Economic Council of Canada, it is said:

> At first, we had considered a fourth report which would have summarized all the work done under these terms of reference, but we now believe that such a report would be redundant.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this quotation from the third report is a sufficient reply to those who have blamed us for using a temporary report as a basis to review our competition policy.

Finally, I think that the point raised about the unions, to the effect that the government seems to be getting blamed for excluding them from this legislation, deserves clarification. In fact, the unions are excluded except for matters pertaining to collective bargaining. Such a situation was unacceptable. That is why, basically, all union activities recognized by this act were not subject to the first Canadian act of 1889 on competition, and this exclusion still stands.

Nowadays, both at the provincial and federal levels, there is a whole series of very specialized legislation on labour. There were reforms to be brought about and it is at the labour level that action must be taken. However, Bill C-2 clarifies several aspects of collective bargaining exclusions. I would like to point out, in particular, the clause of the bill specifying that the exclusions apply to management as well as to labour.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by saying that all the amendments in this bill concern the interests of the Canadian consumer maybe in a different way but always with equal importance. I am convinced that these interests are as badly served by restrictive schemes, resale price fixing and refusal to sell as they are by misleading advertising or pyramid selling. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I rather presented one bill only instead of including consumer protection legislation in a separate bill. I hope therefore that this bill will be examined with the warranted thoroughness by the members of the parliamentary committee and that we may report for third reading a bill really worthy of Canadians and of the competition policy in Canada.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the House would be good enough to revert to presenting reports from Standing and Special Committees and also revert to motions. If it is agreed, I will present the first and second reports of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, and if there is unanimous consent I would move acceptance of the first report tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Hon. members have heard the request of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): There is not unanimous consent, therefore we cannot do as the hon. member requests.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR SERVICE BETWEEN EASTERN SASKATCHEWAN AND WESTERN MANITOBA—APPLICATION OF TRANSAIR FOR JET SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on October 17 I raised a question with respect to air service into western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan. I bring up the subject again tonight because of the confusion and mess in transportation policy that was referred to by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) in his celebrated statement last spring.

I will review the history of this service briefly. In the 1960s Air Canada inaugurated a service between Calgary and Saskatchewan and western Manitoba communities, on a daily basis, as part of a new regional air transport policy.

New runways were built at considerable cost in order to accommodate this service. Two years ago a brand new air terminal was opened at the Brandon airport to serve western Manitoba. It was considered an important breakthrough in air transport policy and the then Minister of Transport now the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson), came out to open the terminal.

Last January all air service into the western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan region was cancelled. That indeed indicates there is confusion if not a mess in air transport policy in this part of Canada. This development is in the face of expenditures of multimillions of dollars to build new airports to serve Montreal and Toronto.

Let me refer also to the STOL program costing either $125 million or $25 million depending on who is making the estimate to serve Ottawa and Montreal, the announcement that the government is to support a third-level carrier service, and also to the demonstrated fact that no program of regional economic development can make any progress unless adequate air service connects eastern Canada with western Canada.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to Winnipeg on May 23 and made some interesting comments. That is why I am making my appeal this evening. He said:

> The general principles are that the policy of this government, as you know, is to work for all of Canada. We do this in different ways, but one of the most important ways of doing it is to make sure that every region of Canada shares in the growth of this country and that prosperity is accessible to all—

His statement continued to this effect:

> . . . we have asked Air Canada to work with each provincial government to determine what action is necessary to put in place in each province a third-level air carrier system that will provide high quality local air service, promote industry, reduce isolation and provide jobs. Air Canada will then cooperate with the existing carriers in each province to put in place this service. Air Canada will, if necessary, either directly or through a subsidiary, provide that service. In other instances, however, it will work with the existing carriers, supporting them financially by providing management back-up, by providing technical and maintenance know-how, and of course through the vast purchasing power of Air Canada.

Let me add that there is not much evidence of this in western Canada. Finally, may I quote from another part of the Prime Minister's statement. He said:

In another area of air service, air policy, industrial development and job creation, I would like to announce the following: approval in principle has been given by the government for the provision of air services linking Winnipeg, Brandon, Dauphin, Yorkton and Saskatoon as a test of possible new third-level air policies, the ones I talked about earlier. This will be air services linking these western cities.

I am sorry the Minister of Transport is not here. When he replied to my question originally he said that the government has purchased two Saunders aircraft which are to provide this service, but did not say who will operate the service. Will TransAir, the designated regional carrier, be responsible for providing this service? It will require a subsidy, as any other air service in Canada does, if we are to judge from the experience of Air Canada. If that is so, what will be the nature of the subsidy? Will it be similar to that provided for the demonstration STOL project now operating between Ottawa and Montreal? Finally, Madam Speaker, will it be supplemented by a first-class jet connection with eastern Canada?

TransAir, the designated regional carrier, now provides jet service to Dryden, Kenora, Thunder Bay and Toronto but, for inexplicable reasons, does not continue it to Brandon, Yorkton, Dauphin, Regina or Saskatoon. TransAir has had an application for almost six months before the Transport Committee, which seems to be in a state of suspended animation. The carrier has offered to provide this service without subsidy. It would provide direct, daily service to Toronto and the eastern market both ways; that is, by flying east and west, and would do this, as I say, without subsidy. In short, it would provide the kind of service which is absolutely essential for economic development programs on the Prairies. It would also supplement third-level carrier service. This would be a collector service which would make the pure jet service offered by TransAir economically viable. I trust that whoever replies this evening will answer these specific questions.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer all the questions raised by the honourable member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). I do not have the information available, but I assure him that I will check with regard to most, if not all, of the questions he raised. I am just as interested as the hon. member in the extension of air service to western Canada.

In his May 23 speech, to which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) referred, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that the federal government would make available $1.5 million for the purchase of two aircraft, plus spares, for a provincial demonstration project. The aircraft, of course, are to be ST-27 turbo prop manufactured, as the hon. member well knows, by the Saunders Aircraft Company in Gimli, Manitoba.

The federal government is awaiting a formal reply from the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan on whether they will embark on this demonstration project. I believe it is fair to say that negotiations are going well. Every indication is they will indeed go on with this, but as yet there has been no formal reply from them. Therefore the question as to when the demonstration services will start can be best answered by the provincial governments.

In the House the other day the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) announced that he had completed arrangements to purchase the two aircraft. The machinery has been set in motion for that.

The Prime Minister also stated that the Minister of Transport and Air Canada would put together a team of officials to work with the provinces. That is being done. A great deal of work has gone into it. Federal officials have assisted in every way with this demonstration project.

I can assure the hon. member I am also looking forward to the success of this particular service which is being inaugurated. Surveys have been conducted of the terminal and the other facilities. Information has been provided to the provinces to allow them to draw up a schedule for implementation of the demonstration project. The hon. member asked who will be operating the service. I do not know the answer to that.

With regard to the second part of the hon. member's question, the application by TransAir to bring jet service to Brandon and that region is, as the hon. member said, now before the air transport committee. I did not realize it had been there that long. The decision to grant a licence to TransAir rests entirely with the transport committee and not with the Department of Transport. We, of course, cannot interfere with the CTC while it is considering an application for a licence. I am hopeful that consideration will again be given to that request.

SOCIAL SECURITY—MEASURES TO PROTECT PENSIONERS IN PRIVATE PLANS—DISCUSSIONS WITH CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, on Thursday, October 10, as recorded in Hansard at page 281, I put this question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner):

Is the government giving consideration to the introduction this session of legislation regarding private pension plans, to provide greater protection for pensioners under those plans and to require such plans to comply with modern-day standards including the escalation of the pensions of those already retired?

In his answer the Minister of Finance suggested that my inquiry related to future legislation and that it had budgetary aspects which prevented him from replying fully to my question. I then posed a supplementary question in these terms:

In view of assurances the minister has given in former sessions, would he make a beginning on this subject by having further discussions with the chartered banks about their inadequate pension plans?

The minister's reply was to the effect that he had had discussions with the banks on previous occasions, but he thanked me for reminding him about the matter.

Your Honour, although I feel I should say Your Grace, my question is really a double barrelled one. In fact, there may be a third angle to it. However, it is an important issue, and I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen) is at least in a position to give me the assurance that the matters covered by my question are under active consideration.

I certainly do not want to exaggerate or to contribute to any sense of panic, but it is a fact that some pension plans have failed in recent months; it is a fact that there are a number of private pension plans which are in trouble, and the members of those plans are not sure they will get the pensions they were expecting. This is a situation which could get worse, and it seems to me that before it does it should be studied very thoroughly and the government should exercise its responsibility, bearing in mind the fact that the Department of Finance is in charge of legislation such as the Pension Benefits Standards Act. That is one aspect of the question—the need to protect the members of private pension plans, and I urge that this matter be given serious consideration.

Another aspect has to do with the question of the escalation of pensions. Thanks to efforts on the floor of this House this is now a fairly general practice in the public sector. But when private pension plans escalate pensions minus the escalation which takes place under our old age security legislation, those pensioners who are under private plans obtain no increase to enable them to keep up with the rising cost of living. Escalation is only effective if it applies to all of one's pension income. I hope the government will give consideration to legislation which will make this the rule for all pension plans.

These are the two important aspects of my question, but there was my subsidiary question about chartered banks and their pension plans. These come directly under the responsibility of the federal government in more ways than one. Some of the chartered banks are already offending their retired employees by subtracting from the escalation in their pensions the escalation which takes place under the Old Age Security Act. I could develop this point further if I had time in which to do so.

Many retired bank employees, some of whom were managers and who understandably do not not wish their names to be disclosed, are annoyed by the way the banks are treating them, and I hope the Minister of Finance will continue his conversations with the banks and talk to them in a way which will persuade them that they ought to play the game. The plain fact is that not only should all public pensions be escalated and made such that people can live on them, but this should also be true of all private pension plans, and I call on the government to see that this is done.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question may I say I believe he will appreciate that there are a number of social, financial and jurisdictional considerations related to regulatory legislation of this kind.

It is necessary to bear in mind that the majority of the pension plans in Canada are subject to provincial jurisdiction. Up to the present four provinces have instituted pension benefits standards legislation. This legislation deals primarily with two aspects of pension plans, namely, plan solvency and benefit portability. The federal government has already enacted similar legislation which applies to pension plans in areas of employment subject to the jurisdiction of parliament.

The only way in which the federal government could try to require and enforce the escalation of pension benefits in all plans would be indirectly through the Income Tax Act, where the normal penalty for non-compliance with such a requirement would be the probable deregistration of the plan, thereby making both employer and employee contributions to the plan ineligible for deduction from the income of the taxpayer. This could result in the employees being less well protected for their old age than they are at present.

It should be noted that neither of the forms of the legislation I have mentioned requires that an employer provide a pension plan. Nor does it prevent the termination of a plan. Some employers may be finding difficulty trying to fund their pension plans without provision for pension legislation. To impose compulsory escalation might well lead some employers to terminate the plans they have at present. In these circumstances hon. members will appreciate that requests such as those made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) must be considered with great caution.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

TRANSPORT—REPORT ON PLANE CRASH NEAR FROBISHER BAY—REASON FOR DELAY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I should like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary on his elevation to an important position in the ministry. My concern tonight arises from questions asked not only by myself but by others, Your Grace—and I refer to you in that manner because you do honour us—about a most unfortunate accident at Frobisher Bay last February. I welcome this opportunity because in response to questions the minister at one point said, and I refer to Hansard of October 4 at page 118:

> No, Mr. Speaker, the truth cannot be changed, but sometimes it takes time to reveal the truth.

In the interest of accident investigation and transport safety generally in Canada, embracing all modes of transportation falling within the jurisdiction of the federal authority, I asked why there was not an investigation and report available from the coroner's inquest into that tragedy. Once again, I draw the attention of the minister to the urgency of separating the regulatory body from the responsibility of investigating all accidents involving any form of transportation falling within our jurisdiction.

I have a report in my hand of an aircraft accident to a Sabreliner CF-BRL on February 27, 1974, at Frobisher Bay, Northwest Territories. This report was made available to members on October 25, some eight months after the accident. I suggest that no competent investigative authority in North America or Europe would take more than three months to handle it. I cannot understand why this has taken so long.

Let me refer to one thing in this report to lend some emphasis to the point I make for the establishment of an independent commission of investigation in these matters. On the first page of the report under the paragraph heading "Description of Occurrence" we find in the last paragraph:

The Frobisher main, high power non-direction beacon ... went off the air at 00:10 and was restored to service at 00:59.

All the times referred to are Greenwich mean time for the purpose of the investigation. Anyone reading this report will eventually reach page 7, and will find again in the last paragraph under the paragraph heading "Aids to Navigation" the following:

The operator coming on shift at 00:01 performed his routine station equipment check which included verifying the operation of the FY beacon. On the audio test the beacon went "in the red", a visual indication of a transmitter outage. The operator attempted to reset the transmitter—

The report indicates that the operator did those things that should be done under these circumstances.

I suggest that here we have a contradiction. This report will be read by everyone who flies the Atlantic in light aircraft or, indeed, in any type of aircraft. The purpose of these reports is to make corrections and see that mistakes do not recur to give concern to others using our system.

● (2220)

Here we have a discrepancy. There is nothing in the report to indicate how long the transmitter was inoperable prior to 00:01 hours on the date in question. It could very well have been out for a period even before that. My point is that if we are to foster and encourage confidence in our federal transport system on the part of those who use it, not only Canadians, but all users of our air space, then what we say must be accurate, must be complete and must be impartial.

I have no question about the impartiality of the investigator in this particular instance, but I suggest the publicity surrounding the coroner's inquest, and the division which will arise as a result of this report are such as to give rise to a belief that possibly a conflict of interest could take place in the investigation of transportation accidents in Canada.

I am here to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary as forcefully as possible my concern, and the concern of all users of our transportation services in Canada, that what we do not only must be right but that it must seem to be right. Where there is a conflict of interest we must remove it. In this case we cannot remove it until we remove some of the conflicts in respect of responsibility for investigations.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary to tell us why this report was not available to the coroner's inquest. I would also ask him when we might expect to have a bill introduced in respect of the division of the regulatory body. I have been asking for such a bill through four parliaments. If we had word from him about this I am sure the users of aids to navigation in air would have the type of confidence in our system which I know it merits.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax-Dartmouth East (Mr. Forrestall) has made, I believe, an excellent case for the division of the regulatory and investigative aspects of accidents of this kind. Perhaps I should review for him some of the pertinent dates in this regard relative to the report into the Sabreliner crash at Frobisher.

I am advised that the report was originally scheduled for completion sometime in mid-July, or a bit later. For reasons involving technical detail and checking into some of the material that was there, it was realized that it would take perhaps until mid-October before the results of the investigation could be completed. I am advised that on July 15 MOT officials met with the Crown Attorney and pointed out that it would be this late before the report would be available, and asked the coroner to delay the inquest until that time, or at least not look for the report until that time. However, as the hon. member is aware, the inquest was started on September 30 and the report was not available until October 9.

I think it is in respect of this aspect that some sort of an accusation was made, although it was not really an accusation, against the investigators. MOT officials were asked to comment on the report and they chose not to comment on it. They were very helpful in furnishing the facts at the coroner's inquest. I think this is what brought about the situation.

As the hon. member said, it was another situation in which some people might have felt there was a conflict of interest. I am satisfied there was not. The hon. member said he felt the same way. However, it points to the need to bring in legislation to separate the two functions because we have a good reputation, nationally and internationally, in investigations of this kind.

It has been the duty and the responsibility of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) to carry out investigations, and I do not believe that there is any question that that has been done. But certainly if legislation can be introduced to make it even more true, that is what the government intends to do. I cannot tell the hon. member exactly when that legislation will be forthcoming, but I do believe it to be later on in this session, and I am sure the hon. member will have comments to make in the debate when it comes. I am sure he also appreciates some of the problems associated with the slight delay in tabling the report.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, again, but the time allotted to him has expired. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

BEEF PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, that is the very uncertain position of beef producers.

Since beef producers in Eastern Canada are slaughtering cattle day after day on or along the roads for the purpose of drawing the government's attention to their difficulties arising from an increase in production costs and a decline in beef prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House examine immediately the disastrous situation in which beef producers are now, and that recommendations be made in order to take immediate steps to protect those producers and thus spare the consumer difficulties arising in a few months.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion which, under Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent the motion cannot be put.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since I am forbidden to do so by the Standing Orders, I do not question the Chair's decision, but I want to say that, perhaps because we are sitting at one end of the House, we have not heard hon. members refusing unanimous consent to this excellent and very important motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse. In the name of my colleagues, I request that you ask once more whether there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: I can only say the refusal was quite clear for the Chair.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROTECT JUVENILES FROM INVITATIONS TO ENGAGE IN SEXUAL ACTS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-360, an act to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

● (1410)

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, this bill will amend the Criminal Code to fill the gap created by a recent decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal. Before that decision an offender could be convicted, if found guilty, of making an indecent proposition to a child under 15 years of age if the offence were proven. The decision had the effect of requiring some physical touching to complete the offence. The amendment will restore the former law and give extra protection to children.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REASON FOR MEETING WITH PREMIERS—PROPOSALS BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister in connection with his meeting tomorrow with the premiers of the provinces. I am very pleased that this meeting is to take place. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister rejected the request for such a meeting a few weeks ago and now has invited the premiers to come to Ottawa tomorrow, can he tell the House what the new development is that makes the meeting seem worthwhile now when it seemed to him to be worthless just a few weeks ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the Leader of the Opposition is referring to in terms of what happened a few weeks ago. If he is referring to the idea proposed by Premier Davis in a speech he made at the Toronto Ex when he talked of a public summit, that is the idea I rejected. I have never rejected the idea of consultation; on the contrary, it was very much part of our policy. We talked about it in the Speech from the Throne and I have talked about it at various places publicly and about the importance of talking with all sectors of the Canadian public, including provincial governments.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Whatever request may have been made by a particular premier, it was an informal meeting that all the premiers requested following their own meeting. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is intended tomorrow to put before the premiers a specific proposal with regard to the forum and the method of consultation which the government of Canada intends to pursue in order to see whether any consensus can be achieved among the principal groups in our economy as to how the GNP should be divided.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the best way I can answer this is to indicate the process of consultation which we have always had in mind was an ongoing one; one which would proceed step by step. I would not want to convey to the House the idea that tomorrow we will make any kind of proposition to the provincial premiers. We have announced in the Speech from the Throne that there will be a federal-provincial conference with the premiers early in the new year. The precise type of proposal that the Leader of the Opposition is talking about would be better made then than tomorrow. Tomorrow is the beginning of a process in so far as the premiers's consultations with me are concerned.

Mr. Stanfield: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I must say the Prime Minister's casual approach to the question of inflation is shocking to me.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Stanfield: We are going to see leadership in slow stages. May I ask the Prime Minister what he is bringing the premiers here for tomorrow and what will be the subject of discussion?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we will be discussing the subject of inflation. It is not a public summit and I do not intend to reveal the contents of that meeting with the premiers.

AGENDA FOR MEETING WITH PREMIERS—SUGGESTED TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS CONCERNING MEETING

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Prime Minister remembers the actual circumstances in which this meeting was requested, because he responded so smartly in referring to the impotence of the premiers. I am sure he remembers.

Mr. Trudeau: I did not mean in the physiological sense.

Mr. Lawrence: In order that the premiers can be better prepared for the meeting, has the Prime Minister taken the opportunity of communicating with them with respect to guidelines or any type of agenda for tomorrow's meeting?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was made clear in correspondence I had with them that we would be discussing the subject of inflation. That will be the essence of the agenda.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, so that the affairs of this country can be discussed in this House as well as with the premiers, would the Prime Minister do the House the courtesy of letting others in this chamber see this correspondence as well, or at least give us a general outline of what is going to be discussed tomorrow.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not object to tabling a copy of that correspondence, provided I get the authorization of the premiers to table any responses. The House will not be deprived of its chance to discuss this. Indeed, we shall welcome constructive suggestions from the opposition. I will have an excellent opportunity to do this at the time of the budget.

INDUSTRY

UNITED AIRCRAFT CORPORATION—STUDY OF GRANTS MADE TO CORPORATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the House whether his department commissioned a comprehensive study of all federal government grants made to United Aircraft Corporation. If so, has it received the results of that study? Finally, if the answer is yes, will the minister make available to members of parliament the study to which I referred?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is an overstatement to suggest that a comprehensive study has been commissioned. Work has been done with respect to reviewing outstanding contracts between the government and UACL. That review establishes that roughly $66 million of some $70 million can be repaid, if the company makes a profit. I described these amounts as grants. I think that was the accurate way to describe these funds as, by the company's own admission, it has already lost $87 million.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister misunderstood the question. I am referring not to a study which he may have requested within the past couple of weeks, but to a study of a much earlier time. Has a study been done with regard to the financial wisdom of making grants to that corporation in the first place? I am asking if such study was done some time ago, and it is to that study that I referred in requesting the minister to table the findings, if it was carried out.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of such study as alluded to by the hon. member, but will make inquiries with respect to the matter.

UNITED AIRCRAFT CORPORATION—SUGGESTED SUSPENSION OF GRANTS PENDING INQUIRY INTO OPERATIONS OF CORPORATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question. Considering that the government of Quebec decided to suspend payment of part of the $2 million grant which had been made available to United Aircraft Corporation, because that government suspects the company has not carried out its obligations, and in view of the announced failure of de Havilland Aircraft Corporation of Toronto, which is now owned by the government of Canada, to carry out its production obligations because it cannot get engines from United Aircraft, will the federal government, because of its more substantial financial involvement with United Aircraft, consider suspending its grants to that corporation pending a full inquiry into its operations.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of different grants involving the government and the corporation which deal with particular projects. These are always under continuing review, to ensure that undertakings given by the company with respect to contracts are met.

POSSIBLE FEDERAL PROPOSALS TO AID QUEBEC PRODUCERS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the prevailing situation in agriculture, and of the fact that calves are being sacrificed in the Shawinigan area and elsewhere in the province of Quebec, is the minister maintaining contact with his Quebec counterpart to find a solution to this very serious problem which is far from favouring farmers at the present time?

Mr. Speaker, our farmers being most justified to take such action, has the federal Minister of Agriculture any solution to propose to the Quebec government to remedy this situation?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked if I have a solution to Quebec's problem. I think certain responsibilities concerning this problem are provincial. As I said the other day, Quebec has put forward what is probably the most realistic program of any province to assist meat producers. We are working on a program which I hope will be realistic enough to assist them in a different fashion than the present provincial programs, including that of Quebec which, as I said, is the most far reaching of any program with regard to assistance.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

VEAL—REASON FOR DIFFERENCE IN PRICES TO PRODUCERS AND CONSUMERS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Our farmers keep complaining that, while their calves sold last year for 60 to 75 cents a pound, they can hardly obtain 15 cents a pound this year. Yet, prices in meat markets and supermarkets remain exactly at the same level as last year.

Has the department taken steps to find out who are those who really abuse the situation and who are robbing Canadian consumers?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. member that Mrs. Plumptre is responsible for the review of food prices. On the other hand, I should like the hon. member to provide me with all the data he has just quoted to the House, because, apparently, they are not in complete accordance with the facts.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): A last supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

The minister has just said that the figures I quoted were not in accordance with the facts. In my area, and I know it, farmers sometimes organize public auctions, and the prices which they were offered in some cases were so low that they had to buy back their own cattle because they would have taken a total loss selling them on auction. Has the minister checked the figures of the Farmer's Union of the province of Quebec, which confirm exactly what I have just said?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, a study is presently under way on this subject, and if the hon. member wishes to provide me with other figures, I will be very glad to pass them along to those who are presently studying that matter.

WORK STOPPAGE BY GRAIN INSPECTORS IN VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Due to the fact that 45 of 48 grain inspectors in Vancouver who booked off work yesterday have apparently been stricken by the germ which was incubated within the Labour Department at Ottawa during the strike of grain handlers, is the President of the Treasury Board willing to swallow the same antidote which the government forcibly imposed on farmers then in order to prevent extended work stoppages or a strike by these inspectors?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the inspectors in question are presently negotiating with the government. We hope that we will soon come to a satisfactory arrangement.

[English]

Mr. Towers: A supplementary question. Calling the tune as the government did in the grain handlers strike, is the government now prepared to pay the fiddler and will the President of the Treasury Board go to the west coast and meet with the grain inspectors in an attempt to resolve a very serious situation?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there is a well established procedure in Canada to cope with such situations, that is negotiation and conciliation. We are therefore following the normal procedure. Those workers are not presently in a position to go on strike illegally, and we hope we will be able to solve the problem before they are in a position to strike.

POSSIBLE PROPOSALS BY MINISTER OF LABOUR FOR DISCUSSION AT MEETING WITH PREMIERS—LIAISON WITH PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to follow up this matter, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the fact that collective bargaining is bound to be of particular importance in 1974-75. In view of the fact that in 1975 we shall be faced with the heaviest collective bargaining agenda in Canada's history, and since labour is concerned with protection against future inflation, could the Minister of Labour inform the House whether he has prepared recommendations aimed at avoiding a labour crisis in 1975 to put before the provincial premiers at the conference on inflation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I think a question relating to the agenda to be considered by the first ministers' conference dealing with inflation should more appropriately be addressed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Alexander: I thank the minister for his answer but I do not know why I should have to direct the question to the Prime Minister; the Minister of Labour is surely making some input. I would ask the Prime Minister whether there have been any recommendations from the Minister of Labour, prepared in advance and aimed at avoiding a labour crisis in 1975, which the right hon. gentleman can place before the premiers at the conference on inflation? Has there been any liaison between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour on this most sensitive and important issue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker, in the kind of consultations we have in mind the Minister of Labour will play a very important role. As far as I am concerned, it is not intended, tomorrow, to go into any details with the premiers on that particular subject. But if they have proposals to make which might be of interest to the Minister of Labour I will certainly make sure he hears about them.

POSSIBLE PROPOSALS BY MINISTER OF FINANCE FOR DISCUSSION AT MEETING WITH PREMIERS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): It seems to me that the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister are playing hanky-panky with a serious situation. As I understand it, on September 16, the Minister of Finance stated:

> It is important that we seek to develop a national consensus in support of working out a fair and reasonable balance between wages, prices and profits which would best serve the common interest of us all.

I would now ask the Minister of Finance, if he is serious, whether there has been any discussion between himself and the Prime Minister in order to bring this principle of his before the premiers tomorrow to determine whether there is a possibility of reaching a consensus regarding these matters.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, sir.

Mr. Lawrence: On a point of order. I do not wish to waste the time of the House but I think the answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will come to the hon. member's point of order in a moment. With an answer like that I really think it would be improper to cut off one final supplementary from the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Now that we are finding that something is going on over on the other side, would the Minister of Finance be kind enough to advise us whether he is prepared to table the recommendations he has made to the Prime Minister in this regard so that we can all have some idea what will happen?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Conversations between the Prime Minister and other members of the government at this stage are within the realm of cabinet confidence. As the policy is developed it will appear on the floor of the House.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I really do apologize for rising on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Well, sit down, then!

Mr. Lawrence: —but that does not prevent me from raising it. The Minister of Labour referred in the House a few moments ago to "the agenda for tomorrow's conference."

The Prime Minister indicated to me that there was no agenda for tomorrow's conference. Can the Minister of Labour tell the House whether he has actually seen this agenda or not?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure about the validity of the point of order but if the minister wishes to clarify his use of that term he may do so.

● (1430)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, quite simply, as I understood it, the hon. member for Hamilton West asked me about some agenda for the conference tomorrow. Without dwelling unduly on the word "agenda," I take it he was concerned with the question of labour-management relations generally and how we would confront the whole labour situation and collective bargaining in the ensuing year. I indicated to him that in terms of the Prime Minister being chairman of the first ministers conference it would be more appropriate for him to direct the question to the Prime Minister, and that was all there was to it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES AND PRIME MINISTER

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister will shortly be undertaking a very important trip to Washington to make the acquaintance of the new President of the United States and discuss very important matters with him, does the Prime Minister feel confident that he will be able to bring about the same degree of mutual respect and warm personal friendship with Mr. Ford as he was able to generate with President Nixon, as evidenced by the Watergate tapes?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after sitting across the aisle from the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings for something like six years, I know that the friendship between us has not been impaired by the kind of foul language that he thinks will be used.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister's unwillingness to answer that very important and serious question, one that is very important to the good of the country's future, mean that he does not believe that he is going to be able to evoke from Mr. Ford even the same appreciation of his qualities as he got from Mr. Nixon?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my answer to that question is that it is obvious that the hon. member does not know the difference between razzmatazz and a hole in the ground.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

ENERGY

FEASIBILITY STUDY OF CONSTRUCTION OF ARCTIC RAILWAY TO TRANSPORT OIL AND GAS—TABLING OF SUMMARY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated that an investigation was being made to determine whether or not railway transportation through the Crowsnest pass of oil and gas was viable and practicable. I ask the minister whether there has been any further consideration given to this matter since, as I recall it, a final decision was expected in the latter part of October.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he was asking about a rail line or the over-all transportation of oil?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is still rather general. That type of answer leaves quite a hole in the head. Is any consideration now being given to determining the practicability of bringing oil and gas from the north by rail through the Crowsnest pass, thereby preserving the environment from many of the dangers that would otherwise be present should a pipeline be constructed?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is referring to the study carried out at the instance of the Minister of Transport and myself by Canadian National and Canadian Pacific. The study has been received. I think I am right in saying it consists of six volumes which are now being translated. It would be the proposal of our department to lay on the table, probably next week, another summary so that it can be before the House before the full document is available.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As far as laying a summary before the House is concerned, has the government given any consideration to this action being taken so that oil and gas from Alaska, the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and so on can be hauled by train rather than moved by pipeline? Is the government giving any such consideration to this, or is it simply placing before the House six volumes which, before translation, the minister apparently does not understand?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman would want—

Mr. Stanfield: We want an unexpurgated edition.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —as the Leader of the Opposition would want, to make certain that we lay all documents before the House in both official languages. But apparently the Leader of the Opposition does not agree with that.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I really do not mind the thumper, if I may use that term informally, inputing statements or attitudes to me, but I do want to say that what I actually said was that we do not want any expurgated edition, particularly any expurgation that is conducted by the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that I have touched a point there, which may not be without significance. I can only say that the government has given some consideration to the possibility of building a railroad in this regard, but no final decision has been taken.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If you had answered the question that way in the beginning, we would have saved a lot of time.

FOREST INDUSTRY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO STIMULATE TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the worsening unemployment picture in Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: There will be trouble in caucus tomorrow.

Mr. Anderson: —in the forest industry, can the minister advise the House whether—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In view of the obvious and dramatic increase in the popularity of the hon. member who is attempting to pose a question, it might be very worthwhile listening to what his question is.

Mr. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the worsening employment picture in Canada—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anderson: —and particularly in British Columbia in the forest industry, can the minister advise the House what steps his department has taken, or will take, to stimulate the forest industry and alleviate the unemployment problem?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department has been very active through a variety of measures and programs aimed at finding new export possibilities for the Canadian lumber industry. We have had recent successes in Japan,

Iceland, Cuba and the Middle East. Indeed, my officials are just about ready to leave for the Middle East. May I add that my officials, on an urgent basis, are examining other options which the government might adopt to ensure and assist the production of lumber during this winter.

Mr. Anderson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

INABILITY OF FISHERMEN TO FILL QUOTAS BECAUSE OF STRIKE AT PLANT OF FRESHWATER FISH CORPORATION—ELIGIBILITY OF FISHERMEN FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the strike by the Freshwater Fish Corporation Employees in Transcona, is the minister planning any action to compensate those fishermen, who have not filled their quotas, and who cannot fish because they cannot sell their fish to the corporation.

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which we are investigating. I hope to have a more complete answer for the member perhaps tomorrow.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. Could the minister inform the House what steps he plans to take with reference to the unemployment insurance qualification which cannot be met because the fishermen cannot fish, therefore cannot sell and therefore do not qualify for UIC benefits. Would the minister also tell the House what steps will be taken in respect of the same problem in connection with the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the responsibility for the two programs he mentions lies with other ministers. We will consult with them to see what they intend to do.

PUBLIC SERVICE

WORK STOPPAGE BY GRAIN INSPECTORS IN VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT OFFER—SUGGESTED BASIC MINIMUM OFFER TO ALL EMPLOYEES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the seriousness of another work stoppage in respect of grain shipments out of Vancouver would the minister explain to the House what he means by collective bargaining when apparently representatives of the government made an offer of 8 per cent and 8 per cent, which is less than the increase in the cost of living.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government negotiators are doing their job properly. They are now discussing with the employees, and I hope that the latter will wait for the conciliation board report before going on strike, because they cannot stop working before the expiration of these legal delays.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Would the minister discuss with his cabinet colleagues the possibility of establishing as a basis for all collective bargaining on the part of the government with its employees, of which there are many groups now entering collective bargaining, the basic policy that the minimum the government would offer any of its employees would be the actual increase in the cost of living, plus the projected increase in the cost of living for the coming year, plus the increase in productivity as recommended by Mr. Justice Hall during his consideration of the railway workers case a year ago?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, our negotiations with government employees are not conducted on exactly the same basis for all groups. Some of them have some catching-up to do while it is not necessary for others. A universal policy cannot be enforced in view of the circumstances.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: I have a last supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Because not every group is in exactly the same position, I suggest that the minister immediately consider using a floor from which the government would operate, namely, that at least the cost of living increase be taken into consideration plus productivity. I wonder whether the minister would consider that as a floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it proper to negotiate collective agreements for the 315,000 government employees in this very House of Commons. Parliament has legislated into being a mechanism designed to settle that matter and we are endeavouring to use it as provided by the law.

SOCIAL SECURITY

GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—SUGGESTED CONSIDERATION OF UNITED STATES STUDIES

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the fact that an American senate committee is now studying the $3,500 guaranteed annual income formula recommended to the government for every American citizen, which formula would replace the bureaucratic, dehumanizing and costly welfare system, has the minister asked the officials of his department to follow the work of that committee in order to become acquainted with every aspect of the proposal, which creditistes have been advocating for a long time indeed?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my senior officials indeed follow all studies on the subject being carried out in Canada and elsewhere throughout the world. I am convinced that they are very well aware of the debates of the American senate in this regard.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Since he is aware of the work being done in the United States in this regard, has he ordered his officials to study it or is he merely waiting for their results before applying them in Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, let me say simply that the research being done in Canada in this field, especially that carried out by my officials, is probably further ahead than what is now being done in the United States or just about anywhere, at the present time.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED REFUGEE STATUS FOR HAITIANS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

The Minister Responsible for Immigration has already said in this House, in answer to a question raised by my colleague from Greenwood, that the applications from Haitians living in Canada who are threatened with deportation to their country, and I quote the remainder of the answer:

—were fully considered within the department and that they would take such appropriate measures as appear wise.

Is the Minister prepared to recognize on the one hand that it is the normal attitude of the officers from his department, towards any record submitted to the Immigration Appeal Board and on the other hand that, considering the situation prevailing in Haiti, the cases of all these Haitians threatened with deportation should now be considered collectively and, in this regard, that the time has come for the Minister to submit the whole matter to the Cabinet, even if the Quebec government remained discreet on the subject?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I cannot make any further comment beyond what I said yesterday. I repeat that we will deal with each of these individual cases on its own merit in the prescribed manner which is that there will be a review of refugee applications by the government's interdepartmental committee on refugees and there would be further access or appeal to the immigration appeal board which body also can deal with the evidence in each individual case, but I am not prepared at this stage to recommend a mass refugee declaration which would involve many people but rather intend to deal with them on an individual basis.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT HAITIANS BE INFORMED OF CANADIAN IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since there are Haitians living in Canada who have already been expelled from this country or may possibly be expelled in the near future, and since their lives and security and those of their families would be in danger in Haiti, could the minister say to the House whether he has made or will make representations to the Haitian authorities so that our immigration legislation are well publicized in that country. That would be an act of basic humanitarianism to plead the cause of those Haitian expelled from our country, in order that they may suffer no prejudice when they go back home. This is the question I ask the minister with the same sense of humanitarianism I had when I heard the answers of the Prime Minister in Paris, speaking of Chileans on French television.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not intervened with the Government of Haiti with regard to the persons who wish to return there and who may fear reprisals. I shall take under consideration the hon. member's representation which undoubtedly will be noted by the Haitian authorities themselves.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Andras: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in response to the question of the hon. member in which he referred to the question of information given to Haitians in Haiti about Canadian immigration law. I think he should know, as I have been informed, that subsequent to the changes in respect of access to landed immigrant status by applicants within Canada the Haitian government published a full explanation of those changes in Canadian regulations in the newspapers in Port-au-Prince.

We sent an officer to Port-au-Prince who sought an audience and received about 25 tourist agencies and fully explained the regulations so that there would be a full understanding in that country of what access to Canada legally was.

AVOIDANCE OF DISCUSSION OF CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION AT MINISTERIAL MEETINGS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. In view of the lengthy correspondence which he tabled in the House on Friday, October 25, indicating his point of view and those of other ministers of communications, can one assume that as a condition precedent of the next communications ministerial meeting there will be an agreement to have no discussion whatsoever on conflicts of jurisdiction between the authorities?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): I have already stated publicly, Mr. Speaker, and I see I must repeat it once more to answer the hon. member's question, that if the provinces want to amend the Canadian constitution, it is certainly not the Minister of Communications they must see, but the assembly of prime ministers.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED POLICE BRUTALITY AGAINST BILL BLACKNED— REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and it is with regard to the incident which took place in Hull last Saturday when an Indian Youth named Bill Blackned of Rupert House was allegedly brutally manhandled by the police. In view of the fact that the youth has studied at the Hull CEJEP under the auspices of DIAND, would the minister say if the department is investigating the incident and if the student is receiving legal assistance from the department?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The situation concerning this lad and the other one is being looked at by the department.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SUGGESTED AVOIDANCE OF CRISIS BARGAINING AND REINSTATEMENT OF CONCILIATION IN SETTLING DISPUTES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In light of the report made by Mr. Stanley Hartt, and in view of the impending national crisis facing us with an Air Canada strike, is the minister prepared to exercise his option under the Canada Labour Code and give his assurance to the House that he will not appoint boards and commissioners in labour disputes in order that crisis bargaining may be avoided?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Friesen: Is the minister prepared to take action to reinstate the conciliation stage as the truly last stage in the settling of labour disputes?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Each labour dispute deserves the treatment that the events which occur warrant. But I might say that when the hon. member puts forward a proposition of that kind, he should reconcile the various opinions that emanate from his own party.

POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF CROWSNEST FREIGHT RATE— REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is with regard to remarks made to the Canada Grains Council as reported in today's press with respect to the matter of the removal of the Crowsnest pass rate. I wonder if the minister, having regard to the great uncertainty that his remarks have now caused the western farmer, will give serious consideration to making a definitive statement at this time with respect to the government's intention or else to the effect that he will lift this proposal and put it to summer fallow for good?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): It would not be appropriate at this time to make a statement to the House in a formal way with regard to the government's policies, and I made it clear to the meeting in Edmonton that I was putting forward some ideas to be discussed by the Canada Grains Council and others. I made it emphatically clear at the meeting that this government was not moving away in any sense from the benefit of the Crowsnest rate in what I am suggesting. I suggested that I would not be a party to any such move that would lift the benefits, and this was the idea that I was putting forward, that the benefit from the Crowsnest rate to the extent that it is enshrined in our traditions might well be transferred to the prairie producers in a better way than through the inflexible rate itself. I emphasized that in my view any change would have to be enshrined in the statute to be useful.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is just a double cross of the western farmers.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Would the minister give an assurance to the House that any suggestion or proposal with respect to the removal of the Crowsnest pass rate would not be made before the government is in a position to make a comprehensive proposal with respect to western transportation in general relating to the grain trade, and furthermore, not before every interested party and group in Canada will have had an opportunity to make full and adequate representation to the government?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, hon. members are familiar with my strong belief regarding the putting forward of suggestions to the producers and receiving their views and consulting them in many different ways. This particular proposal is part of a three of four year review which has gone on with regard to our grain handling and transportation system. We are reaching the point of making some extremely important decisions about the future of that system, and any changes that might be made in the next months and years will require legislation in this place, at which time there will be an opportunity for more discussions. But the express point of my putting forward the idea before it is a firm proposal from the government is to encourage reaction to it. I still firmly believe that the transfer of benefits from the rate to some other form for the direct benefit of producers would be of immense advantage to them.

CATTLE PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who has just now disappeared from the chamber, but I will put it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that I have spoken to many farmers who have received as little as eight cents a pound for cows they have sold, and in view of the fact that farmers are now threatening to kill a lot of cattle across this country in protest, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not this government will provide immediately some emergency aid to cattle producers so that they can keep their cattle and not deplete their herds.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Minister of Agriculture has just returned.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows the position of the provinces in this respect, and I am sure he knows the position taken by his home province. They are asking us to share in their program with them; they seem to think it is satisfactory, but they must know that many cow-calf operators think it is unsatisfactory. Top grade cattle in Canada are selling at a higher price today than they have been for two weeks. We are working on a program which we think will supplement the programs that have been put into force by provincial ministers, but there are differences between the provinces. In fact, only two of the programs are similar, and three are very different. It is difficult to complement them.

Mr. Nystrom: The minister referred to some of the top beef cattle in the country. I was asking about cows that are selling as low as eight cents a pound and I was asking what the minister will do about this. For many weeks he had been saying he would do something; I want to know what it is. Is there aid coming or is there not?

Mr. Whelan: I would appreciate it if the hon. member would suggest some programs that he thinks might aid them.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I have always believed in consultation and I would accept suggestions. We have received many suggestions from the provincial people when they were here in October, but they were not unanimous on what should be done. If the hon. member can think of any programs that will aid cattle producers who are selling cows for the low price which the hon. member stated, I would like to hear of them because I do not know of any program that would take care of the situation. Most of them are culling cows from their herds as has been recommended by the provinces. They cull cows from their herds, and they are usually made into hamburger.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I would like to point out that some of the sirloin steaks and filet mignons also come from the eight cent or ten cent a pound cow and the restaurants were saying these were costing them $1 a pound last week by the carcass.

Mr. Nystrom: I rise on a point of order. I seriously suggested to you, Mr. Speaker, when members of the House, whether on the opposition or on the government side, ask a minister a question, it is the right of members of the House to have the minister answer that question, and this minister has not done that; instead, he has asked me a question. He wants me too suggest some alternatives to him. I can do that if you would give me the time to do it. In fact, I would be glad to suggest some alternatives to him. My point of order is that I think we in the House deserve to have ministers of the Crown give us answers when we ask them specific questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED CONFLICT IN STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS ON CROWSNEST FREIGHT RATES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister which is supplementary to that put by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Can the Prime Minister advise this side of the House who we are to consider the official government spokesman on transportation matters? We have had the minister in charge of the Wheat Board indicating that the Crowsnest freight rates should be reviewed and he went into some detail on how that should take place. On October 23, at page 676 of Hansard the Minister of Transport indicated, and I quote:

—no one in my department, and certainly not in my office, indicated that we should modify the Crowsnest pass rates.

Who are we on this side of the House to believe?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the practice in my government that ministers are not prohibited from thinking about the future and this does not mean that the status quo will not be preserved in the meantime. Contrary to the Conservative Party, we are always thinking ahead and I do not propose to prohibit my ministers from doing that.

BEEF CATTLE—PROPOSED UNITED STATES IMPORT QUOTAS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FORESTALL

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Agriculture relates to last Friday's trade information committee hearing in Washington that was convened to discuss Canada's cattle policies. In view of the alleged unfair and inequitable status of Canada's global quotas for cattle and beef, as charged by all six U.S. witnesses at this hearing; and since the minister or his department was not present at the meeting even as observers; and in view of the excellent and very well researched brief presented by the Canadian Cattleman's Association at this meeting, will the minister give the House some positive assurance that he intends to fully support the CCA brief in an effort to forestall almost certain quotas or embargoes on Canadian cattle and hogs entering the United States?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we followed the usual procedure with the representatives at the Canadian Embassy and a Canadian government representative was there to observe the proceedings. I might say that the Canadian Cattleman's Association brief was prepared in full consultation with our departmental people. I concur in everything they said and also disagree greatly with the American cattlemen's representations that were made according to reports I have received from my officials, and also I agree with the hon. member who asked the question.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

HALIFAX—REASON FOR DELAY IN SETTING UP MAGI—APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I should perhaps first of all compliment him on his success in international diplomacy apropos of what the Prime Minister just said. I should like to ask the minister if he intends to appoint a chairman or chief executive officer of MAGI, a proposal which was put forward, I think, in the 1972 election campaign as something that would be set up immediately in the metropolitan Halifax area and was to be a great step forward. Can we expect an announcement this weekend at the DREE conference in Halifax and is there any reason why members of parliament are not invited or able to attend that conference?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there are several elements in that question. When the hon. Leader of the Opposition talks about my success in international diplomacy I cannot tell whether he is referring to my activities in London or in St. John's Newfoundland, at the weekend.

On the question of MAGI I can advise that within the last ten days we have received the names put forward as directors of the corporation by the government of Nova Scotia. My recollection is that we are required to put up two additional names, and I see no reason why this cannot be done within a week or ten days. In that case the board of directors would begin to carry out the required search for a chief executive officer. On the matter of the weekend conference, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition or any member of parliament has not been invited I sincerely apologize. Of course, they are welcome.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that in the past the delay in setting up this MAGI was attributed to the difficulty of the minister and the Premier of Nova Scotia in reaching agreement on a chief executive officer or chairman, what is the great breakthrough now? How does the minister expect the directors to solve something that he and the premier could not solve face to face? And I am not getting mixed up in any international diplomacy in St. John's, Newfoundland!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, on the question of procedure, over the past 18 months a number of suggestions have been advanced on how the search for a chief executive officer might be pursued. This was not successful. As the hon. Leader of the Opposition is aware, the government of Nova Scotia suggested that the directors be put in place and given the responsibility for the search. I am prepared to move in that direction and they have accepted the responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE BORROWING POWER OF COMPANIES AND AUTHORIZE ISSUANCE OF SUBORDINATED NOTES

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-7, to authorize federal trust companies and loan companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power and to issue subordinated notes, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to make certain amendments to the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. These statutes provide for the incorporation and supervision of federally-incorporated trust companies and mortgage loan companies, respectively.

Trust Companies Act

Trust companies raise money from the public by accepting deposits and selling guaranteed investment certificates. Loan companies obtain their funds by the sale of debentures and the acceptance of deposits. For both types of companies the relevant statute places a maximum limit on the funds that can be obtained from the public. At present, this maximum limit is 20 times the company's capital and surplus, which can only be reached with the approval of the minister. The effect of these limits is to require the maintenance of at least a minimum excess of assets over liabilities to the public. This provides a safety margin in the sense that any asset losses can be absorbed first by this excess before any question arises as to the ability of the company to meet its obligations.

The maximum limit on the amount that any trust or loan company may borrow from the public was raised in 1970 from 15 to 20 times a company's capital and surplus. However, because of the rapid expansion being experienced by these companies, a number of them are now reaching the new limit. As a result, the companies requested that the existing capital margins be modified to enable them to continue to expand.

The government recognizes that a number of trust and loan companies are sufficiently sound, financially and from the standpoint of management, to justify some expansion beyond existing limits as previously referred to. In this bill we are, therefore, proposing that the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act be amended to permit a trust or loan company to borrow—in the case of trust companies it is more accurate to say that they accept money from the public in trust—in excess of 20 times a company's capital and surplus, subject to the adoption of an enabling bylaw establishing a new limit, which bylaw would have to be approved by the minister.

The authority to exceed the limit will also be subject to the ability of the company to meet a number of financial criteria that will be established by regulations. The amendment proposed would also empower the minister to require, as a condition of approving the borrowing bylaw, that some proportion of the additional borrowings in excess of the present limits be in the form of subordinated notes. This is desirable to ensure that a company retains an adequate margin of protection for, first, depositors; second, the holders of guaranteed investment certificates; and third, the holders of ordinary debentures.

As I have mentioned, the issuance of subordinated notes is part and parcel of the increased borrowing limits, and the bill would therefore expand the corporate powers of the companies to enable them to issue such subordinated notes subject to certain limitations designed to avoid confusion between the subordinated notes and any other instrument the company might issue to the public. I should mention here that these notes are intended primarily for sale to institutional investors and will only be issued in denominations of $25,000 or more.

Because of the rapidity with which events seem to change in the financial world in current years, it is desirable to have some slight flexibility in the application of these limits. Because of rapidly increasing deposits or a drop in security values, a company may find itself at or near its limits more quickly than might be expected. In order to provide some time to the company to arrange for additional capital or a modification of its pattern of growth, the bill contains two provisions that would, in certain circumstances, permit a company to accept funds in excess of limits otherwise applicable.

The first of these provisions relates to the amount off highly liquid assets, cash and government bonds, held by a company. A company would be given authority to accept funds from the public in excess of limits otherwise prescribed, to the extent that its highly liquid assets exceed the minimum prescribed by the act. The other special provision is that under terms and conditions prescribed by the minister, funds received by way of a loan from a shareholder or shareholders may be treated as though they were part of the capital for purposes of computing the limit on funds accepted from the public, provided the loan is made on terms subordinated to all other indebtedness of the company. It would be expected that the terms and conditions prescribed by the minister would be such as to make the use of subordinated loans in this way a temporary expedient to be replaced by permanent capital at an early date.

It occasionally happens that a company may find itself in excess of the limits imposed by the provisions of the act. Should this happen, the Superintendent of Insurance is required to report to the minister, and the minister may prescribe a time within which the company is to remedy the defect, he may impose conditions on the company or, in an extreme case, he may direct the superintendent to take control of the company's assets.

Some question has been raised concerning the obligation of a company toward its depositors and creditors in respect of funds received during a period that it is in excess of the limits otherwise prescribed. To remove any doubt on this score, the bill makes clear that in such case a company's obligations are not affected by the fact that it is in excess of those limits.

It is in the public interest that the amendments proposed by this bill be adopted, since trust companies and mortgage loan companies are an important source of funds for residential mortgages. The additional funds that these amendments, if passed, would allow them to raise would, of course, enable the companies to expand their lending activities while maintaining their financial stability. It might be of interest to note that at the end of 1973 there were 17 federally-incorporated trust companies with total assets exceeding $3.5 billion. This includes company funds and funds received in trust, the repayment of which is guaranteed. There were, as well, 14 mortgage loan companies with aggregate assets of approximately $3.25 billion.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a preliminary matter before speaking to the actual bill. My suggestion might help to facilitate the business of this House. This bill was given third reading in the other place last Thursday or Friday. It was studied in a committee of the other place. Unfortunately, it will not be possible for us to obtain a transcript of the evidence taken before that committee until the end of this week. I know the purpose of the government, and commend it for initiating this kind of legislation in the other place. I think the Senate Committee on Banking and Commerce can do an admirable job of investigating, questioning, and so on, with respect to legislation. The transcript of evidence taken before that committee would help hon. members of this House, in the same way as evidence taken before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs is helpful to hon. senators. But to be helpful we must have those transcripts. Efforts must be made to speed up their release.

Owing to the change in the scheduling of this bill, backbenchers both on this side and that of the government are at some disadvantage in that we do not have the benefit of knowing what happened in the other place. I hope the government will initiate more bills there and I commend the government House leader for what he has done. However, I ask him to keep in mind what I have said and have someone on his staff see that transcripts of evidence from Senate committees come forward as soon as possible so we can use them.

My second point also concerns scheduling. This bill is to be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Government supporters on that committee should be interested in the bill and may want to hear this debate, but they are dealing with another bill this afternoon. The government has asked them to do this. The committee was supposed to sit tonight but for some reason the sitting was advanced to this afternoon. Three or four members of my party who should be attending that committee, which is dealing with the Federal Business Development Bank Act, cannot attend; they must remain in the House to deal with this particular bill. I ask for closer scheduling of these matters.

I also wish to comment on the order of business and I draw my remarks to the attention of the government House leader. I am referring to the many bills referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs; there is a long queue of them. I do not think we are advancing House business simply by passing bills in this chamber and referring them to that committee, where they must remain queued up. Other House committees have nothing to do at present, and legislation could and should be referred to them. I know that this is sometimes difficult to arrange. In the previous session of parliament, of the first nine items six were sent to the finance committee. It had difficulty doing its work and government supporters on the committee and members from the opposition were very hard pressed.

Let me turn my attention to Bill S-7. Frankly, I wonder why the government has brought forward this bill at this time. It is some time since there was an examination of the business of banking and of the granting of credit in Canada. In view of rapidly changing events, and as conditions in the 1970s are far removed from those of the 1950s, I would expect the government to set up another commission of inquiry of the nature of the Porter royal commission on banking, which was set up almost 15 years ago. True, its findings were not handed down until 1964, but these things take time. I suggest that the government should give earnest consideration to again setting up such an inquiry, if the new Bank Act which I have discussed is to be brought in by 1977.

I do not think the public, the banking system or the government have sufficient information on hand to bring down the type of Bank Act we shall need in 1977. Conditions have changed immensely since the time amendments to the Bank Act were brought forward following the report of the Porter commission. I remember when the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), then minister of finance, brought forward those amendments. Even then I was concerned about a good deal of the philosophy embodied in the changes, even though the Bank Act was out of date. However, there were some steps forward.

With the greatest respect, all the government is doing with this bill is tinkering with one or two bolts in the machinery of credit granting and banking. After all, these trust companies do engage in the business of banking. We are not dealing with their powers as executors or their powers as mortgage companies to invest in realty mortgages. At this point we are dealing with the concept of a trust company as a credit granting institution. There is no way anyone can put it any other way; a trust company does engage in the business of banking.

As I said, this bill is a mere tinkering with a couple of bolts of the machine. It is not as serious as the tinkering that is proposed in Bill C-7, where there is quite a fundamental change of philosophy by introduction of the notion of partial public ownership in our chartered banks. That is something quite new, quite different; but it is tinkering of the worst kind. It represents moves now and then which are unrelated. Our entire credit granting and banking system in this country is far too complicated and far too important to engage in any of this ad hoc, unscheduled, uncoordinated tinkering.

Bill C-7 is only window-dressing in response to the premier of one province—possibly the premiers of two—having a delusion or illusion of grandeur. They feel they should be able to move in on one or more of the chartered banks. If and when Bill C-7 comes forward, we will have plenty to say about it. However, I feel this is a wrong step by the government in principle and philosophy in its strategy to deal with the banking system of Canada.

The parliamentary secretary was quite correct—there is no pretension of the legislation holding out more. This legislation will affect only trust companies falling under federal jurisdiction. In number they are small compared with the totality of trust companies operating in Canada. The biggest trust companies are not under federal jurisdiction. For example, the Royal Trust Company and the Montreal Trust Company escape the direct jurisdiction of federal legislation because they are provincially-incorporated trust companies. True enough, there is some indirect control over them through the deposit insurance regulations, but that is a very untidy and improper way of dealing with the situation. These companies engage in the business of banking. My answer to this question is that there should be a general banking act defining the business of banking. Anyone, whether incorporated provincially or federally, would then have to submit to the jurisdiction of the act.

The Superintendent of Banking should be a much more active official, not merely a passive receiver of information from our financial institutions. We should have a much wider banking system which would permit merchant banking, for example. This would do away with the "suitcase banking" that has been going on in many areas. Foreign banks operate through agents coming into Canada as visitors; they set up in a hotel room. They are engaged in the business of banking in Canada but are totally beyond the reach of the Minister of Finance or any supervisory agency of the government. Something is wrong when we have this situation.

It seems to me there is a proper way to deal with these matters, and I will come back to this point time and time again. I thought I had the minister of finance of the day at least partly persuaded in 1965 and 1966 that we should have a general banking act with appropriate sections or portions applicable to our chartered banks. They are a category of banks. I would also like to see merchant banks and trust companies, in their banking functions, controlled under such an act. At the present time we do not have the necessary flexible instruments in Canada. The lack of flexibility is clearly pointed out by this attempt to introduce a degree of flexibility of formula with regard to expansion of the lending powers of trust and loan companies.

However, there is one point here that I do not like. There is no specific control on the limit of overborrowing by trust companies. It is at the discretion of the minister. Parliament is being asked to give a blank cheque. What will motivate the minister to exercise his discretion? How will there be any certainty in so far as the operations of trust or loan companies are concerned, which are, presumably, supposed to benefit from this feature of flexibility? Who is to determine who receives the favourable discretion of the minister? Is not overlimit borrowing providing a sort of bail-out mechanism by permitting an increase in debt? In the recent history of the United States permission was given to borrow over the limit in order to assist with a bail-out. However, it did not work.

There are, supposedly, regulations to determine the financial health of a company; however, these are not specified. There is no indication of the regulations. Without wishing to go into detail, I am dumbfounded by their range. We are being asked to pass this open-ended legislation without having a chance to see the regulations. It is possible we shall have the opportunity of learning at least something of the nature of the regulations in committee. In fact, the regulations may well have been drafted and it may be possible to submit them to the committee, as has been done in the past with legislation of this kind.

Here again, we are considering an increase in the lending and borrowing powers of loan and trust companies which are beyond the control of the Bank of Canada. This is strange. The government already finds it difficult to maintain adequate monetary control at this time of inflation, but the bill before us proposes extending the powers of institutions over whose operations it has little or no control as far as monetary policy is concerned. It gives them a free hand. The parliamentary secretary might care to comment on this point, or tell us that the Minister of Finance will have something to say about it. I think it is one which should be considered by the government even though the margin might in the over-all be negligible.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

As I say, I do not want to go into detail now. A number of my hon. friends will have something more to say about this bill which was approved rather quickly in the other place. It will be some time before we reach it in our committee. I hope that later today we will complete this discussion and send the bill to committee. But that is the only undertaking I shall make at this time.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is to authorize federal loan and trust companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said at the outset, it applies only to companies incorporated under federal law. As far as I know, that involves only 17 trust companies with assets of $3.5 billion, and 14 loan companies with assets of $3.25 billion. So we are considering corporations with assets of slightly under $7 billion, according to the latest information I have received.

I wonder why this bill comes before us today, Mr. Speaker. It originated in the other place. I shall ask some serious questions about this measure and attempt to discover the motivation behind bringing it before the House of Commons at this time. Some of the information I have would lead me to believe that these trust and loan companies have been lobbying the government to get the legislation passed because their profit picture has been suffering. They are finding it necessary to pay more for money, and they are locked into mortgage contracts with low interest rates and five-year terms which they cannot escape. As a result, they are caught in a squeeze and their profits are not rising. If borrowing limits are removed, they can obtain more money and lend it at higher interest rates to compensate for the fact that a great deal of capital is tied up at lower rates. The fact that profits have been falling is one of the strongest motivations behind the presentation of this legislation.

The second reason for the bill is that trust and loan companies want to strengthen their place in the mortgage market. They have dominated that market for a number of years. Today, the supply of money is tighter; they want access to more funds; they want the ceiling to be raised so they can continue to dominate the market. This is an approach to which members of my party do not take very kindly. We believe that the federal government, representing the people, should be pumping millions and millions of dollars into the mortgage market at a low interest rate of, say, 6 per cent for people in the low or middle income groups. The money which the loan and trust companies are raising is going into the housing market at rates of 12 or 13 per cent, while interest rates on second mortgages are higher still.

The only motivation for putting this bill before us today is to fatten the profits of the trust and loan companies and to enable their shareholders to reap benefits at the expense of the consumer and the home builder. This bill will help to keep inflation rates high. It will help to drive up interest rates and keep inflation going. If it is passed and the companies expand their operations, they will be obliged to pay higher interest rates to depositors and bond subscribers in order to obtain more capital to lend. Corresponding rates of interest must then be charged on loans if desired profit rates are to be maintained. In other rates, inflation will be reinforced and prospective Canadian home buyers will find their situation increasingly difficult.

I cannot see any reason at all why I, as a person who tries to represent the consumer, should support this bill. The only people who will gain through its passage are shareholders in the trust and loan companies. The hon. member for Edmonton West has drawn attention to other reasons why the House should view with concern the passage of this measure. We are asked to give a blank cheque to trust and loan companies in order to create more money during a time of inflation. I know the regulations will set out guidelines, but how will those guidelines be interpreted? This will be left to the Minister of Finance. No ceiling will be placed on the amount of new money which will be created. I do not like this sort of situation being created in a highly inflationary situation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the bill originated in a very undemocratic, corporate lobby—namely, the Senate. I do not like the idea of bills coming to this House from the other place. The position taken by members of my party is clear. The other chamber is a place to which members are not elected but are appointed until age 75. This goes against the grain.

When this bill was considered by the other place last week, the president of the Trust Companies Association of Canada testified before the Senate committee and spoke of the need for the bill. He pretty well admitted that the prime motivation for the bill was to facilitate the making of greater profits by the trust and loan companies of this country, since so much money was being tied up in mortgages at a lower rate of interest that was prevalent a few years ago. Mr. D. G. Neelands, president of the Trust Companies Association of Canada and president of Canada Permanent Trust, had this to say:

> The trust industry . . . is experiencing some difficulties at the present time in terms of earnings because of the effect that rapidly rising interest rates have on spread. This is a matter which is obviously outside the industry's control and really the only—or major—defensive action or counteraction that the industry can take is to increase its volume.

The purpose of the bill before us is to increase the volume that is available to the trust and loan companies.

Mr. Gillies: More money for mortgage lending is what the country needs.

Mr. Nystrom: My hon. friend from Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) says we need more money for mortgage lending. But, I ask, at what rate of interest?

Mr. Gillies: The only way is to increase supply.

Mr. Nystrom: You will not increase the supply of houses until they are priced lower so people can afford them. You will not solve the problem simply by increasing the amount of mortgage money available at very high rates of interest, because people cannot afford to pay those rates. The President of the Trust Companies Association went on to say:

> If you have a lower spread, but you have a larger volume, you can still maintain a reasonable level of profit. Therefore it is critical for companies to be able to expand their operations, and many of the companies at the present time . . . are having difficulty with the 20 times limit. If we are going to be able to expand, as I believe we should be able to in the future, and to continue to make the major contribution which we, as an industry, have made to housing by making available mortgage funds in the recent times of difficulty in housing in Canada, then it is going to be essential for the companies to be able to expand their position—

Then Senator Hayden said:

> I suppose, then, in another sense, you might put it this way, that the ability to expand would provide you with sources, or should, of money, so that you can get the benefit of the high interest rates that are currently in effect to offset some of the low ones that you are stuck with.

To which Mr. Neelands replied:

> That is true—

I think it is obvious, from testimony like this and from other testimony given to the committee, that the prime motivating factor for this bill is the fact that the trust and loan companies of Canada are currently in trouble. They are asking that we remove the present ceiling so they can obtain and lend more funds, and in turn make a larger profit. I ask, for whose benefit? As far as I am concerned, it is not for the benefit of the home buyer or the consumer of this country. Our party has maintained for a long time that the way to solve the housing problem is not to make more funds available from mortgage companies at very high rates of interest but to put a lot of public money into housing. For too long the ordinary home buyer has been subject to the financial whims of the marketplace. Housing is a basic right of Canadians, not a matter that should be left to the whim of those in this country who control finance.

For that and other reasons, I cannot support the bill before the House. I see no way in which the bill will help the average person whom I try to represent in this House. I see no way in which the bill will facilitate the planning of our economy, the lowering of the inflation rate or anything of that sort. The sole, narrow purpose of the bill is to provide loan and trust companies in this country with access to more capital, so they can lend more money and compete with other financial institutions in making greater profits. I do not think this sort of situation will improve the living standards of ordinary Canadians.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen) introduce this bill, and although I do not fault the hon. member for this, I found that the wording he put on the record was very strange. It was wording that could have been used 10 or 20 years ago, or perhaps in some other country today. For obvious reasons, the hon. member, or whoever wrote his remarks, chose to avoid talking about the real problems that are causing the government to introduce this bill.

The fact is that the government has tended, through its spending and monetary programs, to aggravate inflation in this country beyond reason. A consequence of this deliberate action is that trust and loan companies are finding it exceedingly difficult to remain competitive, to render the service that I suggest to the hon. member for the NDP who has just spoken they have been rendering, and at the same time to make a fair return, called a profit.

I believe it is time we were a little more frank with the Canadian public.

Inflation today is a political problem, not an economic one. For the last four years the government has known perfectly well that steps should be taken to curb inflation in this country, yet it has chosen, I suggest egged on by NDP members, deliberately to throw out responsible fiscal and monetary measures of the kind that should have been implemented. As a result, the government has brought in a bill which, if you read between the lines, Mr. Speaker, is designed to correct the problems they know exist in a very substantial industry in Canada, namely, the trust and loan companies.

The figures are really startling. For example, the money supply in this country has doubled in four years. From the first quarter of 1970 to the first quarter of this year—the last available figures that I have—the money supply jumped from $12.5 billion to $25 billion. This is one of the root causes of inflation, and there is no way the government should be allowed to duck that fact. If one looks at the figures, one finds that trust and loan corporations have increased their assets, deposits and guaranteed certificates and debentures, along with most other financial institutions. However, I suggest—and I was very disappointed with the answer given me by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in this connection—that it is now time for the government to commission an outgoing study of the Canadian banking and financial system.

In 1961 such a study was aked for, and it led to the Porter commission on banking. I believe they made a worth-while review of the trust and loan field, the life insurance field, consumer banking and the other financial sectors of our economy. But let us put it in perspective. At that time the baking industry in Canada had gross assets of about $20 billion. Today they are over $80 billion—four times the amount. One bank today, the Royal Bank of Canada, is greater in size than the entire banking community at the time of the Porter commission on banking in the early 1960s. Trust companies, likewise, have had phenomenal growth, as have the loan companies in the same period. For example, in 1964 the trust companies had guaranteed funds of $2.6 billion; at the end of 1973 their guaranteed funds amounted to $9.8 billion.

The funds of estates, trusts and agencies handled by the trust companies rose in the same period from $11.2 billion to $29 billion. In total, the assets of trust companies in Canada rose from $14.1 billion in 1964 to $39.7 billion in 1973. The mortgage companies, or loan companies as they were called, had a correspondingly sensational growth, although slightly slower than the growth to which I have referred.

I would point out that a heavy proportion of that growth has been due to the inflationary policies followed by this government. This is the reason we are debating a bill that proposes to raise the limit under which the trust and loan companies may operate with regard to their deposits, guaranteed investment certificates and, in the case of loan companies, debentures. Surely it is time, again, to ask whether our banking system is working properly. Is it proper to have ten chartered banks at the present time, 63 trust companies, and a smaller number of loan companies dealing in somewhat similar activities and yet not all under the same act and not controlled by the same regulatory authorities? This is a question which has been raised many times.

[Mr. Stevens.]

I believe it is important for this House to consider whether it is time our banking institutions and our trust and loan companies were treated in a way that would allow them to be in a truly competitive position. In that way we might find that the type of situation with which we are dealing today would not recur as readily. The truth is—this came out during the Senate committee hearings—that the banks do not have these artificial limits. For example, they do not have to meet a limit of 20 times their capital. Why do the trust and loan companies have to follow such arbitrary limits?

I believe we should be asking ourselves whether previous parliaments were totally wrong when they said that trust and loan companies should be limited to 4, 8, 12½ or 20 times their capital. Were they totally wrong, when today we say we should have a very much looser system which is not open to decision by this House but simply to future drafters of regulations and some discretionary overseeing by the minister? Who is wrong?

I suggest that over the last ten years this government has systematically ignored the rule-book in order to suit its own political purposes as far as economics are concerned. Once you have abandoned sound monetary and fiscal policies it is only natural that you must come in with band-aid legislation such as this to repair the damage done to institutions in our financial system which have been caught in a difficult position. This government likes to take comfort from the fact that other countries are also in a difficult inflationary position. Let us face it: why should the government not take comfort from this fact? If one looks at the predominant government parties in most of the industrialized countries since the end of the Second World War, one sees they have been socialist, liberal, or democratic governments of the left. It is 30 years since the legislatures of our main industrialized nations became dominated by liberal, socialist or democratic governments of the left, to which I have referred.

I think it should be placed on record that in the United States, for example, the Democratic Party has held a majority of seats in both the Senate and the House of Representatives for all but four of the past 40 years. In Great Britain, Labour has had a consistent edge over the Conservatives since 1945, while in Canada only once in the past 39 years has there been a majority Conservative government: that was in 1958. I could go on and give similar statistics in respect of other industrialized countries.

I suggest there has been a consistent move toward irresponsible fiscal and monetary measures in those countries. That is why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) can almost take heart when comparing his record to those of his socialist, liberal and democratic friends who are to the left, in other countries. They all follow a "no rules" system so far as management of their monetary and fiscal affairs is concerned. Let me be more specific. Surely we should be asking ourselves, when we consider this type of legislation, why the majority of the trust companies in this country are under provincial, rather than federal, jurisdiction. If one looks at the individual trust companies in Canada, one finds that very few are under federal control. Our bigger trust companies are provincially controlled.

Here we have a situation in which a very important sector, as indicated by the billions of dollars in assets which the trust companies control, is not wholly controlled by the government of Canada. That is a further reason for believing a Porter-like commission on banking would be a suitable study, rather than the introduction of legislation such as we are considering today in virtual isolation from the other ingredients of our financial community. In this bill—I hope this matter will come out in committee—I think it is interesting to note that we still refer to things called assets and liabilities and that there are ratios under which, say, 20 times your excess of assets over liabilities is the limit.

What is meant by assets? In an inflationary economy such as the government has triggered, what value is placed on an NHA, 6 per cent mortgage that has 15 or 20 years to run? Is it fair to show that item on your balance-sheet on a cost, or even on an amortized basis, when you know the reality is that if the mortgage had to be sold immediately it would have nothing close to an amortized or cost value? A look at our trust and loan companies will show that they are still reflecting their mortgages on a cost basis—certainly at the Ottawa level.

When this bill is considered in committee, I hope the minister or the officials of his department will explain the current position with regard to trust and loan companies. Do they, in fact, have an excess of capital over liabilities if true value is taken into account? I refer to the liquidation value of their mortgage portfolios and any other assets they have which are subject to today's market fluctuations. I would also point out that if one reads the annual reports of the trust companies, one finds that over the last few years there has been increasingly a comment in the reports to the effect that they hope the government will quickly take steps to end inflation which is causing them distinct problems.

Guaranty Trust's annual report, for example, pointed out very specifically that they felt it was regrettable that so many people were, in effect, apologizing for inflation instead of taking steps to end it. They and the other trust companies involved are well aware of the devastation that inflation is inflicting upon the country.

In conclusion, let me say that we know this bill will go to committee and we can do nothing about it, but I suggest that we in this House can do something about the irresponsible actions of the government with respect to the economy. I believe we should ask ourselves: was it really necessary for government expenditures in the past ten years to soar by 330 per cent, if you exclude defence expenditures? That 330 per cent increase does not include such matters as the sixfold increase in our unemployment insurance benefits. I mention this because the 330 per cent increase this government has brought about in its own spending has contributed to inflation. The increase they have allowed has caused inflation, yet if we review history we find that the situation in which we are living is truly abnormal.

It is totally wrong for the government to indicate that somehow inflation is uncontrollable and that we must live with it. The fact is that you can go back literally 300 years in British history and you will find there never has been a period of inflation comparable to the present one, other than in wartime. Surely we must ask ourselves why, for a period of 110 years prior to the First World War, the industrialized countries of the world had a 3 per cent to 5 per cent interest rate structure, with very little inflation, and today we are told that we must accept a 10 per cent to 12 per cent interest rate structure, with a similar rate of inflation. The fact is that if this government had the courage, we could counteract inflation.

It seems to me that the type of bill with which we are dealing would not be necessary because the trust and loan companies could operate as well under a 20 times ceiling, without this type of escape valve, which would allow them to look after any immediate problems they may have as the result of inflationary pressures. I do not wish to delay the bill, but I hope we will at least undertake in committee a partial review of the situation. Most important, I urge the government, once again, to overview the entire financial system in Canada so that the whole country knows where it is going. I am very fearful of the direction in which the economy appears to be heading.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) set forth the reasons members of the NDP oppose Bill S-7, and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has set forth his doubts as to what is a reasonable amount by which trust companies should increase their credit as expressed in the formula defining excess of capital over liabilities. He asked whether that amount should be 4 times, 10 times or 20 times the present amount. I wonder whether he could have answered that question himself by telling us what limits should be imposed on trust companies, because every month when we get the figures from Statistics Canada we find that the largest component of inflation is usually to be found in housing.

Mr. Stevens: No, government.

Mr. Gilbert: I say that interest rates are the largest component of inflation. It seems to me that the proper course for the government to take would be to impose a limitation on interest rates. There are three types of interest rates: rates for consumer loans, rates for companies, and rates for mortgages. We in the NDP would like to see a limitation on mortgage interest rates. If we support this bill, there is no guarantee whatsoever that there will be a downward trend in mortgage interest rates. In fact, I suspect they will increase because trust and loan companies have appealed to the government to change the limits imposed. I am sure hon. members have seen the big signs put up by some of the trust companies in certain cities across the country telling depositors that they will receive 11 per cent and 12 per cent interest on their money. There is only one result that can obtain from that type of advertising, that is, higher interest rates. The same result will obtain from the changes that the government intends to make. That is why we oppose them.

Last Friday we heard the persuasive member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) attempt to convince the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) to remove the cyclical cost of housing from that spiral, especially with regard to interest rates. Today he thinks that if we support this bill and it is passed, there will be an increase in mortgage moneys which will bring down interest rates. If that were so, I would gladly support the bill. I would call to the attention of the hon. member for Don Valley the fact that the government used the same argument when they removed the ceiling from the bank interest rate. They said that once they removed that 6 per cent ceiling we would see a tremendous change in interest rates.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We certainly did.

Mr. Gilbert: We certainly did; it went up and up. Then we had the 25-year mortgages changed to 5-year terms to appease the mortgage companies, thus giving them the opportunity to change interest rates every five years and imposing upon borrowers the added worry and burden at the end of every five years that they would have to pay larger interest rates. The former member for Trinity suggested changing CMHC rates, and he guaranteed members of the committee that interest rates would go down substantially when the CMHC formula respecting interest rates was removed. Again, we had the similar experience of rates going up and up. Now, the CMHC rate is 11½ per cent, as I noted in today's paper, and conventional mortgages are 12 per cent and 13 per cent.

I would remind hon. members of the example I gave last week of a $35,000 mortgage. If a home buyer wanted to buy a house and assume a $35,000 mortgage at 11 per cent, he would have to pay every month, for principal and interest, the sum of $336.89. Over a period of one year the amount would be $4,042.89, and it would take the 25-year period to pay off the mortgage. At the end of 25-year period, the house purchaser would have paid $100,670, with an 11 per cent mortgage. Now the government brings forth another bill to permit loan and trust companies to increase their borrowing power so they can lend moneys at higher rates of interest. We are certainly opposed to that, Madam Speaker. We in the New Democratic Party feel there is a social responsibility on loan and trust companies and banks to put aside a percentage of their moneys as dictated by the amounts required for housing needs for the year, and we feel the interest rate should be no higher than 6 per cent. This would give the average working person an opportunity to buy a home and pay for it within a reasonable period.

I notice that the hon. member for Don Valley always likes to agree with my proposition that every Canadian is entitled to a home at reasonable cost and a reasonable interest rate, but when it comes to putting that idea into action, he and the Conservative Party fall short in their efforts to bring forth the philosophy which he seems to accept. We are opposed to this bill because of the results which will obtain. There will be higher interest rates for the average Canadian because the federal loan and trust companies will borrow moneys at higher interest rates and pass them on to the borrower who wants to buy a house. We will not be party to this scheme. It would also give the provincial loan and trust companies an opportunity to change their legislation in the same way. It is not a good way to meet the problems of inflation and, more especially, the acute housing shortage of today. Madam Speaker, we are strongly opposed to this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling).

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, the question will be put in due course, I am sure, and the bill will go to committee at the appropriate time. Contrary to the opinions of some members of the New Democratic Party, I do not object to the fact that this bill originated in the Senate. I find no fault with that procedure, because the Senate has time to consider measures such as those put forward in the bill. I do object, however, to the lack of information with regard to this bill. I am somewhat annoyed that we have not been given its background.

The Senate had meetings and hearings at which there were witnesses. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) pointed out, we in this House are not given the opportunity to study the evidence presented to the Senate committee. Surely the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) could have put together some information for us so we could adequately examine the various facets of the bill.

This bill pertains only to trust and loan companies that are federally chartered, Madam Speaker, so the first thing we have to ask is, what about provincially-chartered companies? Has there been any liaison or discussion with the provinces on this matter? Are they going to bring forward parallel legislation in the near future? The activities of trust and loan companies figure very prominently in the monetary life of this country; they are a very powerful force.

Anyone in the mortgage field knows very well that these companies are in great difficulty today because of lack of funds. This legislation will allow them to increase their borrowings so that they will have the funds to lend. I cannot find fault with their having more funds, because one of the complaints from those who are concerned with housing in this country is that not enough mortgage funds are available. They claim this is creating the high interest rates we are faced with. So we can hope that if more funds become available, interest rates will come down and the housing market will be assisted.

My concern, Madam Speaker, is that we do not seem to know where we are going in the over-all banking field. Let us face the facts of life. Trust and loan companies are competing with the banks for deposits with which to operate their businesses. Across this country we have the chartered banks, 65 or 75 trust companies, a number of loan companies, credit unions, and venture capital firms of all kinds. It is obvious to anyone who has even a nodding acquaintance with the financial world that trust companies and banks are caught up in inflation. It is time, therefore, the minister considered setting up another royal commission on banking. Perhaps the way to start would be with a preliminary inquiry conducted by the Senate, and then to have a full-blown royal commission.

Madam Speaker, I should like to quote from the 1973 annual report of the Guaranty Trust Company which indicates that company's concern. The report points out that we were faced, in 1972-73, with great legislative uncertainties. That is a polite way of saying they are very concerned about the level of inflation in this country and what is being done about it. The report opens by saying:

> The 1972 report to the shareholders noted that, "with the large increase in money supply that has taken place in 1972 and the possibility of a continued substantial increase in 1973, there is a great danger of sharp increases in inflation and, therefore, interest rates—

● (1620)

The report refers to 1972 inflation rates, which were not nearly as high as they are today. I continue:

> —as 1973 draws to a close and the third successive year of economic growth ends. It is possible that 1974 will see the end of the current cycle of growth and this may coincide with high inflation and high interest rates."
> This assessment, while generally correct, did not anticipate the magnitude of the increase in both interest rates and inflation that faced the company this past year and that faces the company in the future.
> As senior officers of a company which invests money on behalf of other people, we are concerned by the fact that so many people seem to be taking this rapid increase in inflation for granted. The Economic Council of Canada in its recent annual report said that Canada should merely outperform its neighbouring countries in this respect. So far, the country seems to be able to tolerate without any great social unrest a rate of inflation between 5 per cent and 8 per cent.

Inflation is now running at 12 per cent and may reach 14 per cent. That is intolerable. The report continues:

> We do not know whether inflation can be kept this low. We rather doubt it and we do not know what kind of further social distortions will take place if inflation moves up to rates in excess of 10 per cent annually and middle income savings become subjected to confiscation by this rate of inflation.

The author of this report was a prophet. Today, mortgage funds are almost non-existent at rates which the average Canadian can afford. Now we have a bill before us which seeks to increase the borrowing level of trust and loan companies. That is how the government is trying to deal with the situation. We must go much further and consider the serious questions facing our entire banking structure. I am disturbed when I see advertisements dealing with guaranteed deposit certificates. What do they guarantee? They guarantee only the interest rate. Really, they guarantee the interest, and nothing else. I think that is intolerable.

Trust and loan companies are operating in the banking field. Legislation which controls banks guarantees the security of deposits. In this instance we are debating a bill which deals with guaranteed deposits, yet the guarantee really means nothing. Passage of this bill will increase the work load of the Department of Insurance because, obviously, more personnel will be needed in that department to supervise the operations of trust and loan companies.

It must be obvious, Madam Speaker, that we are fumbling around in speaking to this bill. The reason is simple. We have available absolutely nothing to help us debate this legislation. We are asked to rush this bill through without being able to make an effective contribution to the debate. I hope that when the bill is discussed in committee the minister will make information available. In that way we could pass this bill rapidly, which I believe is what the minister wants. We can only discuss this bill intelligently if we have available adequate information.

This bill will increase the power of trust and loan companies which are not under the direct control of the Bank of Canada but which compete with banks in the field of banking. As I said earlier, the bill will apply to federally-incorporated institutions, and it is assumed that appropriate provincial legislation will follow. Let me ask this question: what steps has the government taken to make sure that legislation like this is applied uniformly across the country? How can we be assured of uniformity of legislation governing trust and loan companies? Certainly, the largest companies in the field are provincially-chartered. We should have before us information showing that the minister and his staff have discussed the matter with the provinces and that parallel legislation will be brought forward by the provinces, thereby bringing uniformity to the operations of trust and loan companies.

This bill will lower the safety margins of companies at a time when their assets are declining and their liabilities increasing directly because of inflation. Previous speakers have dealt with overlimit borrowing and the bail-out mechanism which will permit an increase in debt. In committee we shall consider this subject carefully to see what safeguards are included in the bail-out mechanism.

One feature of the bill which bothers me is that it puts so much power into the hands of the minister. There is no specific overlimit with regard to borrowing; this is left to the discretion of the minister. The minister may increase or reduce the authorized ratio of borrowing. Here, again, we see great power vested in the minister. I think that power should be vested in the House of Commons, which should consider this matter. This sort of thing is happening with many bills which are debated in this House. I suggest that we may be abdicating our responsibilities. We are putting power into the hands of commissions and ministers of the Crown which should rightfully remain vested in the House of Commons. I deplore this, Madam Speaker. Sooner or later we must deal strongly with this situation.

Why am I raising these objections? Consider our mess in transportation as a result of power being vested in the Canadian Transport Commission. The bill which the House considered immediately before this one dealt with amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. The government suggested, through the medium of that bill, that great powers should be vested in the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Yet here we are discussing another piece of legislation under which power to increase borrowing limits is left to the discretion of the minister. I ask, to what extent can such discretion become a tool of monetary policy? We must consider this question seriously. The regulations concerning the financial health of the company are not specified, and they are discretionary.

This bill, I know, will be referred to the standing committee at five o'clock.

Mr. Lang: Would you like to pause for a few minutes? Take a deep breath.

Mr. Kempling: I should like to, but we have 30 minutes to go.

Madam Speaker, I am concerned about the lack of adequate information which is necessary if we are properly to consider this bill, instead of sort of floating around and talking in this fashion. I refer to a suggestion put forward by previous speakers. We need to have established a royal commission on banking which will consider the whole field of banking, trust and loan companies, the way credit unions across this country operate, and venture capital operations. I am supposed to be in committee this afternoon where they are discussing Bill C-14, the Federal Business Development Bank Act. It is time we had before this House a mechanism whereby we could set up a royal commission to study the whole matter of banking, near-banks and merchant banks.

● (1630)

In my own private business, I had to go to London, England, to find a merchant bank with which to do business because we could not find adequate facilities in Canada to carry out the type of transaction in which we wished to engage. It is time this type of action was taken by the government. We should take a good look at the total financial structure of the country as far as banks are concerned, and do something meaningful to supply money to the mortgage and general business fields.

In the twenty-ninth parliament we passed legislation setting up a mortgage investment corporation. I am sure the minister has noted that very few of these companies put shares on the stock market because the market is at such a low ebb. They are now endeavouring to improve the situation in the mortgage field with Bill S-7 which will increase the borrowing limits of the various trust and loan companies. In conclusion, I say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen) that it is a poor show that more information was not provided. We implore him to ensure that adequate information is placed before the committee at the time it considers this matter.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Madam Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate. However, I have been inspired to do so by at least two factors. The first was well expressed by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling). I can well imagine the embarrassment of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen), knowing his feelings of understanding and sympathy toward his colleagues who would have liked an opportunity to examine the background material which gave rise to this legislation. Had we even seen some of the material that was available to the Senate committee, this debate would not only have been more meaningful but more helpful to all concerned. I can appreciate the embarrassment of the parliamentary secretary, because he was the spokesman for the government on this occasion, and he knows that hon. members—himself included—had very little opportunity to prepare themselves.

Second—and I hope I do not have to apologize for being parochial—the matter of trust and loan companies is very personal to me and, I think, to many others from western Ontario. We—I include the parliamentary secretary—went through the traumatic experience of the failure some years ago of a very prominent trust company in our part of Canada. It is easy for those of us who have practised law to regard a trust or loan company in a very narrow legal sense. Indeed, it is possible for those who have engaged in real estate, either as a member of the real estate profession or in conjunction with associates, to regard a trust company as merely a source of borrowing mortgage or short-term funds. It is very easy for those of us who have the affluence with which to make substantial deposits to simply regard trust companies as a depository for those funds. However, I say to all hon. members that the ordinary Canadian, if indeed those whom I represent in Perth-Wilmot can be classified as such, regard a trust company as much more than that.

Those of us in western Ontario who invested funds in the company which failed some years ago regarded a trust company as almost akin to the Bank of Canada, not just for their deposit receipts, savings accounts or guaranteed investment certificates, but if one owned a share in a small rural trust company it was regarded as being almost fully guaranteed by the government. Shares in small trust companies, particularly those that were rurally-oriented, passed from generation to generation. I suspect this is true not only of western Ontario but of many parts of Canada.

The trauma and disturbance, not only to the economic community when one of these trust companies fails, is something you have to experience to appreciate. In the city of Stratford, people rushed to the trust company and literally took out suitcases full of money, for fear they would lose their entire savings. Loan share values went overnight to one-twentieth, and indeed one-fiftieth of their previous high values. When talking in terms of trust companies, I hope my colleagues will not regard them simply as financial institutions, because in many cases they are community institutions.

With regard to this legislation, I deplore the fact that it is prompted out of sheer necessity created by the cancer of inflation. No doubt we will have further legislation of a similar kind, because trust and loan companies find themselves in the horribly difficult position of having to pay tremendously high interest rates on even short-term money while at the same time trying to operate in a successful manner.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) quoted some very interesting statistics on what it would cost a home owner with a certain mortgage at a certain interest rate. Statistics like that have been given for years and years. They are always intended to create horror. On the first home I bought, the interest rate was 4 ¾ per cent. My wife and I sat down one evening to figure out what it would cost us over the 25-year amortization period. We were just as horrified by the figure 25 years ago as the figure given today might horrify people. But that is not the crux of the situation. The difficulty in which we find ourselves, in October, 1974, is not the horror created by those figures. The difficulty is that six potential home owners who wanted to buy a home in my constituency were turned down by a trust company because they could not qualify for a mortgage. That is the horror, not the arithmetic which the hon. member gave us this afternoon. It is that these six families who wished to invest in their community by owning their own home were turned down by the same trust company. If the members of the New Democratic Party are going to be horrified, let them be horrified by the fact that their fellow citizens in every community across Canada are not allowed to invest in their communities by investing in homes.

Mr. Gilbert: Even if they qualified, they would not be able to pay for one.

Mr. Jarvis: No statistics have proved to me that foreclosures, powers of sale and revocations are increasing. What is decreasing is home ownership in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: I question the sincerity and integrity of the members of the NDP. If they are going to use this abundance of energy to worry about their fellow citizens, they should worry about the fellow who wants to buy a home. I appreciate your indulgence, Madam Speaker, because I know I have gone far afield; but I was prompted to do so by hon. members to my left.

● (1640)

As we all know, this legislation applies only to federally-incorporated institutions. My concern is this: our fellow Canadians do not know whether a trust company is federally incorporated or not. I do not think they care, and I do not think there is any reason they should care whether a comapny is federally incorporated. Their concern is with the solidity and integrity of the institution. I am disappointed the parliamentary secretary did not give us an indication of the likelihood of the provinces adopting identical or similar legislation in this regard. This information is, almost certainly, available to the minister. I presume there has been consultation, or at least some correspondence, on this subject between the minister and his provincial counterparts. I trust the parliamentary secretary will clarify this aspect of the matter before the debate is over.

With regard to ministerial discretion, I would only remind the parliamentary secretary of the days he and I spent in law school studying the effects of ministerial discretion under the Income Tax Act. I think every professor of law has impressed upon students the dangers of ministerial discretion. I make no comment with regard to this particular example, except to say I can hardly believe the parliamentary secretary would accept another encroachment upon our statute books, by way of ministerial discretion, without making any protest.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, he would; he's a Liberal.

Mr. Jarvis: I am sorry, too, that the parliamentary secretary did not give us any assurance as to the capacity of the Department of Insurance to undertake the increased work load this legislation involves. It is my experience that this vital group within the government service has probably been as understaffed as any. This afternoon might have provided an opportunity for the government to tell the House whether this group would be given the staff it needs and the wherewithal to carry out its tasks effectively. I suspect we cannot take much comfort in the protection afforded us by the Department of Insurance with regard to continuous inspection of the institutions which fall within its jurisdiction.

In conclusion, may I say two things: first, I deplore the paucity of material which was made available to us as a basis for making a meaningful contribution to this debate; second, I would hope that in considering this legislation we would look upon loan and trust companies, not as just financial institutions but as valuable institutions within the life of our community.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I, too, welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate on Bill S-7, a complex and technical measure increasing the powers of federally-incorporated trust and loan companies. There are a number of things I should like to say about this bill, but at the outset I should like to compliment my hon. friend from Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) who has just put some pertinent questions to the parliamentary secretary about certain features of this legislation. The hon. member succeeds Mr. Monteith, who was for years financial critic for the Conservative Party in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. I believe he acquitted himself nobly in analysing a bill of such financial complexity and putting specific questions to the parliamentary secretary. Whether he will receive pertinent and specific answers to those questions is not certain, but in any case I wish to compliment him before I proceed.

The fact is that the bill would give the minister discretion to increase the borrowing limits of loan and trust companies to the extent of approximately 20 times the excess of assets over liabilities. This can be done provided the minister is satisfied the company complies with regulations which he himself has laid down. I can remember an occasion, not too many years ago, on which there was a debate in the House on an amendment to the Excise Tax Act. It was proposed that the then minister of finance be given discretion to decide whether an article which entered this country was of a class or kind similar to that already made in the country.

The opposition at that time, which included some, if only few, of those who are sitting across the way this afternoon, castigated the minister of finance for wishing to assume unusual and dictatorial discretionary powers. Indeed, the Pickersgills and Chevriers of that day said the proposal would give power to the minister of finance never previously conferred upon ministers in times of peace. Yet here we are, giving the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) power to decide whether certain loan or trust companies shall be allowed to extend their borrowing limits in the absence of any real checks or balances such as ought, in my view, to be exercised either by the finance committee or by some other body.

We are also asked to consider a new procedure allowing for the issuing of subordinated debentures. This will add a new dimension to an already complicated field. Before examining the merits or demerits of some of these proposals, I should like to say four or five things. First, condensing what some of my hon. friends have said about being caught with some of their digits down, or their balance-sheets exposed, because of the unusual circumstances in which we are debating this bill right now, I would like to take a different tack: I think it is deplorable to call a financial bill for consideration in this chamber when a committee of the House charged with considering matters of finance is discussing another financial bill in a committee room some doors down the corridor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: As we all know, there are many claims upon the time of a member trying to do his duty, as between the House, his office and the committees. At least one of his problems could be resolved if care were taken not to schedule committee meetings at the same time as a similar subject matter is being considered on the floor of the House. For example, I see the Minister of Finance is not here today and I know that his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), is an illustrious member from a riding in Ontario. He was the eminently fair chairman of a very difficult committee during the last session of the previous parliament. I do not detract from his stature one whit, but the fact of the matter is that since the Minister of Finance is not here, his parliamentary secretary is in charge—a practice that I think is deplorable.

● (1650)

The second reason I rise to participate in this debate is that the bill comes from the Senate. One of my colleagues to my left, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), has carried on a personal crusade, suggesting that the other place be substantially altered in a most fundamental form, namely, by terminating that legislative body.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: He wants to extinguish, to abolish, the Senate. To some extent I share the hon. member's sentiments. We have talked about reform of the Senate until we are blue in the face. For the life of me, I cannot understand why a Conservative, with only 17 good gentlemen in the Senate, should continue to put up with the charade that we have a chamber of sober second thought. Out of some 102 senators there are only 17 good, true men. The only reason I mention this is that the bill has come from the Senate and I do not have too much opportunity to comment on the Senate. Nevertheless, a good many senators themselves feel that it is time fundamental reform of the Senate was made, and to me the only fundamental reform is abolition of the Senate.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You may hope to get there.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) may find another chamber in which to participate at some stage of life, be it high or be it low; but he will participate well and energetically in any chamber. While I may have some personal views as to the utility and, frankly, the rationality of the Senate as presently composed, notwithstanding some of the so-called reforms of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Senate does do some good from time to time in considering details of bills of a technical nature.

I have said enough about the Senate for the moment. We all seem to think that the world will stop turning if the Senate is abolished, but there is not a province in Canada that did not once have a legislative council. Even during the long years the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) has had in this place, the legislative council of Quebec has seen the axe under Premier Lesage, a member of the same party as hon. gentlemen opposite. Those members are not too consistent in some parts of Canada, but they do have certain power in other parts, and I think they should use some of that power to do something sane and sensible regarding the Senate.

Coming to the bill, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why bother?

Mr. Nowlan: —if I thought that this bill would in any way help increase money supply to the young, farmers, small businessmen or tradesmen, then I would be ecstatic about it. But I doubt how it is going to help those people who cannot get funds no matter what their station in life. As my hon. friend from Perth-Wilmot said, we all know inflation is the cancer of our society today, and interest rates are the arteriosclerosis of our economy. As arteriosclerosis chokes off the arteries of humans, so inflation and the exorbitant, almost usurious, interest rates charged Canadians—be they tradesmen, small businessmen, farmers or fishermen—delay plans for production, thus causing lay-offs which even today are increasing. Our economists today debate whether we are in a period of inflation, stagflation or recession. There are as many opinions about this among economists as there are opinions among members of parliament about the efficacy of some of the procedures in this chamber.

I am less than enthusiastic about this bill because, as so often, the government has failed to do some joint planning with the provinces on the question of monetary policy as it relates to trust and loan companies. In this respect we have had only silence. There has also been a vacuum in many other areas of federal policy and leadership, In fact, the economic philosophy of this government can be sized up in two or three phrases, phrases we ran into again today during the question period. Whether it is the grain handlers who are holding study periods, or Air Canada pilots who are threatening to go on strike this weekend, the philosophy is catch up, catch up, catch up. When one group catches up with inflation, every other group starts to fall behind; and when all other groups try to catch up, the whole country starts to go down the drain.

If the parliamentary secretary had a voice, had some sway, among his colleagues, then he might bring some sense to them through his persuasive powers and the tremendous stature that he has in the House. But the fact is that he is only a parliamentary secretary. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are meeting the premiers tomorrow, yet they do not have a comprehensive plan in mind for anything at all. All they have is a fly-duster to take care of housekeeping chores.

I say the sooner we get this bill to committee, where it will be given detailed examination to see whether some of my fears are realized regarding the money supply and high interest rates, the better, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, having looked over the bill and heard some of the debate, I am led to think that if my colleague from Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) and some of his compatriots were to write another operetta based on this bill, they would have to call it "The Pirates of Finance".

I see it is five o'clock; may I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO ENABLE HOUSEWIVES TO MAKE CONTRIBUTIONS AND TO COLLECT BENEFITS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge) moved that Bill C-202, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (housewives' contributions and benefits), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable housewives to make contributions to and collect benefits from the Canada Pension Plan. Since many housewives spend part of their careers working in industry as well as working at home, they should be permitted to continue their contributions to the Canada Pension Plan while at home to ensure them a full pension at retiring age. The bill recognizes the equal importance of work performed at home with the work performed in industry and provides housewives with the same pension opportunities. The plan is voluntary and housewives are designated as self-employed contributors paying the contribution of the employee as well as of the employer at the rate of their choice, up to the maximum.

Let us face it: in this country we can be very proud of the old age pension that has been a part of our life now for many years. We merely have to look back to the days when people reached old age and did not have security, to see how far we have come. Nevertheless, a great deal remains to be done. The old age pension is not high enough: it should be increased. The eligibility age should be lowered. People should be able to receive benefits at age 60.

A third point is that the Canada Pension Plan should be made applicable fairly to women and others outside the labour force. It is this third point which is the purpose of my bill. It could be argued that the Canada Pension Plan is not in the same package or is not in the same range as the old age pension; that the Canada Pension Plan is a work-related pension and that women who are not in the labour force, or others who are not in the labour force, should not have a claim on it.

When the plan was introduced, the argument was made that it was an actuarially sound plan. I do not think the Canada Pension Plan can be looked upon in that way. There is little relationship between the contributions and pensions. There is some relationship between the contribution the person makes and the pension he receives, but anyone can see there is a great benefit for people in a certain age group.

Anyone over 50, certainly, receives outstanding benefits from the Canada Pension Plan, when eligible, compared to a younger person. Our younger people are expected to contribute more to the plan than they could receive. They will have to pay a great deal more than they would have to pay for similar benefits in a private plan. There is a cross-subsidization in the Canada Pension Plan which in fact makes it a social plan rather than a straight plan or an actuarially-based plan.

The plan has been in operation since 1966. If a person were retired who had been paying in during these eight years, he would have paid in something under $800—actually, $779.40. He would begin to draw, in this year, $103 a month. This means that in less than eight months that person would have recovered all the contributions he had made to the plan. That is a pretty good deal for a person who retires at this particular time. It is pretty difficult to argue that this is an actuarially-based plan, because it was obvious from the day it was incorporated that people at certain age levels would receive considerable benefits.

Since it is an income support program in many ways, and since it involves a considerable subsidy from one element of society to another, why should housewives be excluded from the plan? What is the justification for saying it is strictly a work-related plan and, therefore, housewives who are supposed to be outside the regular work force have no claim upon it because they are not working in a factory, in the field, in construction or in some other kind of industrial work? It is just not so. It is obviously a transfer payment.

The other argument is that it makes what I believe is a very serious distinction since it talks about work and refers to work related to industry. It would seem to be suggested that that type of work is fare more valuable in this country than work carried out at home. That is sheer nonsense. All of us recognize that that is not so, and that in fact the contribution of women in respect of raising children and maintaining a household may be far more valuable, in terms of the future of our country, than some obscure job or activity that men or women are now involved in.

There are many inconsistencies to be pointed out. I shall take just a few. Some men work very hard. I think most people in industry work pretty hard. But others have what are called very soft jobs, yet they can contribute and draw a pension because there is no way to evaluate such employment; there is no way of evaluating whether a person is working hard or has a very pleasant or unpleasant occupation. This bill does not, and should not, go into that because it is a very difficult judgment to make.

In some cases, however, we know that people are paid for doing work which is almost like leisure. Some people may put in only a couple of hours a week, yet they are in a position to draw full benefits. On the other hand, all of us are aware of women who on their own may raise a family of one, two or three children, which is a terribly difficult task. Why should such a woman not receive any benefit from the Canada Pension Plan? It seems to me that is a terribly unfair situation.

The Canada Pension Plan is a great improvement over what we had before it. I think most people feel it has worked out quite well. However, there are significant problems in respect of the plan. There are problems of equity and fairness about which I believe we should do something. The things I have said in respect of women apply to low earners and other people outside the labour force. Some men or women may not be in the work force because they are crippled, they may have disabilities which prevent their working, or they may have been ill during the latter part of their lives and therefore have not made contributions to the plan. These people are excluded from the plan. The same principle of unfairness applies in their case as in the case of housewives.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), on behalf of the government, has made a number of statements and has introduced legislation. He recognizes that this kind of anomaly exists. He has made a number of proposals to the House. It seems to me that none of those proposals is very satisfactory. They do not take into account some of the questions about fairness which arise in respect of the Canada Pension Plan. The chief proposal seems to be to take the amount of money that would normally go to the husband, and perhaps in some cases the wife, and split it so that each spouse receives an equal amount. That may satisfy a few technical draftsmen, but it will not change the picture very much, because all that will be done is to take from the husband in order to give to the wife; and that cannot be considered a very satisfactory arrangement.

The truth of the matter is that we really find it difficult to know how to correct these anomalies in the Canada Pension Plan. This leads me to the conclusion that either the government must find a way which will permit housewives and others to make contributions to and receive benefits from the plan on retirement on the same basis as those who are employed, or we may seriously have to consider—and I am certainly prepared to consider it—that the CPP and old age security program be combined into a universal pension at a much higher level. I mentioned that perhaps housewives and others should be subsidized by the government, but even if we have to subsidize some of the others—for instance, if there are poor people in our society who do not have the money to make their own contributions to the CPP—some method should be found to do it on their behalf.

I do not deplore the fact that we broadened the Canada Pension Plan; that may have been the only thing possible at that time. I know that my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), had a number of proposals which were better than the present CPP, but they were not acceptable at that time. There were problems with the provinces in trying to get their agreement on whether we would have a "pay as you go" plan or whether the plan should be funded.

A compromise was reached. Instead of a 20-year funding, we had a 10-year funding, but the "pay as you go" plan did not receive the support of the provincial governments. So it has come to the point where we have to review everything we are doing in the way of providing a pension for our senior citizens. Because if there is one thing that Canadians seem to agree upon, it is that we must look after the people who have spent so much of their lives in building up this country and providing the infrastructure and benefits which we have inherited. The Gallup polls which have been taken show that of all the programs, the one that is most universally admired and accepted, and the one that people are most willing to enlarge, is old age security.

I ask hon. members to consider this and, because of the importance of doing more for those who are retiring, to find a way of letting this private member's bill go to committee so that we can at least examine the serious questions that arise as a result of the present unfairness of the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, marriage is a partnership. When a couple enters into this holy state, they face a life ahead of them in which many decisions must be made. In some of these decisions they have a choice, but in other decisions they have no choice. To illustrate in which decisions they have no choice, let me refer to the decision of who will decide what the sex of the offspring will be. Another example is who will carry the offspring during the gestation period. At least medical science has not changed that yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You should bring in a bill to change that.

Mr. Maine: There are other decisions in which they do have a choice. To illustrate this, there is the decision as to who will earn the income for the family unit. The husband may earn the income, the wife may earn the income, or they can both earn the family income. Another decision which they have the choice to make is who will do the housework. The husband can do it, the wife can do it, both can do it, or neither can do it but instead they can hire help to do it for them. In the latter case they have a real idea of the monetary value of the housework when they pay the wages of the help that does it.

So there is no question that housework has monetary value. The Canada Pension Plan is satisfactory unless that partnership breaks up; then the wife's contribution to the family unit to which her efforts have contributed are not recognized. I believe they should be recognized because there is a real value in these efforts that she has contributed to the family. This is why I support extension of Canada Pension Plan benefits to include housewives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maine: The question is, then: how can one achieve this? There are many options and many alternate ways of approaching this problem. One of the questions one has to consider is whether these contributions should be voluntary, or compulsory. Another question is whether one pension should be obtained, that is, split between husband and wife, or whether there should be two pensions, one for the husband and a separate one for the wife. There are several other questions but these are the two important ones that come to mind. So far as voluntary contributions to the CPP are concerned, the problem with this is that it tends to reward the rich, as they are the ones who can easily afford to make voluntary contributions, whereas the ones who will most likely need these benefits are the poor people who cannot afford extra premiums under the plan.

In actuarial terms, the Canada Pension Plan is not self-supporting, and this is a strong reason for there being just one pension split between husband and wife, because two pensions would tend to double the amount of payments to be made and, therefore, worsen the financial imbalance and aggravate the problems we are facing in this inflationary period when we are trying to restrict government expenditures.

For this reason, it is important that we opt for the one pension plan split between two partners. It seems to me that when a family unit breaks up—which is a real tragedy—at that stage the court has to decide how the estate should be divided. Up to the present, it is my understanding that CPP benefits are not considered part of the estate, and therefore the wife cannot benefit and her efforts are not recognized. I think we should change this. It is my understanding that presently this matter is being considered by the government and that action will be forthcoming in the not too distant future. For this reason, I oppose Bill C-202 in its present form.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, before I say anything on the bill I should like to assure members of the House that the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) is my seatmate, not my house spouse. I congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) on his diligence in time and again calling to the attention of the House, inequities which exist in the Canada Pension Plan. He is to be congratulated for bringing to the attention of the minister and the government the unfair situation which exists for the housewife. Also, I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for the great concern he has shown in the ongoing development of the CPP. However, I am persuaded that both hon. members who have spoken in this debate are involved with the technical details of the implementation, and neither has come forward and recognized the ideological and philosophical truths.

In the past, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge has said that if the housewife could make contributions to the plan or remain in the plan, the husband could pay for her if he were in a position to do so. Surely this is what a loving husband would do, without a plan. The hon. member is requesting that we seal forever in legislation the patronizing attitude which women have experienced through the years. He has also said, "If we cannot adapt the Canada Pension Plan to include housewives, then we must find a way of providing benefits and equity in the old age security benefit." Once again, is not each individual entitled to the old age security benefit? There should be no doubt that the house spouse, man or woman, should enjoy the equity of being entitled to Canada Pension Plan benefits. The minister has admitted that certain provisions within the plan accord different treatment to male and female contributors and beneficiaries. He has further recognized that views have been expressed that housewives who remain at home and do not draw salaries as members of the working force should be enabled to participate in the Canada Pension Plan.

The minister has suggested two approaches: first, crediting to the spouse remaining at home a portion of the contribution of the employed spouse, and those contributions made by the employer on the employed spouse's behalf; second, on an optional basis, permitting the spouse at home to contribute as a self-employed worker. Some hon. members who advocate the participation of housewives in the Canada Pension Plan appear to have two goals in mind: first, to give recognition to work in the home as regular employment; second, to guarantee some measure of independence to the housewife.

I must say I am convinced that hon. members then lose themselves in the technicalities of achieving these two goals. For my part, I would like to operate on the premise that all things are possible if we come to the proper conclusion concerning work and the independence of the housewife or housespouse. Let me address myself to these two matters and leave the legislation to far more competent individuals. Mr. Speaker, our recent rounds with inflation, unemployment, unemployment insurance and welfare, have brought much attention to the work ethic. Many statements have been made concerning the necessity for incentive programs and for the recognition of work, in itself, as a good thing. One such statement is as follows:

To be idle is to become a stranger to the seasons.

To be idle is to step out of life's procession that marches in majesty and proud submission toward the infinite.

Life itself is pointless save when there is an urge.

The urge itself is blind save when there is knowledge.

Knowledge is vain save when there is work.

And all work is empty save when there is love.

And when you work with love you bind yourself to yourself and to one another and to God.

Mr. Speaker, you will notice that I have drawn freely on some of the great thoughts of Kahlil Gibran. It is most important to honour the work in the home, as all work in our day and age should truly draw honour. Work with love is to weave the cloth with threads drawn through the heart. It is building a house with affection. It is to sow seeds with tenderness and reap the harvest with joy. Surely hon. members will agree with me that housework is to charge all things you fashion with a breath of your own spirit. The work of the housewife is easily compared to the work of him who seizes the rainbow to lay it on a cloth in the likeness of man. Work is love made visible. This the housewife has done down through the centuries and we should be proud to recognize this along with the dignified work of the labourer, the executive, the soldier and the maestro.

Mr. Speaker, second I wish to address myself to the independence of the house spouse. I will, however, concentrate on the woman as the partner, because up to now she is the one who has been denied her independence. Marriage is that kind of experience which implies you were born together, and together you shall be forever more. But there should be spaces in togetherness. Again I quote:

And let the winds of the heavens dance between you.

Love one another, but make not a bond of love:

Let it rather be a moving sea between the shores of your souls.

Fill each other's cup but drink not from one cup.

Give one another of your bread but eat not from the same loaf.

Sing and dance together and be joyous, but let each one of you be alone.

Even as the strings of a lute are alone though they quiver with the same music.

Give your hearts, but not into each other's keeping.

For only the hand of life can contain your hearts.

And stand together yet not too near together:

For the pillars of the temple stand apart,

And the oak tree and the cypress grow not in each other's shadow.

I think back to the time when I was a young man and had the opportunity of observing a family which comprised 21 children and the father and mother. Certainly the father went to work, but I wonder what the mother with the 21 children did? Should her occupation not be classified as work? I think it is important to recognize that work in the house, that wealth for which mothers down through the ages have been responsible, is indeed dignified work, just as we have come to recognize that work with the shovel, with the pen, with equipment or even by automation is, indeed, an urge to move forward and to serve in life. So we must accept as a principle that work itself is dignified and that the housewife is, indeed, involved in work.

There is still some confusion, however. We are always unclear whether the woman is not still just part of the family unit or whether she can have the option of going into a pension plan on her own without depending on the husband to pay her contributions. I believe that in most cases a loving husband takes care of his wife, so we are giving him the opportunity to do it in a legal fashion. It still leaves it up to the so-called senior partner, the head of the family, to decide if he will give the money.

Surely those persons who have some idea of technicalities can suggest a better settlement than this. Surely one of the main features of the Canada Pension Plan is its compulsory nature. Surely we should not settle in any way for the optional nature in respect of the woman. Surely we should not in any way try to secrete the money to her through the old age pension. Surely we should be proceeding with all haste to recognize the individual independence of woman, and that this woman is secure with this man and they are both entitled to the Canada Pension Plan, which may one day become a guaranteed income.

Mr. Speaker, let us not only in this House pass legislation concerning pensions. Let us make certain that we make an open statement concerning the dignified role of the housewife in our society. Let us make certain that, while recognizing the wonder and value of the family, we recognize the individual rights of its members, the participation and single desires of the husband, the individual rights of each child and the independence of woman to achieve her own destiny.

I am firmly convinced that in presenting legislation that touches on the status of women we must not continue to refer to women in a patronizing way, but as beings who deserve in every way equality with the breadwinner. To presume that men and women should always drink from the same cup, that they will always be united, is to presume that one or the other has lost his individuality. I believe in the perfect union where each should respect the other. Therefore we can refer to the term house-spouse. If, in future, the male decides to stay home and do housework, that term should apply to him. We must not lose sight of what we want to do.

In the past, the woman stayed home while the man went off and did what he had to do. The woman stayed home during wars; she stayed home and cared for 21 children while the man went to war, or the older brother went to war, or the older married son left his new wife and went off to fight. If we consider the task of woman to be work, let us dignify it. Let us pay her the respect we pay those who sent men to the moon; let us respect her in the way we respected those who, in generations of fear and oppression, defended nations. Let us respect her as we respect those who create paintings and music. Let us recognize that woman has prepared the supper with loving care, and performed with love those tasks which are necessary in the home, while others were away doing what they considered more important.

The minister, and the hon. member who presented this bill, have both shown great concern over improvements to be made to the Canada Pension Plan. I respectfully suggest that before we pass a measure of this kind, which is well deserved, we must respect work in the home as work itself; we must respect the dignity and independence of woman.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my comments will deal with the comments of the two hon. members who have spoken, and with the voluntary aspect of the legislation in question. It has been suggested that for purposes of contributions the work of the housewife should not be considered as voluntary work but as regular employment.

For too long we have looked at the woman as the person who stays home and does housework and, at the end of the day, greets her husband and performs her wifely duties. It is time we considered providing some measure of financial security for the woman. I am thinking of women who may be deserted by their husbands, who may be separated from their husbands, or who may be divorced and are unable to obtain support from their ex-spouses.

The idea of bringing housewives under the umbrella of the pension plan was mentioned in Edmonton at the health ministers' conference last February. Since then this idea has become one of top priority. The matter is also under study by a subcommittee of the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee. Consultations between such bodies and those to do with the status of women have received a great deal of press coverage. We anticipate that reports will be forthcoming in the near future.

May I now talk about the hon. member's bill. As the hon. member knows, before a proposal like this can become law it must obtain the consent of two-thirds of the provinces containing two-thirds of the population. Therefore, the need for full consultation with the provinces before such a proposal can become law is clear. In addition, this subject is currently part of the total social security review being carried out by federal and provincial welfare ministers.

Another important consideration is the desirability of maintaining as much similarity as possible between the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan. For that reason I suggest that the implications of the present proposal should be discussed fully with representatives of Quebec who are also participating in the social review program.

Let me draw attention to another part of the hon. member's proposal. If a housewife's computed earnings are to be determined at her option, it surely follows that other contributors and non-contributors will demand the same right. Clearly, this implication of the hon. member's proposal would jeopardize the earnings related principle of the plan. For instance, if a housewife were allowed the right to determine earnings, there would be considerable pressure to allow the sole breadwinner the choice of increasing coverage from actual earnings to maximum earnings.

Another proposal concerns housewives being covered on a voluntary basis at the self-employed contribution rate. Presumably, coverage would be optional rather than compulsory, so as to avoid placing a burden on low income families. However, voluntary coverage, as proposed, would permit our more affluent families to contribute under the most advantageous circumstances. In other words, the poor would not benefit and the rich, as they say, would get richer.

I think the bill defines to a certain extent the person who can be considered as a housewife, but does not say if coverage is to be extended to those involved in common law relationships, to house husbands, widows, and so on. Neither does it touch on the coverage of other deserving persons not attached to the labour force, such as students, non-working single women and the long-term unemployed.

The bill speaks of being occupied entirely as a housewife. Is it the intention to exclude any housewife who may earn a few dollars at some part-time activity? Some definition of parameters appears to be required in this bill. In other words you might have a housewife, who goes out and earns a nominal amount, being excluded from contributing as a housewife.

The whole bill seems to discriminate against an area of people who would like to be in the enviable position of being able to contribute to the maximum earnings without any set guidelines. The government, particularly the Department of National Health and Welfare, has been studying this whole area of trying to help the housewife.

The housewife has always been in a position in which she could not defend herself. She has not had access to legal facilities in the past. She has been doomed to the idea of going after welfare agencies for support, or of going after the stray husband. This has incurred an awful lot of difficulty, particularly where the woman could not receive any benefit until a certain period of time had elapsed.

The government has now come around in its thinking and some of the policies put forward in the working document which was presented by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to the standing committee on April 4, 1974, produced mandatory alternatives. These alternatives included the contribution on earnings. This would allow a housewife to contribute in her own right and build up her own pension entitlement. However, it would be necessary to set a wage on what housewife duties are worth in terms of the family unit from which she comes. This approach would certainly give recognition to work in the home as regular employment. However, some standard would have to be obtained to make it non-voluntary in terms of any amount being contributed versus a set standard if this plan were to be used.

The other alternative is the splitting of pension credits, an approach set out by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. As the royal commission put it, this would involve crediting to the spouse remaining in the home a portion of the contributions of the employed spouse and of those contributions made by the employer on behalf of the employed spouse. This seems to be a fair way in terms of splitting the income of the earning spouse across the board in the event of a separation. In other words an agency could immediately go against the spouse and determine the amount the wife might have contributed at a designated point in time.

To explain it more clearly, the spouse would probably be entitled to a percentage of the earning spouses contributions at the time of the split. This means that if the husband decides to go, some agency will be able to go against his contributions and convert that to the benefit of the housewife.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) is to be complimented on bringing forward this bill. However, the voluntary aspect is a handicap. It allows putting something into a pension plan on the part of a housewife that discriminates against her sex and others in the working world who would like to contribute on maximum earnings rather than the graded step.

To summarize, the government's position has already been stated. The government is studying the whole idea of pensions in relation to housewives. This became a priority at a meeting in Edmonton of the ministers of all provinces and the federal minister. It is being studied closely by the respective provinces as well as the federal government. Hopefully at some point in the future some type of legislation will be brought forward as a result of these studies.

As a result of that conference this whole issue was referred to the Status of Women Advisory Council as well as the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Council. They are studying the most advisable way of implementing a pension. Reports are anticipated, and implementation of the plan should be forthcoming.

I again thank the hon. member for his bill. However, I must oppose it on behalf of the government on the basis of the voluntariness of the plan. In one sense it is a very limited version of voluntariness. Also, the definition of housewife does not make it clear who would be included in this scheme. Someone could be excluded by working on a part-time basis. Even though she may not contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, she could be excluded under this bill. The voluntariness of the plan seems to discriminate against a lower income person whose husband cannot afford to give the benefit to the housewife to put into the plan. On the other side of the coin, there are those whose husbands earn sufficient to contribute to the maximum amount.

I am not trying to say that I am against the implementation of a pension for housewives. It is the position of the government that the work women do in the home will be recognized as regular employment and that they should be provided with protection against need. However, as I have said, the government is against this bill particularly on two points, the definition of "housewife" and of "volunteering" as put forward by the hon. member.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The fact that this debate is taking place today underlines how fast history moves. If any government were trying to bring in a bill today which left out of account, as the Canada Pension Plan does, the position of women in general, and particularly the position of housewives, it would have a rough ride. Yet only nine and one half years ago we debated and passed in this chamber the Canada Pension Plan with these deficiencies. A lot has changed in the last nine and a half years, and I pay tribute to those who have pressed the case of the rights of women to an equal place in our society.

[Miss Campbell (South Western Nova).]

I am glad this bill has been introduced. It is easy for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Campbell) to call attention to the difficulties, but the issue will not go away and I do not think it would hurt the government to consent to the bill, or at least its subject matter, going to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs so that we could consider this whole question. It does seem to me that, in many respects, the position of women in relation to pensions has to be reviewed and updated.

As I say every time I get to my feet, I think it is for the birds that pension plans generally provide 100 per cent benefits to a man and provide for them to be continued at 100 per cent if he loses his wife and carries on, but provide only 50 per cent to the widow if the husband dies first. Likewise under the Canada Pension Plan there is a built in discrimination against the spouse, whether male or female. There is certainly a built in discrimination against housewives and I think this ought to be corrected.

This is private members' hour and one of the ten commandments for opposition members is never to be guilty of talking a bill out during private members' hour. So I will have to sit down soon. However, I do wish to express my congratulations to my hon. friend from Waterloo-Cambridge who has brought this issue forward today. I am not surprised that it is likely to be talked out, but I welcome the support from the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), and from the parliamentary secretary for the idea that we should be coping with this problem. I just hope we cope with it soon.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure during the remaining few minutes of this debate to make a brief comment on the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). I listened to his presentation and wish to be on record as being in agreement with most of what he had to say. It seemed to me, though, that the viewpoint he was putting forward was not broad enough—that amendments to the act should take into account other matters which are of equal importance.

I should like to express a special interest with regart to the position of women who are part of the management team on farms. These women have made a great contribution to the agriculture industry. For a while the trend in agriculture was toward large, integrated farms. Some may be surprised to learn that more of these farms went bankrupt on a percentage basis than any other type. It seems to be that the future of agriculture must be based on family management units, and when one thinks about family management units it is evident that a great deal of the input comes from farm wives.

I am talking now about viable farm units, units which are eminently successful, and to the operation of which the farm wife makes a major contribution as purchasing agent, registrar of pedigrees, and so on. If these groups are dissolved for any reason, the woman is at a great disadvantage; unless legal arrangements have been carefully made in advance she is likely to be left with little security and no recognition of the major contribution she has made. The same might be said of wives who help in the operation of small businesses.

We are not opposed to the position taken by the sponsor of this bill but, in our view, his proposals do not extend far enough. I should like to be recorded as saying that any person should have the right to contribute to a voluntary pension plan, whether a housewife, an injured workman, or a person who has had to withdraw from the work force for any reason. Finally, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for bringing his private member's bill before the House so that we might have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to say a few words on Bill C-202. I agree with it wholeheartedly. I also agree with my hon. friend who has just spoken that it does not go far enough. All women should be included. There are some women who cannot afford premiums such as those on welfare, etc.—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE BORROWING POWER OF COMPANIES AND AUTHORIZE ISSUANCE OF SUBORDINATED NOTES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill S-7, to authorize federal trust companies and loan companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power and to issue subordinate notes, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, before five o'clock this afternoon I was saying that if Gilbert and Sullivan were to write an operetta on this Senate bill it would probably be entitled "The Pirates of Finance". The first thing that struck me about it was that it seemed very à propos that this bill should originate in the other place. The Tory member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) referred to the bill as a very technical bill. That may be because it was conceived and drafted by Senators who certainly know what is best for Canada's 31 federally incorporated trust and loan companies, whose total assets of $7 billion bespeak their poverty.

When this bill is shorn of its technicalities we find that it is a gross attempt to increase the profitability of these 31 trust and loan companies. It must galling to these poverty stricken financial institutions to see today's juicy interest rates, which could certainly swell most of their funds, and to know that they are committed to lower interest rates of 9 to 10 per cent.

Let me quote a few of the comments made by Mr. D. G. Neelands, president of the Trust Companies Association of Canada and of Canada Permanent Trust. Before I do so, it has always struck me that the names these companies choose to identify themselves are rather strange. For example, they use words like "Trust", "Acceptance", "Beneficial", "Household", "Associates", "Permanent" and "Guaranty", all words that bespeak the solidity of the community. This is what Mr. Neelands had to say before the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee:

> The trust industry . . . is experiencing some difficulties at the present time in terms of earnings.

One of the venerable Senators, Senator Hayden, put it more bluntly when he said:

> I suppose, then, in another sense, you might put it this way, that the ability to expand would provide you with sources of money, so that you can get the benefit of the high interest rates that are currently in effect to offset some of the low ones that you are stuck with.

And of course, Mr. Neelands replied:

> That is true . . .

Having made clear how he viewed the bill, Mr. Neelands goes on to suggest that if this bill wins Canadian acceptance there might be some permanent, beneficial guarantee that citizens would be able to purchase their households from the trust companies and their associates. This, of course, is to ignore the major problem in housing in Canada, which is the cost of mortgage money.

The fact of the matter is that the great majority of middle and low income Canadians cannot afford the usurious mortgage interest rates of these big-hearted companies. My party's policy is that housing is a social right for every Canadian who wants to own a home. Our people should not have to depend on these companies to provide mortgage funds, because it has been proven time and again that they do not recognize the social priorities of the Canadian community.

I note that the latest quarterly and half yearly figures of most trust companies show profit levels that are tending downwards. What a pity! It is an observation that ought not to be lost on the Canadian consumer that this government is very quick to step in when profits tend downwards. But when profits tend upwards, as in the case of the food processors and retailers, the government takes the hands off position that the marketplace ought to determine its own rate of rip-off. Heavens, cannot we have some consistency from the government? Indeed, the only thing consistent about the government is its inconsistency.

Mr. Nystrom: That is free enterprise, John.

Mr. Rodriguez: I suppose they call it free enterprise but there is nothing free and nothing enterprising about it, at least not for the working class people of the country. It is only free and enterprising for the Neelandses and, I suppose, the Senator Haydens of this world who always seem to find a place in the other place.

I do not want to prolong this debate, so I suggest that the best thing to do with this bill is to defeat it right here in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Moncton.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Rodriguez: En français!

[Translation]

An hon. Member: In French.

Mr. Jones: I do not speak French, what about you? I do not speak French.

[English]

Madam Speaker, there appears to be something odd and perhaps sinister about the manner and conduct of the debate on this bill. Quite frankly, it has been difficult for even the most astute technical financier to study and scrutinize any portion of the enormous verbosity and complexity of this bill. Its ramifications are tremendous and I sincerely fear that haste, in both perusal of the bill and a full and proper presentation of it, will sooner or later be regretted by those who have introduced it into this House.

There is a maxim in journalism and law which says: "When in doubt, leave it out". Possibly those who drafted this blooming legislation realized that it was not really blooming, and that they were following this maxim of when in doubt, leave it out. Perhaps we should do the same thing and throw the bill out this evening, because so much, Madam Speaker, is left hanging in mid-air. We are given no clues, and possibly those who drafted the bill had very few clues too.

So much of what should have been in the bill has been left out that the bill is made ineffective and meaningless. It is a terrible commentary on drafting. This legislation is a poor commentary on our parliamentary system. Those who presented Bill S-7, entitled "an act to authorize federal trust companies and loan companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power and to issue subordinated notes," must have thought differently. They must have thought that the members of this House were very naive, to say the least.

First of all the title is misleading; it is deceiving; it is a misnomer. The explanatory notes and information given us by those presenting the bill are negligible. They are nil. It seems rather ridiculous for us to discuss any such legislation without having complete disclosure. In business circles one hears the expression "let us have disclosure". There is no disclosure in respect of this legislation.

The next item which concerns me, which must concern all other members, and which will disturb certainly decent thinking members of this House and the public when they hear of legislation of this kind, is the ministerial discretion that is given to some member of the cabinet. I thought that went out with Magna Carta when King John was taken to Runnymede. Certainly this bill will result in arbitrary, bureaucratic dictatorship for the minister, the trust companies and the loan companies.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

This bill is a perfect example of the uselessness of the Senate and the duplication of cost to our country. It will lead to inflation. It is unreal. It will lead us into a worse economic situation than we have today. It is inflationary. Interest rates certainly are high enough, but if a bill of this kind should be enacted they will go even higher. I said earlier that the bill is a misnomer. Obviously this bill has been thrown together without any realization of its results and effects. My prediction is that it will create inflationary trends never seen before in Canada.

If this House should pass this bill, or even refer it to committee, that would be an absolute waste of time. There are other more important things which might be considered. There are many items in this bill that will lead citizens and shareholders alike to be misled in respect of subordinated notes. This is nothing more than a cheap way for loan and trust companies to obtain money from the citizens of this country without exercising a real responsibility toward them. There is no real protection provided for holders of these notes.

Again I urge that this bill not be sent to the committee but be voted out right now. It is a monstrosity.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, as the hon. members for Nickel Belt and Moncton (Messrs. Rodriguez and Jones) have just explained, Bill S-7 is rather confusing. First of all, it was brought before this House after being passed by the Senate without our having had a chance to read it. We are being asked to pass a bill, and I quote:

—to authorize federal trust companies and loan companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power—

—in order that they might loan and reloan at exorbitant interest rates, as we have quite often noticed in the field of finance.

To my mind, confusion reigns supreme in this country where financial and monetary matters are concerned: one day, plans are made to set up a federal development bank; the next, for another financial organization to confuse or annoy the people. Bill S-7 is yet another one, the purpose of which is to allow the trust and loan companies to borrow, and specially to increase their borrowing power.

To my mind, we are going around in circles; we are not improving the situation; on the contrary, there is more misunderstanding than ever about our present financial system.

Madam Speaker, we, of the Social Credit Party of Canada, have advocated for a long time a financial formula which some would call simplistic. I would rather have that than confusion such as is proposed by Bill S-7. I can understand that some hon. members oppose it, for instance, the hon. member for Moncton. He was not too clear about it when he said: We must oppose this bill. Why? No one knows. Still, the hon. members of the NDP applauded despite the fact that they did not know what it was all about.

However, the House studies the secondary aspects of the real problem, the secondary aspects of what must be changed in our economic system. And it is not by increasing the borrowing power of a loan company that we shall improve the situation. There are easier ways to do so.

As concerns Bill S-7, it is obvious that we oppose it and that we shall ask that it be put to a vote. The government has the majority, and this is the trouble with a majority government in Canada, Parliament is forced to accept its ideas while members of parliament should have all opportunities required to defeat the government on important matters, on monetary and economic matters, because all this is related to the Canadian economic system.

Madam Speaker, the Social Crediters have other solutions to suggest. Instead of increasing the borrowing power of federal trust and loan companies, we should use the services of the Bank of Canada, which belongs to Canada and to Canadian citizens, and harness the physical possibilities of our country. It is up to the government to pass regulations and to order the Bank of Canada to act in the interests of the Canadian people, and not in order to increase the borrowing power of federal trust companies or loan companies.

Instead of laughing at the duties and obligations of the Bank of Canada, all hon. members should force it to maintain an efficient instead of a restrictive economy, a logical instead of a shaky economy like the one we have presently. If we examined seriously the problem instead of creating new financial institutions and trust companies with increased powers, if we increased the powers of the Bank of Canada in order to serve the Canadian people, it seems to me it would be the end of the economic, political and social games we are witnessing at this time.

As everybody knows, there is a feeling of discomfort in all areas of economic activity. Let us correct the cause of this discomfort. I am sure it is possible to guarantee the Canadian people, without the help of any other country, economic security and personal freedom, and to ensure that Canadian production will first serve Canadians contributing to it.

● (2020)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I must remind hon. members that when the parliamentary secretary speaks he will close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I too am anxious to get to the question. However, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and others have raised some issues which I think need comment.

Frankly, I wondered if the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) had read the bill. He seemed to indicate that subordinate notes will be issued and companies will be going out and taking money from every Tom, Dick and Harry. I should like to draw his attention to a clause of the bill which provides that subordinate notes shall be issued only on the application of the head office of companies, and shall have denominations of $25,000 or more. So it is not similar to promissory notes, it is a fairly significant sum, and I suggest, with respect, that any company that is in a position to lend that kind of money is pretty sophisticated.

The hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) said that this was a complicated bill. I am not surprised he thought that because he did not deal with the bill but rather with many other issues.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The purpose of this bill is to increase the monetary limit of the borrowing power. Some hon. members indicated that they did not have enough information on this. I suggest that this is almost housekeeping legislation insofar as increasing the borrowing power is concerned, and that four safeguards are proposed which will be discussed at the committee stage.

I suggest to some individuals who do not feel they have all the information they want, that we spend hundreds of thousands of dollars each year so the opposition parties can have the necessary research facilities and research assistance. Obviously the New Democratic Party made use of this, and that is the way to use the research money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Now, why is this bill being presented at this time? Frankly, it is because of the strength of the economy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: —that most of these companies have reached the level of borrowing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: I thought hon. members wanted some of the responses that I am endeavouring to give. I listened patiently without heckling.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I can understand the selective reading by the NDP. After all, they have a particular position to maintain. It happens to be wrong, but still, selective reading of witnesses' comments made before committees is not unusual, and I accept it as part of the political cut and thrust in debate. The bill simply proposes an increase in the monetary limit of the borrowing power and the issuance of subordinated notes. There is nothing very complicated about the bill except where hon. members insist on injecting into its narrow confines the matter of interest rates and things of that nature.

One of the questions asked was whether there is consultation between the provincial companies and the director of insurance operating in this field. Definitely there is consultation, and quite often a lead is taken from the federal legislation and adopted by the province. I suspect that the reverse is also true. There is provision in the act for administering some of these provincial companies by the director of insurance, so there is excellent liaison in that way.

I sometimes wonder to which member of the official opposition I should listen. One member spoke of the lack of control by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who, so to speak, did not keep his hand on the tiller insofar as dealing with these companies is concerned. Others from the same party decried the supervision and the discretionary powers given to the minister.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) speaking about the little people he represents. I suggest to him that the little people in his riding and in mine are using these particular facilities in order to finance their houses.

An hon. Member: Yes, at 13 per cent.

Mr. Cullen: There was one other comment by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who said this was a band aid approach. No one suggests that this is the be all and end all. This bill endeavours to do things which are very clear, and which are innocuous insofar as the over-all picture is concerned. However, they are very necessary if this segment of the economy is to operate.

I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West and I think that the point he made is an excellent one. I frankly apologize for the fact that we did not have all of the material from the Senate committee because, notwithstanding what some members of the NDP think, there is a wealth of information and assistance available there.

An hon. Member: It is a waste of money.

Mr. Cullen: However, with other bills from the Senate we will have that information.

Insofar as conflict with the Finance Committee is concerned, I might say that this comment would have been warranted if the House had not spent so much time on Bill C-2 last night and got that bill into committee. It was our hope that this Bill S-7 could have been dealt with last night, would have received second reading and been referred to the committee. I am sorry about that, but it was not of the government's making.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question? All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)), which was agreed to on the following division:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR PAYMENTS FOR WHEAT PRODUCED AND SOLD IN CANADA FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): moved that Bill C-19, to provide for payments in respect of wheat produced and sold in Canada for human consumption in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this fairly straightforward bill is yet a somewhat significant one. I take pleasure in introducing it and recommending that it be sent to the Standing Committee on Agriculture where it can be examined further before proceeding into law.

This is a bill whose specific purpose is to enshrine for a period of years, in this case for seven years, a procedure whereby the treasury supplements payments made for wheat designed for human consumption in Canada. The government acted in order to place a portion of the cost of milling wheat essentially on the shoulders of the treasury, thereby minimizing the impact of increases in the price of wheat which were occurring, and ensuring that the price of bread, a product essential to the diets of families, particularly those with lower incomes, would be lower than would otherwise be the case.

The bill allows for the transfer from the treasury of up to $1.75 per bushel, with respect to wheat consumed in Canada, to the producers of the wheat—to the Wheat Board in the designated region, to boards designated in other regions to act on behalf of producers, or to producers themselves in other areas. The amount transferred is the amount they would otherwise normally have obtained from the millers.

Initially, the bill in the form in which it was introduced in the previous session would have performed this function for the full period of the arrangement which was entered into in September of 1973, in order to assure the transfer of the appropriate amount of money to the producers for the first part of the period. Before the passage of the bill an item in the estimates dealt with the first series of such payments, but the intention of the bill is to provide these payments for a long period of time.

I think it is significant that this payment in support of the price of bread is to be put into law for a prolonged period of time. It is in its present form without any doubt and, I should think without any argument, in the nature of a consumer subsidy, an amount paid by the treasury, on behalf of the people of Canada as taxpayers, to lighten the burden on the consumer of the cost of wheat products in Canada. It is in this way a significant milestone in technique, one which should be applauded by members on all sides of the House.

The bill also has a relationship to other factors in connection with wheat prices. The very title of the bill, two-price wheat, has had a fairly long history of debate in the producing areas of Canada, particularly in the prairie region where so much of our wheat is grown. There, when two-price wheat began to be talked about, it was in terms of the obligation and necessity of Canadian consumers paying a fair price for their wheat in Canada in order that producers receive a somewhat better return, even when the world price for wheat was lower than a figure that was reasonable in those days. The introduction of such a plan of higher prices for wheat was brought about in Canada initially, therefore, as a transfer from consumer to producers above that which the international market would bring them.

The first action in this regard was taken by this government in 1969, when the interruption in the arrangement made under the International Wheat Agreement meant that the world price began to fall below the floor that had been agreed upon. When that happened the government acted to hold the price in Canada at the figure of $1.95½, as it then was, which was the equivalent of the floor in the international agreement. This price persisted, and was held throughout a period of very difficult years when the world price fluctuated but generally fell to levels in the order of $1.70 a bushel. Throughout that period two-price wheat was a benefit transferred from the consumer to the producer, but one which was fully legitimate, in my view and in the view of the government, due to the costs of production. Indeed, if it had been within our power we would have had such a price throughout the world market area rather than just in Canada alone.

Then in response to the suggestion that this was still inadequate, that further protection should be given the producer in connection with wheat consumed in Canada, and that further compensation could and should be given him, in 1972 we introduced a two-price wheat payment to farmers in addition to the $1.95½ that was being obtained by him from the market, a figure that was above the international price.

At that time, with the price still hovering in the area of $1.70 and with the price to millers at $1.95½, we determined, in response to further requests from producer organizations, that a two-price wheat program should be brought in which, in effect, valued wheat consumed in Canada at $3 a bushel. Even at that time we showed our concern about the problem of imposing that additional cost on the actual consumers of bread, recognizing that so many of them were in the least suited position to pay, and that some of them would indeed require a helping hand rather than be given a further burden.

Accordingly in introducing the two-price wheat program we introduced it in the form of a payment from the treasury, rather than an increased charge from the millers. At that point we were in a situation where we effectively had a fixed price for wheat in Canada regardless of the world price. The $1.95½ would come from the millers and another $1.04½ would bring the amount up to $3; but we were effectively valuing wheat in Canada used for human consumption at a fixed price of $3 regardless of where the international price might be then.

With the changes in pricing patterns which occurred in 1973 and 1974, as international prices rose to the $3 level and then, indeed, passed that level, it became apparent that a review of the $3 price of wheat used for domestic consumption was appropriate. I suppose one could have taken the position that that having been the price which was set while the world price was as low as $1.70, it should have been maintained in a period after that while the world price rose above that price. However, we recognized that the producers had been in a difficult position, and that they were still in a difficult position in terms of their costs and their returns, and we accordingly felt that a different pricing structure was appropriate.

At that time, with prices approaching what were then record levels, levels which are still to this day pretty well close to a record, we decided that we should look at the proposition that as between the Canadian Wheat Board on the one hand, and other producers of wheat in Canada, and the consumers of Canada as represented by the buyers, millers and other users, we should enter into an arrangement whereby there would be a range of prices for grain, for wheat used for human consumption, a range which reflected more adequately than anything before that the cost of production to producers.

Thus we decided that for seven years we would have a price of wheat in Canada for millers which would not be allowed to fall below $3.25, twenty-five cents higher than the previous fixed price, and correspondingly would not be permitted to rise above the level of $5. We recognized that with that arrangement there would possibly be transfers from producers to consumers compared with the world market when the price of wheat was above that $5 figure. On the other hand there would be potential transfers from the consumer to the producer in a period when the price of wheat was below $3.25.

It seemed to us that it was an appropriate time to enter into such an arrangement. From the producers' point of view it was a time when it was reasonable to look at long-term pricing in a way that would have been far less advantageous earlier. When prices are low it is very hard to persuade buyers to enter into agreements which include price ranges that are very high. At the time we entered into this arrangement we had prices that had just hit a record level, a level which, as I have pointed out, is today still a record. For only very brief periods has the price of wheat crossed the level which we had at the time this arrangement was entered into, Mr. Speaker.

What we were doing was saying that this kind of arrangement is one that we would like to enter into with some of our regular customers, a long-term arrangement whereby a reasonable range of prices for grain was fixed, a range that recognized cost of production of this grain on the part of the producer. Having set the range at $3.25 to $5 for a seven year period, we continued the philosophy that had gone into the original payment from the treasury for two-price wheat, namely, that the portion above $3.25 should be borne by the treasury rather than be reflected in an increase in the price of bread.

At that time as we made our move we were able, in effect, to stop the price of bread moving on the basis of increases in the price of wheat. The price of wheat was just moving through the floor level in terms of the millers' business when we entered into this arrangement. We therefore decided to put forward the proposition that while wheat, in terms of bread wheat other than Durum, was above $3.25, the portion higher than that up to $5 should be paid for from the treasury.

In the case of Durum, while the arrangement was just a little different, the basic principle was the same with a payment up to $1.75 from the treasury, although there the actual price in play went higher and this was also reflected in the amount allowed to be obtained from the millers. In our view the price for Durum was unnaturally separated from the price for other wheats, and there is a common long-term floor of $3.25 which was adopted for both.

This then is a measure which will see the transfer to producers from the treasury, for the period of the full seven years originally intended of amounts of money which will save the consumer significant amounts in the cost of his bread.

Figures can perhaps be a little misleading in talking about the price of bread because this depends upon markups and the arrangements that different people in the producing and marketing chain have, but I think one can safely say that this particular measure, with world prices at or above the $5 level, is saving in the cost of flour for bread in the order of five cents or six cents a standard loaf. To that extent it continues to be perhaps a small but significant element in our effort to cushion the problem of the cost rise for those who have to bear the load.

I, therefore, commend this measure to hon. members and invite them to pass it to the committee where we can look at it more specifically. Then we can see the bill become a part of the law of the land. As I said at the beginning, I believe it is a simple and straightforward measure.

I think this is a significant measure in the way of enshrining into our law a consumer subsidy for a significant period of time. I commend the measure to all hon. members and urge its passage on second reading for later study in the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say that we on this side of the House agree with the principle of a two-price system. We regret, however, the fact that this bill lacks an effective measure to take into consideration the increased costs of production. Therefore we would recommend to the minister the implementation of such a provision to reflect the rising costs of production over the seven-year period.

The absence of such a mechanism is tantamount to a seven-year freeze for the Canadian wheat farmer in the range between $3.25 and $5 a bushel, depending upon world markets, in the case of wheat, and $5.75 to $7.50 in the case of Durum. So, it seems to me that at this point in time, during this period of very rampant increases in the costs of production, and during a period of very rampant inflation, more effective measures should be instituted in the pricing structure to take into consideration the increases in production costs. I do not believe that the range referred to by the minister truly reflects or takes into consideration such increases in the costs of production because that range would be utilized depending only upon the price in world markets.

The minister has suggested that this measure constitutes a subsidy to the consumer at the expense of the public treasury. The minister may have referred to this and I may have missed it, but I would suggest that it also constitutes a subsidy at the expense of the producer, because we know that at this time the export price for milling wheat hovers in the $6 range while producers are receiving $5 per bushel for wheat earmarked for domestic human consumption.

It seems to me we really are asking too much of the wheat producer in respect of this bill. We are asking him to accept the vagaries of the international market place. This is something which, in the absence of any long-term international wheat agreement, the producers must bear the brunt of Mr. Speaker. Now we are asking the wheat producers to absorb the inflationary effects of a government which has no anti-inflation policy to speak of and I do not believe it is right to ask producers to accept the increase in farm input costs over which this government has exercised absolutely no control, and in respect of which it has shown no leadership.

The increase in input costs, has been averaging about 20 per cent on an annual basis. The producers have had to bear the brunt of this while the government played the role of Santa Claus with the unions. It is certainly a lot to expect the wheat producers to accept this as well as the uncertainty which surrounds the transportation system and the threat of the loss of the Crowsnest Pass freight rates. They are also being asked to absorb the huge demurrage costs which have accumulated. It seems to me that to ask them to do all these things is really asking too much from the wheat producers of Canada.

If we are dealing with a legislative measure which is supposed to give some protection and some stability to the wheat producers of the country, certainly now is the opportune time to build into the legislative mechanism some protective features which would offset the spiralling costs which face the western wheat producers.

We know, for example, that the two-price system which has been in effect for some time now has already cost the producers something in the order of $15 million. That represents the difference in the amount the producers could have received had the wheat been sold on the export market rather than being used for domestic consumption. As I said before, in the international market the export price for milling wheat is in the $6 per bushel range, while wheat which will be earmarked for domestic human consumption will be frozen at a maximum of $5 a bushel.

Canadians consume for human consumption something in the order of 60 million bushels of wheat per year. The difference of $1 per bushel between the export price and the domestic human consumption price will mean that, over the period of the next 12 months, the producers in western Canada in effect will be losing something in the order of $60 million. So, having regard to the fact that wheat producers are indeed giving up very much under this bill, it seems to me it would not be asking too much that the minister and the government build in an effective indexing system which would reflect the increases in the costs of production on a year basis.

I am not sure whether the minister feels that prices on the international market will maintain their high level or will go down. Nevertheless, it seems to me that if we do not bring forward some measure in this area, the producers in this country, having regard to the fact that prices on the international market may go down, could find that a bushel of wheat will be back to $3.25. It seems to me also—and I want to remind the minister again—that it is because of the absence of an effective cost of production control that we opposed quite vigorously the stabilization bill. I am sure that if the minister again introduces a grain stabilization bill in the House it would be in his best interest to propose some sort of mechanism to deal with the increases in the costs of production.

The United States, in its stabilization agricultural programs, has incorporated an indexing provision related to the costs of production, to ensure the wellbeing of farmers. This is also another reason why we should be going in that direction. Indexing has become a fact of life in Canada with this government, just as inflation is a fact of life. However, the government continues to say that it cannot do much about inflation because it is an international phenomenon. But really what we are doing here is, in effect, fighting inflation on the backs of the farmers by not providing an effective mechanism which would cushion the effects of inflation upon them.

I must say again, as I said at the outset of my remarks, that the price of wheat for domestic human consumption is in effect being frozen. It is rather interesting that we have two vital commodities in western Canada being frozen, namely, wheat and oil—both products of the west—and yet the minister, whose interest in western Canada is known, and in spite of the fact that the government is not prone to accept the concept of price freezes, allows the price of both these important commodities produced by western Canada to be frozen for the benefit of the consumers in the whole of Canada.

It is also very disturbing to me to note that the minister suggests that he will examine the Crowsnest freight rates which for years have been the Magna Carta to western grain producers. In this respect we get conflicting comments from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang). I hope that the minister will outline the form that the review of these rates will take, and that he will outline the policy upon which the government has embarked with regard to grain handling and transportation.

I also hope that very soon the promise of an equalized freight rate structure—a promise which was made to western agricultural ministers a year or so ago—according to which we would get better freight rates on the movement of beef from western to central Canada, will be kept. We certainly hope that the government will act more quickly than it has in the last twelve months with regard to the removal of the various freight rate anomalies and inequities which have existed in the country for the last 18 months, and which have been the subject of debate in the House.

I think that this bill could be improved if the minister would accept the amendments which I have outlined. If that were done, I think the bill would be a very good bill for western Canadian wheat producers as it would give some stability to the domestic grain trade. As it stands in its present form I do not believe this legislation gives the western wheat producer a fair deal.

There is something else that I would like to say in connection with wheat. It seems to me that the initial price is far too low in terms of current prices on the international market, as well as in terms of the domestic market. I urge the minister to undertake an adjustment immediately.

I just had a call from a producer in Vermilion who told me that he was getting $1.80 per bushel for wheat which he was selling to an elevator through the Canadian Wheat Board. He could sell the wheat as feed for $2.80, although it is not feed wheat. Many producers are uncertain as to what route they should take, and they are looking for guidance.

Surely, with the prices in the $5 to $6 range, it seems to me only reasonable to request that an upward adjustment be made quickly because now is the time when producers need money to pay their farm expenses, to settle their debts, and to prepare for a long, but I hope, not cold winter.

I should like to conclude by saying that I hope the minister will seriously consider the comments that I have made, and will decide to help the western wheat producers at a time when it is urgent to do so, because I fear that the wheat that has been harvested this year is of a much lower grade than usual and, as a result, will bring in lower prices which will have a detrimental effect on the gross and net incomes of the producers.

Many grain producers and small livestock producers find themselves in a difficult situation. An adjustment of the initial price, as well as some assurance of a stable wheat market, at least on the domestic scene, would certainly provide the kind of climate that is conducive to a strong and healthy agriculture.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-19 before us this evening is almost identical to Bill C-33 which died in the last parliament. The only difference between them is the date at which they come into force. Bill C-33, with which we would have dealt in the last parliament, would have come into force several months earlier, but last Friday parliament voted, in supplementary estimates, the money for the previous several months, with which we will not deal so far as this bill is concerned.

The bill before us today basically does two or three things. It establishes the floor price for the next seven years for wheat and Durum. The floor price is a guarantee of what the farmers, no matter what happens to the international price of wheat, will receive for wheat that is sold domestically. I think it is a step that all members of the House support in principle, and it is one that our party has advocated for many years. Before I entered politics I remember hearing a spokesman for our party call for a two-price system and price guarantees. Members of the cabinet at that time dismissed it as socialistic nonsense, something that was completely impractical. One of the chief detractors was, as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) says, a Saskatchewan Senator. Now this Utopian nonsense is becoming law. Perhaps the pressures of the last parliament forced the government to wake up to the needs of the western farmer.

The subsidy provided in the bill is $1.75. That means that if the price for international grain is $3.25, with the subsidy the farmer will receive $5 a bushel. If the guaranteed price for Durum wheat is $5.75, with the subsidy of $1.75 he will receive $7.50 a bushel.

It should be stressed that it is not only the consumer who is paying for this type of legislation. As has already been made clear by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the farmer is taking a loss because of the present two-price system. From some figures I saw last Saturday I noticed that wheat is selling for $6.04 on the international market. That is about a dollar above the price the farmer is getting for domestic grain sold for human consumption. It means that the government is making a sacrifice in order to keep the price of bread down. This is basically a good step, but it should be made permanent.

The whole philosophy of price guarantees and price supports should be applied to all farm products. The principle is sound. If there were price guarantees farmers would be able to plan in the spring for what they would receive in the fall. The farmer gambles on the weather, on world conditions, on the international market; why he should have to gamble with government programs is beyond me.

I should like to see an amendment moved in committee to provide for the indexing of the price to the farmer for wheat consumed domestically. Maybe we should index the floor price, or the government subsidy, or the ceiling price. If not, the farmer could find the price of grain frozen for seven years while his costs of production skyrocket. Perhaps there could be indexing in the manner that has been developed for taxation, old age pensions, family allowances and such things. The basis of the index could be the increase in the costs of production. The alternative would be a clause in the bill to provide for review by the House of Commons each year. If an upward adjustment were necessary, then this House would make it.

Another point is that we should provide for policing of the bill. One of its purposes is to provide a consumer subsidy so that an increase in the price of wheat will not necessarily mean an increase in the price of bread. When there are subsidies or taxcuts on items like clothing or children's footwear the saving is not always passed on by the wholesalers or retailers, but is sometimes regarded by them as extra profits or dividends for their shareholders. This legislation should be policed to make sure that that does not happen with this subsidy. It is not intended for the companies, for Weston's or any other miller.

This legislation was first announced in September, 1973, and in September, the millers announced that the price of a loaf would be increased by four cents. After pressure from this House and the Food Prices Review Board, the increase was rolled back to two cents. Despite the fact that the price of wheat had not gone up, in August, 1974, the millers announced that the price of a loaf would go up by three cents in the middle of September. So, since this legislation was introduced the price of bread has gone up by five cents a loaf despite the fact that the price of wheat has not increased. We are aware that there are many other inputs in the price of a loaf, but I wonder whether the five-cent increase reflects the legitimate costs to the bakers.

If we pass this legislation it seems to me that the Food Prices Review Board or some such body should police it to make sure that someone is not pocketing the subsidy at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer.

Those are some of the concerns I have about the bill, Madam Speaker. We support it in principle, but we should keep in mind that it is only a small step, toward providing the farmers of western Canada and the other wheat producers with income security. We must have a stabilization plan to cover all products and to take into account the increased costs of production. Unless we have that, farmers will not be able to continue in business.

We just have to look around the world to see how people are starving. This should be one of the first considerations of the food conference in Rome in November.

There should be price guarantees, floor prices, price supports on all farm products whether consumed domestically by human beings, or exported. If we do this we will not only help the Canadian farmer but will be playing our part in the world as a great food producing nation.

We must also consider the very low initial payment when we talk about wheat. Wheat is now selling in the world market for about $6 a bushel, yet farmers in my area are getting only $2 per bushel initial payment because the Wheat Board is holding back $4. That is like saying to any worker that a half or two thirds of his income will be held until the end of the year, and then paid to him without interest. How would members of parliament react if 50 per cent of their salary were held back for nine or ten months and then paid without interest? Yet that is the way we are treating our farmers, and it must be changed. I hope the minister will have an announcement on it shortly.

Another thing that concerns me is that the initial price of feed grains is being held down and, as a result, many farmers are going to the open market where they get a higher price for grain delivered on the spot. It seems to me that there is a sly hand in this. I am suspicious of why the minister is not raising the initial price of feed grains, and wonder if he is trying to drive farmers to the open market so that he can then say that they do not use the Wheat Board. The government wants to sell feed grain on the open market. Obviously it does not want the Wheat Board, and thinks that perhaps we should get rid of it. How can the government's approach to orderly marketing be in the best interests of the farmers of this country? How can low initial payments—

Mr. McIsaac: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, although I am interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) who is speaking on feed grain policy, let me remind him that the bill before us deals with the implementation of a two-price system for wheat. Surely he can take all the latitude he wants in talking about the two-price system for wheat without talking about a totally different matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will revert to the subject matter of the bill. I think he has nearly concluded his remarks.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has completely misunderstood my remarks. Perhaps I should start at the beginning. I am talking about the bill before us, and suggesting that the government should not introduce legislation like this in isolation. We need other bills of this kind. This is but one step in the right direction. We need more legislation which will guarantee prices for farmers so that we can protect them from the peaks and valleys of the open market. My remarks apply as much to feed grains, or wheat sold internationally, as to wheat sold domestically for human consumption in this country.

I am talking about the broad situation concerning farmers. We should not look at this in the narrow sense; let us look at the entire picture, something the Liberal government has not done in the last number of years. It has tended to respond in an ad hoc way to issues which have arisen. In the previous minority parliament it responded this way to pressures put on it, and it is still responding this way. The Liberal party is good at straddling both sides of the fence. You could get a lot of slivers that way. I am saying that this is good legislation, that it should not be an isolated instance, and that it should be followed by other legislation which will help our farmers to stay on the land. If they stay, and if their prices are guaranteed, they will produce food.

The world needs desperately the food Canadian farmers can produce. The days of the LIFT program and the old stabilization plan are over. They will not come back. The first two or three years after the minister in charge of the Wheat Board assumed his current responsibilities were among the darkest Canadian grain farmers have ever experienced.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of this bill which will implement a two-price system for wheat, something that has been promised for years, and talked about by members of all parties in this House.

I was really pleased to hear the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) say he will support the bill. He took a lot of time reviewing other issues which have nothing to do with the bill, but after talking a long time he decided, as the NDP has done both in this House and in provincial forums across the country, to support it.

I was disappointed in the remarks of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). His party at one time had the chance to implement this kind of policy, but did not take it. It has finally been introduced by the minister who sits in front of me, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang).

The hon. member for Vegreville was being irresponsible in criticizing the bill because it did not deal with some minor issues. He raised some interesting points, however. For instance, if in two or three years the $5 figure does not seem to meet the need, it can be changed. The point is that we are adopting a principle, one I am happy to support and one which has the support of many provinces.

We are dealing with the establishment of a two-price system. This bill will establish that two-price system and the minister should be proud of it. I think practically every member of the House supports it. Hon. members ought to consider some points made by the hon. member for Vegreville. Perhaps we should do for feed grains what we are doing for wheat. Perhaps that way we could provide part of the answer for the difficulties besetting the livestock industry. Perhaps this principle ought to be applied to that industry.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) prepared to tell wheat producers in his constituency that $60 million is a small issue? That is what we are talking about. He criticized the remarks of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), but I cannot accept $60 million as a small issue. The fact is that when the government offered to support the grain industry to the tune of $50 million a few years ago, it felt it was providing the western grain producers with a great benefit.

Let me point out that approximately 60 million bushels of western grain are used for the domestic industry and approximately seven million or eight million bushels of wheat are purchased from wheat growers in Ontario.

For the information of hon. members, the world price of grain today is $6.20 per bushel, which means that the western Canadian producer is subsidizing the industry to the tune of $1.20 per bushel. That is not chicken feed and must be looked at seriously. We will not be able to live with this in the future. That is why we, on this side of the House, are prepared to move an amendment in committee. Hopefully the minister will accept it and other minor changes which are acceptable to the farmers he represents. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION OVER COASTAL WATERS—POSSIBILITY OF UNILATERAL ACTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) of October 3 was prompted by statements that were made by two ministers, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) and the then minister of fisheries, Hon. Jack Davis, during the July 8 election campaign. The statements in question concerned the Law of the Sea Conference and the action allegedly proposed by the government if our country's position with respect to jurisdiction over our off-shore resources was not accepted by the member nations represented at the conference.

Both ministers are reported to have said categorically that the government was prepared to act on its own and declare unilaterally its jurisdiction over the continental shelves off our coasts. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion made the statement in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, on June 24, at a political rally at which the Prime Minister was present. The former minister of fisheries, Mr. Davis, made a similar comment in a statement which was prepared by him in Vancouver and released in Halifax on June 15, to coincide with the closing meeting being held there of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries, ICNAF.

● (2200)

In reply to my question of October 3 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) questioned the accuracy of the press reports to which I referred. At the same time he stated quite emphatically that unilateral action would not be taken by his government to protect our fishing industry and our fishermen against the plundering of foreign nationals.

The conservation and management of our rapidly dwindling fish stock is a matter of grave concern to our fishermen. It should not have become the subject of such blatant political dishonesty on the part of this government and in particular the two responsible ministers.

Our fishermen have been used as pawns and the butt of political chicanery almost since the industry began. They have been victimized, exploited, and almost dehumanized for centuries by unscrupulous fish merchants, and have been used in every way possible by likewise unscrupulous politicians. Is it any wonder they have lost confidence in the industry and view with suspicion the actions of their political leaders?

If the government is unwilling to honour the commitment that was made by two of its members during the election campaign, the very least we should expect is that the Prime Minister or the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) tell the fishermen of this country precisely what their intentions are with regard to the management and control of our marine resources.

The minister or his parliamentary secretary will no doubt tell us this evening that they are placing all their bets on the outcome of the next Law of the Sea Conference. The minister's predecessor, Mr. Davis, told us the same thing five years ago.

We want to know, and even more important our fishermen want to know, what action the government will take if we have no more success at the next Law of the Sea Conference than we had at the one held in Caracas earlier this year. Is the government prepared to abandon its powder puff, nice guy approach and tell the other nations of the world that, with or without their concurrence, we intend to take control of our continental shelf and the resources that lie thereon, or is it going to sacrifice the fishing industry and our fishermen for the sake of diplomatic niceties and being thought of as nice guys?

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that what he said in closing is not correct. We will not let the fishing industry down.

The question has been raised whether Canada should now proceed unilaterally and extend its fishing jurisdiction to the edge of the continental shelf. As the House is aware, Mr. Speaker, the world community is presently engaged in bringing the Law of the Sea in line with the political and economic realities of our times.

A first session of the Law of the Sea Conference was held last summer in Caracas. Given the large number of participating countries, over 135, and the many complex issues to be resolved, it was not possible to elaborate, in all its details, a treaty dealing with all the aspects of the subject.

However, during the Caracas session real progress was achieved. It became apparent that a future Law of the Sea Treaty could only be agreed upon if coastal states were recognized as having effective rights with respect to both living and mineral resources, as well as for the protection of the marine environment. These rights will be exercised by the individual coastal state in an "economic zone", which is generally conceived as extending to 200 miles from the coast. However, the question of whether such rights would go beyond the 200-mile limit and reach the edge of the shelf did not receive the same degree of support as was given the economic zone concept. Canada is, however, hopeful that some arrangement can be worked out in this sense.

In these circumstances would it be timely for Canada to extend its fishing jurisdiction unilaterally? I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that, as a responsible member of the international community, Canada should aim at a widely accepted Law of the Sea and, as a consequence, should give the United Nations Law of the Sea Conference a chance to succeed. We are confident that it will. This does not mean that the government is not conscious of the need to prevent over-exploitation of the living resources off our coasts, even before the conference ends. Indeed, through action as a member of international bodies such as ICNAF, as well as through bilateral consultations, the government is constantly trying to control this situation.

The best way for Canada to acquire sufficient powers to remedy this problem is through international agreement. In present circumstances unilateral action would only create confusion and controversy. I would also add that control of the living resources over the continental margin would fall short of providing adequate protection for salmon. That particular issue also calls for international acquiescence in the rights of the state of origin.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, unilateral action, though not called for at the moment, could very well be considered as a matter of policy if the Law of the Sea Conference fails, within a reasonable period of time, to reach a satisfactory solution as regards the interests of coastal states in their offshore living resources. This coincides with the view taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in this House on October 3, as well as with the statements made by other ministers before that.

STORMS—ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR AID FROM PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that I participate frequently in what is called the "Late Night Show". Some people ask why, and the answer is that I am a great lover of crowds and there is nothing like a large and enthusiastic audience to turn me on.

A few days ago I asked a question about the measures being taken to assist the people of Prince Edward Island who suffered severe crop damage, besides loss of electricity and telephone services, as a result of a severe storm in what is well know as the garden province. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen) seemed to be well briefed on the issues and I congratulate him on the lucidity, fulsomeness and directness of his reply. He might well serve as a model to other parliamentary secretaries, and indeed to those lofty incumbents of the treasury benches.

A great many islanders were seriously inconvenienced for a period of a week and, in some cases, for a little longer. Shortages of utilities, water, light and fuel made life difficult for the people and for their farm animals. There was a threat to our valuable potato crop and to such grain as was not harvested. I now hear less disturbing reports than were coming my way when I first asked the question. Yet to many people this was not an inconvenience of a minor nature. For a week it was impossible to telephone to my residence in Prince Edward Island, as I discovered daily. Many homes were unheated for days. The utility companies moved as best they could to get things back to normal.

My main concern has to do with the alacrity of the movement of aid toward provinces and regions affected by seriously adverse weather conditions. From time to time in this House I have heard members bring forward appeals arising from emergency situations in their home areas, inquiring about federal aid and being advised that no official request had yet come from the province concerned. In many cases speed is of the essence, and I would urge greater co-ordination so that there might be a diminution of the waiting period.

In July of this year a freak storm damaged crops in my constituency. Appeals for compensation were made, discussed and processed, but it was a long time before the victims of the storm were able to receive funds, or even to receive assurances as to the measure of aid which would come to them. In these days it is not easy to wait. Time is money, and during a period of inflation money is shrinking.

It is ironic I should be talking about two grim assaults from nature on Prince Edward Island—strange, because this summer was one of the most beautiful and balmy in the island's history, as many thousands of tourists can testify. I appeal for a method whereby the whole procedure for making aid available in such cases can be improved and expedited.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his kind comments. One of the things which make this country great is the fact that although there is a problem in Prince Edward Island the heart of the rest of the country goes out to the people there in the disaster they face.

Federal policy on disaster assistance has, since 1970, taken the form of reimbursing provincial governments on the basis of a per capita formula for the expenditures made by the provinces in dealing with a disaster. It seems to indicate that kind of thrust the hon. member seeks, and I am sure all hon. members seek, in dealing with disasters or problems in their immediate areas. But the initiative must be taken by the province to determine the size of the disaster and the kind of assistance that is required, and then it must make an application to the federal government.

There is, however, as the hon. member knows, a formula set up for the sharing of the cost, and the formula is equal to the amount of $1 multiplied by the population of the province. When the sum exceeds that amount there is an ever increasing formula of contribution at the federal level.

Generally speaking, eligible expenditures are those made by a province for the restoration of essential property of private individuals, small businesses and farmsteads, and public works, to their pre-disaster condition. These guidelines limit cost sharing for agricultural losses to payments made to restore farmlands to workable condition where a farm operation has been seriously affected by flood erosion or land gouging.

Payments made for the restoration of farm buildings and equipment would also be eligible, since they would represent payments made for restoring the essential private property of the farmers concerned. The basic federal measure for assisting farmers who suffer losses on account of damage to farm products is the Crop Insurance Act. This act is given effect by means of the federal-provincial crop insurance agreements which have been contracted between the federal government and the various provinces.

I think it is fair to say that Prince Edward Island has sought advice on what provincial expenditures, related to the earlier storm of July 3, would be eligible for cost sharing. If a similar request is received from Prince Edward Island regarding expenditures related to the recent storm, it will receive prompt and sympathetic consideration. But the initial thrust, as the means of expediting assistance, has to come from the province, which has to determine the size of the disaster and the amount of funds it is seeking.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, because of the length of the answer, perhaps it might be printed in Hansard as having been read.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

National Energy Board reports: (a) 1. Marshall A. Crowe, Chairman, B.A.; Douglas M. Fraser, Vice-Chairman, B.A., and graduate studies in economics and political science; Jack G. Several other employees of the Board have also had training relative to the aforementioned fields but fill positions in other occupational categories. Consequently, a large, complex amount of work would be required to identify each such individual and provide an accurate return.

INTERLOCKING DIRECTORSHIPS

Question No. 207—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government considering the reintroduction of legislation to prohibit interlocking directorships where it is satisfied that such interlocking directorships have or are likely to have the effect of significantly lessening competition?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The government is proceeding with the revision of competition policy in two stages. Bill C-2 represents the first stage. In the second stage, consideration will be given to the reintroduction of legislation relating to interlocking directorships.

VETERANS IN THE OKANAGAN BOUNDARY IN RECEIPT OF ALLOWANCES

Question No. 302—Mr. Whittaker:

1. What is the estimated number of veterans in the Okanagan Boundary receiving (a) war veterans allowance (b) disability pension (c) civilian war allowance?

2. Under the Veterans' Land Act, if both husband and wife are veterans, does the certification of one signify the eligibility of the other?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. Statistics are not maintained by the census division on the numbers of veterans receiving War Veterans Allowance, Civilian War Allowance and Disability Pension. According to the 1971 census, there were an estimated 3,435 veterans resident in the Okanagan-Similkameen census division. This represents 3% of the estimated veteran population of the department's Vancouver district office. At August 31, 1974, in this district, there were 6,237 persons in receipt of War Veterans Allowance and Civilian War Allowance and 15,075 veterans in receipt of disability pension.

2. No. It was necessary for a veteran, on an individual basis, to apply for and be certified as qualified on or before October 31, 1968.

● (1410)

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, for more than a month I have endeavoured to get an answer to question 544. From time to time I have communicated with the minister's office, on each occasion being promised an early reply. Finally, because I could not get any answer, I placed this question concerning the commissioning of statues of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and Right Hon. Arthur Meighen on the order paper. One week ago I again placed this matter on the order paper as a starred question. I cannot understand why the government has no record of this or is unable to furnish an answer. I understand that for the last several years these statues have been in storage. I wonder why they are there, and also why, although the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was prime minister before Mr. King, Mr. King's statue is on Parliament Hill, but not Mr. Meighen's. It is impossible, apparently, to secure information concerning the whereabouts of these two statues. I hope that the department will pay some attention to this because I know the scriptural admonition "seek and ye shall find" will certainly bring results.

THE MINISTRY

SUGGESTION MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE BE GIVEN ADVICE ON HIS RESPONSIBILITIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of what the Minister of Agriculture told the press outside the House yesterday when he said he is not sure of the division of authority and responsibility as between himself, the National Farm Products Marketing Council and the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, will the Acting Prime Minister make available to the Minister of Agriculture all necessary legal advice so that the minister may be provided with all facts relating to this authority and responsibilities.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the difficulties the minister must be experiencing and in view of the gray area which may exist, from the point of view of the minister—

Mr. Hees: And that doesn't mean Herb, either.

Mr. Stanfield: —what steps does the Acting Prime Minister propose, to make certain that the Minister of Agriculture receives proper advice on the subject.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture is performing magnificently in his portfolio.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: I know the opposition wants to downgrade him, but I do not think that will happen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ask Mrs. Plumptre.

Oral Questions

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF COMMITTEE EVIDENCE TO DETERMINE IF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTED OFFENCE UNDER CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Will he examine the evidence presented yesterday to the special committee on egg marketing, to determine whether his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, has committed an offence under section 115 of the Criminal Code dealing with disobeying a federal statute.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am always glad to look at the reports of that interesting committee.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED ACTION BY CANADIAN TUNGSTEN COMPANY AGAINST EMPLOYEES INVOLVED IN LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Labour, may I direct my question to the government House leader. It concerns a report to the effect that in the community of Can-Tung, in the southern part of the Northwest Territories, which is a company town run by Canadian Tungsten Company, provisions have been cut off for those in the community who were involved in a labour dispute and evictions have taken place. Will the minister assure the House that the department which licences these companies and permits them to operate in the Northwest Territories will require of them elementary standards of decency and humanity in the operation of these communities.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will see that this question is brought to the attention of the minister.

SOCIAL SECURITY

GRANTING OF OLD AGE PENSION TO SPOUSE AT AGE 60—POSSIBLE RETROACTIVITY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister but, in his absence, I shall put it to the Acting Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: He is at the conference.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I see. He may be at the conference, I do not blame him.

During the last election campaign, while we had recommended it years ago, the Liberal candidates promised to grant the old age pension to spouses at age 60. Recently, while answering a question I put to him the Prime minister said that we would have until the 1st of August of 1975 to pass this legislation in the House of Commons. Since we receive a great many letters on this subject from all parts of the country, is the minister in a position to tell us whether if it is passed in July or before the 1st of August 1975, this legislation will be retroactive to July 8, 1974?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, when the legislation is brought down, the hon. member will have the answer to his question.

TRADE

REASON FOR ALLEGED DECLINE IN EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As exports increased by 28 per cent during the first nine months of this year compared with the same period a year ago—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Just wait until you get the bad news.—and the prices of those same products increased by no less than 37 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Hees: —leaving a decrease of 6 per cent in the volume of exports during the first nine months of this year, does the government intend to do anything to reverse this accelerating trend and, if so, what and when?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the first eight months of this year, Canada's exports of end products were 5.1 per cent higher than for the same period a year ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Second, the largest increase in physical volume, as distinct from value, has taken place in end products, excluding automobiles.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not make any attempt to answer my question. He dealt with a specific type of export over an eight month period whereas the nine month figures are available to him. His answer made clear his indifference to this whole question. What has happened to the former determination and ability of this department to overcome difficult situations, which characterized its operations under a former regime?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the hon. member that the government's priority given to the Export Development Corporation indicates the very high priority we are placing on assisting Canadian exporters to remain internationally competitive.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have one final supplementary. Is the minister not aware that the principles employed by the Export Development Corporation are those which were initiated by the government of which I just spoke and have been developed by his government following our very excellent example. All this is nothing new. It is simply following the principles started by the minister's predecessor.

Mr. Chrétien: When you were a minister, I was still in college. That was a long time ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Despite the fact there is great liberty during the oral question period, there must be some sense of the present somewhere in the question.

POST OFFICE

LOSS OF ASHES OF LATE MICHAEL KLOCHKO

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Has the post office yet located the ashes of the late Michael Klochko which were lost in the mail two months ago while making the 50 mile trip from Grimsby to Toronto?

● (1420)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): No, unfortunately. However, the parcel would have been made safer for the sake of another 90 cents. That is why we have had registered mail for over 100 years.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—POSSIBLE REQUEST FOR FOOD AID

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the widespread famine in India, the worst for decades, may I ask whether the government of India has made any request to the government of Canada for food aid?

Hon. Allan MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There has been no formal request with respect to food aid. Yesterday, however, I did have occasion to speak briefly with the Indian High Commissioner and the question was raised in a particular context.

Mr. Ritchie: Has the government of India indicated that Canada should request to supply food to the starving people, as was indicated to Mr. Kissinger that the U.S.A. should request to supply such food on his visit to New Delhi?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Kissinger was not mentioned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CRASH OF ARMED FORCES PLANE IN MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. The hon. gentleman's parliamentary secretary provided me with some information about the unfortunate crash of a Buffalo aircraft assigned to UNEF and I wish to follow up this matter. Do both the Canadian and the United Nations reports on the incident disclose that there was a gap of some two and a half minutes in the communications tape between the Damascus control tower and the aircraft? When may one expect the United Nations' report and our own NDHQ report to be made public so that the families of the men who were killed might have some reassurance about this tragedy?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The reports to which the hon. member refers are in the process of being studied. However, the United Nations' Report has not reached us and I cannot name a date for its arrival.

[Later:]

Mr. Fairweather: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not often raise questions of privilege, as Your Honour knows, but I think the Minister of National Defence would like an opportunity to correct the incorrect answer he gave me. My information from his parliamentary secretary is that the United Nations' Report has, in fact, been received. I know the minister has been away, but I would like the record to be straight. This is a very grave matter and there are unpleasant aspects to it that I think should be cleared up.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. I have been informed that the United Nations report has very recently been received and is now being studied, together with our own report.

TURKEYS—INCREASE IN NUMBER IN COLD STORAGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture and it arises from the present sizeable build-up of turkeys in storage in Canada. What does the government intend to do about managing these turkeys stocks? I ask this question because during the first part of October there were some 77 million pounds of turkeys in storage as compared with some 46 million pounds in storage in October of last year and 16 million pounds in September of last year.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Not long ago, Mr. Speaker, I had a conversation with one of the people who is concerned about turkey storage. As we know, many turkeys were sold over the Thanksgiving weekend—I do not have the figures with me. I know that some were sold as loss leaders below cost. Many birds were sold at lower prices than they were ten years ago, enabling people to benefit from this excellent source of protein. I would point out that the trade owns most of these birds. The National Turkey Marketing Agency does not own any at all. I understand they are all in good cold storage and that there are no signs of deterioration. They could be used in many different programs.

Mr. Murta: Can the minister advise the House what could be an acceptable figure for surpluses of turkey products in Canada as far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned?

Mr. Whelan: I look upon the supply position in this way: it is better to have a surplus position than a deficit. A surplus ensures that we are able to supply our people at reasonable prices and participate in world food programs.

INDUSTRY

FOREST INDUSTRY—POSSIBLE SALE TO CUBA AND ICELAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STIMULATE MARKETS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In reply to a question yesterday concerning the 16,000 lay-offs in the forestry industry of British Columbia and equivalent lay-offs coming into New Brunswick and Quebec, the minister stated that his department had effected certain sales to countries like Iceland and Cuba. I should like the minister to be more specific. Was he suggesting that recent sales to those countries were going to affect lay-offs in any significant way and, if so, in what way? I should also like to ask him what he is doing in addition to deal with this situation.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the active participation of my department in seeking new export markets for the products of the forest industries of Canada. I identified some of these markets in my remarks yesterday.

Mr. Broadbent: But have you made any sales?

Mr. Gillespie: I was not suggesting that there would be an immediate short-term benefit. For that reason we have been examining other options which might sustain production during the winter.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister inform the House what the other options are so that we, and more particularly the people directly involved in these lay-offs which are taking place right through northern Canada now, will have some idea what to expect in the coming months?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the study has not yet been completed. As soon as it has been completed I will be making an announcement.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED LOWERING OF MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I put a final supplementary question. May I ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs this question. Given the lay-offs in the lumbering industry, and also given the report this morning that Premier Davis, that well known radical from Ontario, has suggested that the government involve itself in providing mortgage money at lower interest rates so that more houses can be constructed in his province, is the government finally going to do something to bring down mortgage rates and, if so, when?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly I welcome the bold initiative of the premier of Ontario in suggesting more mortgage money at lower rates would be helpful. I think this is very much in line with our innovative housing program. We have been doing this, of course, to the tune of $1,350 million during the past year. I would very much welcome any innovative thinking on how to bring down mortgage interest rates without spending still more money. However, we are spending that money; we have spent it, and we intend to continue to stimulate housing construction. Our expenditures on housing have increased each and every year, and the effect of that spending, as a result of programs introduced by my predecessor and as a result of present programs, will have an even greater impact on the market next year.

ENERGY

ALLEGED REQUEST FOR SOQUIP TO ASSOCIATE WITH PANARCTIC—REASON FOR REFUSAL

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources being absent, I shall put my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that Panarctic Oils Limited is a joint venture of the federal government and the private sector which conducts explorations for oil, and that a corporation called Soquip has similar operations in Quebec, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House if he is aware of the fact that Soquip presented a request in order to become member of the Panartic Oils Ltd. consortium? If he is, how was that request answered?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question, as I recall it, related to an interest by Soquip in buying shares in Panarctic Corporation, and the government indicated that this would not be in accordance with government policy.

● (1430)

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Is it true, as newspapers indicate, that the request was dismissed in order to avoid political conflicts between Ottawa and Québec, and that the real interest of Canadians in this field have been ignored?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it was not especially related to Quebec; it is the general policy of the Canadian government that the present distribution of shares, 45 per cent to the federal government and 55 per cent in the hands of the private corporations, should not be disturbed.

HOUSING

PROPOSED AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES TO HAVE ONE BODY RESPONSIBLE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister of state responsible for housing following his answer to the leader of the NDP. As housing starts are down 24 per cent, will the minister now explore with officials of provincial corporations responsible for housing and officials of the CMHC the idea of obtaining a federal-provincial agreement under which one body would pour money into housing, rather than having the conflict that exists between provincial and federal bodies, always used as an excuse by the minister responsible for housing in this House?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have used that as an excuse. I do look for co-operation and, indeed, I obtain it. We have agreements and we hold meetings with the provinces, and the fact that we will have something like 255,000 housing completions this year is an indication of that co-operation and success in our programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up on that as the minister did not answer my question. I asked first of all whether he had or would explore the idea suggested by the Premier of Ontario of preparing an agreement between federal and provincial bodies in order that we might have one housing body responsible for housing. I asked that question in view of the fact that every construction company and construction worker knows that housing starts are down in this country. There is no point in looking at last year when we are living in 1974.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, we are living in 1974 and planning for 1975. Certainly, I would explore any positive avenue which would help improve the situation to the greatest possible extent. I am not convinced that having one vehicle in each province is the only answer. I think coordination of programs is extremely important. I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree that it is very important when funds at one level are being spent by another that there be a high degree of accountability and a recognition of where these funds come from, particularly for the governments that have to provide them.

AIR TRANSPORT

STUDY ON COMPETITION BETWEEN CARRIERS IN MARITIMES—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON APPLICATION OF CP AIR

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, last March a series of air transport hearings were held in the Atlantic area dealing in part with competition and the entry of CP Air into that region. Could the Minister of Transport now indicate the status of the report, what stage it has reached and when he expects to hear from the air transport committee as to its conclusion reached following these hearings and studies?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know that the committee held very fruitful meetings with the ministers of the governments as well as with other groups in the Maritimes, and are now on the way toward improving services to the Maritimes. I hope that the hon. gentleman will be satisfied with the work that has been done.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would give an answer to my more direct question? Is it the intention of the government to allow CP Air to operate between Montreal and Halifax and/or Halifax, Montreal and points west?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, there is a part of the question I missed for obvious reasons. Is the hon. gentleman referring to one particular airline?

Mr. Forrestall: Yes, I was referring to CP Air.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Surely, the hon. member will allow me not to give an answer at this moment.

POSSIBLE ABOLITION OF CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I know that we can always get a clear and definite answer from the Minister of Transport. In view of the aroused public opinion in the prairie provinces over the suggestion that the Crowsnest Pass rates are to be abolished, now that the minister is here again may I ask whether he can give the assurance that such is not the case?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know that the right hon. gentleman posed exactly the same question over six months ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That's right.

Mr. Woolliams: And you gave the same answer.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): If my memory serves me well, the way he put it then was that if ever we touched the Crowsnest Pass rates it would be worse than an atomic bomb exploding in the west.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That's right, that's what I said.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): So the bomb is still there and it has not exploded.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is not often that a minister can remember with such exactitude what has been asked, and answer with such indefiniteness. Regardless of the bomb not having exploded to date, has the minister or his department given consideration to the removal of the Crowsnest Pass rates?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the only thing I can state this afternoon, and I think this is very important, is that the only matters which are under consideration by the department or the ministry are those matters which have been submitted to the ministers of transport for the western provinces, and we are satisfied that the agenda really corresponds to the problems that exist.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I know how deeply concerned the minister is. Let us now have a little definiteness rather than this playing around with the House of Commons. Is the minister or is he not going to remove the Crowsnest Pass rates, or is he giving consideration thereto? I can only conclude that unless he answers he intends to.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think the right hon. gentleman already has the answer. He knows very well that if the Crowsnest Past rates had been put on the agenda for our meetings in the west he would have heard about it and the press would have heard about it, so that means this is not the problem with which we are concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Good. Tell the Minister of Justice.

FISHERIES

SEALING—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN REGULATIONS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question relating to comments made by the minister of fisheries to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry on October 17, at which time he expresssed certain reservations regarding seal hunting regulations and how they should be applied. Would the minister indicate to the House whether he is contemplating any changes in the sealing fisheries regulations?

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I did say to the committee that whenever people's livelihood and incomes were involved I was ready to review and have a second look at anything, and I maintain that position. Yesterday at a luncheon meeting with Dr. Ronald, who is chairman of the advisory committee which advises the minister on this particular issue, I received his report. I intend to read it carefully and discuss it with Cabinet. Thankfully this is an area in which we have some lead time since the season does not open until March. I will obviously undertake to consult with the committee on any decision concerning any new regulations.

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF PRICE SUPPORT FOR INDUSTRY

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister met yesterday with the Newfoundland fisheries minister along with other officials and people connected with the fishing industry, and that one of the matters discussed was price support for the industry. Can the minister tell the House if it is the government's intention to extend the price support? I think originally it was planned for a four month's period.

● (1440)

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I hope that this matter will be discussed at this week's cabinet meeting, following which I will inform the hon. member.

INABILITY OF FISHERMEN TO FILL QUOTAS BECAUSE OF STRIKE AT PLANT OF FRESHWATER FISH CORPORATION—ELIGIBILITY OF FISHERMEN FOR UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, and with your permission, I should like to answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Selkirk regarding the effects of the strike by the Freshwater Fish Corporation employees in Transcona on fishermen who have not yet filled their quotas. It is my understanding that the majority of fishermen from the Lake Winnipeg area had caught most of their quota before the strike began. I am advised that it will take some time before the province of Manitoba and the corporation will have sufficiently detailed information to determine how many fishermen had in fact reached their quota. As for the problem of UIC and the Canada Pension Plan, these matters are being actively discussed in the departments involved, as I indicated yesterday.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED INFILTRATION INTO CANADA OF C.I.A.—KNOWLEDGE OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. Solicitor General.

Following the report presented yesterday on the CBC French network about the infiltration into Canada, and particularly into Quebec, of the C.I.A., with supporting proof and evidence, would the minister be prepared to make a statement on motions about the extent of those intelligence activities which our country apparently does not escape and inform the House of the government's position on that matter?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, last night I did not see the broadcast referred to, but I have asked for a text of what was said on the broadcast. I will investigate the charges made there and report to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In view of this answer, will the minister, after having examined the report of the interview, inform the House as to whether the C.I.A. operates with the knowledge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or on a parallel basis without the RCMP being aware of its activities?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, neither the CIA nor any other foreign police agency operates in Canada without the knowledge of the RCMP. From time to time foreign police agencies continue cases in Canada, but they do so with the consent of the RCMP and there is always an RCMP officer present as they carry out their work in Canada.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT FROM MARITIMES CONCERNING SERVICE TO THEIR AREA

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. With respect to the public meetings held in the Atlantic region by the Air Transport Commission earlier this year—a matter which was already brought up during the question period today—as a result of recommendations made and arising therefrom, will the minister arrange a meeting with the Atlantic provinces' members of parliament regarding air services in the Atlantic region and the roles of Air Canada, Canadian Pacific Airlines and Eastern Provincial Airlines?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I think I have a permanent problem; I did not hear the hon. member. He spoke before I used the earpiece. May I ask him please to repeat his question with your permission?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was asking whether the minister could arrange a meeting with the Atlantic provinces' members about air service for the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Jones: Would the minister like me to repeat my question? My question is with respect to the public meetings in the Atlantic region by the Air Transport Commission earlier this year. As the result of recommendations arising therefrom, would the minister be prepared to arrange a meeting with Atlantic provinces members of parliament with respect to air service in the Atlantic region and the roles of Air Canada, CP Air and Eastern Provincial Airlines?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice to see whether this is really the best way to proceed in order to give the best service to the Atlantic provinces.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF LUMBER BANK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the current depression in lumber prices, will the minister give consideration to setting up lumber banks along the lines of land banks to provide a flow of low cost lumber for housing in the future and at the same time to provide relief and employment in the depressed regions of the country?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a very imaginative suggestion which I should like to take under consideration. Obviously, it poses some knotty problems which we will have to work out.

REDUCTION IN HOUSING STARTS—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO INCREASE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The minister has stated that he has been planning for 1975. Now that a University of Toronto affiliated institute has substantially confirmed the Conference Board's earlier forecast that housing starts will be down 35 per cent, or 96,000 units next year compared with last year, would the minister indicate what new steps, if any, his department intends to take to avert this slump?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Certainly I treat the reports of the Conference Board and other such reputable bodies with great respect. That would be the case if they did not have an alert and energetic government. I will be introducing and announcing legislation with reference to new steps to the House at the appropriate time, and I can assure the hon. member they will be steps which I think will be appropriate to rectify what would be an unacceptable situation.

Mr. Stevens: Again I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I take it from his comments that he is challenging the forecast and the predictions made by these two reputable bodies. If so, would the minister kindly indicate to what extent he believes housing starts will be down in the first quarter of 1975 compared with the first quarter of 1974?

Mr. Danson: I am not challenging those figures. Those are projections by reputable bodies, as I said before. But it is my job to prove them wrong, if I can.

Oral Questions

REDISTRIBUTION

PROPOSED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF SEATS ALLOTTED QUEBEC AND ONTARIO BUT NOT BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): I have a question for the government House leader involving redistribution of seats. As the government House leader knows, in the last session we delayed it, but under that program the province of British Columbia would have obtained three more seats, the province of Ontario three more, and the province of Quebec would have lost two. We understand that under the bill to be presented next week, the province of British Columbia will still gain three seats but the province of Ontario will gain seven and Quebec will gain one. We wonder why, if these two provinces have had their seats increased, Ontario by four and Quebec by three, British Columbia is not having the number of its seats increased.

Mr. Speaker: I think the question clearly anticipates not only government policy but, by its very nature, what will be before the House in the form of legislation for debate next week. Therefore, I cannot allow the question to be asked.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DATE OF TABLING OF HERMANN REPORT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Would the minister kindly advise us as to when he proposes to table the Hermann report which he told us would be tabled immediately after the resumption of this session and is now well over a month old?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, I can table the Hermann report soon. The reason it has not yet been tabled is that we have been very busy in the Veteran Affairs Committee. However, it will be tabled shortly.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PURPOSE OF SUBSIDY ON SKIM MILK POWDER

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Will the minister inform the House if the purpose of the government subsidy of 24 cents per pound on skim milk powder was and is to give a lower price to the consumer?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I think it would be better if the hon. member put the question to the Minister of Agriculture who is administering these subsidies.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, may I direct that question now to the Minister of Agriculture.

[Mr. Danson.]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the latest report I have came yesterday. Every retail outlet was passing this saving on to the consumers except for one, and yesterday they thought they would be doing it. I have not received a report on that this morning.

SUBSIDY ON SKIM MILK POWDER—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CONSUMERS RECEIVE BENEFIT

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): My supplementary question is directed now to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the irresponsible position which the Retail Council of Canada has taken in this situation by informing retailers that they are not obliged to pass on the government subsidy to the consumer, will the minister inform the House if he intends to continue to license the theft of public funds by the retailers?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I feel that the reply the hon. Minister has just made clearly indicates that the greater majority of retailers—with only one exception—have passed on the subsidy to consumers. Having discussed the matter with him, I know that he was ready to cancel this subsidy, should retailers refuse to pass it on to consumers.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. It was the minister's own Food Prices Review Board which reported retailers and processors were not passing on the government subsidy to the consumer. In effect, his own board has informed us that this is not being done.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: The answer is that, at the present time, not only is the subsidy passed on to consumers, but I have been advised that in some cases, prices have been reduced, to compensate for the inconveniences of the previous situation, when the subsidy was not passed on. I feel that the hon. member wants to start a storm in a tea-cup, although he has received every assurance that this subsidy is actually passed on to consumers and that the Minister of Agriculture intends to deal severely with those who, once again, would not pass on this subsidy to consumers.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED ISSUANCE OF STAMPS TO COMMEMORATE MEETING OF INTERNATIONAL SOIL SCIENTISTS IN 1978

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. For the recent meeting of international soil scientists in the Soviet Union that country issued a commemorative stamp. Canada will be honoured in 1978 when the meeting of international soil scientists takes place in Edmonton. This will require about 8,000 letters to organize it and will bring 3,000 to 4,000 international guests to this country. Can the minister assure the House that Canada will issue a commemorative stamp to mark the occasion?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for getting his bid in for a commemorative stamp for 1978. I can assure him that his request will be given due consideration along with the many other requests I have on my desk of a similar nature.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED ADDITIONAL AID TO THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES IN THE FORM OF OIL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that the minister has put himself above politics, I wonder if he has had time to examine a suggestion I made about a month ago that Canada take the lead in adding oil as a new dimension to our foreign aid programs to help relieve the balance of payments difficulties of the underdeveloped world?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat offended at the suggestion that I have risen above politics! I want to assure the hon. member that I have given consideration to his suggestion but have concluded that oil would not be a suitable commodity for aid purposes and that probably it would be in our best interests to rely on commodities in which we have a comparative advantage over other suppliers.

PROPOSED OPERATION OF CAPE BRETON COAL MINES BY CONSORTIUM—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON PROPOSED STEEL COMPLEX

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who reports to the House for the Cape Breton Development Corporation. May I ask if he or any officials of his department or the government have held discussions with the Nova Scotia government on the possibility of the Cape Breton coal mines being turned over to a company or consortium of companies to operate them?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker, there have been no discussions of the nature outlined by the hon. member. I am aware, of course, that a proposal has been discussed at some non-governmental meetings. Indeed, I made reference to it as recently as this morning in conversation with Premier Regan but there is not any substance to it in terms of immediate action.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister to tread very softly on that point. Is he aware that the Nova Scotia minister of finance is quoted as having said in New York that coal mines in Cape Breton will be operated by a consortium in connection with a possible new steel company? Can the minister assure the House that, as he promised, he will release the report of Canstel on the proposal for a steel complex? I realize that the Prime Minister has said that when members of this House get a few yards away from the Hill we are nobodies, but I do not think the minister holds that view so would he make sure that this House is advised of any proposals of such a nature?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to reply briefly. Let me say without any qualification that we have not in any sense discussed any change in the status of Devco or the coal mining operation either with Devco or the government of Nova Scotia. The only reference to it was a passing one during a recent meeting. I was not aware there was one in New York but I did know such a comment had been made. On the question of the Canstel report, I am prepared to table it at the earliest possible time but there are two restrictions. One is the translation which is necessary under the House rules, and the other is deletion of—I do not think it is important, but nevertheless it is confidential information. I hope to do that within a week or ten days, as soon as the translators are through.

URANIUM—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF MAINTENANCE OF ADEQUATE SUPPLIES FOR CANADIAN NEEDS

Mr. Ross Milne (Pell-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, perhaps I can put a question to his parliamentary secretary. Concerns have been expressed recently about the adequacy of uranium resources in many countries of the world, particularly the United States. Can the hon. member assure the House that there are adequate supplies of uranium in Canada and will Canada protect her own long term needs in view of the fact that some very lucrative long term contracts are likely to become available?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that there are adequate supplies for the present nuclear generating capacity. It is recognized, however, that the demand for uranium will increase fourfold or sixfold in the next decade. That is why the government last month announced its policy of requiring that ongoing reserves be maintained for domestic reactors for 30 years.

SUGGESTED CONSULTATIONS WITH QUEBEC ON PROGRAM FOR BEEF PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the very difficult situation of the Quebec beef producers, and since the Quebec Minister of Agriculture,

Mr. Toupin, has disclosed yesterday what he intends to do in this respect and since the measure contemplated is far from being sufficient to allow those producers to operate at full capacity next winter due to the high cost of grain, could the hon. minister advise us whether he intends to communicate with Mr. Toupin in order to develop a real federal-provincial assistance policy in favour of those producers which would allow them to survive and maintain their production levels?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have just seen the program that the minister of agriculture for the province of Quebec has stated he is going to put into force and I think it is one of the best in Canada aimed at aiding farmers or cow-calf operators at the present time. The hon. member will have to be patient and wait to see what I am going to do.

PROPOSALS TO PROVINCES FOR CONTROL OF MEDICAL COSTS—GOVERNMENT INTENTION

In view of the fact that the provinces have recently turned down the federal government proposals for controlling the cost of medicare and health care, I want to know whether the minister intends to meet the provincial authorities in the near future to solve that problem as soon as possible.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am to meet the health ministers early in 1975. Now, I am not sure whether that matter will be on the agenda which has not yet been drawn up definitively with my colleagues. Naturally, the review of cost sharing has been discussed at length in the past few years and at least several more months of discussion will probably be required before we can ascertain whether there are better solutions to the present situation for improving health services.

POSITION OF REGIONAL AGREEMENTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the keen interest shown yesterday by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Liberal backbenchers in the crisis in the forest industry facing Canada today, particularly in British Columbia, will the minister tell the House what stage his discussions with that province have reached subsequent to the umbrella agreement signed on March 28, and how are the regional agreements coming along?

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is possible for me to go into full details in the time available. I may say that from our point of view we are most anxious to conclude these agreements, particularly those relating to areas of the hon. member's concern, as quickly as possible. Within recent weeks we have instituted further talks with the government of British Columbia, in an attempt to speed up this process. For our part, we are ready to go ahead quickly and I will be prepared to sign as soon as the documentation is completed. Largely, however, the question itself at this period of time will probably have to be answered by the government of British Columbia.

[Later:]

Mr. Leggatt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, earlier today I directed a question to the government House leader in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As that minister is now present in the House, I wonder if he could be given an opportunity to answer my question, which is of some importance.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE FRANCOPHONE IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the statement the minister made on motions last week respecting new regulations for immigration, what new steps is the department taking to recruit French speaking immigrants?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question in a reply to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I indicated that we are working in a co-operative fashion with the government of Quebec to establish offices and other facilities in Francophone countries. These will work with our officers abroad and will encourage, recruit and search out Francophone immigrants who wish to come to this country, but all of this will be done within the constraints of the regulations which are applicable to all prospective immigrants, no matter from what source.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED BOYCOTT OF POSTAL CODE BY EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE GRIEVANCES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Postmaster General. Because of my sympathy for the problems of post office employees, I am wearing one of their boycott buttons. I referred to these earlier this week in the House. I want to assure the minister that a boycott of the postal code by postal employees is in progress. My question is this: Is the minister now prepared to take steps to overcome the grievances of postal workers in this respect, perhaps by suggesting some alteration to the code system, or are we to assume that the minister is content with general mail delivery in Canada?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, if there is any boycott of the postal code in Toronto, it is not reflected in the efficiency figures for Toronto. Second, it is difficult to straighten out these problems so long as there is not a union with which I can bargain. Third, I am glad the hon. member identified the button, because when he first stood up I thought he was advertising a new athletic support.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED TABLING OF CONTINGENCY PLAN TO DEAL WITH OIL SPILLS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Some time ago I asked the minister to table in this House a copy of contingency plans for spills of oil on the west coast. I have in my hand a document entitled "Joint Canada-United States Marine Pollution Contingency Plan for Spills of Oil and Other Noxious Substances". Is this the document which the minister said at the time was difficult to table?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed difficult to table a contingency plan because it is difficult to know what plans are to be implemented before we know the nature of the accident.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Sauvé: These plans are contained in our retrieval system. If the hon. gentleman is interested, I can get from that retrieval system the information he requests.

TWO-PRICE WHEAT ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR PAYMENTS FOR WHEAT PRODUCED AND SOLD IN CANADA FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-19, to provide for payments in respect of wheat produced and sold in Canada for human consumption in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I was unable to conclude my remarks on this bill last night and am pleased to have this further opportunity to speak. I wonder how this bill, if passed, would stand up in court if the competition bill presented by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) becomes law. Misrepresentations have been made concerning this bill, and in the next few minutes I propose, for the benefit of producers and consumers, to reveal facts and figures which will show exactly what is taking place.

The minister suggested—this is significant—that this bill, once passed, will keep bread prices down by five cents a loaf. The consumer will benefit, according to the minister. He did not say that the Canadian producer of Red Spring wheat—that is, the producer in western Canada and, to some degree, in Ontario—is to subsidize the price of bread to the tune of three cents a loaf. The bill does not mention this fact, either. We must recognize that the western grain producer has just emerged from one of his most difficult periods in history because of low selling prices of wheat.

The recent strike of grain handlers on the west coast may not have affected very much the amount of grain used domestically in Canada, but it did affect the economic well-being of the grain producer. During that strike the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, who is supposed to protect and work for the interests of producers, told western Canadian farm organizations to settle the strike with the grain handlers' union on the basis of the Perry report. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had also thrown their weight behind that report. Clearly, the minister was trying to get his colleagues off the hook. The prairie producer is to be commended for not taking the bait of the minister.

Now the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) is on the hook because the government forced the producers to settle for a 61 per cent increase to the grain handlers and Treasury Board is now offering 16 per cent to the grain inspectors who work for them. These men work side by side. I wish to quote a few facts from the August 28 edition of the Montreal Star, as follows:

> Put into annual terms, the conciliation board report calls for a base pay increase from $10,316 a year to $12,126 next year and to $13,478 the following year.

In addition to that, there is a cost of living index, plus a pension benefit. This runs to about $17,000 or $18,000. With regard to the income of producers, the article states:

Wheat Payments

Even in 1973, which by no stretch of the imagination can be regarded as a normal year, average net income of Alberta farmers was about $12,100; and of Saskatchewan farmers about $12,500.

In 1972, a more typical year, average net income of Alberta farmers was about $5,600; and of Saskatchewan farmers about $5,400. And the average was lower in 1971 and 1970.

The figures for the producers do not include pension benefits. The figures for the grain handlers do. Therefore, there is a vast difference. Approximately 8½ cents worth of flour, including milling costs, goes into a 24-ounce loaf of bread. At the present time, bread sells for between 40 and 48 cents a loaf, depending on whether it is a private brand or a name brand. In the last year, direct labour cost in the production of bread increased between 17 and 18 per cent. Unless the government is prepared to bring inflation under control, this type of increase will continue year after year; there will be no end to it.

The profits of the bakeries run from zero to 1½ per cent. That is not a great profit. We cannot condemn the bakeries for what they are doing; they are caught up in a series of regulations which are prescribed by government officials and they are being buried under the load. They have great difficulty dealing with these regulations. The cost of packaging, which the modern housewife demands, is up 84 per cent over last year. In addition, I understand that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is demanding a list, in percentages, of all the ingredients in a loaf of bread. This adds to the cost to the consumer.

On one hand we are trying to do something for the consumer; on the other the government negates that policy by adding controls, regulations and restrictions which increase the cost to the consumer. I mentioned recently in the House that the policy of this government is causing a great deal of hardship to the business economy of Canada. This is an example. Rather than list all the ingredients of the product and their percentages, it would be far better if the government set up a nutrition information bank where information would be available for persons with allergies. There could be a data centre in Ottawa which a person could call to obtain all the details of a product. The bakeries do not criticize the policy that this information should be listed somewhere, but they recognize that it costs a lot of money to do it. This cost ultimately must be borne by the consumer under the present system.

Some consumers can afford to pay a little more for a loaf of bread. In Canada today there is a vast majority who make more money than the producer. They enjoy the benefit of the three-cent subsidy which the western producer in many cases can ill-afford. In my constituency we grow some of the best wheat in Canada. We can grow number one CW wheat most years. Land is selling in the vicinity of $500 an acre. This is not because industry is trying to buy up the land; it is foreign-controlled money which is purchasing this land. The prairie grain producer has to compete with this type of financing.

Production costs have gone up. The costs of fertilizer, machinery and labour have increased. There does not seem to be any end to the rise in the cost of production for western producers. In my constituency it costs approximately $50 an acre to put in and take off crop. If land is worth $500 an acre, and the interest rate is 10 per cent, that amounts to an additional $50 per acre. This means the producer has a $100 cost per acre. He must recover this amount before he receives any return for himself.

[Mr. Towers.]

The cost of repairs is up 30 per cent, and the cost of machinery is up 30 per cent. Not long ago I spoke to a farmer who had just purchased a new swather. It was ordered and delivered in October. On November 1, the price of that type of swather will increase to $12,000, an increase of 30 per cent. Tractor and combines prices have increased to the point where they now cost between $25,000 and $35,000. While the operator in western Canada may have a great deal of wealth, he does not have the opportunity to make use of the return on that wealth because it is invested in his property. He cannot enjoy its benefit until he retires or sells his farm.

There is no guarantee that the western Canadian producer will have a large crop each year. The minister knows very well that for the past three years crops have been getting smaller and smaller. I am sure the minister will agree that crops in western Canada this year will be of lower quality and quantity than at any time in the past ten years. The average yield in the western Canadian Wheat Board area was 25 bushels per acre last year.

The price of wheat is good at the present time. As I mentioned in the debate yesterday, it is $6.20 per bushel, which means that the farmer will break even, and possibly come out with a small profit. But there is no guarantee. The farmer has to face many obstacles, and when the government imposes restrictions and regulations which are hard to deal with, many problems are created. The western Canadian farmer likes to produce. He recognizes there are approximately 3.9 billion people in the world and that the world population increases by 80 million each year. He recognizes the need to produce more and more as the years go by, if people are to be fed. The average Canadian eats 190 pounds of cereal a year, in one form or another. In India, people eat approximately 300 pounds. But the 190 pounds consumed by Canadians is supplemented by the extra protein we are fortunate to obtain from our red meat diet.

We must never take anything for granted. This is why I am concerned about the manner in which the minister has presented this bill. There has been no attempt to protect the western farmer against escalating costs of production. No provision is made for an increase in the price of wheat used for domestic use. I suggest there are people better able to pay this three-cent subsidy on a loaf of bread than is the producer. We recognize there are people in low income brackets who need assistance. I assure the minister that the western producer is a compassionate person who would not let anyone go hungry if he could prevent it. At the same time, he wants a fair shake.

I trust the minister will accept the amendment we intend to propose at the committee stage in order to afford the producer the protection he so vitally needs, because unless the government is prepared to do something to control inflation, the sky is the limit. The producer has to be protected as well as the consumer.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, in addressing myself to this bill I intend to be brief. I begin by saying that my colleagues and I support the legislation in principle and, indeed, with some degree of self-satisfaction since it embodies an idea which was put forward by my party in the mid-thirties, as it relates to a minimum price, and since the early fifties as it relates to the two-price system. Thus, we feel some satisfaction that even after so many years the government should have come around to our view.

I recall that famous Liberal rally which was held in 1965 in the skating rink at Humboldt, attended by the prime minister of the day, Mr. Pearson, and an unlamented former member of the CCF, presently in the other place. The promise was made, then, of a two-price system and of a base price related to the cost of production. But nothing happened until two years ago when the industry was faced with a somewhat unusual situation and, incidentally, the government party was in a minority position in parliament. Anyway, the principle has at last been accepted, and even though the bill we are considering may be considered inadequate by some of us, a beginning has been made.

I recall the discussion which went on during consideration of the first grain stabilization bill the minister in charge of the Wheat Board brought down. This was one of the conditions we put forward for supporting that measure—a guaranteed price and a two-price system. At that time, the minister turned us down, but today he has come at least some distance toward accepting the point of view we then put forward.

Perhaps I could make one or two suggestions which in my view would make the legislation better and enable the minister to provide wheat growers with greater security. First, I would direct this question to the hon. gentleman: why just wheat? The minister has now come around to believing it is logical to give growers a fair price and a two-price system for bread wheat and Durum which is consumed in Canada by human beings. Surely it would be logical to extend this to other grains—oats, barley, rye, flax, rapeseed, sunflower seed, etc. The principle should be extended. I hope the minister, and his colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), will persuade their cabinet colleagues that this is a logical extension. There is good reason for doing so now, while we are at it.

Since Canadians consume only a relatively small percentage of those commodities I have mentioned, it would not involve massive expenditures, though it would afford a modicum of protection by way of guaranteed floor prices for those who produce these commodities. I hope the minister will bring in an amendment to this effect at the committee stage. If this is too much to hope, I trust he will at least discuss the matter with his colleagues and seek to have the legislation extended to cover other grains.

Then there is the other point, which is the desirability of providing an escalator clause or method of indexing the floor price in order to take into account increasing costs of production. It seems to me that if Statistics Canada, the farm organizations or the minister's own research people, establish that there had been an increase of 3, 4 or 5 per cent in cost of production in a given year, it is only fair that an increase of this nature should be reflected in the floor price. I hope the minister will consider bringing in an amendment of his own so as to incorporate an indexing clause of that kind in the legislation. This would at least see us through for six years, and when the legislation comes close to terminating we can always wrestle over it again. It is not a matter of setting a precedent. It would merely be an extension into the field of agriculture of a principle—a good one in my opinion—which has already been adopted in other areas.

I was disappointed that the minister was not more explicit in his introductory remarks. I wish he had included figures to show people in urban Canada, particularly in the east, how much these various agricultural programs are costing. Since he did not, I should like to put on record some examples of what is involved. For example, if the world price for wheat is, say, $5, then the farmer receives $5 from the Wheat Board, the miller pays $3.25 and the federal treasury pays the other $1.75. The public should know, Madam Speaker, that if the board's asking price is $5 and the world price, as was the case last Friday, is $6.04⅝ a bushel for 1 CW, 13½ per cent protein wheat, this means that the farmer is subsidizing Canadian consumers to the tune of $1.04⅝ a bushel. I have not found a single farmer, either in my constituency or elsewhere in western Canada, who is complaining about that at all. But I hope the rest of the people of Canada realize that were the situation left to the whim of the so-called open market, to world demand and so forth, it would cost them more for bread wheat than is the case under this legislation. This is something of a sacrifice that the wheat producers of the three prairie provinces are making and, as I say, I hope the people of Canada understand and appreciate that fact.

Let me take a further example. If the board's asking price for hard wheat is $4, and the same grain is sold in Canada for human consumption, then the farmer receives $4, the millers pay $3.25, but the government pays only 75 cents instead of $1.75, which means a reduction in cost to the Canadian taxpayer. A third example: the world price drops to $2.50; the farmers still receive $3.25, the millers pay $3.25 and the cost to the government of Canada is nothing. Only in that instance would the guaranteed floor price have any meaning or effect; it applies only when the world price drops below $3.25 a bushel.

Similarly with Durum wheat. Again, the farmer receives $7.50 a bushel for 1 CW Durum, basis Thunder Bay, the miller pays $5.75 and the government pays the other $1.75. The world price last Friday was $7.61⅝—not a large amount, but nevertheless 11⅝ cents per bushel that the Canadian farmer was giving up for the benefit of the consumers of Canada. I hope this is also made known to the Canadian public so it can be appreciated. The Durum wheat producers in western Canada are not complaining about this sacrifice either. If the world price goes to $6.75, the farmer receives $6.75, the miller pays $5.75 and the government payment drops from $1.75 to $1. So there is a provision reducing the cost to the federal treasury. If the world price were $5, then the farmers would get $5, the millers would pay $5 and the cost to the federal treasury would be nil.

Now we come to the crunch, Madam Speaker, and it is a point about which I want to argue with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. If at any time between now and the end of July, 1980, a six-year period, the world price of 1 CW Durum, basis Thunder Bay, drops to $2.50, for example, then the farmer receives, not $5.75 but $3.25, the miller pays $3.25 and the cost to the national treasury is nil. But in that instance the farmer has lost $2.50 on the floor price that was in effect, and would continue to lose it so long as the world price for 1 CW Durum remained that low. In other words, in reality the floor price for both hard wheat and Durum is $3.25, although when one looks at the legislation it looks as though the floor price of Durum is $5.75. But it is a mythical floor because once Durum drops below $5.75 a bushel, the floor price drops with it down to $3.25.

I must say I do not understand the reasoning for this. With only the odd exception in a crop year over the last 12 or 15 years or so, Durum has always been of higher value than hard wheat, costing anywhere from 25 cents to $3 more per bushel. I do not know why the minister insists on having a $3.25 floor for both Durum and hard wheat when this has not been the practice or the history in the past. I hope the minister will bring in an amendment of his own in committee which will provide that there be a higher floor for Durum than for hard wheat. If he does not want to stick with the $5.75, we can always argue what is appropriate; but I think it is appropriate that there be a higher floor for Durum than for hard wheat.

We may never have to use it, Madam Speaker. If world prices stay up during the six years, we will never have to use it. But in case the world price for Durum does drop drastically between now and 1980, and if the economists who are predicting a depression are right, then we should be prepared for it. I contend the minister would be well advised to bring in an amendment to the legislation providing for a higher floor price for Durum in the event of a drastic drop in the world price.

In regard to both the direct and indirect subsidy to the consumers of bread, I think it is incumbent upon the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), to get together and see to it that we do a much more accurate job of monitoring the subsidies and of ascertaining whether or not they do reach the consumer. This matter was raised during the question period today with both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I do not think it is by any means settled.

In my opinion, the subsidy on powdered skim milk is not being passed on to the consumer, and has not been passed on in the past year or so. Mrs. Plumptre says that it has not been passed on, and the Retail Council of Canada admits it. In fact, they have told their members that they have no obligation to pass it on. Surely the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, and the Minister of Agriculture, are not going to allow themselves to be "had" in that manner. It is time for them to get tough. I know they are both tough people, and when the going gets tough it is time for tough people to get going.

Mr. Whelan: You have been reading my speech.

Mr. Benjamin: I am sorry, but I have not read the minister's speech. Incidentally, that phrase is one that Woodrow Lloyd used for years. As far as government monetary intervention in the economy is concerned, unless and until we have proper monitoring through legislative authority, and the will to enforce that authority to ensure that monetary intervention by the national government does reach the consumer, the situation will not be satisfactory. If we do not do that, all we will have done is fatten the pocket-books of those who do not need it. We will have helped neither the farmer nor the consumer.

● (1540)

It is a "must" that the benefits of this monitoring and these rigorous requirements are reaped by the consumers. If the minister in charge of the Wheat Board fails to accede to that suggestion in respect of the price of bread, flour and pastries, then I submit there will be a misuse of public funds. I hope the Minister of Agriculture, in the areas in which he is responsible and in which there is monetary intervention by his department in respect of various agricultural products, will see to it that these subsidies reach the consumer.

We are not interested in the arguments or any warfare that is going on between the Minsiter of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Let them have all the arguments they want. But when they are through, I hope there is a co-operative effort by the departments concerned, and the Food Prices Review Board, with effective machinery put into place quickly not only to ensure but to require that these subsidies reach the consumer. Otherwise, this is nothing but an exercise in futility.

I wish to repeat my main argument and contention to the minister, reminding him again of the loss of $2.50 in the floor price for 1 CW Durum in the event there is a drop in the world market. I plead with the minister to take this into account. I hope he will have the opportunity to comment on this question later today. Failing that, I hope he will at least bring in an appropriate amendment when the bill reaches committee. I am pleased to say that we support in principle this legislation.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Madam Speaker, in order to speak to this bill one certainly needs to have a forked tongue, as there are in this bill principles with which one can agree, but many shortcomings which leave a great deal to be desired. When the minister introduced the bill, he suggested that it envisaged a two-price system for grain and wheat. The fact is, that is simply not the case. First of all, it does not apply to all grains, and it really does not apply to all wheats. It refers to those wheats which are sold for use and consumption in Canada. Obviously, this means it applies to those wheats that are used for the milling of such commodities as macaroni, bread and pastries. That constitutes about 10 per cent of the grain consumed in Canada. This means that we are talking about a two-price system for 10 per cent of Canadian milling wheat. That, of course, is not a two-price system and falls far short of what the minister suggested.

More importantly, while it is assumed to be a bill—as the minister mentioned—that will offer a subsidy to the consumer, in fact it will not do that either. The fact is that the cost of wheat has very little to do with the cost of bread. When we consider what is comprised in the cost of bread, we all know that wheat must go through the milling, baking, packaging and marketing processes before it reaches the kitchen. Of every $1 we spend on bread in supermarkets, the wheat farmer receives about 15 cents. This means that on a hypothetical 25-cent loaf, the farmer receives about 3½ cents. Therefore, if the farmer were giving his wheat away, it would still cost us 21½ cents for that loaf of bread. Controlling the price of wheat will have almost nothing to do with subsidizing the consumer because that is not where control is required. Control in respect of bread prices must really relate to all other processes; it must relate to labour, baking, transportation and, finally, the supermarkets and their profit.

While I commend the minister for his intention to introduce a two-price system, this bill falls far short of the objective he outlined in support of it. I should also like to comment on the floor price of $5 starting in 1974 and continuing to 1980. The unfortunate situation is that this puts the farmer into a six-year period during which the government establishes what the price will be. I cannot think of anything more frightening or dangerous to the farming community or the producer of food than such an established rate being written into the legislation.

We have all witnessed what has happened in the oil industry in the past few years, with the tremendous increases that have taken place in the price of a barrel of crude oil. When we look at the indicators on the international scene, which can reflect on the price of grain, we see many things which indicate that the price of wheat will in fact increase. Let us look at some of the indicators which show that grain will go up in price. First of all, if we were, hypothetically, to divide all the food of the world among all people, we would find there would be barely enough carbohydrates to go around, and not enough protein. That is the situation at the present time. With the increase in world population, this means we will be falling increasingly further behind in meeting this need.

Let us take India as an example. In that country there are some 77 million more human mouths to feed each year. That is four times the present population of Canada. We must remember that figure in light of the fact that at the present time Canada is expecting a decrease in its grain yield, the United States will have something less than a quarter of its corn production, and the Soviet Union is barely holding its own. We are looking at something like 30 million tons of cereal grain less on the world market this year, so the situation is extremely critical.

Let us couple that situation with the fact that, with the shortage of petroleum and its very high cost, the production of nitrogen fertilizer is very much restricted. This means that we will have more people in need of more food. With all the inputs, including inflation and the cost of farm machinery, this means the price of wheat on the international market is bound to go up. Then we look at this bill and see that it locks in, for a period of six years, the price of wheat to be sold in Canada. If I were a grain producer in Canada today, I would be extremely concerned because unless there is an amendment to this legislation, this means a six-year freeze on the wheat producing people. I would simply ask, who would accept a six-year freeze on any other industry? Certainly the banker would not accept that his interest rates be fixed for six years. Farm machinery producers would not accept that their prices be fixed for six years. Those who produce the tires, chemicals and other things required in agriculture would not accept a six-year freeze.

It is crucially important that this bill be amended so that there is some kind of relationship between the payments and the cost of production. If there is no such relationship, I think this is a tremendous insult to the producer of food. There is, in fact, nothing that is more important in the world today than giving a feeling of professionalism and encouragement to those who produce food at an ever increasing rate.

There is one other aspect of this bill that I think must be taken into account, and that is the following statement on page 3:

—this act together with interest thereon at a rate per annum fixed by order of the Minister of Finance for the period commencing with the first day after the end of the month—

First of all, this means that the farmer is, by a two-price system, really getting his money, not in terms of a subsidy but in two payments. It is his money, and this just means he gets his second payment later. The fact that it is his money means it is on loan to the government. I think it is important, then, that he not be treated as he has traditionally and given an insignificant amount of interest for that money, but that he be given interest at the regular lending rate. Why should farmers support the federal government, which should at least be able to pay lending rates for money?

The other thing I question is—again, I think it is an insult to those who want to see a professional approach to agriculture—why we are waiting 30 days? The fact is that on a fairly major shipment of grain, 30 days could add up to a considerable sum in interest. Also, I think it is important to note that here again, if you were to borrow money from a bank for 30 days; you would have to pay for that money from the very beginning. This should apply in all cases. Calculations do not start on the first day of the following month, because this would mean that those who sold on the 1st or the 2nd of the month would have given up that payment for a full 30 days before interest began.

It is obvious, then, that if we want to create an environment in which we encourage the producers of grain to produce much more extensively than in the past, they must receive proper rewards for their efforts. If we are to meet the food shortages that exist in the world, then obviously producers of grain should be given the kind of rewards that match those of any other industry. I say that the bill before us does not treat agriculture as an industry, but as something that is subservient to the rest of society, inasmuch as the interest rates are not to be as high or given as freely, and there is no real relationship between the cost of production of grain and the amount which the farmer receives.

We might stay on that subject for just a moment. I should like to point out that very recently this House considered legislation dealing with the west coast grain handlers strike. At that time, the principal argument of the government was that the west coast grain handlers should have parity with the longshoremen working on the same docks. May I ask that if the government accepts that argument, then why not accept a similar argument for agriculture? Why is it that the farmer who takes financial risks on his investment, who gambles with weather, who gambles with pests and insects, and who gambles with fluctuating markets, is not given some kind of guarantee that would be equal to the one given to an unskilled worker who simply unloads ships? Why are producers not given cost of living adjustments, as were the grain handlers who were working next to the longshoremen? If we are to give parity to those who unload grain, then let us lock in some kind of guarantee for those who assume all the responsibility for the production of grain.

So although in principle I agree with the notion of a two-price grain system, I will summarize by saying, first of all, that this is not a two-price system for wheat because it does not affect all the wheat that will be used in this country. Second, it is not really a valid two-price system because it bears no relation to the cost of production. Also, it is an insult to the agricultural industry because the bill does not provide a guarantee to pay a proper interest rate from the moment at which the farmer has loaned his money. So on those points I suggest that, while we can certainly accept the notion of a two-price wheat system, it needs the characteristics that I have outlined before this legislation can become acceptable not only to ourselves but to the farmers; the producers of cereal grains, which are so badly needed in a hungry world.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, as a member representing a large wheat producing area in Saskatchewan, I am pleased to participate in this debate. Farming is one of the most important industries in our country and it is becoming more and more important because of the demand for food in the world today. We have an increasing world population, and we have famine around the world. I read in an editorial of today's issue of the Globe and Mail that in Bangladesh between 70,000 and 80,000 deaths from hunger are already reported in the Rangpur district. The report goes on to say that the most conservative estimates by foreign diplomats foresee at least one million deaths from famine as an aftermath of this year's floods. The United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization considers 32 countries, with a total population of 700 million, threatened by starvation this year. This is why food production is important.

We have reduced production on the prairies this year. In the spring we were faced with flooding, which resulted in late seeding. During the summer we had an extremely dry season, and we had an infestation of grasshoppers which we were unable to control with the chemicals available to farmers. It appears that we may have a severe infestation of grasshoppers next year, which again will curtail production. We had a wet fall, and a very early frost, which resulted in low yields and very low grades. So it is very important that we develop our agricultural industry.

It was indicated in the Speech from the Throne that a number of bills relating to agriculture would be presented before this session is over. The bill with which we are dealing today, Bill C-19, is one such bill. Reports that have come in from Edmonton from the Canada Grains Council meeting on Monday indicate that perhaps legislation dealing with the reduction of the Crownest pass freight rates will be coming before us very shortly. It would appear that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board wishes to do away with this concession to the western grain producers. I gather from newspaper reports that he suggests that the Crownest pass freight rates are unfair to the railways. When I read the report, I wondered whether the minister had studied the history of the Crowsnest pass freight rates. Originally the rates were not a concession to the prairie farmers; they arose as the result of an agreement or contract between the government of Canada and CPR.

Mr. Lang: Madam Speaker, may I rise on a point of order? I am sure that in due course we will all want to have a discussion on the very important matter of the Crowsnest pass freight rates and the benefits which they provide to the prairie provinces; but it does not seem to me that this subject has any relationship to the bill before us. I wonder if the hon. member would assist us in getting this bill through to committee, so that we can help prairie producers in this way. Then we could get on to the next bill as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker, there are mills on the west coast as well as in the east, and the Crowsnest pass freight rates have to do with mills on the west coast. Therefore, I feel they have a certain bearing on the bill in question. But I will be very brief in my comments regarding them, and then I will go on to the bill.

● (1600)

I should like to point out that the contract between the government of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway gave to the railway, among other things, a monopoly on rail traffic in Alberta south of the city of Calgary. It approved the purchase by the Canadian Pacific Railway of the B.C. Southern Railway and the Columbia Western system, including 270,000 acres of land and a smelter at Trail, B.C., at a cost of $800,000. By grants, options and other means, the CPR acquired some 3,350,000 acres of land with mineral rights, and six square miles of valuable coal land near the Crowsnest pass. As far as the Crowsnest pass freight rates are concerned, they are not a concession to the western farmer; they were a contract entered into between the government of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Lest I be accused of digressing, as I already have been, Madam Speaker, I will move back to discussion of Bill C-19. What is the effect of this legislation? The bill deals with both Canada Red Spring wheat and Durum wheat used for domestic consumption. Under the bill, the millers of Canada pay $3.25 per bushel for No. 1 Canada Red Spring wheat of 13.5 per cent protein, basis Thunder Bay. If the world price exceeds $3.25 per bushel, then the treasury—by that I mean the government of Canada, with the taxpayers' money—pays the difference between the $3.25 and the $5. If the world price exceeds $5 a bushel, as it has and as it is likely to remain for the foreseeable future, then the producer subsidizes the consumer for the excess.

In other words, if the world wheat price is in the neighbourhood of $6 a bushel, as it is today, the producer is subsidizing the consumer of Canada by approximately $1 per bushel, and as the price goes up so does the subsidy by the producer. The program for Durum wheat is similar, except that the base price is $5.75, with the treasury paying the difference between that and the maximum of $7.50 per bushel. Again, if the price of wheat on the world market exceeds $7.50 a bushel, the producer subsidizes the consumer for the excess.

I will say, Madam Speaker, that the bill is an improvement over the previous arrangement. Originally, the two-price system was an acreage payment and was paid no matter whether or not the farmer produced a bushel of wheat. He could have produced feed grains, forage crops—anything—but as long as he had acreage under cultivation he received an acreage payment. I recall speaking to a farmer who had retired and had rented his land in the fall to someone who had never farmed. The tenant applied for a permit book at the beginning of November and moved on to the farm. Under the two-price system he received an acreage payment in the spring of the year—before he had ever planted or produced a bushel of wheat. So I say, again, that this legislation is an improvement over the program we had in the past.

The situation with respect to special permit holders was also a mess. These were the people who had produced wheat for a number of years and then sold their farms but had grain on hand to dispose of. They could sell it by special permit. After waiting a year and a half, the two-price payment to these special permit holders was recently made. It was a real mess. Some 9,586 producers were entitled to payment, and the cheques to the special permit holders were mailed out just prior to July 8 this year. That made 9,586 people relatively happy. Whether the mailing date had some bearing on the election, I do not know; but it has been common practice over the years in Saskatchewan that prior to a federal election the farmers have received a payment of some kind—an acreage payment, a dry-out bonus, or something. That has been the history of the party on the opposite side of the House.

But what happened in this case? A week after the election, 7,529 recipients of those cheques received letters telling them that they had been overpaid, and demanding a refund. In some cases, up to 80 per cent was demanded. The minister claims the computer made a mistake, but it seems to me it was a deliberate Liberal mistake.

Madam Speaker, my party agrees with the principle of this bill, but it still requires improvement. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), and several others, have suggested an amendment to index the initial and top price. I agree with this suggestion, and unless the minister brings in such an amendment in committee it is the intention of this party to do so.

I have two further comments with respect to the bill. In the interpretation section, a producer is described as a person actually engaged in the production of wheat. I feel this is unfair. There are many farmers in Saskatchewan of retirement age who have rented their farms and are dependent upon the rental income. It seems to me that the interpretation of "producer" should be widened to include the landlord as well as the tenant. I brought this matter to the attention of the minister this spring in connection with payments under the two-price system, and he looked at it with a certain amount of sympathy in committee. But I note this matter was not taken into consideration when the bill was drafted.

Another thing that concerns me is the method of payment under the two-price system. I had occasion to question the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, in the miscellaneous estimates committee on Wednesday, October 16. From this it was determined that payments will be made only to producers of No. 1 Canadian Red Spring wheat. Madam Speaker, there is not very much No. 1 Canadian Red Spring wheat produced in the province of Saskatchewan, or in any of the prairie provinces, for that matter. It is restricted to certain areas which vary from year to year.

This means that conceivably when the price of No. 1 wheat on the world market exceeds $5 in the case of Canadian Red Spring wheat, or $7.50 per bushel in the case of Durum wheat, it will be the restricted group of producers of that particular grain who will lose the difference, which presently is approximately $1 per bushel. In other words, when the price goes to $5, the subsidy to the consumer is not made by all grain producers in the prairies but only by those who produce No. 1 Canadian Red Spring wheat. On the other hand, if the price of wheat sinks to $3.25 a bushel or below, the price to the producer will be guaranteed, at $3.25 per bushel.

Does the minister not realize that when world prices are above the limits set in the bill these producers will be subsidizing the consumer, and when world prices are below the limits many farmers will not benefit from the guaranteed price of $3.25 a bushel? Wheat is produced in different areas from time to time. Production of milling wheat varies with climatic conditions. Some grain farmers may retire or go into other types of farming, such as livestock production, and will not benefit. This question should be looked into, as there may be some unfairness with regard to the manner in which payments are made under the system.

To sum up, we began with acreage payments under a two-price system, under which money was paid to farmers no matter what they produced. The pendulum has swung and we are adopting a new two-price system. Money passed in the 1974-75 estimates will go into the Canadian Wheat Board pool and be spread evenly among all producers of wheat. The pendulum has swung again and payment of a subsidy is to be restricted to producers of No. 1 Canadian Red Spring wheat. I will not belabour the point. We must have full discussion in committee on this bill. I hope the minister in charge of the Wheat Board will consider my comments and the comments of my colleagues and will, in committee, bring forward amendments which will make this bill beneficial and operative.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my constituency in western Canada relies heavily on the grain farmer and on the wheat farmer in particular. The legislation before us is especially significant for those of us who represent areas like mine. That is why I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I am also pleased because of the nature of this legislation. The present debate is most important and we are witnessing a truly historic moment as we deliberate upon this measure.

Today we are moving toward the enshrinement in legislation of a fundamental measure which westerners of all stripes, political and otherwise, have talked about, sought and worked for over many years. The two-price wheat program has been called for, from time to time, by almost all political parties of any standing in western Canada. The question has been raised by farm spokesmen and farm organizations. Now, two-price wheat will become reality, with the co-operation of this House, and will be enshrined in the statute books of Canada. This is indeed a great day for the western grain producer.

Let me comment briefly on remarks made by other hon. members participating in this debate. Yesterday evening, when the minister introduced this legislation, he recited the historical background which has brought us to the present measure. He outlined adequately the mechanics of the legislation, and I need not repeat what he said. Let me comment, however, on a remark made earlier today by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) who complained that this law will not introduce a true two-price system because it affects only domestic wheat for human consumption. Clearly, the intention of a two-price system is to do just that—to separate domestic and export wheat. We have talked about this for the past 30 years. One price is charged on the export market, and another on the domestic market.

An added feature of this legislation is the provision for a consumer subsidy. The treasury—ultimately the taxpayers of all Canada—will subsidize the consumer under this two-price system. Hence, when hon. members criticize this program and suggest it really does not involve a two-price system, I do not think they are being accurate. There has been much comment here today, and last night, concerning the cost of production. I sympathize here with hon. members; many of their points are valid. The cost of production relating to the producer of western Canada is a serious factor indeed. It is one which members of this House must consider carefully and deal with in due course.

We must bear several things in mind, however, when we talk about production costs being a factor in the two-price system. First, I suggest that members are inaccurate in suggesting that this bill constitutes a price freeze. I suggest that the bill provides, not for a freeze but for a broad, guaranteed range of prices. I say that because it guarantees a floor price for wheat, just as much as it does a ceiling.

Not even the most optimistic will suggest that during the next five or six years we can always expect to maintain present price levels. I know we all hope that we are beyond the days when wheat sold for $2, $1.98, $1.95, $1.50, or less. Nevertheless, we must be prepared in case the price falls. That is why this legislation is important, as it guarantees the domestic floor price for the next six years at least at $3.25. It is particularly significant to note that price. Until just a few months ago, when conditions in the world market changed, this price was beyond our wildest dreams. Yet the government is guaranteeing this price for about the next seven years: it is guaranteeing it as a floor. That makes the range we are considering very significant and important.

[Mr. Goodale.]

The new floor price adequately and fairly reflects the situation we are witnessing today on world grain markets. Projections show that between now and 1980 there will be at least one—perhaps more—downturn in grain prices. On the basis of odds alone, let alone economic projections, we can look forward, unhappily, to at least one downturn in the grain market. Therefore, a floor price is an important feature. That distinguishes this measure from one imposing a freeze, something which might have adverse effects, considering the cost of production. In short, this bill guarantees the farmer a certain price range, and a fair one.

Secondly, on this matter of taking into consideration the costs of production, if conditions change drastically, as well they may, between now and 1980, if there is a downturn in the grain market—as grain producers of western Canada realize might happen—the figure provided for in the bill can be changed by this House to keep it in line with real circumstances. My third, and most important, point concerning the cost of production is this. It has been argued that this legislation should reflect specifically costs of production. I think that kind of suggestion is somewhat inappropriate in a discussion on a two-price system for wheat.

I ask hon. members to remember this government's commitment to an over-all western grains income stabilization program. That kind of concept is not particularly new to this House. It is a firm commitment of this government that we will be proceeding with that particular legislation as quickly as possible. Indeed, a week or so ago the minister indicated to the Standing Committee on Agriculture that he hoped to have that legislation ready for introduction within perhaps a week or so now. That is very significant. We look forward to that kind of legislation. Perhaps it is a more appropriate vehicle for trying to deal with the important question of the cost of production.

The stabilization plan for western grain incomes, as we have heard from public pronouncements, will have a voluntary feature. This is very important. As well, it will be based, not upon gross grain receipts but net cash flow. That is a very significant distinction. It means the stabilization plan will have that essential link to the cost of production. The plan will not only become operative when markets or prices fall, but when costs squeeze up from the bottom and pinch the grain producer's profit margin.

I can understand the concern of members opposite about this cost of production factor: it is important. But I believe stabilization programs are a more important and a more effective vehicle for dealing with this problem. We have the assurance there will be legislation to confront the problem head-on. Probably that was the most significant comment by members opposite with regard to this legislation. Otherwise, I find that the sentiments of most members opposite are in support of the proposal put forward by the minister in this legislation.

There were comments which may have been a little off the point but nonetheless were "pointed". They concerned other factors that may, by one means or another, affect the western grain producer. There were some comments about the Crowsnest rates. The minister commented on this question in a recent speech in Edmonton. Members opposite have talked about the "destruction", "removal" or "abolition" of the benefit of the Crowsnest rates. It is important to consider what the minister said both in Edmonton and in this House with regard to questions on that point. He said the benefits of the Crow rates must be, and will be, preserved. He stated it is his intention to see they are preserved in statutory form. That is the essential point.

There is no question that the benefit of the Crow rates are to be preserved for western grain producers. That is clear. It is a fact that they will be preserved. The issue is how best to do it. Do we serve the interests of the prairie grain producers best by putting money into the coffers of the railway companies so they can spend it on industrial centres in Toronto, Halifax and elsewhere? If we want to give a benefit to the western grain producer, surely there is a more direct way of doing it. That is the question we have to face. We do not have all the answers at this stage.

It is crucial to the future interests of western grain producers that we examine where the real costs and benefits are and ensure they receive the maximum of those benefits. That is what the minister said, and that is the direction in which we should move. We should not be afraid of a bogeyman coming up at one point or another in the examination. If we are to assure the future of western agriculture, we must be prepared to examine the situation.

Finally, I wish to make a brief comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). He spoke about cheques being mailed in late May and early June in connection with the old two-price wheat program, and the cheques sent to special permit holders. There was some suggestion that that was an election plot of sorts. I had direct experience in that matter. My constituency was probably as much affected as his. The farmers in my area who were eligible for the payment received their cheques in the last week of May or the first week of June. They received a letter indicating a computer error with the cheques in the mail between the middle and the end of June, prior to the election.

Mr. Neil: Not in my constituency.

Mr. Goodale: They did in mine, and the results were rather satisfactory.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Madam Speaker, Bill C-19 makes law what has been accepted for the past year. It is just one more factor in an already overcomplicated grain industry. The tangle in the two-price payment for special permit holders brought literally dozens of letters from my area. It is something people just do not understand. What is desperately needed in our grain industry is confidence, not something to add to the confusion. The minister said this bill will enshrine the two-price system for seven years. That is a long time. As my colleagues have pointed out, consideration must be given to indexing.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) talked about a small group of producers who will carry the whole load of subsidizing the bread consumers of this country. It is the producers who deliver the high quality milling wheat, 1 CW Red Spring, 13.5 per cent. The subsidy these producers are now carrying is over $1 a bushel. This year the load will fall on producers in southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan, the only producers of high quality milling wheat to escape the frost. I do not remember a more mixed up crop as far as quality is concerned. Milling wheat is being bought and used for livestock feed and our overseas customers are becoming nervous. There is one man on the grain commission in Winnipeg who is responsible for over-all quality control. He is the chief chemist. If there has ever been a year when he is desperately needed at his desk in Winnipeg, it is this year. However, he and his family are in Quebec City on an extended French course.

The mess in which the cattle industry finds itself can be traced back to the grain conditions of a few years ago. There was no confidence in the industry. The minister and his advisers continually look backward. What we need is someone in the industry and someone in the government who will look ahead for a change. The whole idea of this legislation is to ensure that the price of bread in Canada will be lower than it would be otherwise. The minister spoke about a saving of five or six cents a loaf. My arithmetic does not confirm those figures. It is my understanding that it is possible to bake between 65 and 70 one-pound loaves from a bushel of wheat. The miller now pays $3.25 at Thunder Bay for a 60-pound bushel of wheat. This works out to 5½ cents a pound for wheat. Just over half a pound of wheat is used in a loaf. Therefore, there is not much more than three cents worth of wheat in a loaf at the present time. The government subsidy of $1.75 cannot account for more than 2½ cents a loaf. I question the need for this type of legislation, which could cost the taxpayers $60 million and the producers of high quality wheat $40 million for the 50 or 60 million bushels which will be used domestically.

I was surprised when the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) suggested there was only one floor price for milling wheat and Durum wheat. I understand from my reading of the bill that there are two—$3.25 for milling wheat and $5.75 for Durum wheat. I wish the minister would confirm this. I realize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre may have been a little unnerved, since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated some time ago he was at the top of a very short list in Saskatchewan.

I want to take issue with the statement made that this legislation implements a two-price system for wheat. Consider one grade of wheat, the top grade milling wheat known as 1 CW. Right now, the producer receives $2.25 a bushel at Thunder Bay through the Canadian Wheat Board. This means that 1 CW returns to the producer in my area about $2.04 a bushel, if he is lucky enough to have that grade. The miller pays $3.25 a bushel for 1 CW at Thunder Bay. It sells on the open market for $3.83 or thereabouts. The same grade is quoted at over $6 a bushel for export. Under our two-price system, 1 CW returns $5 in total to the producer. It will return about $5.50 if it is sold through the Wheat Board on the export market.

This maze of prices really has producers confused. I quote from the Alberta Grain Commission's report on feed grain prices, dated October 25, 1974, to give an idea of the range of wheat prices: Lethbridge, $3.25 to $3.60 a bushel; Medicine Hat, $3.15 to $3.40; Calgary, $3 to $4; Red Deer, $3.25 to $3.50; in the Edmonton area, up to $3.95 a bushel. It is a tragedy to see, especially this year, with the frozen crop, milling wheat going into the livestock feed market of Canada.

I have another comment on the confusion which exists in the industry. We know that the grain inspectors on the Pacific seaboard were off the job a couple of days ago; they were back at work today. Loading at Vancouver is still not up to par. On October 21, 471 cars were unloaded, for a total of just over a million bushels. They should be handling between 600 and 700 cars. October 22 was a better day; 588 cars were unloaded, totalling 1,274,000 bushels. I am in agreement with the hon. member for Moose Jaw: the minister certainly failed to instil any confidence in the grain industry when he mentioned in his speech that there might be some moderation of Crowsnest rates. The president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, commenting on the statement made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) in connection with the Vancouver situation, concluded by saying:

> The statement should have come from the Prime Minister, not a minister. The fact that a dispute between 520 grain workers and companies which represent 200,000 farmers should lead to a possible nationalization of our grain handling system is almost humorous if it were not so sad.

I like the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I quote from a publication of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool:

> Mr. Whelan told a food prices forum we simply will not have any farmers or any food produced here in Canada unless and until farmers begin to get better treatment in our society and our economy. He pointed out that if farmers get a better deal it will be consumers who will reap the real, long-term benefits.

What we need in the grain industry and in the agriculture industry generally is a dramatic new concept. It takes farmers a long time to own the land they work. Ownership of the land constitutes, in effect, their retirement plan. I do not understand why we cannot allow farmers to register their land as a retirement savings plan, take a few thousand dollars before taxation and allow them to put it into their land, rather than obliging them to turn to a trust company for a registered retirement plan and seeing their money leave the district. Such a scheme as I have suggested would encourage young people to make a start in agriculture. There is nothing wrong with starting small, but it is difficult to start small today because the Farm Credit Corporation does not recognize small units; they must be going concerns. I support the bill in principle but I hope it will be amended in some respects in committee.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, in considering Bill C-19 one has to study the concept and the purpose of the bill and ascertain whether its objectives, or intent, will actually be accomplished. In the committee dealing with the main estimates it became abundantly clear that the purpose of this bill was to bring about lower food costs for consumers in Canada. The minister said that when the world price rose above $1.95 and continued to rise, the government became concerned. When it became clear it would go to about $3.25, the price to the Canadian miller was frozen at that figure. Ministers opposite have told the country and this House, through answers to questions, that the additional $1.75 will go to the wheat farmer in the final pool payment; that is, for hard spring wheat. For Durum wheat the average is $5.75 and the final payment of $1.75 makes it $7.50.

The point I wished to establish through my questioning was that all political parties have advocated a two-price system from time to time. It is nothing new. Under the leadership of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was prime minister we introduced what was, in effect, a two-price system on an acreage basis. The concept has stood up well. But in those days the price for which the Canadian farmer was obliged to sell his wheat was unreasonably low, and the two-price system was designed substantially to increase the payment farmers would receive for wheat consumed in Canada. Farmers had to produce in an environment where the cost of production was high, and they sold it abroad at what was considered to be far too low a price, one which did not cover the cost of production.

Many parties have advocated a two-price system involving a higher price for wheat for Canadian consumption paid to the farmer over and above that paid for the same wheat internationally. Here we have a bill that firmly establishes a two-price system. Members of the government will throw out their chests and say that they are putting this system into permanent legislation. They will say, "Everyone has been advocating a two-price system, but we are the good guys who are putting it into legislation".

Let us look closely at what the government is in fact doing. The government is not establishing a two-price system that is going to bring the farmers more money. The minister himself answered this question in committee. I asked him how much, in ball-park figures, the farmers had lost so far under the system, but he hated to say. So I put it another way. I asked him how much the western farmers have subsidized Canadian consumers, per bushel, under this system so far, and he said it was hard to derive a figure because the price of wheat fluctuated a little every day. However, with a little bit of coaxing the minister arrived at the conclusion that under this legislation the Canadian farmer had already subsidized the Canadian consumer by 25 cents a bushel.

Knowing the minister in charge of the Wheat Board as I do, that figure is very low. I asked him for a ball-park figure, and that is the figure he gave. Obviously, he is used to hitting Texas leaguers; certainly he has not hit many home runs if these are the kind of figures he wants to play with. I say that the Canadian farmer is subsidizing the Canadian consumer under this legislation today by at least 50 cents a bushel. If the minister will readily admit to 25 cents, then anyone who knows politics can safely double that figure, which is a little on the conservative side.

Mr. Benjamin: It is $1 right now.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) is absolutely correct. Right now, the international price at Vancouver is over $1 more than the farmer will receive for wheat consumed in Canada, under this legislation. If we are talking about 60 million bushels, this subsidy amounts to more than $60 million. Certainly to this date the Canadian farmer has already subsidized the Canadian consumer, on the wheat consumed in Canada, by 50 cents a bushel.

The basic purpose of this legislation is to lower food costs to the consumer, not necessarily to protect the farmer. During the committee study the minister admitted that as the price of wheat went up, the government introduced a freeze because it was afraid that the price would go too high. The price did go too high, but since the price was frozen the consumers were saved from paying that high price.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre is quite right in suggesting that under Bill C-19 there is only one floor. There is a suggested floor price for Durum wheat, though $3.25 is basically the floor price for both wheats. The point I want to make is that the government is saying that so long as the price of Durum wheat stays above $5.75, this is what we will charge Canadian millers; but as soon as it goes below $5.75 on the international market, down will go this supposed floor to the Canadian farmer, to $3.25. So what we have here for one particular brand of wheat is a floating floor; as long as the international price is well above $5.75, the floor will not go down.

The minister says that we can rest assured that the floor of $3.25 will be guaranteed for a seven-year period. It does not seem to be such a great guarantee for the Durum wheat producer, so why should our farmers believe it is a floor for hard spring wheat producers when the real purpose of the bill is to lower the cost to the consumer? The purpose of the bill is not to bring about a base price for wheat so as to encourage farmers to continue to produce and to meet their cost of production; the purpose is to lower food costs.

If the price of wheat goes below $3.25 on the international market, it would be both folly and negligence on Mrs. Plumptre's part if she did not complain long and loud that the Canadian consumer was paying too much for bread. She has been a rather effective voice. All of a sudden the Minister of Justice might find himself occupied solely with the law as his arm of responsibility because he has neglected to protect the Canadian farmer through this deal that he suggests the bill establishes.

The minister has suggested that $3.25 is a good price, that it is above cost of production. When someone talks about a certain price being above cost of production in today's world, the immediate question that comes to mind is, when? Was it above cost of production yesterday, the day before yesterday, or a year ago? Will it be above cost of production tomorrow, the day after tomorrow, two years from now, or at the end of this seven-year period? Any member of this House who would guarantee that $3.25 will be above cost of production at the end of the seven-year period referred to in this bill would be quite foolish. When anyone tried to forecast the weather in my part of the country, they were described as being either a fool or a stranger. No member should be a stranger in this House now, particularly when dealing with the subject of wheat. No member should be a stranger in the House, particularly when dealing with the subject of inflation and the way goods have risen in price during the past year.

Many members who have spoken in this debate have laid stress on the rapid rise in cost of production due to cost of fertilizer, wheat sprays, farm labour and farm machinery. Some increases have been as much as 300 per cent during the past year. If this state of affairs continues, although $3.25 a bushel may have been above cost of production this year or last year, it may not be above the cost of production in the years ahead. I can see problems ahead for Canadian farmers in terms of increased costs over and above those that have already taken place for such things as fertilizer, crop sprays, labour, machinery, twine, and so on.

What else lies ahead for the farmer in the line of increased costs? If one listens carefully to what the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is saying across the country, one can well see increased trucking costs ahead for Canadian farmers in getting their wheat to Canadian millers. I do not know how many members of this House have ever trucked grain, but it is a heavy commodity, rather stable on the truck but pretty rough on tires if you truck it any distance at all, particularly in the summertime when the tires tend to get hot. There is an increase in cost which may well be ahead if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) has his way.

I can see other increases in costs ahead, too. The producer will require greater and greater capitalization. There is no doubt that if you have to truck grain greater distances, you are going to require bigger trucks. You have to buy bigger machinery all the way along in order to make farming worth while. If you are going to truck your grain 100 miles, you are not going to farm only 100 acres but 1,000 acres, to make it worth while. Therefore, the farmers will have to find huge amounts of capital in the years ahead, whether I like it, whether the Minister of Justice likes it, or whether anybody else likes it—and this will add to the cost of production.

These are increases that I see occurring during the seven-year period referred to in the legislation, and the $3.25 guaranteed floor will not cover those increases at all. The minister may say, "Yes, but the farmers are getting $5". They are getting that $5 now, though they should be getting a lot more. They should be getting $6. If the government wants to lower the price of wheat to the consumer and to keep inflation in check, then that is a political decision. That they are entitled to make. If they want to lower the price of bread, that very stable commodity, that is their prerogative. But why make the farmer subsidize the consumer to the extent of 50 cents a bushel? Right now, he is subsidizing consumers to the extent of about $1 a bushel. Why not take up the whole difference and say we will apply everything above the $3.25 figure to the Canadian producer?

The minister said in committee that the government was giving a guarantee in the event that wheat goes below that price. Any farmer today who puts any faith in that guarantee is either a fool or a stranger—and not one western farmer can be placed in either of those categories. They do not believe in governments, and they do not trust this government in particular. Therefore, they will have no faith at all in the $3.25 floor.

There is another thing that will add to the farmer's costs in the years ahead. Farmers will have to haul grain farther and they will have to build more storage facilities to store additional grain at home. If they produce more, they will haul it farther, using bigger trucks, and they will require more storage facilities at home. Many of the elevator companies will have to face a rationalization period. If the minister has his way, with something like 1,700 miles of railway track abandoned in his province of Saskatchewan—

An hon. Member: He doesn't care.

Mr. Horner: An hon. member says the minister doesn't care. I would like to think that he does, but I wonder how much he cares. In any event, I envisage a great modification and rationalization program being necessary in the grain elevator business. Over 50 per cent of the wheat in the province of Saskatchewan is handled by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, which is the farmers' own company, so this really means the money comes out of the farmer's pocket once again. This means an added cost in carrying on the farming operation.

In addition, when one thinks about hauling grain farther, one must think of the roads, and the taxes which farmers have to pay to maintain them. If anyone suggests that $3.25 covers the cost of production today, surely he cannot say that it will cover that cost tomorrow, because nothing lies ahead but increased costs.

A few years ago we heard the oft quoted phrase in the House of Commons "the cost-price squeeze" in relation to farming problems. We then had a period of six to eight months during which international prices actually shot up and went ahead of the increase in the cost of production. A few farmers were able to build up their inventories of new machinery and new equipment to assist them better in the field of agriculture. However, costs are rapidly catching up. The cost of fertilizer is up 300 per cent, the cost of crop sprays is up 300 per cent, and the cost of twine is up 300 per cent. In this context, one wonders what has happened to the price of agricultural commodities. I suggest they have not increased by a comparable amount. Statistics Canada show the index of farm prices of agricultural products for the month of June as being 211, compared to 100 for 1961. In 14 years the price of agricultural commodities has just about doubled, whereas in the last year farm production costs increased threefold. This gives some idea of the rapid increase in the cost of equipment which farmers must use.

Let me make it abundantly clear that the purpose of this bill is to bring about lower food costs for the Canadian consumer. A portion of the subsidy to bring about lower food costs is being paid by the government, which they take out of everyone's pocket, while the other portion is being paid for directly by the farmer. I suggest that the government is wrong in doing this. If it decides that politically it should lower the cost of food, then the cost of that decision should come out of the pockets of all taxpayers. While the farmer loves his brother, the great consumer, he feels no special obligation to work on his behalf. He feels he should pay his taxes and be a good citizen. But if the government makes a political decision, it should not make the farmer pay; all taxpayers should pay.

In view of the fact that according to this bill we are entering a seven-year agreement, let me establish beyond any doubt that the purpose of the bill is to lower food costs; and we do not put any trust in the $3.25 floor price, because it will come down if world prices come down. The situation has ever been thus. This government will find a way to lower it, just as it says it will lower the Durum price from $5.75 to $3.25 as soon as the international price drops below that figure.

Let us compare a similar piece of legislation in the United States. On June 20, 1973, the House of Representatives passed Bill 8860 dealing with a support program in respect of the production of various grains. That bill was not intended to lower food prices but, rather, to create a guarantee so farmers could produce enough grain. In that bill the support price changes; it is indexed to the price paid by farmers for goods and services to produce their products. Interest rates, wages, and so on, determine what that index will be. As the index goes up and as the cost of services farmers have to buy goes up, so the support price goes up. This starts off, in respect of wheat, with a support price of $2.05, to be adjusted each year through 1977.

One can go back and read the committee report to find that it was not a unanimous decision, but it was certainly a decision taken by the committee in respect of support for grain. I see nothing wrong with that indexing principle being adopted by this government in this bill, if the cost of production continues to go up and surpasses the $3.25 figure. I might point out, in respect of the $3.25 figure, that any farmer who happens to be reading today's Hansard will wonder about the figure because all he gets when he delivers his grain to the elevator today is about $2 a bushel, depending on the delivery point. We are encouraging him to believe he will receive a final payment. He will this year, but whether he will next year or the year after is difficult to determine. With the increase in the cost of transportation being borne more and more by the farmer, there will be less and less in the kitty for him.

Recently, in western Canada, the minister announced that he was going to do away with the Crowsnest pass rates. What will this mean? Let us take 100 pounds of wheat as an example. That 100 pounds of wheat moves from Regina to Vancouver at something like 26 cents. The comparable rate now used in the United States is in the neighbourhood of 96 cents. If one takes the $2 a bushel the farmer now receives at the delivery point, and chops it down by using the "Otto Lang" freight rate, that pretty well cuts up the $3 figure, without taking into account the other increases in cost of production to which I have referred. Otto has big plans which will increase the cost of production through the movement of grain. He is reluctant to allow this bill to be amended in order that indexing can be applied, allowing the $3.25 figure to go up as the cost of goods and services to the farmers go up. That is being done right now in the United States with regard to a variety of grains. I am only suggesting that it be done with wheat under this bill.

In the United States, Bill 8860 deals with wheat, corn and a number of other commodities. There is nothing new in this idea. I would not want to try to convince the minister that I am advocating anything new. It is a well established practice in grain producing areas that when you believe it is in the interest of the country to either continue or to increase production, you should at least ensure the farmer an adequate return for that portion of his production which will be used in Canada, because surely we want to make certain that farmers can cover the cost of production. That is all an indexing formula tied to the $3.25 would do.

Let us suppose that the goods and services which farmers buy compare, relatively speaking, to the rate of inflation. If the rate of inflation is 1 per cent a month, 12 per cent a year, why can the $3.25 not go up by 12 per cent next year? If the minister does not want to foist that increase on the consumers, why does he not increase the $1.75 portion that the federal government is paying, by the rate of inflation? If the minister adjusted any one of these two figures he would show the country, and the farmers in particular, that his heart is in the right place and that he understands the problem.

We farmers see one union contract after another being signed with a COLA clause embodied in it. The COLA clause became popular after it appeared in the grain handlers contract. I do not blame them. But if you look at any other negotiations that are taking place anywhere in Canada, you will see that they all ask for a COLA clause. What is a COLA clause? It is a clause that writes into the contract increases according to the rate of inflation. I see the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey), who has an understanding of labour contracts, listening. I am glad he is here and I hope he is sympathetic. All I ask is that a similar clause be written into this bill.

Farmers must be assured that subsidization to the consumers of Canada will not necessarily increase, but that the government's share will increase by the rate of inflation. The government has forced that principle upon other workers. It has forced the grain companies to pay it to the grain handlers, and it will probably include it in the contract with the grain inspectors. It is included in nearly every labour contract signed these days, whether it be with the air transport controllers or the Post Office workers.

Here we have a floor price of $3.25 being placed on wheat consumed in Canada, and another $1.75 being paid by the government. Over and above that there is the subsidization by the farmer of the Canadian consumer. So this is broken down into three categories. The purpose of this bill is to maintain a low price for bread in Canada, and I have no quarrel with that principle at all. All I am saying is that, as a farmer, I do not trust the $3.25 floor because it does not cover the cost of production today and it will not tomorrow.

What I am saying is: put a COLA clause into the legislation for the farmers. If the minister does not wish to add a COLA clause or add the cost of inflation to the $3.25, then that is a political decision and I would not blame the government for not wanting to take it. But if he adds it to the $1.75 that is to be paid to farmers whose costs are going up, then I would support it. Should the farmer not be treated in the same way as every other person in Canada, whether he be a unionized worker or a civil servant? Every contract, whether it be with the grain inspectors or the railway workers, will be asking for more wages this winter. The grain handlers got it, and the air terminal workers will be asking for it; so will Post Office workers.

All I am saying is that we should increase either the $3.25 or the $1.75 by the rate of inflation. I think I would prefer having the second figure increased, because then I would not be forcing the consumers of my product to pay more for bread, and I would not be suffering from increased costs of production which the $3.25 will certainly not cover.

I know that the government wants to be better understood on the prairies and better received there. If it wants to show the farmers that its heart is in the right place, let it treat the farmers in the same way as it treated the grain handlers and will treat every other worker, whether or not he is unionized. All the government has to do is add a COLA clause, an indexing system, to this legislation. I am not asking the minister to add an indexing provision to all the grain sold internationally, because that is a decision which farmers must make. If they cannot produce cheaply enough to get their product on to the international market, then perhaps they should not produce, or else we should not allow their costs of production to go up too much. If Canadian consumers should eat bread produced in Canada, there should be a declaration by us to provide enough bread for consumers in Canada. If we make such a declaration, then we should add a COLA clause to this legislation saying that the cost of production will be taken into consideration and an indexing system will be included.

Bill C-19 asks for a seven-year contract. The Postmaster General who is in the House now knows he could not find one labour union in Canada that would sit down at the bargaining table and sign a contract for seven years. They would not even approach the table. They are only ready to make a deal for one year. But this bill is asking Canadian farmers to make a deal for seven years, without even a COLA clause being written into it. What kind of suckers do they think Canadian farmers are? What kind of blind people do they think Canadian farmers are?

I listened to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) make a speech this afternoon. He was right when he said that western farmers like to produce. But if they have no money to pay for the fuel, to pay the taxes or to pay for the longer hauls that the Minister of Justice will require for wheat, then they cannot produce enough wheat for all Canadians. It is the obligation of this parliament to recognize the serious situation in which farmers find themselves. Inflation is rapidly increasing, and I firmly believe it was the rapid devaluation of the American dollar that started this round of inflation. But I recognize that the huge wage contracts of 65 per cent or 70 per cent now being settled will add impetus to what might be called the second round of inflation. I do not see any abrupt end to it, although I should like to see it trailing off.

The government is asking us to sign a seven-year contract to provide Canadian consumers with wheat. The very least it could do is write a COLA clause into the contract. Not one worker today would negotiate a seven-year contract or any kind of wage settlement without some kind of COLA clause. The government should consider this because, without doubt, production costs are going to rise rapidly, particularly if the Minister of Justice has his way. On this side of the House we are cheering for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), who seems to have a better grasp of the situation. I hope he wins the fight going on in the cabinet. If the Minister of Justice has his way there will be a phenomenal rise in the cost of production, yet he is piloting this bill through and asking us to forgo a COLA clause.

This bill should be given thorough study in committee, and farm associations should be called to give evidence. We should see whether Unifarm of Alberta thinks it is a good contract, and hear what the National Farmers Union of Canada has to say, although I am not a particular fan of theirs. The Palliser group, which has a strong base in the riding of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, should be consulted.

If parliament passes the bill as it is now, heaven help the people who represent the farmers. Can they go back to their ridings and tell the farmers that they did not know about such a thing as a COLA clause, or did not know that the cost of production was going to increase? We cannot claim to be so blind to the inflation that is rampant. All we are asking of the government is that the farmer be given the same right as everybody else. They will do their share to increase production without increasing inflation. The agricultural industry in no way contributes to inflation and should not be asked to accept a seven-year contract that does not have a COLA clause. That is just poor business.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in this debate because it involves the grain industry. Sometimes we are inclined to forget that this industry has helped to make Canada great. The changes that have occurred in the past two years indicate that the grain industry is going to assume a greater part in our national life than it has in the last 20 years. We have emphasized our manufacturing industry and forgotten how important grain, especially wheat, is to the country.

Technically, the bill deals with a relatively small area of the industry, that of ratifying the two-price system; but I think we should take the opportunity to find out what the government has in mind for the wheat industry. We need to know what is going to be done to assist the producers and those who handle wheat on the way to world markets. The bill follows hard on the heels of the abortive settlement the government imposed on the grain co-operatives owned by the million farmers on the prairies—a settlement particularly biased in favour of the grain handlers on the west coast. As an aftermath of that settlement we now have the walk-out of grain inspectors and a demand for parity from the grain handlers at the Lakehead. All these extra costs have to be paid out of the world price of wheat, so the cost of moving the grain from the farm to world markets is a very important matter for this House to consider. This bill must be considered in the context of what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) said to the grain handling industry and to the farm co-operatives, so it is important that it be discussed in detail.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board has made a great point of saying how important it is to assure $3.25 for wheat milled for home consumption. Six or seven years ago that might have made an impact and would have represented a considerable subsidy from the federal treasury, the taxpayers of Canada. But that was before inflation and was perhaps of some importance in 1968 and 1969, although even then production was declining. One could see fields that were not being worked because the price of grain was too low.

The cattle industry got a shot in the arm because cheap grain was available, but now the cattle industry has problems because the price of grain has increased. With the price of $3.25 to run for seven years, we are not as well off as we were in 1968 with $2 wheat. The devaluation of the American dollar and our own in 1973 has meant that the present $3.25 for No. 1 wheat at the Lakehead in reality brings less to the farmer than the $2 he received in 1968. In fact, much of the wheat sold does not bring $3.25, but a considerably lower price.

The increased costs of production make $3.25 seem like a pauper's penny. For instance, a pail of the herbicide Avadex cost $59 in the spring but now costs $83. So the government is not committing itself to doing much by guaranteeing $3.25 for 50 million bushels of wheat. Also, they show no evidence of being willing to introduce a COLA clause. With inflation running at 12 per cent, the government could promise at least $6 at the end of the next seven years.

On the other hand, the government is taking from producers of No. 1 milling wheat a substantial amount of money to subsidize the consumers of Canada. The mechanism for doing this is to be set up. I am not one who believes that food subsidies in the long run ever solved anything. I appreciate that violent fluctuations in the cost of food, shelter and the necessities of life can wreak great havoc. For instance, the former Heath government of Great Britain was highly criticized because it allowed coal miners to extract higher wages and then protected the consumer with coal subsidies.

Certainly, the government wishes to mitigate violent swerves in the cost of living and in the cost of certain essentials. Therefore, I do not take issue with the government for paying out of the federal treasury the difference between $3.25 and $5 as a consumer subsidy to relieve hardship. In the long run, if subsidies continue for too long and encompass a wide range of food products, a reduced production of food will be the result. It is important for that $3.25 figure to bear some relation to the farmer's cost of production and to what grain is worth on world markets.

I object to the producer of No. 1 milling wheat being made to accept less than the going world price for his produce. The difference runs at about $1 per bushel at present, and the total loss could be between $50 million and $60 million in one year. That the loss is to be borne by the producer of No. 1 milling wheat is unfair. We are not fortunate in my riding to produce much of this grade of wheat, even in good years, and this year has been unusually bad. It may be desirable to compensate the producer of No. 1 milling wheat with higher prices. As it is, that producer, under the present program, may receive less money than the producer of No. 2 wheat who will sell his produce at world prices, or the producer of No. 3. Unless the full going price is paid to the producer of No. 1, the industry must suffer from distortions. Under this bill we are penalizing the producer of good wheat who harvests it before the rains come and makes an extra effort. Surely he is entitled to receive the maximum benefit for a good product.

The minister brought in the LIFT program, which was surely one of the worst programs ever perpetrated on the farmers of western Canada. We have had far too much government interference in the grain industry. It is time for that industry to find its own level. We must make sure that support measures do not disrupt the grain industry and create distortions and stresses within it.

The minister has shown a marked intransigence with regard to COLA clauses. His attitude is distinctly similar to that of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) who, in speaking of farmer-owned co-operatives, said, "unless rates paid to grain handlers, working under conditions deplorable as they are, are brought more into line with those paid to longshoremen, the companies will experience great difficulties in getting the manpower needed to man their operations." Yet what are the facts? Two shifts were back at work willingly within hours of Senate approval of legislation to end the strike. There was an excellent unloading day on Friday, October 11.

The government, particularly the Minister of Labour, have stated that farmer-owned co-operatives have one of the worst records in their relations with employees. Nevertheless, productivity at United Grain Growers' terminals in the last ten years, measured in bushels per farm, increased as follows: at Terminal A, Thunder Bay, it increased by 24.5 per cent; at Terminal M, Thunder Bay, it increased by 92.7 per cent. This is unbelievable, you will say. Nonetheless, it is true. The activity at UGG terminals at Vancouver decreased by 21.5 per cent.

It seems strange that results at two locations coming under the same board of directors and management should be so different. I believe that the total labour environment at Vancouver has more to do with the situation at the terminals than has been supposed. Further, I do not think farmer-owned co-operatives ever had difficulty getting all the labour they needed at Vancouver and Thunder Bay, despite what the Minister of Labour said. Actually, there is little difficulty with regard to procuring labour at Vancouver, even with extremely high wages paid in general there compared with the prairies.

I bring these matters forward because if COLA clauses are included in union agreements, we may need to revise the $3.25 support in the future. The present bill and the previous bill with which the government settled the strike in Vancouver show, I believe, that the government intends to take over the elevator system. Possibly the government will levy a charge related to the $3.25 in order to run the elevator system. Actually, the National Harbours Board No. 2 elevator at Vancouver is not operated at all because it is too expensive to operate. If the government wants to provide money for grain farmers, and wants grain co-operatives to handle grain, it must provide to farmers a base price which is large enough to enable them to meet their commitments in moving grain.

The minister himself suggested that automation may provide the cure for the grain handling industry. But automation means that we must spend great gobs of money, which grain companies do not have and will not acquire if they charge merely the 4½-cent a bushel handling tariff. The Canadian grain terminal system can only function because it is old. It was built when costs were a fraction of what they are today. Replacement costs are on a completely different scale. I think that government involvement in the grain handling system will mean that we will pay a large price for the operation of our grain handling facilities. Under private ownership of the facilities there is an incentive to save grain. Private ownership provides the incentive to save grain and grades by cleaning to the closest tolerances. This prevents waste of good grain in dockage, and so on.

Mr. Benjamin: You don't believe that, do you?

Mr. Ritchie: No such incentive will exist for government operators, and the farmer would be the loser. I think we must look at the total costs of such operations. This bill deals with only part of the present cost involved in moving grain from the farm to the markets of the world. At page 237 of Hansard, the Minister of Labour said, "the companies are convinced that sooner or later they will sell the grain they now have on hand." The minister should know that 83 per cent of all grain shipped to Vancouver is Wheat Board grain which is owned by the government of Canada and for which the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is responsible to this House. The companies have neither financial control nor interest. He went on to say they do not even have to justify their actions to the membership. The directors of prairie co-operatives are elected by a most democratic process. All farmer members are allowed to vote. They in turn elect the officers of the company.

● (1730)

In committee we should have the input of people who know the grain industry, particularly from the side of the farmer. Many of them have a great deal of experience. I hope this bill will receive close study, not only within the narrow range of $3.25 at one end and $5 on the other, but we want to know what the government has in mind for the future. What will the cost be to move grain from the farms to the markets of the world? Will we be developing alternate shipping through the Mississippi or Seattle in addition to our eastern and western terminals, as well as trucking, and so on? All these matters should be discussed. A useful purpose will be served by widespread discussion of this bill in committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I wish to advise the House that if the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board speaks at this time, he will close the debate at this stage of the bill. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a very few comments to conclude this debate on second reading, in order that the bill can go before the committee for further consideration. I welcome the support which the bill has received; it seems to be unanimous from all corners of the House. I therefore expect it to move forward through the remaining stages with expedition.

I noticed that a number of the comments of hon. members dealt with subjects not directly related to the bill. In dealing with the question of farmers' costs, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) spoke about the question of Crowsnest rates. He referred to remarks I had made, which were put forward for consideration by the prairie farmers and the industry, in connection with whether there might be a better way for the prairies to benefit from the Crowsnest rates. This traditional and hallowed arrangement, as I call it, to which they are entitled will always be the same with this government and, I am sure, with successive governments because of the tradition associated with it.

The specific question which I put forward, and I did so for the benefit of the prairies, was as to whether the benefit of the Crowsnest rates could, in fact, be turned over to producers more directly and not necessarily still in the form of a specific, frozen rate on grain. I say that particularly in answer to the hon. member for Crowfoot who obviously misunderstood this important point.

The hon. member for Crowfoot argued that any change I was suggesting would in some fashion increase the cost to the producer if the rate on grain increased. Of course, if any increase in the rate of grain were matched by a transfer to the producer of an equivalent amount, it would not increase his costs. In fact, my argument—and I believe this to be for the probable benefit of the prairies—was that with the more flexible rate we might have a grain handling and transportation system that better meets the needs of the prairie farmer. It would allow him to have a better choice as to the kind of transportation system he wants, how he wants to relate to it, where he wants to deliver his grain, and at what cost. We would have a better transportation and handling system for an equivalent amount of money. I noted the hon. member for Crowfoot clearly missed that point. I am confident he would not want to distort the matter in that way, and I have tried to make that point for him now. It is an important point and I urge hon. members to consider it very seriously.

It is not accidental that I, a person who comes from the prairies, a principal grain growing area, have put forward the proposition that the Crowsnest rates might better benefit the prairie producers if they were handled in a different way. I do that, and hon. members who know my record of performance in fighting for things that are good for the prairie farmer and the west will appreciate that that is ample testimony and evidence that, once again, I see an opportunity to improve the lot of the prairie farmer in a clearcut way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: There are, of course, some members opposite who do not always agree with those sentiments which I expressed, but I am happy to have the more eloquent testimony of a significant number of voters in Saskatchewan who happen to agree with that proposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Lang: The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) pointed out that discussion on cost of production will be an important matter in connection with the stabilization bill which is being prepared for this session of parliament, and which we hope to have passed into law very quickly. I think it will be the most appropriate place for firm protection for the prairie grain producer against increases in the cost of production. In this particular situation, what we have involved—not in the bill but in the arrangement with regard to price which is outside the bill—is a range of prices in the form of a long-term agreement with a floor of $3.25 and a ceiling of $5.

I ask hon. members, particularly those who welcome long-term agreements, whether they would not now—or indeed would have a year ago when this principle was, in effect, accomplished—welcome a long-term agreement with other buyers with that kind of floor price and ceiling. Even today, when prices are higher than that ceiling, it seems to be a fairly attractive range for negotiations or discussions. When you are discussing a range of prices, you are really dealing with a market price which may rise or fall. Over the long term, we need to have increases equal to the cost of production. That is the nature of market prices. It is not a fixed price such as a wage which can be indexed to go forward every year. I hope hon. members understand that.

The basic agreement with regard to price is outside the bill. The bill is specifically for the transfer to the producers of the wheat of $1.75 a bushel or such lesser amount as may be required when wheat is above $3.25 in the case of Spring wheat, and above $5.75 in the case of Durum. The arrangement with regard to the price for wheat, that the Wheat Board will sell at no higher or no lower price than $3.25 for Spring wheat and $5.75 for Durum, was included in an order in council adopted at the time the policy was announced. The order in council explained this arrangement through the seven-year period contemplated originally, through to 1980. The price for Durum payments from the treasury is triggered over the $5.75 figure.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) asked why the eventual floor for Durum in the long-term arrangement is, in fact, the same as for Spring wheat, that is, $3.25. This is an important question and one to which we gave full consideration. It was our conclusion that it would be inappropriate to take the temporary, very large difference in price between Durum and Spring wheat and enshrine it in the domestic wheat pricing arrangement. A review of prices over a long period shows that prices of Durum and other wheats produced in the prairie region are far closer than the present distance between them indicates. The difference at the present really reflects an unusual production and demand pattern. In fact, poor crops of Durum in one or two principle countries outside North America have resulted in these price discrepancies.

Another form of analysis which we undertook concerned the number of bushels we could expect to be produced on various lands in the prairies which could grow both Durum and Spring wheat, and this analysis indicated a very close relationship in the yields between the two. There is a tradition on the prairies that Durum yields a little less than does Spring wheat, but further analysis indicates that in fact it tends to yield the same amount, approximately, on the same land. The statistical difference which appears when one looks at the broad yields seems to come from the fact that Durum tends to be grown in those areas where yields tend to be lower, rather than that the grain itself naturally yields less.

Obviously, to impose an artificially higher price for Durum, even in the domestic market, a very small market, it is true, might have had the result of encouraging more production of Durum, as compared to other wheat, than would have been the case. We felt that as we approached the floor, if we ever do, the two ought to be allowed to be in the relationship in which market forces place them.

Mr. Benjamin: Would the minister permit a question, Mr. Speaker? In view of the fact that the price of Durum has always been higher than for hard wheats, even sometimes as much as 25 cents higher, would the minister not agree that the floor for Durum should at least be somewhat higher than the floor for hard wheat? I agree that $5.75 may be too high a spread. But should it not be somewhat higher than the $3.25?

Mr. Lang: There have been periods during which Durum has been priced higher than other wheat, but this is not universally true; it has not always been the case. It may have reflected a particular number of special conditions. I think in the case of a floor price it would be very difficult to know the exact relationship which would be desirable. Of course, we have been looking at this question, recognizing that the greater proportion of both these crops is likely to be exported. Therefore, real market forces in the international world would likely adjust the price fairly appropriately between the two without our seeking to deal exactly with it. If we could come to any specific conclusions about the scientific reasons for the difference in price between the two, I would certainly be glad to take them into consideration when looking at the floor price for Durum.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre made a number of other suggestions with which I must take issue. He was grasping at straws, I think, Mr. Speaker, when he saw the two-price wheat system as having come about in the minority parliament situation of the last couple of years. I would have thought that at this point in the new session he would not want to refer back to this party's reliance on taking credit for everything that went on during the last parliament. He and his party tried that in the election campaign. The two-price system was, of course, begun in one form in 1969, the first year of the previous majority Liberal government; it was converted into $3 two-price wheat in early 1972, in the last year of the majority parliament. That is when the most formal kind of two-price wheat was really born.

Of course, when a good program comes forward I suppose it is typical of politics that many people should try to take credit for it. Why, we even heard the hon. member for Crowfoot trying to claim it for the Conservative Pary, going well back into history to do so, because the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), when he was prime minister, had made a couple of acreage payments. The hon. member called that two-price wheat, in retrospect. Of course, these payment were coughed up from time to time, usually when an election was in prospect. This government intends to do things on a regular basis. The history of the right hon. gentleman and his government doing these things before an election is so implanted in the hon. member's mind that every time we introduce a good measure he expects an election to be around the corner. I suspect that some of the good things we shall be producing in the next few months will lead him to get ready for an election in 1975.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre should also go back and check his notes about the stabilization bill debate, because he suggested that I was in some way opposed to two-price wheat in connection with that debate. I was, of course, at that time in the very process of developing the two-price program which was implemented in January of 1972. What I said in the course of the stabilization bill debate, when his party and the official opposition obstructed in every possible way the movement into law of a good measure, was that this was good legislation which could be improved at a later date. I also said it should not be stopped simply because it was not the answer to all the problems.

I am delighted that all hon. members see the value of this bill. Some have suggested that the principle be extended to other grains. I will be glad to hear what they have to say about the specific levels they would regard as being right in the case of long-term arrangements for barley, for instance. If hon. members have any suggestions to put forward I would be delighted to receive them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-31, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1975.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa, October 30, 1974

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Administrator of the Government of Canada, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 30th day of October, at 5:45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

Royal Assent

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

● (1750)

A message was delivered by Major A. G. Vandelac, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1800)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-31, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1975—Chapter 2.

At 6.08 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STOP WASTEFUL SLAUGHTER OF CALVES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last night, Mr. Speaker, Canadians were shocked to see on the national television news the wanton and wasteful slaughter of hundreds of calves. This bloody waste of high protein food comes at a time when Canadians are paying record high prices for beef which are not reflected in returns to producers. We saw, on the same television program, the suffering, death and human misery on the Indian subcontinent arising out of famine and drought.

I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the government give immediate consideration to taking whatever steps are necessary to put an end to this wasteful slaughter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. As it is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, it can be debated only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, it cannot be debated.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO FISHERMENS' WIVES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 for the usual logical reasons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: Present unemployment insurance regulations discriminate against fishermen's wives who are engaged in work related to fish processing in that they are being denied unemployment insurance benefits. This situation conflicts with the government's stated intention to implement equality of status for women. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter):

That the matter of the entitlement of fishermen's wives to UIC benefits be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

ADOPTION OF MEASURE TO ASSURE SUPPLY OF FERTILIZER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the manufacturers of fertilizers are not in a position to ensure a normal supply to farmers for this fall and next spring, and in view of the fact that they anticipate a price increase of about $50 a ton, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House instruct a special committee to fully investigate the causes of this disorder in the fertilizer trade and report to the House before the Christmas recess.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion which, under Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There being no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put at this time.

SUGGESTED IMPROVEMENT IN PROGRAM TO CONTROL BRUCELLOSIS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the increasing incidents of brucellosis among dairy herds in Canada, particularly in eastern Ontario, which has resulted in the withdrawal of farmers from needed milk production, I rise to seek leave of the House to propose a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 on this matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the Minister of Agriculture be instructed to improve immediately vaccination and inspection procedures to deal with the serious outbreaks of brucellosis throughout Canada and particularly in eastern Ontario, that he give serious consideration to increasing compensation for herds already affected by the disease and further that the minister's programs with respect thereto be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for reassessment and review.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS TO STANDING COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the recent statement by Lloyd Barber, Indian Claims Commissioner for Canada, that the failure of the federal government to satisfactorily settle the outstanding problems of land claims has created an emergency situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the whole issue of native land claims be referred immediately to Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF ABORTION FROM PROVISIONS OF CODE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. I am aware of Your Honour's concern about these motions being of a serious nature. In view of the publication on Saturday, October 26, of the results of a Gallup poll to the effect that 62 per cent of those Canadians surveyed state that the decision to have an abortion should be a matter solely between a woman and her doctor; in view of the fact that of those who initially disagreed with the above, 81 per cent would permit abortion if the woman's physical and mental health were endangered, and in view of the pressure applied by the Minister of Justice having resulted in very few hospitals establishing therapeutic abortion committees, I ask consent to move, seconded by my hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie:

That this House request the Minister of Justice at the earliest possible date to bring in amendments removing abortion from the Criminal Code thereby allowing a full and important debate on this subject which would ensure the right of women in many parts of Canada to receive the medical attention which they need and which is their right.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some doubt that the existence of an opinion poll in the country somehow changes the issue from one of general and continuing concern into one which could be classified as of urgent and pressing necessity within the terms of Standing Order 43. This, notwithstanding the fact that Standing Order 43 has to be liberally interpreted, in view of the requirements of unanimous consent. I cannot see that the existence of the opinion poll is a very significant factor in bringing the general subject under the terms of the standing order. However, with this caveat, I shall resolve the doubt in favour of the proponent. Does the House give unanimous consent to the motion being put?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimity, the motion cannot be put forward.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE FOR DEBATING MOTION CONCERNING VETERANS LAND ACT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Chapter III of the Statutes of Canada for 1974, the House must proceed to the consideration of the motion concerning the Veterans Land Act of which notice was given on October 17. I suggest the House now order that this matter be taken up after orders of the day are called on Tuesday next and, if necessary, on Wednesday next, and that in order to give as many members as possible the opportunity to participate in the debate, which according to law cannot exceed two days, I suggest it be made part of the order that the hour for private members' business on Tuesday next be suspended.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of the statute pursuant to which the notice was filed with the Chair require that this matter be taken up and considered by the House within 15 days. Under at least one interpretation this involves calendar days and the period would expire tomorrow. Accordingly, the suggestion made by the President of the Privy Council is important in the sense that making an order rather than simply giving assent to an agreement at this time would constitute in the view of the Chair the taking up and considering of the item within the 15 day period. With these considerations in mind, I now ask whether the House agrees to an order being made in accordance with the terms outlined by the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE MEMBERS WITH INFORMATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. By calling "Introduction of Bills" the opportunity for statements by the ministry has now passed for today. I should like to protest as strongly as I can as a member of this House—and I think this affects the privileges of all members of the House—the continual ignoring of the members of the House by not giving us information so that we can properly discuss the affairs of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Destruction of Calves

Mr. Lawrence: Yesterday a very important meeting was called by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country, to which the premiers of the provinces in this country were invited, to deal with a very important matter, if not the most important matter affecting the economic history of this country to date. Today the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) is present but he has not mentioned publicly one word about this meeting. One, if not two, members of the ministry who were also present at the meeting are here. I should like to protest as strongly and as loudly as I can this continual ignoring of the members of this House, which is the place where the affairs of this nation should properly be discussed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has in fact protested as loudly and as strongly as he possibly could. Unfortunately, this matter does not constitute a valid question of privilege. However, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) wishes to make some kind of announcement.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should perhaps explain to the House that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not present today because he is continuing the very useful discussions that began yesterday with the prime ministers of the provinces. He is meeting today with members of the trade unions, I am sure the House will agree a very useful activity, very much in the public interest. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), who was present at the meeting, will be present to answer any questions he can about the proceedings.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member a little later.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

AGRICULTURE

DESTRUCTION OF CALVES AND HIGH RETAIL PRICE OF MEAT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the crisis in the meat producing industry manifested by the destruction of calves in Quebec and the high prices being paid by consumers throughout Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has given the Chair notice as required within the terms of the Standing Order. He has therefore given the Chair the opportunity to consider the validity of the proposed motion pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 26.

The motion alludes to a somewhat general problem of rising food costs faced by consumers in Canada. In that respect it would appear to be dealing with a continuing or general type of problem as opposed to one which is envisaged by the terms of Standing Order 26 as constituting an emergency situation so that the business of the House ought to be set aside for its consideration.

However, the reference to the rather dramatic occurrence in the province of Quebec which was reported last evening brings the motion, in my view, into a different context in that that specific occurrence is of a sufficiently dramatic impact on the food situation, particularly the meat producing industry, in its relationship to consumer prices in Canada, to take the matter out of the realm of generality and to give it urgency which, at least on a prima facie basis, in the opinion of the Chair brings it within the provisions of the Standing Order.

I was, of course, further concerned that the demonstration referred to in the motion appeared to have been directed in whole or in part at the provincial minister or the provincial government involved. However, there can be no doubt from the numerous discussions which have taken place during the first weeks of this parliament and the questions that have been answered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that there is a very considerable federal involvement in the subject.

Furthermore, while there is some possibility of negotiating a solution to the problem, the fact remains that the very dramatic and tragic occurrence of yesterday in the province of Quebec referred to in the motion still remains of sufficient importance in the view of the Chair to qualify it as an emergency situation within the terms of the rules.

In addition, the Chair must direct its attention to whether there is likely to be a reasonable opportunity for this very important subject to be discussed or considered by this Chamber within the time which would be appropriate for effective consideration vis-à-vis the emergency nature of the occurrence itself. I am satisfied that no such opportunity appears to present itself.

Accordingly, for those reasons, I have come to the conclusion that within the terms of sub-section(4) of Standing Order 26 the subject matter of the proposed motion is indeed a proper subject for discussion within the terms of this rule. If I may favour the House with a brief explanation of the procedure, in the circumstances the House may either give its consent that the matter be considered, in which case it will be considered this evening at eight o'clock, or, alternatively, if the House does not give its consent I will ask if those in favour of having it considered will rise, and if 20 or more members rise again it will be in order to consider it at eight o'clock this evening. Therefore, may I ask if the hon. member has leave to move the motion for the discussion of the subject stated in the proposed motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly the matter will be discussed this evening beginning at eight o'clock.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MEETING WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF RESULTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance relating to the often mentioned discussions heading hopefully to a consensus of the principal elements in our economy in respect of sharing the gross national product. Can the minister tell us anything further following those discussions yesterday with the provincial premiers? Will he tell the House what procedures the government will be following, or the form the discussions will take with the principal elements of the economy with a view to reaching such a consensus?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there will be an opportunity fot the House to go into that in more detail. I was invited to participate at the meeting yesterday between the Prime Minister and the premiers at two o'clock, and I understand that the particular subject to which the Leader of the Opposition referred was discussed at lunch.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, who has a particular responsibility in this area of fighting inflation, and presumably a particular responsibility with regard to these discussions that have taken place, whether the Prime Minister has not seen fit to take him into his confidence on what he is up to regarding these discussions?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and I had a thorough conversation preceding the meeting yesterday. My only limitation in reporting to the House is that I was not present during this particular conversation at lunchtime. I am sure that in due course the Prime Minister will be glad to respond in more detail to the hon. member.

MEETING WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES—PROPOSAL OF MINISTER OF FINANCE ON WAGES, PRICES AND PROFITS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one put by my leader. I understand that the Minister of Finance has indicated he gave the Prime Minister a proposal or recommendation which would convey to the premiers a plan under which we could have a fair and reasonable balance between wages, prices and profits. I further understand that the minister has said the procedure was discussed with the premiers. Was this placed before the premiers and, if so, what was their reaction to the recommendation by the Minister of Finance?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I just arrived at coffee time and I did not hear that conversation.

● (1430)

MEETING WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF RESULTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, we are now seeing the difficulty of having this discussion in the question period where we can obtain no answers or merely evasive answers. My question is directed to the ministry which means it does not have to be answered by the Prime Minister, but by someone who was there. We have a right to know what went on yesterday. Would somebody mind telling us.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear from the statements made by the other prime ministers who were present, the prime ministers of the provinces, that this was one of the most successful conferences ever convened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ASSIST BEEF PRODUCERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the tragic slaughtering of cattle which has taken place, and which is continuing to take place in the province of Quebec, and considering that the minister said in the House last week that he would be announcing this week some program for the assistance of cow-calf operators, I wonder whether the minister has finally made up his mind about this important question and is in a position to inform the House what the government intends to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interfere with the rights of hon. members to present questions during the question period but it seems to me the hon. member is trying to have it both ways. He succeeded in having this very important subject matter set down for debate beginning at eight o'clock this evening. Under the circumstances, I can scarcely consider the questions involved in that same subject urgent enough to be considered during the question period.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MEETING WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES—PROPOSAL TO DEFER SPENDING ON SOME CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS AND TRANSFER FUNDS TO HOUSING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I shall defer to your judgment in respect of the fair-minded decision made earlier and shift my question to the Minister of Finance concerning the meeting which took place yesterday between the Prime Minister and the premiers. I should like to ask the minister whether the government is giving serious consideration to the proposal made by some of the premiers, which I understand gained wide acceptance, that the federal government defer spending on some of the construction projects which were planned, but which are not of immediate importance, such as office buildings, and that the federal government should transfer such funds to housing.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there was a general feeling on the part of the premiers that in some parts of the country where there was an overheating of the construction industry it would be in the interest of the government to postpone some of the non-residential construction in order to free up that industry for residential construction. There was a general feeling that that was the proper stance to take. What the stance of the federal government will be will depend upon the estimates and budgetary policy.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING FUNDS AVAILABLE TO MUNICIPALITIES FOR PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. May I ask the Minister of Finance whether the government intends to increase the amount of funds going out to the provinces to be channelled back to the municipalities for capital expenditures in respect of sewers and other similar publicly needed facilities, in the context of dealing with the looming unemployment in the winter and spring months.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, announcements to that effect would be made in certain aspects by my colleague the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and in others, if there were an appropriate response, on budget night.

IMMIGRATION

CONSEQUENCE OF EXPULSION OF HAITIANS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the recent statements he made in this House to the effect that the government was eager to favour the coming to Canada of French-speaking immigrants and to deal in a humanitarian way with the victims of oppressions, does not the hon. Minister feel that both these aims will be thwarted by the deportation of several hundred Haitians from Canada, and more specifically from the Province of Quebec.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in announcing that intention of the government to promote Francophone immigration, it was indicated that such immigration should be under Canadian law and according to Canadian rules and regulations. In the case of the Haitians in Montreal, a matter of considerable debate, the problem is that many, if not most, of them came here illegally, are in Canada illegally, and are subject to Canadian immigration law. It has nothing to do with the fact that they are French-speaking or from what source they came.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MEETING WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES—FEDERAL PROPOSALS TO CONTROL HEALTH CARE COSTS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. With the spiralling increase in the cost of the multibillion dollar health care joint program with the provinces which is a leading inflationary matter in this country right now, with a 15 per cent annual increase, I should like to ask the minister if this important matter was brought up with the provinces yesterday in the discussions because, as the minister knows, the inflationary rate of the health care costs means that many of the services are ineffective or non-existent today.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not disagree with the premise advanced by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. It was not discussed yesterday. It might well be a subject of conversation at the meeting of the ministers of finance of the provinces and the federal government on December 9 and 10. The hon. gentleman will recall that the federal government, under the leadership of the former Minister of National Health and Welfare, now Minister of Labour, by his successor, by the present minister and by myself, tried to devise with the provinces some formula to put some cap on the escalation of the health costs.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary. Yesterday I posed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and he could not assure the House this subject was on the agenda for the health ministers in the future. My question to the Minister of Finance is: since this government imposed on the provinces the kind of medicare program we have today, what initiative does the federal government intend to take to clear up this matter and when will proposals be made so that these costs can be brought under control.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the last two or three years to my direct knowledge within the responsibility of the portfolio I hold, the federal government came up with several proposals each of which were rejected by the various provinces. I agree that the subject is vital, is still worthwhile exploring, and we will continue to take initiatives.

CRASH OF PANARCTIC AIRLINER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CAUSE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Does the minister have any further information concerning the cause of the accident which occurred on Melville Island involving the serious crash of the PanArctic airliner.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. At this moment I do not know anything more than the hon. gentleman knows through the newspapers. There are only two persons who survived. We have some people in Melville trying to find out exactly what happened, the cause of the accident.

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF ALL-VEGETABLE WEINERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the apparent disagreement and confrontation between the minister and his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who is now apparently supported by the Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding the introduction of all vegetable weiners and other simulated meat products, I wonder whether the Minister of Agriculture can now tell the House if this disagreement has been resolved or if he wishes to make his usual denial of disagreement will he tell us whether the introduction of these products is imminent?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned discussions are continuing between the departmental officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of Agriculture to ascertain whether they can come to any decision concerning the wording so that the consumer really understands what is being purchased and so that false names are not used in advertising it as a meat product. I do not think we have any objections. I have talked to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs about this to see whether some workable agreement can be made.

GRAIN

WHEAT AND BARLEY—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, a question for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Having regard to the wide discrepancy between initial prices for wheat and barley delivered under the auspices of the Canadian Wheat Board and local feed prices within various areas of western Canada, as well as the wide discrepancy between the initial price and the final price, all of which is having a very bad impact on deliveries to the elevator system, can the minister tell the House when we can expect an upward revision in the initial prices of wheat and barley? Will it be before the end of the year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the timing of any change is under consideration. Differences of price are, of course, to be explored but any change of initial price would not alter the fact that there would be a distinct and different price for the off board market which would reflect the views of farmers on particular supplies and their judgment of the market for the year.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the fact that this is under consideration could the minister give the House some idea of the range the upward revision might take?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. I think perhaps it would be better to await the formal decision.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MEETING WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES—FEDERAL TAX ON PETROLEUM—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Crude petroleum is one of the commodities that brought about some degree of inflation because of our imports, so its supply is important. Was there discussion yesterday between the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces with a view to reaching an agreement on the resources of the provinces, with particular reference to the federal surtax which is really a super tax on top of any initial price of crude petroleum per barrel and also royalties charged by the provinces. Was there any agreement in this regard?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the description of the federal position on that issue but the question of resource tax by provincial governments and the federal government was discussed yesterday.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question. Would the minister at least take the House into his confidence as he did the newspaper reporters in Edmonton? The Globe and Mail reported what was discussed. Will there be some compromise on the federal tax which the provinces, on the whole, object to because of the federal government's interference with the constitutional rights of the provinces?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman and I have had some discussion in this House on the interpretation he wishes to take from a reporter's judgment. I will say to him that in no way did I or the Prime Minister reveal what the budgetary response is going to be in this discussion. We did lay our cases as openly and frankly as we could to the provincial premiers and, in the later session, to Premier Lougheed.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

SUGGESTION CORPORATION DIRECT CONNAUGHT LABORATORIES NOT TO INCREASE PRICE OF INSULIN

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance concerns the price of insulin which has increased by about 20 per cent in the past year. In view of the fact that the price of insulin was held steady for years when Connaught Laboratories was under the aegis of the University of Toronto, can the Minister explain why insulin production was put on a profit-making basis when Connaught Laboratories became part of the Canada Development Corporation? Will the minister give direction to the Canada Development Corporation to ensure that Connaught Laboratories refrain from future price increases of insulin supplies to the 200,000 Canadian users?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was given a report on that subject which I cannot find at the moment but I will give it in full detail to the hon. member.

ENERGY

ATHABASCA OIL SANDS—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PURCHASING INTEREST OF SHELL COMPANY IN UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that Shell Canada Ltd. has indicated its intention to proceed with the construction of a $1 billion plant on the Athabasca oil sands despite the fact that its partner, Shell Explorer Ltd. of Houston, Texas is seeking to dispose of its 50 per cent equity, can the minister tell the House whether the federal government is prepared to enter into negotiations with Shell Canada Ltd. with a view to picking up the equity of its partner in order that the Canadian people may have some public participation in the development of the Athabasca oil sands?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, Shell Canada Ltd. has indicated its wish to go ahead and, with the assistance of its ex-partner, to try to find a replacement partner. As I mentioned the other day, it is conceivable that one or other of the public corporations now operative at the provincial level might wish to buy in. It is also conceivable that when Petro-Canada is formed it might like to participate. At this point we have not made any suggestion that we would take over the partnership interest.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. May I ask the minister if the federal government, either through the Canada Development Corporation or the Canada Petroleum Corporation, when it is formed, would be prepared to enter into negotiations with the governments involved for some public participation in the development of the oil sands of Alberta and the heavy oil of northern Saskatchewan?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I take it the hon. gentleman means public participation by somebody, but not necessarily by the federal sector. I would be prepared to canvass that question with them, and also would be prepared to canvass my colleagues on whether this is the way in which the federal government should become involved in the oil sands.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

METRIC SYSTEM—COMPENSATION TO SCHOOLS FOR COST OF CONVERSION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the decision to go to metric conversion, has any decision been made by the minister's department to compensate school divisions faced with a conversion cost of $4 per student in some cases and up to $50 for vocational students in the public system?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, no decision has been made for compensation. The House will have an opportunity on an early occasion I hope to debate the whole metric conversion program through a resolution of the House of Commons.

INDUSTRY

LUMBER—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO IMPROVE MARKETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On Monday, October 28, in the absence of the minister I directed a question to the right hon. Prime Minister concerning the decline in housing starts which is bringing about a disastrous situation in our production of lumber, especially in Nova Scotia where Bowaters Mersey has announced the closing of its Bridgewater mill in December because they have absolutely no sales whatever for 1975. The Prime Minister said he would take the question as notice. I now ask the minister if he has taken any steps recently to improve our lumber markets within the European Common Market countries or Iran or the Republic of China on Taiwan where there is a market for Canadian products?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I gave an answer in the House early this week on that precise point.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question. If I remember, Mr. Speaker, the question was asked by a member from British Columbia and the minister stated that he had taken steps to improve markets in Japan and in the Middle East, but he said absolutely nothing about improving our markets for lumber in the European Common Market or in Iran or the Republic of China on Taiwan. I would ask the minister now if he could give an explicit answer to my question?

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I was of course referring to Iran when I referred to the Middle East. On the second point, we have taken a number of initiatives with respect to other markets. I mentioned Cuba and Iceland. I have taken initiatives as far as Europe is concerned and very recently we had a forestry mission from the Common Market that crossed the country to look at the Canadian situation. We have also taken a number of initiatives to develop the market in Japan. I will have to make inquiries as to the nature of initiatives taken in Taiwan.

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Agriculture. The urgency of this question is the continuing high price of sugar. Can the minister give the House a report on the progress being made to re-establish the sugar beet industry in southwestern Ontario so that more of our sugar requirements can be produced in Canada or has the minister come to the conclusion that he will never be able to convince his cabinet colleagues that there would be any value in such an industry or a sugar policy for Canada?

● (1450)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am divulging any great secret when I say that discussions concerning the sugar industry are going on right today. I hope to be able to present a report to parliament by the end of November.

FEED GRAIN—INQUIRY AS TO ADEQUACY OF SUPPLY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

On October 3 last, the president of the Agricultural Producers' Union sent a letter to the minister seeking his assurance that Quebec producers would be provided with the necessary supply of grain to feed their herds during the coming winter.

Has the minister replied to this organization and can he tell the House the gist of his reply? Can this assurance be given? In the negative, can he advise the House today that Quebec producers can count on their necessary supply?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, members of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board were in my office the day I appeared before a certain committee and reported to me that they expect that the need for feed in Quebec will be met and at the same price. I am very optimistic that all the feed needed in eastern Ontario will be taken care of before the shipping season closes. If not, arrangements are being made to transport it by rail.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED FAILURE TO GIVE MARITIME PROVINCES WARNING OF STORM—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In light of the recent storm which struck the Maritimes on October 20 resulting in loss of lives and damage estimated in the millions of dollars in Cape Breton Island alone, and in view of the assertion that the Atmospheric Environment Service did not give due and timely notice of such an impending gale, will the minister cause an investigation to be carried out, to determine and correct the causes of this alleged shortcoming.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is extremely difficult to make long term forecasts of the weather or even the beginnings of a storm. The matter is under continuous study. Even very recently a Canadian research vessel took part in climatic studies in the tropical area which will perhaps enable us to predict the weather and storms more than two days in advance. However, I can inquire whether any particular action might have been taken in the case mentioned by the hon. member.

LUMBER—ALLEGED DUMPING OF PLYWOOD BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for South Shore and has to do with plywood. Is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce aware that American plywood is being dumped on the Canadian market at 15 per cent below the cost of manufacturing the same type of plywood in Canada. If not, why not?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, questions or representations with respect to dumping should be referred to the Minister of National Revenue.

[Later:]

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I directed a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am not aware which minister looks after anti-dumping. The minister mentioned the Minister of National Revenue. May I direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is he aware, especially as he comes from Vancouver, that American plywood companies are dumping American plywood on the Canadian market at as much as 15 per cent below the cost of Canadian manufacture. In the minister's own area they cannot sell the stuff.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my office has not received any complaints regarding anti-dumping, but I will check with the department and investigate the matter.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO DATE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since he said several times in the House that the budget will be introduced early in November, is he prepared to give us the specific date for that long awaited event?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF BAN ON POLITICAL CANVASSING ON ARMED FORCES BASES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that persons who live in homes located on Canadian Armed Forces bases are citizens with full voting rights, will the minister take steps to lift the ban against political canvassing so that all parties may present their message to the voters who live on the Canadian Armed Forces base in Rockcliffe in the current Carleton-East provincial by-election.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member implied in his question, there is a regulation in the Queen's Regulations and Orders, which prevents an officer from allowing a candidate, his agent or canvasser from going onto a base to campaign during an election campaign. That applies federally, provincially and municipally. If the PMQ's are off the base, then the personnel can be canvassed by the candidate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. If it is a matter of regulation, does that not put it under the minister's control? Should not citizens in their homes, no matter where those homes are located, have the same political rights?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has a good point. I will be pleased to consider it.

REFERENCE TO SLAUGHTERING OF CALVES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Last night, on a television news program, we were shown scenes of the slaughtering of animals that took place in Saint-Bruno in the Lac Saint-Jean area, in a civilized country, which shows that our revered economic system is provoking general indignation. To facilitate tonight's debate, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture, whether in his opinion—

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—PARTICIPATION OF FIVE ESCAPEES IN VIOLENT CRIMES—RESPONSIBILITY FOR ESCAPE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Can the minister advise the House whether the five inmates in whom he took such a special interest as to issue special instructions and who proceeded to escape were, in their short period at large, involved in gang land killings in Montreal, bank robberies and armed robberies involving a sizeable quantity of cigarettes?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that this morning three of those individuals were involved in a bank robbery. One of them, Mercier, was shot and is seriously injured. Frappier was shot and is in critical condition. One of the others escaped in the shoot-out. I am awaiting a further report.

Mr. O'Sullivan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say if he has determined who was negligent in the escape and has he taken action concerning this negligence?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am expecting a full report tomorrow.

TRANSPORT

INCREASING CANADA'S SHARE OF MARITIME TRAFFIC UNDER UNITED NATIONS ACCORD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and/or his distinguished colleague next to him, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises out of the conference last April at which 72 nations ratified or agreed in general to the principle of 40-40-20 with respect to the shipment of goods and commodities in and out of various countries. Canada at that time abstained from voting on the resolution, which is now in the process of ratification. In the light of Canada's abstention and in the light of the tremendous advantage to Canada of raising its share with regard to Maritime borne traffic from one per cent to 40 per cent, will the minister indicate whether Canada intends to ratify this protocol or accord. If so, when may we expect an announcement from the minister?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs deals with these matters. I will be happy to give an answer tomorrow. Our people are involved in negotiations and tomorrow I will probably be in a position to tell the hon. member exactly where we stand.

AUTOMOBILES—POSSIBLE CLOSING OF FORD PLANT AT TALBOTVILLE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the recent announcement by Mr. Anthony Fredo, a spokesman for Ford of Canada Limited, to the effect that if sales of new cars continue to decline at the present rate, the Talbotville small car assembly plant will be forced to close the week of November 25, will the minister immediately communicate with officials in the automobile industry and his American counterparts in an effort to avoid this very serious situation from happening? I remind the minister that over 3,000 jobs are at stake.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about the effects on the automobile industry of the downturn of consumption in the United States. I have on a fairly regular basis met with the presidents of Canadian automobile manufacturing companies. I will again be meeting with the president of one of the major companies within a day or two with regard to the specific situation to which the hon. member has referred. I have been informed that particular company is balancing its production and the difficulties in Canada should be of a short-term duration.

RIDING MOUNTAIN—SUGGESTED CONSULTATION ON MASTER PLAN FOR DEVELOPMENT—POSITION OF LEASE HOLDINGS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the announcement in Winnipeg today that the minister's department is about to announce long-term plans for the development of Riding Mountain National Park, will the minister assure the House there will be no formalization of a master plan until such time as there has been a thorough and complete consultation with the people of Manitoba?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dinsdale: Can the minister also give assurance that the Supreme Court decision with regard to lease holdings will apply to Riding Mountain National Park.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, if it is the law of the land, it certainly applies to Riding Mountain National Park.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN BY UNITED STATES—INVOLVEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Considering the threat of unilateral action by United States congressmen and in view of the fact that presently the United States house of representatives is considering a bill to permit diversion of water from Lake Michigan, has the Canadian government been engaged in discussions with the United States regarding this matter? Also, recognizing Article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, why has the International Joint Commission not been actively involved in this dispute?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has made its position of opposition well known on the question of additional diversion of water at Chicago. These proposals have been made from time to time, especially during periods of high water. The government has just as consistently reiterated its objections to these proposals. No formal proposal has been made by the United States government to Canada in this regard.

MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF FOUR CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES—ALLEGATIONS OF DISCRIMINATION—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I understand that the minister and his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, recently had a meeting with the high commissioners of four Caribbean commonwealth countries at which the subject of immigration was discussed. Was the published report correct which stated that the minister sternly rebuked the high commissioners for interfering with Canadian domestic affairs?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the report is not correct. It is not accurate. My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I did meet four high commissioners from the Caribbean. We had a very constructive discussion about immigration. They expressed some concerns based on press allegations about the possibility of discrimination in the regulations which were subsequently announced. I was joined by my colleague in strongly refuting the allegations of such discrimination. Indeed, I think the high commissioners' satisfaction was set out in a statement which was released after that meeting. They said they had received this assurance of non-discrimination and were satisfied with the meeting. We deplore any suggestion of this nature which could possibly damage our very valued relations with those countries.

GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Considering that raging inflation affects most grievously many Canadians living at or below the poverty line, is the government giving serious consideration to the melding and rationalization of welfare and social service programs along the lines forecast by President Ford for his country by a guaranteed annual income or a similar consolidated approach? If so, when can we expect an announcement or some action?

RENEWAL OF CERTAIN SECTIONS OF MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR FUNDS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who is in charge of housing.

Since representations made to the central government up to now for funds to upgrade old housing have been unsuccessful, and in view of a statement of Mayor Drapeau of Montreal concerning the federal position on urban renewal, would the Minister admit that the program standards of his ministry do not meet the social and family needs of large city dwellers, and is he determined to cooperate with the provincial government concerned to provide technical and financial assistance to municipal authorities of Montreal and other cities which are determined to emphasize urban renewal and specially the upgrading of old housing units?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with the question. I welcome any initiatives on the part of the city of Montreal, through its provincial government, with whom I have the most cordial relationship, to participate in any way in which we can be supportive and helpful. I have affection for that great city and would be more than happy to be involved. Certainly, it is not my intention to intrude in the jurisdiction of the provincial government, but we are ready, willing and able to be responsive and supportive where we can.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO FISHERMEN'S WIVES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns discrimination. I wonder whether it does not go beyond questions to the appropriate ministers. In the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will direct a question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that wives of fishermen are being denied qualification for unemployment insurance benefits as a result of ambiguous legislation and conflicts with the thrust of the direction of the Departments of Fisheries, National Revenue and Manpower and Immigration, will the parliamentary secretary advise what consideration is being given to overcoming this ambiguity in order to give equal status to women with regard to UIC benefits?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given the department notice of this question. I am under the impression that it is being looked into.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that certain wives of fishermen receiving unemployment insurance benefits were overruled by regulations of the minister's department, and in view of the fact this is discriminating, has the minister taken the representations he has received under advisement? Also, has the government decided whether it will uphold the claims of these wives of fishermen who are being denied unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question refers to a group of scallop shuckers from whom I received a representation this morning. My departmental officials are examining this today.

TYENDINAGA RESERVE—INQUIRY AS TO METHOD OF REMOVAL OF MEMBER OF BAND COUNCIL

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with reference to the Tyendinaga Reserve in my constituency where Indians have indicated they intend to hold a special election by custom to overthrow the properly elected band council. Can the minister tell us whether such an election would be valid, and in what manner a properly elected band council member can be removed?

Mr. Speaker: Despite the apparent urgency of the question, I have grave reservations as to whether this is a proper question for the question period involving the kind of answer it does. I wonder whether it ought not to be done by correspondence. However, if the minister feels he can give a brief answer to the question, he may do so.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the legal bases by which a chief or a councillor may be removed from office are clearly set out in section 78 of the Indian Act. Until such time as I am provided with factual evidence that the chief or any individual councillor has violated the provisions of Section 78 of the Indian Act, I cannot recognize the validity of a special election. I intend to continue my support of the chief and councillors in their positions as the duly elected council of the band.

REDISTRIBUTION

REPRESENTATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—ALLEGED BREACH OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council, involving the redistribution of seats. In view of the fact that the terms of union under which British Columbia entered confederation guarantee that the province's representation in the House of Commons will be increased in accordance with the British North America Act, 1867, and not as subsequently amended, and a further guarantee that the BNA Act, 1867, is applicable to British Columbia in the same way and to the like extent that it applies to other provinces, will the President of the Privy Council tell the House whether the government has obtained the consent of the government of British Columbia to the breach of these guarantees by the reduction of the representation of British Columbia in comparison to the representation of Ontario and Quebec?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I was not aware that any action of this kind had been taken.

Mr. Reynolds: Can the hon. gentleman tell us, then, whether he intends to reintroduce the redistribution bill in the near future?

Mr. Sharp: Yes. I hope we shall deal with this matter before the end of the year. Otherwise, we would have to extend the existing legislation unless we want to return to the distribution which has been criticized so strongly in all parts of the House.

BRUCELLOSIS—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN COMPENSATION PAYMENTS AND REVIEW OF CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A question to the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the growing incidence of brucellosis is driving milk producers out of business, is the minister prepared to review his program for control? In particular, is he prepared to consider increasing the amount of compensation which is now paid? Knowing the minister's opinion that it is already generous, is he prepared to increase it further?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): First, I should make it clear that we are reviewing the control program—stepping up the number of inspections and so on. I am sure the hon. member is aware of this. I am sure he is aware, too, that we have raised levels of compensation twice already this year. At the present time we are reviewing these levels to determine whether they provide enough compensation to enable farmers who suffer losses to restock their herds when the time comes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): May I inquire of the government House leader the business for today, tomorrow, and next week?

Mr. Sharp: Today the House will begin consideration of the motion for second reading of Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Act. This evening, of course, there will be discussion of the emergency motion which was agreed to earlier. The debate on second reading will continue, except for possible interruption to call the report stage of Bill C-22, the Canada Pension Plan amendments. After these bills have been disposed of, if this should happen before Tuesday when we will debate the VLA motion, we will take up Bill C-10, subject to revision should urgent items be returned from committee.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I refer to the substance of the measure, I wonder whether, on a point of order, I might raise a question on the motion itself. As hon. members have just heard, the reference is to a committee of the whole House rather than to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. The predecessor of the bill before us, Bill C-18, was referred, in the last parliament, to the standing committee where there was, of course, an opportunity to hear witnesses and to carry out an extensive examination. I wonder whether the House would agree, either now or at some later time, to the motion being amended so that the bill would go to the standing committee, rather than being dealt with on the floor of this chamber.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In response to the minister's suggestion, may I say we should like to hold the matter in abeyance and make a decision later.

Mr. Speaker: This being one of the budget bills, unanimous consent would be required before the motion could be changed so that the bill might be sent to the standing committee. Perhaps that matter could also be considered.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, this bill, the successor to Bill C-18 in the last parliament, has been brought before the House because of a significant change in the economic realities facing this country, a change brought about by forces external to Canada. The basis of the altered situation is, of course, the cohesive action of the OPEC countries in raising the international price of crude oil fourfold during the past year. By this series of acts, not only have the oil policies of the oil importing nations, including Canada, been changed but the economic base of the world's trading community has been seriously challenged.

In this crisis, Canada is therefore not alone. We have participated in a response at the international level, as is indicated by the agreement on an international energy program which recently has been receiving attention from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. Because of its geographical and geological good fortune, Canada has been less seriously affected than a number of other countries. We are, nonetheless, affected by this change in the world situation and we wish to play a constructive role as a member of the international community while at the same time taking action to protect ourselves.

I have referred to the international action being taken. In the bill before us this afternoon we are dealing with domestic action contemplated to protect ourselves in this new situation. Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Act, is intended to provide the federal government with a statutory basis for the management, necessary in the interests of all Canadians, of important areas of international and interprovincial trade in petroleum and natural gas. Enactment of the legislation is essential if the government is to have the means to continue to guide the Canadian energy economy safely in the present turbulent global oil environment.

The bill before us is a lengthy one and is complex in parts. Hon. members will, however, be familiar with many of the aims and much of the content of the measure. The portions of the bill dealing with, first, petroleum export charges, second, domestic oil price restraint and, third, petroleum import cost compensation, are essentially unchanged from the corresponding sections contained in Bill C-18 which I introduced to the last parliament in April of this year.

[Translation]

When Parliament was dissolved, the government was forced to resort to devices to preserve two very important features of Bill C-18, namely the export tax on oil and the compensation of oil importers. Since the beginning of April, the oil industry has voluntarily agreed to collect and pay for export taxes pending this legislation. The compensation was paid to oil importers through special warrants of the governor general which were recently submitted to the House. When the House approved votes and 52a of Supplementary Estimates (A), it allowed for compensation to be paid to importers till the end of the year.

Those makeshift measures obviously do not provide for an adequate permanent base for government programs, less so with regard to those we are concerned with and which involve such great sums of money. The House will realize the importance of putting before Parliament as soon as possible the terms of adequate regulations.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

[English]

I hope that the degree of familiarity which most members have with the background to and content of this bill from our previous lengthy hearings in the standing committee on Bill C-18, and from more recent committee discussion of the votes connected with oil import compensation, will enable the House to give these measures speedy passage without a sense that the careful review which is equally necessary has been in any way foregone.

I would like now briefly to review the structure of Bill C-32 in relation to certain stated aims of the government's oil and gas policy. I should like to draw the attention of the House first to part II, the domestic oil price restraint. A central feature, perhaps the central feature, of our oil and energy policy relates to the pricing of domestic crude oil. The government's declared policy is that domestic oil prices should be high enough, but no higher than the level required to bring forward an adequate supply for Canadian requirements. This is a simple enough principle to express, but let me say that I am under no illusions as to the potential difficulty of its application. We recognize two main aspects of this supply price—a technical aspect and what I might call a social aspect.

As to the technical aspect, my department continues to refine and develop assessments of the net price necessary to attract the capital, trained manpower and technology which, applied to our resource base, will provide the supply we will need in the future. The social aspect consists primarily in finding a position of equity between the needs and interests of consuming and producing provinces in relation to the return which is necessary to justify the exploitation of this non-renewable resource.

We must recognize that this price is bound to change over time. For the moment, however, we have a price for crude oil of approximately $6.50 per barrel at the wellhead in Alberta which reflects consensus among the first ministers of Canada as being the appropriate price level to obtain for the period through to July 1, 1975. We do not pretend that this agreed price necessarily meets all the criteria of technical adequacy and social appropriateness by which it might be judged. I do believe, however, that it satisfactorily achieves for the moment a reasonable balance between the interests of consumers and producers in Canada, as well as protecting our national economy from the extraordinary surge of oil prices which took place in international markets during the past year.

The basic reference price of $6.50 which was achieved by consensus at the first minister's energy conference in March could readily have become the prescribed price referred to in part II, division I of the present bill. It would have been but a small step for the government of Canada and the governments of the producer provinces to enter into agreements to give the $6.50 price the character of a prescribed price according to this part.

While it is the government's earnest hope and desire that the price of oil from the producer provinces will always be determined at mutually-acceptable levels by agreement with those provinces, realistically it is prudent that the federal authority, as the final arbiter of interprovincial interests, should equip itself with powers to provide for oil price restraint in situations where either such agreements cannot be reached or, having been reached, are terminated or are found not to be effective. These powers are embodied in division II of part II of the present bill.

The government is most hopeful that the exercise of such powers will not be required. However, the potential tensions between producer provinces and consuming provinces are such that the only wise course is for the federal authority to equip itself with this latent power. Moreover, it could be that agreement having been reached as to a prescribed price under division I of this part, the province or provinces concerned might find it legally unenforceable, in which case the procedure envisaged in division II would have to be applied.

The federal policy in respect of oil prices means that for the moment, and conceivably for some time to come, the price of Canadian oil will be significantly below the international level. The House is aware that, as a nation, we produce approximately the same volume of oil as we consume. However, we are, by the facts of geography, an important oil trader; about half of the oil we now produce is exported to the United States while about half of our consumption requirement is met by imports from overseas. Special measures are therefore needed if consumers across Canada are to benefit from a domestic oil price level below the international price.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, about Part IV of the bill which deals with the single price policy for oil, the second essential objective of the government policy is to set up a single price for oil in Canada taking into account, however, the differences in transportation costs and quality. Practically, this will mean that a refinery in Toronto will pay the same price for its crude as a refinery in Edmonton excluding, of course, the difference in transportation costs.

Still, under certain circumstances, with which I shall deal later, it may be necessary to alleviate some abnormally high transportation costs. Similarly, the same oil should be worth the same price at the Montreal and Halifax refineries, the only differences stemming from the cost of moving the oil from overseas suppliers to the refineries.

As far as the government policy is concerned, the problem is one of adjusting the price of the oil products of the Montreal refineries, which use very expensive foreign crude oil, to that of the Toronto refineries which use a far less costly crude oil for western Canada.

Division I of Part IV of the bill stipulates that part of the mechanism must serve to achieve uniform prices through the setting up of an importer compensation program, in fact this was done when Parliament voted certain sums to that effect.

Last January, when the ministers of Energy held their first conference, the "cushion" concept was studied and accepted with regard to international oil prices in those parts of Canada which rely on imported oil. Later, its implementation led to the achievement of our objective, that is the standardization of the cost of crude to Canadian refineries, due allowance being made for the differences in transportation costs and quality. As a result, we saw, for the first time in many years, a remarkable uniformity in wholesale prices of petroleum products.

As an example, the cost of gas is now the same in Montreal as in Toronto. There is a difference of tenths of one cent in the cost of heating oil between those two cities. In Quebec City gas costs just over 1 cent a gallon more than in St. John, N.B. The difference in gas and heating oil prices in the Prairies and Central Canada merely reflects the differences in transportation costs of the crude oil to refineries; it also shows how keen the competition is in Alberta as far as natural gas is concerned. Therefore, we have already succeeded in applying efficiently throughout Canada the single price policy for oil, in spite of geographical characteristics that mark the oil sector of our economy. The House is now asked to establish a permanent regulation for this important aspect of our oil policy.

The government attaches great importance to the single price policy for oil across Canada. Without this legislation, the import-dependent areas would be subject to fluctuations of world prices controlled by OPEC and would actually have to pay oil over $4 or $5 a barrel more than areas supplied with Canadian crude products. That would create an intolerable situation and would bring about tremendous differences between oil-consuming areas and industries. It is almost impossible to imagine the consequences that could result to our way of life and our commercial activities.

The statements made by the Provincial Premiers left no doubt about how important they consider the upholding of price controls, and showed they recognize the marked cost factor of oil in our national economy.

[English]

In circumstances where overseas oil supplies are readily available, as they presently are, albeit at high and fluctuating price levels, the single oil price policy can be implemented by means of the import compensation program. However, overseas oil supply could again be subject to disruption as it was last fall and winter. The government is acting vigorously to plan for such emergencies. Earlier this year, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act created an allocation board which is now developing plans to deal with internal aspects of supply stringency. On the international front, Canada has been closely associated with the development of the international energy program which has as its central feature a system of international oil allocation.

Given the size of our domestic oil producing and refining industry, there is much which Canada can do to help itself in circumstances of stringency in overseas supply, but at a cost. Because of the great distances in our country, such help by way of transfers of oil between regions is very expensive. The large-scale shipment of western Canadian crude oil, first by the Seaway and then via Vancouver and the Panama Canal, a distance of some 8,000 miles, was probably the single most important factor enabling the oil industry adequately to maintain product supplies in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces last winter.

The additional cost of the Panama movement could be great, possibly amounting to some $2 per barrel, or about four times the cost of moving oil from Edmonton to Toronto by pipeline. Shipments of residual fuel oil from eastern Canada, which usefully supplemented the supply of industrial fuel to British Columbia, were made at a similar extra shipment cost.

In a possible future emergency, such extraordinary movements could only take place, on any realistic basis, either if the companies effecting them could recover the additional costs from the market or if those companies were to receive compensation from government for those costs. Market cost-recovery would necessarily involve a breach of the single oil price policy, which the government is not prepared to countenance. Apart from the question of principle, the difficulties of allocating increased transportation costs between regions will be obvious.

The government, therefore, proposes that provision should be made for compensation to be paid by government for abnormal transportation cost incurred in the emergency delivery of petroleum into any areas of Canada experiencing a shortage in supply. Powers to extend such compensation have been incorporated in division II of part IV of Bill C-32. The triggering mechanism is a recommendation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the governor in council, which in turn directs the Energy Supplies Allocation Board to implement division II. These powers will be used only where an emergency situation exists.

I should point out that this could be an emergency different from, and perhaps occurring prior to, the declaration of a state of emergency so grave as to bring into play the allocation mechanisms under the Energy Supplies Emergency Act. Indeed, action by the oil industry to transfer supplies on the basis of compensation to be provided under this part of the act could well remove an existing shortage of supply without further moves by the government. We would hope in this way to be able to forestall the development of circumstances in which the full allocation procedures of the Energy Supplies Emergency Act would have to be called into play.

In short, the House should look on this provision as an instrument complementary to the powers under the Energy Supplies Emergency Act and to the steps being taken in relation to the international energy program. The intention is to safeguard Canadian oil and energy supplies in an emergency, without impairing continued implementation, in those circumstances, of the essential principle of a single oil price across the country.

A necessary corollary of a domestic oil price level below the international market is some provision to ensure that Canada retains the higher value available from sales of domestic oil in international markets. Parliament already recognized this when it passed the Oil Export Tax Act in January of this year, with its provisions for the levying of flat rate export taxes, on crude oil only, in the period from October 1, 1973, through April 1, 1974. Part I of Bill C-32 provides for a "tariff of charges" on the exportation of oil, including oil products.

As I remarked earlier, export charges have been paid by industry on a voluntary basis since the beginning of April, and the provision in part I is needed to supply an ongoing legislative basis for the export charge. Determination of the amount of the charge is linked to the National Energy Board's assessment of the just and reasonable price for Canadian oil in the export market. In setting this price in relation to section 83 of its act, the board takes into account the general public interest.

The proceeds of the oil export charge represent an important contribution to the consolidated revenue fund. Similarly, the costs of oil import compensation are a significant charge on the fund. Estimation of the respective financial magnitudes is a matter which must interest this House greatly, but which entails great uncertainties. For example, overseas oil supplying countries have shown themselves capable of implementing retroactive tax adjustments, and in many cases contractual supply arrangements can be such that the retroactivity has to be accepted by importing companies as a contingent liability. However, our export charge per unit is assessed each month on what is intended to be a firm basis. We therefore have a "once for all" export charge on the revenue side, but face an import compensation liability which may be subject to some retroactive change at the instance of a foreign government.

Another problem area is the estimation of the aggregate volumes which will bear the export charge and which will be liable for import compensation. For example, our rates of export are dependent in part on market conditions in the United States—which are difficult to predict—as well as on the National Energy Board's determination of quantities surplus to Canadian needs. The volumes of imports qualifying for compensation, that is, the net amount of eastern Canadian consumption supplied from foreign oil, are difficult to assess on the basis of past experience.

However, assuming an average export charge in the present fiscal year of slightly less than $5 a barrel, an average import compensation of $4.50 a barrel, average exports of crude oil and products of some 860,000 barrels a day, and average compensable imports of some 790,000 barrels a day, we arrive at a compensation liability of approximately $1.3 billion and an export revenue arising of approximately $1.5 billion. I must stress that these are "order of magnitude" estimates and not precise forecasts. I put them forward, not without hesitation, because I believe the House would wish to have some guidance in this area. However, I must stress that the estimates are only as good as the assumptions which they embody, and some of these could quite well be invalidated before the end of the fiscal year.

● (1540)

As to unit amounts of export and import compensation, it is my general expectation that the average per barrel export charge would somewhat exceed the average per barrel import compensation, largely because of quality: the oil that we export is generally of a lighter grade and of a lower sulphur content than the oil we import. As to the aggregate volumes of exports and imports, in making this estimate it has been assumed that in the balance of the fiscal year no significant reduction will take place in export rates. As the House knows, this is a question upon which the National Energy Board has held extensive hearings.

Concerning the succeeding fiscal year, I think I would be committing a hostage to fortune if I were to produce at this time an estimate of the balance of revenues and expenditures. Suffice it to say that this matter is under constant review in my department.

Part III deals with domestic gas price restraint. A most important and necessary new element of the bill respecting the Petroleum Administration Act is part III, which deals with the pricing of natural gas primarily in interprovincial trade, and incidentally in extraprovincial trade as gas moves toward the international boundary and is destined for the export market.

Natural gas is an extremely valuable energy resource. However, as a result of historical circumstances and the particular commercial relationships and regulatory procedures existing in the gas industry, it is a resource which is presently seriously undervalued in Canada in relation to competing energy resources. This is an unhealthy situation leading to distortions within the energy economy and as between consumers of different fuels. It is resulting in wasteful use in some instances of a precious resource.

To avoid distortions both in the supply and in the consumption of competing fuels, an integrated and consistent approach to pricing is required. I think that all of the participants in our energy economy would assent to this principle. The problem is to achieve this consistency in a manner which strikes a balance between the interests of consumers and the ambitions of producers.

This question of finding an appropriate pricing mechanism for natural gas has been the subject of intensive discussion with the producing interest, represented by Alberta, and the consuming interest, represented chiefly by Ontario. We have seen, over the past few years, the tension between these two interests marked by lawsuits, by threats to withhold gas and by threats to challenge provincial legislation. In a series of discussions we have had with the two governments, both together and on other occasions individually, we have proposed a phasing to commodity value, which would yield increasing returns to the producing region, but over stages that would cushion the impact on consuming regions.

In the past several months we have indicated that while we would hope to arrive at a compromise, federal authority of the kind sought in the bill would be necessary in order to carry out any agreement. We have advised the provinces of our intention to exercise our jurisdictional responsibility in this area.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Certainly.

Mr. Stanfield: The way the minister put that, he suggested that the power would not be used to impose agreement, but to implement one. Is that what he meant?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I shall be dealing with that point in my next two passages. If I do not answer the question satisfactorily, I shall be glad to receive a question at the end. At the moment, gas prices for domestic consumption are being shaped principally by arbitration proceedings taking place under the Alberta Arbitration Act, which specifies the criteria for determination of the value of natural gas in terms of its commodity value in markets served. By "commodity value" under that act is meant the thermal value of natural gas determined in relation to the price of substitutable energy competing with gas and after allowance for the premium value of gas as a fuel.

The federal government is not opposed to this pricing principle. However, the extent of the gas price increase needed to achieve commodity value is now such that an abrupt rise to this level could prove very disruptive. For example, there may be situations in which industrial consumers of gas will have to switch to alternative fuels upon gas being priced at commodity value. In these circumstances, it would be reasonable to provide a transition period. If this transition is to be accomplished without confrontation between producing and consuming interests, a federal presence in the gas transacting area of our energy economy is required.

[Translation]

Such is the purpose of Part III of the bill. It is intended to regulate the gas trade and it sets goals similar to those of the oil policy. It is also meant to maintain balance between prices of alternative fuels in Canada.

This approach compares to the one explained in Part II of this bill and Parts II and III of Bill C-18 of the previous Parliament concerning oil. It is provided that the federal government and producing provinces, and this refers to the question of the Opposition Leader (Mr. Stanfield), will determine the price of gas by agreement. In case such agreements are not reached, or if they are but are not put into effect for any reason or if they are declared ultra vires by a provincial government, as is the case for oil, it is provided that the federal government will give itself increased powers. While the goals for gas are similar to those set for oil, differences in the principles of transactions of these two products give, in Part III, a more simple situation for gas than the one for oil described in Part II. For example, it is not necessary to put up a system of licences to regulate the interprovincial movement of gas at preset prices.

[English]

To sum up, if I might, for a moment on the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), in the discussions, primarily with the two provinces affected, in this regard we have suggested the general principle of phasing to commodity value with regard to petroleum or petroleum products, and have suggested a timetable of five years of appropriate steps that might be taken. This is, I think, a question very much in negotiation and we hope the negotiation will be successful.

With respect to the public statements of the various ministers, I think I would be correct in saying that in the statement of the Ontario minister of energy there is acceptance of the principle of a higher price, and in the statement of the Alberta minister there is acceptance of phasing. I would hope these two positions can mature into an agreement. But an agreement, for legal reasons, would have to be enshrined in action taken at the federal level with regard to the interprovincial price of gas.

Mr. Stanfield: If there is no agreement, what is the stance of the federal government?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In respect of petrol and crude oil, if there is no agreement between the parties or if, for example, agreement should fail perhaps in respect of natural gas because of the long-term contracts, the federal government would have to take action pursuant to the regulations to stipulate what the price level would be.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Part V, the next one, is entitled: "General".

Part V confers on the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the necessary administrative powers to prevent infractions to this Act. These powers include the right to demand information and examine files on the premises, whenever there are reasons to believe that this act has been contravened. In case he is refused, a judge could issue an order to confirm these rights. On the other hand, citizens are entitled to a certain degree of protection against administrative abuses.

Moreover, if requested by the Minister, the Energy Supplies Allocation Board may also review the prices at which domestic oil, foreign oil, oil products and gas are being sold in Canada, and may also submit reports and recommendations to the Minister.

Finally, under Part V, the Minister must submit to Parliament, following each fiscal year, a report on the amount of revenue from the charge imposed pursuant to Part I, and on the aggregate amount of compensation paid out pursuant to Part IV.

[English]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I commend Bill C-32 to the House for its careful consideration and prompt passage. The objectives which it seeks to achieve are for the most part familiar to members as being now well-established components of an integrated national energy policy. The provisions for export charge, import compensation and oil price restraint are essentially as they were in Bill C-18 of the last parliament. Where changes have been made, they reflect experience and knowledge accumulated in the intervening months.

The measures for gas price restraint represent a logical step to deal with the uncertainties of the present gas pricing situation. The provision in part IV, division II for compensation to be paid for emergency movements of oil between Canadian destinations is, I suggest, a prudent provision in the present circumstances of instability affecting the supply of world oil and a necessary complement to measures already taken or contemplated.

Important elements of our oil and energy policy have been endorsed by the consensus of first ministers, although it cannot be fairly represented—and I make the point specifically now—that Alberta agrees with us in the matter of gas pricing. The Alberta ministers indicated that they would, of course, oppose that particular approach. I believe that the direction of our policies has widespread public acceptance. This consensus has in large part been implemented by informal or temporary measures. It is now the responsibility of parliament to give formal expression to its will in these matters as incorporated in Bill C-32 which is the focus for this debate and decision of this question.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, this is the second time the principle of this bill has been discussed in the House. When the bill was introduced in the last parliament as Bill C-18, we thought it was just to put into legislative form the agreement that the 11 governments made on March 27 last year. Today the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) indicated that some changes had been made in light of the experience of the last four or five months. That means we are into an entirely new ball game, Madam Speaker. What makes it different and new is that what we thought was a temporary measure turns out to be permanent. We thought the previous legislation was just a temporary means of carrying out an agreement reached by the 11 governments, but from the minister's speech today it is obvious that he looks upon this as permanent legislation to control prices on a permanent basis.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

It is clear that this permanent measure refers to all products made out of crude oil, out of the tar sands and out of natural gas. The minister kept referring to the fact that this is part of an integrated energy policy, so we must assume that next it will refer to hydro power and after that nuclear power, and so on. So we are dealing with a new situation entirely, Madam Speaker; not the one we thought we were dealing with last spring.

The debate on second reading lasted two days last spring. The seven speakers who participated for the official opposition mentioned the dangers they saw in moving into the very sensitive area of federal-provincial relations, and they put forward ideas for strengthening and improving the bill. In committee, we were intent upon being provident housekeepers, looking at the terms of the bill and the auditing conditions. Witnesses such as officials of Imperial Oil of Canada and the attorney general of Alberta were called. We found out from the latter gentleman that although much of this bill is according to the understanding between the 11 governments, part III was not part of that understanding.

Part III shows us that when dealing with matters of federal and provincial jurisdiction we need all the help and competence of the people in our system of communications and consultation. The attorney general of Alberta said in very clear terms that part III was not only part of the understanding arrived at by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the ten premiers, but that Alberta could not agree to it. This bill is simply a flat, brutal statement, in the name of bureaucratic efficiency, that if there is no agreement the federal government has the power—and intends to use it—to impose unilaterally a price control system in Canada. I suggest that the question of price controls, as evidenced by court decisions over generations, is purely in the provincial field.

We had an election last summer. I got the impression at that time that the government was opposed to wage and price controls and other parties were also. But one of the first acts of the government in this new parliament is to bring in a bill—not just a housekeeping bill to get us by for a year or so and to adjust to the new situation of petroleum in the world, but permanent legislation to control prices. This first step in the area of control will lead to the control of other products, Madam Speaker, and eventually to wage control. That point should be kept in mind during this debate. Although this government campaigned against wage and price controls, it is now using the excuse of the difficulties of last fall in the oil market to bring in legislation such as this on a permanent basis.

Madam Speaker, at this point, regardless of the feelings of some of my colleagues and some provincial cabinet ministers, I should like to compliment the minister on the way he has handled and has learned one of the most involved and complicated subjects in the world today, that is, energy in the form of oil and gas. Speaking as one who has spent his life looking at the economics of the oil, gas and related energy industries, I recognize the work the minister has done and yield to no one in paying him a compliment. On the reverse side of the coin, it must be said that some members on my side of the House and, I hope, members on his side, have grave reservations about the government's moving so rapidly and, if I may say so, in a blundering way in the direction of price and wage controls, which is the ultimate thrust of this bill. So in discussing this bill I will put forward some of its principles upon which we all agree.

● (1600)

All parties in this House hope that, with God's grace, we will have energy available for many decades to come and that we will be advantageously placed in this competitive world to provide energy at lower prices for all Canadians. Not only must prices be lower for the benefit of consumers and industry, but they must be lower to attract investment to this country: it will come because we have cheaper energy resources on which to build secondary and tertiary industries. All parties support that principle. This bill will make it possible; we do not dispute that.

I was interested to note that the minister has changed his position with regard to the price level of oil. Most of us think that if the system is to work, the single lower price for all Canadians would need to be increased, over a phased period, to a level within shooting distance of the world price, otherwise intolerable stresses will be built up in the industry. Now the minister says that the price is to be significantly lower. All consumers in Canada back him on that statement. However, he also said that the price must be high enough to attract sufficient investment to this country to ensure a continued supply of oil, gas and other energy resources. That is where the wisdom of Solomon is required.

I hesitate to say flatly that on the basis of evidence available to those representing oil and gas producing areas, the price of $6.50 will not provide oil and gas in future decades and will enable us to meet the needs of our consumers and industrial concerns. I know that when the minister first entered this ball game he spoke of world prices and prices available at Montreal. Now he suggests that the price is to be significantly lower, which will make every consumer in Canada happy. Yet he says that he hopes the price will be high enough to encourage further production. I do not think any person in this House can pretend to know what that price will be eventually. I am sure the minister feels, as most of us do, that the price of oil will bear some relation to the price of the volume of gas required to provide an equivalent amount of thermal power. The same principle applies to other fuels.

The government and the official opposition have agreed on the principle of bringing in increases by stages so that our people will not suffer the shock of going from $3 per barrel—the price at which we have been stealing it from the Arabs for 50 years—up to $11 per barrel. We all agree that the price should go up, but that there should be a differential between the world price and the Canadian price. It is possible, under this legislation, for that increased price to be reached in stages. This must be done through constant consultation between producing and consuming provinces on a daily or weekly basis, because conditions are changing rapidly.

We also agree on another principle. In this adjustment period when we are moving from $3 per barrel to whatever the final price will be—it will be related to the energy commodity price level, no doubt—we must provide a cushion for consumers who would otherwise suffer the impact of a sudden increase in offshore oil prices. It has been said in this House that Canadians owe a great debt to the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan who agreed voluntarily to provide the bulk of the oil needed to provide this cushion. You do not read in the newspapers of Quebec, Ontario and the maritime provinces that Alberta and Saskatchewan—have-not provinces only a few short years ago—are subsidizing Canadian consumers of oil, no matter whether they are driving their cars or heating their homes.

These two provinces are subsidizing consumers east of the Ottawa Valley at the rate of $1,300 million a year. As well, the people of these two western provinces are subsidizing the rest of the people of Canada. The owners of this resource have also subsidized the people of Ontario and those of other consuming provinces. That Canadians are willing to take on the responsibility of subsidizing Canadian consumers of oil, whether they are heating their homes, driving their cars or using it in manufacturing, speaks well of the common bond which hold this nation together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Although the western provinces have accepted the tremendous burden of subsidizing Canadian consumers of oil to the tune of between $2.5 billion and $3 billion a year, this bill does not specify how long the people of those two western provinces must, with their depleting capital resource which is disappearing by the hour, maintain this subsidy. This brings me to my fourth principle, on which I think all parties agree. When we discussed a similar bill last spring, it was suggested that there should be a quid pro quo for the provinces which produce oil. The bill of last spring did not mention such a quid pro quo. In this new bill, despite all our talk of producing oil from the oil sands and producing natural gas, there is no mention of a quid pro quo for the producing provinces.

I know at the meeting of first ministers it was arranged to give back $100 million to Saskatchewan and a different amount to Alberta. However, by no stretch of the imagination does that meet the full measure of the burden these two provinces are carrying in the interest of national unity.

● (1610)

Last spring the minister heard in committee about amendments that were proposed. They were not laid on the table of the committee, but shown to the various parties represented there. These were to recognize what Alberta and Saskatchewan are doing today on behalf of national unity. The legislation should enshrine the intention of the federal government to make a reasonable quid quo pro if there is any surplus.

The fifth principle that I think should be in this bill is that of consultation. When you have responsibility and jurisdiction on the federal side and on the provincial side, over and over again there will be overlapping. In the case of some of our resources, such as agriculture and fisheries, the constitution allows for equal powers of both levels of government. However, in the field of oil responsibility for the ownership and the enjoyment of this resource falls under the British North America Act and the amendments of the Alberta Natural Resources Act and the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Act are beyond debate. These resources are the property of the people in those provinces.

Therefore, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) pointed out, the question of consultation should be enshrined in this legislation. If agreement is not arrived at in voluntary fashion, then we will have a centralized, bureaucratic type of government at the federal level. I do not think Canadians as a whole, whether they belong to the "have" provinces in oil, or not, want to see this principle established just because the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan are minority groups. This argument applies to all potential resource areas.

On the question of consultation this bill fails to meet the test of legislation to which we all agreed. In the spring we were not sure about just where we stood on the constitutional issue. Nearly all speakers on the Conservative side raised this matter as a danger. We did not take active, strong, decided opposition to this bill because we thought it was carrying out a temporary agreement between the ten provincial premiers and the Prime Minister. We thought it would be off our backs in a year or so. However, when we read the budget on May 6 and saw the provisions whereby the federal government declared open war on every province, at the constitutional level and the economic level, then this piece of legislation which we are discussing made itself part of a pattern that is extremely dangerous. We now have no choice but to rise and say in loud voices, hoping that the country will hear, that this is a new ball game. Section 109 of the British North America Act makes this very clear. I quote:

All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise—

That is as clear as you can make it. Section 125 reads:

No lands or property belonging to Canada or any Province shall be liable to taxation.

No provincial government can tax the federal lands of the national parks, federal lands that belong to us, because it is against the constitution of this country. However, this government, on May 6 in a budget, broke the constitutional terms and said that any provincial tax or royalty which is part of a property—it is a share that goes to the provincial government in right of the Crown—is non-deductible, and therefore taxable. This breach of a constitution which is only 107 years old is part of this debate. When you see the machinery being set up in this bill for permanent price controls, for unilateral action by the federal government over oil from natural sources and over natural gas and oil coming from synthetic production of the tar sands, you realize the path we are following.

As you go through the various statutes that deal with this question, the responsibility that should rest on each one of us is simple: are we honouring the agreement on which this country was based? I come from an area which is now called the province of Saskatchewan. It was not treated as an equal when it was set up as a province. The people who preceded me in that province fought against the decision of 1905 which set us up as a colony. The wheels of fortune changed, a Conservative government was elected at Ottawa and we finally received justice. I am referring to the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Act of 1930. I shall read the preamble. I know that all the ghosts of several years of political effort are with me at this moment. The preamble reads:

And whereas the Government of Canada desires that the Province should be placed in a position of equality with the other provinces of Confederation with respect to the administration and control of its natural resources as from its entry into Confederation in 1905—

In 1930, a Conservative government in power in this House gave justice to Saskatchewan and Alberta. It made us equal with the provinces and master of our own resources. I quote further from the Saskatchewan act:

And whereas the Government of the Province contends that, before the Province was constituted and entered into Confederation as aforesaid, the Parliament of Canada was not competent to enact that the natural resources within the area now included within the bondaries of the Province should vest in the Crown and be administered by the Government of Canada for the purposes of Canada and was not entitled to administer the said natural resources otherwise than for the benefit of the residents within the said area—

It goes on to say that this agreement was made and signed, and if there are to be any changes this provision is enshrined in section 26:

Amendment of Agreement

The foregoing provisions of this agreement may be varied by agreement confirmed by concurrent statutes of the Parliament of Canada and the Legislature of the Province.

May I say I am not pushing for statutes to make agreements. When you are confiscating the resources of somebody else by mutual agreement, that is one thing. I am simply saying this bill is a poor bill because it says nothing about an agreement having to be made by common consent with the man from whom you are stealing.

● (1620)

Mr. Saltsman: Compensation implies that there is no agreement.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I hear a voice—

An hon. Member: In the wilderness.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): —which received a call from the voices at Ottawa last August, who said, "The Prime Minister wants a policy to keep prices from rising." This voice heard the call and said, "The way to do it is to put controls over oil and impose an export tax." So the father of this legislation does not sit on that side of the House, but is the voice I just heard.

Mr. Saltsman: Just call me papa.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I want to give an opportunity to the former leader of the New Democratic Party to take part in the debate before five o'clock, so I will bring my remarks to a close. The point I want to make is that the budget of May 6, 1974, was an attack on all the provinces and not just on the "Arab" provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): When you say to all the provinces, "If you are taxing your resources at 50 per cent, the federal government will turn round and take that 50 per cent", it is no longer a battle between Alberta or Saskatchewan and the federal government: every province is under attack, whether it be British Columbia with its forests, or Ontario and Quebec with their mines, or Newfoundland with its hydro power. Every province which contains a resource is under attack. Even the land taxes imposed by Ontario are vulnerable. If provinces wish to retain the point of view that under the constitution certain powers are given to the federal government while certain other powers are retained, they should recognize that the budget of May 6 was nothing less than a declaration of war.

If we look at tax decisions arrived at by the courts over the decades we find that over and over again, when a province levies a tax which it has a right to levy under the constitution, and when that tax interferes with a tax already put in place by the federal government, the courts overrule the province. Likewise, when the federal government, acting within its jurisdiction, seeks to impose a tax which has the effect of sterilizing or nullifying a tax imposed by a province, the courts hold that the first authority to impose the tax, when it has the right to do so, is the one whose position must be upheld.

This is a matter which will be dealt with later by members of my party who are better versed than I am in questions of constitutional law. However, I know enough about history to assure hon. members that there is a considerable body of opinion upon this subject. I will put just one quotation on the record as an illustration. The author has the name Laskin, and the subject of the book from which I intend to quote is Canadian constitutional law. In this passage, the author confirms what I have just said:

> The respective taxing powers of dominion and provinces may not be used by either of them to sterilize powers conferred by the other upon its functionaries or substantially to impair their status.

This means that neither jurisdiction acting within the constitution can do anything to impair or sterilize the other jurisdiction acting within the constitution in the exercise of its powers. One government cannot negate what the other is doing. But this is what happened in the budget. I know, and Canadians know, that what we are witnessing in this budget is a fight for power between greedy governments, and I cannot see much difference between the provinces and the federal government in this fight. I have brought along, for the edification of some of my innocent colleagues, a statement made by a cabinet minister in this imperialist regime. He was speaking in Estevan during an election campaign. This minister—everyone knows who he was—said, "Claiming royalties was allowed in the past because it was a relatively insignificant amount. Now it is a major provincial tax, that is wrong."

In other words, a long as you are doing it under the constitution and only taking a little bite in the form of royalties, the federal government will not interfere, but if, though still following the terms of the constitution, you take more, it is a sin. That is a new principle of justice. A second statement by the same minister was, "The provinces are getting an unfair share of our revenues and the budget cannot allow this to happen."

Those passages are from the minister's speech. If the provincial royalties were allowed, the minister claimed, provinces would be encouraged to make royalties as high as possible. Imagine that! As a partner in a property, you have been content with one-eighth, then the value rises so high that you ask for a half and get it. It is all right to take one-eighth, but it is wrong to take a half. That is what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) said. Imagine the provinces, asking for more money! That is a terrible thing. To be quite frank, I think they asked for a little too much, but the fact is that the federal government went in and started grabbing, too.

An hon. Member: To the benefit of the majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Another statement from the Minister of Justice was, "Canadian tax revenue from oil should be the same irrespective of where the wells are located." He did not like different rates being imposed. But what is wrong about there being a different rate in each province? I will say no more about the Minister of Justice.

This legislation started out with a temporary bill; now it is to become permanent. It will affect oil sands, natural gas and the development of hydro power, including the James Bay development. That is bound to make Mr. Bourassa happy. It will affect the Labrador development. Mr. Moores will be up here immediately. It will have a bearing upon the Columbia River development. That playboy will really be down here giving press conferences. When they begin developing Fundy power, I can see the premier of Nova Soctia coming here on the next train, or maybe flying his plane. Hydro power must be included, if everything is to be brought under control. Ontario is building four big nuclear power plants. They will have to be brought under the control of the federal government. The same applies to all other sectors of provincial resource development.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the principle of staging is not fully dealt with in this bill. There is no principle of quid pro quo in the bill; neither is there any clause providing for consultation. I point out that this is part of a pattern that is developing. As I see it, it is part of a pattern to move centralized power to the bureaucrats here in Ottawa. At the same time, the government is willing, where there is a power position in the provinces, to destroy the resource companies through this innocent kind of ping-pong game. I say flatly, Mr. Speaker, that the minute you move the government into a position where it will control prices and wages, the consumer is the one who is going to get hurt.

Secondly, Canada's great opportunities which stem from our resources, particularly of energy and water, are being checked the minute government controls are put into place. We know that the government has alientated the west and is trying to take us back to colonial days, days we have just left.

Finally, the bill does not entrench or enshrine the principle of consultation. We do not have time to go through all these slow steps required to put things in statutes, as we used to 35 to 40 years ago. However, if the bill contained a clause providing that the government must consult, and that orders in council are accepted as statutory legalization of their action, then I think we could go along with it. I submit that the bill should be sent back for rewriting before asking the House of Commons to accept such a major change in the constitutional practices of this country.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-32, which will be known as the Petroleum Administration Act, has some features which the members of the New Democratic Party support and which we were the first to propose in this House. The bill also has some features about which we have decided reservations.

Let me deal first with the aspects of the bill of which we approve. The bill puts into legislation two policies which the New Democratic Party have been urging upon the government for at least two years. The first is a two-price system for oil, which would keep prices in Canada lower than the world price, and imposing an export tax or tariff charge so that the difference between the domestic price and the world price will accrue to the public treasury. In our opinion, this money could be used to compensate for the higher prices for imported oil which must be paid by people in Canada east of the Ottawa Valley, and I hope some of the money would also be used by the federal government and the governments of the producing provinces to develop, through some kind of joint arrangement, new sources of oil under public ownership.

The second feature of which we approve is that the bill seeks to establish a single price for oil plus, of course, transportation and handling charges, so that all Canadians will benefit equally from our petroleum resources. We in this party welcome these provisions, but we have serious misgivings about the method of compensation payments to the oil cartel and the increased prices which the minister has intimated will be paid to the gas companies in the future.

The details of these questions we can discuss more fully when the bill goes, as I hope it will, to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, as well as when the bill is reported back to the House at the report stage, and at third reading. However, it seems to me that this bill requires us to look at the much larger question of a national oil policy as part of an over-all energy policy for Canada.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

It should not be necessary to remind the members of this House of our dependence on energy for our future development and survival. Napoleon is quoted as having said that an army marches on its stomach. There can be no doubt that every industrial nation's progress or deterioration is in proportion to the availability of its energy supplies. Without adequate energy supplies, living standards in Canada could revert to those of the last century. So we have to ask ourselves: Do we have a national energy policy? Do we have a national oil and gas policy? If so, what are these policies? I suggest that we do not have a national oil policy for the Canadian people. What we have is an oil policy which has been foisted upon successive Canadian governments by the major oil companies, most of whom have their head offices in the United States.

I was very interested in the speech which was made to the Sierra Club of Ontario by Mr. Robert Macaulay, a former Ontario cabinet minister who represented the Ontario government before the National Energy Board and who served as counsel to the Ontario Energy Board. In the course of his speech, Mr. Macaulay said:

> Canadians face a serious energy problem—a life and death energy problem. North America has lived in a fool's paradise. The national government of Canada for the past 10 to 20 years has drifted leaderless in the field of energy.
> It has been lulled to sleep by the energy cartel of North America. Industry dominance of government policy amid public indifference is an open book and is beyond dispute.

That is a very strong indictment from a man who is knowledgeable about the energy situation in this country and who is fully aware of the operations of the oil cartel. I submit that the government ought to tell the people of Canada frankly that we are rapidly running out of oil and gas supplies. It is estimated that we have about nine years' supply of oil at our present rate of increased consumption. Conventional oil fields in western Canada have already passed their peak, and we can expect a continued decline. Unless we either curtail consumption or radically reduce our exports, we could be one million barrels a day short of meeting our requirements within the next five or six years.

We ought to ask ourselves: How did we get into this position? We got into this position because the government and the National Energy Board have for years accepted the figures of our available supplies of oil and gas from the oil industry. The people of this country have been lied to about the amount of oil and gas that we still have available to meet our needs. The United States oil companies operating in this country blandly assured successive governments that there were adequate reserves of oil and gas. As a result, they were able to obtain permits to export to the United States far larger quantities of fossil fuels, which Canada could ill-afford to lose.

It is significant that we are still waiting for the availability report of the National Energy Board to tell us what our inventory is of hydrocarbons in this country. If one wants to see the absurdity of our oil policy, one has only to look at the government's own figures put before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works the other day. These figures are for the 12-month period ending June 30, 1974. Our production in that period is estimated at an average of 2,008,000 barrels per day, and we exported in that period 1,206,000 barrels per day. We consumed, in Canada, 1,751,000 barrels per day. To meet the deficit as a result of these large exports, we imported 949,000 barrels per day. If you look at these figures it is apparent that in the 12-month period ending June 30, 1974, Canada exported 60 per cent of its production. We shipped out of this country 30 per cent more than we brought in. If some person came from another planet he would not believe that intelligent people would allow their rapidly dwindling resources to be shipped out of the country without a word, and knowing at the same time that their supplies were close to exhaustion.

To crown this indignity, the government is getting ready to sign an international agreement which, in an emergency, will require Canadians to reduce their consumption of petroleum products in Canada while at the same time maintaining our normal exports of oil to the United States. I say to the government that it would be well to think very carefully before signing that agreement. The government's excuse for this deplorable situation is that we must export our western oil because there is no way in which we can ship it to the area east of the Ottawa Valley. This merely proves the contention that our oil policy has been industry-dominated rather than people-oriented.

Interprovincial Pipe Line has never wanted to build a pipeline from western Canada to Quebec and the Atlantic provinces because its parent company, Exxon, controls the Venezuelan oil fields and has always wanted a captive market in eastern Canada for oil which has a high sulphur content and is difficult to dispose of elsewhere. The result is that while in Canada we produce sufficient oil to meet our own needs, we still have to export 60 per cent of our production because we do not have the pipeline facilities through which to take that oil from the parts of Canada where it is produced to the areas where it is required.

About a year ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that a pipeline would be constructed to Montreal. There were two possible routes; from Sarnia to Montreal, or an all-Canadian route through northern Ontario and Quebec. The government said that while it would provide greater security for us to use the northern line, that would take a year longer and consequently it selected the less desirable route from Sarnia to Montreal. After a year, where are we? Not only is the line not started, but the application to build the line has not yet been dealt with by the National Energy Board. Interprovincial Pipe Line has asked for an adjournment, and an indefinite adjournment has been granted. The fact is that Interprovincial Pipe Line is dragging its feet. One cannot help but ask, who is running this country?

In answer to a question of mine the other day, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) said—and I do not lay the blame for all of this situation in Canada at his feet; he inherited the result of 20 years of negligence and maladministration; he is one of the most knowledgeable ministers we have had in this field, and I think he is valiantly trying to deal with the situation—he was prepared to consider the alternative of having the government build the pipeline. We are always considering alternatives, but we have come to the time when something must be done.

I want to suggest a number of aspects of a national oil policy which have to be dealt with by this parliament. The bill before us is part of it, and the bill which is on the order paper to set up a national petroleum company is part of it; but there are many aspects of this question which ought to be brought together into a Canadian oil policy. Let me suggest, first, that it is not too early to institute measures for voluntary curtailment of petroleum consumption in this country. If Canadians were told that there will be a gap between the time our western oil supplies run out and the time new supplies from the tar sands and from frontier areas come into production, they would co-operate in reducing consumption. A reduction in consumption can be brought about without any hardship, and we ought to be asking for public co-operation to that end. I am not suggesting that any curtailment of consumption would solve the problem, but it would increase the lead time we have in finding other supplies of oil and natural gas.

My second proposal is that we should start, now, to drastically reduce our exports of crude oil. Some of our western oil could be moved east. If the pipeline were built, of course, we could move quite a bit of it. Some could be moved down the St. Lawrence Seaway, some by the Panama Canal, and some by rail; but if we could not ship all the oil that is surplus in western Canada it would do no harm to leave some of it in the ground, because we are certainly going to need it in the very near future.

The third proposal I make is that we should get on at once with the construction of a pipeline to take western oil into the province of Quebec and eventually to the Atlantic provinces. We in this party would prefer the all-Canadian route through northern Ontario and Quebec: it would give us greater security and would serve an area in Canada where a petrochemical industry and other industrial operations could be established. I do not think it will take any longer, if we begin right away to build an all-Canadian northern line, than if we sit around waiting for the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company to make up its mind and for the minister to summon up courage to do something about it.

Somebody must tell the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company either to begin construction of this pipeline or the government will move in. As a matter of fact, it is inconceivable to me that when the government a year ago decided it would agree to the building of this pipeline, it did not obtain an understanding from Interprovincial Pipe Line Company that if the National Energy Board approved the line, it would proceed with construction, otherwise months would be wasted with no result.

The government ought to move boldly. It has an obligation to the people who live east of the Ottawa Valley. The present situation in the Middle East is so precarious that no one can be sure that oil will be available from that area in the next few months, particularly if war should break out between the Israel the Arab nations. If that should happen, even at the very best estimate the people east of the Ottawa Valley will go through two or three winters of uncertain oil supplies because the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company has been dragging its feet and refusing to move boldly on this project.

The fourth proposal I wish to make is that we should speed up production plans for the development of the Athabasca oil sands and the heavy oil in the Cold Lake area of the province of Saskatchewan. I do not agree with the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) who last year wanted us to build one plant a year. I think that is unrealistic. However, a plant could be built every two or three years in the Athabasca oil sands area.

It is possible to bring the heavy oil in northern Saskatchewan into production when adequate technology has been provided. I submit this is an area for public ownership in which the federal and provincial governments, either jointly or separately, should develop those sources of oil owned and controlled by the people of Canada with the people of Alberta or the people of Saskatchewan.

Today, almost all countries of the world except Canada and the United States have seen governments step in to take control of the oil industry and to set up national petroleum corporations to develop their resources. Most of these countries now recognize that the pressure of events is forcing them to look upon oil and natural gas as public utilities. Energy is too important to be left to the international buccaneers. In a speech made to the Sierra Club, Robert Macaulay made a comment which I should like to quote. He said:

> The open marketplace should not determine energy prices. The marketplace stresses short-term benefits, particularly profit, rather than long-term social needs. Those who won't abandon the market concept are going to bring something cataclysmic down around their heads.

I should like to say that when a Conservative really becomes convinced that public ownership is for the benefit of the people, he has the courage to say so. That worthy position was taken by a former Ontario cabinet minister who comes from a province which gave us Adam Beck and Ontario Hydro. I should like to see my Liberal friends become equally courageous about the idea of public ownership in respect of the production of oil and natural gas.

We will have an opportunity, when the minister brings in the bill on the Canada Petroleum Corporation, to see to what extent it is merely a peripheral move or a genuine attempt to ensure that we develop oil in this country under some measure of public ownership. I urge the government to consider the possibility of becoming involved in the Athabasca oil sands and the heavy oil area of northern Saskatchewan.

The fifth point I wish to make is this. If the government is not prepared itself to establish plants in the Athabasca oil fields at least, as I suggested to the minister today during the question period, we ought to be prepared to take up the share of the project for building a $1 billion plant in the Athabasca oil sands which is to be dropped by the partner of Shell Oil of Canada. The American partner, Shell Explorer Company, of Houston, Texas, has decided to withdraw because the government—I congratulate it for this—refused to agree that whatever oil that company produced from this plant could go out of the country, which would mean we would have no control over keeping our oil in Canada. The company also wanted very large tax write-offs. I commend the government for refusing this.

So the Shell Explorer Company is getting out and will dispose of its shares to someone else. This is a golden opportunity for the minister and the government of Canada to step in and take over the shares of Shell Explorer Company. This would give the government a 50 per cent equity in the plant to develop the Athabasca oil sands, and it would give the Canadian people some input into the development of those oil sands. One of the good features of this is that the government would not have the problem of having to go to the Alberta government for a licence or permit. The licence and permit have been granted, the plans are laid, the technology is completed, and the operation is ready to begin in 1976.

The government, either through the new Canada Petroleum Corporation or the Canada Development Corporation, should become a 50 per cent partner in this project. I hope the government will seize this opportunity so that this very important development of the last great resource of which we are sure in this country will not slip out of its hands into the hands of the multinational corporations. Mr. Speaker, I see you are about to rise. It is five o'clock, and I understand we are to proceed to private members' hour. Since we will not be dealing with this subject tonight, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I thank the hon. member. It being five o'clock, the House will proceed to the consideration of private members' business listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers), public bills.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions. I believe there is a general understanding that perhaps we could move from Bill S-11, which would normally be dealt with today, to Bill C-206 in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The House has heard the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed that that private member's bill be stood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Since there is no motion for papers today we will proceed to public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

INQUIRIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COMMISSION REPORTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved that Bill C-206, to amend the Inquiries Act (publication of reports), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the parliamentary secretary brought me in on his conference because I certainly did not realize the procedure would be other than the disposition of Bill C-206.

An article by Geoffrey Stevens appeared in the Globe and Mail on October 26 dealing with the subject of private members' hour, in which he referred to members who bring bills as "candidates for oblivion". I think he was quite correct because this private members' hour could be called an hour of frustration notwithstanding the fact that it does give members of parliament an opportunity to bring forth matters which they consider important to the Canadian people.

I should like to read the concluding paragraph of Mr. Stevens' article which is right on point. He said:

> Although some of these bills will eventually be debated, (for one hour), they all have one thing in common—none will become law unless the government decides to take them over. Unless you subscribe to the quaint notion that the only people in Ottawa who are capable of thinking are those who inhabit the treasury benches, you have to be concerned about the short shrift given private members' bills. It's one more argument for a real reform of parliamentary procedure.

I certainly agree with that and I am sure all hon. members do, Mr. Speaker. I hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has indicated his interest in and concern about the role of parliamentary procedure, will read that paragraph and take it seriously.

The explanatory note to Bill C-206 reads as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a right in the public—vested in Parliament—to reports made by Commissions appointed under the Inquiries Act. Under the present law, a commission only reports to the Government which thereafter voluntarily releases the report in its own time.

I sincerely believe it essential in a participatory democracy that the public have access to information compiled by government, provided such information does not affect national security or matters which are, without question, confidential.

The bill I bring before the House this afternoon will commend itself to you, Mr. Speaker. It entails no expenditure of public funds out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, this bill, if passed, will ensure that another fund, the fund of public knowledge, will wax fat with the pearls of wisdom, gems of wit, and nuggets of information continually brought forth by royal commissions.

Getting down to the substance of the bill, it would first ensure that a report by a commission appointed under the Inquiries Act be made public by tabling in both Houses of Parliament; second, that the publication of a report would not be delayed but be tabled in both Houses within 15 days after its completion; and third, that there be an opportunity to debate a report within a time limit after it is tabled upon motion of ten members in either House. I would hope that all hon. members would look upon these criteria with favour.

Having regard to the report of the commission which inquiried into Canadian security measures and procedures, and in fact the procedure followed by that commission in its own report, there is a provision in the bill that a commission—if so authorized in its terms of reference—may omit from its report published in the House any matter that may be prejudicial to the safety or interests of Canada. The uncensored report would, of course, go to the Contemporary Secretary of State.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to delve at length into the history of our Inquiries Act. My recollection is that it came to us from the United Kingdom by way of the province of Upper Canada. I do not believe it was amended over the years since its passage in the early years of Confederation except perhaps to consolidate part I and II with part II which relates to inquiries by a minister within his own department. The United Kingdom, however, amended its legislation many years ago to provide for publication of a commission's report. The amendment was made after a government got into trouble by withholding a report.

In the hundred years of Confederation from 1867 to 1966 there were 396 commissions under the Inquiries Act. Excluded from this total are the several hundred commissions appointed to investigate charges of political partizanship, and many pre-1948 commissions involving the revocation of naturalization or of citizenship. My authority for these figures is George F. Henderson's "Federal Royal Commission in Canada, 1867-1966—a Checklist". Information provided by the Library of Parliament adds four more commissions, in the period 1967 to mid-1974, for a total of 400 commissions exclusive, as previously mentioned, of those commissions relating to political partizanship and citizenship.

Mr. Henderson's introduction to his "Checklist," although only seven pages in length, is interesting reading. The following quotation from page xv is relevant:

> Today many royal commissions have become temporary government departments. To a large extent this change from the earlier, simpler form, with a few commissioners, a secretary and a stenographer who recorded evidence, has occurred because of the greater importance now attached to the gathering of data and to the preparation of "special studies". The first commission to prepare numerous studies—18 in its case—was the Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations (1937-1940). To date the largest number of special studies has been issued by the Royal Commission on Canada's Economic Prospect (1955-57)—33 in all.

Then Mr. Henderson speaks of his difficulties in locating many of the diverse reports. At page xvi, he says:

> ... With the compilation of the list completed the task of locating the reports commenced. About half of them were readily available either in the Sessional Papers series or as separate publications. The others which have been discovered turned up in various places from sets of private papers to the departmental files of the federal government.
> In spite of this added effort only 300 out of 400 royal commission reports could be located ... There is consequently little doubt that copies of many of the elusive reports are hidden away in collections of private papers or in other unlikely repositories.

That is one reason for my introduction of this bill, Mr. Speaker. There should be a specified public depository for all commission reports. This bill provides that the depository shall be parliament. Mr. Henderson's introduction alerts me to the fact that the bill may be deficient. It does not deal with the problem arising from the modern trend of commissions to issue "interim reports" and "special studies".

Nor does the bill deal with that recent phenomenon, Mr. Speaker, the ubiquitous "task force," so-called. The Library of Parliament—in a ten year period commencing in 1964 and ending in July of this year—lists the appointment of 19 royal commissions. However, in the last five years of that period, there were 17 task forces or other miscellaneous federal bodies of inquiry that published reports. This does not include, Mr. Speaker, those task forces and other boards of inquiry appointed by the government that did not publish reports, but withheld from the public the information they had gathered at public expense.

● (1710)

I am concerned about information gathered at public expense not being readily available to the public. It should be readily available. It can be argued, Mr. Speaker, that modern royal commission always publish reports. That may be so. But they do so only by the leave and licence of the government.

Under the Inquiries Act the public is not entitled to the reports as a matter of right. This point is illustrated by the fact that the terms of reference of the Food Prices Review Board, dated May 25 of last year, specifically authorized the board to "issue reports, on its inquiries, with all dispatch, including recommendations." Again, when the board's powers were widened on August 21 last year, the Governor in Council, in granting powers to the board, said that where the board deems it necessary it may publish a report on tis inquiries without delay. Here, Mr. Speaker, are both the principle and substance of this bill in governement form.

The government itself speaks of publication of reports from time to time, and of the publication of these reports "with all dispatch" and "without delay". Here are words, Mr. Speaker, that are full of juice to meet the purpose, 100 per cent pure in bacillus coli count.

I suggest to the House that the order in council in which these words are recorded is public confirmation that members of the Privy Council who advised His Excellency to use them are in accord with the principle of this bill and would welcome the present opportunity to send this bill to the committee.

The suggestion may be made that the precedent concerning the Food Prices Review Board is addressed to a particular purpose, and that the members of the Privy Council never intended to adopt the principle of "publication with all dispatch" as a general principle. I refute that suggestion with the words of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) who said at one time:

—there is another side to the right to privacy which has not received the prominence it deserves but whose dimensions cannot be ignored. This is the tendency of governments to abuse citizen entitlements under the guise of privacy. In other words, government secrecy is sometimes legitimated as the need for a government's right to privacy but which may well be a denial of the public right to know. If privacy is the foundation of democracy, the right to know is fundamental to any participation in democracy. The public cannot be expected to dialogue—still less decide—meaningfully if it is refused the very information which would make such a dialogue and decision-making possible. What is necessary, then, is a freedom of information act entitling the individual to information which the government authority has arbitrarily seen fit to withhold. Indeed, as Professor Hugh Lawford of Queen's University has pointed out, the Canadian government has yet to enact a law respecting clearance of, and access to, government documents. The situation both in respect of access to documents in the National Archives as governed by the Public Archives Act, as well as documents still in the possession of government departments, is far from satisfactory.

I adopt those words, Mr. Speaker, and make them my own, just as colleagues of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton have made them their own. He uttered those words when he was Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, and he was addressing Queen's University in May, 1970.

Let me isolate the nitty-gritty of that statement: "If privacy is the foundation of democracy, the right to know is fundamental to any participation in democracy". To which, Mr. Speaker, in humbleness I add a paraphrased commentary from the Magna Carta: "Knowledge delayed is knowledge denied".

I ask my colleagues to support this bill. I commend it to the consideration of the House, in the certain knowledge that it is acceptable to Her Majesty's government.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the bill moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), an Act to amend the Inquiries Act, stems from a natural right of the individual, the right to information. As I have just said, this is a fundamental right and we, in this country, are very sensitive to the individual rights and the basic individual freedoms. We live in a liberal society, we find advantage to it, we want this kind of society and its advantages to be preserved. Any discussion, any administrative or legislative measure which would tend to restrict those fundamental rights of the individual are always the object of discussions and objections from citizens, pressure groups and also politicians. In these circumstances, in these discussions, where we see that these rights are in danger, protests rise from all sides, justly so.

The intent of Bill C-206 is precisely to confirm that right to information. Its aim is to make it easier to exercise this right, and, I would add, to protect the individual against the government's leaning to hide its administrative activities behind the too discretionary curtain of State secret and security.

● (1720)

Mr. Speaker, the administrative machinery of all our levels of government has become so cumbersome and complex that people are bewildered, and feel cut off from it. They often wonder to what degree they control that machinery which, as a matter of principle, belongs to them.

One can guess, Mr. Speaker, by what I have said up to now, that I agree as a matter of principle with the bill now before us. However, I would have certain objections to raise as to its passage. The first would be as follows: I believe that on the whole, one can say that the individual, in our Canadian society, is not hurt as far as his right to information is concerned. The second objection would be as follows: The act that this bill tends to amend is such that we should ask ourselves whether it would not lose some of its efficiency, should we pass Bill C-206, introduced by the hon. member for Hamilton West. And here is my third point: one wonders whether the right of the individual does not reflect upon another right, which is the right of the state, and whether a conflict may not arise here between an individual freedom and another right of the state or the community.

A more careful examination of those three points I mentioned could justify, I believe, objections to the passage of this bill. It is obvious that a surprising volume of information is made available to the Canadian people as to the administration of their country. A day barely goes by, Mr. Speaker, without the editing staff of the various media getting numerous releases, either from government departments or from various government agencies. Releases are so numerous that the mass media are unable to publish or broadcast all of them.

Those releases deal with all aspects of the public administration in this country. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, papers are published by Information Canada at such a rate that I wonder whether an individual would be able to go through them on a regular basis.

As for ourselves, Mr. Speaker, we already find it difficult to go through the releases of all kinds that we get on the information coming from departments or various government agencies.

However, Mr. Speaker, our parliamentary system is another mechanism which contributes to the spreading of information, alerting public opinion on the administration of government affairs, and shielding what can be claimed too easily that is official secrecy.

The official opposition constantly has the opportunity to raise problems and put questions on the administration of public affairs, problems that seem to them as not being necessary for the public good, the better being of the people of this country. I must add, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition is doing a good job. I can understand that the three parties forming the opposition readily acquired extensive experience after several years on the other side of the House, enabling them to do a marvelous job, and thus help people to be better informed.

I would also like to add, Mr. Speaker, that the incredible number and the quality of mass media and information professionals also contribute to fulfill the right to information, a fundamental right of citizens and the community. The volume of information, the aggressiveness of the opposition, the number of media and the quality of information professionals are such that in Canada the right to information is in no way denied or restricted but quite on the contrary, highly promoted.

The second point I wanted to raise is the following—will the Inquiries Act up for amendment lose some of its efficiency if amended as under Bill C-206?

That Act, Mr. Speaker, gives the government powers to institute an inquiry on any matter relating to the good government of Canada, or the administration of any area of public affairs.

It seems obvious to me that if a provision like the one contained in Bill C-206 becomes part of the legislation, the Inquiries Act may loose some of its effectiveness.

Indeed, the immediate publication of the report on an investigation carried out under this act could nullify or seriously hinder certain procedures that should or could become necessary in view of the findings of the inquiry.

On the other hand, such a provision could make these inquiries more difficult. Witnesses could be much more reluctant to testify and to present certain papers in such conditions.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we must think about the harm that could be done to certain people by a premature publication of the result of such inquiries.

In my opinion, our governments do not abuse the secret of State nor the secret of inquiries. Time has shown the validity of the arguments for postponing the publication of certain documents until such time when the results of the inquiries are made public.

The third point that I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, is that in opposition to the right to knowledge, there is also the right of the State to keep some secrets. This right is related to the right of the society to protect itself. This point could be carried as far as saying that this right can also become a means to protect individual freedom.

What I would call the right to secrecy is recognized in our administrative traditions. This right is recognized and easily justifiable by common sense alone.

For instance, one could wonder if parties in this House are shocked and think they ignore the individual's right to information when they make their caucus secret. They are not shocked, they do not infringe this right and I believe that this right to secrecy is justifiably recognized.

One could also wonder if the parties in this House are shocked or believe that they ignore the right to knowledge because the discussions of the Privy Council must be kept secret. I do not think so and I believe that this is justified.

Those who would be shocked about this would certainly not have had to take part in the government or are sure that they will never be asked to do so.

By analogy, it can be said that the publication of the findings or the report of certain inquiries must be left to the discretion of the one who orders it pursuant to the Inquiries Act, that is the Governor in Council.

It seems to me that we are all very conscious of the importance of public opinion in our society and of the influence of public opinion on the institutions that govern our society.

I think the primary occasion on which public opinion materializes can be identified as electoral campaigns. The electoral machinery, which in a way is a symbol of democracy in our society, gives the people the opportunity to convey their judgment to their leaders, at irregular intervals of course, but not exceeding five years. And that opinion of theirs on their government is conditioned by political parties in presence. It is a vast forum which the various political parties take advantage of to cross-examine the administration of the outgoing government.

The actual duration of those campaigns, Mr. Speaker, is not as provided for in the Canada Elections Act. In fact, as I pointed out earlier, our parliamentary system allows political parties to canvass all year long.

Consider for instance the relation between information as broadcasted by the media and the actions of opposition parties in this House. For instance, a program on the quality of ground beef has led the opposition parties to literally pester the government with questions. And that is a very serious matter.

The opposition parties quickly materialize the preoccupations of the people, and information is rapidly broadcasted, whether in respect of eggs, immigration regulations, or again in respect of the cow-calf prices, following the situation in the past few days in Quebec. One just has to take a close look at the questions put to the House to realize that the government is not hiding or entrenched in state secrecy.

Mr. Speaker, no one can obviously question the hon. member's good faith in introducing this bill. Keeping in mind the honesty of his intention, I should like to revert to the principle underlying this bill, namely the right of individuals to information.

However, even though I am personally convinced of the validity of this bill, I cannot subscribe to it for the reasons I have just mentioned.

Those were, Mr. Speaker, my feelings about this bill, and I thank you for letting me voice them.

Mr. Alexander: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to inhibit debate on the bill but it had been brought to my attention that there was supposed to be some discussion with respect to Bill S-11, which has something to do with telephones in British Columbia. I just want it to be known there was no discussion with me or, as I understand it, with other members of my party—I am not sure about the NDP—with respect to that bill, which was supposed to come on today, rather than Bill 206.

The only discussion in which I took part was through the appropriate channels. The parliamentary secretary did indicate to me some time ago that Bill C-206 was to come up this afternoon. I do not like what has occurred over there. I was not brought into the discussions. Bill S-11 was supposed to be debated, and now we find out through the parliamentary secretary—I do not know who it was—that Bill S-11 would be postponed in favour of Bill C-206. As far as I am concerned no discussion took place. I want to let you know, Mr. Speaker, that we take a dim view of this sort of hanky-panky, if you will excuse the expression.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that if there was any discussion with respect to this matter it would likely have taken place with me. There were no discussions with respect to the point my hon. friend has raised. When I left the House a few moments ago I did so in the expectation that on my return we would be dealing with Bill S-11, which is extremely important to British Columbia. We had hoped that Bill S-11 would be brought forward because of its importance to the people of that province. If there were discussions, they were not through the usual channels. Perhaps they were through the most unusual channels.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to try to clarify the situation. I should say that the instructions I personally received as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice were to discuss bill C-206 introduced by my hon. friend from Hamilton-West (Mr. Alexander).

I have no knowledge of the discussions which might take place on the subject of Bill S-11 but I think that we shall certainly clarify the situation because I believe that the point raised appears to indicate circumstances which might seem surprising at first sight.

I presume however it will be easy to provide my colleagues with the necessary explanations so as to prove that if Bill C-206 was discussed, it is because the circumstances warranted it. But I shall undertake, together with my colleagues, to submit the objections to the parliamentary secretary who submitted the agreement in order to try to clarify the situation in the interest of all the parties in this House.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I confess I am taken by surprise at the suggestion there has been any hanky-panky. Someone from the government side did speak to me and indicated that the sponsor of Bill S-11 did not wish to proceed with it today. The fact that a member has a bill on the order paper does not mean he is obliged to proceed. I was told that in any case a day had been set aside for the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) for his bill. I see nothing wrong with that. I am a little surprised that the hon. members were not given the same information, but I do not think there has been any hanky-panky.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I thank hon. members for commenting on the question of privilege. From the point of view of the Chair may I say there seems to be no way in which the Chair can be aware of the nature of consultations which may, or may not, have taken place. The responsibility of the Chair, when suggestions such as that which have been made by the parliamentary secretary are forthcoming, is to ask whether or not there is agreement. In this case there was agreement, and the Chair has no choice but to allow the debate to proceed accordingly.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I was not privy to any discussions. I am not in the same position as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) when it comes to keeping in touch with such matters. I was advised last week that I was to speak today. Bill S-11 is, no doubt, very important, but I was always under the impression that we were to discuss Bill C-206.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) made some pertinent observations regarding the need for the improvement of the rules of the House as far as Private Members' Hour is concerned. Although I do not agree with him that we should be candidates for oblivion I think it might be said that some of the subjects put forward might well be consigned to oblivion, since not all of them are reasonable, or set out in a sufficiently striking manner. I do not have the experience available to the hon. member for Hamilton West and it is possible that the criticism was well taken. Maybe, though, we should be putting forward better legislation.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is not trying to mislead the House, but those were not my words. I was quoting from an article by Mr. Geoffrey Stevens who called us "candidates for oblivion".

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I am sorry if I misunderstood the hon. member. I do not read Mr. Stevens, so I do not know. I should like to see some improvement in the quality of our debates on the principles of the bills which are presented. Possibly we could exchange points of view more freely with regard to the principles of the bills which come forward. That is the main thrust of my speech this afternoon. I hope that any time I say something with which hon. members opposite disagree they will interrupt me so that we can have a debate which would, I suggest, be more meaningful than some of the debates which go on during Private Members' Hour, when speeches made from one side are followed, without comment, by speeches from the other.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). It is obvious that Bill C-206, at least in my opinion, runs contrary to any government objectivity concerning information necessary to a healthy public administration.

I am not at all surprised to see that a member of the opposition—maybe if I was one I would do the same—is trying to do harm to the present government by requesting that it make public all reports of commissions established pursuant to the Inquiries Act. In its present wording, as has been said, the Inquiries Act allows the cabinet to investigate anything concerning the good government of Canada or the administration of any area of public affairs. This act also allows a Minister, with the authorization of the cabinet, to order an inquiry and demand a report on the activities of his ministry and on the conduct of whoever is employed by this Ministry.

At this time, the commission responsible for an inquiry submits its report to the government only who decides afterwards whether it should be made public. Bill C-206 is intended to change this practice and make it mandatory for any commission established under the Inquiries Act to submit its report to both Houses of Parliament.

● (1740)

[English]

I have read the bill—

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member has not read the bill. Confidentiality is still respected.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): In certain matters. But who decides the confidentiality?

Mr. Alexander: Read the bill.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Subclause (3) reads:

> The commissioners, if thereunto authorized by the commission issued in the case, may exclude from a report to be laid before Parliament pursuant to subsection (1), so much thereof as might, if published or otherwise communicated, be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State but nothing may be so excluded from a report except upon explanation made in the report as so laid before Parliament.

Who decides, the House, the government or the commission? Understandably, the scope of any particular inquiry and its scale of endeavour vary in accordance with its underlying purpose, and this of course will usually be revealed in the commission's report. If the issues are narrow and reasonably clearly delineated, the report may read like the judgment of a court. On the other hand, broader and more policy-oriented questions will likely produce a report that speaks in language appropriate to these wider terms of reference.

Nevertheless, a commission's report remains just that—a report containing its own conclusions and recommendations on the subject under investigation. It is not a decision. In the same way that this House must decide whether and how to act on a report submitted to it by one of its committees, so the Governor in Council will have to determine these matters in so far as a commission report is concerned. How, if at all, should it be translated into action?

There may be occasions when publication of a commission's report is itself important to the object of the inquiry. Public doubts and concern about a contentious issue, such as alleged maladministration or supposed threats to the security of the nation, may have set the inquiry in motion and the most salutary means of putting them to rest may, as a first step at least, be by publication of the commission's report.

However, there may be many occasions when this is not of such great importance. The report of a commission of inquiry may be wanted as one of the steps leading to the formulation or assessment of a particular policy. This step, like so many others that are carried out by government, may lead to a public statement of policy, the publication of a white or green paper, or the introduction of a bill into parliament.

But arrival at any particular policy position is, as is well known, usually carried out in an atmosphere of confidence and secrecy. Nobody would seem to disagree that this is a necessary and desirable condition of policy making in government. If a commission report represents merely one step in this policy making function then it, too, like the other steps along the way, should be subject to the same secrecy requirements. Therefore, whether such a report should be published or kept secret will depend on circumstances.

A general and unalterable rule in favour of publication in all cases may be injurious to the policy making process in many cases. Such a rule would fail to take into account the variety of objects that may have prompted the appointment of a commission.

Required debate of a report ignores the fact that the report represents only findings and recommendations, and only of the commission itself. It has not been translated into government policy. The subject of any such debate, therefore, would not be the policy or decision of the government. Debate at this stage may very well be often premature. When, and if, a report is translated into a green paper, or a white paper, or a bill on the subject, it would seem to me that this would be the appropriate time for debate.

[Translation]

The bill introduced by the hon. member for Hamilton West seemed at first glance to bring a judicious change in the situation which exists presently.

However, if we consider it carefully, we find that it features more disadvantages than advantages. I sincerely believe that reports prepared by commissions established under the Inquiries Act must remain classified, and that for the following reasons.

First, the inquiry commissions must proceed in all impartiality and put forward with honesty the necessary recommendations. That would be impossible if the investigators knew that a priori their reports must be made public. They would rather tend to attenuate the scope of their recommendations and please the greatest number of people, even groups, in order to avoid hostile reactions. So, there would be neither objectivity nor impartiality.

Furthermore, those who will give evidence before the commissioners responsible for the investigation must be able to do so in total freedom, so that their testimony may not be prejudicial to them on a professional or human level.

Moreover, we must protect reputations which might be affected due to the simple mentioning of names even though there is nothing they can be blamed for or though they cannot be charged with any criminal action.

Fourth, it is important not to restrict Cabinet freedom in choosing the decision that is best in the national interests. How can the government exercise sound management of this country if, instead of being free to weigh all possibilities, he has to adhere strictly to recommendations made in a public report?

Undoubtedly, the government would soon be considered as being at fault if it did not implement immediately a recommendation of such reports. The government would be considered at fault, and not quite assuming its responsibilities. Such would in my opinion be a very narrow view of government. I believe government is entitled to research and direct enquiries on any subjects of concern to it. Commissions created under the Inquiries Act, aim at serving Cabinet, at helping it better discharge its duties. Cabinet must not become a servant to such commissions, it is the other way around. Cabinet is answerable to the public, and commissions to Cabinet. The reverse would in my opinion be contrary to reason.

I am amazed that the New Democrats did not discuss that matter because in my research, I found there has been in Sweden, since 1766, a legislation on the subject. A whole lot of government information is available to the general public, in cases where Canadian citizens have no such right. Any government document can be made available to the public in Sweden, and since this principle was adopted, such right has been enshrined in the constitution.

In theory, all state documents are public property and each government department must present any document or file requested by a citizen or a newspaper, radio or TV reporter. In actual fact, the situation is much more complex and there are a number of exceptions: national defence, foreign affairs, unofficial reports, and the like; the main thing is that in Sweden, as in Canada, a minister can always refuse access to a document and his decision is final.

So, I do not think that there is any improvement evolving from the statement that generally speaking all commission documents are public.

The main thing is not statements of principle, but the honesty and the morality of the government. Nothing ever prevents any government who has something to hide to avail itself of exceptions included in a bill such as the one before us, and to avoid making public the reports it receives, for reasons that it will divulge or not.

The last election proved it enough. The present government has the confidence of the people, it has nothing to hide. Therefore it must be free to decide whether or not it is in the interest of the population to publish a report submitted to it under the Inquiries Act.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask that Bill C-206 be rejected.

[English]

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) in introducing his bill made some reference to the use of this hour allocated to private members' business which I think is of concern to many of us. However, he did not make any specific suggestions. Surely he would be considered naive if he really thought there was some chance that all, or most of some 150 and more public bills presently appearing on the order paper, and 40 motions, could get through to committee discussion. Quite obviously this would make the whole committee system of this House completely inoperative.

I think that also he is missing the point. He said many good ideas are presented. That may be so. I myself have several bills on the order paper which I think present good ideas. The reason for putting these bills forward is to present these ideas and, as the hon. member knows, via the draw at the start of a session, to give some of us the opportunity to expand a little more on what is back of the idea presented in a bill.

Since we only have at most some four hours each week for the discussion of motions and public bills I suggest that there might be some move toward splitting the time so an hon. member would have the opportunity to present his arguments in a period of, say, 15 or 20 minutes, and the remaining 10 or 15 minutes of the first half hour would be allotted for the response from either the government or opposition, depending on which side of the House sits the hon. member who presented the bill. This would enable us to get through about twice as many bills and motions as at the present time.

We are discussing the hon. member's Bill C-206, which takes a position I cannot support. We realise the protection of the confidentiality of reports under this act is at the discretion of the government which, naturally, must always retain full responsibility for the actions of the department under review. The public does not have the availability of reports as a matter of right and, as has already been said in the arguments presented here today, if this House debates subjects before the decisions are formalized and presented, it may make debatable the actual need for the government and for responsible ministers since, in effect, this House would become the discussion point before the government could make up its mind. It is the government that has the responsibility for determining the direction in which it should move to correct anything found out, or found to be improper, as a result of the investigation.

I also think that the hon. member for Hamilton West, for the benefit of those persons who may, more by accident than design, read what is being debated in this private members' hour, should have expanded a little bit on the bill itself. In that respect I think I should read paragraph 2 of Chapter I-13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada:

> The Governor in Council may, whenever he deems it expedient, cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of Canada or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof.

Then there is a paragraph about the appointment of commissioners and the power of the commissioners, which is much as it is set out in a court of law. Perhaps I should also read paragraph 6 as follows:

> The minister presiding over any department of the Public Service may appoint at any time, under the authority of the Governor in Council, a commissioner or commissioners to investigate and report upon the state and management of the business, or any part of the business, of such department, either in the inside or outside service thereof, and the conduct of any person in such service, so far as the same relates to his official duties.

I have already stated my position in respect of the principle governing the declaration of these reports being at the discretion of the government. We then come to the technical considerations. As the hon. member himself must realize, as most of us do when presenting these public bills, when they are compiled they almost inevitably contain points at conflict with the existing statute.

Let us take Bill C-206 as an example. In the first clause, which is the part the hon. member suggests be added, it states:

> The commissioners shall, within 15 days after the completion of a report by them on any matter within the scope of the commission, cause the report to be laid before both Houses of Parliament.

However, the act itself says in Section 13:

> No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice has been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him and he has been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel.

Obviously no one can guarantee the time this is going to take, and that makes quite inoperative the definition in Bill C-206 of the specific time, which might quite easily take away the rights of the individual.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in respect of the arrangements that have been considered for the debate tonight. I think you will find there is unanimous agreement to a House order which I shall suggest in a moment.

Slaughter of Calves

Standing Order 26 provides for all speeches to be limited to 20 minutes, but it makes no provision for the debate to end until everyone who wishes to do so has spoken. I think you will find, however, that there is unanimous agreement to the following points: First, that the first round of speeches be limited to 20 minutes, but that all speeches after that be limited to 15 minutes; second, that no one shall seek or be given overtime; and third, that the debate be concluded not later than twelve o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is the agreement as I understand it as well, Mr. Speaker, and we consent.

Mr. Caccia: It is acceptable to us as read, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired I now leave the chair until 8 p.m. at which time the House will proceed to consideration of the meat producing industry, under Standing Order 26.

At 6.03 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

AGRICULTURE

DESTRUCTION OF CALVES AND HIGH RETAIL PRICE OF MEAT

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Leave having been granted to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the crisis in the beef producing industry manifested by the destruction of calves in Quebec and the high prices being paid by consumers throughout Canada, it is moved by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I want at the outset to answer briefly the questions—why do we have this debate—why do we have the crisis that now exists in the meat producing industry, referred to in the motion I sought leave to move this afternoon?

Public awareness that something was drastically wrong, that something was profoundly disturbing, was surely maximized last night when millions of Canadians witnessed on television the tragic destruction of some 600 calves by beef producers in the province of Quebec. Such destruction is abhorrent both to the producers themselves and to consumers throughout Canada.

Men do not raise cattle, farmers do not produce any kind of product in order to see them or it destroyed. Hungry people, whether in this country or abroad, and many of them are abroad, do not sit back in any state of equanimity or pleasure beholding the deliberate destruction of food, whether it be beef or some other product. Something has surely gone astray in Canada when this situation exists.

I want next to deal with the question of blame. Who is to blame? Is it some institution? Is it the farmers? Indirectly are the consumers responsible? The answer surely is that none of these groups is to blame. The answer surely is that the blame must rest squarely on the shoulders of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: He, and he alone, is responsible for the total lack of a beef production policy, a lack that has resulted in the situation where producers are losing approximately $150 per calf and have to resort to killing their products in order to dramatize their plight.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, it is the Minister of Agriculture, and he alone, who is responsible for this situation. He, and he alone, has permitted a vicious cost price freeze—squeeze leading—

An hon. Member: A freeze?

Mr. Broadbent: We would have had a freeze if we had had the gentlemen to my right forming the government. That is perhaps the sole advantage of the present situation. It is the Minister of Agriculture who permitted this cost price squeeze which led to tonight's emergency debate.

● (2010)

During the past 18 months we have not had total inaction by the minister. He has certainly been very active. However, the action really amounts to a hodgepodge of ad hoc policies on beef which contradict themselves and, from month to month, lead to solutions which on a previous date were considered by the minister to be totally inappropriate. Let me be a little more specific.

During the past 18 months we have had increased tariffs on beef. These were followed by decreased tariffs. We had the elimination of tariffs. We then had them reintroduced. A few months ago the minister banned the importation of all beef from the United States. He then lifted that ban. Now we have a quota system for the importation of beef from the United States.

I see the minister is making notes. It is refreshing to see him involved hopefully in some constructive activity. I hope we will hear from him later this evening. The minister has done everything but give this country a coherent, rational, beef-producing policy that would, as a minimum, ensure the survival of Canadian produced calves over the coming winter months.

What specifically ought to be done in the short-term emergency situation? I do not want just to waste time by condemning the minister for his inaction or lack of coherent policy. I want to come to grips with the immediate emergency situation by making some constructive suggestions.

First, in the short run the federal government must catch up with the provincial governments. The prairie governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta some time ago introduced special measures to help the producers of beef. They wanted federal assistance. They wanted federal action, but they did not get any from this minister.

Yesterday the province of Quebec took a much needed step to help the producers of beef. However, there is not one of these programs which, in itself, is sufficient to deal with a situation that is national in scope. The provincial governments simply do not have the financial resources to do what is needed in the current situation.

The federal minister must immediately guarantee that our beef producers will receive, as a minimum, their costs of production in keeping the calves they must feed during the coming winter months. That must be done as a minimum, and it must be done immediately. Only by guaranteeing our producers that they will be subsidized to the extent of the difference between costs and market prices next spring can our beef industry be salvaged from the present crisis.

I do not use the word "crisis" lightly. If the product is not saved during the coming winter months it will mean one thing, and one thing only. Next spring, summer and fall we will have much higher beef prices in Canada. The consumers think they are experiencing difficulty now. If the minister does not take immediate steps to deal with the problem over winter months, Canadian consumers will be much worse off next year.

Second, for the long term the federal government must establish a national marketing board for beef.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I expected that. I expected my friends on my right, ever as they are back in the 19th century in terms of economic and social thinking, to oppose a beef marketing board. We have the hoots and catcalls now. I repeat, for the long run we must establish a national beef marketing agency. Without such an agency that would bring to the production of beef a sense of coherence and rationality, the horror produced in the minds of people watching television last night will, next spring and next fall, be repeated in the same minds due to the resulting increase in price. The only way of breaking the vicious up and down price cycle so harmful to farmers and producers alike is to establish a marketing agency for beef.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I say to my Conservative colleagues, and I use the terms loosely, that over 60 per cent of our agricultural products are marketed by such agencies. The only major agricultural product excluded from such marketing agencies is beef. I suggest it has been, to a considerable degree, the sense of coherence and organization brought to agriculture by these marketing agencies that has made Canada one of the major agriculture producing countries in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: What about consumer interests? In the short run consumer interests can best be met by the point I made a minute ago, that is, by a guaranteed subsidy program introduced by the federal government to ensure that calves will survive the winter months. Secondly, the federal government must follow the example of the government of Manitoba and initiate a full inquiry into the beef industry, following the product from the farm or ranch through the meat packing industry to the retail outlets, and eventually to the consumer.

What is needed is a full and comprehensive study of our meat producing industry. I want to stress that any survey that is merely a skimming over of the industry by the Food Prices Review Board will not constitute an adequate substitute for the kind of major inquiry I am calling for now.

Why do we need this inquiry? It would at least provide answers to the following questions. Why is it slaughter prices have dropped more than 10 per cent from last year but the price of sirloin steak has gone up by 25 per cent? Why is it that the profits of the major meat packing firm in Canada, Canada Packers, went up by 36 per cent during the past year? I am comparing March, 1973, with March, 1974. The public have a right to know the answers to these questions. They have a right to know all the facts about the meat producing industry. The government has an obligation to set up the kind of inquiry necessary to provide these facts.

I want to conclude by saying something about the situation outside Canada. I have said we are among the four or five major agricultural producing countries in the world. We are among the four which are capable of exporting food. We are capable of producing more than we need. What all Canadians and people throughout the world find abhorrent is that there should be starvation in many countries of the world, not tomorrow, but today, while we in this country are not maximizing our production of agriculture.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) is here this evening. On behalf of his government he will be attending the world food conference in Rome next week. I suggest that he take to that conference not a general commitment or rhetorical expressions of concern for the well-being of the needy nations in terms of food, but that he go to that conference in Rome with a very specific proposal.

Surely Canadians are capable of producing enough to meet not only their own needs but also the needs of a great many hungry people of the world. If we had a coherently organized beef producing sector, along with the good organization and productive capacity we find in other sectors of the agricultural industry, the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be in a position to go to Rome and make a commitment on behalf of all Canadians so that people would not have to starve this year, next year or the years to come.

Slaughter of Calves

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to say, first and foremost, that one of the things I am appalled at is the cheap politics some people are trying to make out of this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: One of the members of the NDP has made a big bunch of noise about putting the Minister of Agriculture into jail for destroying food. I emphatically deny I have ever done so, and I am amazed that anybody would stoop to tactics that low, knowing my history of aiding other people and taking part in food aid programs. If his party is serious—

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, if the minister wishes to rise on a question of privilege I respectfully suggest he should do so. If, on the other hand, he wishes to fulfil his obligations and talk about agricultural policy, then I suggest he do so now.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, what is good for the goose is good for the gander.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: If the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) endorses the suggestion of his colleague, he is saying that every Canadian should be put in jail, because every Canadian is, on an average, throwing away 400 pounds of food a year. The eggs which were lost amounted to one and a quarter ounces per person. To suggest that I am responsible for what happened in Quebec—

Mr. Paproski: You are.

Mr. Whelan: Some more assassination by innuendo. You are one of the greatest I ever saw at that. In a democratic society, when things like that are said by people without any backing whatsoever, they want to do nothing else but destroy, because they figure I stopped them from being over here on these benches—that is the main reason—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Anyone who says I have not fought for the farmers or not got things done for the farmers since I have been Minister of Agriculture is a stranger to the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby talks about what I have done and what I have not done. I intend to touch on some of the things the government has done to assist the farmers of this nation, especially beef farmers. I would suggest he take a closer look at what was in those pictures last night and learn something about them. Most of those calves were day old calves from dairy herds. They were not beef calves at all. They are dairy calves, and they are not for human consumption until they reach a certain age.

What the minister of agriculture for Quebec has done is a most reasonable thing, and I have complimented him for it in the House of Commons. I would remind hon. members that farmers do not have the same bargaining power as do grain handlers on the west coast, for example. I didn't hear the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby get up then and condemn those men when they stopped the shipment of millions of tons of grain for food to the starving people of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I did not hear him, or his party, or any of them condemn the Great Lakes pilots, some of the highest paid people on the Great Lakes, when they stopped the shipping of grain through the Great Lakes, which is worse than stopping shipments of grain from the west coast because more grain moves through Thunder Bay than from the west coast. We shall never make up the delivery of those grains to the hungry people of the world. Did he condemn them? No, he didn't. Why? Because he knows where his bread is buttered. He was too cowardly to get up and condemn them at that stage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: As I was saying, farmers do not have the same bargaining power as other people in this nation, and they probably never will. But who the hell has condemned me more than that party for my stand on behalf of the agricultural producers in this country? I ran against a member of that group over there in my constituency and, boy, oh boy, he certainly sounded different from that great fellow opposite who is going to support the farmers, with the innuendo about me that he spread among the workers in my constituency at that time. But the workers in my constituency didn't believe him at that time, and they don't believe them now either, as far as that goes. They are about as phoney as a three-dollar bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: The fact of the matter is that we have ten provinces with ten different agricultural programs.

I welcome the opportunity to take part in an emergency debate on the beef industry in Canada. I have had many discussions on this subject with the provincial people. I believe the hon. member would even suggest that we impose a national marketing board on the beef producers. I say the legislation is there. If the producers want a national marketing board they can bring it about in a democratic fashion. The machinery is there. But maybe the hon. member's party doesn't know anything about democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: It is there for them to use. It is like a machine. It is there, and if they want to use it, it can do a job for them. There is no denying that. This government sponsored marketing boards for farmers if they want to use them. But marketing boards will not be forced upon them as long as I am Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: We are all concerned about the price and quality of food Canadians eat. We all know that beef is one of the most important items in every housewife's shopping basket every week. I am deeply concerned over the slaughter of calves in Quebec. My position is, and always has been, that I cannot sanction the destruction of food by anyone in any way.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Even eggs?

Mr. Whelan: Just stick to the facts, that is all. And make sure you act as you have been taught to act, as a good jurist.

On the other hand I sympathize with these farmers. They have been faced with rapidly rising prices for feed and all the other commodities they have to purchase. At the same time they have been hard hit by the loss of overseas markets for dairy calves. In the first six months of this year exports to Europe amounted to only 74,000, well down when compared with the first six months of last year. This situation has been brought about by the world surplus of cattle.

Last year, when the producers were exporting calves there were people who suggested we should ban those exports—that we should take this market away because it was a lucrative one. We did not do so. We let them keep that market. Now there is a surplus of beef pratically all over the world. The situation has been brought on, as I say, by a surplus of cattle, and this is something Quebec farmers can do nothing about.

I welcome the action taken by the government of Quebec and congratulate them for their quick response to offer assistance. I am not sure that all of us are fully aware of the importance of the livestock industry to this country, or aware of the serious problems that those in the industry face, particularly since inflation has been upsetting trading patterns in all commodities. Not all of these problems originate in Canada: we have to react to world situations, and I have outlined what we have done in this respect. In fact, most of the problems are international in origin. Nevertheless, we in Canada have done our utmost to assist the industry and to keep it on an even keel.

The statistics will show just how successful we have been in stabilizing the beef industry in spite of the enormous pressures and price fluctuations generated outside our borders. For example, let me first put the industry in proper perspective. Canadian farmers last year had total farm cash receipts of $6.4 billion. Livestock accounted for $3.6 billion, or 57 per cent of total farm income in Canada. Livestock are not only important to the agricultural industry of this country but to the manufacturing industry as well. The meat processing industry in Canada has annual sales of over $2.5 billion, which makes it the third largest manufacturing industry in the country. It employs more than 31,000 people, pays out $265 million each year in wages and contributes more than $20 million in income taxes. The hon. student from Oshawa—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —who I was told by a hard working friend of mine has never worked a day in his life, would learn a little about beef farming if he spent some time on a beef farm. He also might learn a little about automobile manufacturing if he were to spend some time in an automobile plant, which he never has. He is an expert on everything. He has now become an instant expert on food and beef marketing in Canada. He astounds me. His leader, in the last election campaign, had a two-price system. He never explained it, although I asked him to explain it many times. He said there would be one price for Canada and one price for the rest of the world. For whom was the other price meant, Mr. Speaker? The starving Africans and Asians who make only a couple of hundred dollars a year? He never explained it, neither did any member of his party.

We had dramatic evidence just recently of how high feed prices have made livestock production a very touchy business for the farmer. We have had to cope with some gigantic problems in the industry in the last two years. Anyone who says that I have not worked on those problems and done more than any other minister of agriculture of any government just does not know the facts. They do not want to be associated with the truth. They are out to assassinate by innuendo, and that is all.

On January 1, 1973, Canada banned the use of DES both as a feed additive and as an implant, because of the potential danger of cancer resulting from its use. The Department of Agriculture did not take this step, as Dalton Camp says we did; this action was taken by the Department of National Health and Welfare in the interests of the health and safety of the people of this nation. In February of last year we suspended the tariffs on beef and live cattle to ensure consumers a better price. We were also informed that there would be free movement of cattle in the United States. On August 13, 1973, we imposed export controls on beef and cattle, pork and hogs, to ensure that all Canadians had adequate and ample supplies of meat.

Why did we do this, Mr. Speaker? Because of the price control system in the United States, some sharpies down there discovered that if they shipped meat into Canada they could then ship it back to the United States and sell it at whatever price they wanted, thus disturbing the whole of the beef market in Canada and North America, a market on which we had always relied. Then in September we removed the controls but restored the tariffs same as the United States. On November 2 we imposed an import surcharge. We were asked to do this by the beef producers of Canada. We did what they asked, to protect them at that time. Hon. members can ask any one of these producers whether we did anything to assist them at that time.

Then in March we introduced a seven cents a pound premium on grade A cattle. In April we reduced it to five cents, but extended it to all grades except mature cows and bulls. Also, in April we required certification that imported beef was free of DES. The United States did not see fit to follow that up, but tried to participate in the election campaign in Canada. On August 2, I announced a comprehensive beef stabilization program, and on August 12 beef import controls went into effect. The beef import controls were based on a five-year average of imports from all countries shipping beef to Canada. We could see what was happening to beef production throughout the world, and all these actions were necessary to stabilize our own beef industry.

On October 7, senior officials of my department met with provincial officials to begin work on a truly national plan to stabilize the beef industry. If hon. members opposite had not said, "You are going to have an election, you lucky Canadians", the stabilization legislation would have been before the House and passed into law by now. But they said, "No, let us have a big election," because they said they were going to run the country.

All these actions were necessary, Mr. Speaker, to deal with unusual and abnormal situations in the domestic and international markets that threatened either to depress the industry or to inflate consumer prices. They were all successful, too. We have enjoyed stability of price and supply that no other country in the world can match, and I challenge hon. members to prove otherwise. To October 19 of this year, inspected gradings of beef were 4 per cent above the same period in 1973, yet the price to the producer remained almost constant. Beef producers in other countries have been forced to fire-sale prices by increased marketings. At the present time, top grades in the United States are 10, 11 or 12 cents a pound less than our top grades.

We took action to protect our producers from the price pressures exerted by the ill-advised price freeze imposed by the former President of the United States. The United States Secretary of Agriculture said that any man who put a price freeze on food or beef would be an idiot.

Mr. Woolliams: There are lots of those around.

Mr. McKinley: How much is beef in Japan?

Mr. Whelan: I am glad the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley) has asked that. A kilo of beef in Japan—that is, two pounds, two ounces—costs $25. Let me tell the House about Japan. We protected our consumers against imports of United States beef that had been fattened with the artificial hormone DES. Every other country in the world did the same as we did. They do not import meat from any country that allows its beef exports to be fed DES. Even the energy problem and the rising cost of fuel affected the industry. Japan, for example, drastically reduced its beef imports because it needed the money to pay the higher prices for imported oil. This cut off imports from Australia, New Zealand and the United States. So where did they look for a home for their products? To the old dumping ground, Canada.

However, we did what the cattlemen wanted: we put a quota on all those imports, and in essence we protected Australia and New Zealand as well. Last year, when Americans were buying Canadian beef to try to circumvent the price controls on their own animals, we applied export controls to ensure that Canadians had enough meat, at stable prices, for their own needs. I was criticized for that, too. This was done mainly to ensure that the industry was stabilized, and it worked. When U.S. price controls were removed, we placed a surcharge on imports of American beef to protect our beef industry from the flood of overfat cattle which U.S. farmers had kept off the market in protest against their own country's price freeze, and which they then flooded their market with.

In January of this year, the United States court of appeals ruled against the ban on DES, and Canada required that all beef entering Canada be certified free of the growth hormone. In March the government moved to assist the beef industry and the consumer by applying a seven cents subsidy. During the spring and summer that subsidy program was phased out in favour of a beef stabilization program that ensures the beef producer an adequate floor price for his product. Every provincial program is based on the federal stabilization program for beef. We do have a national stabilization plan which is something that no other nation has, Mr. Speaker.

● (2040)

At the same time we applied import quotas made necessary by the fact that there is a world surplus of beef. We do not want this beef to ruin our Canadian industry, or to benefit from our stabilization program.

In addition to what the federal government has done, most of the provinces have instituted programs to help their producers deal with the particular problems they face. Not all of the programs are the same. Alberta, which is not a very poor province, has funded up to $40 million with the objective of improving the cash flow to small farmers hit by low calf prices. This program is available to Alberta farmers with cow herds owned prior to August, 1974.

An hon. Member: Tell us about federal plans; never mind the provinces.

Mr. Whelan: I have heard what the hon. member has said about the farmers in Alberta from time to time, but I will not repeat them in the House tonight. The Alberta plan is eligible to farmers with cow herds owned prior to August, 1974. It provides a cash advance of $75 per head up to a maximum of $6,000 per farmer, and up to 80 per cent of the individual farmer's calf crop on the date of application. These cash advances are to be interest free for one year.

Under this plan the unpaid balance at the end of one year is to carry a prime rate of interest plus a small carrying charge. This amounts to an average of more than $1,200 to these farmers to assist them over the winter.

I might say that most of the beef producers in Saskatchewan and in Alberta have condemned these plans as something that is not what they need. Most of their associations have recommended that the farmers do not participate in these plans, but I am sure there will be some who will be participating. The program in Saskatchewan is practically the same as the one in Alberta, so I will now move to the plan in Manitoba. This is a different kind of a program. If I were allowed I would ask the consent of the House to have these program statistics printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

An hon. Member: No.

An hon. Member: You have told us what you have done, now tell us what you are going to do.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Stanfield: Tell us how you won the election single handed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Alberta and Saskatchewan have made a move to assist farmers who have been hit with low calf prices, by providing a cash advance of $75 per head.

Manitoba has adopted a program to make cash available to farmers who wish to feed their own stocker calves and have the feed and facilities to do so. They have applied a little bit of socialism by adopting a stocker agreement not to exceed 200 head, or $50,000 per farmer. This plan provides for an insurance fee of 2½ per cent of the stock payable by the farmer to cover 75 per cent of the cost of losses. The program is to be interest free on up to 50 calves for one year, and loans made one year ago are extended.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It was agreed earlier this day by unanimous consent that the first round of speakers be limited to 20 minutes, and that each speech after that be limited to 15 minutes. The point I think significant in the order of the House at this moment is that no one shall seek or be given extra time, and that the debate be concluded by midnight. Accordingly I must interrupt the minister and go on to the next speaker.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased and privileged as a cattleman to take part in this debate tonight. This is an emergency debate of concern to the Canadian cattle industry, and the first to result from a television program such as the one last night, repeated again this morning. Let me suggest that this incident has finally dramatized in a very spectacular way the current very serious crisis on the cow-calf side of Canada's cattle industry.

I am sure all hon. members regret having to see such a demonstration as we saw in living colour last night. However, as a lifetime cattleman I can fully appreciate the frustrations and despair behind that tragic action.

Our Canadian cattle industry has, and is still involved in a series of developments that have almost destroyed our faith and confidence in ourselves as cattlemen and in our total industry. No responsible cattle organization in Canada would properly condone this approach, yet as a cattleman I can understand this very extreme action. Suffice it to say that this emergency debate tonight would not have developed without that incident.

First of all let me give some background information about our Canadian cattle industry. This industry has had plenty of rough times before this crisis. I am old enough to remember my father selling two and three-year old grass steers for two cents to three cents a pound, fat dry cows at the same price, with canner cows going for three-quarters of a cent per pound. That took place back in the 1930's.

In 1948 I attended a Western Stock Growers Association meeting in Lethbridge when the late James Gardiner, the then Minister of Agriculture, was invited and was under pressure to lift the U.S. embargo which prevented our cattle from going south to the U.S.A. The Alberta cattlemen were so sincere and dedicated to this concept that they threatened to secede from Canada and join the United States if the minister did not agree to their request.

He stayed up all night and, although he did not agree, next August the embargo was lifted and the Canadian cattle market shot up $3 overnight.

This is not the first crisis the cattlemen have been through and it probably will not be the last one. Nevertheless the present cattle situation is the most serious I have seen in my lifetime as a cattleman, and that includes all of the days of the depression and drought during the 1930's.

How did we get here from there? What has happened that has allowed present day cow prices, as well as yearling and calf prices, to drop approximately one-third to one-half while feedlot costs have doubled, all in about one year? This sudden price collapse in respect of grass cattle has a chain reaction in other industries, since about 15 per cent of all our economic activity is related to our red meat industry. Our red meat industry has a high economic generating effect, probably the highest of any of our industries in Canada. The cattle industry itself has perhaps an even higher effect, about 17 per cent of our total economic activity. That is an indication of how important is this industry.

Let me point out the most important factors that have contributed to the present crisis. First we have a short-term over-supply of cattle in North America and in other major beef producing countries. All but one of the major beef producing nations have been expanding production over the last five years. They are the United States, Russia, Brazil, Australia, Canada, France, Mexico and New Zealand. The numbers of cattle in respect of this group of nations have gone up 13.6 per cent during that five year period, from as low as a 4.7 per cent increase in France to a 32 per cent increase in Australia. The only exception is Argentina which had a decrease of 6 per cent.

During this interval the world price of beef almost doubled in less than three years. Most of us read the signs wrongly. We argued and convinced ourselves that these rapidly rising prices meant there was a global beef shortage. However we, and I mean the economists, governments, cattlemen, and even some farm organizations, were wrong. As far back as three years ago the Canadian Cattlemen's Association was warning anyone who would listen that north American and world breeding cattle numbers were increasing too quickly.

Most of us, in the midst of our affluence, had completely overlooked and forgotten to take into account the impact of world inflation and devaluations of major world monetary systems. A contributing factor has been the shortfall in feed grain worldwide, which has caused dramatic feed cost increases. I am sure you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the serious droughts of several years ago in the U.S.S.R., China and Australia, as well as the South American rough fish crop failure which caused upheavals in respect of one of the world's major sources of protein.

Then we had the soybean shortfall in the United States and Ontario due to too much moisture. Next there was the aftermath of the United States control program, and especially the extra 60 days during which these controls were left exclusively on the cattle industry. This was the cause of fantastic holdbacks and price disruptions, mostly in the United States but also in Canada. In fact, the United States is still not current in respect of its supply-demand situation.

The third factor is that, more recently, two major meat consuming areas of the world have been shut off completely from the cattle and beef exporting countries. I refer to the European Economic Community and Japan. This contributed immensely to the short-term over supply. The fourth item was the beef subsidy program of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) which was a disaster for our cattle industry. This was the seven cents per pound subsidy on all A, B and C grades of fat cattle. The program resulted in a market drop of about $10 per hundredweight in ten days, of which only $2 to $3 was due to a drop on the Omaha, or United States, market.

This hurry-up program, I suggest, cost our Canadian cattle industry an inventory loss of about $1 billion in ten days. Recent history has proven that the cattlemen were right in advocating reciprocal quotas and tariffs with the United States which recognized the ten-to-one ratio in respect of our respective cattle and human populations. The minister's global quota policy is a good one, and I commend him for it. It is working well. However, if it was the right policy on August 2, why was it not right last spring when he brought in his subsidy program?

Let us now consider the current situation. Canadian cattle producers are split into two well defined groups concerning what should or should not be done by governments in respect of this crisis. The well established cattlemen who have been in business for ten years or more, who are reasonably debt-free—and this includes both the large and the small producer—say, "Leave us alone. We've turned the corner, hopefully, and we'll get by. We want no more government interference, because there has been too much already".

The newer producers, the ones who have been in business for perhaps two or three years, are in a desperate situation. They have paid too much for their breeding herds—as much as $400 to $600 per cow. They were probably from an exotic breed. They had easy credit, but paid highly inflated values for their land. They budgeted to repay this line of credit on the basis of $250 to $300 per calf. The problem is easy to recognize; indeed, it is very real. Some of these producers have already folded up and moved into industry.

This group is demanding government grants or interest-free loans, or at least some type of positive action, now. Because of a considerable sense of responsibility, five provincial governments already have taken some action in their considerable encouragement to farmers to diversify and switch to cattle. The federal government has as much, or more, responsibility here, but so far has done very little. I suggest emphatically that the minister's new support price policy, with the price of $45.42 that will trigger deficiency payments, is not providing any short-term help. There are obvious reasons for this. It is payable only in respect of feed cattle grades A, B and C, but is not paid in respect of feeders, yearlings, calves or cows. No benefit will be available until August 11, 1975, when the first year will end. This is in operation for one year only. It is not to operate by quarters. This is regrettable, since this would greatly improve the policy. If this support policy were extended for another year it could help, but unless the triggering price is somewhat higher, even this is somewhat doubtful.

What can be done about this cattle crisis? There are no easy or apparent solutions. I say that very sincerely. Essentially, and perhaps I am oversimplifying the situation, we must grow and eat our way out of this current crisis. A number of things should be considered. First, let us take the short term. We must recognize that heavy marketings of cows are now under way and will continue. There is nothing wrong with this. The culling of old and undesirable cows should be continued. During the 12-month period from September, 1974, to September, 1975, our Canadian cow slaughter will be up 34 per cent. I say this is good. It is inevitable.

The second point is that the most urgent market problem is our current calf crop, now coming to market in large numbers. We must appreciate that we have an extra 570,000 calves over last year for which we must find homes. This represents the 7 per cent increase in the current calf crop of some 5.5 million. There is a greatly reduced demand for these calves because of the obviously bad experience of those who bought them a year ago. Essentially, they have to go to two broad areas in Canada: the first is southern Alberta and the fringe areas of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and the other is Ontario. If they cannot be absorbed in Canada at adequate prices, they will have to go south to the United States at $2 below their market price which is already $6 to $8 below ours. This is the reason the United States trade information hearing that was held last Friday in Washington on Canada's beef trading policy is so important. If it should result in a United States embargo, our market situation could worsen still further. We should consider an incentive policy that ties in with cow slaughter and would encourage the holdback of heifer calves and lightweight steer calves for future breeding and feeding requirements.

The next point is that in view of increasing evidence of the need for world food banks, surely we should seriously consider a joint program with the packing industry for the freezing and/or canning of surplus cow beef that could be disposed of in offshore markets where there is an urgent demand. Such a program would require federal assistance in financing and storage. Another point is that in view of the present live cattle market spread of 30 cents per pound between top steers and good cows, the time is most opportune to have an all-out merchandising campaign to promote the consumption of good Canadian cow beef, which is generally superior in flavour to younger grades of beef. Most people do not realize this.

We should immediately encourage our Canadian banking institutions to continue to make realistic credit arrangements with feeders. Considerable mutual understanding will be necessary here, but the results could be very beneficial in the form of increased demands for feeders and a strengthened calf market.

Finally, in the short term we should encourage our Minister of Agriculture to get back to the negotiating table with the United States Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Butz, immediately after next week's United States elections, to bring back some common sense to the United States-Canadian cattle negotiations.

There are several things that we must do in the longer term. First, we must recognize that the key to our sagging fed cattle industry is, of course, the price and supply of our domestic feed grains. Until world feed grain supplies become more adequate, our domestic prices will reflect world prices. These will be high and will likely remain so until United States corn and soybean crops are greatly increased, hopefully as a result of their set-aside lands now back in production, but that point is at least two crops away.

Second, governments can help the total cattle industry to adjust to some fundamental structural changes that are both needed and inevitable. We can no longer afford the luxury of feeding high priced grain and protein to calves for some 200 days, or even 120 days. The limit will be about 90 days or less; and that will not be too long in coming. Third, in the long term, our packing industry should be encouraged to move somewhat away from the traditional "kill and ship" philosophy. New "breaking" facilities by our packers or processors will be needed soon, if only to capture our complete HR and I trade, that is, the hotel, restaurant and institutional trade.

Fourth, and perhaps most important of all, our final feed grain policy may very well determine whether our feedlot industry in western Canada will survive. Equitable freight rates are needed here. If the Crow rates are to continue, then they must apply to the products of feed grains as well, that is, moving carcass beef from Alberta to central Canada which now accounts for about two-thirds of our total beef requirements.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, it seems evident that a Canadian beef cattle industry investigation is not only inevitable but perhaps highly desirable. In a full board meeting of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association held yesterday in Calgary, it was announced that that body would be happy to see such an investigation and would co-operate to the fullest. They pointed out that the present market system for Canadian cattle has responded well over the last very trying two years, and has sent back appropriate signals of some very unique situations. With this I certainly agree, and would suggest most emphatically that our Canadian marketing system is not at fault, although there are some who seem to think it is on trial. I say again, and most emphatically, that a national marketing board is not the answer to this crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, a while ago I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and when he finished speaking, I thought that all our problems were solved because of the vigour with which he pleaded his case. However, I always remember that when the House has to deal with crises involving both levels of government, we always wonder who is really responsible while both governments put the blame on one another.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the hon. member of the New Democratic Party who finally obtained the unanimous consent of the House to discuss the price of beef. We have been proposing such motions in the House since the beginning of the session and they have always been turned down by the government. I believe that the situation has reached an epidemic level for our beef producers and that the federal government must act, even though the Quebec government does not want to ask for help, it seems, particularly since the primary cause of the beef crisis is the ever rising price of feed grain which seriously affects the market.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested earlier that the slaughter which is going on in Quebec is almost senseless and quite useless. But tonight, I would like to make quotations reflecting the opinion of our farmers and explaining their behaviour. I believe that the Minister of Agriculture is misinformed or uninformed about the intentions of our producers.

If we consider the prices published in the Grain Chronicle of October 11, 1974, we find that in 1972, corn and barley cost only $1 and $1.40; in 1973, they had gone up to $2.04 for barley and $2.53 for corn. In August 1974, corn sold for $3.69 a bushel and barley for $3.50, and the dealers expect the prices to go up to $4.70 for corn and $4.30 for barley in a few months.

Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that it is not exactly because of a beef or calf surplus in our area that the farmers have to slaughter their cattle, but because of the lack of money, a lack of means to feed the cattle this winter. That is why they would rather kill them this fall rather than go into debt to the extend of three times their value this winter.

However, what is most ridiculous about the situation, Mr. Speaker, is that in 1971, the government was paying western grain producers not to sow their fields because Canada would have had a grain surplus—at that time it was a grain surplus, now it is a beef surplus—which would lower consumer prices. Would it not have been more logical at that time to build storage facilities to guarantee supplies for three or four years in case of bad crops?

Because of this negligence, our farmers cannot feed their herds this winter. They will therefore have to sell them on the market for a ridiculous pricee since the big buyers will take advantage of this sad situation, as always, to get for next to nothing the producers' beef and sell it at fantastic prices. Proof of this is in the fact that the price of beef did not go down one cent at the consumer's level. On the contrary, consumer prices are constantly increasing. Our Quebec families still look for a few pounds of hamburger, the cheapest one they can find on the market, because they cannot afford choice meat.

For months Canadian producers, and Quebec ones in particular, have been increasingly begging both levels of government in the hope of getting relief from either side. It must be observed, Mr. Speaker, that in most cases where governments offered help, it was aimed at allowing farmers to get deeper into debt, to the point that their present indebtedness forces them to sell their land in order to repay finance people, while we are granting loans without interest to foreign countries, to the extent of hundred millions of dollars each year, for periods up to 60 years. I repeat without interest.

But we do not find the means to allow our farmers to secure loans at reasonable rates, in order to modernize their equipment and become truly efficient, as the term is used among self-appointed agricultural experts.

There is apparently a principle in Canada that what is good for foreigners is not good for Canadians. One must then conclude that Canadian loans are first intended to serve foreigners before Canadians may be helped.

As far as direct help to subsidize production is concerned, I believe the government will have to change completely its policy of helping industry by investing more into agriculture, our basic industry, before making grants with workers' and farmers' money to multinational American companies at the rate of $100 million at a time, under the pretence that these companies create jobs in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I challenge the House to find in Canada one industry creating more jobs than farming. The government will have to stop playing international finance at the Canadian people's expense and remedy the current situation. The government is indeed well aware of the situation. Going through the beef price stabilization program, I realized they knew the situation. They could have submitted to the House measures we could debate. The situation is very simple.

There is an excess of supply, that dictates the price farmers need to earn their living, over demand. Prices fell below profitability level. Such is the case not only in Canada, but all around the world. Certain markets are glutted with beef to such extent that such countries as ECE members had to stop imports. This is only made matters worse. Further, he said:

> However, in the meantime, Canadian producers need help during these hard times.

I admire the farmers' courage. We continue to take things lightly, Mr. Speaker, and to give nothing.

I believe the farmers, after all the promises made by the two levels of government, have decided to take action, to use the only weapon available to them, to act in their own way. That is why there were demonstrations, slaughters, and calf destructions. There were not only calves, as suggested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He should not forget that all those calves were bound to become mature. The farmers had no hope of being able to feed them during the winter. This fall, there will not be any shortage of beef, but it will be scarce next summer or during the coming months. An article appeared in La Presse which reads as follows:

> Thousands of calves slaughtered on Quebec farms.

I shall read a few excerpts to give the minister an idea of what the farmers think:

> Mr. Paul Couture, president of the Farmers' Union, disclosed yesterday to La Presse that thousands of calves have already been slaughtered in various parts of Quebec in the last few days.
> According to Mr. Couture, it is due to the fact that farmers are unable to sell their cattle to feeders whose production costs are too high compared to the sales prices. For instance, it costs 60 cents a pound to raise a calf and its wholesale price is between 15 and 40 cents, according to its grade.

Being unable to sell or feed their calves, the farmers prefer to slaughter them.

The Farmers' Union now speaks a different language. There is no more talk about reports, study committees or recommendations to the minister, but of strategy and of fight to a finish with the government. To use the words of the secretary general, Mr. Jean-Marc Kirouac, it is necessary "to settle matters with the province before deeling with the federal government".

Farmers and especially beef producers want a standard of living comparable to that of city dwellers, which is far from being the case for the 38,000 Quebec farmers, except for a few.

The Farmers' Union sent to Premier Robert Bourassa a telegram requesting essentially:

—that the price of their products reflect production costs;

—that the cost of production be escalated;

—that the farm producer get an income comparable to that of the skilled worker in industry; —that a $150 adjustment be given in two payments of $75 in the fall and in the spring to facilitate the purchase of feed grain during the winter;

● (2120)

This shows that there is no calf surplus but a lack of feed, and that is what the farmers are asking for in our area. On October 31, they said concerning the grants requested:

The grant proposed by Mr. Normand Toupin represents approximately 13 cents a pound and applies only to 2000 out of the 10000 producers who need it.

That is the problem at the provincial level, and that is why, if the federal government does not intervene and provide assistance, hundreds and thousands of calves will continue to be slaughtered. I now resume the quotation:

This $2.6 million grant applies only to the producers of slaughter calves, said Mr. Dagenais. It does not concern feeders who feed calves to produce beef . . .

According to the Union, this represents $40 million, of which the Agriculture Department gave $5.8 million—

This serves to give an idea of the amount Quebec is expecting from the federal government. Again I quote:

What is $34.2 million, he said, to save the Quebec agriculture, compared with the hundreds of millions of dollars given by the Quebec government as subsidies and tax exemptions to ITT, a multinational concern?

And what about the $90 million which the federal government granted to the american aircraft companies, supposedly for creating from 2,000 to 3,000 new jobs, when we know the number of jobs created in agriculture? Mr. Speaker, I feel comparisons are impossible in this case.

This type of slaughter was criticized by many people. Perhaps our farmers would have been better inspired to slaughter their steers in front of the supermarkets and give away the meat to needy families who cannot afford it.

Public reaction might have been better, for the general public cannot tolerate to be made aware of these destructions. As far as farmers are concerned, in view of the present situation, they had better destroy these animals instead of getting into debt for three times their value during the summer months.

Mr. Speaker, I wish I had the time to quote figures to give an estimate of the losses in the whole Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area, but since the time allotted to us is very short and I do not want to go beyond, I will say very simply that the hon. minister ought to do something immediately and not wait one, two or three months or till the winter is over to take action in order to put an end to those slaughters of calves. We, the whole population of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area, are looking forward to his action, and I know it can be effective.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think this is an excellent opportunity, tonight, to review during this debate the situation prevailing in the beef industry in Canada. This debate is obviously the result of a series of events which happened those last few days in Quebec and reached its climax with the slaughter of a certain number of animals yesterday in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area and particularly in the municipality of Saint-Bruno, within the constituency I am representing.

It stands to reason that I had to take part in this debate for several reasons. First of all as a member for an agricultural constituency; second, as an active member of the House Standing Committee on Agriculture, and as a consumer and a producer concerned with the producers' welfare, of course, and also in order to ensure food at decent prices to consumers.

Mr. Speaker, what caused the situation we are in today? Why have producers come to the point of organizing such demonstrations? We have to consider the governments' programs and the general situation in the meat trade and industry.

As regards beef, if we look back two, three, or four years ago, we will remember that some economists, some market analysts who make projections, were unanimous in predicting a beef shortage in the world markets. They predicted that shortage and they asked the government to take the necessary steps to provide against it.

Realizing they would be held responsible for that situation in one way or the other, governments responded to the suggestion and created programs to encourage the development of domestic beef production. Canada, the United States, Europe, the Common Market, Argentina, New Zealand, Australia, in fact all the important producers of beef most of which are at the same time exporters, developed programs designed to increase beef production. They had to, because it is not a production that can be increased quickly. Such was the situation about four of five years ago. This government participated in the program by providing assistance to increase grazing land, herd efficiency and to encourage artificial insemination, which developed very rapidly and permitted to increase the capacity of our beef stock, all of which resulted in the fact that our agriculture and our producers increased their efficiency more rapidly than the shortage predicted by analysts came along.

Finally, production was increased faster than the predicted shortage came along. We find ourselves today with surpluses, temporary ones, needless to say, which are going to vanish to a large extent within six months at the utmost and it is possible that prices will get back to a more normal level. If we fail to intervene promptly and judiciously it is also possible that the prices will increase more than normally due to a scarcity which can reappear.

Such a cycle is not easy to control, Mr. Speaker. The beef industry is confused because of certain government measures. We have urged producers to increase their production in the face of a demand which seemed to be on the increase. It was not and we have surpluses today.

As a government we have, therefore, responsibilities towards producers, and we must live up to their expectations and help them. It became more difficult because production costs has increased excessively over the last two years. The cost of feeds and grain has almost doubled which has also been prejudicial to producers. Not only are they not getting a fair price for their product, once it has reached the market, but also it is costing them more to deliver it to the market.

There are many explanations to this, and as I have but a few minutes at my disposal, I shall not dwell on them.

I want to remind you that today, governments must take position on this problem and that the incident which has taken place yesterday in Saint-Bruno, in the Lac Saint-Jean area, has served as a spark to trigger this debate. As a representative of that area, I would like to say that the farmers in my riding are not more unruly than others. It is rather the contrary. They are disciplined producers who are aware of the fact that in order to sensitize governments, and especially consumers, a shock treatment is needed. Consumers have been used to pay a rather low price for food in Canada. They have been spoiled for years and it is difficult for them to accept paying reasonable price.

It is unfortunate that the farming community should have to resort to means such as those we witnessed yesterday on the national television network from Halifax to Vancouver. It is unfortunate that the farmers should have to resort to such means to make the consumers aware of the difficulties the farming community is now experiencing, and especially, which is more important, of the problems the consumers will have to face themselves in a few years if we, the people, do not accept to support the farmers who, in 1974, represent only 7 per cent of the Canadian population.

It is impossible for 7 per cent of the Canadian poeple to continue producing food at a low price and accepting to live on the fringe of society. It is indecent to ask 7 per cent of the people to work, produce and give the others comfort and more. We must take on our responsibilities towards that group of workers, the farmers.

This evening, we are dealing with the question of beef producers; tomorrow, we will deal with that of turkey breeders, and the day after, that of dairy farmers. The whole gamut of food products will have to be dealt with.

We have a choice, Mr. Speaker, we can abondon agriculture to its fate, and let it adjust to the natural forces of the market which tend strongly towards doing away with a third of the farmers, at the risk of perhaps having to pay very dearly for our food within the next few years. That danger exists even now, let us not forget it. Food could even be rationed, we could be deprived of it no matter how much money we would be willing to pay for it.

The danger is real and governments cannot shirk thir responsibility of ensuring decent food to the people. If we are to do our duty, as members of Parliament, we must support the government, the cabinet and especially the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who is fighting with all the the means available to him in order to obtain the support of his colleagues of the cabinet, but who must also get the support of each and every member of Parliament and of Canadian consumers to guarantee the farmers a decent income for the work they do for us, seven days a week, for very costly investments and also for the great risks they take in order to provide us with food. If we are not prepared to give this support to agriculture, we will have to accept the odiousness of the situation we will be in as consumers in a few years.

I say that if we rely on the studies, on the report of the Plumptre Commission or on the report which has just been tabled, Professor Forbes' report, we should let agriculture adjust itself to the forces of the market. If we do that, Mr. Speaker, in a few years the same people who recommend today sanctionning agriculture will probably say: the government did not act timely, the government did not look after the agricultural community and today, we face scarcity, rationing and starvation.

I sometimes wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether it would not be good for us to be rationed by the agricultural community for some time. It is perhaps a lesson we have to be taught and experience. We have been overfed for too long, we do not really know the price of the comfort we enjoy in Canada. I say farmers are getting ready to teach us a lesson. They warn us and if we are not intelligent enough to understand the message they want to convey, I think we deserve punishment, which perhaps will not be very long coming.

In July of last year, only 50 per cent of the expected shipments came in Montreal and dealers got only 25 per cent if not less, of their orders. There was restlessness in the newspapers or on television, everywhere. We heard a cry of restlessness. We thought we would have beef rationing, a phenomenon that had been almost inexistent since World War Two. We did not learn from last year's lesson. We did not learn and if we are not prepared to take steps to help our farmers, we deserve another lesson and we shall get it.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to refer more specifically to the situation in Quebec. There are approximately one million heads of dairy cattle in Quebec. The dairy herd is our main source of beef. Most of the beef we eat comes from that part of the dairy cattle not required for milk production. The cows are covered or artificially inseminated to produce beef animals.

Unfortunately the Quebec producer engaged in milk production cannot have the benefit of government assistance, of the excellent program announced by Minister Toupin of Quebec. I commend him for his remarkable program, undeniably the best of all those offered to beef producers in Canada. But of course it is meant exclusively for beef producers and those who devote themselves to milk production, who are bound to milk quotas cannot get this assistance and, perforce, must get rid of young calves as we saw yesterday, because there are no buyers.

We cannot expect those producers to feed those calves all winter long to give them to us free next spring! That is impossible! What we saw last night seemed to shock the weak-hearted. We saw happen in the open what occurs in the near building that is the slaughterhouse of the Saguenay co-ops. We saw the slaughter of animals. That is what they do inside the building. There is nothing unusual in that except of course that we Canadians do not see that. We are quite pleased to eat those animals, of course, at meal-time. We do not see them being slaughtered and we are untroubled, we sleep peacefully, our conscience is at peace.

● (2140)

However, that is how the animals are slaughtered in our Canadian slaughterhouses, in my area as in any other area of Canada. There has not been any slaughtering of animals yesterday in Lac-Saint-Jean. It is not true. The slaughtering was done outside instead of inside. Personally, I feel too many were slaughtered, I approve of the symbolic protest gesture on the part of the farmers. Perhaps they could have slaughtered fewer animals as a symbol of their protest, but it seems they had to slaughter 600 of them in order to impress the Canadian people. Otherwise, there would have been no response.

I believe the goal set by the farmers in those Quebec demonstrations has been reached. We were made aware, the Canadian public opinion and authorities became aware of the situation. I hope the Canadian consumers were particularly made aware of the problems the beef industry has to face in Canada. We owe it to ourselves to do something and I hope we can rely upon the comprehension and support of all opposition members and particularly on the Canadian consumers' support.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to take part in this debate and I am doing it following the account that was made by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard), an objective and balanced account, from a man of experience, who knows something about the agricultural situation in Quebec.

I must point out in particular that I was listening respectfully to the hon. member's remarks. And I hope that some day his magnificent qualities will be recognized and that he will be appointed as a parliamentary assistant or else to some higher office.

Mr. Speaker, on October 15 last, as I was taking part in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I said, and I quote:

> In agriculture, the government will have to launch a "green operation", as the saying goes, the time has come to give it all we've got. When one considers the proliferation of auction sales in Quebec especially, one soon realizes why the farmers are growing angrier.

And I added:

> Recently, 2,000 of them, in front of the Quebec Parliament, exposed their grievances. Madam Speaker, let us not wait till those people, who rightly hope the governments will solve their problems, grow so impatient that they go beyond the bounds of reasons and are led perhaps into even more difficult situations.

That was, Mr. Speaker, my assessment of the situation on October 15 last. The facts now show that my words which made government members smile at that time were unfortunately too well-founded.

Mr. Speaker, those pictures we saw on television of a public cattle slaughter campaign dramatized the impatience of producers and reminded everyone that their patience is not without limit. And that action we saw was a follow up to an increasing number of marches and demonstrations of all sorts in the province of Quebec which should bring public authorities to meditate on that situation. At the rate this discontent is increasing, we are one step away from social chaos.

It seems to me we have now reached a point of no-return when people exacerbated by the frustration of the cost of living, the inaction of those in power, feel they have to resort to extreme means to draw the attention of legitimate authorities on their disarray. It will have been necessary, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard) pointed out earlier, to slaughter 600 animals in Lac Saint-Jean for the governments concerned of both Quebec and Ottawa to stop and examine the Quebec agricultural record. This short special debate we are having tonight will be of any value only to the extent that we, all of us, deal with the causes of the anger of beef producers in particular, and farm producers in general.

What are those causes? What are the real basic problems in that whole business? That is what I would like to deal with without passion, without innuendos and without insults of any kind.

First, we all want, particularly in this time of inflation, to meet the needs of the consumer. We will manage it provided the farmer himself is satisfied and can plan the management of his business. However, the present situation of fluctuating beef prices makes such planning of farm operations positively impossible.

The federal government bears the primary responsability for the agricultural situation prevailing in Quebec in that it lacks planning in that respect as in many other ones, therefore allowing for the disorderly management of the cattle market and the exportation of American problems into Canada.

We have to realize that for want of an orderly beef marketing system, whatever it is, or of any other adequate solution, the victim once again is the consumer and also, as a matter of fact, the farmer, both being mainly, though not uniquely, people from Quebec.

And yet that situation is not new, since in some 40 years, 17 royal and other commissions, have revealed a lot of inconsistencies especially in respect of controls.

It is no surprise that the present government has apparently chosen for its motto: "Let go and let moo". Let us talk about controls, Mr. Speaker. Are the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister in charge of consumer protection aware of the fact that in Quebec for instance, and particularly in Montreal, swindlers and speculators of the worst kind keep the market under their own control by storing at leisure Canadian beef or United States imported beef. I urge them to check whether that is true, and to take the necessary measures to put an end to that shameful and antisocial process.

The federal government is again responsible in respect of the anger of Quebec farmers, since it has no really efficient control over intermediaries between producers and consumers. And, by third parties, I do not necessarily mean the wholesalers and even less the food retailers, but rather those profiteering adventurers on the make in our economic system and those people are well known to the ministers concerned.

If the governments in Ottawa and Quebec do not step in at the planning and control level, I am afraid that the predictions of some economists specialized in agriculture will become true when they say that in a year from now the consumer will have to bear a 50 per cent increase in the price of beef.

And more serious still, Mr. Speaker, is that every delay or refusal coming from the government in Ottawa or Quebec in answering the reasonable demands from the farmers concerned can only lead to the loss of a profitable industry in Quebe. In fact, we are running the risk of seeing our stock-breeders getting out of the production industry. Such a step would be economically disastrous for Quebec when agro-business relies on our producers for more than three billion dollars a year.

It is therefore urgent that the governments of Ottawa and Quebec, in answer to this green wrath come forward with a real "operation greenery" that will result in massive budgetary votes for the departments of Agriculture.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is a question of justice that we effectively and quickly meet the essential and reasonable demands of the farmers especially those concerning production cost control and raw material price stabilization, as in the case of feed grain, for example.

The next budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), a budget that we are all anxious to see, must bear witness to the importance that the government grants to the farmers of Quebec and those of the whole country. In actual fact, this whole thing revolves around a battle for the respect due to the agricultural class and profession. Mr. Paul Couture, president of the Agricultural Producers Union, had this to say on the subject last night at Alma, and I quote:

> If in one, five or ten years we wish to ensure the population of a good diet, we will have to give the farmers the assurance that they will be able to make a living out of farming. They are sick and tired of being treated as though they lived in a world apart.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the provisions announced to date by the Quebec and Canadian ministers of Agriculture are both inadequate and partial, as they only concern some of the producers. Incidentally, I do not quite see why the beef producers of district No. 6, which includes the territories of St. Hyacinthe, Farnham and Valleyfield, have apparently been excluded from the grant program recently put forward by Minister Normand Toupin.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, I am asking the members of the Canadian government not to let the responsibility for this whole thing fall on the shoulders of the government of Quebec alone. Recent answers from the federal Minister of Agriculture have given us that impression. Unfortunately, in the address he has just made, an address which was sometimes tinged with passion, I did not see where this impression was corrected, amended or erased.

The government members must realize the importance of the problem and they must consider that the Quebec farmers are quite serious in voicing their indignation when they said yesterday in Alma, and I quote:

> We are going to fight this battle to the bitter end; it may be long and hard, but it matters not, we have nothing to lose.

Mr. Speaker, if I am speaking like this tonight, as I do whenever I speak about agriculture, it is not because I have any special experience in that field, far from it, it is because I represent a riding for the most part rural and because of that I have always thought it was my duty, since October 1972, to be there with my constituents and meet farm producers as well as UPA officials.

I know how much the farmers from Saint-Hyacinthe and from all over Quebec, in all justice, need higher income and deserve a more human existence for they also are entitled to enjoy this civilization of leisure.

I have been elected and reelected mainly because I have become the protector of farm producers in my area and I intend in all honesty to continue to be the upholder of the farmers' cause.

Now, I say to the Minister of Agriculture that he can be assured of my sustained and continuous efforts which are identical to his. I assure him of my support because he will need it as he needs the support of all members.

In concluding, I say again, Mr. Speaker, that satisfied farmers mean satisfied consumers. And to that end, we will have to depend not only on statements made during an emergency debate but on specific action. I hope we will achieve something before it is too late.

[English]

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity of speaking during this debate tonight as one who represents an agricultural riding. The constituency of Kamloops-Cariboo has one of the largest cattle populations in the province of British Columbia. I was raised on a small ranch and I have some idea of and feeling for the difficulties now facing cattlemen. Over the years they have often faced difficult times.

I go along with what the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) has said, that ranchers have faced many of these problems before but have prided themselves on not crying to the government for help. As a matter of fact ranchers have often told governments to keep their hands off and stay away because they want to ride out the ups and downs.

I do not remember all the things recalled by the hon. member for Medicine Hat as he has been in the game a lot longer than many of us, but I recall about 20 years ago when the price for cattle calves in British Columbia went up to 35 cents a pound, and that was a good price then. But not too many years afterwards the price dropped to 15 cents or 16 cents for good calves. The ranchers have ridden these ups and downs, and by and large have made a great contribution to the country.

In many ways the cattlemen of British Columbia find themselves in a more difficult situation than perhaps that of other cattlemen in other parts of the country. They have had a double-barrelled bit of bad luck as a result of a drought in British Columbia last year.

An hon. Member: Too many Liberals.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Liberals don't cause droughts.

An hon. Member: Thank God; they cause too many other things.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They are all wet.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Those socialists out there in British Columbia are causing other problems, and the people know what to do about that, at least in my riding.

There was a hay shortage last summer in British Columbia and many of the ranchers had to haul in hay over great distances. Many of the ranchers had a lot of outstanding bills, but as a result of a good market last year some of them were able to get out of the hole. Some were able to grow crops, but many ranchers on dry land had to haul hay from as far away as Manitoba, and even from the United States, at over $100 a ton.

An hon. Member: That's free enterprise.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): The socialist government in British Columbia didn't do a doggone thing for the ranchers of that province.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Just let me finish the few remarks I have to make on behalf of those people I represent, and I will look after the socialists in the next election.

Many of the small ranchers in British Columbia had a double bit of bad luck. They hoped to be able to get out of that situation last year because of good markets, but this year as a result of various things, including the uncertain market, not only in Canada but in the United States, they were unable to do so. I suggest that the price and wage control program in the United States was one of the biggest factors contributing to the difficulties facing the beef industry.

An hon. Member: Who told you that?

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I can give you all kinds of proof for the statement that the price and wage program of the United States caused difficulty in the beef industry. I am sure the cattlemen were happy that the people did not elect those over on that side who advocated a price and wage control policy during the last election campaign. That is certainly the case in respect of the ranchers in my part of the country. They are among the last who advocate free enterprise, and they are pretty great guys.

I must agree with a couple of things said by the spokesman for the NDP. He expressed concern over the fact that these 600 calves were slaughtered and buried. No one in his right mind likes to see a situation such as we had in northern Quebec in respect of these calves. No one likes to see food wasted. In my opinion that was an irresponsible act on the part of those people. It should not have occurred under any circumstances. I do not wish always to be referring to my colleague from Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), but I agree with those sentiments he expressed.

● (2200)

One can imagine the frustrations of those people because of the amount of money they must spend in order to feed their calves. In talking to them one hears that it can cost up to 60 cents a pound to finish a pound of beef. That is a pretty rough situation. I do not believe even the Social Credit economics could work that out, Mr. Speaker. There is just no way to survive in a situation like that.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Give money to the consumer and that will fix the whole thing.

An hon. Member: That solves that problem—next one.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I move we adjourn.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I realize there are varying points of view about what should be done in this situation. There are no easy answers. I have a mixed view about this situation.

When the President of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association was in my riding we were told the point of view of that association was that the cattlemen should be left alone, that they are surviving. I do not fully subscribe to that view. That view might be all right for the big rancher. He can survive. He can ride it through.

However, there are many smaller producers, those who might have 200 or 300 head of cattle. They have been great contributors to the cattle industry and to the food supply of the country over the years. They have a very difficult time. I think something must be done for them. As a matter of fact in discussions with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) I have asked that he introduce a program. I think it is incumbent on him to introduce a program. I realize that it is rather difficult for him to do something at this time when many provinces such as Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta have introduced their own programs.

I should like to suggest two or three things which might be done. There is a need for ready cash. Many ranchers in British Columbia have suggested that perhaps there should be outright grants. I do not like outright grants. I do think, however, there is a good case to be made for interest-free loans similar to those available under the programs offered in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. Quebec probably has the best program of all, yet we hear about government becoming too much involved in some of these things.

I think there is a real opportunity here for the cattlemen to start culling a lot of their older cattle. They should sell many of the old cows. Perhaps some ranchers have been saving them so that they would have more calves in the event that the price should increase. There never has been a better time to cull some of the old crotchety cows.

I also believe there must be a greater effort made to sell more beef. A program has been introduced by the British Columbia cattlemen which I think will be useful. They would like to cut out many of the middle people. They believe the beef is handled too much from the time it leaves the rancher until it reaches the consumer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I was very pleased to note one suggestion they made is that the sale of beef to the freezer market should be encouraged. They are promoting the idea of selling whole hind and front quarters. This is a program they have just begun to promote. I think there are real possibilities here in respect of cutting out many of the middle people so that the rancher will get his product more directly to the consumer. This would benefit not only the rancher but also the consumer.

I have also been interested in the possibility of there being a full-scale inquiry in respect of the beef market situation. I am glad to see there is much consensus in respect of an inquiry of this nature. I feel great benefits would accrue to the rancher as well as the consumer if there should be a full-scale inquiry, particularly in respect of what happens to the beef after it leaves the farm gate.

I am not in favour of a marketing board concept. The legislation is available to the producers if they should decide to avail themselves of it. They could use the provisions of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. The cattlemen do not want to do this, and I do not believe this is necessary. However, there is a real need for an inquiry in respect of the marketing of beef after it leaves the farm gate.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, as a farmer and producer I am very pleased to enter this debate this evening. Although I am not a producer of beef, over the years I have seen many producers of different products in much the same situation as the beef producer is in today. There are many ranchers in my riding which is similar to that of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand). It is in the dry belt of British Columbia.

At this time, for the benefit of the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo, I should like to set the record straight in respect of what happened last year concerning the drought and its effect on the beef producers in this area. It was one of the most difficult times these ranchers experienced. There was a combination of frost and dryness. Not only were their ranges and hayfields dried out, but also the frost killed their alfalfa and the fields they cultivated. In British Columbia the provincial government awarded a transportation subsidy to those ranchers who haul in hay from—

Mr. Benjamin: "Tomahawk" said he was interested in culling.

Mr. Whittaker: I am giving the government of British Columbia a little credit, Mr. Speaker, and members of the same party in this House should take it or we will start talking about the land freeze. This transportation subsidy was $15 a ton. But then they came to the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and asked him to help them with it. At the same time I was pleading with the minister to match the subsidy, but instead of doing that he paid half of what had already been paid. He could have done more for the rancher at that time, but he did not. It cost some of these people up to $100,000 to feed their basic herds, and they had to do it because there were officials from the federal government telling them not to count on selling their herds, but to feed them. The Minister of Agriculture was telling them how wonderful agriculture was in Canada, what he was going to do for them, and to keep producing. But today the bankers are telling the same people that they must sell. The market price today is lower than it was a year ago. This constitutes a disaster for the ranchers.

I know from experience that in the past other producers have found themselves in a similar situation to that of the rancher today. We have been pleading with the federal government for years to bring in agricultural policies which will give the industry a solid base. There have been many passionate speeches over the years on the plight of the farmer and the plight of agriculture, but really we have not seen any action to remedy the situation. No good, concrete farm policies have been produced to sustain the industry in times of trouble. There have been the shotgun programs which the minister spoke of this evening. If that kind of program had done anything to help the beef industry, we would not be here this evening. The minister can talk until the cows come home about the subsidy, the surcharge, the stabilization program—but he did not offer any solution.

We have heard from the government that we need high production in order to solve inflation. When we get high production in eggs and in beef, what happens? If the government is going to encourage high production at the farm level, it should have programs ready to take care of overproduction. The percentage of overproduction does not have to be very high to give rise to a situation such as we have experienced in Quebec.

We heard the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) say tonight that the rancher should cull his old cows. If he did that today, he would get five cents per pound, which is about $28 or $30 per animal. Mr. Speaker, that hardly pays for transportation to the yard. I am very pleased to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave). Because he knows the beef industry very well, he made an excellent presentation of the problem and what should be done about it.

The Minister of Agriculture told us what he has done, but it has not solved the situation. He did not say anything about what should be done, however, or what is going to be done. Last week in the agriculture committee I asked the minister about situations such as the one that caused this debate. He said that the stabilization program should help the farmers indirectly, and that there was the hope that the cow-calf operator selling his calves on the feeder market would get some security. Mr. Speaker, the producers cannot live on "should" and "hope": they must have something more concrete than that. We have heard the fancy speeches about what good citizens of Canada the producers are, and how they feed the nation. But that is not good enough.

The stabilization program will only cover about 50 per cent of the cattle going to market. It will not cover cattle going to market at the rancher level, at the cow-calf level, at the grass-fed level, such as those in my riding and in much of British Columbia. If the industry is to be sustained, stabilization must be at the level of the basic herd. We are in danger of losing much of the basic herd in Canada. The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo told us about the ups and downs of the rancher and the low prices he is getting. Mr. Speaker, I submit that producers today, particularly young farmers, will not stand for this kind of treatment. They want the same kind of treatment that is given to people in the urban areas. They want stability.

Tonight there has been a call for an inquiry; I have even heard a royal commission mentioned. I assume what is meant is an inquiry into the price of beef at the consumer level. We already have the Food Prices Review Board. Is this not what it was set up to do? Certainly it is costing the taxpayers of Canada a great deal of money. I think that the members of that board have done this. I would not want to say for sure that they have, but they certainly should have if they have not.

Over the years, on many occasions, the same type of plea was made for inquiries or royal commissions. Actually I do not think there has ever been a time when any complete inquiry or information has proved that there was anything wrong at the higher level. Let us ask the Food Prices Review Board; they should be able to tell us quickly if there is, Mr. Speaker.

It is at the producer level that the problem which has provoked this debate tonight has arisen. Ten cents a pound for beef at the producer level is a lot of money. It is not the same amount of money when you go up the chain. So I do not think that what we want is an inquiry or a royal commission inquiring into the meat industry. What we need is some concrete action by the government to look after the over-production and to ensure that the producer is making a living.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I must say, first of all, that I am happy to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) back in the House tonight, awake, alert and alive. I think that the type of speech he gave tonight was the first one for him. I have never seen him so excited, nervous and emotional as he was in the House tonight. I must admit that in rhetoric and oratorical style it was one of the liveliest I have ever heard him make. But let us digest what he said.

What did the minister say? He said nothing at all. All he did was catalogue what he has done in the past for the beef industry. All of us know what has happened to the beef industry since he took office. But he did not say a thing about what he would do now to alleviate the situation. He said he would be making a statement in the House this week about his new program. I ask through you, Mr. Speaker: why did he not make that statement tonight? Is that all the sympathy he has for the cattle producers and consumers in this country?

The minister did not tell us a thing tonight. All he managed was to do a lot of politicking and to spout a lot of rhetoric. He has a reputation for doing a lot for farmers but, so far as I am concerned, he has not done anything at all for farmers except to spout rhetoric from one end of the country to the other. The time has come when the minister had better start delivering in the House.

The four provincial governments, Quebec and the three prairie governments, have all recognized that there is a crisis in the beef industry today, and they have all tried to do something within their own limited means. But the Minister of Agriculture has been very critical of them and cynical about them. He said that they have not done enough, that they have not done the right thing, and that they are fighting among each other.

I have discovered today, talking to one of the officials in one of the provinces, that the minister and his officials have not even spoken to the provinces for the last four weeks about the problems and policies in the beef and livestock industry. Is this a crisis, or is it not a crisis? Do we have a problem, or do we not? I should like the minister to answer some of these questions, but he did not see fit to do so tonight when he spoke to the House, and made the dramatic appeal to us to understand the point of view of what he thinks is the best Minister of Agriculture that the country has ever had.

The time has come to do something for the cow-calf operator, something which in the long run will benefit the consumer also.

Mr. Whelan: The government of Saskatchewan did not do anything.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: The minister speaks about the government of Saskatchewan. Let me tell him that they put more money into the cattle industry than this government is doing right now. At least we in Saskatchewan have a cash advance program. The Saskatchewan government is trying to do something, as are Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta. There is need for federal action. It takes money to stabilize the industry, and you must do that at the federal level, not through the various provincial governments.

There is a crisis. What we saw on television last night was something that I am sure all of us deplore. We saw 600 head of cattle slaughtered by farmers. That has never happened in this country before. We have never seen anything like it before. I am sure everybody in this country deplored what happened. But why do we not look at some of the reasons why it occurred?

Why did farmers decide, all of a sudden, to take cattle that they raised and fed in the last few months and slaughter them, one every 30 seconds? The reason is that cattle are hardly worth selling because the price has dropped drastically on the market in the last few months. Prices are down by one third to one half of what they were a year ago. In my riding in Saskatchewan this last week end I spoke to many farmers who had sold cows for eight cents a pound, cows that were at an age when they should be bred and produce calves next spring. Yet, farmers were selling out and depleting their herds. Calves are going for less than 25 cents, some for 10 cents or 15 cents a pound. One cannot find buyers.

When something like that happens, it is a crisis—a serious crisis. Who will benefit? No one will benefit except perhaps the packing company, some of the retail stores, and some of the buyers in the short run who will buy at a low price and sell at a much higher one. What has happened to the price of hamburger, steak, veal, and so on? It has not come down despite the fact that the farmer is getting a low price for his commodity. Despite that, the minister has not seen fit to keep his commitment to the House and to the farmers of this country and to announce this week, as he promised, what his new program will be. I ask him: when will he make a statement? When will he provide us with the leadership that he has promised us? He led the farmers to believe in the last few months that he would provide leadership.

The price has fallen for the farmer, particularly the cow-calf operator. He is the small fellow who operates in a riding such as mine. Despite the fact that the price he is getting has fallen, the cost of producing a cow has risen drastically in the last year; in some cases it has nearly doubled. The feed cost and all input costs to producers of livestock in the country are up, Mr. Speaker.

Some agricultural economists to whom I have spoken told me that for every calf a producer is selling he has to bear a loss of about $150. When that occurs there is no way in the world that farmers will stay in business. They will sell their herds, sell their breeding stock, and get out of business. As a result we will have a shortage of cattle in this country in the next year or two, and if the consumer thinks he is paying a high price now, let him wait a year or two by which time prices will skyrocket because of the shortage of beef.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) speaks about increasing production and increasing supply in this country. Yet we will have a shortage of supply deliberately engineered by this government because it is not doing anything to solve this problem. When there is a shortage of supply, the price goes up. It is not possible to raise cattle quickly. It is not the same as in the case of hogs or poultry.

You cannot suddenly raise cattle. It is a long-term proposition. For that reason something must be done by the government very quickly, and it must be done on the federal level because we need the type of resource that is available at the federal level. It think we must have an emergency plan at this time, a subsidy for livestock producers such as has been started in Quebec. That subsidy should cover the difference between the market price and the cost of production of livestock in the country.

The cost of production is feed costs and other costs, plus the farmer's input in terms of his own labour and profit. If you provide a subsidy you will have the farmers and ranchers keeping their cows over the winter, and next year we will still have the herds we have at this time. That is the only way to stop farmers from selling. If we do not do that, they will sell out by the thousands all across this country. The government must make that commitment. It must subsidize the cattle industry, particularly the small cow-calf producers.

In the long term the time has come for us to say to the cattle producers what they need are marketing boards. They need some organization and some clout in the market place. They must plan their production. The beef industry is one of the few agricultural industries which does not have a marketing board. Look what has happened. This industry has been going up and down. It goes up to the peaks and down to the valleys.

When there is an oversupply prices drop, and then there is a shortage. The only one to suffer besides the producer is the consumer, who has unstable prices in the grocery store. It is time to end the fluctuation in that industry. The only way to do that is to have a marketing board in which the farmers have a voice. They will be able to bargain for their product and have stability of production.

Something else we must do is guarantee prices so that the little guy can afford to get into the cattle industry, raise calves, and stay in business without being squeezed out by the big rancher. I have no sympathy at all for the large cattle rancher in Alberta who runs his outfit like a factory or huge industry. The one I am concerned about is the small cow-calf operator. The Minister of Agriculture should be spending millions of dollars trying to save him. He should be kept in business. He should keep his calves for the winter, and keep his cows to produce next year.

What is so sad about this whole affair of seeing cattle being slaughtered or hung, and food being destroyed, is that Canada is one of four or five countries in the world that are net exporters of food. There is no reason why this country should not be producing all the food we possibly can, and exporting it through the world food bank or the United Nations as part of our foreign aid.

Millions of people are dying of starvation in Africa, Asia and other parts of the world, yet the government is not encouraging the farmers of this country to produce beef and livestock. Three years ago, when millions of people were dying of starvation, the government told the farmers to get out of the wheat business through operation LIFT. That was highly immoral.

We in this country have the capacity to produce. We should use that capacity to the fullest extent, and produce all the food we can in order to feed the hungry people of the world. The farmers of this country want to do that, and that is what the Canadian people want them to do.

A world food conference will be opening in Rome on November 5. One of the proposals that should be made by the government is that Canada will commit itself to supplying a lot of food, beef, livestock, grain and so on, to the world food bank to feed the hungry people of the world. We have not yet had a statement about that from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen).

With the situation in this country, it is time to push for a world food bank. If we do that the farmers in this country will have a stable future, a stable income. There will be guaranteed exports for their commodity. There will not be the constant up and down in the market place that we have in the world today. However, that type of support is not coming.

The minister promised some action. In answer to questions by myself and other members of the House during the past week or so, the minister promised a new program. He has not yet come forward with that. I wonder whether he is waiting until tomorrow or next week when a bit of the heat dies down. The provinces alone cannot save the cattle industry. Cattle are sold across provincial boundaries, exported and so on. Responsibility lies solely on the shoulders of this minister. However, he did not do a darn thing tonight, and the people of this country should not forget that.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us under Standing Order 26 contains three specific elements. First there is a reference to the crisis in the meat producing industry. The second was manifested by the destruction of calves in Quebec, although I am not sure the crisis really started there. I feel a lot of people knew about that before the spectacle last night. The third is the high price for beef paid by the consumers of this country. I wish to deal with all three elements in sequence.

First, with respect to the crisis in the beef industry in Canada, it is quite evident that we have one. That crisis seems to stem basically from three things. First, the domestic and world surplus of beef is quite evident to any unbiased observer. The second is the price of feed grains which has risen between 200 and 300 per cent in this country in the past 12 months. Third is the anticipated levelling off of finished beef prices and the relationship of that to the whole equation.

I wish to illustrate the combined effect of high grain prices and the presumed levelling off of prices for finished beef in the industry. To illustrate that I wish to use an example. In 1969-70 feed grain prices were low. The offering price for calves in that particular period in the calf market for entry into the stocker and feeder market went up very substantially because of two factors. First, the input costs to bring calves to market were down because of lower feed grain costs. Secondly, there was an anticipation in the market that beef prices would rise. As a consequence of expectations of good profit by those who were bringing calves through the system, offers for calves rose considerably.

Today the problem is exactly the reverse. Feed grain costs are up 200 to 300 per cent over the past 12 months, and finished beef prices are anticipated to be relatively stable at the present time. Therefore, stockers and feeders are not willing to pay a high price for calves simply because the equation will not allow them the kind of profits they feel are appropriate. Thus, with the expectation of good profits by bringing calves into the system, people will pay more for calves. When they do not expect to be able to bring their calves through the system and make the same kind of profits as they are accustomed to, they obviously drop their offers for calves in the first instance.

Very simply put, the equation is that as feed prices go down, calf prices go up and as feed prices go up, calf prices go down. In the past number of years we have seen that equation fulfilled in every instance. I wish to give some examples of what has happened in terms of the value of calves in the market, bearing in mind the costs of feed grains in the past year have increased between 200 and 300 per cent.

I have statistics which indicate that in the Toronto public stockyards in August and September, 1973, the prices for slaughtered calves, normally called vealers, were approximately $62 in August and $59 in September. In 1974, the prices for vealers were $49 in August and $46 in September. The average price of slaughter cows in August, 1973, was roughly $40 as compared with $26 in August, 1974. The price of feeder calves, in August, 1973, was $63.77 compared with $40.11 in August of 1974. Yearling steers fetched $57 in August, 1973, and a year later the price was down to $40.22. These statistics certainly show there is a crisis in the calf market.

● (2240)

An hon. Member: What is the solution?

Mr. Cafik: Wait. I want to get the principle established first. That is more than the hon. member who raised this question sought to do.

There is no doubt at all that there is a crisis. People selling calves are getting less money than the costs they must incur entitle them to get. I do not know the solutions to all these complex problems by any means, but there can be no doubt that under our constitutional form of government, the solution, whatever it is, must be worked out along the lines of federal-provincial co-operation. The provinces themselves have taken steps to alleviate the immediate difficulty, and I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of anyone in agriculture that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is lending his full support. He stands unique among ministers of agriculture in the concern he has shown for producers in this land and for the action he has taken on their behalf.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: The second element to which the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) directed our attention obviously concerns the destruction of food in the province of Quebec, dramatically illustrated last night on television. Action of that kind cannot be condoned in my opinion and my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, concurs with that view. One appreciates that the situation in which these producers find themselves must be severe when it drives them to this kind of action. As I say, it is understandable, even though it cannot be condoned.

The third element involved in this motion is that of high prices to consumers. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I should like to address myself in some detail to this question. First, I am a little nervous that a false impression might be created by the motion itself and by last evening's dramatic illustration of the low price which calves are fetching.

The impression may be left that the price of beef cattle in all ranges has declined as far as the producer is concerned. The information at my disposal does not indicate that this is true. Beef production is a complex business. There is the finished beef market, the stocker market, the cow market, the cow-calf operation. Lower prices to the producer have not been recorded in all those areas.

Today the price producers receive for finished beef is not very different from what it was last year, and 70 per cent of the beef we buy for our tables comes from the finished beef market. It is important that consumers should understand this lest they get the impression that, because calf prices have declined so significantly, the price of finished beef has also declined to the same extent. It is true that prices for lower grade beef have declined and questions have been raised as to whether those reductions have been passed on to the consumer.

It is important to note that today in a committee dealing with an agricultural commodity, namely, eggs, Mrs. Plumptre of the Prices Review Board said she would be bringing forward tomorrow two reports on the subject of beef prices. The original report was put out in June. Another will be made public tomorrow, and I am sure all of us look forward to hearing her findings in this area. I understand that tomorrow she also intends to make public a report on retail price spreads in the beef sector, which should give us a clear picture of what is really happening in connection with beef after it leaves the producer and before it ends up in the hands of consumers.

I do not know what these findings will be, and none of us yet have access to this report. However there is no doubt it will be of great interest to consumers who wish to find out whether in fact any lowering of prices to producers has resulted in a corresponding reduction of prices at the retail level, or whether any benefits which are to be found there have been lost through an increased price spread. There has been talk in the House about the presence of too many middle men in this whole process. At this point I cannot make such a judgment although I basically suspect this to be true, and I look forward to reading what the board has to say on this particular aspect.

It has been said there is need for a commission of inquiry under the Inquiries Act to look into the price of beef, or for a royal commission to carry out this task. Since the Prices Review Board will be bringing down these two reports tomorrow I suggest it would be appropriate for hon. members to study them before asserting that there is a need for further expenditure by way of setting up royal commissions or public inquiries. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and my minister, in particular, are extremely anxious to study the contents of the two reports to which I have referred on a priority basis to see what action might be taken to assure Canadian consumers that they will get a square deal in the marketplace.

As hon. members know, the government has put forward a series of legislative measures for this parliament to consider, measures such as Phase I of the Competition Bill to protect consumers against misleading advertising and to guarantee real competition by means of anti-profiteering legislation along the lines of the bill which was introduced in the previous parliament. That bill will be reintroduced, perhaps in a different form, in the present parliament. This bill will, I believe, constitute a legislative basis for the kind of action consumers believe should be taken. I hope opposition parties will co-operate with the government to ensure that the action that we want to take on behalf of consumers is made possible, and that they will support this measure rather than hold it up here in the House of Commons.

● (2250)

In conclusion, I simply want to assure the Canadian public that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and its minister will do everything in their power to be the guardian of their proper interests.

Slaughter of Calves

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, once again I am pleased to rise in the House of Commons to take part in a debate, one that is of utmost importance not only to the beef producers but also to the Canadian consumers.

I was glad to hear the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Cafik) and his revelations. I wish he had stood on his feet a little longer and told the House why the department knew that eggs were rotting on May 31, yet kept the matter quiet until after the election.

That is the sort of thing that is happening under this government, and it is why we have the problem we are discussing tonight. The government has no agricultural policy at all.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member is referring to activity taking place before a committee of the House of Commons. If the hon. member wants to talk about that subject I think it would be more appropriate for him to do so in the committee. I have not seen him do so as yet.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I recognize from that statement that I have really hit a tender spot so far as the hon. member and the government are concerned. The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) said there was a double barrelled problem here. Actually I would think it is a triple barrelled problem, and the third barrel is a Liberal government that the beef industry has been trying to defend itself against during the past several months.

No industry can withstand the manoeuvring that has been applied to the beef industry in the past 18 months. No industry can have six successive changes in policy in that short period of time and survive without problems. I must say I feel sorry for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) because he is having real problems with the government.

The hon. member for Ontario said that the Minister of Agriculture is interested in and concerned about this question, and that he is a minister of action. Unfortunately the only action we have had from the minister constitutes his travels around the country telling the producers what he is going to do for them. I can assure him that the agricultural producers will not accept this kind of malarky for very long; they want action. This is why we must have an agricultural policy that will take into account the inflation that exists at the present time.

The problem we are discussing did not commence with this Minister of Agriculture. It started with the Liberal government of six years ago which introduced the LIFT program. That was the time when the government started to meddle in the cattle industry and encouraged a lot of people to get into the industry, people who should never have had anything to do with it. As a result the Minister of Agriculture is now suffering from the actions of former Liberal ministers of agriculture. He is not getting the support from the cabinet that he should in order to extricate himself from this dilemma, because, apparently the government does not know how to solve the problem.

Mr. Whelan: Has the province of Alberta spent any money on the beef industry?

Mr. Towers: The situation we are discussing tonight can be found all across Canada. Last week calves in my part of the country were given away because they had no value. They are not killing calves in Alberta, but they are of little worth. It is unfortunate that the situation in Quebec was dramatized the way it was, but we must recognize that it happened and that we have to live with it. I consider it immoral to destroy food in a world where there are hungry people.

Let me return to the lack of government policy. One of the first bills that the minister presented to the House of Commons was a crop insurance bill. We wanted to amend that bill but the minister would not accept our amendment. If he had accepted the amendment, it would have encouraged farmers not to go into the cattle business but remain in the production of grain. They tried to use the cattle industry as a buffer, so that if one aspect of agriculture failed they would be protected to some extent.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) has promised to bring in a stabilization program. If this program works it will be to the benefit of the agricultural industry, but it will run counter to the crop insurance program introduced by the Minister of Agriculture. There is not room for both, but if the crop insurance program were made to work properly, it would stabilize the grain industry to a great degree and there would be no need of a grain stabilization program.

I am sorry that people are suffering as they are at the present time, but the Minister of Agriculture will not accept any advice offered from this side of the House. We have made suggestions which he did not accept. When he introduced the present beef subsidy program I said at the time it would be of no benefit to the producer unless chaos hit the industry, and I say the same thing today.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) dealt in detail with the minister's beef subsidy program, which is based on a 45.42 cents a pound average over the year. If the cost of putting on a pound of beef is 60 cents, this subsidy is 15 cents below the cost of production. The fellow in the beef feeding industry will try to protect himself, so he in turn is going to buy that animal at 15 cents below the subsidy price, which means that the selling price of the animal is down around 30 cents a pound. There is no way the cow-calf operator, in these days of inflation, can exist receiving 30 cents a pound for his calves, but there is a chance that he could survive with 40 cents a pound.

It is rather ironic, Madam Speaker, that a year ago last spring fat cattle were being sold in Alberta for 42 cents a pound, or $42 a hundredweight. At 42 cents a pound the beef producers had never made more money in their lives out of the cattle industry. This year, 12 months later, they were selling their cattle at 45 cents to 48 cents a pound, and they have never seen a time in history when they were losing money faster. The reason is, of course, the inflation factor which has hit the industry and the cost of production, something the government has failed to consider or to deal with adequately; hence the problem at the present time.

I sincerely hope the government does not try to ride out this dilemma on the backs of the grain producers. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will agree with me when I say that the grain producer is finally getting a price for his product that will enable him to survive and to buy a few of the things he has been waiting for for so long.

● (2300)

The grain producer has gone through a very difficult period in the last several years and I sincerely hope the government does not adopt a policy that is disadvantageous to him in order to offset or circumvent another serious situation, in this case the dilemma we are debating tonight. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board has been hesitant about establishing an initial price within an acceptable ratio.

Today No. 1 barley is worth $3 on the world market yet the western grain grower is receiving $1.35. That does not make sense unless the government is trying to manipulate the producer into a position where he will have to sell his grain for feed, thereby getting the government off the hook. I hope it is not too long before the minister establishes an initial price for grain that will convince the producer he is not being used to get the government off the hook in so far as the livestock industry is concerned.

I remember the Minister of Agriculture standing up in this House telling the agricultural people to produce to beat the band. That is what they did, and now what has happened? Some 28 million eggs have gone bad, and we have a cattle situation he does not know how to correct. Until the government comes up with a long range agricultural policy for the benefit of the people, we will get nowhere. The government will continue to jump from crisis to crisis, and no matter how hopping mad the Minister of Agriculture gets, as he did tonight, we will get nowhere.

I hope the government sits down and establishes a long range agricultural policy for the benefit of the producer and the consumer, without manipulating one segment of the industry against the other. Canada needs a policy today which will afford the producer a certain degree of protection, guaranteeing that he will not be producing at a loss. If the time comes when we have a general shortage the person who will suffer most is the consumer. After all the agricultural industry is engaged in producing something for the consumer, and if that industry does not produce we will be in a sorry situation in a world which is becoming hungrier and hungrier as the days go by.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, who knows what tomorrow holds? One week, we hear that millions of eggs are being destroyed, the other week that wheat was spoiled in the west last winter, then we hear of problems concerning milk, whole milk, powdered milk, industrial milk. Then we hear that there are not enough workers to harvest fruits and vegetables, and this happens all across Canada. Tonight, after listening to half a dozen liberal members, I find that not one of them has suggested a solution to the problem, not even the minister. We ponder over the facts, and we say to ourselves: we are going to look for a solution, but we always wait until the situation is a real mess before we start to discuss solutions.

Madam Speaker, I ask: who knows what tomorrow holds? That is especially true of this situation. Four months ago, we had a federal election. The liberals are on the treasury benches. That is true. At that time, a dozen ministers visited the Saguenay-Lake St. John area. The Prime Minister flew there by helicopter. The member for Lake St. John (Mr. Lessard) was there and at that time the liberal party had all the money they needed to buy the "two-footed calves" of the area. At that time, they did have the money. Four months later, the same party is in power and it no longer has enough money to buy four-footed calves.

That is a paradox, Madam Speaker. Last night, on television, I watched calves being slaughtered. The member for Lake St. John says the calves were not slaughtered. No, they were doing the same thing as in slaughter-houses. The only thing is that in slaughter-houses, this is done behind closed doors. Last night it was done in public. And this is not a slaughter! What makes it a slaughter is not that they killed the calves. We know that when calves are sent to the slaughter-house, only the bones are taken away, and the meat goes to the consumers.

In Saint-Bruno, the meat went into the hole, along with the bones. The calves were buried with milk, eggs and some dirt. It did happen in the Lac Saint-Jean area. It is unthinkable! It reminds me of what happened 40 years ago. That was a long time ago. In 1934, wheat was burnt in western Canada, because the crisis was international. The next day potatoes were burnt or dipped in washing-blue in New Brunswick, because there were too many potatoes. Thousands of bags of flour were thrown in lake Superior, lake Erie and lake Ontario, because there was a world crisis.

Meanwhile there were unemployed in Canada. Families were not even getting welfare allowances because they did not exist then. A massive destruction of farm and other products took place. The same situation is happening all over again, but we are told: No, there will not be an economic crisis. Was not the destruction of animals in Saint-Bruno an insult to our poor and needy families? Nothing is said about those families. We talk about surplusses in Europe. Production of meat, wheat and other products has begun. Since we are no longer able to export, then let us quietly poop out here. What does that mean? Instead of finding a system that would allow the Canadian consumer to dig into his immense resources, we are being lulled by those words: Sorry, but there was nothing else the farmers could do.

Madam Speaker, the situation is serious and not only in agriculture but no solution is put forward in that field nor in any other field.

I asked the minister a question not long ago. Well, he said, the beef industry is the concern of the Quebec Minister of Agriculture. Quebec says: Marketing comes under Ottawa. We are witnessing a poker game. The buck is passed from the province of Quebec to the federal government and nothing is settled. Attempts are made to lull the people to sleep, but they will not be easily fooled.

Twenty-five years ago, when I was a backbencher, I said, as I say again today, that farming, the farm, the farmers, are the very foundation of the whole economic and social structure of Canada. Dress coats and beaver hats would turn to dust if it were not for the farmers, and yet we wait! The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) finds that amusing. But it is true! Everyone knows it.

The farmer is praised, but he is not given the means to live decently. His is the social class that is most neglected by the governments of Quebec and Ottawa. All other groups of society have obtained working conditions the farmers have been denied. The farmer is "trapped" at home, seven days a week, without holidays, summer or winter. He has to milk the cows, morning and night: they never go on strike. The farmer is tied down to his job. Our attention turns to him only when we are up against such situations as this one. Otherwise, we take no notice. No one offers solutions. What is the solution?

Twenty-five years ago, I suggested building refrigerated warehouses and others in which to store food produce when it cannot be sold; those stocks would eventually be sold normally. The government should give financial assistance to that type of construction, as it did, up to a point, for the storage of wheat. It was not done in the case of meat. That is left up to the big companies.

A while ago, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) said there may be too many middlemen between the farmer and the consumer. It may be true, but what is the government waiting for? Why does it not help the farmers to set up public markets where the consumer could buy directly from the farmer? That would do away with the thieves between the two. Though I must say some distributors are honest.

We have seen backers of electoral party funds, like the fellow Obront, in Montreal, who got caught up to his neck by the underworld for having financed the provincial liberal party. Madam Speaker, those are the people who devour both consumer and producer, the producer who now sells his veal 15 cents a pound in Quebec, when it costs him 43 cents a pound to feed the calf.

As mentioned a while ago, in Saskatchewan beef was paid 8 cents a pound. How come store prices do not change? The other day, last Friday, I bought four T-bone steaks and paid $12 for them; that is the price of a calf at Saint-Bruno.

An hon. Member: They are not yet on the market, the calves of Saint-Bruno.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): They are not yet on the market. Madam Speaker, this is terrible.

In the Ottawa area, a committee investigates supermarkets, A.L. Raymond, IGA, Steinberg and others, to compare prices. We hear on television that A.L. Raymond has much lower prices than the others. After having examined the reports, we note that they are on the bottom of the list and that they have the highest prices. The reports were useful for adjusting prices a little. Whether it is A.L. Raymond or another, I don't care. But it was good for adjusting prices a little. It established competition. There should be such committees in all Canadian cities to make comparisons between stores and to tell the consumer who is selling at the best price. It is a way of curbing inflation. It is not only a question of noting, inventing or seeking, but of obtaining adequate prices. One sells at a higher price than the other, they say. If the public is informed about it, we will witness a price readjustment.

In the meantime, as far as agriculture is concerned, the only solution is to subsidize farmers, allowing them to make a profit on their cattle, to store meat for consumption when it cannot be sold, either through cooperatives, or by building storage facilities, or by establishing agricultural markets where the consumer will be able to buy at a decent price while bearing in mind that some profit must be paid to the producer.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to talk on a subject which, I am sure, leaves all the hon. members embarrassed. I think that no member in this House is very happy tonight, after having seen yesterday evening the television program on the demonstration of the Alma union group, especially when, at the end of the program, we were told that people starve in Bangladesh or India, for example. In Canada and particularly in the province of Quebec, we want to express our dissatisfaction with an agricultural situation by slaughtering calves.

It is not for me to judge such a situation. I do not think that farmers are involved because they love their animals. If they have reached that point, it is because they want us to hear their cry of anguish.

I shall endeavour, Madam Speaker, to make a brief review and then offer some solutions to the present problem. It is a most complex one. Agriculture cannot be compared to the shoe industry. Several factors limit our farmers' income, and I shall only list a few and devell a little more on the two main factors that have brought about this situation. Among the factors that could limit the producers' income when it involves a plant production, let us say that those producers are always under tension or subject to factors which could definitely restrict their crops, namely insects or weather. There is also the fact that these products are perishable. It is sometimes difficult to bring them to the market when prices are more or less attractive. We are dealing with products with short or long production cycles. And yet we cannot turn on the tap when we need some product and turn it off three months later when we say that the consumer market can no longer absorb those products. It is still an other element that may limit the economic aspect of the agricultural industry. A regular supply must be provided. Our economists tell us that an increase of more than 4 per cent of consumption is enough to lower prices much below the production costs.

And now my last point: there is no relation between the finished product's production costs and the sales price's production costs, between the production costs and the sales price. This is precisely the problem facing us tonight, that is the gap between the sales price and the production costs. Since there is no relation between the two, the producer who had to process grain finds himself in this situation which we could express in figures. I have here the report published by Statistics Canada, Agriculture Division, on a comparison of receipts from farm products. From January to August 1974, the overall amount is $3,190 million compared with $824 million for 1970. I am referring to crops like wheat, oat, barley. With regard to cattle and other similar products, for the same period, we note for 1974 an amount of $2,725 million and for 1970, of $1,700 million. So we note an increase more than fourfold compared with the 1970 figures. But relating to cattle, we have barely a one billion dollars increase. This shows to what extent there is no relation between the gross product and the finished product's sales price.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Madam Speaker, I think that with regard to our Canadian agricultural industry, the objectives of the Department of Agriculture are as follows: we want to develop an agricultural industry that is stong, dynamic and competitive on all international markets. I feel that on this point we have succeeded because Canadian farmers are among the most knowledgeable in the world. We come first both in terms of quality and productivity as far as farm products are concerned.

● (2320)

Canadian farmers have bred the best Holsteins. They have developed the best wheat, the best layers, the best beef, the best dairy products, and so on and so forth. Canadian farmers are responsible for the best products in the world.

We have achieved our first aim. This productivity has not always been to the advantage of producers. When we consider the percentage of the family budget earmarked for food, we realize that consumers in Canada, compared with those in other countries, have largely benefited from this increased productivity by farm producers. In Canada, today, the percentage of the budget earmarked for food can be favourably compared with Italy, where one-third of the budget is used to buy food. In Great Britain, Sweden and Canada, these percentages are 25, 25 and 19 per cent respectively. This means that the first objective of the Department of Agriculture has certainly been reached.

As a second objective, we should see to it that Canadian farmers get higher incomes, in line at least with those received by workers in others sectors of our economy. This is a subject which we should pounder more. In fact, we have already done so.

We have won the Productivity Cup, a trophy which testifies to the quality of our products. Here is an example: Although our cars may be powered by very powerful engines, if we do not improve our roads, accidents may occur. In the area of farm products, if we increase production without regard for the needs of consumers, accidents may also occur. Legislation and standards dealing with production are essential. Well, this is exactly what we have done and we wish to continue to regulate this production.

A moment ago, I heard the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) argue that it is necessary, for justice's sake, to go all out and to strain our budget to the limit.

I think that production should be set to order as there is a marketing and distribution problem. This is precisely what we have been trying to do.

One remembers that when we established national marketing boards, we tried for two years in this House to put some order in production, while the members opposite were condemning everyone of our efforts. The Progressive Conservative Party has systematically objected to the creation of marketing boards, but a Canadian association of beef producers demonstrated their support for such a national marketing board with a view to regulating production in cooperation with consumer markets.

The Progressive Conservative members have objected to the creation of a marketing mechanism to ensure a return to producers for their investments.

I think if we consider the dairy industry, we will find that producers cover their costs, and the increase in production costs has affected that industry as well. Nevertheless, they cover their costs and there is a national marketing board which is the Canadian Dairy Commission. There is also another marketing agency called the Canadian Wheat Board.

Madam Speaker, I would like to mention about this marketing problem and the increase in production costs that since there is a marketing agency, that is the Canadian Wheat Board, we should, according to the wish of the Farmers' Union, have some representation in this agency. Going back to the year 68, 69, and 70, when the world price of wheat was lower than the domestic price, producers and consumers from eastern Canada have agreed to pay a premium in order to secure at least a normal income to western grain producers. But it seems to me that the principle acknowledged through the establishment of the Farm Products Marketing Board was a worthwhile one, providing for a distribution of members in agencies and in the Council. Well now, we also have consumers at the agencies level. I suggest that we should have at least one consumer representative from the eastern provinces within the Canadian Wheat Board.

Therefore, I would ask for a review of the Canadian Wheat Board powers, so that eastern producers who consume 75 per cent of the food grain produced in Canada, may benefit from it. I would also consider as a normal step, if we have acknowledged the principle whereby consumers should be represented within the Canadian Marketing Board, that the Eastern provinces should also be represented on the Canadian Wheat Board.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I say that the success of the farming industry depends not only on the farmer himself and his suppliers but also on those at the various marketing steps. Then, we should appeal to the goodwill of everyone directly related to the problem of foodstuffs marketing.

I fully agree with the hon. member who a little while ago has expressed the view that our producers do want to produce. There is no doubt, about that and this is not really a matter of production. We are sure that there is no problem at the production level. It is rather the marketing and the distribution aspects that cause some difficulties and I think that the mechanism capable of putting some order into farm production is precisely the marketing boards system.

[English]

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, this is a really strange world. Every one of my colleagues who has risen in the House tonight has said that he was pleased to take part in this debate which is dealing with a very serious crisis. This crisis is affecting not only Canadians but people throughout the world. I suppose that farmers will learn something from this debate, if no one else does.

I suppose that the farmers have learned something from the many acts that have been committed in Canada recently, acts which other groups of people have committed to gain the attention of parliament. I suppose that farmers have felt that by orchestrating a slaughter or a massacre—as some of my colleagues have termed it—they could gain the attention of parliament. So, finally, they have gained attention, but it is the attention of the government they have gained, not that of parliament. There were all kinds of people in parliament in the last week or so who have brought to the attention of the government the fact that there is a serious crisis in the lumber industry, and in the food industry, but it took a token act of that nature to get this matter debated in the House.

I am a practical man and I wonder what happened to the romance of being a western rancher that people in the east of Canada, and people in other countries, have dreamt about. I will not speak about the causes of this crisis in which we find ourselves. The purpose of this debate should have been to find a solution—the cause is not important now that we have gone this far. Farmers have lost confidence, they are helpless, and this is why they are massacring calves.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has not offered any solution tonight. He could not complete his speech, and I was tempted to rise and plead with Mr. Speaker to please extend the minister's time so that he would come up with some solution. However, the rule did not permit the minister more time to complete his remarks. Perhaps it is for that reason that he could not give us a solution to the problem. He also is a practical man, and I half expected him to say that perhaps we should invent a birth control pill for cows.

An hon. Member: Or abortion.

Mr. Oberle: Yes, or something like that.

The causes of all this are the anti-inflation policy in the United States, the policy in Canada to stabilize the grain industry, and certainly the forecasting by the people responsible for that work. The minister said in his speech that there was a global over-supply of beef. If we speak about the basic principles of economics, there is not a sufficient demand for beef in the world.

Several of my colleagues have said the same thing, that there is an over supply and an under-demand for beef. My God, there has never been a time in the history of this world when there was a greater demand for food, including beef. However, there is no demand for beef with the price tag that we put on it. Not only is there not enough demand within Canada for beef at that price, because there are some people in our society who cannot afford that price tag, but there is certainly a shortage of people in this world who can afford the price that we have put on our agricultural products, not only we in Canada but other major agricultural producing countries as well.

I am sorry that I have to say this here, but I cannot help but put myself in the position of a young, growing child in Bangladesh. It is not very hard for me to do that because I have been in such a position, I have experienced it. I daresay that there are not very many people sitting here tonight who can say the same.

This young boy in Bangladesh sees death around him every day. He watches his immediate family die. He watches his mother leave the place where they eat every day without touching the food because she wants to reserve every last particle that is available for her children. I cannot help but fear that perhaps the small boy, in this modern world of communications today, by some strange accident will read some of the press reports that have appeared in our newspapers in Canada lately. One reporter described the scene of horror in Quebec in this way:

> The tiny black and white calf stumbled in a struggle to escape and its tiny hoofs slid in the blood soaking the scaffold hanging over a 30-foot-deep pit.
> Roughly hauled to its feet, it grew calm, or at least motionless, as its brown eyes stared at the hundreds of carcasses below.

I could go on reading this, but my time is limited. However, it is a beautiful story. I am looking at this small boy who, by sheer accident, reads something like this, and at the same time he might be looking at the eyes of a person dying of starvation. I wonder if anybody here has ever looked into the eyes of a dying person. I have. You can see the sign in the eyes of a dying person for the whole day before his death. It is a terrible story to tell here and I know it shocks people, but obviously it is the only way in which to gain the attention of people. There are people starving to death in the world every day. There are headlines in any of the newspapers at which you would like to look. One of the articles reads as follows:

> There is a severe famine throughout the country, and the most conservative estimates say 750,000 persons will likely die of starvation or diseases related to malnutrition from August through November this year.

We are living in a global community; we are talking about our immigration laws and about our responsibility to open up our borders to people from other countries, and yet we allow people in other countries to starve to death while we dump our foodstuffs.

Another thing that I have experienced, that the little boy in Bangladesh might also experience, is to have lived in a country where people were starving to death and, at the time, to have read that North America was dumping wheat into the ocean, dumping flour into the sea to maintain some kind of market stability. The press is full of stories about our rotten eggs. The global community which has access to radio and television will hear and read about those rotten eggs in Canada, about the calves we are slaughtering, and about the wheat we are dumping into the sea. I am very concerned about what this small boy might be thinking and I have an idea what it is, but I will not spatter the pages of Hansard with it. I will tell you one thing he will be thinking. If he ever gets the chance, and he likely never will, there will be an equalization of the score. However, we do not have to worry about that because he likely will never have the chance.

We have an oversupply of expensive beef and an overdemand for inexpensive beef. We must find a balance. We must consider the consequences of a great number of these small boys who say that some day they will have to equal the score. The consequences must eventually be a total collapse of our system, and even a global war as people in other countries watch us waste, destroy and commit criminal acts as we have done. I consider it to be almost a criminal act to discourage farmers and others from producing all the food they can. The solution must obviously be for them to produce all they can.

We cannot pass laws to restrict Canadian farmers from producing the maximum. We must look at who has the responsibility of paying the bill. Certainly everyone is entitled to a profit. Everyone is entitled at least to break even. However, it has been amply demonstrated this evening that the farmer has not been breaking even. The marketer and the processor have not done too badly.

The farmer is entitled to a profit even though he is dealing in food that is hard to come by for consumers. He can be compared with the person who drives an ambulance. Because some poor guy is lying in the ditch bleeding to death it does not mean the ambulance driver should not receive any pay. He is entitled to make a living.

Mr. Benjamin: The good Samaritan did that.

Mr. Oberle: The farmers have been good Samaritans. They have played their role. There are more consumers in this country than farmers. The government should take the side of the farmer and equalize the responsibility. If it is fair for the farmer just to break even, it must be fair for the processor and the consumer just to break even. If it is fair just to break even, then anyone who receives a day's pay is responsible for the situation. If we look at it in that way, it is not hard to find a solution. We have to pay the farmer to keep these calves alive and feed them through the winter. We might even have to pay him to put them out to pasture next year and feed them next fall.

Mr. Benjamin: But he doesn't want us to interfere.

Mr. Oberle: What I am talking about obviously does not fit into the hon. member's philosophy. I do not think there is much common ground. I am saying we must allow the farmer to break even. It is a responsibility we must all face, whether we are electricians, storekeepers or whatever. Because it is a problem of society, it is something the government must face.

The government must make it possible for the farmer to make it through the winter. He should be given an advance for each calf born last spring or during the summer. He could be given an advance of $100 a head, interest free. This could be repaid after the eventual sale of the calf.

Mr. Benjamin: Like Saskatchewan did.

Mr. Oberle: Saskatchewan implemented something like that, as did Alberta and other provinces. The federal government must enter into partnership with the provinces. If that is what it takes to overcome this situation, that is what we have to do.

This debate should have been designed to find a solution. We should put a dollar figure on what is necessary. I am a small rancher and, therefore, probably one of the reasons for this problem. I am a gentleman farmer. I consider ranching to be a romantic game. I have never really had to work at it, and walk through those brown things scattered all over the field. I see my time is up, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I do not often find myself making speeches at this hour of the night. However, I am glad to do so because this is an extremely important subject. I want to speak about an aspect I think is of very great importance. Although the resolution before us does not explicitly refer to the international crisis, that crisis exists. It is clearly related to what we are discussing here.

We are discussing the destruction of food in the context of the world food conference at Rome which starts next week. That destruction of food has implications not only for Canada but the world.

The situation that faces the world has been set out very clearly in the material prepared for the world food conference. I do not have time to go into it in detail, but it is estimated by experts that roughly 460 million people are in a state of chronic malnutrition, with all that that means for the energy, vitality, lives and even the mental development as well as the physical development of those people.

In addition to that chronic situation there is the problem of the starvation emergency that is facing the world. There are estimates by genuine experts, not scaremongers, that there is a prospect of between 25 and 75 million people dying of starvation within a very few months. Therefore, we face a human problem, a problem of human suffering.

In this context the destruction of food raises moral issues. I am not going to suggest we should point the finger at the producers because of the incidents here that precipitated this debate. I am quite sure the people involved would not have dreamed of doing what they did unless they felt obliged to call attention to the fact that the system we have is not providing them with the incentive or, indeed, the means to produce food in a needy world.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) will be one of Canada's spokesmen at this conference in Rome. At least that is the last I heard. I do not know whether he has changed his mind. In any event, I hope he will be there. I will say something about his presence there later. What I want to say is that this conference will give Canada an opportunity for practical leadership. Canada will be looking to the minister and his Cabinet colleagues to give that practical leadership at the conference in Rome.

One of the things we must do is to maximize food production not only in Canada, not only in the west, but throughout the world. It is true that a major responsibility rests with the developing nations to increase their own production and look after their own needs. But international action is needed to make this possible. They need capital and other forms of assistance which it is possible for us to supply.

It is also my belief that fundamental changes in the marketing system are required, not only in Canada but in other countries. It must be recognized that the agricultural industry or, to make it more personal, the farmers, are entitled to stable prices. They are entitled to economic security to the same extent as anybody else in the community, perhaps more. For that purpose, in our view, national marketing boards and other marketing boards are required. But there is also need for international action which would stabilize world prices for both producers and consumers throughout the world.

One proposal which I hope the minister and his colleagues will be putting forward in Rome concerns the establishment of an effective world food price reserve, or world food price bank to provide the security which is required, and prevent the boom and bust cycle which is beneficial neither to consumers or producers. I believe we should work for fundamental social changes. They are imperative. Although we are speaking of crises there is one advantage about them—they give rise to times of decision. We are now at a stage when the world food crisis requires decisions to be made.

I shall not attempt to run over all the suggestions which have been made to deal with the situation. What is needed is a comprehensive and flexible world food policy, making provision not only for wider research but a co-ordinated national stock policy embodied in international undertakings.

I shall conclude a few minutes before the allotted time but, before I do so, I would say this to the Minister of Agriculture: I hope he will approach the conference in Rome in a slightly different spirit from that in which he approached this debate. I hope he will listen with humility to what is said by those who represent other nations at that conference.

In particular, I believe we have a lot to learn from the so-called Third World, whose people are most endangered by the food prices we are discussing. I hope the minister will come forward at that conference with specific, practical proposals, which will call for continuity after the conference has ended so that the conference will not be solely an occasion for rhetoric, procedural debate and a few pious resolutions, but the beginning of co-ordinated, international action to deal with the gravest problems facing the planet, that is, the task of providing food for all the men, women and children in the world.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Temiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) talked tonight about confusion. There is a lot of confusion in this House tonight. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) talked about the beef industry in general. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), when he wasn't waffling about Bangladesh, also talked about the beef industry.

The problem is not the beef industry in Canada. The problem is the cow-calf operation. Let me illustrate this by giving some data. Slaughter cattle prices in Calgary have gone from $46.50 for A1, A2 steers in 1973 to $48.25 a hundredweight in 1974. That is an increase of $1.75 a hundredweight. The story is similar in the case of A3 and A4 steers. It is only in the case of commercial steers that the price has gone down $1.50 from $40.50 a hundredweight in 1973 to $39 a hundredweight in 1974. The big decline in price relates specifically to cows. In the week ending October 19, 1973, D1 and D2 live cows were selling for $36.75, and in 1974 the price was $21.

It is recognized that cow-calf farmers are experiencing a problem and we must work positively and constructively to resolve it, and do so quickly.

The Ontario Federation of Agriculture has recommended to the Ontario government that a program be launched which would enable beef farmers to keep their herds intact, rather that force them to slaughter cattle because they cannot afford to feed them. This program would involve payments of $100 for each culled cow slaughtered for sale, and $25 for each calf introduced into or maintained in a herd. In the short term, this would provide cash to the farmer to improve his cash flow problem. In the long term, this would provide safeguards against a possible future situation in which we might be faced with a shortage of beef, perhaps as soon as 1976. Such a shortage may develop if farmers continue to slaughter feeder calves.

In order to maintain herds in the best condition, and still allow for some thinning out in order to save feed costs, it is suggested that a certain percentage of a herd, say 20 per cent of the poorest quality cattle, be slaughtered. These could be sold as cutters and canners, and the breeding stock would not be depleted as is now the case.

This would improve the quality of the herds and contribute to improving agricultural efficiency, as well as answer the criticism made by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) in his comments on the suggestions put forward by the hon. member from Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand). The farmer would get $100 per animal, not $38 as stated by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

It is extremely important that the provinces act with the federal government to work out, as soon as possible, a uniform policy for the whole country. This is not being done at present. Alberta and Saskatchewan have moved to improve the cash flow to farmers hit by low cow prices by paying cash advances of $75 per head. Manitoba has made cash advances available to farmers who wish to feed their own stocker calves. Ontario has provided low interest loans to producers of feeder calves. Quebec has made outright grants to help farmers winter their animals. New Brunswick will pay farmers up to $5,000 over the next three years to help them increase the size of their herds. All this has been done without consulting the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

It is important that there be a truly national plan to ensure that the beef industry survives and that the consumer gets top quality meat at a fair price. These two things are more closely interrelated than most people realize, because if the beef industry falters in the face of unrealistically low prices the result will be abnormally high prices for consumers in the future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Twelve o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. It being twelve o'clock midnight, pursuant to order made earlier today the debate is deemed to have been concluded, and I therefore declare the motion carried.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

PRIVILEGE

MR. NYSTROM—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT MADE OUTSIDE THE HOUSE BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It arises out of a statement which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) reportedly made outside the House last evening. During a special debate yesterday, the minister had an opportunity to make an announcement on what he would do regarding beef prices in this country. However, no announcement of new policy was made by the minister in the House last evening.

Earlier in the week the minister promised that such an announcement would be made sometime this week. Last evening I drew this to his attention, as did other members, but we received no response. The minister then went outside this House and reportedly made to the press a specific commitment on two aspects of the motion before the House. I believe it is an infringement upon the rights and privileges of all members of this House for any minister of the Crown to refuse to announce a new policy in the House and then speak to the press outside, while the debate is in progress, and announce two new aspects of a policy which he should have announced in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I think it is an infringement on the rights and privileges of all members of the House, regardless of which side they may sit. If Your Honour finds that I have a question of privilege, I will move that the Minister of Agriculture be asked to make a statement in the House this morning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the so-called question of privilege, I suggest that the hon. member either get the tapes or talk to the members of the press about what I said. I made myself very clear.

Last night my time ran out after 20 minutes. I understood I could not re-enter the debate. I could not say anything more in the House because the Speaker had called me to order. At that stage I had not realized my time was up. However, I announced no new policies. I asked farmers to have confidence in the policies which have always taken care of those in the beef industry. With regard to the inquiry, I said we were waiting for the results of the Food Prices Review Board report, but we were prepared to go ahead with an inquiry if that report did not accomplish the things we thought it should.

● (1110)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville was good enough to give the Chair notice of his intention to raise this question of privilege and I thought I should hear from him about the specific nature of the allegation and the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture. I have heard from the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville and briefly from the minister. There are numerous precedents which indicate most clearly, that statements made outside the House of Commons do not constitute a breach of privilege. Furthermore, hon. members may be critical of statements made by ministers or others outside the House, and they may legitimately be the subject of debate or questioning but they do not constitute a question of privilege. The citations on both counts are numerous and I do not propose to take the time of the House by reading them. I therefore rule that a prima facie case of a question of privilege does not exist.

Mr. Lawrence: On a separate question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, even though it relates to the same matter, is there any way in which members on this side of the House can convince you that there was a very definite new statement of government policy made outside this chamber last night? I have the tapes—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —if you require them—if you require the actual words the minister used.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think I can make my disposition of this matter any clearer than I have.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEADERSHIP OF DELEGATION TO WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Robert Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of rule 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Egmont, and in a case of urgent and pressing necessity, I seek consent to move:

That it is the sense of this House, being conscious of the great importance of the forthcoming world food conference in Rome to millions of people who are suffering from malnutrition, hunger and the threat of death by starvation, that the Canadian delegation led by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Agriculture will be able to give leadership to meet the urgent challenge to humanity which faces the conference.

I understand, after some discussion among members, that if the motion is permitted it will be accepted without debate.

Some hon. Members: What motion?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That will be a new experience.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion which is proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without unanimous consent.

Mr. Woolliams: What is the motion? Nobody heard any motion.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I thought everyone heard the motion as it was read. The motion is:

That it is the sense of this House, being conscious of the great importance of the forthcoming world food conference in Rome to millions of people who are suffering from malnutrition hunger and the threat of death by starvation, that the Canadian delegation led by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Agriculture will be able to give leadership to meet the urgent challenge to humanity which faces the conference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TABLING OF PRIME MINISTER'S INVITATION TO PROVINCIAL PREMIERS TO ATTEND CONFERENCE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I was asked about correspondence preparatory to the meeting which took place the day before yesterday. I was asked by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham whether I would table the correspondence. Under Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table copies of the Telex that I sent to the premiers inviting them to attend the meeting on Wednesday. In essence, all their answers accepted the invitation. I have not had clearance from all of them as of yet to table their answers, but I am sure it will be forthcoming if the hon. member still desires it. For today, I should like to table a copy of my Telex.

HOUSING

STATEMENT ON LEGISLATION CONCERNING $500 GRANT

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement concerning forthcoming legislation. I should like to confirm the government's intention to introduce in the House very soon legislation which would authorize, for a one-year period, the payment of a $500 grant to people buying a new home for the first time, provided the home is moderately priced. For this purpose a home may be defined as a principal residence of permanent type which conforms to local standards or by-laws.

This measure was a commitment made by the government during the election campaign in order to make it easier for families to purchase their first home. Rather than wait until legislation can pass through the House, I wish to make this benefit available to families immediately and to remove any uncertainty on the part of the home buyer or the housing industry.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the House and the people of Canada that when this legislation is presented to hon. members for their approval, it will stipulate that the grants will be payable to people who fulfil the required conditions and who purchase and occupy their new homes on or after this day, November 1, 1974, until November 1, 1975. In other words, the legislation, if approved, would be retroactive and would benefit people who bought and occupied their new house now, without waiting any longer.

The conditions under which the grants may be paid will be spelled out in the legislation but I would like today to review our intention in general terms.

The homeowner grant would be payable to people who are buying a new home for the first time, within price limits which vary by market area. They will be those used by CMHC in setting the upper limit of loans it will insure under the National Housing Act. In Regina, for instance, the grant would be payable to someone buying a house costing $31,580. In Toronto, where costs are substantially higher, the maximum price eligible for a grant would be $44,915.

The legislation will provide that the housing must be new, not previously occupied and must be the owner's principal residence. At such time as the legislation may be approved, the owner who has bought and occupied his new home may apply to the local Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation office which would process his application and, if it is acceptable, send him a cheque.

This grant will be a selective measure, Mr. Speaker, directed to those who need help. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pointed out in announcing the government's intention:

It will go directly to the home buyer—to the consumer. It will not be available to housing speculators or to the wealthy purchasing expensive homes. It will be available to first time buyers of moderately priced homes.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation will find favour among hon. members when it is presented as a timely help for a very large number of Canadian families. It is an important initiative in the broad range of federal housing measures and one of a number of proposals which I shall be presenting to the House during this session of parliament.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to thank the minister for sending me a copy of his statement. I received it about a quarter to eleven and I would have been concerned if there had been very much in it, particularly with a housing crisis of the proportion that we have today.

At the outset I might say that I am very happy to get some confirmation at least on this matter, because when the House first convened for this parliament I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about this promise and he sort of threw up his hands and gave one of those evasive answers to the effect that within the next four or five years some legislation would be introduced.

I think we must take a look at this program. First of all it provides $500 to anyone who purchases a new home at a moderate price. Those are important words when you analyse the degree of inflation in this country and in the United States today. As one of my friends pointed out a few minutes ago, the present rate of inflation is about 10 per cent so that the price of a house in the category set out in the second paragraph of the statement would increase from between about $4,000 to $5,000. Keeping that in mind, this is really not going to do very much to assist these people.

I should like to ask the minister one question through you, Mr. Speaker, about this most unusual procedure. If this government is as honest, as credible and has the degree of integrity it attempts to hold out why did the minister not present a bill today for first reading? In this way we would not only know that the $500 is to be provided for by legislation, but we would then have the opportunity to see the law and the regulations regarding the manner in which this money would be paid.

Mr. Stanfield: He is not ready.

Mr. Woolliams: Of course, the reason we have received a statement rather than a bill is that we have flushed this government out. During the election campaign it made about $2.5 billion worth of promises across this nation. I suggest the only person who really has not had a heart attack over this is probably the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), who is too busy trying to wiggle out of these promises.

Why was a bill not presented in order that we might know the terms and conditions of this proposal? I suggest today we have a very serious housing crisis. This matter is so important that I should like to spend a few minutes on it. It is interesting to note that on October 2, I posed a question concerning the drop in housing starts of 24.3 per cent over last year. In fact, housing starts for September were down 35 per cent. When I brought these figures to the attention of the new minister he said, as reported in Hansard for that date at page 28:

—I suggest there is not a housing crisis in this country.

When the minister held a press conference, and I draw this to his attention, he said, and I quote from the Vancouver Province of October 21:

Danson says he's "about to present new ideas to cabinet" to help solve the housing mess.

That statement was made about the time he was denying in the House that there was any mess or crisis. I do not know whether anyone can take him seriously when, at one time he holds a press conference at which he states there is no mess, while at another time he admits in the House that there is. Perhaps the minister has gone to his colleague the Minister of Finance with his cap in his hand. In any event, he is always talking about AHOP under which $467 million has been spent. I understand there is about $47 million to $50 million left under that program, so it is about to die when there is an actual housing crisis in this country.

Unless this government comes to grips with ever increasing inflation, high interest rates and the fact that the average man, even with both he and his wife working, cannot afford the down payment on a new house, this program which is really a government subsidy program, will go bad. If it merely provides the $500 to the developer or the builder and not to the purchaser, and I am concerned about that, it might be known as the "rotten egg" housing program. I suggest it will be about as effective if the grant goes to the developer or the builder and not the purchaser, and that is our fear.

It would have been far more effective had this government repealed the 11 per cent sales tax on building material, and that would be far more realistic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: It is my hope that the minister will bring in legislation immediately so that we can see whether it includes safeguards of such a nature that the $500 will go to the purchaser and not the builder or developer.

We found out by examining the estimates that nothing was really being done about land banking in this country. No money has been spent on the new demonstration program, and I suggest if there had been this would not have built even one new house. In any event, if the money is being spent that program is costing the country $55,000 a day without one new house for anyone and without any real effect in curbing the housing crisis. My final word on this matter is that the minister should go back to his colleagues for some concrete policy that will curb inflation, and in that way he will be doing something about the housing crisis in this nation which he denies exists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I am appalled, shocked, disgusted and dismayed at the statement of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) in charge of housing. He is beginning to sound more and more like the Minister of Agriculture—all huff and all puff. The $500 grant to first-time purchasers of new homes will not help solve the housing crisis. It is very much like giving a peanut to a starving elephant. What we need to solve the problem is action to increase the supply of houses, action with regard to decreasing the interest rate and action with regard to the diffusion of moneys to increase the land banking and the servicing of lots across the country.

With regard to increasing the supply of houses we have had an announcement that there will be a 25 per cent drop in respect of housing starts this year. With regard to interest rates no action whatsoever has been taken to decrease the interest rates. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that if a person were to buy a home with a $35,000 mortgage at 11 per cent it would take him 25 years to pay if off at a rate of $350 a month. After 25 years, he would have paid $100,000. This action does nothing to help the serious housing crisis across the country. We need action. Members of the New Democratic Party have mentioned that there should be a revolving fund with regard to land banking, and there should be a massive infusion of money for the servicing of land across the country so that more housing may be available.

This is a miserable offer to solve the housing crisis across the country. When one looks at the restrictions related to the $500 grant, one finds that it must be a new house and that the person involved must be a first-time purchaser. Then, there are the limits with regard to price. The limit the minister mentioned in respect of Regina would be $31,580 and the limit in respect of Toronto would be $44,915. The average price of a house in Toronto is $55,000. I would invite the minister to take me to any place in Toronto and show me a new house that could be purchased for a price of $44,000 or less.

This is legislation by announcement. If the minister wanted to bring forward this meagre measure, why could he not have translated it into legislation immediately and have it passed. He does not want to do it. He wants to spin it out and be a part of this slow progress for which the Liberal government is so well noted. As I said, this minister is not a minister of housing but of hoaxing. This is a cruel hoax on the purchasers of homes in Canada. I would remind the minister that the philosophy announced by his predecessor is that every Canadian is entitled to a home at a reasonable cost. This minister is not implementing that philosophy. It is about time he stopped this hoax and took the initiative with regard to this serious problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have heard and read the statement made by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) in which he says that only first-time buyers of new moderately priced homes can benefit from the $500 grant for a moderately priced home of $31,850 or a $44,915 home in Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that this statement and the legislation which we eventually will have before us is a sheer mockery at the population. Indeed, of the ordinary workers who constitute the very broad majority of our population and who earn $8,000, $9,000 or $10,000 a year, who are those who can afford a $44,000 or a $31,000 house? It is true that it is somewhat impossible to buy anything cheaper these days, but that does not mean that it is a moderate price; it is rather a prohibitive one. That is the problem. And we will not assist home ownership with a legislation providing for a $500 grant for people buying a new home, when the sales tax on building materials stays at 11 per cent. That means about $3,000 on any house within the categories mentioned by the government.

There is another point. When a Canadian citizen buys a home and seeks financing with banks or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to whom he has to pay a 12, 13 or 15 per cent interest rate, instead of the 7 or 8 per cent interest rate of yesteryear, Mr. Speaker, what is the $500 good for? There will not be, I believe, 2,000 people across Canada who will avail themselves of this legislation. That means that the government is still laughing at the worker, at the Canadian population. And if they were logical in their dealings with people, they would first suppress the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and bring down the interest rates to 5 per cent, instead of demanding 15 or 18 per cent as the case is presently.

FARM CREDIT ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE CAPITAL OF CORPORATION AND PRESCRIBE REGULATIONS FOR LOANS

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-34, entitled an act to amend the Farm Credit Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order at this time because I have been sitting here waiting and hoping that we would hear some kind of statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs on at least the broad position of the government with regard to the food conference which will be taking place in Rome. It appears that the government is quiet on this subject, but I think that it has an obligation to the people of Canada, and certainly to the House of Commons, to at least present us with a broad statement of intentions or a statement on what Canada's position will be at the conference in Rome. I feel that somewhere, sometime this government must start giving some leadership.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO PRODUCTION AND SALE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs I have decided that the government is trying to change the old adage of a chicken in every pot into a mess in every department.

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture—and this of course has nothing to do with messes but with a very serious state of affairs—whether, in the light of the report of the Food Prices Review Board released this morning and the debate that took place last night, the minister will not recommend to his colleagues a full scale inquiry into the beef industry in order to alleviate the plight of both the producers and the consumers.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have just received the report of the Food Prices Review Board and if the findings in the report are that the situation in the beef industry is not good enough, I will recommend a full fledged inquiry.

Mr. Stanfield: Do I take it that the minister is insufficiently concerned about the conditions that he sees in the industry, at the prices that continue to remain high at the retail level despite the reduced prices received by the farmers, and insufficiently concerned about the dramatic events that have taken place to demonstrate the anguish of the farmers, to believe that an investigation is necessary to reassure the country?

Mr. Whelan: I do not agree with anything in the preamble of the hon. gentleman's question. I want to make sure that I understand what is in the report of the Food Prices Review Board, and we have properly reviewed it in our own minds before recommending a thorough investigation. I have made it clear that I am in favour of a thorough review of the feeding programs and everything that is involved in the total production of beef in this nation. If I feel that it is not in the report of the Food Prices Review Board, then we will certainly institute an investigation because, as I have stated many times, I am concerned about all the things which the hon. gentleman talks about.

BEEF—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION IF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD REPORT IS INADEQUATE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the inconclusive nature of the findings of the Food Prices Review Board in their beef report released today and in view of the growing disparity between prices paid to producers and prices which we have to pay—my question is prompted by the growing lack of confidence of the people of Canada in the present Minister of Agriculture—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Absolute nonsense.

Mr. McGrath: —I ask the Prime Minister if he will give consideration to having an inquiry into the whole mess in the beef industry in Canada conducted under the aegis of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in order to ensure that there will be no attempt by the Minister of Agriculture to hide the facts.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept in any way the innuendos in the question. I would say that this report will be studied by the government and the minister and, as the Minister of Agriculture indicated, if we do not believe its findings are broad enough covering the area of concern, we will consider the matter of instituting an inquiry.

Mr. Whelan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.The hon. member who just asked a question has made all kinds of insinuations, trying to assassinate by innuendo. I object to it. Again, he has said that I am trying to hide the facts. This minister, this member of parliament, this man has never been known in his public career as one who hides facts, and I want this known.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGrath: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Agriculture—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

BEEF—SUGGESTION MINISTER RESTATE COMMITMENT MADE OUTSIDE HOUSE THAT PRODUCERS WOULD NOT LOSE MONEY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that he said outside the House to reporters yesterday that he would guarantee that any cow-calf operator producing calves during the present season would not lose money on that production, which in fact means he was agreeing with the proposal I put forward on behalf of my party in the debate last night, to which he refused to reply in the House, I should like to ask the minister if he will give the same commitment to the House and thus publicly commit the government to the course of action that he outlined to a reporter outside the House.

● (1140)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this Minister of Agriculture has continually said—

Some hon. Members: Which one?

Mr. Whelan: —he has continually said, and it is there if the hon. member wants to check the record, and this government has continually done things to guarantee farmers a decent return for their production—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Put my remarks in context; do not pick out little bits and pieces of what I said. Put them in their context. I have said that the stabilization legislation which will be before this House will make sure that farmers do not lose money on their production. This is what I said. Do not pick little things out of context, but use everything I said. Do not use little bits, because the statement was quite lengthy.

BEEF—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO REDUCTION IN PRODUCTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question refers directly to what the minister said, and it is on tape and on record. He gave a specific guarantee for specific producers during the coming months. I take it that the minister, in his answer, was reneging on that commitment, unless he can clarify it later on.

My second question concerns a statement made by a staff member of the Food Prices Review Board, Dr. Burton, at a press conference this morning. He said, in reply to a question about the prices paid to the producer of beef, that the only way, in his judgment, that they can be improved, that is, for the farmer to get a better return, would be through a cut-back in production, which has horrendous implications both for consumers of Canada and starving people abroad. I ask the Minister of Agriculture if his position and the government's position is that that is the way to get a fair price for the farmer? Does the minister agree that his policy will not involve a cut-back in beef production?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think we all realize that we must have peak production. I agree with one of the things the hon. member said, which may surprise him. I agree with him when he talks about the need for more production around the world. The biggest problem around the world concerns the world food distribution system. I challenge anyone to say that this minister has ever told farmers not to produce. Anyone who says that this minister said we should not produce as much as we can is wrong. On the contrary, I said we must produce enough to meet demand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should permit the minister to get away consistently with a complete refusal to answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: My question to the minister is this: Will he assure this House that the government will not embark on the policy of cutting back the production of beef as a means of assuring a fair price for its production to the farmer?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are asking for a total review of the whole beef industry, all aspects of it, to see how we can do the most good for the sake of utmost production.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Whelan: That will be the policy this government will follow. There is a proper way to distribute meat products around the world. We should find out what it is and make sure that in no way is meat being destroyed. As I said at the beginning, I am a farmer who produces crops and if there is one thing a farmer deplores more than anyone else, it is to see something which he has planted destroyed. We do not like to see anything destroyed. I suggest that if the hon. member could learn a little about planting and harvesting, he would realize some of the problems confronting our producers in agriculture. He would have a better understanding of our problems.

An hon. Member: Come on Gene!

BEEF—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I really think it is about time we tied down this wild-tongued minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: It is like trying to contain a bowl of fat in a fishnet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: The minister last night, after having had full opportunity of saying what he liked in the House, went out and had a press conference with a CBC radio reporter. My question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have already been over that ground on a question of privilege. This is a supplementary question and at this point I would be grateful if the hon. member would ask it.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the minister is this: Perhaps the minister would kindly explain his words. If they are taken out of context, maybe he can explain them to us right now. After he had harangued the CBC radio reporter, the reporter said, and I quote:

> You are giving them your word they won't lose money if they hang on.

The minister very clearly replied:

> That's right.

Surely we should have some explanation from the minister of the budget requirement with regard to that remark. What program has he in mind; or, if those words are taken out of context, let us hear him give the complete statement to us right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said, this minister lives by his word. And what I said the government means. I also talked in that conversation about our stabilization legislation, which will be presented before this House, and about hanging on. I said that by the time producers are ready to sell their product they will be able to get a decent price for beef, if the legislation could be passed by that time and the program initiated. That program would mesh with other programs. I took it for granted that the program would work with other programs the provinces have implemented, some of which are very good. All these things would be reflected in the price producers will receive. The prices of some products at present are not as bad as some would have you believe. The price of top quality beef products is not that bad. There are feed programs in Canada under which you can feed cattle in feed lots for 40 cents, while in other lots it costs 60 cents a pound. So, how are you to resolve a problem like that? If you want facts, you have to put all these factors together. That is what we want to do and what we are going to do.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is this. The whole conversation previously referred to is on tape and concerns, I suggest, the potential losses this winter to the producer. Now I ask the minister, and he has not told me, what program has he in mind this winter with respect to these livestock producers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I feel compelled to say that, desirable as the practice of asking supplementary questions may be, I cannot look at repetitions of questions as supplementary questions. The question has been asked not only by the hon. member who was on his feet, but by other hon. members, and the minister has had ample opportunity to make whatever response he is going to make.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED ADJUSTMENT IN ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the minister in charge of LIP projects. It is a quite important one and I would even wish to raise it as a question of privilege, giving as an example my own riding.

Last year—and do note that the same thing happens in others, in the constituencies of opposition members in particular—the department granted $200,000 in the Témiscamingue riding for LIP projects. That amount was not enough for the projects we wanted to implement. I appealed to the minister who told me that funds were short, that they were waiting until the end of the season to see if there was any money left anywhere.

Now it happened that $72,000 were not spent in the Témiscamingue riding. They were allocated elsewhere while projects were refused in mine on grounds of lack of funds. This year, Mr. Speaker, about $400,000 were earmarked for the Témiscamingue riding.

I would therefore ask the minister to add to the $400,000 allotted for this year the $72,000 of last year which were refused to us though we had projects under consideration. It would represent a total amount of $472,000.00. Such a case applies also to other constituencies.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I shall have to examine the comments of the hon. member which are intricate and complex. I should like to consider them and perhaps take notice of the question, then respond either directly or in the House at the earliest opportunity.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Indeed, a civil servant of the department advised me of it yesterday saying that the amount had been spent elsewhere. Can the minister tell us whether it might be possible to take steps to make sure that the ridings are not deprived of the funds they were allotted last year?

● (1150)

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am not in any position to indicate any additional funds for local initiatives for this winter nor until the final tally as it were of all applications versus all constituency allocations are completed and examined, to indicate whether there will be any adjustment of funds as between different regions or different constituencies.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF CANADIAN POSITION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that members on this side of the House have been asking the government to state Canada's position at the World Food Conference in Rome ever since parliament met in September, and in view of the fact the Canadian delegation will be leaving this weekend, will the minister take this final opportunity to tell the House and the public what proposals Canada will be presenting to the World Food Conference or is it the minister's intention in the absence of any such statement to try to work out a position with his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, while en route to Rome?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the answer to the last part of the question is no. The Canadian position has been carefully worked out. I have already indicated in general terms in my participation in the debate on the Address in Reply some of the major questions that will be dealt with at the food conference. It is my view that it will be in the interests of the success of the conference, and in the interests of solving the problem of world hunger, for the Canadian position to be stated in detail at the conference. That would have a much more efficacious result. I considered the possibility of making a statement in general terms on this point, but I thought it would be unwise and the best course would be to reveal our position at the conference.

Oral Questions

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—SUGGESTION SURPLUS BEEF BE MADE AVAILABLE TO THOSE WHO NEED IT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Will the minister at least take the opportunity of discussing with his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and the meat packing firms prior to his departure whether our surplus beef can be sent to those who need it most?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no doubt the question of food aid is a very important aspect of the conference. The conference secretariat has put before the world community a request for the provision of food aid over the next three years. Canada will be studying in detail its position of food aid for the next three years. It will certainly be possible, where appropriate, to provide Canadian source food commodities. Each commodity will have to be considered on its merits in relation to distribution systems, transportation and the needs in the developing countries. The hon. member can be assured her suggestion will be considered.

BROADCASTING

CABLEVISION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF CAUSE FOR DELAY OF APPLICATIONS IN ST. JOHN'S AREA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. Has the minister received a request from Canada's only living Father of Confederation to investigate the ownership of the shares of the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company and specifically the relationship between the owners of CJON and the opposition and delays to cable applications in the St. John's area?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I believe CRTC will assume that task when the cable company applies for a permit.

[Englishs]

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the nature of this allegation by the only living Father of Confederation, will the minister check with the chairman of the CRTC and report back to this House whether there is any impropriety involved in the ownership of the shares of the Newfoundland Broadcasting Corporation and whether the owners of that corporation have in any way influenced the processing of cable applications in the St. John's area?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I can only say again that the decision, if one has to be made—and I am not aware of the serious mess of the allegations that have been made—would be that of the CRTC president, with whom I can of course discuss the matter, because it would be up to him to decide.

FISHERIES

SWORDFISH—POSSIBILITY OF RE-OPENING FISHERY IN VIEW OF ACTION BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Fisheries). It relates to the terrible conditions which exist at the present time in the Atlantic Coast fishing industry. Present indications are that haddock, cod and halibut are heavily over-fished and landings are very low. Deep sea lobstering is not profitable because of the destruction of gear by foreign trawlers. However, swordfish on the Atlantic coast are abundant and are being harvested by other countries, especially the United States which has opened its markets to swordfish in Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and New York. Will the minister visit Washington and discuss with his counterpart the possibility of re-establishing the Canadian swordfishing industry which has been closed since February 1970?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's suggestion is welcome. If it is felt that my participation or travelling to Washington would be a positive contribution, I would be happy to do so. However, I have to remind the hon. member that the problem is not with my counterpart, but the U.S. food and drug administration. Exports of swordfish to the United States containing levels of mercury which they consider unacceptable constitutes the real barrier. There are states which have on their own allowed fishing for swordfish by their residents. However, we are always interested in a review of this area. I have already discussed the matter with my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in relation to Canada's position and a possible appeal to the American authorities.

SWORDFISH—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON POSSIBILITY OF RE-OPENING FISHERY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As this is a matter that is vitally important to Nova Scotia and many of his constituents, has the minister taken any steps to interview the food and drug directorate of the United States to see if the Canadian swordfishing industry may be reopened?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I have not taken any direct action myself, but I will take into consideration the suggestion made by the hon. member.

PRODUCTS CANADA COULD MAKE AVAILABLE TO WORLD FOOD BANK

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture who will be a member of the delegation attending the World Food Conference. We in this House have not been able to secure any information excepting ephemeral and uncertain information concerning the stand of the Canadian delegation. Knowing the minister's capacity for detail, I wish to ask him what advice he has given or what stand he has taken concerning Canada's surpluses of food products that could be made available to the food bank. Also, what products are in surplus to such an extent that they could be used immediately or very shortly for the alleviation of starvation in all parts of the world today, it being one of the most serious problems facing mankind?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is the official spokesman for anything that is to be said before we go to Rome. He has already stated the government has gone into great detail trying to work out a program. We realize our responsibility in being part of the world food aid program. I am sure the right hon. member has read all the speeches I have made in the past two years—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —about world food aid. Much to my amazement, a group of people who have done research have said that this Minister of Agriculture has made more constructive statements—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —about what we can do, what we are doing and what can be done in the future about world food aid than any previous Canadian Minister of Agriculture. They appreciate the stand I have taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1200)

Mr. Diefenbaker: After listening to his speech, notable for its modesty, may I ask the minister, now, because he has all these things at his fingertips, as his speeches reveal—and I read all of them, sometimes for amusement but more often for information—where are the surpluses of Canadian products which he is advising the other members of the delegation will be available to assist countries which may require them, whether it be eggs or beef or pork? What are the products he is advising his co-workers on the delegation will be available to assist needy countries? Can he give us a general picture of them, because he has all this information at his fingertips?

Mr. Whelan: The right hon. gentleman says he reads all my speeches. I am sure that when he refers to the information in them he is correct. I am sure that what he says about their containing humour is correct, too. If he reads the speeches made by some of the members on his side of the House he will not find either of those qualities in them.

I am sure the right hon. gentleman realizes that our producers are among the most capable in the world and that they can turn the taps on when there is need to do so. We have the know-how and we have the facilities. Our farmers could turn these things on if we had a proper world distribution system.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What products are available? That is what I am asking. What products are in surplus?

Mr. Whelan: The very fact that we have a surplus of eggs, for instance, places us in a better position to supply egg protein to other parts of the world.

MANPOWER

POSSIBLE INTEGRATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE AND MANPOWER SERVICES

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and it arises from a recent directive which he has issued to the effect that actions in addition to registration with manpower offices are necessary in connection with the receipt of unemployment insurance benefits. Is it the minister's intention to reunite unemployment insurance and manpower services so that a national employment agency may be established from that structure?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): It is not my intention to recommend the integration in a structural sense of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower. However, we have had considerable success in getting much closer co-operation and co-ordination at all levels between these two organizations and this is a course we intend to pursue.

SUGGESTED CHANGES IN MOBILITY GRANT REGULATIONS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): The new directives indicate that jobs have to be sought not only through the manpower agencies but also outside those agencies. Is it the intention of the minister, then, to extend Part II of the mobility grants and make grants available to those who seek employment outside the manpower structure and find employment in other places, so that those who do locate jobs in this way may get the benefit of the second part of the mobility grant program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In the first place, the requirement that a person who is unemployed and receiving benefit should conduct an active job search beyond co-operating and registering with the manpower office has always existed. With regard to the mobility grant, I should like to examine the hon. member's recommendation in more detail, but generally speaking we are very keen to offer not only recipients of unemployment insurance benefits but all who are seeking work the full benefit of mobility grants to assist their search for work outside their normal location. This does, however, call for prior liaison with the manpower centres before such a grant can be approved.

Mr. Peters: It is a requirement that before drawing unemployment insurance benefits persons seeking jobs should make an application to a manpower office. In my area people often go outside the manpower structure to get jobs and I am sure this is true across Canada. Is it not reasonable, then, that the minister should change the terms of the mobility grant so that the Department of Manpower should not be the only agency responsible for dispensing the advantages of mobility program when someone takes the minister's advice and locates a job outside the manpower structure?

Mr. Andras: I am simply saying that if we are to keep order in the process, the person contemplating such a move has to deal with the manpower office and clear it with them before he can assume a grant will be forthcoming. There is some merit in the hon. member's suggestion that there might be an increase in the flexibility of the program, but it will not be likely to be introduced in the foreseeable future.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED MEASURES BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION TO CONTROL IRREGULARITIES BY OTHER AGENCIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

According to a news report which appeared in yesterday's issue of Le Droit, some provincial officials of the Ontario Housing Corporation would apparently be arrested soon in relation to a matter of bribes.

Moreover, according to the article, it seems that lobbying by certain contractors allowed their company to extract considerable profits from housing projects in the area of London, Hamilton, Kitchener and Ottawa.

Can the Minister tell the House if the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation exercises any control over the spendings of the various provincial housing agents in relation to the acquisition of real estate?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The CMHC monitors its own programs extremely carefully, particularly since there have been suggestions of irregularities in other agencies. I would be happy to meet with my counterpart Mr. Irving, the Minister responsible, to discuss any procedures which might be appropriate. If there are cases regarding which the hon. member has specific information I would appreciate receiving details from him.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF DENIAL OF DOCUMENTS TO MR. JUSTICE BERGER'S INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who has indicated that if Mr. Justice Berger, in the course of pursuing his inquiries into the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline, should seek any sensitive documents in the possession of the federal government he would consider changing the terms of reference of the inquiry, which is something I find very shocking particularly after what we have seen in the country to the south of us recently in connection with claims of executive privilege and things of that sort. Will the minister assure the House that he will not interfere with the inquiry conducted by Mr. Justice Berger and that there will be a full inquiry into that pipeline proposal to the extent that it is necessary?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this parliament has passed a number of laws, including laws with regard to oil and gas land regulations and the Income Tax Act, in accordance with which proprietary information made available to the government by firms and individuals is held to be strictly confidential to the extent that ministers are prevented from making this information available either to the public or to other ministries of the government. In these circumstances, particularly with regard to the oil and gas land regulations, I might be faced with compulsion to make public documents which by law I am told to keep confidential. I expect to meet Mr. Justice Berger within a few weeks to discuss the conflict which might arise involving the specific injunction placed upon me in my capacity as minister.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister give the House an assurance that he will confine any claim of confidentiality to documents which are clearly defined by acts of this parliament as being confidential, that he will not set himself up as a judge of what should be kept confidential and what should not, and that we shall, in fact, have a full and fair inquiry and not one conducted according to rules which the minister himself may try to lay down?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would remind the hon. member that the rules have been laid down, not by me but by parliament. What is more, may I point out to the hon. gentleman that there are other documents, for example, cabinet proceedings and other proceedings of that kind, which while not covered by statute, have traditionally been regarded as confidential to the executive. It seems to me that for the hon. member to suggest that these kinds of confidences should be breached is a misreading of the responsibilities I have in my office.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—ALLEGED THREAT TO CHANGE TERMS OF REFERENCE OF MR. JUSTICE BERGER'S INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I apologize, but for the minister to suggest that if Mr. Justice Berger, in his search to have a full inquiry and to do the task that has been assigned to him, asks for certain documents to which the minister does not think he is entitled he will change the judge's terms of reference, this is one of the most shocking things that has taken place in this country for a long time.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I said clearly in response to the question from the journalist, which presumably the hon. gentleman has read, and I say to him clearly now, that I am under certain injunctions with regard to the law. I hope that he will not try to twist my answers in any other way.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister think that Mr. Justice Berger is not aware of the laws that are on the statute books of this country and that he will not know there are certain documents that he cannot ask for because the minister cannot produce them? Therefore, I ask the minister whether he has been asked to produce any documents which would be contrary to the laws restricting him at this time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, sir. The question specifically put to me was whether I would make all documents available, whether covered by law or not, and I indicated to the reporter some of the difficulties involved in this question. There has been no request from the judge, though there has been a request that we should meet and discuss this difficulty that exists between his responsibilities and mine.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Then why is the minister making threats to change the terms of reference before he has even met the judge to determine what the judge wants?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there was no such threat; it was merely a response to inquiries from the press as to the situation in which we would find ourselves. It seems to me that one of the appropriate things to be done by a minister and a member of parliament is to respond to this kind of press inquiry as to what a particular situation may be.

HEALTH

PROPOSED COMPUTERIZED MEDICAL RECORD SYSTEM—SUGGESTED INVASION OF PRIVACY

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, because it could overlap with the responsibilities of a number of departments I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. It arises from the recent report of the Science Council of Canada, report No. 22 "Science for Health Services", which recommends a nationwide, computerized birth-to-death medical record system for all Canadians, access to which can be had anywhere in the country. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that he has no present intention of encouraging the creation of such a system, which could seriously threaten the privacy of all Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the report but I will refer the question to the relevant ministers.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

SUGGESTED RENAMING OF JUSTICE BUILDING TO HONOUR RIGHT HON. LOUIS ST. LAURENT

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. In view of the considerable difficulties encountered by the minister in using statues to pay tribute to former prime ministers, I am wondering whether the minister is considering suitable alternatives; and specifically, would the minister consider renaming the justice building which is currently being renovated by the Department of Public Works, in fitting memory of a distinguished former Minister of Justice, and later Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in respect to this particular suggestion there is a governmental responsibility which is shared by the Department of Public Works and the Secretary of State. I will be glad to look into the suggestion made by the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATION OF PALESTINIANS AT GENEVA CONFERENCE—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I wish him well on his trip with the Minister of Agriculture. My question is based on the recent declaration of all the leaders of the Arab states, including His Majesty the King of Jordan, that the PLO should attend the Geneva conference. In the light of the Canadian government's view that the Palestinians should be represented at Geneva, is it now the opinion of the government that such representation be through the PLO? If not, how in the view of the Canadian government should such representation be achieved?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Canadian government—

Mr. Stanfield: Is well known.

Mr. MacEachen: —is well known, as the Leader of the Opposition has so helpfully indicated. It is to the effect that it is not the job or the purpose of the Canadian government to prejudge the form of Palestinian representation at the Middle East peace conference. We believe that the Palestinians should be represented because of their vital interest in the outcome of the talks, but we have not judged, and we do not and will not judge, the form of that representation. That is the situation. It is the situation because we believe that it is the right of the parties involved in the dispute to determine that question, not that of Canada or other countries.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Greenwood on a supplementary.

Oral Questions

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—CANADIAN POSITION ON ESTABLISHMENT OF WORLD FOOD BANK

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is not supplementary. I had intended to put the question to the Minister of Agriculture, but in view of what has happened this morning I will put it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister, without going into any detail, state whether Canada will support at the world food conference the setting up of a world food bank and give a definite commitment to make a substantial Canadian contribution to enable this to be done?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, put in those terms, to my knowledge there is not a specific proposal before the conference for the establishment of a world food bank. There is a proposal put forward by the secretariat with respect to national stockholding of foods, and certainly Canada will make a positive response to that question, as was done earlier by the Minister of Agriculture at the FAO conference. The whole question of world food security will, of course, be positively responded to by the Canadian delegation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Greenwood may ask a final supplementary.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether the proposal includes what Canada is, as I understand the minister, going to receive favourably, namely international co-ordination of the food security plan?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the flow of food resources must be the result of international co-ordination. It is our intention to support the necessity for this international co-ordination, and if possible to set up mechanisms by which the co-ordination and flow of resources can be carefully monitored.

HOUSING

PREDICTED DECREASE IN NUMBER OF STARTS—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO RECTIFY SITUATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, through you may I put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Last Wednesday I asked the minister for his comments concerning the Conference Board's prediction that housing starts next year will be down 35 per cent compared with last year. In response, the minister stated that he would be taking appropriate steps to rectify what he believed was an unacceptable situation. Would the minister explain if his penny-ante program today is one dramatic step in his program of rectification?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised at the description by the opposition of a program for which they have been asking for some time as penny-ante. It is but one of several measures that have yet to come before the House. As far as the Conference Board is concerned, as I said the other day I respect the Conference Board's figures as valid, based on projections. But the figures for the United States are even poorer; there is in the U.S. something over a 50 per cent reduction in housing starts. We do not intend to limit the number of housing starts in Canada during the coming year, and the measures that I will be introducing soon, in addition to this one measure, will help achieve that result.

• (1220)

REASON FOR RESTRICTION OF APPLICABILITY OF $500 GRANT TO NEW HOMES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could explain why his program applies only to new homes as opposed to all homes, bearing in mind that Statistics Canada figures, on which he may be relying, include only the actual house price in the sense of bricks and mortar and not land cost, yet bricks and mortar have only gone up 60 per cent while land costs in this country have gone up 200 per cent in the last five years, all of which means that home prices in Canada have gone up 110 per cent compared with 38 per cent in the five year period? The minister is suggesting a very limited program and I wonder if he would explain why it does not apply to all houses?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as we know, there are statistics and there are statistics. We now have two sets, Statistics Canada and statistics Stevens, and I rather prefer the former. This is a judgment or trade-off that one must make, and it is quite in keeping with government policy to increase supply. We have our resources and ideas, in this case AHOP, and the funds were channelled after the initial start program into new housing construction. We think this will serve all the people of Canada well by increasing starts and reducing the price of housing in Canada, and that is our objective.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ENTITLEMENT OF PRE-RETIRED COAL MINERS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, in light of the many and varied discussions the minister has had with the former member for Cape Breton-East Richmond and myself over a period of many months regarding unemployment insurance benefits due to the pre-retired coal miners, and in view of the very excellent hearing the minister gave a delegation representing the pre-retired miners some months ago, at which time the moral responsibility of Devco in the matter was discussed once again, I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he is in a position today to advise the House of any decision he has come to on this very important problem?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, a number of decisions have been made as a result of these meetings, representations and the like over the last couple of years. The most recent request I received came I believe from a spokesman for the pre-retired miners group asking for a further meeting. I will certainly be prepared to arrange that. Also within the last week I had discussions with the president of Devco regarding the whole process of negotiations for a new work contract with presently employed miners and others of the Devco organization. I assume that as a result of these negotiations there will be certain elements which will relate to these already retired. I am waiting to hear in more detail from Mr. Kent as to just what kind of propositions are going to be put forward and the extent to which the future of the already retired miners is in fact or likely to be involved in the negotiations for a new contract.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of the debate yesterday I had outlined five proposals which might become part of a national oil policy for Canada. I want now to add a sixth proposal. I believe the government should not tie up scarce capital and materials on oil and gas pipelines mainly designed to move United States oil and gas to the United States, which will have little value for Canada. The first of these proposals, and I know it is now being resurrected, is for the construction of an oil pipeline from the Mackenzie Valley to the United States. It should be pointed out that we do not, so far, have any proven reserves of oil in commercial quantities in the Mackenzie Valley. The main purpose of such a pipeline would be to transmit oil from Prudhoe Bay to the United States. It is true that if we discovered some oil we could put it into that pipeline, but the quantity of Canadian oil would be negligible and would not warrant the $6 billion to $10 billion capital investment that would be required.

The same thing is true with reference to a gas pipeline from the Mackenzie Valley to the United States. In this instance we do have commercial quantities of gas in that area, but we have a 25-year supply of gas in the southern part of Canada and we need not look at this area for at least ten years. Those who are proposing the building of a gas pipeline from the Mackenzie Valley are not thinking in terms of Canada's need. The situation is that the gas in the Prudhoe Bay area can only be taken out as the oil resources are exploited; therefore, they want a pipeline with Canada involved so that for the first four or five years some 70 per cent or more of the gas going through the pipeline will be Canadian gas. The result will be that by the time we need the Arctic gas most of it will have been sold, through the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, to the United States. There will come a time when we will need that pipeline, but that is some years away. When we build such a pipeline, it should be a pipeline to sell Canadian gas in Canada, and not to export it out of the country.

My third point has to do with offshore oil reserves. So far we have not, unfortunately, found quantities sufficiently large to warrant development. We cannot count on this source to solve our problems in the next decade. It is to be hoped that oil will be found off the Atlantic coast, but we should reconcile ourselves to the fact that in this respect a lead time of five to ten years will be required. Therefore, Canada's best bet is to develop the Athabasca oil sands and the heavy oil deposits in Saskatchewan. The estimate is that the Athabasca oil sands have an oil capacity of some 300 billion barrels, of which about 50 billion barrels can be recovered by strip mining. The National Energy Board report of 1972 suggested that we could produce 1,200,000 barrels a day by 1985. It is my opinion that this figure is too optimistic as it would mean building eight plants between 1977 and 1985 and moving about two million tons of loose quartz sand every day. I do not think that is possible. We must step up the programs we have now.

What concerns me is that the government seems to be lackadaisical about the one sure source of oil to meet the critical situation which will confront us between 1979 and 1980. We already have the Great Canadian Oil Sands company, which is producing some 53,000 barrels a day and which will probably go up to a peak of 65,000 barrels a day. We have the Syncrude plant which is now under construction and is hoped to be completed by January, 1978, with a capacity of 125,000 barrels per day. Also, the Shell Oil plant, if it proceeds as it should, will be started in 1976 and completed in 1981, also with a capacity of 125,000 barrels per day.

If we assume an exportation and importation balance, I think it is safe to say we will have to find a supply from other sources. The only other sources which come to my mind are the Athabasca oil sands and the heavy oil deposits in Saskatchewan. We will have to find, from those sources, between 300,000 and 400,000 barrels a day by 1980, and something over 900,000 barrels a day by 1985. That is the reason I urge that we do everything possible to step up the program in respect of the oil sands and the heavy oil deposits.

First, I think our course of action must be by way of conservation in order that the existing, conventional oil supplies will last as long as possible. Second, we must step up, encourage and intensify the development of oil from the oil sands. Third, the government should be spending very large sums of money now in scientific research related to alternative sources of energy, because we must not forget that even the great oil deposits of the Middle East have a life index of only 35 years. The whole question of solar energy, geothermal energy and nuclear power must be examined, and the research must be carried on much more rapidly than has been the case.

I am concerned about the provisions in this bill for paying compensation to the oil companies and for paying higher prices to the gas companies. Canada is paying tremendous sums of money to the oil companies for imported oil. We agree that it is necessary to maintain a single price across the country, plus transportation and handling charges. But we paid out, under Governor General's warrants, between June and October $470 million in compensation to the oil companies. Under this bill, for the first quarter of 1974 the government is authorized to pay out another $430 million. This will represent an amount of $900 million in a period of less than a year.

I have a very strong feeling that the public funds of Canada are being ripped off by the oil companies. It is very significant that, in this oil crisis, everybody makes some sacrifice except the oil companies. The consumers have accepted an increase of $2.50 a barrel. The provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan are giving up in the order of $1,300 million a year. But the oil companies have never had it so good. The profits of Imperial Oil increased 45 per cent last year over 1972, after payment of taxes. The profits of Gulf Oil, after taxes, increased last year by 58 per cent over 1972. I do not have their figures for 1974, but I do have them for Shell. In the first nine months of this year the Shell Oil company had profits of $119.5 million, compared to $60 million for the first nine months of last year. This represents an increase of almost 100 per cent. It is positively obscene, at a time when we face a national and an international crisis, that the multinational oil companies have been able to rip off the public and the public treasury to the extent that they have.

This legislation allows the government to fix the price of gas. I do not object to that, because this party is in favour of selective price controls. This is one field in which price controls are appropriate. We want to know, however, the price level that the minister has in mind. In statements which have appeared in the press from time to time the minister has suggested that the price probably ought to rise from, say, 60 cents per thousand cubic feet to $1.20 per thousand cubic feet, by stages—on the principle, I suppose, that it does not hurt a dog if you cut off his tail an inch at a time. Why does the price have to virtually double over a period of time? Have the costs of production gone up? No one will quarrel with an increase in price if the costs of production have risen, but they certainly have not risen to the extent the minister seems to envisage.

I do not buy the argument that it is necessary for these companies to have larger and larger profits because they will use those profits to explore for more gas. If the government wants them to use the money for the exploration of gas, let the provinces and the federal government collect the money and then rebate it to them for the exploration they carry out or, better still, have the exploration carried out under federal and provincial auspices. I think the public will accept higher prices for gas if production costs warrant it, or if they can be sure the money will be used to find further supplies. But the public will not stand for an increase in the price of gas if it is merely to swell the already high projects of the gas companies and of TransCanada Pipe Lines in respect of the transportation and sale of resources which belong to the people of Canada.

I wish to make an appeal to members of this House, particularly the younger members, many of whom will be here long after I have left. I ask that, no matter what their party is, they apply themselves conscientiously to finding a solution to the energy crisis which faces Canada and the world. This is the most serious problem facing our generation. I suggest that the policies we adopt and the actions we take in the next few years will determine our life style, our future and our survival.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I always appreciate the opportunity to take part in a debate on energy, which is so important to the economy of my province which produces about 86 per cent of the crude petroleum not only for domestic needs but for export to meet the needs of the world. I also like to follow the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). Even though we may disagree on our stand in respect of a program, he always provides food for thought and has vision. I was pleased to hear him speak out as he did today, particularly in his concluding remarks, about this being one of the most serious problems facing Canada and the world in the next few years.

I am told by representatives of the industry in Calgary that they now find, since the election—probably because the pressure is off—that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has relaxed a good deal, is much more affable and easier to deal with. I hope that situation continues for the next four years. I should like to break my speech into four parts. I wish to deal with the history of this bill, some of the constitutional questions involved, and particularly part III of the bill. I also wish to say a few words in respect of incentives for exploration and development, which is one of the most important aspects of this subject, in order to ensure an adequate supply.

The bill, in part, flows from the historic meetings of first ministers. That was a point made by my friend, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). We all remember the second last meeting of first ministers, held at the residence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the latter part of March, 1974. We need not wait for history to put that occasion into proper perspective, as the agreement they reached will stand as a triumph of statesmanship, good sense and co-operation in the delicate field of federal-provincial relations. I heard the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain say that.

I would emphasize another point which was made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain; that is, that when the meeting took place and there was agreement, it was for a period of 15 months. That is why we have grave reservations, with which I will deal later, in reference to part III of the bill, whereby the federal government can bring about price-setting, control of supply and other measures without consulting the provinces and securing their agreement. Of course, if you carried the practice to its logical conclusion, it would destroy the economy and the jurisdiction the provinces have under the constitution. The essence of the agreement was that for a period of 15 months, which would expire on July 1, 1975, the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan undertook to sell one of their principal, non-renewable resources at an average price—as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said—of $6.50 per barrel at the well head. There would be a set price across the land, except for such factors as transportation and handling. The federal government, for its part, agreed to adjust the distribution to ensure that crude oil would become available at the same basic price across the country.

Part III of this bill was not one of the terms of the government reached by the ministers but was, rather, a mechanism whereby the federal government, by agreement in cabinet, could impose its will unilaterally upon the producing provinces in respect of the price at which they would sell one of their depleting natural resources. To that concept, strong exception has been taken by myself, by the attorney general of Alberta and by members of the standing committee when Mr. Leitch appeared before them as a witness, both on the ground of principle and of constitutional validity.

Part III, to which our most fundamental objections are directed, far from embodying a term of first ministers' agreement, stands as a direct negation of the principles upon which that agreement was based. It permits the executive council to terminate an existing agreement between a producer province and the federal government, or to decline to negotiate a renewable agreement and to impose, by unilateral action, maximum prices on a natural resource owned by the province.

The inequities in part III are both plain and subtle. I ask the minister—even though his party now has a working majority in the House and in the committee, so that when I said what I did about the industry, it was not puffery; it was fact—in view of the new atmosphere in which the minister is operating, is he giving serious consideration to making changes to part III? If he is, this bill could be expedited, not only on second reading but in the committee. If one of the negotiating parties reserves unto itself the right to cancel the bargain, or the right not to bargain at all, then the consultative or negotiating process becomes meaningless: the concept, the grand scheme, the sensible formula for resolving federal-provincial differences loses its very foundation. For example, if one of the negotiating parties, by legislation, purports to reserve unto itself powers of the most dubious constitutional validity, it invites the other party to embark upon a course of judicial confrontation.

There was a position taken early in the negotiations and the minister knows that even the proposition to implement the surtax may be questionable constitutionally. The producing provinces—I do not know whether it was Mr. Blakeney of Saskatchewan or Mr. Lougheed of Alberta—did not want to come to the federal government at a time when there appeared to be problems and a constitutional confrontation before the Supreme Court of Canada; therefore they arrived at the agreement which I have already discussed.

In the last analysis, when viewed in practical terms, part III amounts to an assertion by the federal government of the right to regulate the price, the flow, the production and the sale of a provincial natural resource. I say that is unconstitutional. It embodies a concept which I am sure no provincial government, after measuring the consequences of its extension to other natural resources—this is the point the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was making—such as lumber and hydro power, would accept. I do not believe for one moment that a powerful province in central Canada which has more political muscle than others because of the number of its members, the province of Quebec, would want to see a federal tax put on hydro, which they export, particularly in view of the great development at James Bay. I think somebody said last night that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If we do not have equality for all provinces, small and large—those with small representation and those with large representation—on matters of this nature, then confederation will erode.

We deal with potash, iron ore, asbestos, nickel, copper and coal without acknowledging that in today's economic circumstances the federal government has taken complete charge of the provinces' capacity to determine their future economic development. I am sure that was never intended in the terms and conditions of confederation, even in the spirit of confederation, and it is certainly not in the spirit of the law as it has been interpreted. There is no need for the legislation contained in part III which provides for the substitution of the federal will for the negotiated agreement referred to in part II. They can negotiate, they can make agreements for the good of the nation even when they represent the special interests of their province, which every provincial premier must do.

The first ministers' conference demonstrated the presence, strength and vitality of the national concept in a way which is perhaps unparalleled in our history. I hope that concept will not be impaired by the enactment of legislation which is unnecessary and susceptible to constitutional challenge because, as I have said, the very spirit of confederation would be eroded. I do not think now is the time, when we are dealing with matters of energy, to have a constitutional confrontation.

I might say that in the area of constitutional law—and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, who was the premier of Saskatchewan for many years, will agree with me—when you are interpreting the constitution before a judicial tribunal, everything depends on the personalities there. I do not want to pass any judgment that would reflect upon a judge, but I say that the personality of a man appointed to that position, and his philosophy when he is interpreting the constitution and therefore taking into account the social, economic and political implications, is reflected in the decision. That is why, whether it is in the Supreme Court of Canada or the supreme court of the United States, you find that the courts legislate in the field of constitutional law.

I do not know who mentioned this, but it has been said that it seemed to be constitutionally unsound for the provinces to tax little, but constitutionally sound for the provinces to tax much. Surely that is not the formula on which we should base federal-provincial relations when dealing with taxation, particularly when dealing with property, civil rights and resources owned by the provinces.

I should like to turn for a few moments to a matter that has political implications. In May, 1974, gasoline prices increased. The higher gasoline prices, following the controlled lifting of the price freeze by the federal government, reflected the increased cost of doing business but mainly the higher cost of the raw material, namely, crude oil. Very little of the price increase went to the petroleum industry; most of it ended up in the government treasury. I make one suggestion, if we want to put safeguards on this: if you leave it to the corporations, human nature being what it is they can use the money for exploration in Canada, all things being equal in international competition. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that if oil companies are to be encouraged to explore and develop petroleum resources, the government should in some way hand back to them part of the money which has been paid in tax, as compensation for exploration expenses. Only in this way will we encourage exploration and development of petroleum and natural gas.

State-owned corporations are not as efficient as private corporations. True, some corporations have made agreements with communist countries, but they remain privately owned. I do not think a state-owned company can be as efficient as a privately owned company which is answerable to its shareholders. That is where I part company with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I accept his first idea, that of giving a rebate to companies for exploration expenses, but I reject his second idea. We differ in philosophy in that regard.

What is the future of the Canadian oil situation? Canada will be threatened with the loss of self-sufficiency in crude oil production toward the end of this decade unless action is taken now to increase investment in new oil resources. The word which keeps cropping up as I listen to members of this government and of provincial governments is "supply." That word is very important in any consideration of the price of crude petroleum. Adequate supply will only come about through adequate exploration and development.

Many geologists in my constituency believe that there is much oil still to be found in Saskatchewan and Alberta. People speak as if no more oil is to be found there. They are not right. In addition, we have the tar sands and we have the Arctic development, about which I shall speak later. What is most serious is that drilling rigs are moving out of this country because greater incentives for exploration are provided elsewhere. These rigs always go where the action is, where the dollars are. Let us be practical. I have yet to meet a man or a woman who can tell me that human nature is different as between Socialists, Conservatives and Liberals. We are all pretty much the same.

What is our Canadian oil potential? There is much guessing, but it is estimated that our potential reserves total over 300 billion barrels, enough to meet Canada's needs far into the future. We can only develop this potential if we encourage exploration. This we can do only if we change some of our ideas with regard to taxation. This, too, I shall speak about later. What happens when there is a cutback in oil production, or in exploration and development? The adverse effects are felt not only in Calgary, which city people have already left, but in the rest of Canada in the secondary and tertiary industries which operate in areas like the golden horseshoe and other industrial areas. For example, the oil industry buys from Ontario manufacturers piping and valves worth between $500 million and $600 million. So when you rock the boat it is like disturbing the balance of nature. The ripples spread out and are felt in every corner of the land.

What can one say about oil industry profits? Some say that these profits are excessive, relevant to investment in the oil industry. Others who have examined the facts say that returns are not very great. I will deal with this topic later. The $6.50 per barrel price of crude oil provides only 77 cents per barrel investment for oil companies with regard to search and development. In other words, out of the gross price of $6.50, the companies have available 77 cents to invest in exploration and development in Canada, unless cash flows in from outside. Many of us think that some degree of Canadian investment is preferable to foreign investment. Well, you cannot cut the profit levels of oil companies to nothing and expect them to carry out exploration and development. So I suggest that there is a need for foreign capital and we must develop a sensible formula in this regard.

Provincial and federal governments, through the medium of the export tax, take about 90 per cent of the value of exported oil. As we heard yesterday, the federal government had received by June 1974, $900 million in oil funds, and by the end of this year it will receive $1.5 billion. Most of our oil comes from Alberta. Saskatchewan exports to the United States most of its 14 per cent share of production. From its 86 per cent share of production, Alberta supplies all areas of Canada west of the Ottawa Valley. We are providing oil to the rest of Canada at $6.50 per barrel when the world price is better than $10 per barrel. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain said, what Alberta is doing shows that the province is not selfish. It is subsidizing eastern and central Canada to the tune of $1.5 billion. Altogether, in one year the 1.5 million people of Alberta will subsidize the rest of the people of this country to the tune of $3 billion.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Woolliams: Madam Speaker, we have a little quality here today, if not quantity. Before lunch I was dealing with the fact that with the surtax alone that is collected on Alberta resources, $1.5 billion is paid to subsidize and compensate for the cost of oil imports, mainly from the Middle East and Venezuela. In addition, $1.5 billion is paid to Ontario indirectly by reason of the fact we are selling crude petroleum to them at $6.50 a barrel: it is the difference between $6.50 and the world price. The surtax has been as high as $5.20. Our profits are compensating the nation in respect of crude petroleum in the amount of $3 billion annually. That is the amount collected this year. I know the minister agrees with that figure.

I wish to turn for a few moments to the consumer problem. It is at the gasoline pump that the public meets the petroleum industry most frequently, not in the executive offices. It is, therefore, only natural that public reaction to petroleum industry activities begins at this point. Yet the gasoline pump is many steps removed from the raw material source, the oil well, and it is even more remote from the planning and legislative process that controls the search for and development of the raw material. Therefore, there sometimes is not very much liaison between the consumer who fills his car with gasoline, and the people involved in the exploration and development stage. When I talk about that stage, I need only remind the House that this week a tragic accident occurred. Thirty-two people from PanArctic, with know-how and skills, geologists and others, lost their lives in the Arctic this week through exploration and development for our nation.

Any burden on the raw material, be it in the form of royalties for the provinces, royalties for the federal government, surcharges, mineral tax or corporate tax, must eventually be borne by the consumer. He is the only real taxpayer. I emphasize that: royalties, surcharges, mineral taxes and other taxes must eventually be borne by the consumer. Taxes are just as much a cost of doing business as are wages, salaries and raw material. If taxes on the raw material increase, the cost of the raw material will in turn rise and the consumer will pay higher prices at the gasoline pump. I want to emphasize that we cream so much off the resource industry that we do not leave enough money in Canada for exploration and development. Our explorers and developers are engaged in international competition. Corporations which are owned by Canadians, the drilling companies, will leave Canada.

When Canadians began paying more for gasoline following the controlled lifting of the price freeze on petroleum by the federal government on May 15, 1974, the higher prices reflected the increased cost of doing business, but mainly the higher cost of the raw materials. Very little of the price increase went to the petroleum industry; most of it ended up in government treasuries. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, there was an increase of $2.50, from $4.00 to $6.50. Of that $2.50, the oil companies received about 77 cents; the rest went into government treasuries to be used for various programs, federal and provincial.

The proposals in the budget of May, 1974, would, if implemented, accentuate this situation. The point I am trying to drive home once again is this: if the May budget had been approved, or if the same terms and conditions are included in the next budget, the federal government would be taxing not only the profits of the companies but the royalties paid by them, royalties which constitute a provincial tax. In other words, these royalties are included in the amount upon which tax is claimed by the federal government. I say that this is unconstitutional, that it is unfair and that it is certainly not good for confederation.

Inherent in such a process is the prospect of an energy shortage in the near future. Consumer dollars siphoned off by governments into the social sector are not available to the industry for reinvestment in finding, developing and producing new supplies of oil. What will happen? In the end, Canadians will be the losers. There are people in this House who seem to enjoy the prospect of a shortage of crude petroleum. They talk about an energy crisis. Mr. Speaker, there never was a real energy crisis in Canada. What we saw, resulted from the inability of governments to plan transportation and pipelines to move petroleum and natural gas to all parts of the country at a cost which the people and the industrial empire of Canada could afford. There certainly was not a shortage of supply. If there is a shortage, how is it we are exporting a million barrels of crude petroleum to the United States every day? As things are, the consumer faces the prospect of paying increasingly high prices while at the same time Canadian supplies dwindle and Canadian self-sufficiency is impaired.

When you tax an industry to death, the consequences are obvious—exploration slows down and the cost of gasoline at the pump goes up. Canadian crude oil production from the so-called established areas will soon peak and then begin to decline if there is no further exploration and development, especially of the tar sands. We shall become increasingly dependent upon foreign supplies. Canadians are not used to such a disturbing outlook. Under the stimulation of a national oil policy backed by appropriate tax and royalty policies, Canada tripled its oil production from 625,000 barrels a day in 1961 to two million barrels in 1973. This was the program devised and implemented by the government headed by my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Members on the treasury benches opposite have often spoken in glowing terms about the national oil policy implemented by the party to which I belong, a policy which, as I say, enabled us to triple our oil production. If we could do that in a ten-year period in the past, we can do so again. The fear that we shall run short of supplies is not great. The fear of Canadians who understand this question is that pea-brained policy makers will fail to provide an incentive for the development, the supply will fall off and the cost of energy to the consumer will go up.

I want to deal, now, with the world situation as it fits into the picture, with special reference to OPEC and how it works. OPEC is not a government, but a world power which is presently giving the western world the jitters. And it shows no sign of breaking up. The welfare of most of the world's non-communist countries depends more and more on decisions made by a dozen oil producing countries acting through a cartel, plus Venezuela and Ecuador. Who are the members and leaders of this suddenly powerful group? How are they able to make the oil consuming world pay ransom? OPEC's full name is the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries. The source of their power is oil, billions of barrels of it, and the billions in dollars and other currencies which have come from its sale. It is the source of their power and their common bond.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, they never put their own money into the development of these resources. It is foreign capital which developed these wells in the Arab countries as well as in South America. Be this as it may, OPEC is rapidly becoming one of the most powerful cartels the world has ever known, controlling the price and supply of oil which is the lifeblood of industrialized societies. In the last 12 months some members of the cartel, acting individually, have restricted the output of crude. All its members, working together, have been able to impose an increase of 400 per cent in the price of crude oil as a result of the stranglehold they have exercised over this vital resource. Indeed—and I speak after giving this matter a great deal of study and attention—this stranglehold exercised over a large part of the world's energy resources has raised fears of a global depression resulting from the growing burden of oil costs. Such a depression is well within the realm of possibility in the next few years.

It is obvious to anyone who comprehends international trade in crude oil petroleum that the wealth of the industrial western nations is fast flowing to the Arabs. The seriousness of the situation is starting to sink into the consciousness of all western nations, including Canada. Unless we can create a climate and atmosphere for continued exploration and development, a deep global depression is in the making, caused in large measure by the astronomical increase in price of crude petroleum in the last 12 months, an increase from $2 a barrel to $10 a barrel. At one point the price was $11 a barrel.

The blackmail and economic pressures caused by the OPEC countries cover the Mesopotamian area, plus South America. Let us consider some of the high costs that have resulted. In 1973 the United States imported the same amount of oil as in 1974; the cost in 1973 amounted to $7.5 billion, whereas the cost in 1974 is estimated to be $25 billion. Japan paid $6.7 billion in 1973, and $21 billion in 1974. West Germany jumped from $5.1 billion to $11 billion, France from $3.4 billion to $9 billion, Britain from $3.3 billion to $9 billion, and Italy from $2.1 billion to $7 billion. Canada imported proportionately less, but nevertheless it cost us an extra $1.5 billion. This sum was paid, not by the treasury but from revenue derived from the resources that flow from the province of Alberta. Only 16 per cent of our oil emanates from Saskatchewan, and this is used for their own consumption.

The finance ministers of the western world, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), gathered in Washington in early October for a meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. All western countries were worried that they would not be able to pay their inflationary oil bills or would not be able to borrow enough to pay those bills, and they asked the producing nations, particularly OPEC, to lend money to the World Bank from the surplus of moneys they had earned from oil sales. The serious question is, will they do this? If they will, then will they continue to do it?

Canada has been in a very fortunate position, however, and will continue to enjoy that position provided the federal government does not overkill exploration and development. I emphasize the word "overkill" in terms of taxation, which stymies exploration and development.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Every day we use from our own crude reserves one million barrels, and we export about the same amount to the United States. In other words, we import one million barrels and export one million barrels. So our imports and exports of crude petroleum are equal. Therefore, Madam Speaker, in reality we are self- sufficient in oil and would face no problem if this government and the provincial governments would make certain that transportation facilities will carry these reserves to all parts of Canada. The propaganda that Canada had an oil crisis, as I have said, was manufactured by the government to cover up for its ineptitude, procrastination and vacillation.

Those who oppose foreign capital coming into the resource industry are the first to cry blue ruin when there is a shortage. You cannot develop this type of industry without large pools of capital. Everyone seems frightened to say this, but I am not: if it had not been for United States capital and know-how at the beginning, in 1947, Alberta would not be in a position today to supply 86 per cent of domestic Canadian crude petroleum needs and, in addition, export one million barrels a day. We must always remember—I say this without criticism—that the money to develop these fields of oil did not come from St. James Street in Montreal any more than it came from Bay Street in Toronto. The money came from a foreign source to begin with. We were as poor as any other non-producing province until Leduc No. 1 was drilled in 1947. The development took place ten years after a world depression, at a time when Alberta could not meet even the interest of its bonds.

In other words, all the finance ministers were told that the western world must come to grips with this problem or we would definitely be in a serious recession or depression. It is regrettable that a country which continues to build reserves by developing the tar sands and encouraging continued exploration within provincial borders and the Arctic is following a policy of overkill in development. The OPEC price will only be reduced when countries like the United States, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said today, find alternatives to crude petroleum and, indeed, natural gas.

This does not mean that a worldwide economic slump is unavoidable. But it does mean that there is no single, simple solution, and from what I have read, and according to what independent financial experts in the world say, the answer for Canada lies in exploration and development in Canada. If we had ample supply at a time of shortage, then for the first time we would be able to outcompete our competitors. This means a great deal, particularly to the province of Ontario which is the industrial centre of Canada and which has transformed us from an agrarian nation to an industrial one.

All the beautiful arguments about the constitution may contain many high-sounding phrases, but I have found that in the field of constitutional law, constitutional tribunals legislate by interpreting words to fit the social, economic and political conditions of the time. Therefore, precedents and constitutional law are of somewhat limited value.

I should just like to refer briefly to two other matters. Some 39 rigs and 250 crewmen left Canada this year in response to the great demand in the United States and the Middle East. One has only to read what Mr. Thomas Kennedy wrote in the Globe and Mail to learn how many drilling rigs are leaving Canada because of the overkill to which I have referred. They are going to the United States, Alaska, the North Sea and elsewhere. Our enemies—I mean our political enemies—will in the future be able to rise in this House and say that we are now in short supply because of the short-sighted policies of the government. Preliminary statistics as at the end of September indicate that 2,967 exploratory and development wells were completed in western Canada, including the Arctic, for a decrease of 245 from the first three-quarters of 1973, and there was a decrease in footage to 10.6 million feet. Those figures speak for themselves.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is there agreement that the hon. member should continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: I have only a few more points to make regarding what I think the government should be doing, and I thank hon. members for giving me this opportunity. First of all, we must make certain that our corporations are good citizens. On the other hand, we should stop flogging business for emotional vote-getting. One thing of which I am confident is that corporations are here to stay. Farm-out agreements with corporations in communist countries are common. In fact, the leader of the provincial Liberals in my province, who runs an oil company in Alberta, has farm-out agreements with communist countries and he described them to me when we were playing golf.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): How is his golf?

Mr. Woolliams: To digress, I must say he is a better golfer than I am. Canada cannot, and will not, destroy these corporations. Our rules should be set up and shaped in such a way as to make certain they offer these corporations incentives in a competitive world to continue their development and exploration operations. The federal attempt to tax every barrel of crude petroleum, taking into consideration royalties in the calculation, means tax upon tax, and this must be abandoned. Section 36 of the act must be modified so that the federal government does not have the power to control supply, price-setting, and so on, without consultation with and agreement of the provinces. In addition, I think a North American conference should be called in order to have either formal or informal discussion of the best ways to develop and explore our resources and, indeed, find alternative crude petroleum on the North American continent. We must remember we are in competition with the European Common Market and the Asian bloc.

Lastly, the subsidy paid to the provinces which are importing crude petroleum should, in my opinion, come from the taxpayers' federal treasury, instead of the government continuing to gouge revenue out of one or two provinces. I end on the words I used in starting. I thought the greatest statesmanship was shown when the provincial premiers came together with the Prime Minister and his ministers to work out a deal to sell oil at $4 a barrel less than the price of the same oil in the world market. I could not help thinking of the bigotry of some people when I read the following in a leading newspaper recently:

> If Alberta can exploit the accident of geological history that left much of Canada's oil and gas within the boundaries of the province, then surely it cannot complain when central Canada exploits the accident of Canadian history that gave it sufficient political power to dominate federal politics and determine that national policies shall favour the east.

● (1430)

That is real bigotry, because we reached a compromise with the rest of Canada to make sure that this nation would get its energy at a proper and equitable price. I have enough faith in this country and in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario to say that they have not, to my mind, ever deliberately used the power that has been given them to break up and destroy confederation. The answer today may lie in energy to help this great nation build together for the future. I thank hon. members for giving me extra time and I say it has been a pleasure to talk to hon. members this afternoon.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Act. I was very interested in the comments of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). I think the wind-up statement by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, when he spoke about the energy issue as perhaps being the most important to be decided in this session of parliament, was very true. The energy policies we adopt in the next few months or the next year or so will have a very important effect on our life style, the growth of this country, our attitude toward growth and our ability to compete in the world marketplace. I was pleased to note, as well, that the hon. member agreed with most parts of this bill. Most of the remainder of his speech seemed to me to deal with other matters which are important, but outside the scope of the bill before us this afternoon.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, for two reasons. I lived for a few years in his constituency, and know what a fine constituency it is and the importance of that part of Canada. I listened, also, because that hon. member has a reputation in this House of being a man with ideas and I wanted to see what new ideas he would bring before us. It seems to me that a couple of his ideas were not altogether accurate in respect of this bill. He suggested that the former bill which this one replaces, Bill C-18, was a much more temporary measure that would be phased out automatically. As I read it, that is just not the fact. There was no time limit or specific time when Bill C-18 would pass out of existence.

The hon. member also suggested that Bill C-32, the one before us, was a whole new ball game and a completely different bill. I submit that nearly all its features, including the export charge, the oil pricing system, the system of restraint on oil prices, the compensation program and the administration of the act are basically the same as those in Bill C-18, with only the addition of gas pricing and the procedure of compensation features of this bill being new. Even here, the principle of restraint in gas pricing and the prescribing of a gas price is the same as that outlined in Bill C-18 in respect of oil.

It seems to me that the hon. member was agreeing with the idea of cushioning the transition to higher prices for oil which are prevalent in the world today. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain said something to the effect that the government was moving rapidly, in a blundering way, in the direction of price and wage controls. This bill as it relates to oil pricing, export tax and compensation was before the Canadian people at the time of the July 8 general election. The government's policy on oil pricing was consistent before and during the election campaign, and it has been consistent since the election. I am not sure which side the hon. member was on in the debate that took place within the Progressive Conservative Party as it related to wage and price controls. However, I would not think any member of the official opposition would want to talk very loudly about blundering in respect of wage and price controls.

The hon. member seemed to be especially concerned about consultation in the establishment of prescribed prices for oil and gas. As I read the bill, part II, division I provides for this when it speaks about "mutually acceptable prices" between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the producer provinces. It goes on, in the second part of that division, to talk about reciprocal orders in council to implement these prescribed prices. It seems to me that this government has shown that consultation does not rest just at the official level or at the level of cabinet ministers, but extends right up to the first ministers of our country. This was amply demonstrated in the agreement on oil prices reached by the first ministers last March; also this week during the consultation on other important matters relating to our economy.

Let us consider this proposed legislation in somewhat broader perspective. The world energy economy is undergoing a traumatic adjustment process to a new set of economic and political realities. These are relatively unchartered waters, and bold and imaginative responses are required from governments, industry and individuals if we are to ease the transition to a new energy environment. Most members are aware of the many facets of this new environment, which include a quadrupling of international oil prices in less than one year; a correspondingly large transfer of wealth, about $100 billion, annually to a small number of oil exporting nations; increases in demands for aid from the less developed parts of the world; the possibility that overseas oil supply could be disrupted at almost any time, for political reasons.

In response to this environment, most oil importing nations are seeking a more rational use of energy in an effort to reduce demand, and at the same time are endeavouring to encourage increased production from indigenous sources. If successful, both measures would, of course, serve to reduce dependence upon imported crude oil. At the same time, international financial institutions are trying to devise arrangements to channel the greatly increased wealth of the oil exporting nations to imports of industrial goods, to develop and diversify the producing nations' economies, to aid for developing countries, and to international capital markets in an effort to ease the strain on the already precarious balance of payments positions of many oil importing nations. Unfortunately, efforts to reduce the high, worldwide rates of inflation—of which greatly increased oil prices is one contributing factor—have to date met with very little success.

Among the industrialized nations of the world, Canada is in a relatively favoured position in this new energy environment because of our self-sufficiency in petroleum. However, our resources, for the most part, are located in western Canada, while the large consumption centres are in eastern Canada, necessitating long distance transportation systems. In order to economize on the cost of moving oil to markets, it was advantageous to export some of our petroleum production to markets in the United States while importing oil from markets east of Ontario.

In 1973, petroleum accounted for approximately 5 per cent of the volume of Canada's merchandise exports. In 1974, as a result of higher export prices, it is expected that this proportion will increase to over 10 per cent. Imports of petroleum roughly balance our oil exports, resulting in no net balance of trade implications. However, since we are net exporters of natural gas, as gas increases in market value following oil prices we can expect a significant increase in export earnings of roughly $10 million annually for each cent per thousand cubic foot increase in the border price of gas.

Petroleum and gas are also very important commodities in interprovincial trade, and will probably amount to $2.5 billion in 1974. The Canadian energy economy, therefore, bears a similarity to the world energy economy: oil and gas in Canada are the most important sources of energy, accounting for almost 80 per cent of energy consumed; the oil and gas resources are located a considerable distance from major consuming centres, resulting in significant trade between producing and consuming regions; and the producing regions desire to use the wealth derived from the exploitation of their non-renewable resources to further diversify and industrialize their economies.

However, we must recognize that if Canadian oil prices were to track world oil prices, severe strains would be forced on our national economy similar to those now facing the world economy. For example, if domestic oil prices had not been held at several dollars a barrel below world prices, Canadians could be experiencing a rate of inflation perhaps 2 per cent higher, and fuel oil prices might be as much as 15 cents a gallon higher than current prices. In addition, severe financial imbalances could have arisen between our producing and consuming regions, which might have imposed serious strains on our confederation.

We recognize that oil and gas prices must increase from the low levels to which we have become accustomed, first, if producing provinces are to secure an equitable return for a non-renewable resource and, second, to encourage the development of our frontier oil and gas resources in order to ensure sources of supply in the future. Third, they must increase in order to discourage the continuation of wasteful consuming practices in respect of our energy resources and, fourth, in recognition of the fact that Canada is an open trading nation who cannot isolate herself, for any extended period of time, from the international environment. We also recognize that prices should not be allowed to increase in such a way as to put our primary and secondary industries at a disadvantage in relation to their competitors, particularly in the United States where oil prices are lower than international levels.

Fortunately, Canada's unique position permits, us, within certain limits, to control our own destiny in regard to the development of oil, gas and other energy prices. Canadian consumers and industries can and will adjust to higher energy prices by, first, better insulation; second, smaller-engined automobiles; third, more efficient energy conversion equipment in factories; fourth, greater use of public transportation systems, and so on. But it takes time to effect many of these changes, It therefore appears prudent for Canada to follow a course of moderation in the transition to higher prices, thereby reducing the social costs and political strains associated with the necessary adjustment to the new world energy environment.

This principle was recognized and accepted by the first ministers last spring. It has been implemented in a manner which minimizes the financial burdens within the economy and cushions the impact on consumers, private and commercial, without ignoring the legitimate interests of the producing provinces. For example, revenues accruing to the Alberta treasury are expected to increase by nearly $1 billion over the level of oil and gas revenues received in the last fiscal year.

In my opinion, Bill C-32 is essential to implement the principles agreed to by the first ministers. Part II provides for an oil pricing agreement between producing and consuming interests in this country. The power to determine maximum oil prices by the federal government acting unilaterally would only be invoked as a last resort. Part III stipulates similar pricing provisions for natural gas. Part I of Bill C-32 will ensure that the difference between Canadian oil prices and the just and reasonable price for that oil in the export market will be appropriated by means of an export charge, while part IV will reduce the cost of imported oil to Canadian consumers so as to achieve oil pricing equality across the country.

Part IV would also provide for compensation of the additional transportation costs that might be incurred in moving western Canadian oil to eastern markets in the event of future disruption of our imported oil supplies. Part V of the bill will empower the minister to undertake certain administrative functions essential to an efficient and tidy management of the act. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I support the passage of Bill C-32 for the role it has to play in the development of sound energy policy, and the opportunity it affords Canadians to be masters of their own destiny during this difficult transition period.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Madam Speaker, it is a treat for a member who has been in this House as long as I have to be able to look at such a pretty face when making a speech. If this is part of the women's liberation movement, then I am in favour of it.

As the previous speaker indicated when he began his remarks, this is a critical situation within our nation because there is a real and present danger to the world as a result of the events associated with the distribution of world energy resources, more especially in relation to oil. Because we are a fortunate nation with what appear to be more than adequate resources, both now and for the foreseeable future, our plight is possibly not as serious as that facing other parts of the world.

However, there is a serious situation because many of the known resources of oil and gas are located in one part of the nation and, as a result, the whole nation cannot readily secure any advantage from these resources. Therefore, somewhat complicated but acceptable solutions have been worked out. Up until now we have been exporting part of our resources to other parts of the world, while at the same time we have been importing the same amount from other parts of the world. Agreement to this sort of arrangement was not a problem for the nation until last year, when the world faced skyrocketing increases because of certain external actions taken mainly by the Arab oil producing nations. These increases were followed by a similar type of escalation in the cost of oil by the South American countries, one of our major sources of supply.

The solution to the problem, which is partly contained in this legislation so far as the federal government is concerned, is very complex and carries with it some serious complications from the strictly Canadian point of view. I say this because it will produce a great many altercations between the federal government and the provincial governments. These must be solved in a manner wherein both the parties, and the public in general, are protected. At the same time, we must not leave scars on the constitution which will be impossible to remove in future negotiations between the federal government and the governments of the provinces.

The speeches today have outlined, in a good deal of detail, some of the complications associated with this legislation, as well as some of the things that have already happened. Some of the things that have happened give every parliamentarian, whether he be associated with the federal parliament or one of the provincial legislatures, a great deal of concern for the nation. We are concerned about the nation being able to stay together in face of what appears to be, on the surface, in this legislation substantial intrusion by the federal authority into the provincial realm. One thing that amazes me is that federal politicians should be expressing almost greater concern about what is happening at the moment than is indicated by the provincial premiers. It almost seems that the provincial premiers are more anxious to let those who are feeling the brunt of the federal decision carry the burden, in the hope that it will not happen to them. But as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) pointed out in his speech, what may be a problem for Alberta and Saskatchewan today could very easily be a problem for Ontario and Quebec tomorrow, and the day after that it could be a problem for Atlantic Canada.

So while I am rather hesitant to put forward my concern, as a federal politician, for some of the problems faced by provincial governments, at the same time I feel it is absolutely necessary that I place before the minister some of my concerns, as a member of parliament from the Atlantic provinces, regarding what I anticipate may be a far greater problem in future because of what is now happening in my part of Canada. It is very obvious to me, and I am sure to the minister and to members from Atlantic Canada, that we are slowly but surely reaching the position where we will become one of the great oil and gas producers, not just of this nation but of the world. It could well be, as the result of strikes that have been announced in recent weeks, which I am sure will continue to be announced in the days ahead, that offshore Atlantic Canada holds the same kind of riches as those discovered in the North Sea.

As a result, it is imperative that a number of things be done by this government, including allowing the resources of the areas in question to flow to the provinces in which they are found, and to be under their jurisdiction as far as rights and benefits are concerned. This has not been the case up to now, and if this legislation is put into effect it may not be the case in the future. I think that in many ways this legislation poses threats to Atlantic Canada, just as it poses threats to the western provinces which are oil and gas producers at the moment. One thing that impressed me in the speech of the hon. member for Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain and that of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) was this: up to this moment, Alberta and Saskatchewan, in the main, have provided benefits out of the revenues obtained from their resources to the tune of $3 billion annually. They have done this in order to establish in Canada a single price for oil and gas.

Far too often during the past year the governments of those two provinces were made out to be gougers of the Canadian public, while in fact they have displayed generosity never before asked of a provincial government in providing their resources at a far lower price than could have been obtained under past arrangements. It is an extreme price for Saskatchewan to pay because—like most parts of Atlantic Canada—they are a have-not area and must value every dollar they can get their hands on, by whatever means available, in order to uplift the economy and improve and the lot of their people.

We, in Atlantic Canada, have a special interest because, although for a long time we have been one of the unfortunate parts of this nation, there are many indications, going well beyond the discovery of oil and gas off our shores, that we will become the power-house not just of the eastern Canadian seaboard but of the whole of North America, certainly the eastern part. We have established power resources associated with Brinco. We have the anticipated power developments associated with the Fundy tidal power, coupled with the move, now, by the government of New Brunswick into the nuclear power field. All this indicates that we shall certainly be a power-house for eastern Canada and the northeastern United States and, with a proper national system, we could be a power-house for the whole of Canada. Because of this we must look very carefully at any piece of federal legislation which in any way tries to take over what has been firmly established as provincial jurisdiction. I refer to jurisdiction over resources.

[Mr. Coates.]

● (1500)

Yet, time after time the minister has made statements to the following effect: that it is of the utmost importance for the federal authority to be given firm control over our resources and the final say with regard to how our resources are to be developed and used. For instance, as recorded on page 914 of Hansard for October 31, 1974, the minister said:

> We are . . . affected by this change in the world situation and we wish to play a constructive role as a member of the international community while at the same time taking action to protect ourselves.
> I have referred to the international action being taken. In the bill before us this afternoon we are dealing with domestic action contemplated to protect ourselves in this new situation. Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Act, is intended to provide the federal government with a statutory basis for the management, necessary in the interests of all Canadians, of important areas of international and interprovincial trade in petroleum and natural gas. Enactment of the legislation is essential if the government is to have the means to continue to guide the Canadian energy economy safely in the present turbulent global oil environment.

In other words the minister says that because the world is turbulent, the government will assume full jurisdiction over our resources, even though such jurisdiction from the constitutional and legal point of view has been vested in the provinces.

The minister went on to say:

> —perhaps the central feature of our oil and energy policy relates to the pricing of domestic crude oil.

Then he said that the department will continue to refine and develop assessments of the net price necessary to "attract the capital trained manpower and technology" which will be needed if our energy resources are to be developed. This, according to the minister, will "provide the supply we will need in the future." In other words the government will determine what the supply is to be. The minister went on to say:

> The social aspect consists primarily in finding a position of equity between the needs and interests of consuming and producing provinces in relation to the return which is necessary to justify the exploitation of this non-renewable resource.

The minister is suggesting that it is equitable to allow Alberta and Saskatchewan, our major oil producing provinces, to contribute between $2.9 billion and $3 billion to this country. The government is being very generous. I wonder how long the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan will think this state of affairs equitable. How long will the people of those provinces be willing, in the name of equity, to provide this kind of money from their treasuries? Nova Scotia may think this state of affairs equitable, as will Ontario. The question is: will the people of Saskatchewan or Alberta for very much longer go along with this idea of equity? What is happening may be necessary in the short-run in order to protect our consumers, but we should not expect one part of the country to support another part for very long, especially as we are dealing in non-renewable resources for which there is no tomorrow, there being no replacement for them.

Let me now speak of off-shore resources. For a long time we have tried to resolve a recognizable problem regarding jurisdiction over off-shore resources. Agreements of one sort and another have been negotiated over the years. In this connection may I refer to an article in the "Journal of Canadian Studies" written by Hal Mills, who said on page 57:

> The offshore mineral rights dispute has been an overt one for over nine years, and has gone through five major stages, with an acceptable solution still to emerge. The foregoing history of the controversy leaves little doubt as to the prevalence of stages of deadlock, as well as the ill-will and resentment engendered throughout. If the total complex of federal-provincial relations is to be of a continuing and effective nature, one must expect individual conflicts, such as the offshore mineral rights dispute, to be resolved with a maximum of speed and a minimum loss of goodwill between participants at both levels of government.

The dispute continues, without sign of resolution. Indeed only the Premier of Newfoundland seems willing to stand firm and fast in his belief that his province owns the right to all resources offshore Newfoundland. Similarly, I and my leader believe that Nova Scotia has the right to 100 per cent of the benefits associated with the resources off our shores. The same may be said of all five eastern provinces. Yet there is no indication that the government is willing to do today more than it was willing to do nine years ago, and concede to the peoples of the areas concerned the right of offshore resources and the benefits associated with their development.

There is a real danger that we cannot get our resources developed because the government will determine the price of our resources, a price which may be far below that available internationally. As a result, prospects for exploration and development will go out of the window. Machinery for development is already moving to other parts of the world where economic prospects are better than in this country. So long as we depend on money, those engaged in exploration will go where they can make most of it.

The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has handed me a recent copy of Financial Post which contains this headline: "Oil-sands withdrawal comes as a bombshell." I point out that "bombshell" refers to Shell Oil Company. The text says that the Shell Oil Company's decision to withdraw from its 50 per cent holding in Shell's Athabasca oil sands project hit Calgary like a bombshell last week. I can only say that if the government continues on its present course we shall see many such statements. We are bound to see money for exploration leaving this country and heading for the North Sea, the South Pacific, as well as other places.

Atlantic Canada needs massive development if its people are to have some prospect of the sort of life which was anticipated would be theirs when they became part of this nation in 1867. This development has not taken place, and we have less chance every day that the government holds off, or because of this or that action that has been taken to eliminate this or that opportunity for us. There is no doubt that the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. That seems to have been the policy of the government since it has taken office.

In the days of the Diefenbaker administration we had one policy after another which enhanced the opportunities of our people. It gave us at least a hope of catching up with the rest of the nation. However, those actions have been destroyed on the altar of expediency to benefit the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, especially Quebec.

It is very difficult for our people to look at confederation today and feel they have an even chance or an even break. That opportunity is just not there. If Fundy tidal power were located in Ontario or Quebec, it would have been developed 20 years ago. We are still waiting. We are waiting either for translators or someone else to tell us that the government is going to order another study, or do something else, before it can take a serious look to see whether something can be done about this project.

The people of Atlantic Canada are in the same boat with regard to offshore resources. We have asked for equity, justice, and a right under the constitution. We asked the government to do as much for us as was done for other areas of this nation when they were allowed to increase their boundaries and pick up rich resource land. The government says it wants to talk more. It does not believe we have any more right to those resources than anyone else in Canada. That could be true if every other part of Canada had been treated the same since the beginning, but that is not the case. Other parts of this nation were allowed to expand their boundaries. We believe we have a right to expand ours.

If Nova Scotia is going to extend its boundaries they will have to be extended under the sea because there is no more land available on top of the sea. Our party has recognized that province's right and our obligation. We recognize the fact that we should assist Atlantic Canada, not with half-baked schemes produced in ivory towers in Ottawa, but with development of resources that exist in our area to give our people equal opportunity. I am fearful that if the government moves in with the big grab that is associated with this legislation, takes the power away from the provinces and takes the resources or control of them away, then we in Atlantic Canada will have little hope for the future. Indeed we will have to accept the fact that we are going to be second-class citizens for as long as this government holds office.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on Bill C-32 for at least the second time. A similar bill was dealt with in this House and in committee last April. However, an election and other things intervened.

This is an important bill because it puts together some of the essential components of a national energy policy. I am referring to a single, equitable, reasonable price across Canada.

I find it very difficult to follow the reasoning of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates). He talked about the hardships of the eastern provinces, which I fully understand. However, this bill in effect sets a fair price of $6.50 a barrel for oil, plus transportation, for all of Canada.

Mr. Stanfield: Nonsense.

Mr. McRae: It is about $4 or $5 cheaper than the world price. Eastern Canada is traditionally served by the world market. This is a way of subsidizing eastern Canadians and of having a considerably lower price in the maritimes.

This bill, which secures this single, fair, equitable price was fought out between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers of the provinces. I think the price of $6.50 is fair. I do not feel the federal government could go beyond that price. If more demands had been made and, if it had been impossible to agree to something more than this, we would have had to go to a national marketing board or something of that nature.

The have provinces, in terms of oil and natural gas, have made some concessions in connection with this bill. With some of these concessions there has to be a quid pro quo, particularly in the area of transportation. There must be a complete reworking of our transportation policy which will favour areas other than Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa. That is part and parcel of the quid pro quo for this price which is certainly $4 or $5 below the price on the world market.

There are three major areas in terms of an energy policy for this country that we must consider. There is the single, equitable, reasonable, fair price, something I feel this bill achieves. The second is that there be a larger Canadian component, with greater Canadian ownership of our resources. This is something we must work at, Mr. Speaker. There will soon be some action on this front with the setting up of the Canadian Petroleum Corporation. The third, and perhaps the most important, is having a secure supply of all forms of energy. Canadians need to be basically self sufficient and have a secure energy supply for a long period of time. In this whole notion of secure supply there must be some kind of levelling of demand in order to equate supply and demand. We cannot always have supply chasing demand.

I wish to deal with some of the long-term problems in terms of oil and gas, our energy requirements, and some concerns I have about achieving a secure supply, pricing and everything else that goes along with it. If we are to believe those who speak with authority in this energy field, we have to accept the fact that Canada is going to require investments of up to $100 billion in the next 10 to 15 years.

It is estimated the James Bay project will cost something in the order of $12 billion. There is an application for a Mackenzie Valley gas pipeline that will cost $6 billion plus. There is the possibility of a Mackenzie Valley oil pipeline. The United States government has been and is talking about this. It will cost between $8 billion and $10 billion. Massive investment will be required in the Athabasca tar sands to maintain a supply situation in oil. Each plant would cost about $1.5 billion, and anywhere from 15 to 20 of these plants would be needed in operation by the end of the eighties. So we are talking here about another $30 billion or $40 billion; the estimates I have seen could add up to around $100 billion.

I am concerned when I hear the press talk, rather lightly, about the desirability of establishing another nuclear enrichment plant. What would be the cost? Around $2 billion? This is not taking account of the extra billion dollars or two billion dollars required to provide the necessary 2,000 megawatts of power. We must consider the effect of these investments. How great are they to be, and what distortion effects can be expected from them? There are three areas of danger, and I am not dealing now with the environment, the effect upon native peoples, and so on, important as these aspects are.

First, we should consider the effect upon capital flow itself. What would be the effect upon our economy and upon our currency of a massive capital flow from the United States or from Japan? If the capital comes mainly from sources within Canada, what would be the effect in terms of our ability to accomplish other tasks?

Specifically, if we pursue the James Bay project at a cost of $12 billion and simultaneously the Mackenzie Valley oil pipeline scheme at a cost of $8 billion, where will the bucks come from to build houses? We have to take into account the effect on the Canadian dollar itself. What happens to the pulp and paper industry if the value of the Canadian dollar is forced upward by a massive inflow of capital? I come from the city of Thunder Bay, which is tremendously dependent upon sales of pulp and paper and is greatly concerned about markets for this product.

We should also be concerned about the consequences of selling our energy. If Japan or the United States buy increasing supplies of our energy will they be able to purchase, in addition, manufactured goods which we are capable of supplying? Or do we become more and more hewers of water?

Mr. Nystrom: How do you hew water?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ellis: Have you ever tried hewing water?

An hon. Member: I should like to see you do it.

Mr. Nystrom: That's a job description for you.

Mr. McRae: I put the two, water and wood, together. At the rate we are going we will soon not have any wood left.

I am really concerned about this distortion effect. Those responsible for policy should look at our long range objectives in two ways. First, I do not think we can continue to respond affirmatively to requests for this project or that project. The time has come for decisions to be taken as between alternative projects. For example, is the polar pipeline a more sensible approach, or should some other project be preferred? Are there inter-modal facets which ought to be considered?

When we are considering the supply of gas, should we also be considering coal gasification? I believe we should. People to whom I have spoken, people who know something about these things, believe there is a great possibility here, and that the technology is not very far off. I believe we must make a choice between the various projects open to us. If we seek to do all of them at once I believe other important sectors of the economy will be neglected. I think, too, the provinces must realize that they, too, cannot enter upon projects of this scale without some kind of general consensus being reached. For example, aside from its effects on the native people, how far should the James Bay project go? It looks as though James Bay power will be very expensive; a nuclear alternative would be a great deal cheaper, it seems to me, judging from the figures I have been able to find.

Even more important is the whole subject of energy conservation. We see demand curves which follow an extremely steep slope. The supply curves for almost all the energy commodities which one can think of, cross at some point in the eighties. At some point we shall be bound to reduce the slope of these demand curves. Sustained growth in the energy area cannot be maintained along present lines. Thus it seems to me that one of the main components of the supply situation is our success in getting the demand curve to level off so that supplies may, at least, be secure.

I should like to discuss one or two possibilities in the field of conservation. First, I should like to see studies conducted to show, as I am sure they would, that money spent on conservation would result, dollar for dollar, in more energy than money spent on exploration and other development. Those who are concerned with conservation should be placing the results of such studies before us.

One area which should be examined closely is that of transportation. There is no question that there is a great demand for a satisfactory public transportation system, something which would in itself tend to conserve energy. From the point of view of conserving energy, ground transport is vastly more efficient than transport by air—the factor is something like ten to one. This is particularly the case when short journeys are made, because most of the energy used by an aircraft is used in getting the plane up to 25,000 feet.

It seems to me we ought to move rapidly to establish better ground transportation facilities between Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal, large communities which are relatively close together. My own feeling is that projects such as the Pickering airport might not be needed if we adopt improved ground transportation as an alternative to air travel.

We live in a country which, in the past, has fortunately been blessed with very cheap energy. We find energy more costly today, it is becoming scarce, and we should begin to think of building our houses in such a way as to conserve a great deal more energy. For example, we could use solar experiments, locating our houses to benefit from solar heat. Different methods of insulating are called for also. These are two aspects that we could explore, but it is extremely important that we do everything we can to flatten out the demand curve.

Then we should insist that the automobile manufacturers in this country produce automobiles that will get a minimum of 20 miles to the gallon. No car should be built today that does not get that mileage. Mention was made in the budget of taxing large cars. I think the tax should be contingent upon mileage. If a car can deliver only 12 miles to the gallon and is certified as such, a heavy tax should be placed on the car. We must make every effort to get cars with good gasoline mileage.

I think that if time, effort and money are spent on conservation we will avoid some of the massive problems that will confront us if we decide within the next ten years to commence huge projects costing $100 million. As I have said, if we pursue the idea of massive energy investment and our energy growth continues in the way it is today, then we will create tremendous distortions in our economy, indeed in our whole way of life.

Therefore, I suggest we look at these individual items, decide which are the important ones, and develop priorities. These priorities must be national in scope; it must not be a case of one province wanting to do one thing and another province wanting to do another. Secondly, we should spend a lot of money to convince all Canadians, through advertising and in any other way, that some kind of slight modification of our lifestyle is going to be required if we are to continue living in harmony with our environment in this country.

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is, in essence, a resurrection of the petroleum administration bill of the last parliament, and to the extent that the oil omnibus bill duplicates its predecessor, it also inherits its faults. To the extent that additions have been made, the government has simply gone further in its assault on provincial jurisdiction over natural resources. The new measures concerning gas pricing do nothing to mitigate the war of nerves being waged between Alberta and Ottawa. The overt refusal to consult and to conduct serious negotiations with the energy producing provinces serves only to further alienate them and to drive a negotiated solution further out of reach.

This legislation further reflects the Liberal government's propensity to increase its power ambit under the guise of emergency powers, by enacting measures to be used "in case an agreement cannot be reached". More specifically, what is offered here is legislation that would give the government the unilateral power to set natural gas and oil prices nationally, but outside the borders of the provinces where the energy is being produced.

Let me say to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that to ensure that domestic natural gas prices do not jump drastically next fall, but increase in stages over a reasonable time frame to price levels competitive with the domestic oil price, seems to be a rational objective. But the methods herein proposed are draconian. I believe strongly, and our party has always stated, that an agreement on what constitutes a fair price should be arrived at by the process of negotiation, and only then should we attempt to stage increases over a reasonable period of time to ease the impact on Canadian consumers. There has been no indication that any let alone all ten provinces have agreed with Bill C-32's provisions.

The minister admits that Alberta has already warned that it would oppose any federal government action to exercise jurisdiction over natural gas pricing, and the signals are clearly out that a further round of charges, counter-charges and confrontation between the governments involved will ensue, leaving a further legacy of bitterness and sense of alienation in its wake.

The minister has attempted to placate the voices of opposition members by pointing out that if Ottawa and the provinces are able to agree to a staged increase over the next few years, to cushion domestic consumers, the federal legislation on gas pricing would not have to be used. In fact, however, domestic gas prices are scheduled to jump 22 cents a thousand cubic feet today under new gas rates approved by the National Energy Board last week. Furthermore, under Alberta law gas selling prices are scheduled to be revalued again next year.

Instead of waiting until after further discussions with Alberta on the matter, which I understand are scheduled for November 12, the minister wants the Commons to approve his legislation and grant him these extensive powers at once. How can meaningful, good faith negotiations take place when the minister has in advance armed himself with the power to legislate an agreement? In addition to this objectionable aspect, the proposed legislation also allows the federal government to determine how extra revenues from increased gas prices should be distributed between producer, transmission companies and governments.

It is not an overstatement to say that this bill is an assertion of almost total authority and control over petroleum resource development in Canada, and as such flies in the face of our constitution and historical provincial prerogatives.

On the whole question of petroleum pricing I would commend to the minister for his serious consideration an observation made by C. E. S. Fraser in an article on energy published in the Queen's Quarterly last summer. He said:

> Over the long run, it is unlikely that Canada can, and undesirable that Canada should, remain an isolated oasis of cheap petroleum.
> Proper analysis suggests that oil and gas are not so cheap or so plentiful in Canada as some politicians appear to believe.
> The real value of Canadian petroleum supplies is that they can stabilize short-term fluctuations of supply and cost, and in so doing reduce the harmful effects of the inevitable but painful readjustments of world energy industries during the next half century.

But, Mr. Speaker, important as the constitutional questions raised by this legislation are—and they are of fundamental importance—I wish to discuss another matter of even greater concern to the people of Canada, namely, the question of security of supply.

Two years ago Canada possessed a domestic petroleum industrial organization in which she could take great pride, an industry comprising over 300 separate producing companies and which, in the preceding 20 or so years, had grown and developed from relative insignificance to a threshold of strength and competence which rendered it able to operate in competition throughout the world. Plans were afoot in terms of additional development of our domestic petroleum resources, including the tar sands and the transportation facilities incidental to these, that would have assured the Canadian consumer of uninterrupted supplies of oil and natural gas for decades to come. The task was neither easy nor cheap in terms of the capital required, but the goal was attainable.

What is the situation today? Recently released statistics on drilling and exploration activity in Canada are cause for real concern. I suggest with all sincerity to the minister that he is over-sanguine in his response to this situation and these trends which, if not reversed, will create in five or ten years in Canada the same kinds of supply shortfalls now being experienced by our neighbour to the south, but with an impact on our society, if only by reason of geography, far more serious in nature.

[Mr. Balfour.]

During the next 20 or 30 years and beyond, the problem in Canadian petroleum policy, at least as much as keeping prices or the federal-provincial distribution of revenues down, will be to mobilize the investment and resources needed to develop our reserves. But instead western Canada's drilling activity is experiencing a serious decline, brought about by the sense of doubt, uncertainty and insecurity felt by the Canadian petroleum industry as a result of the moves and countermoves of federal and provincial governments in the last 18 months or so.

● (1540)

The number of wells completed during the first nine months this year was almost 8 per cent below the same 1973 period, and with the continuing emphasis on shallow gas drilling footage was down 10 per cent. With the likelihood of this trend continuing into the final three months, the tally for 1974 will be very close to 3,900 wells completed and 13.9 million feet of hole drilled, compared with 4,390 wells and 15.9 million feet of hole last year, a level of activity only slightly above the level of 1972.

Preliminary statistics compiled to the end of September indicate a total of 2,967 exploratory and development wells were completed in western Canada, including the Arctic, for a decrease of 245 from the first three-quarters of 1973, while footage was off 1.2 million feet to 10.6 million feet. This disappointing decrease in activity was reflected in the average active rig count which fell to 155 units for the nine months, with a drop of 12 per cent from 174 rigs working last year. This represents a utilization of only 48 per cent of the 322 rigs available for work.

The number of rigs working in eastern Canada, Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and offshore averaged four compared with six last year. But of even more concern is the number of rigs being moved to the United States and Alaska, and in most instances the rigs are of deep hole capacity. A total of 39 drilling rigs has been taken out of Canada this year to work in the United States and overseas, together with about 250 experienced, competent and trained personnel.

While various reasons and explanations are offered for this exodus, it is my view, shared I believe by most knowledgeable people in this area, that the uncertainties over our taxation and energy policies in Canada, aggravated by the ongoing intergovernmental squabbling between governments on energy issues, is the main motivation for this seriously disturbing trend in our domestic petroleum industry.

The decrease in wildcat drilling was a disappointing 16 per cent, with 261 fewer tests for a total of 1,386, while the footage decline amounted to 12 per cent, with a drop of 778,600 feet to 5.7 million feet. A total of 122 oil wells were brought in, down from 147, while gas finds decreased by 18 per cent to 476, and abandoned holes were 130 less at 788.

There were 2,553 wells licensed in Alberta during the first nine months compared with 2,634 last year, and almost 80 per cent were located east of the fifth meridian, with development wells outnumbering exploratory tests 2.5 to 1.

In Saskatchewan the situation is even more alarming. The number of wells drilled in the first nine months totalled 220, compared with 410 a year ago, while footage was cut almost in half to 530,000 feet against more than one million feet in 1973. There were 142 wildcats completed, 57 less than a year ago, accompanied by a 38 per cent decline in footage to 337,200 feet. Only 78 field wells were completed, 142 less than a year ago, with footage off 65 per cent.

The drop reflects the industry's reaction to the political initiatives undertaken by Premier Blakeney's government, with most of the ongoing drilling involving commitment wells. It is essential that the energy climate of Canada be stabilized if we are to again enjoy the benefits of a dynamic and vital domestic petroleum industry which, if given the opportunity, is capable of providing our country with the energy reserves required to maintain our place in the industrial world in which we live.

The suggestion that federal or provincial governments, by direct intervention and investment in the petroleum industry will contribute in a significant way to Canada's over-all energy position is, in my view, erroneous, and I am supported in that view by the policy document of the minister's own department published last year.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said Canadians should own and control their own resources. The Canadian people already own, either at the provincial or federal level, virtually all the oil and gas lands in this country and furthermore, the government possesses the power to regulate the terms of participation in development by private industry and to stipulate royalty rates and levels of taxation to be imposed on income produced therefrom.

I am at a loss to understand what significant benefits can be expected from the creation of a so-called national petroleum corporation in this country. On the other hand I am only too well aware of the negative factors involved, including discouragement of the private sector, wasteful dispersal of resources and talents already in short supply, and the enlargement of the bureaucratic establishment already overly large.

It would make far more sense, and be of greater ultimate benefit to the Canadian people for the federal government as an alternative to deploy the assets it intends to commit to the national petroleum corporation, to the research and development required to make available alternative renewable energy resources, a field in which the government's performance to date is, by comparison with other nations, lamentable.

The Montreal pipeline extension is another example of an over-complacent attitude on the part of the minister with respect to guaranteeing Canadians adequate supplies of domestic oil. I do not often agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on energy policy, but I share his view that the pipeline extension project should be undertaken as an instrument of national security with a serious sense of urgency and purpose now lacking, and if that requires, as it likely will because of the economics of the situation, government involvement or ownership, so be it.

I go further and suggest to the minister that he seriously study the possible benefits in terms of emergency supply capability of creating under public ownership facilities for the storage of a 60-day reserve supply of oil in eastern Canada. This type of initiative is being undertaken by the governments of other industrialized countries on a much larger scale, notably Japan, and is a policy option which I suggest deserves serious examination.

In conclusion I repeat my opposition to the elements in this legislation creating a unilateral price fixing mechanism over petroleum and natural gas. I underline my concern regarding long-term security of supply in this country in light of the demoralized condition of the industry, and I urge immediate federal government initiatives to effect the construction of the Montreal pipeline extension to ensure our capability to move 250,000 barrels of oil or more a day into eastern Canada, thereby reducing its dependence on foreign supplies.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Madam Speaker, this is a great opportunity for one of those five or ten minute speeches which comes before you see the clock. Therefore, I think I should say something about what has impressed me.

In listening to the debate to this point I was impressed by the sort of conciliatory tone of many of the members from western Canada. This is something very heartening to me, being from Ontario, as up until very recently whenever this subject of energy has arisen there was an obvious bitterness on the part of western members in the sense that they were being asked, on behalf of their provinces, to take less in the way of revenue than they felt they were entitled to receive.

As a person from Ontario, recognizing the substantial benefit we in Ontario are receiving because of the lower price at which we are able to obtain energy supplies from western Canada, I want to thank the people of western Canada. I appreciate that, and I think it is a good thing in our confederation that this kind of attitude prevails, once the quarrelling and argument are toned down.

It is unnecessary to remind people from western Canada that Ontario for a long time, in fact for 11 years under the national oil policy, was prepared to pay higher prices for energy in recognition of the fact that we needed to develop energy supplies and sources in western Canada. There was not very much grumbling about that. That was an expensive program for the rest of Canada. We have various figures in this regard, including those of the National Energy Board, which would indicate a cost to consumers in Canada of $500 million over the 11-year period. My calculations would show that it is much greater, something closer to $500 million a year, in other words 11 times greater, but I do not want to get into any arguments on that ground. I am simply saying this conciliatory tone is really something that fills me with pleasure.

There are understandable differences. People who have the resources want as much for those resources as possible, and the consuming parts of Canada think they should have those resources at as low a cost as possible. These differences are being resolved. We are engaged in this kind of negotiation.

While listening to the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) I wondered whether he was adopting the kind of arrangement that is developing in Scotland, where suddenly there is a new militancy in an area which has the prospect of oil and gas discoveries. Each part of Canada at one time or another either contributes or takes from the general pool of our society. I think it would be sad if, with the prospect of wealth, some part of Canada should forget that at other times it was on the other end of the equation. I sincerely hope there will be substantial discoveries on the east coast because any discoveries in the long run serve to enhance the future of this country and enable us to be a more affluent and self-serving country than otherwise might be the case.

It seems to me that in the future, if not now, we must move toward public ownership of our energy supplies. When I say this in respect of energy supplies I believe it to be important, because we should have that kind of ownership in order to have a rational allocation of energy. This includes gas, oil, coal, nuclear energy and hydro energy. Some of these are already under public ownership. Most of hydro is under public ownership and most nuclear energy in Canada is under public ownership, but not all. It is important that our energy supplies be under public ownership for the future of our country.

I am not making a general statement that public ownership is always better than private ownership because, in many ways, I have never been a strong proponent of public ownership. I think there are many areas where it is not a satisfactory answer. However, in the field of energy, because of the complexities and because of the importance of this field to the future of a country, there are strong arguments which can be made in favour of public ownership.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is the wish of the House to move to another item, so may I move the adjournment of this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is it agreed that we move the adjournment of the debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Saltsman the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I believe there have been some discussions and a suggestion that Order No. 22 might be called. This is the report stage consideration of the Canada Pension Plan amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENTS TO DEFINITIONS AND PROVISIONS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-22, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of National Health, and Welfare) moved that Bill C-22, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, there is not agreement at this time to proceed to third reading.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreement is not necessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I think we will find agreement to proceed with item no. 7 on the order paper, which is Bill C-207 in the name of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there agreement of the House that we proceed to Bill C-207, and that the other bills will not necessarily lose their position and will be stood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT TENURE OF SENATORS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria) moved that Bill C-207, to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (tenure of place of Senators), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to rise in this House on a Friday afternoon when there is a cozy atmosphere. One sometimes feels we should bring a picnic lunch, spread a cloth in the middle of the aisle, and pass away the remaining hours of our legislative week.

I am speaking today on behalf of my private member's bill, Bill C-207, to amend the British North America Act in respect of tenure of place of senators. This bill is part of a two-bill parley. It originated as a single bill to amend the Senate, but I was informed by the legal advisor that this suggested reform must take the form of two bills. In order to understand Bill C-207 it may be necessary for me occasionally to mention Bill C-261, to amend the British North America Act in respect of the appointment of senators.

I think there has been a fairly widespread desire, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on down, that something must be done with regard to Senate reform. Perhaps first we should look at the reasons for Senate reform. The Senate was instituted in our parliamentary system for two main reasons: first, to give sober second thought to legislation and, second, to represent regions from which the senators were appointed, on a provincial basis. It is in the dereliction of these basic purposes that the Senate has fallen to its present low state. It must be reformed or one day soon the will of the people, as expressed here by the peoples' representatives, will be to do away with the Senate. Let us attempt to reform it. If the reforms do not make it viable then we will have to come to what Hitler referred to as the solution when he was speaking, of course, in another context.

Two recent events may point out how far the Senate has strayed from its original purpose. First I should like to remind hon. members, particularly new members, that last winter in the twenty-ninth Parliament the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) introduced a bill commonly known as the wiretap bill. This bill was amended in committee. The amendments were voted on in this chamber. Some amendments carried, and some did not. Then the bill as amended was given third reading by the Commons and sent to the Senate.

One amendment was not attractive to the Minister of Justice. It must be borne in mind that it had been accepted by the majority of members of parliament here assembled. The Senate at that item, being more mindful of its party affiliation than of its duty, attempted to have the legislation re-amended to subordinate the will of the Commons to the will of the minister. The Senate amendment received the treatment it deserved. The bill was passed according to the wishes of the elected representatives and not the wishes of the appointed senators expressing their life-long gratitude to the government.

The second deleterious occurrence concerning the Senate was the use by the Liberal Party of the Senate in the recent election. We have become accustomed to the appointments to the Senate by successive prime ministers having a strong, perhaps overwhelming, smell of political reward, of payment for services rendered. But recently a new tendency has slipped in. Some Senators no longer make any pretence at impartiality and consider that it is their duty to support the party that appointed them, until death do them part.

● (1600)

I should like to read a few notes on some of the Senators of whom I am speaking. The national campaign headquarters of the Liberal Party listed Senator Keith Davey as the Campaign co-chairman. In speaking of Senator Davey I might read a news item from the Toronto Star of June 19, 1974, which goes as follows:

> Federal executives responsible for preparing government announcements during the July 8 election campaign period have been ordered to clear all statements with Liberal campaign co-chairman, Senator Keith Davey . . .
> A memo to that effect was sent to all ministerial executive assistants by Joyce Fairbairn, legislative assistant to Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau. The memo, however, has been circulated through government departments as well.
>
> Purpose of the screening is to ensure that all announcements "receive maximum publicity through proper timing and presentation", the memo says.
>
> Announcements and ministerial statements are to be sent to the Prime Minister's office "at least one week in advance".
>
> "Senator Keith Davey will then judge the timing which would produce the maximum result", the memo says.
> "Announcements should not be scheduled until his judgment is given". The "not" is underlined.

What relationship does such an activity bear to the original purpose of the Senate to give sober second thought to legislation, and to represent the regions from which the Senators are appointed? None whatsoever. It is this kind of activity that has brought disrepute to the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Let me go on with the list of the national campaign headquarters of the Liberal Party. There is Senator Gildas Molgat listed as the president of the Liberal Party, Senator R. J. Perrault as campaign chairman for British Columbia, Senator Earl Hastings as chairman for Alberta, Senator Jean-Pierre Côté as chairman for Quebec, and Senator Lorne Bonnell as Chairman for Prince Edward Island. Among those actively involved are John Aird of Toronto, Sidney Buckwold of Saskatoon, Douglas Everett of Winnipeg, Louis-Philippe Gélinas and Louis Giguère of Montreal, Harry Hays of Calgary, Dan Riley of Saint John, Irvine Barrow of Halifax, and George van Roggen of Vancouver. This group have done more to bring disrepute to and to misconstrue and misinterpret the role of the Senate than any group in recent history.

It is pretty clear that the Prime Minister should set about reforming the Senate. But, it is his belief that it is much better to have the taxpayers of Canada providing the dollars to operate his party than to take from the party chests. I should like to read from the Senate Hansard to show you what Senator Godfrey's impression is of his role. This is what he had to say:

> I am, and have been since the fall of 1968, the chairman of the finance and treasury committees of the Liberal Party of Canada, and in that capacity I have the overall responsibility for raising the funds for the federal Liberal Party, not only at election time but also to maintain its activities between elections.

The Senate needs reform; nothing could be more clear. It is an absolute necessity that it be reformed quickly or it will be too late.

I should like to say that there are different groups of senators. There is the group I just listed, and there is the other kind, those who enchance upper chamber and Canadian politics by their presence. Although I admit to lack of detailed knowledge of the personalities and records of senators, I must say that in my short time in federal politics I have noticed Senator Cameron, Senator David Croll, Senator Forsey, Senator Goldenburg, Senator Grosart, Senator Lamontagne, Senator Manning, Senator O'Leary, Senator Bélisle and Senator Yuzyk.

These gentleman do not look upon the Senate as a place in which to express their lifelong loyalty to one party or another. They look upon their responsibilities in a mature way and in the national sense. I tell you that it is only the achievement of these senators that convinces me that we should attempt to reform that body rather than follow the route prescribed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is because of the work of the second group of senators that I have gone to considerable effort to prepare the two bills, Bill C-207 and Bill C-261.

Bill C-261 would provide a new method of selecting senators bases upon party standings in the House of Commons on January 1 of each year. The then existing vacancies could be allocated on a pro-rated basis among the parties, determined finally by the party leaders. The Governor General could announce the appointments. This would mean that the Senate membership would eventually bear some relationship to the desires of the Canadian people as expressed every four years at election time.

Bill C-207, the one with which we are dealing today, is a bill that has to do with the tenure of appointment. I put in both of these bills a year ago, but I did not win in the draw. In consequence, they were not heard. I put them in again and now have the opportunity to speak on one bill only.

The key words in Bill C-207 are:

A Senator who is summoned to the Senate after the coming into force of this subsection—

That means of course that it will not apply to any existing senators.

—shall, subject to this Act, hold his place in the Senate until he attains the age of seventy-five years or for a period not to exceed ten years, whichever occurs first.

It is not by accident that it say "ten years". Last year it said fifteen years, and this year, on October 2, the Prime Minister of Canada said that he had two reforms in mind for the Senate.

... First, we should limit the duration of senatorial appointments to a certain number of years, seven, for instance, with the option of reappointing senators when they have well served their country.

He is the Prime Minister and I am just an ordinary member, so I thought I would meet him somewhat more than halfway, that I would come down from fifteen to ten, and he could meet me and come up from seven to ten.

I am sure that hon. members opposite will agree that the bill complied closely enough with the Prime Minister's wishes, and therefore they will give it speedy passage later this afternoon and send it to committee.

With regard to the last portion of the sentence uttered by the Prime Minister, in which he wanted the option of reappointing senators when they have well served their country, let me say that this would destroy the purpose of any Senate reform if that option were vested in the Prime Minister. It would make people ask: how did senator X do in the last election? If he did not pull his weight for the party, he would not be reappointed and, if he worked hard, he would be reappointed. This would put the Senate even more under the control of the party in power.

I do not wish to insinuate that there is a great deal of difference between the parties in this respect. The difficulty in some regards is that one party has been in power a great deal of time lately in our country. I do not think that we are all saints and they are all sinners. I think the difference lies in the legislation power that is given to the party in charge, the party that is temporarily forming the government, to abuse parliament by these types of appointments and employment of senators.

• (1610)

Finally, allow me to quote from the Senate Hansard for Tuesday, March 13, 1973. I shall quote the remarks of Senator Croll who suggested 12 points for Senate reform. I commend the speeches recorded in the Senate Hansard; invariably one finds extraordinarily good speeches, well researched and well constructed. I assure you it is easier to read a well constructed speech than to make one.

Senator Croll brought forward a 12-point plan for Senate reform in the seventies. He suggested, as reported at page 322, that the present absolute veto power of the Senate over all legislation should be reduced to a suspensive veto. I am glad that the Prime Minister agreed with the Senator in his speech of October 2, from which I quoted.

I do not agree with Senator Croll's suggested distribution of Senators. Once again he suggested the appointment of too many senators from this part of the world, and shortchanged western Canada, particularly British Columbia.

The third point must be considered in conjunction with the fourth. He, Senator Croll, suggested that the supporters of any one political party should not comprise more than two-thirds of the Senate at any one time, and that Canadian constitution should be amended as soon as possible to ensure this result.

Senator Croll went on to say:

The Senate is too heavily weighted on one side, and this is not good for the Senate. It is not good for democracy ... Good opposition makes for good government.

His next point was:

The government leader in the Senate should not be a member of the Cabinet.

The leader has to be our man. He is not, and it is time that we cut the umbilical cord with the House of Commons.

The Senator ended by saying:

It seems to me that there are only two options open—Senate reform or Senate abolition. It is a clear case of reform or perish.

I could not agree more with what Senator Croll said in his fine speech.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Madam Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak to the House. Therefore I would formally like to congratulate you on your appointment. I know in the very short time of this parliament that you and your colleagues have distinguished yourselves in the performance of your responsible duties.

I am very glad to participate today in this most academic of debates on Bill C-207, proposed by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), to limit the tenure of senatorial appointments to 10 years. I agree completely with the sentiments that the hon. member wishes to convey to the House concerning the need for general reform in the operations of the other place. In fact, I even agree that some limitation of tenure of our Senators is desirable, if not absolutely necessary, to make the Senate relevant to the political system of this country, in this technologically complex era.

However, I believe that the reforms of the other place required to bring this relevance to Canadian political life are so extensive that the effect of this bill is merely cosmetic and does not provide a fundamental solution to the problem. Therefore I cannot support my hon. colleague on this matter.

I think that perhaps a couple of bills will be required to change the composition of the Senate. Before we talk in terms of 10-year appointments for Senators, we should look at the terms of reference applying to senatorial appointments, and at the function of Senators within the parliamentary process. I therefore propose, in the short time available, to review some of the background of Senate reform and some contemporary responses to the problem.

I remind my hon. colleague that the British North America Act had scarcely passed the experimental stage when, in 1874, the House of Commons was called to consider the desirability of amending the constitution of the Senate. The House was asked to adopt a resolution to the effect that the system of appointment to the Senate was inconsistent with the federal principle, and that the constitution ought to be amended so as to confer upon each province the power of selecting its own senators. Debate on this resolution was adjourned without any action being taken.

Several years later the subject was revived on the motion of the then member for Perth, who advocated abolishing the life tenure of senators, providing a fixed age for compulsory retirement, and limiting "the tenure of one appointment to within the legal term of three parliaments". After debate the motion was withdrawn. In January, 1908, the same member asked for "an age limit for retirement, or a shortened term of service for future senators." Again the debate was adjourned without any action.

In 1909 Sir Richard Scott outlined a broad scheme for reform in the Senate, including the idea that "the term for which senators may be elected or appointed be limited to seven years." Thus the debate over limiting the tenure of senators is not a recent innovation, and is often linked to the question of whether the Senate should be nominated or elected.

At the time of Confederation Canada adopted the Senate nominative system as best suited to the relations which were about to be established between the provinces and the central government. Election was ruled out on the grounds that the government should only be responsible to the House of Commons, the only body to represent the people directly.

The Fathers of Confederation thought the nominative system had definite advantages. Rightly chosen in the true spirit of responsible government, they thought a nominative Senate would be the strongest bulwark of the constitution and the most impartial guardian of true democracy. It would have none of the hereditary weakness of the House of Lords, nor the partisanship of an elected chamber. It could command the services of experts from every walk of life. If it were necessary for its purpose to use the best talents of any profession—to aid in legislation for the development of the natural resources of the country, for protecting public health, for extending trade and commerce, or for widening the horizons of citizenship—they were at its disposal.

Since the 1920's no federal government has tried to alter either the powers or the composition of the Senate. However, in the government's proposals to the constitutional conference in February, 1969, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) added Senate reform to his proposals for revision of the federal constitution. The federal proposals envisaged that the Senate be reconstituted to enable it to play a more vital role in reflecting the federal character of the country.

Among other things it was suggested that senators be selected partly by the provinces, with the term of office reduced, perhaps to six years. It was also suggested the Senate be given special powers, including the right to approve federal nominations to the Supreme Court, and to have special legislative responsibility concerning the official languages, human rights, international relations, and other matters. While some of these ideas have been shelved, the question of fixed terms is still very much alive, as we can see by the Prime Minister's remarks during the Throne Speech debate this session.

When the Fathers of Confederation decided to give Senators life tenure, they hoped this would promote the independence of the Senate and, while this may have been the case, it also had the effect of lowering Senators' prestige with the public, who tended to look upon them as a privileged class of old-age pensioners. We all know they are not that. In 1965 the British North America Act was amended, requiring Senators appointed thereafter to retire at 75 years of age. It is interesting to note in passing that this change has lowered the average tenure of a Senator from about 16 years in the early 1960s to an average of eight years by 1971.

Another frequent suggestion is that the appointment of Senators be for a limited term of six, eight or even ten years as in the bill before us. It is argued that more frequent changes of membership might induce greater activity without tending to strengthen the Senate vis-à-vis the House of Commons. Such changes would also increase the introduction of new men and ideas into the Senate but, perhaps what is more important, would mean that any alternation of power between the parties in the Commons could be reflected much sooner in the Senate. That situation would be welcome, instead of the present situation whereby, when a party has been in office for a long time, it will continue to keep its majority in the Senate long after it is defeated in the House.

This is a crucial point. Over the past few years public respect for the legitimate role of the Senate in the parliamentary process has been steadily eroded since we, as members of the Liberal party, have consistently been charged by the Canadian people to govern the nation. This is a responsibility which they have been loathe to give, for good reason I may add, to Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

The present ratio of Liberal Senators to those of other parties is dangerously close to rendering the whole body of the Senate useless. Hence the sincere offer of the Prime Minister to appoint Senators from other parties.

● (1620)

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to confine oneself to the specific intent of this bill without discussing the whole matter of Senate reform. A simple reduction in the term of senatorial appointments does nothing to answer criticisms of New Democratic Party members, many past members of which party should have continued their very real contribution to the Canadian political system in the Senate after their years in the House of Commons were ended.

I can think of many past NDP members of this House who deserve to be given the nation-wide forum that is accorded to members of the red chamber. Indeed, I can think of a few present members of that party who would be equally effective in the other place.

During debate on the throne speech, I wish to remind the hon. member for Victoria, the Prime Minister suggested the duration of senatorial appointments should be limited to a certain number of years, seven for example, with the option of re-appointing Senators "when they have well served their country".

While most newspapers agreed that the Prime Minister was right to contemplate reform of the Senate, there were many queries concerning this idea. For example, the Toronto Star argued that the greatest value of the Senate lies in the fact that it includes a certain number of strong minded men, not too confined by party ties, who are not afraid to express their views on national affairs and to criticize the government. I quote from the October 18 edition of the Toronto Star:

> The danger of the proposed seven-year renewable term is that it would create strong temptation for the Prime Minister of the day to drop these independent, troublesome individuals when their terms expired and to re-appoint only the faithful party hacks who have served the party, if not their country, well. And the remaining members would be under notice not to rock the boat if they wanted their appointments renewed.

The Toronto Star should realize by now that the Liberal party is never quite that partisan and I doubt whether we have ever appointed someone, to use its derogatory phrase, who is a mere "party hack". Rather, we have appointed people who have contributed to the political and social fabric of Canadian society.

At this point I wish to digress and comment on some of the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria. I regret the hon. member feels that, once appointed, Senators should fade away in the lush splendour of the red chamber. I feel that Senators are expected to participate in the political process to the full. I believe that election campaigns are part of the political process.

I can only conclude that the hon. member's derogatory remarks concerning some of our Senators is sour grapes, and perhaps reflects his displeasure that Tory Senators do not participate fully in the Conservative caucus and the Conservative party. However, I do not know that for sure.

Most Senators are partisan appointees and I expect that they continue their partisan involvement. I remind the hon. member that Senators are members of parliament as are members of the House of Commons. We were certainly reminded of that recently in caucus.

[Mr. Collenette.]

Having briefly outlined some theoretical arguments for and against limited tenure for Senators, it is perhaps necessary to consider some practical problems in changing the present situation. The method of appointing Senators is established by the British North America Act, and in over 100 years the only major change in provisions relating to the Senate was the reform of 1965 providing for a compulsory retirement age of 75 years.

Despite this change the fact remains that effective Senate reform is not an easy task, and the Senate cannot be reformed without its consent. Therefore it is important to consider whether the Senate would favour fixed terms of office for its members. The Prime Minister has discussed this with the leader of the government in the Senate, and expressed the hope that some progress can be made in this area.

Yet only two years ago an extensive study of the constitution was undertaken by a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. The committee included 11 Senators representing both parties, and it examined at some length the question of appointment and representation in the Senate. Among other things it recommended a new distribution of seats which would maintain 24 seats for Quebec and Ontario, but would allot 12 seats each to British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba; 10 seats each to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; six seats to Newfoundland, four seats to Prince Edward Island, and two each to the Yukon and Northwest Territories, for a total of 130 seats.

It also recommended that Senators continue to be appointed by the federal government, although one half of the vacancies in each province or territory would be chosen from a panel of nominees submitted by the appropriate provincial or territorial government. It did not, however, recommend a fixed term of appointment for Senators, concluding only that the compulsory retirement age should be lowered to 70 years, and that upon retirement Senators should retain the right to their title and precedence, as well as the opportunity to participate in the work of the Senate or its committees, but not to vote or receive the indemnity of Senators.

Since this recent document, agreed to by a number of Senators, did not propose fixed terms, one is justified in asking if such an idea would find acceptance in the Senate? If not, then all the theoretical arguments for and against the idea become academic, and the question of Senate reform will probably be postponed once again.

Mr. Stanly Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) expressed the hope the House would give second reading to this bill this afternoon and send it to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. He is a nice fellow and I do not like to disappoint him, but I can think of nothing that would be more wasteful of the time of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs than for it to have this bill presented to it.

That is not to say, despite my well-known opposition to the continuance of the Senate, that one can forever block discussion on Senate reform. However, I submit that this particular proposal is not worth committee consideration. I find it just as useless as the proposal of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that there be seven year terms, subject to re-appointment.

This bill does not get at the root of the question as to whether the Senate is a desirable and useful part of our parliamentary institution. It is being demonstrated more and more that its practices are not in keeping with the principles of democracy. I contend that unless somebody can come up with more significant and more useful proposals for reform than we have from the hon. member for Victoria and from the Prime Minister, my proposal still stands as number one; let's abolish it.

It always interest me when a member like the hon. member for Victoria talks about the purpose of the Senate. He said its purpose was to give sober second thought to legislation passed by the House of Commons. I always wince a bit when that is said. The implication is that the thought in this House is not sober. I do not accept that at all. In any event, I wonder where the idea came from Mr. Speaker. I do not find it in the British North America Act.

I am sure what I shall read from the British North America Act has been put on the pages of Hansards on previous occasions, but not for a long time. Since there is this talk about the purpose of the Senate, perhaps it might be a good idea to remind ourselves what the Fathers of Confederation had in mind.

● (1630)

Section 23 of the BNA Act reads as follows:

The qualification of a Senator should be as follows:

(1) He shall be of the full age of thirty years.

I suppose that was reasonable 100 years ago but it certainly discriminates against young people who rightly believe they are quite important in today's generation; they have voting rights at the age of 18 and they have the right to enter this House at the age of 18. At any rate, that is one of the qualifications of a Senator. You must be an old man of thirty.

Note, also, that the Act just says "He". Once upon a time the judicial committee of the Privy Council had to rule that for the purpose of going to the Senate a woman was a person. That was an historic decision of the judicial committee of the Privy Council, and I think it is interesting that related to the history of the Senate was the question whether or not persons to be appointed to that place had to be men only or whether they could include women. I move on. The section continues:

(2) He shall be either a natural-born subject of the Queen—

I always like that phrase and wonder what would be meant by "un-naturally born".

—or a subject of the Queen naturalized by an act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of one of the Provinces of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, before the union, or of the Parliament of Canada, after the union.

Well, those are routine qualifications. Let us go on to subsection (3):

He shall be legally or equitably seised as of freehold for his own use and benefit of lands or tenements held in free and common socage—

I have been asking my learned friends around here what that means, and they are no more learned than I am. Anyway, there it is socage.

—or seised, or possessed for his own use and benefit of lands or tenements held in francalleu or in roture within the province for which he is appointed, of the value of four thousand dollars, over and above all rents, dues, debts, charges, mortgages and incumbrances due or payable out of or charged on or affecting the same.

Boy! If you are going to apply for a job in the other place, you really have to read the fine print.

(4) His real and personal property shall be together worth four thousand dollars over and above his debts and liabilities.

I am sure that if the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) were to move an amendment to the BNA Act he is so concerned about inflation he would hardly consider letting that $4,000 figure still stand as a sufficient requirement to get into the other place.

Mr. Gillies: It is much too low.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says it is much too low. Does he want to make it $40,000? Or $400,000? In my view any monetary consideration at all is a violation of the basic concept of democracy.

(5) He shall be resident in the province for which he is appointed;

(6) In the case of Quebec he shall have his real property qualification in the electoral division for which he is appointed, or shall be resident in that division.

I have been looking through the BNA Act and I find there are no other qualifications required. I do not see any reference to qualifications in terms of intelligence, capacity of training not even sobriety. You just have to be an old man of thirty, a proper subject of the realm and in possession of certain property.

Mr. Gillies: And be a good party worker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Don Valley says "and be a good party worker". That is not in the Act, but that has certainly been the case in the last 100 years or more. The bill before us makes a proposal under which a term in the Senate could come to an end. I would remind the sponsor that there are already provisions in the BNA Act for the place of a Senator to become vacant. These are to be found in section 31:

The place of a Senator shall become vacant in any of the following cases:

(1) If for two consecutive sessions of the parliament he fails to give his attendance in the Senate.

Well, Their Honours do manage to get into the place, so that rule really does not apply very often.

(2) If he takes an oath or makes a declaration or acknowledgment of allegiance, obedience or adherence to a foreign power, or does an act whereby he becomes a subject or citizen, or entitled to the rights or privileges of a subject or citizen, of a foreign power;

(3) If he is adjudged bankrupt or insolvent or applies for the benefit of any law relating to insolvent debtors, or becomes a public defaulter;

I do not know what the definition of that last word might be. Anyway, there it is, in the Act, and it is printed with a capital "D".

(4) If he is attainted of treason or convicted of felony or of any infamous crime.

Who is to define what is infamous? I believe there are persons guilty of things I would regard as infamous but which might seem a cause for reward to others.

(5) If he ceases to be qualified in respect of property or of residence; provided that a Senator shall not be deemed to have ceased to be qualified in respect of residence by reason only of his residing at the seat of the Government of Canada while holding an office under that government requiring his presence there.

There is really nothing else in the BNA Act regarding the qualifications of a Senator. It does not say he must have gone to school, or hold a university degree, or hold a certificate of professional proficiency. He simply has to be a person past thirty, a proper citizen, not a public defaulter, and possess a certain amount of property.

Some limitations are imposed on Senators. The main limitation is that they cannot introduce into the Senate a bill involving the expenditure of money or the imposition of a tax. There is the further provision that though Their Honours can amend almost any bill we send over there, they cannot amend a supply bill; they must either accept it or reject it in total.

I find these things about the other place interesting, but one searches in vain for the qualification to which reference is made most often, namely, that Senators are appointed to give a sober second thought to what goes on in the House of Commons. I would therefore suggest to the hon. member for Victoria that, before he presses too far his conviction that the Senate is not doing what it was designed to do, he should produce a blueprint setting out what he thinks it was designed for, and in the absence of such a blueprint it seems to me the other place has developed along lines which are natural for a body made up of persons appointed by the government of the day.

It just so happens that during most of this century the Liberals have been in power and they have been filling the place with their appointees. But had the reverse been the case, and had the Tories been in power I doubt there would have been much difference in the performance of Tory Senators.

Mr. Gillies: They would be more sober.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says they would be more sober. That is his comment, not mine. In any case, as I have said on many occasions, I do have respect for many of the Senators over there. I know a number of them personally. After all, I have been around here longer than most of them. I know them and I respect the 25 or 30 of them who have worked hard at the job. But it seems to me that the whole set-up, couched as it is in the language of 1867, does not fit in with a modern democracy where parliament is supposed to be the body responsible to the people of this country.

● (1640)

I have said many a time that we in the House of Commons can and do make mistakes. But when we make mistakes we have to go back and answer for those mistakes, even as we answer for the things we do correctly, to the people who sent us here in the first place. Over in the Senate, whether they do the right thing, the wrong thing, or nothing at all, they are not responsible to anyone. They are not even responsible to the Prime Minister who recommended their appointment in the first place.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I submit that the sensible thing for a modern twentieth century parliament to do is to decide that we believe in democracy, and that we want the persons who make the laws of this country to be elected by, and made responsible to, the people of Canada.

Usually if I find myself in a discussion with students and others, and that particular word comes up and it is said that the lawmakers should be elected, someone will ask: "Well, what about electing the Senate?" I say, let the matter rest rather than that. We have enough conflicts now between the parties in this House, between the executive and the members of this House, between Ottawa and the provinces, that if we added to that the conflict between two houses each with the authority to stand on its own feet, it would slow down the process of government even more. So if we cannot get rid of the Senate, let us leave it as it is.

The Senate is in a situation in which Their Honours realize that their authority is limited. As the hon. member for Victoria has pointed out, in the last parliament the Senate did object to a clause in one of the bills we sent over to them. He indicated why he thought they did that, but at any rate they did realize that once this House of Commons had confirmed its previous vote there was nothing more for them to do.

As I say, if we cannot get rid of the place altogether I think it should be kept in the situation it is in at the present time, where the Senators say their piece once in a while but really do not try to upset the democratic apple cart.

I should like to make a brief reference again to the fact that some of the committees in the other place do a good job. The reports they have produced have been the result of thorough and exhaustive study, and some of their recommendations have been exceedingly worth while. But I do not think that the fact that 25 or 30 persons do a good job when work is assigned to them is justification for keeping 102 persons on the payroll; and not only on the payroll, but nominally with the authority to veto the decisions made by the elected representatives.

So, Madam Speaker, I am afraid, like a good Conservative of long ago, I am unrevised and unrepentant about this issue. I think that in the democracy of this latter part of the twentieth century we should be democrats all the way, and that we should have a parliament that is made up only of those who are responsible to the people. Therefore that means getting rid of the Senate. I suggest that to waste time on this kind of reform is just that—a waste of time.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, may I begin by congratulating you upon your attainment of office and on the way you conduct that important office. I wish you well in your duties.

I listened with great delight to that champion of the status quo, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He reads the British North America Act to us just as they say Senator Huey Long used to read the cookbooks to the U.S. Senate when he was conducting a filibuster. I will not show any preference between the books, but I must say I prefer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to Senator Long.

I do not want the hon. member of the Liberal party, whose seat I do not know since I do not have my seating plan with me, to think that I am registering an attitude of sour grapes; that is not so at all. Also, my own colleagues will know that I am not revealing any conflict of interest or anticipating things that never seem to come. But I will say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that I will support his stand on the Senate when I reach the age of 74½. At that time I will give in and support him; but since I am only 55, the same age as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), we will have to let hope spring a bit reluctantly from time to time, if not eternally.

I believe this proposal is perhaps the oldest public discussion. In 1893, long before I was born, before the mover of this motion was born, and even before the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was born, there was a big political convention in Ottawa, the first national convention in the nation's history. The Liberal party met, and one of the resolutions was that we should reform the Senate. As I say, that was in 1893 and there has not been much reforming done since then.

The giant step taken a few years ago was to say that the Senators could go until they were 75 and no longer, and that has changed the place a good deal. We read of the distinguished Senator who made two speeches in all his career. When he first went there he denied he did so as a matter of political patronage. The next speech was when he thanked his colleagues for giving him a painting on his one hundredth birthday—and there were 35 years between the two speeches. Nevertheless, they said he was a most excellent man, and while he did not speak he always voted for the party whenever those Senate bells began their gentle ringing.

And so the Senate is sometimes laughed at, Mr. Speaker. Dawson, at page 314, talks about the impossibility of making much change, and he quotes from Ulysses:

> Surely, slumber is more sweet than toil, the shore Than labour in the deep mid-ocean, wind, and wave, and oar; Oh rest ye, brother mariners, we will not wander more.

And they practise that urge toward tranquility which keeps the body alive and functioning.

On the other hand I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a bit cynical in suggesting, as he often does, that the contribution of some of the Senators is not sufficient to justify the continued existence of the institution. In my short 17 years here—and I came long after the hon. member—I have been much impressed by the work of the committee on the Caribbean-Commonwealth-Canada commission, one of the finest studies ever done in that very important area, as well as by the poverty study. Some other excellent work has been done in the realm of external affairs which was very, very useful. In fact, I should like to see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre go to that place; he would add a lot to it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, please! Never!

Mr. Macquarrie: They are pretty casual about procedure. I can see the day when he comes down the aisle with Senator Forsey on one side and Senator Argue on the other, to add to the NDP bloc in the other place.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has he given up any hope that there might be a recommendation of an honorary degree for him?

Mr. Macquarrie: Now, Madam Speaker, that is what you call literary blackmail from the chancellor of a very distinguished university. I have often thought that if I cannot get into the Senate then perhaps a university degree, a doctor of letters or something, will do. I will accept his offer and not consign the hon. member to the Senate. Perhaps it will be the leader of his party who will go there, because the leader of the NDP fought very hard against my party during the campaign. I heard him attacking the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), and I think he was motivated by fear. He thought that we were going to get a majority government, and the NDP had been in bed with the Liberals for so long that they could not bear the thought of sleeping alone. Thus they did not want a majority government, so that should come as some reward.

To turn to the bill of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), I do congratulate him on what I think is a very sensible suggestion for reform. I agree profoundly with him that neither that House nor this can sustain a continued lack of respect among the public. I have always said that as individuals we can live with that old syndrome of politicians with all their peculiarities, but there must be a basic respect for the institution itself.

● (1650)

The manner in which the hon. member has put forward this step in reform, and as a member of a reform minded party I am all for it and do not join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his unrelenting support of the status quo, I think is forward and progressive. I support the hon. member for Victoria most fully and heartily. In my mind he has made a good move and I wish him well.

A very difficult step in legislation is that of getting the second House different enough to be worth while. As I said long ago, if it disagrees with this House it is inequitous, and if it agrees it is superfluous. So you have to find some way, and I think the hon. member has opened a good line in that direction. I would suggest perhaps that if we had 10 members from each province it would be a better place, particularly for example from Prince Edward Island.

Before I take my seat, as I know other hon. members want to speak, I want to point out that the Prime Minister, I am sure accidentally, misled the country and the province of Prince Edward Island when he said through the throne speech that he had talked to Senator Flynn, and that in any case where a member of the Conservative party retired he would appoint a Conservative in his place. I happen to recall that Senator J. J. MacDonald of Prince Edward Island, a Progressive Conservative, retired in 1971 and was succeeded by Senator Bonnell, a Liberal. I think the Prime Minister slipped in his memory in that regard. I think it was a rather unfortunate slip, and indeed thought so at the time.

I support my colleague and congratulate him. I think his bill goes about as far as anything the other place would likely pass. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will never be able to put a bill through here that the hon. gentlemen in the other place will support. I am with my colleague the hon. member for Victoria in his move and I congratulate him.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I regret very much that there are only a few minutes left as I know there are a number of members who would like to make a contribution, some of them members on this side of the House.

I listened to the crusade for reform by the hon. member who just spoke and I could not help but remember that the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) and I represent constituencies both of which have far more people resident in them than are resident in the entire province of the hon. member which is now represented in this place by four parliamentarians and in the other place also by four. I cannot believe he was serious in suggesting that we should increase such numbers to 10. If he wants to start on reform I think he should start in his own house and look at it a little more closely.

The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) presented himself as having two bills, and I think the one to deal with the question of representation genuinely involves the problem of reform. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that this bill is not reform and does not get to the heart of the matter.

The real problem with the other place is the lack of opposition. The opposition has dwindled to a handful, and many of them are aging and are not as forceful as they were in other years.

I listened to the hon. member who proposed this bill complain about political partisanship. I wish he had been a candidate in the election of 1962, as I was, when the Senators in the other place had a slightly different preponderance of numbers. I can remember Senator Grosart doing something somewhat similar to the job that Senator Keith Davey performed in the last election. All that time there were members on this side of the House who had some misgivings about the degree of partisanship involved.

If political partisanship is a crime then there is something wrong with our political life. Surely the very essence of our political life is a healthy interest in the democratic process. The cure lies in a better and stronger opposition in the Senate, where there should be a better balance of the parties in Canada. The real weakness of the Senate is the lack of a parliamentary opposition. That is the point to which the hon. member who moved this bill should have directed his remarks.

I listened to the arguments of the hon. member for Victoria, and at no point did he deal with the basic point of his bill; that is, limiting the length of a Senate term. This is a popular exercise and I submit that limiting the term would bring about, if it were enacted—and I do not believe it will be enacted in this form—a discrimination against younger men in the other place. The problem of accepting a limited appointment, to those who are in a profession or business career and are younger in years, is a very serious one indeed.

We are, in my opinion, very correctly raising the question of conflict of interest. We are saying to the men and women who go to the other place they must serve full time, they must serve without conflict of interest, and they must cut their former ties. A man or woman who leaves a profession, business or usual activity, for a limited period, at the end of that period has to face the certainty of going back into civilian life, as it were, and at that point in too many cases has to start thinking of bread and butter.

In such circumstances the very quality of independence, the very quality of full-time service, and the very quality of making sure there is no conflict of interest comes, shall I say, under pressure. That is not the point. The point is that we have a Senate at this stage, whatever the faults of the system may be, and I will concede there are a number of faults. The fact is that the independence of the Senate is the very guarantee of its integrity. The amendment which is proposed in this bill does not, in my opinion, deal with it.

There are two committees about to be struck in this House; one is a joint committee of the other place and the House of Commons to deal with the Public Service of Canada, and the other will deal with the National Capital Region. We look to the other place for able and continuing representation by parliamentarians who will persist in taking an interest in these matters.

On October 30, 1972, there was a previous parliament, of which I was a member, with a number of faces that are not now here, some 120 of them. The turnover of elected representatives in the Canadian parliament is very great indeed. The other place has provided continuity on a number of committees dealing with a number of important matters.

I should like at this stage, with the indulgence of the House and if I have time, to tell a short anecdote. I regret that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not here. I am thinking of the problem of the lost statues.

When I was a member of a previous parliament the then minister of public works, now a member of the other place, called upon one or two of the local members, Jean Richard and myself, and said: "I have a problem and I would like local members to give me their very best advice. What do you do with certain statues?" One of them was a statue of former Prime Minister Meighen, and it was simply outrageous. It was not done by any Liberal artist; it was no Grit plot and there was no attempt at concealment, but what you would do with such a statue is utterly beyond my comprehension.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Send it to the Senate.

Mr. Francis: It was done as a caricature.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please.

Mr. Francis: Madam Speaker, perhaps I might just finish my story as I am sure hon. members would appreciate it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is there agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Richard and I took a good hard look at these statues and said: "We are members of one political party; we are government supporters and we do not feel we should advise you. We feel there are distinguished and competent members in the other place who are most able to give impartial advice, and which would be accepted by everyone as impartial advice that would not be politically motivated."

The minister of public works appointed a committee, I think of Senator O'Leary and Senator Eugene Forsey, representing different and opposing political interests at that time. They carefully inspected the statues that were available, and I suspect that the then minister acted in accordance with the very wise recommendations received from those members of the other place.

I know there are questions on the order paper and that the matter has now been forced into a public debate, and a decision will be made. I hope that this little anecdote will show that there is no conspiracy or plot on behalf of the Commons, or one political party, to do any injustice to previous Prime Ministers in this place.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hour allotted for private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m.

At 5.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

STUDY OF EFFECT OF FREON GAS ON OZONE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the threat of depletion of the earth's protective layer of ozone arising from the freon gas contained in aerosol cans has become so serious as to be the subject of studies in the scientific journal Nature and to cause others to warn that life on earth will be threatened within 10 to 15 years if present production of freon gas continues, I move:

That this matter be directed to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for immediate consideration to determine whether sufficient funds and personnel are available to the atmospheric processes research branch to make effective studies and to return reports in the shortest possible time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to intervene at this point in connection with a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43, but since a motion requires unanimous consent there is often a temptation to believe that it is not necessary for hon. members to comply rigidly with the rule. I would point out, however, that Standing Order 43, in a similar way to Standing Order 26, requires that the subject matter presented pursuant to the rule should be a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The motion proposed relates to a problem which has certainly been with us for some time; if the situation becomes more serious it may have terrible implications 10 or 15 years from now. However, in present circumstances I must rule that it is not a proper subject for a motion under Standing Order 43.

IMPORTATION OF SUGAR

Question No. 316—Mr. Herbert:

1. What action is the government taking or contemplating to increase imports of sugar from the Caribbean Islands?

2. What is the effect of transportation costs from South Africa on the price of sugar?

3. Is the government able to estimate what proportion of the sugar market has already been purchased in the next five years and is there any preliminary plan to ration supplies in the event of a shortage?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The West Indies has experienced declining production of sugar for several years. British Honduras has been able to ship only 13,000 tons of sugar to Canada in 1973 and Jamaica 8,000 tons in 1974. This year the West Indies was not able to fulfil its quota under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement and prospects for a return to normal production are not favourable. In recent years the West Indies has favoured the United States market over that of the United Kingdom or Canada for whatever sugar has been available.

2. Because of the system of pricing sugar in Canada the transportation costs of sugar from any country of origin, are not taken directly into account. The price of sugar in Canada is linked directly to the London daily price, which is a CIF price and includes the Caribbean-United Kingdom freight rates which, in turn is adapted to the Caribbean-Canada rate.

3. Should current discussions with sugar producers, result in agreement, if is expected that almost half of Canadian requirements will have been committed for the next three years. It is not expected that any shortage of sugar in Canada will occur to the extent that rationing will be required.

2. (a) Clean-up at this comparatively isolated site was undertaken through the co-operative efforts of the Department of National Defence, the Ministry of Transport, the Department of the Environment, the United States Air Force and the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation (IT&T), responsible under contract for operation and maintenance of the base. The methods applied included: (i) Controlled burning of spilled oil on the ground surface to prevent further run-off into Saglek Bay; (ii) Pumping to storage the oil contained by diking; (iii) Flush out of oil retained in the porous soil, collection of the recovered material in pools and prepared ditches and subsequent transfer to storage; (b) Clean-up operations proceeded for approximately one and a half months. The onset of winter curtailed the work which will be completed following spring break-up; (c) Total cost of the operation is being compiled, with the expectation that it will exceed $300,000.

3. Initially, costs have been born by the various agencies involved and by IT&T.

4. An investigation which is currently under way to identify the responsible party, is expected to be completed by mid-November.

5. All such installations will be examined and specific environmental protection requirements will be prescribed.

6. No reports have been received in the past respecting oil spill incidents at Saglek.

PORTABLE DEVICE TO REPLACE PRESENT ARTIFICIAL ENDOCRINE PANCREAS

Question No. 355—Mr. Howie:

1. Was an application made to the Canadian Medical Research Council for a grant to develop a portable device to replace the present artificial endocrine pancreas which is too bulky for anything but hospital use and, if so, have any grants been made or money paid for this purpose?

2. Have any applications been rejected and, if so, for what reasons?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. An application was considered by the Medical Research Council. No grant was made for this purpose.

2. The application was not approved. In the interests of the applicant the Medical Research Council does not release information except to the applicant, about the reasons for a specific application not having been sucessful.

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF THE VETERANS' LAND ACT

Question No. 402—Mr. Jones:

1. What consideration has been given to extending the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act?

2. Has the Minister of Veterans Affairs considered an immediate review of the requirements for entitlement to Veterans' Land Act benefits with a view to eliminating the present lot size requirement and substituting therefor lots duly approved by a municipal or provincial jurisdiction and, if so, on what date will the review be completed and a decision made?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1 and 2. As I stated in the House on October 10, 1974, the government is giving careful consideration to the whole matter of the Veterans' Land Act and an announcement on this subject will be made at a very early date.

ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM

Question No. 425—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How much money was allocated to the Assisted Home Ownership Program for 1974?

2. In which cities were funds under AHOP available?

3. How many housing units, new homes or existing homes, have been approved for purchase under AHOP?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. The budget allocation for the Assisted Home Ownership Program in 1974 was originally $300 million. This was subsequently increased and the final allocation totalled $450 million.

2. AHOP funds were available throughout Canada.

3. The total number of housing units approved for the period January 1—October 17, 1974 was 17,252, 60 per cent of which was for new housing. Currently, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has approximately 1,250 additional applications in process.

ARCTIC POLLUTION PREVENTION CERTIFICATES

Question No. 473—Mr. Forrestall:

1. For what reason are none of the vessels operated by the government inspected or issued with Arctic Pollution Prevention Certificates?

2. Does this result from government policy?

3. What does this absence of certificates mean in terms of the level required of government owned and operated ships in terms of pollution prevention requirements otherwise expected of non-government vessels?

4. Would all government ships operating in the Arctic be able to pass such standards and, if not, in which cases?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act does not apply to any ship owned by Her Majesty.

2. Yes.

3. Government ships intended for Arctic service are, in general, constructed to standards higher than those applying to commercial ships for comparable service. Ship Masters are under standing instructions to ensure that pollution prevention requirements are observed.

4. Yes.

Oral Questions

FM BROADCASTING, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 500—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Is New Brunswick included in the plans of CBC for an FM radio network?

2. Will FM reception be available to citizens of the City of Saint John?

3. For what reason was New Brunswick not included in the recent announcement about the inception of FM broadcasting by CBC in St. John's, Newfoundland and Halifax, N.S.?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation had originally planned to apply to the CRTC during 1975 for a license for an FM radio station to serve the Fredericton-Saint John area. Heavy constraints on the capital budget of the CBC have forced it to delay these plans. It is the intention of the corporation to proceed with these plans as funds become available.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AIDE MEMOIRE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister now had an opportunity to consider the tabling of the aide-mémoire that the government submitted to the European Economic Community early in the year? Has the Prime Minister had an opportunity of consulting the minister concerned, and is he now prepared to table the aide memoire?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I did discuss the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and we agree that there would be advantage in permitting the Canadian public to be informed of these matters by tabling. I am having the pieces put together and translated, but I am certain I will be able to table them tomorrow. There will be the aide-memoire, the draft trade agreement, and a statement that was made in September either in Washington or in New York, I cannot recall which, explaining the Canadian position on these two documents. I am quite certain that they will be ready for tabling tomorrow.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF RETAILERS ALLEGEDLY PROFITEERING IN BEEF

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the documentation provided on Friday by the Food Prices Review Board showing that certain retail outlets are selling beef at considerably different prices from others, with the clear implication that some are in fact indulging in what is appropriately called profiteering, would the minister consider making known to the public the names of the chains concerned in particular cities and the prices at which they are selling beef?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the information was obtained by the Board on condition that it remain confidential. The chairman of the Board to whom I directed the same question as asked by the hon. member today has advised me that it is not possible for the Board to disclose confidential information.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN PRODUCTION OF BEEF AS MEANS OF INCREASING RETURNS TO PRODUCERS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that Mr. Burton, a member of that board, at a press conference on this subject on Friday said that the only way of ensuring that the farmer or cow-calf producer will get a greater share or a just price for his product is to decrease the supply of beef in the coming months, and in particular, if I may quote him, that "the only people able to do that are the well established ranchers", is this in the minister's view an appropriate way of dealing with the production of beef both from the consumers' point of view and in the long run interests of the beef producers themselves?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this report was made public last Friday. We are considering its various aspects and some suggestions from that report may be followed up later this week.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: May I put a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister apparently did not hear the question. I was not in this instance referring to what was in the report but to what one of the board members said at the press conference which was called to explain or elaborate upon the report. A Mr. Burton on the Food Prices Review Board is quoted as saying that the only way to deal with the situation we are now confronted with in the beef industry is to decrease the supply of beef. I am asking the minister concerned, from the point of view of the consumers, whether he believes this is the best approach at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I did understand the question but I do not wish to comment on a statement made outside the House by a member of that Board, before knowing exactly what was said.

REASON FOR DIFFERENCES IN PRICES CHARGED BY SAME RETAILER IN TORONTO AND OTTAWA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the minister has stated it is not possible to deal with individual cases, the evidence of which he has not in his possession. I want to draw to his attention and get his observations on two advertisements appearing on the same day, one in the Toronto Star and the other in the Ottawa Citizen, by the same company. From my examination, the interesting thing is that sirloin steak was advertised for sale in Toronto at $1.48 a pound and in Ottawa it was 20 percent higher at $1.79. This is the same ad with the same wording. Porterhouse steak was $1.78 in Toronto and $1.89 in Ottawa and prime rib club steak was $1.48 in Toronto and $1.79 in Ottawa. The minister has said these things are secret, are not known and they cannot be revealed, but an examination will show that, by gosh, the prices are not right, yet these advertisements were by the same company.

In view of these advertisements, and I will let the minister have them although they are ten days old and he should have had them by now, I ask whether he will have this looked into to determine what possible justification there is for this mulcting of the public, as is apparent from these advertisements, while at the same time cattle prices are going down and on the other hand the consumer is being made to pay more and more, providing he lives in Ottawa?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes to the first part of the question. As far as the second part is concerned, I shall inquire about the validity of the hon. member's statement.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID FOR BEEF PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture.

I am convinced the Prime Minister is not insensible to the farming conditions in Quebec as well as throughout the country. Sad demonstrations have taken place over the week end in the province of Quebec and similar ones are likely to occur in other provinces. I think the farming population of the country expects the Prime Minister to take a position. to make statements in order to meet the farmers' normal and fair demands.

Therefore, would the Prime Minister assure the House that his government will introduce some measures in this respect, even in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. Does the government intend to introduce measures in order to satisfy farmers and beef producers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is certainly aware that the Minister of Agriculture is presently in Rome as a participant to a conference which is extremely important for the food situation in the world. Last week he replied on a number of occasions to questions similar to those of the Social Credit leader. Before leaving, he most certainly brought out the issue during Cabinet meetings and initiated a number of working plans which may hopefully lead to a solution of this problem.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I plan to bring down the budget two weeks from now, Monday, November 18. In view of this date, I shall not be announcing plans to deal with the $525 million Government of Canada bonds due December 31, 1974 until the afternoon of November 19.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—POSSIBILITY OF READJUSTMENT IN VIEW OF DEFICIT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the deficit in trade with the United States in motor vehicles and parts of nearly three-quarters of a billion dollars during the first nine months of this year which indicates a deficit for the 12 months of between $1 billion and $2 billion, I should like the minister to advise the House if he is engaged now in discussions with the United States government aimed at a readjustment of this pact which was intended originally to be mutually beneficial to both countries.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I believe the pact has been mutually beneficial. I think it has been particularly beneficial to Canada. During this very difficult year, occasioned by the reduction of sales in the United States, Canadian sales have held up and Canadian jobs have held up. I have had discussions with members of the industry on a continuing basis to ensure Canadian interests will be fully secured.

Oral Questions

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—REASON FOR CONTINUING PRICE DIFFERENTIAL ON SAME MODELS PRODUCED IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. It may be interesting some day to hear the minister explain how this pact which is giving us a deficit of $1 billion a year is beneficial to the country. Would he explain why it is that Canada continues to agree to a differential of more than 7 per cent in respect of United States and Canadian prices for the same models produced in Canada and the United States which differential it was stated would be non-existent five years after the pact started in 1965.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would look at the differential when he was trade minister he would see that it was quite close to 20 per cent. Over a period of years under the aegis of the pact there has been a steady norrowing of the differential. The figure to which I think he is referring is the figure reported by the President of the United States last week in a report to Congress showing the differential had been reduced to 7 per cent. That was based on the beginning of the 1974 model year. As a result of negotiations with the automobile manufacturers in Canada there has been a continual narrowing of the gap in the 1974 and 1975 model years.

Mr. Hees: I have a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not aware of the fact that I was the one who started the negotiations and that without such negotiations there would not have been any auto pact. Does he feel that the existence of something today, which it was promised at the time of the signing of the pact would not exist, is justified in any shape or form, and if so how?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

CONSULTATIONS WITH MARITIME PROVINCES ON OFFSHORE RIGHTS—AREAS OF DISAGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF A REPORT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In reply to a question I asked the minister on October 23, as recorded on page 645 of Hansard, the minister indicated that the federal and provincial authorities were in substantial agreement on the east coast as to the regime for covering offshore rights and jurisdictions. This suggests there were certain disagreements. Is the minister prepared to tell the House the area in which disagreement occurred. Was it in respect of the nature of the resource or the manner of splitting the revenue from the resource?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, without looking up the answer I think I referred to the fact that four of the five eastern provinces and the federal government were in substantial agreement and the province of Newfoundland was not. In respect of any remaining differences between the four provinces and the federal government, I could not respond from memory but my impression is that the difference was very slight. One critical matter was how to achieve the interfacing with the very important lines of demarcation between the four provinces and Newfoundland.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, would the minister be prepared at an appropriate moment and fairly soon to table a report of the government on the eastern seaboard in respect of these matters.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I could consider that. I invite the hon. gentleman to reflect on the fact that this is a matter that is in negotiation and I think I would have to decide as to whether tabling it would bring about an early conclusion or might move us farther away from it.

GRAIN

DATE OF COMPLETION OF SURVEY OF STOCKS—ASSURANCE OF ABILITY TO MEET EXPORT COMMITMENTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board whether he can tell the House if the recent survey undertaken by the Canadian Wheat Board as to grain stocks in western Canada has been completed, and if he could give us some indication as to what the survey contains. Could he also assure the House that Canada will be able to meet the export commitments that it has made in the forseeable future?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The usual survey by the Canadian Wheat Board has been completed. If my memory serves me correctly, as of October 16 there was a balance of about 800 million bushels of grain in total, deliverable on the farms.

While we have to obtain the exact figure for the hon. member, let me say that there are adequate supplies of grain of most types, although there is some concern about the availability of barley for malting purposes. So far as wheat is concerned, there is certainly more lower grade wheat than usual on hand. However, the Wheat Board sees a fairly large supply of good quality wheat left over from previous years as well as a substantial amount in this year's crop. We will be making such adjustments in the selling programs as are required to meet the circumstances.

AMOUNT OF CARRYOVER

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I should like to ask the minister whether the Wheat Board has given him any indication as to the amount of carryover which they would expect at the end of the 1975 crop year. In other words, is Canada prepared to sell down to approximately 100 million bushels or even less to fulfill all the demands for grain that will be received?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The Canadian Wheat Board has been working with the estimated carryover as of August 1, which may be in the order of 100 million bushels lower than last August 1. There is a requirement for carryover to meet the shipments in August and early September when new grain may not be available in any case. Essentially, the Canadian Wheat Board would be prepared, as would the government, to see the carryover being reduced to as low a figure as is practical. There is always concern on the part of the Wheat Board regarding when farmers will in fact begin withholding the final amount of grain even though they had earlier expected to deliver it, and that is not exactly a science but more a matter of general calculation.

ENERGY

OIL—POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN PRICE BY MIDDLE EAST COUNTRIES IF SOLD TO GOVERNMENT-OWNED COMPANY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The government of Saudi Arabia has proposed a 3½ per cent reduction in the price of crude oil with the proviso that this reduction will be passed on only to the government-owned national oil companies such as those of France and Italy, and will not be passed on to the multinational oil companies. I want to ask the minister whether, in view of the obvious advantages to the Canadian consumers flowing from such an arrangement, the minister is planning any discussions with the OPEC countries, and is the government prepared to set up a national marketing mechanism which could deal directly with the oil producing countries along the lines suggested in the Middle East economic survey released last week in Beirut?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite prepared to have further discussions with various OPEC members along these lines.

As the hon. gentleman may recall from previous statements, this is a proposition which has been communicated to us from time to time. As to putting the mechanism into place here in Canada, there is already a bill on the order paper to create such a mechanism, and as soon as the House can dispose of the petroleum administration act, my priority would be to seek an early passage of the Petro-Canada bill.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Oil Can Unlimited.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Does the minister envisage the Canada petroleum company, which will be set up under Bill C-8, entering into the purchase on the international market of oil supplies for Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This was distinctly contemplated by the government when putting the proposal forward, particularly where it is indicated to us that supplies would be available through the Canadian national corporation for the Canadian market where they might not be available through the international majors.

OIL—SUGGESTION BY IRAN TO TIE PRICE TO WORLD COMMODITY INDEX

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker, regarding the proposal of the Shah of Iran to cut oil prices by 14 per cent and his proposal for discussions between the oil consuming countries and the OPEC nations with a view to reaching an international commodity agreement that would tie oil prices to a world commodity index. In view of the fact that this might be more productive than the confrontation which could arise from an international energy agreement such as this government is now contemplating, is the minister pursuing discussions with other oil importing countries regarding the advisability of initiating discussions along the lines suggested by the Shah of Iran?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in reply I would say we should both enter into the IEP and have these discussions. I have had discussions with the minister of petroleum from Saudi Arabia along these lines and I think the Shah's statement over the weekend will contribute further to this. When I saw the Shah earlier this year, at that time they were reluctant to change the price without some kind of international indexing arrangement such as he has referred to. I think these suggestions are very much worth pursuing.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the inflation rate in connection with medical services reached nearly 17 per cent, and that the Medicare program is one of the most important federal-provincial cost-sharing programs, I should like to know whether the right hon. Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, that issue has not been raised by anybody.

PROGRAM FOR MONITORING BIRTH DEFECTS—POSSIBLE CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in his absence I will direct it to the parliamentary secretary. It is related to the program for monitoring birth defects which is to commence later this month in the United States. In view of the fact that Canada does not have a similar program, national in scope, for the surveillance of this very serious problem—I can place this in its perspective by referring to the thalidomide problem in the past—have the minister or his officials had consultations with United States officials with a view to participating in this worthwhile program which of course has the potential for correcting a very serious problem relating to birth defects which occur in their thousands each year in Canada?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Lambton-Kent for giving notice of this question. The health protection branch of the department, in co-operation with the provinces, operates the Congenital Anomaly (Birth Defects) Surveillance System. This system has operated since 1970 and was designed to be able to detect increases or decreases in the incidence of congenital anomalies.

The department is aware of the United States system. In fact, a senior official of the department was actively involved and consulted in the early planning stages of their system. We expect to continue to co-operate fully with them and to receive information of their progress and results. If any improvements in other systems come to our attention that we think are feasible, we will use them. We feel, however, that the Canadian monitoring system is as good as any of the others.

Considering construction deadlines and the kind of facility the government has in mind, can the Prime Minister tell the House when instructions will be relayed to Air Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport answered a similar question a very short while ago and I think he indicated that no specific date had been set when the thing was being proceeded with. It will be ready probably in time for the next—

COLLAPSE OF WHARF AT TADOUSSAC—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Could he tell the House whether he is aware of the collapse, during this past week-end, of the Tadoussac wharf which was used by ferry-boats on the Saguenay, thus compelling truckers heading toward or coming from the northeastern part of the province of Quebec to take a diversion road which makes a trip over 200 miles longer? And in the affirmative, could he tell the House if he intends to take emergency action to deal with this problem?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the accident which seriously hinders traffic on the North shore. Unfortunately, it is not in accordance with federal policy to maintain, repair or rebuild wharves linking two sections of a road located within the same province. This means that the province of Quebec will have—what I say is right, Mr. Speaker—to repair this wharf itself. If we can be of any help in the meantime, we shall be glad to do so.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Can the minister tell the House why that province does not find the program of regional economic expansion as attractive as the other provinces find it?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question in the terms used by the hon. member. I can say, however, that subsequent to his question I made some inquiries and the Northwestern Development Agreement for British Columbia is moving ahead quite satisfactorily. I got the impression that it will be possible for us to reach agreement on specific projects in the relatively near future. UNITED NATIONS ACCORD ON MARITIME TRAFFIC—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RATIFICATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, further to one I asked a few days ago regarding the 40-40-20 formula with respect to the movement of goods in and out of Canada and the very real possibility of a Canadian merchant fleet being built up for the first time in 30 or 40 years. Can the Minister give us some indication of what Canada's position will be with regard to ratification of that accord?

● (1440)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I looked into the question. The hon. member is right. There was a meeting of about 70 countries. The agreement is in force to the extent that 28 or 30 countries ratified it. That is not yet true. It has not yet been done. That means the agreement is not in force. With regard to the substance of the problem, if we decide to use our own ships for about 40 per cent of our international trade, there will be implications which the hon. member understands. I am inclined to support the idea which the hon. member expressed, that he is in favour of a merchant marine in Canada.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not want the minister to leave the impression that I indicated Canada had indeed ratified this. Rather, I was asking whether Canada intended to ratify it, having abstained from voting in principle.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, at this moment we do not have the intention to ratify. We must wait until we know whether we will be in a position to implement the agreement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether we are classified in the same category as the hon. member for Moncton, but it seems to me that we should get the eye of the Chair a bit more often—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Témiscamingue will note, I am sure, that there are exactly five creditists members in the House at this time. I intend to recognize a second creditist member during the question period. This, to my mind, is a fair proportion under the circumstances.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

TAX CUTS ON CLOTHING—REASON FOR DELAYING MONITORING PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, those difficulties now over, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance—

[English]

Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In his May budget, the minister undertook to eliminate taxes on clothing. This was in fact done on July 16. The minister stated that if these tax cuts were not passed on and reflected in prices, he would take steps to ensure that the consumer does in fact gain. Recognizing that most retailers will automatically comply, will the minister advise whether he has received assurance from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that that minister has in fact been monitoring what has been going on and that in all cases the prices reflect these tax cuts.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have received that assurance. I look forward to receiving a full report from my colleague in due course which will answer in detail the question posed by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is now some 14 weeks since the tax was removed. I wonder how long the minister intends to wait. I now wish to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he has any explanation for the fact that it is only this week he is commencing his investigations to ascertain what is happening.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the whole thing is very simple. We wanted to have a pilot project to delineate the investigation more specifically. This project took place in September. We analyzed the answers given to the questionnaire sent out in connection with the project. A complete investigation is now under way with a more complete and improved questionnaire.

I can assure the hon. member that no matter when the investigation takes place, it is really of very little importance because, if the tax is levied, whether we know the results today, or whether we did 15 days ago, will in no way change the situation.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister be good enough to explain how a customer who did not receive the benefit of the tax cut in October or even November can receive this benefit as a result of the minister's tardiness in not discovering until some months later that the tax cut had not been passed on.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, obviously the companies that do not pass the tax cut on to the consumer will be named following that investigation. And I think that is a guarantee for the consumer.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

TAX CUTS ON CLOTHING—NATURE OF PILOT PROJECT FOR MONITORING BENEFIT TO CONSUMER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. What was the exact nature of the pilot project carried out by the department in September, and did it in fact reveal that retailers were not passing on tax cuts to consumers?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, the pilot project was carried out in the Toronto area and the answers we got showed that the tax cut was passed on.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF IMPORTS TO AVOID LAYOFFS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to see that my colleagues are glad when I rise to ask a question. My question is directed to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the fact that several textile manufacturers now have difficulties competing with imported textiles and that they are forced to lay off people, can the hon. Minister tell the House whether he has had representations from the people concerned in this industry asking for him to intervene in order to stop or to reduce if possible imports in this area?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have been made aware of the difficulties in the industry occasioned by a worldwide downturn in textile demand and activity. This is causing inventory liquidations and distress selling. So far we have not been able to determine that any landings have been made as dumping or undervaluation of imports. We are maintaining continuous contact with the industry in this regard. In accordance with the provisions of the textile policy, the Textile and Clothing Board is currently conducting an urgent inquiry into acrylic yarn imports. Further similar inquiries on a number of other products are anticipated in the near future as a result of requests from the Canadian Textiles Institute.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Can the Minister tell the House whether import licenses have been issued during the last months by his department and in the affirmative, for which countries?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will have to make inquiries as to the precise number of import permits granted, what countries and, of course, what products. I will be pleased to make inquiries and provide that information to the hon. member.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE DECLINE IN PRIME LENDING RATE FOLLOWING SALE OF SAVINGS BONDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell the House if the prime rate will follow the United States rate in declining once the Canada Savings Bonds are sold or shut off?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that it is very difficult for me in this position to predict movement of exchange rates, interest rates or other variable factors in the economy insofar as they may affect market decisions.

Mr. Ritchie: Can the Minister of Finance explain why the prime rate in Canada immediately follows a corresponding rise in the United States but lags behind when the U.S. rate falls?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED STUDY OF EFFECT OF AEROSOL DISCHARGES ON OZONE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It follows from the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, which was ruled out of order. In view of studies that show if aerosol discharges continue at the present rate, there is a serious probability of danger to life on this planet and in view of Professor Knelman's recent warning that "a crash program to establish the validity of this new ozone threat should be immediately instituted and the results brought before the world", will the Prime Minister advise whether the government is prepared to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of whether the Atmospheric Research Branch has sufficient funds and personnel to adequately deal with this urgent problem?

● (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a problem about which I have expressed some concern myself but I have not had a recent report from the Minister of the Environment who is meeting with officials of the James Bay Development Corporation in Montreal. I will make sure the question is referred to her to be dealt with.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY OF PLACING FRANCOPHONE APPLICANTS IN A PARTICULAR REGION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It arises from the minister's recent statement on immigration policy that special incentives would be provided for Francophone applicants. Will preference be given to placing such applicants in any particular region of Canada once they are here?

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I can only refer the hon. member to what the minister said in his statement. The fact is that Francophone immigration will be encouraged and that it will direct itself, quite obviously, to regions in Quebec. We are discussing this matter with the government of Quebec and I should like to point out that these regulations will apply across the board to all countries, including those from which Francophone immigration might come.

MULTICULTURALISM

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF STUDY ON NON-OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—NUMBER OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF FORMER MINISTER IMPLEMENTED

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour in charge of multiculturalism? Since the draft report on non-official languages has been ready since April, can the minister advise us when the study on non-official languages commissioned by the hon. member for Hochelaga, now Minister of Communications, in November, 1972, will be laid on the table?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): The hon. member says the report was ready in April, but I do not believe that is correct. In any case, the hon. member is referring to the draft report; I do not believe the final report is in my hands even yet. However, I will check and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question, to the minister: out of the 70 recommendations which were made by the former minister responsible for multiculturalism, the hon. member for Parkdale, the great Dr. Stanley Haidasz—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: —at the conference on multiculturalism a year ago, could the minister name just one of those recommendations which has been implemented?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): May I say from my own visits to minority groups and ethno-culture groups across the country since I have been the responsible minister that they have nothing but praise for the hon. member for Parkdale and the excellent job he did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Of course, at some of the meetings I have attended, even some of those held by the Ukrainian community in Canada, the hon. member himself was missed. I might add that several of the recommendations have been implemented.

Oral Questions

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH TRIPARTITE BODY COMPOSED OF LABOUR, MANAGEMENT AND GOVERNMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour notwithstanding the fact that the meeting of leaders of the trade union movement with the Prime Minister last week was a failure—it has been called just a little social get-together. Is the minister enjoying more success in terms of forming a tripartite body embodying labour, management and government so as to deal with the serious matter of the collective bargaining process in the future? Is the minister experiencing more success than the Prime Minister in dealing with inflation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Both the Prime Minister and myself have been meeting with labour officials. We have held meetings, and my deputy has held meetings, with representatives of the chambers of commerce and others on the business and industry side. There is general agreement that attempts to work out solutions within the framework of a tripartite arrangement are welcome and we are figuring out ways and means of getting on with this now. The prospect is most encouraging.

MEETING IN QUEBEC CONCERNING IMPACT OF MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS ON COLLECTIVE BARGAINING—REASON FOR NON-ATTENDANCE OF FEDERAL REPRESENTATIVE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In the light of the minister's concern with respect to the impact of multinational corporations on the collective bargaining process in Canada, can the minister tell me why his department will not be represented at the meeting of a special national assembly committee next Wednesday called by his colleague, the minister of labour in the Province of Quebec, which will, apparently, study the entire question of the dispute at United Aircraft and will ask the company to justify its attitude toward striking employees? I ask this question bearing in mind that the minister is now considering the impact of the situation at Firestone. I know he is looking at the United Aircraft experience. Can he tell us why his department will not be represented at this meeting, if only by holding a watching brief?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): As the hon. member himself acknowledges in his question, this is a meeting called by the minister of labour of Quebec within his own jurisdiction in his own province. Obviously, it is up to him who he chooses to invite. If he feels our presence could be helpful we shall, no doubt, attend, at least in the capacity of an observer.

Mr. Alexander: This meeting is, of course, a most important one, particularly since the minister is looking into this very area. Can the minister give us an assurance that he will get in touch with his colleague in Quebec to see whether his departmental officials can attend?

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I will be happy to take that suggestion under consideration.

[Later:]

Mr. McKenzie: On a question of privilege. Due to the commotion in the House, when I asked the Prime Minister about the Air Canada base in Winnipeg, I believe he made the comment that he would be making an announcement at the forthcoming Conservative fund raising dinner. I would like to notify him that this will be held on November 28 of this year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed, from Friday November 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian Crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-32 now before us sets the whole question of the Canadian challenge for the present time as well as for the future. National interest must be based of course, on all Canadians being on the same footing. It must also be based on the same quality of life for everyone. But distributed as Canadians are in this great country of ours and administered by three levels of government, national interest in their case rests also and by far on the reconciliation of various social and economic interests at play in this country. Now, the identification of such social and economic interests depends on the full respect of the spirit as well as the letter of our Constitution, and of the jurisdiction of each Canadian province.

Therefore, it is right to say that Bill C-32 on oil and gas administration in this country sets the whole question of the Canadian challenge. Perhaps have I never before, at least in this House, had the opportunity to feel as responsible as a Canadian, as jointly liable in connection with the interests of my fellow citizens from the western provinces, who are very much concerned as we know about this bill and perhaps have I never felt as determined to understand and comprehend the concerns of fellow citizens in kin provinces. In the name of national interest, sections 36 and 52 of this bill come in direct contact with the prerogatives and vested rights of the so-called oil provinces.

I feel all the more I have to be alert on this Bill C-32 because once it is passed, all of us, whether from the Maritimes, Ontario, Quebec, or elsewhere, will be faced with a precedent on the basis of which a centralizing government as the one currently heading this country will be able in the future to take over provincial jurisdictions somewhat too easily. All Canadians, all Quebecers in particular, and the premier of the province of Quebec above all, must give very urgent consideration to the scope of this bill now before us. Today, there is talk about federal administration of oil and gas but if we are not careful today, tomorrow there may be talk about federal administration of power energy, or from another angle, territorial development and—

Mr. Speaker, in the very name of the Canadian challenge of modern times, in the very name of the type of Confederation in which we want to live Bill C-32 must provoke at the level of the people of this country, of provincial governments and information media, an information campaign on the stakes and the issues involved.

Mr. Speaker, consideration of Bill C-32 must actually bring people to their feet, have them talk with words of caution, warning and alertness.

Section 36 of the Bill reads as follows:

> Where no agreement is entered into pursuant to section 22 with the government of a producer-province or any such agreement is terminated by the declaration of the parties, or, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, is not effective or is not capable of being effective, the Governor in Council may, by regulation, establish maximum prices for the various qualities and kinds of crude oil to which this Part applies that are produced, extracted or recovered in that province (hereinafter in this Division called the "exporting province").

Mr. Speaker, Canada or indeed the whole world must be experiencing a true energy crisis or about to experience such a crisis for the government to consider disregarding the vested interests of the provinces, for a central government to assume such powers.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, people will probably say: the facts are there, the world is undergoing serious energy problems; let us think, they will say, of the Arab-Israeli conflict, of the behaviour of oil-producing Arab countries on the world market, let us also remember above all that oil supplies in eastern Canada depend to a large extent upon imports, and therefore, is it not normal that we, as a government, should take appropriate action to meet the following objectives as stated in clause 21 of the bill:

> (a) to achieve a uniform price, exclusive of transportation costs, for crude oil used in Canada outside its province of production;
> (b) to achieve a balance in Canada between the interests of consumers and producers in Canada; and
> (c) to protect consumers in Canada from instability of prices for petroleum in the international markets.

With regard to those national objectives, may I just mention very briefly two specific points.

First, concerning the protection of consumers in Canada from instability of prices for petroleum in the international markets, I should like everyone here to remember how decisively our party fought in December 1973 to ensure equity and justice for the consumers of eastern Canada.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was waging this fight. On December 10, 1973, he said:

> —this policy will result in a difficult and trying period for many individuals this winter, a promise of continued discrimination for many years, a proof of increasing inequalities, and a guarantee of economic problems for eastern Canada.

In the name of justice, we, of the official opposition, demanded then and still demand that Canadian consumers be protected from the instability of prices in the international markets.

Secondly, and still from the point of view of the national objectives mentioned earlier, we must realize that we must also protect the interests of producers on behalf of the long term interests and needs of all Canadians.

On October 4 last, Mr. R. G. Reid, president of Imperial Oil Limited, said to the Ontario Institute of Chartered Accountants, and I quote:

> The key to the development of future energy resources is the investor's confidence based upon risk-oriented public policies.

[English]

It is therefore crucial, Mr. Speaker, for this parliament and the government to keep in mind that the present energy resources available to this country exist because in the past the exploration and production of energy for domestic and export use has been a highly profitable endeavour.

● (1510)

When one briefly scans Canadian commercial history and views the extent to which a serious imbalance has existed between western and central Canada, particularly in terms of transportation and freight rates, one need not be particularly pro-western in one's approach to understand that the commercial unity of this country would be strengthened by rectification of this imbalance. One cannot help getting the impression that the present government's view of the degree to which profits from the oil industry can serve to rectify this imbalance is less than favourable.

I have to say, as a member of this House from a province that has itself in the past developed various profitable energy sources, that this type of view by the federal government is particularly short-ranged and somewhat narrow-minded. I can tell the House that when Hydro-Quebec moves to sell power to markets outside our province and outside our country, it is always done with a very real concern for ensuring the people of Quebec maximum profit for what is, after all, a renewable resource. Surely, therefore, we can understand the concern of jurisdictions wherein the major energy resource is non-renewable as is the case with petroleum products that there be similar, if not greater, protection in terms of increased profit yield for them, to ensure their economic vitality.

I believe we can find the way to protect the public interest, while ensuring that the exploration and processing of energy products, specifically in western Canada, remain activities not only profitable to private enterprise but profitable to provincial governments that are seeking to strengthen their own secondary industry and economic infrastructure through the yield that can be gained from the petroleum industry situated within their jurisdictions.

There is anxiety in the west that has caused many petroleum operations actively to consider moving their drilling rigs from Canada to other countries. Such a course of action, specifically in areas such as southern Alberta, cannot be anything but a source of concern for anyone vitally interested in the health of the western economy. I believe parliament would do well to ensure that legislation presented to protect the public interest in the matter of petroleum and energy embraces a concept of public interest that has room for the type of fair profit within the oil industry that can, and will, play a significant role in prolonging the commitment of capital and other resources in the battle to find and to develop more natural resources for Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the national objectives mentioned in clause 21, the national balance that is sought, all this must be worked out simultaneously by the central government and of each of the provincial governments. We federal and provincial parliamentarians must therefore reconcile the national and the regional interests. And, as I said earlier, one can see how this bill raises the whole question of the Canadian challenge and affects, if I may use this expression, the Canadian pattern itself.

Clause 36 as well as its counterpart clause 52 make it too obvious that in case of a disagreement, the federal government is automatically right. This does not take into account the reasons for which, in a particular situation, an oil producing province may not accept some proposal of the federal government. Yet, this directly concerns provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, on December 10 of last year, I said that this government was powerless to attack in depth the major problems and unable, in its search for adequate solutions, to reconcile the national and the regional interests. This government, under the pretext of acting for the common good, keeps infringing upon the principle of Canadian federalism itself.

● (1520)

The present federal government, probably the most centralizing one in all our country's history is certainly the government who has provoked and is still provoking, sometimes, almost on purpose the highest number of confrontations with the provincial governments.

Instead of trying to be, as the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) rightfully wishes—it is true, Mr. Speaker, that this was said during the last election campaign—instead of trying to be, and I quote:

the life and soul of a common, collegial and global strategy

the present central government is appointing itself, slowly but surely and month after month, the gravedigger of our Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, this government and this prime minister will be known to history as those under whom our Confederation will have been in danger as never before. We know, especially after the cry of alarm of last June 15 uttered by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) we know how threatening for the Confederation this alienation of the West is becoming. Transportation, the difficulties of the secondary industry and natural resources sector, those are problem areas where Western Canadians feel neglected by this federal government.

Should we now be surprised that the oil producing provinces, before approving, if ever, Bill C-32 demand, just by so proof positive of Ottawa's good faith concerning the planning of industrialization policy, agricultural consolidation and restructuring of the railway freight rates in the Prairies.

In the province of Quebec, as everyone is aware, we have but to look at the provincial scene, examine the results of the last election and see the presence and the vitality of a separatist party. In Quebec, almost 30 per cent of the French-speaking population have voted for that party; this should certainly be good enough, above and beyond the language aspect, to demonstrate to this federal government how more and more Quebecers are fed up with the centralizing schemes of this federal government.

Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec must and should be in the forefront of those who fear any unilateral application in the oil administration policies of this country. I want to be very specific here: I am addressing myself directly to the political authorities of the province of Quebec, to the Quebec premier and I say to him that any lightly considered acceptance of a precedent, as would be the passage of Bill C-32 might—

Mr. Stanfield: Where are the members from Quebec?

Mr. Wagner: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asks with reason, where are the Liberal members from Quebec who should be rushing forward to defend the sacred rights of the province and thus make sure that no blow is struck against provincial jurisdictions and that the rights of the provinces are respected. Where are those members?

Mr. Bussières: That is pure demagogy.

Mr. Wagner: There is someone in the fifth row, on the other side who says: "That is pure demagogy".

So, Mr. Speaker, it seems that talking in favour of provincial autonomy means demagogy, claiming the respect of Quebec's rights means demagogy for the Liberals, to pointing out the very serious error this government is about to make, also means demagogy.

An hon. Member: He did not mean that.

Mr. Wagner: The only thing which would not be demagogy would be for Quebec to creep on all fours or to fall on knees in front of this government and say: "You served us quite well when you took away our goods". The people of the province of Quebec are not prepared to do so and if only members from this side of the House are moving, they will know how to voice claims for the province of Quebec. If the Quebec government cannot deal on an equal basis with the federal government, that will be the duty of the official opposition and we will assume it.

Mr. Speaker, that is a short answer—As I do not hear any other exclamation from hon. members opposite. I will then continue.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I raise on a point of order. I would not reply in any way to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), but I know that many members from Quebec are now sitting on several committees and I would like to point out to him that he is the only Progressive-Conservative from Quebec here now.

Here is my question: How could we reconcile his suggestions in order to meet the interests of both consumers and producers? That is what we would like to learn from the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the confidence of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) is showing in order to help me to find the right solutions the government is unable to find. If he will exercise patience and wait until I have completed my remarks, he will have the answer. Will he, in the liberal caucus, be the spokesman for the Conservative party in telling the government that such answers have to be implemented? I doubt it, but knowing the member for Laval (Mr. Roy) for his generosity and good nature, I thank him for his gesture.

Mr. Speaker, I said that any inconsiderate acceptation by the province of Quebec of the precedent set by Bill C-32 might very well affect that province in its possible foreign or domestic sales of resources from James Bay.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There does not seem to be any translation of my colleague's remarks and some of us are having difficulty following the debate.

Mr. Baldwin: There is too much static from the Liberals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I am sure this has been noted by other hon. members, and that the persons responsible are attempting to solve the problem. I suggest that the debate should continue, and members who miss any part of the hon. member's speech will read it in tomorrow's translated version of Hansard. The Chair regrets the inconvenience caused hon. members.

[Translation]

An hon. Member: Big loss.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I also regret that there is no interpretation at this point, there is no doubt a technical difficulty; I am told it is coming on again, and knowing the expertise shown by translators, I am certain it is for good.

Mr. Speaker, I still hear interruptions from my honourable colleague opposite. If he wishes to say something, let him rise. It is amazing, Mr. Speaker, how eloquent those people are when they are resting on their derrières. When they stand up, we can't hear them, but when they sit, everything is loud and clear.

If the precedent was set, Mr. Speaker, it would be a bad joke for Quebec, especially in its foreign or domestic sales of the resources from James Bay or any other source. And speaking of Quebec, this debate gives me the opportunity to raise, and get an answer for, the point already made by Saskatchewan's premier, that is whether the federal government could find itself in a position where it had to make $400 or $500 million transfer payments to Quebec, if Alberta and Saskatchewan oil revenues were deemed to be standard revenues of both provinces? That question asked by the Saskatchewan premier is still unanswered by the government, and perhaps remarks from the other side of this House will shed some light on the matter.

Let Quebec authorities beware, lest they be tricked.

● (1530)

Mr. Speaker, it can be seen by examining Bill C-32 that many important questions are raised such as the provincial jurisdiction over natural resources. It is however evident, pursuant to section 109 of the British North America Act, that oil is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

However, the federal government, supposedly in the general interest of Canadians which must have precedence over the interest of one or several provinces, wants to control the sale and distribution of oil. When one goes against a particular section of the constitution, even in the general interest, every other aspect of its position must be irrefutable which, in this case, it is not as we can see day after day.

Nothing underrates a great principle more-here, that of the precedence of the general interest—than putting it to an end less noble than its original object and to justify an argument-causing approach.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-32, and in particular sections 36 and 52, is a very sad way for a prime minister to reopen the constitutional file! What a funny way of reopening it by beginning this session with a large breach to the constitution! What guarantees do we have that the repatriation of the constitution, urged by the Prime Minister before the House on October 2nd last, is in keeping with a national strategy serving the country's regional interests? Mr. Speaker, one can assume the worse.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce is a neutral organization, without any political affiliation that I know of, and which surely cannot be accused of partisan spirit in its papers, reports and recommendations. During its annual convention held in Winnipeg in September 1973, however, it has warned this government that any energy policy, and I quote:

> —could only be developed if the parties concerned could solve their differences in an atmosphere of consultation and mutual trust rather than in an hostile and distrustful one.

It is nto the opposition which is attacking the government and suggesting that the atmosphere is hostile and distrustful, but an intermediate and completely independent organization.

It is precisely an hostile and distrustful atmosphere that clauses 36 and 52 are inducing.

Mr. Speaker, we oppose the bill such as drafted and we demand at the same time in order to meet the objectives provided in the bill and stated for example in clause 21, the establishment of a mechanism which would enable all legislative partners included in our constitution, namely the provinces and the federal government, to express their views on the concept and formulation of the national interests and on the enforcement mechanisms for bills and other measures proceeding from them.

This objective, honest and realistic solution may be the one which the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) was expecting and which he intends to plead for during his next caucus.

Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent way to really protect in a viable way and for a long time the interests of consumers from Eastern Canada and the other regions of our country, and those of all Canadians. We must keep in mind that there are circumstances when a consumer and a Canadian are the very same person.

To proceed otherwise or along the line suggested in this bill would be to preserve and perpetuate a federalism which thrives on confrontations. I cannot accept the pessimistic view that our federal system can only develop through confrontations and conflicts.

At present, whether we are dealing with the distribution of energy resources or something else, the main problems require in a country such as ours, permanent mechanisms of consultation and concertation whereby, especially in cases of national emergency, provincial governments may deal as equals with the federal government.

There, as in other areas such as the fight against inflation for instance, the federal government must first of all find a reason for determination, stick to a sustained resolution to really accept the challenge it is faced with, that is to provide itself with a national approach and with national consultation mechanisms in the face of national problems.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Decision in consultation!

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for interrupting the hon. member for Laval who has lost his temper again. He would want the decision to be made in consultation. As for myself, I would like to have first consultation, then dialogue, decision, all that being done between parties with some measure of justice and equity.

This is much more useful and much better than, as it is the case with this legislation giving powers to act unilaterally under Section 36 and 52 of Bill C-32.

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the thoughts which this legislation evokes to me. This is why I was glad to participate in this debate. Hoping that my colleagues' comments will induce deeper thoughts on the part of the government members and that within a few days it will lead them to amend their legislation so that it does not prejudice so obviously the Canadian constitution that we want to protect, to repatriate in due time and especially to make sure that it is really respectful of the rights of all Canadians.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. The Chair is prepared at this time to recognize the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). Before doing so, I would remind the House that the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge had the floor and had taken up about six minutes of his time when the debate adjourned last Friday. Because of an unavoidable delay, he could not be here at the outset of the debate today. I am sure the House would agree with me that he should be recognized at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: Make it worth while.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, through you I should like to express my appreciation to hon. members. I will try to be gentle with my friends to the right. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) in his learned development of the constitutional responsibilities involved in this question. It is very difficult at this stage to know to what extent the federal government actively has met and negotiated with provincial officials, and whether in fact the government has acted more precipitously than might otherwise have been the case. It is very difficult, also, to know whether agreement might have been reached that the government did not reach, or whether hon. friends to my right might have been able to reach agreement in a way that the government could not.

I can only say I am glad that the federal government acted when it did. It is very hard to know just how much of its action was necessary. What is important is that had the government not taken a firm stand, Canada would have been in desperate straits for energy last winter and the price of energy would have risen substantially in every part of this country. It was vitally important, failing general agreement—which all of us would like to have seen arrived at—that the government exercised, in what I think was its clear jurisdiction, responsibility in the field of energy and brought in measures to see that energy prices were equalized and energy was available to Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You say this only on oil and gas, but on other things you would be very quiet.

Mr. Saltsman: No, I would not be quiet. My friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), says I would be quiet on other things. He thinks I speak about gas and oil because they happen to be resources within the favourite province of Alberta. The remarks I intend to make apply, in fairness, to all forms of energy. They apply to hydro, to coal and to nuclear energy—if we are to be one nation. The point is not that at the moment Alberta happens to be very wealthy in certain resources and therefore we should grab at its resources. I should like to remind the hon. member for Edmonton West that Ontario assisted his province when energy was a glut on the market; when we could not give oil to the United States even though we pleaded with them to take some.

● (1540)

In the 1960s, when a national energy policy was introduced, the idea was to stimulate western development and to give them an outlet for oil in eastern Canada although the east could obtain oil elsewhere at a lower price.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And waxed fat on the material that went out to the oil fields.

Mr. Saltsman: As the hon. member says, Ontario did wax fat on the material going to the oil fields. There is no doubt that Ontario benefits from what it sells to the west and to the east. I hope all parts of the country benefit from confederation. Nobody is disputing the value of the west to Ontario. It was certainly one of the arguments made to Ontario in order to get a national oil policy. The point I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is that subsidies and assistance did not start with Alberta giving oil to the rest of Canada at a lower price. There is a long history of this kind of assistance, and Ontario did its part in helping the west to develop: it provided the market for western goods. Now the shoe is on the other foot. Ontario does not possess fossil fuel reserves. During the winter, we were in danger of not getting any from offshore and it is a great comfort to Ontario to know there are resources in Alberta and we are not dependent upon the political whims of people outside the country to determine whether we freeze in the dark.

I have been very pleased by the speeches of western members on this subject. It seems that they understand the problem. Although they may not like accepting a lower price for crude oil than they could get on the open market, I think they understand that this has to be done in a confederation such as ours. I should, therefore, like to say "Thank you" to the people of the west. We in Ontario appreciate that we might not now have been in such good shape regarding energy had it not been for developments in Alberta.

We have gone a long way toward public intervention in the field of energy in order to assure supplies and to adjust the price. But we will have to go much further. Energy is so important, and the problem so complex, that I believe all energy supplies must come under public ownership—not just gas and oil but hydro and nuclear energy. And if the day comes that we are sufficiently intelligent to harness the tides or to obtain energy from the sun, this energy too would have to come under public ownership and be the heritage of the people of this country. We might even go beyond that and say it would have to be the heritage of the world: Canada might not be able to keep it to itself if the rest of the world needed it.

If we come to the conclusion that we are going to share our energy, surely our first responsibility is not to the richest country in the world, one that can find substitutes for cheap energy, but to the poorer nations. Those of us who complained about a continental oil policy did not do so because we did not want Canada to contribute in this sense. We objected because this resource was not going to the poor and the underdeveloped people of the world, but was going to those who are looking for cheap fuel and show no inclination of conserving energy by using their technology. I do not want to see any province or town in this country hoarding something and not feeling an obligation to anyone else, nor would I want this country to tell the rest of the world to look after itself.

We must move toward public ownership in order to solve the problem of conservation. One of the difficulties with free enterprise is that it must waste resources. The profits come from selling things to people whether they need them or not. Then there is a trade-off between the short-run interests of investors and the long-run interests as defined by the political process. I am not trying to make an ideological argument that public ownership is more holy than private ownership, Mr. Speaker. Some of us do favour public ownership over private ownership. However, the argument I am trying to make is essentially on the ground of public interest.

This is the kind of argument that was made when the Ontario government moved to take the hydro resources of the province under public ownership. In that case they were not socialist arguments, although people acted in a socialist and intelligent way by putting them forward. Their reasons were not ideological, but practical. The embryonic manufacturing industry of Ontario was in danger of falling under the control of outsiders who would also need control of hydro power to further their interests. Almost everyone in Ontario felt that if the province were to develop, it would have to own its electrical resources. History has proven them wise. Ontario probably could not have developed in the way it has without public ownership of its energy, and today it is in the forefront in the development of energy, nuclear and electrical, and has some of the cheapest energy rates in the world. It was a fortunate decision that electricity was taken under public ownership in Ontario, and these arguments are as relevant today as they were in Adam Beck's time.

In putting forward these arguments I am somewhat encouraged by the receptivity of this government. The minister has found himself in difficult circumstances at times, but he has done a good job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: He had to learn fast, and he did. We found ourselves in an energy crisis last year, without an energy policy. Of course, we do not have much of an energy policy now, but we had nothing at all when the crisis hit. We can laugh now about the Minister of Supply and Services paying an outrageous sum for heating oil, but we would have cried had we run short of it. We would have said he should have bought it no matter what the price. It is regrettable, perhaps, that his business judgment was not sounder, but the important thing is that we came through an international energy crisis almost unscathed. It was done because of government intervention: the government was prepared to move in. It was done without legislation: there was no legislative authority for what the government did. This is an indication of the authority of government in our society. If a government is determined to act, it can say it expects the private sector to behave in a certain way because it is going to introduce legislation to make it so. It is quite clear. The private sector has no choice but to respond.

● (1550)

This situation is very instructive because the private sector concerned was almost entirely foreign-owned. We were afraid foreign ownership would make it impossible for people in this country to respond in an emergency. The message came through loud and clear. If governments in our society choose to exercise the authority given to them by the people of this country, they have infinitely more power than any foreign-owned corporation or privately-held organization. We have seen foreign corporations virtually run this country. That was not because intrinsically they had the power to behave in that way, but because our government refused to intervene. Because of the abstention of the government, these foreign corporations were able to make their will felt.

I know I speak for my colleagues when I say we were pleased that the government was prepared to intervene. One reason the government acted was the particular electoral arrangement at that time: I am talking about a minority government. For a long time there was a great spirit of co-operation between our group and the government, in terms of energy policy. People might say that at this point the government has a majority and no longer has to listen to the NDP. It probably does not. However, I am confident that that kind of co-operation and response by the government to a national emergency made an impact on the government and the people in the Liberal Party. I notice with a degree of pleasure that even though Canada does not have a minority government now and we are not in a position to twist arms, some of the arguments we put forward last year have been put into effect. The government saw they were necessary. I am optimistic that we will continue to have a forward-looking policy and willingness by the government to deal with new problems as they arise.

I was interested in watching members on the government benches when my former leader spoke, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). Tremendous attention was paid to what he said. On many occasions the applause from the opposite side was a genuine expression of agreement with what he was saying. Therefore, I think that arguments once started, or paths once cleared, tend to have a way of being continued. The government was very reluctant to intervene in the situation to which I have referred. They have always been reluctant to do that. However, they now understand that it was absolutely necessary. The people of this country heartily approved of that kind of intervention, and I hope it will continue. I hope the government will listen to these arguments regarding public ownership, not in a narrow, ideological framework but as something that is necessary and useful for the development of future policy for this country.

At the present time, Interprovincial Pipe Line is dragging its feet in building the line to Montreal. They say they need guarantees. They do not know what the throughput, cost or price will be, and therefore are not prepared to do anything without guarantees. If it is necessary to guarantee rates, returns and everything else, why do we need Interprovincial Pipe Line? We might as well build the pipeline ourselves. We will probably be asked to guarantee their bonds. In fact, we did guarantee the bonds and the company operated with government guarantees. Why not build this section of the line under public ownership? I do not think a pipeline is the greatest thing to own publicly, but when you get to the point where you have to make all these concessions, you do not know how accurate company's figures are and you must ensure that the figures are not inadvertently exaggerated, you might as well go ahead and build the pipeline yourself.

It is well within the capacity of the Canadian government's resources—that is, the capacity of the Canadian public—to build this pipeline instead of delaying it. Let us not be lulled into a false sense of security. The tension seems to be off and the Middle East seems to have settled down. But it will boil up again. Are we to be subjected to this kind of pressure without being ready for it? I know we accommodated ourselves last time, but we should be much better off now than we were then. Last time we had to operate on an ad hoc basis because the government had not planned; it did not listen to the various proposals this party had put forward for years with regard to a pipeline to Montreal. We should proceed immediately to build a pipeline under public ownership, instead of trying to figure out what kind of subsidy or conditions the company wants. If we must go to a great deal of trouble, there does not seem to be much point in having private enterprise build the pipeline.

We had considerable argument in committee about the Telesat Corporation. At the time the corporation was proposed, it was a troika arrangement: the idea was that the communications industry would own one-third, the government one-third, and one-third would be sold to the public. We put forward the same arguments. We said the rates would be regulated and the corporation could not lose money. If it appeared they were going to lose money, the government would adjust the rates. Why bring in the private investor or the telecommunications people into what was essentially a government idea? What is the point, when you are going to guarantee the corporation a return? Despite Telesat saying it was waiting until it got going a little before bringing in the private investor, it has not done so because they do not need the private investor. The private investor would be a hindrance to the corporation. Even though speeches are made about Telesat and lip service is paid to the proposition that at some point shares will be put on the market, those shares will never go on the market because it is not necessary. Telesat is an enormously successful corporation. They have made very good arrangements for the leasing of their communications channels and the public investor is not required.

The Canada Development Corporation is another example. We in this party argued for such a corporation. We saw the Canada Development Corporation as an instrument of national development, not as a way of offering the five-buck investor an extra place to invest his five bucks. We have a wonderful instruments for private investment. There are Canada Savings Bonds. Why do we need to create equity ownership in something as important as the Canada Development Corporation when the country needs a development corporation? The investors are satisfied with Canada Savings Bonds. The Canada Development Corporation is doing rather well. We are not happy that it is taking over profitable government corporations and then threatening to take them out of public control and put them into private hands by opening up their investment portfolios, but to this point they have managed very well without the private investor. In fact, they have probably done much better without him.

While the CDC says it is waiting until its portfolio fattens a little before putting its shares on the market, I suspect the same thing will happen as happened with Telesat. Private shares will never be issued simply because the CDC does not need the five-buck investor. Not only that, he would get in the way. There are already problems in the Canada Development Corporation, one of which is shameful for a public corporation. It took over Connaught Laboratories, which manufacture insulin. Because its sole term of reference is to make money, the corporation is still looking toward the day when it will put out investment certificates or provide an opportunity for the private investor. It is taking something which is essential and which should have been produced at cost, and trying to make a buck out of it.

● (1600)

Surely they can provide insulin at cost? They are making enough money from other investments to enable them to absorb the cost of manufacturing insulin. It was important that CDC take over Connaught Laboratories because they had nowhere else to go. But it is also important that they recognize the social usefulness of providing insulin without making a profit on it. As long as that element is there, they must think in terms of the future—how things will look on the stock market. That is the problem. Where you do important work involving the future or public morality, to think in terms of profit is not same.

Profit has a useful purpose in unimportant things. If somebody wants to make a profit on shoes, good luck to them. You don't have to buy shoes to that extent. You can buy one kind, you can buy another kind; you can buy a cheaper one, or you can buy a more expensive one. You do not need to have the shoe industry under public ownership. There is no need for extensive regulation in such areas. But when it comes to programs such as medical care—which of course is almost entirely a public responsibility, as it should be—you recognize it, and now we have to recognize that a resource as vital as energy cannot be left to the shenanigans of the profit motive.

As to people in the field, I grant they have the best intentions in the world. I have met many people in the gas and oil industry and they seem like decent fellows I am not quarrelling with them for trying to act against the public interest because, I am sure many of them think their buccaneering is very much in the public interest and that the public benefits enormously from their buying and selling, and drilling, getting out and getting in, and all the rest of it. The point is, they are not in a position to act for the public, given the kind of attitude that they have and the nature of their industry, even if they wanted to.

What is the point of competition in energy? I know it is very convenient to have electricity going down your street, to have gas going down your street, to have oil being delivered to your house. It is very convenient to have all these modes of energy. But that is for a society that does not think there will be any shortage of energy tomorrow. To waste all that capital, to waste all those resources, to duplicate facilities—that is yesterday's society with its philosophy of sell, sell. Hydro advertises that it will give you a better deal than gas. That is competition. This brings me to the point I am trying to make.

Competition, by its very nature, by its very huckstering, is bound to be wasteful. We cannot afford to waste energy. The most compelling argument in favour of public ownership of energy is that it will eliminate duplication and waste. For the first time we would be able to plan energy. Let me cite one example of what happens when you do not plan. We think of bringing a gas line down from the Arctic. So what is the argument? The argument is that we will have to build so large a line that we will not be able to use all the gas that comes through it; therefore, let us take the three-quarters surplus in that line and export it until we can absorb its entire output.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Saltsman: Well, that is the proposal of the Arctic Gas Study group. That is really what they are saying.

Mr. Andre: No.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is wrong. We do not have enough gas up there.

Mr. Saltsman: Perhaps I am not using their jargon. They are saying, "We cannot build a line for our own use; we will have to export some of the gas." They do not say, "We don't have enough gas; take somebody else's." Most of it has to go to the United States until we are ready to use it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What about Prudhoe Bay?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They will not get any gas out of Prudhoe Bay for the first three years, and you know it.

Mr. Saltsman: There is not enough Prudhoe Bay gas going in there. They want to export more.

Mr. Andre: No, they don't.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, they do.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You have a confirmed easterner's knowledge of the west, which is zilch.

Mr. Saltsman: There will be opportunities. The point is, you cannot plan. If you know you must build a line of that kind and it is expensive, then you start co-ordinating your heating requirements and your planning requirements to take into account gas that will be coming down at a certain point in time, instead of building areas where you have this kind of heating, that kind of heating and the other kind. My colleague over there may say, "That's regulation; you are controlling people. We must have electricity. We must have gas rather than oil." However, we cannot live in a world where we squander these kind of resources. We will have to regulate the use of energy. We may, in fact, have to penalize the use of energy. This is another problem. Instead of pricing gas or oil cheaply, as a matter of public policy all types of energy may have to rise in price.

Mr. Andre: Yes.

Mr. Saltsman: You approve of that. The problem of making prices rise, even if you come to the conclusion that you must use price as a mechanism for rationing, is that when you do so the benefit does not go to the public; it goes to some private company. Therefore you are frustrated in developing an intelligent policy, because while it may be desirable to tighten consumption, it is only desirable to price high if the benefit of that high pricing goes back to the public so it can be used for other things.

Mr. Andre: What about taxes?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Governments already get 80 per cent of a barrel of oil.

Mr. Saltsman: There are ways of dealing with this problem without going to public ownership. One of my distinguished friends on the right has suggested we could tax. We tried to tax and we failed. What happened when we tried to tax? The government of Alberta sent people down to the committee considering the Carter report on taxation and said, "Don't tax the resource industries." A lot of pressure was put on the government.

Mr. Andre: Get your facts right.

Mr. Saltsman: Read the minutes and you will see that the government of Alberta put pressure on the federal government not to tax. The point is, these resource industries were let off the hook. The recommendations of the Carter commission were never enacted in that area. Had we been able to devise an intelligent tax system under which those industries were taxed on the same basis as manufacturing industries, we might have avoided much of the confrontation that now exists among the industry, the federal government and the provincial governments. But we failed miserably to achieve our goals through taxation. While those goals can sometimes be achieved through taxation, this is not a great example of taxation success.

The problem of scrutinizing and verifying the arguments made on both sides of the taxation question is so great that it is really pointless. You can argue that we can regulate. After all, why place oil and gas under public ownership? Why don't we do what we do with Bell Canada and regulate these industries? It works to some extent with Bell Canada. By and large, I do not know that the public would benefit substantially from public ownership of Bell Canada. As I say, I don't know and that is really the problem.

You get to the stage, when you regulate an industry, at which the cost of scrutinizing the industry, the cost of policing it, and its cost in terms of making that policing more difficult—like the CPR with its regressive analyses—becomes so great that at some point you throw your hands up and say, "We're just playing games with each other instead of getting on with the job, and it might as well come under public ownership." It is this sort of cops and robbers game, going back and forth with each other, that eventually leads to the need for public ownership. Regulation of Bell Canada is difficult enough, but imagine how much tougher it would be to regulate the oil and gas industry and to ascertain future plans.

The oil and gas industry has given us misleading information from Day One. When it suited its purposes to export, the industry gave us glowing figures of our oil and gas reserves. According to them, we have enough to last us practically for the next two million years. Then when they wanted a higher price, all of a sudden the story was different; we were told there was little oil and gas left and the industry required more money to go into new fields, otherwise in 15 or 20 years we would be short. It is inconceivable that something as important as energy is left to this kind of game playing.

We will have to spend $50 billion over the next ten years, perhaps more, to develop new forms of energy. Where do we start? If we start with the James Bay project, the tar sands project, building pipelines, developing nuclear energy, we shall need tremendous sums of money. We must approach the matter in a rational and intelligent way by allocating the resources at our disposal in the most effective manner. This means that we cannot finance our energy needs from the market system but must do so through public saving and public investment. To do it in any other way would be an absolute waste.

I can give the House a great example of waste which, fortunately, turned out to be not so wasteful. This sometimes happens when you talk about waste, so I must be rather careful. In this instance, the result was more by accident than design. A lot of investment went into Alberta at a time when there was no need for it and no markets for oil. We operated our wells at something like 35 per cent capacity, tying up billions of dollars in equipment which had to yield a higher return. I see you are signalling, Mr. Speaker, so let me conclude by saying that I have advanced but a few of the many good arguments for our stopping this chaotic approach to private investment in the energy field and moving to a system of conservation and public works.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to participate in this debate because, as several previous speakers have indicated, the topic under study is one of the most important facing the national as well as the international communities. One need only listen to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), who speaks of it in a nationalistic vein, to become aware of it. Some of the members opposite covered every aspect of the energy problem to prive its importance.

To begin with, I should like to criticize the comments of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who said—indeed that was his main argument—of all the opposition members from Alberta that his only objection to the bill is the fact that it gives rise to a confrontation between the rights of the provinces and those of the federal government. He indicated that the government members should protect the provincial rights. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we are federal members of parliament.

As far as the rights of the province of Quebec are concerned, I point out that they are directly protected by the provisions of this bill. Of course, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has not seen anything, since the province of Quebec is paying $6.50 a barrel for its oil, the international price being $11.65. They save thus $5.15 a barrel on the oil imported in Montreal, because of the measures we are trying to implement and to apply efficiently, and which are contained in the bill under study.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is not at all a matter of taking powers from any province. The federal government has a national responsibility and he sees to carry it out with this bill, namely to ensure that the needs of the consumers in eastern Canada are met with western oil.

Mr. Speaker, since the federal-provincial agreement was entered into on March 31, we have in Canada a standard price for oil from coast to coast, taking into account the transportation costs. It is obvious that the province is the first to benefit from it. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec would have to pay $11.65 a barrel, while Ontario could have indulged in the luxury of paying less than $6 a barrel. The government has chosen to take its role seriously in spite of the position taken by the member for Saint-Hyacinthe, who asserts the rights of the province of Quebec and the other provinces. If we listened to him and to his colleagues, we would give up our own responsibilities.

[English]

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this bill is an extremely important one. I would have thought it would receive quick passage since we studied it for nearly a month last April.

An hon. Member: That was before the budget.

Mr. Blais: Yes, we studied the bill before the budget. I should like to take exception to what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said on second reading of the bill, then called Bill C-18. He said: "We will delay the passage of this legislation. We will study it with a fine toothed comb, and when we get it before the committee we will call witnesses galore and try and delay it as best we can". That is exactly what they did. The reason they did that is the same reason they are presently advancing, and the one the attorney general of Alberta gave when he appeared as a witness before the committee, namely, that it is a direct attack on provincial rights.

When Mr. Leitch appeared before the committee, he evidently had not bothered to read the bill beforehand, because if he had read it he would have seen that he was incorrect in his interpretation of its provisions. I suggest that no one has attacked the agreement which was reached on March 31; even the most recalcitrant members from Alberta have agreed it is essential for the stability of Canada's industrial complex and our economy as a whole. It is essential that there be some sort of equality regarding the cost of energy in this country; there is no doubt about that.

I should like to read what Mr. Leitch said when he appeared before the committee, as recorded at page 7 of committee report No. 15 of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. I am sure hon. members have read what he said. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) indicated that the principle of this bill had been negated by the agreement of March 31, and he repeated exactly what Mr. Leitch had to say. Mr. Leitch said:

> Mr. Chairman, I wish to conclude by commenting on part III, the part to which our most fundamental objections are directed.

The hon. member for Calgary North is evidently in error. Throughout his speech he referred to part III as being under attack, but according to Bill C-32 it is part II. So he was referring to part III of Bill C-18.

> Far from embodying a term of the first ministers' agreement it stands as a direct negation of the principles upon which that agreement was based.

● (1620)

> It permits the executive council to terminate an existing agreement between a producer province and the federal government or to decline to negotiate a renewal agreement and to impose by unilateral action maximum prices on a natural resource owned by a province.

That is absolute balderdash. That is not what the section says at all. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I will read what the section does say, because it has been referred to. It provides:

> Where an agreement is entered into with a producer province under section 22, the governor in council may, by regulation, establish maximum prices for the various qualities and kinds of crude oil to which this part applies that are produced, extracted or recovered in that province.

It speaks of an agreement reached under section 22. It provides for the entering into of agreements, and it also provides power to act if an agreement is not entered into or if it is unilaterally reneged by one of the producing provinces: it provides the federal government with the power to impose a price. Would any member of this House argue that the federal government does not have power over interprovincial or, indeed, international trade?

Would anyone argue that any individual province in this federation has power to impose negative prices, or has power to impose a higher price or a two-price system in respect of a commodity which it exports? Is there anyone who would say that as far as interprovincial trade is concerned, the federal government does not have the obligation to ensure that everyone, in every part of this country, has a fair shake and fair access to a commodity produced within this nation? Anyone who would deny that assertion would be attacking the very principles of this confederation.

We are all Canadians. No one can tell me that in northern Ontario the consumer does not have the right to receive natural gas because the province of Alberta, through Pan-Alberta, does not want to send its gas to northern Ontario. If Pan-Alberta has the right to do that, then it goes directly against the principles of confederation and the unity of this great country.

That is exactly the position that is being taken by members of the opposition. They are suggesting that they are doing this at great and tremendous sacrifice on the part of Alberta and Saskatchewan because they are subsidizing the rest of this country. I have some figures here of considerable interest which I should like to draw to the attention of the House. In 1972, before we started to have difficulty and at a time when royalties in the province of Alberta were 16 per cent of the price of oil at the well head, the total revenue for Saskatchewan and Alberta was $270,900,000, or roughly 44 cents per barrel. In 1973, when an export charge was levied and there was some federal interference—I will agree with that—the rate went up from 16 per cent to 22 per cent. Premier Lougheed said that was as far as he would go in respect of royalties, and the amount went up to $480,600,000.

In 1974, when this difficulty really occurred and the federal government interfered with the rights of the province of Alberta, the amount to those poor Albertans went up to $1,500 million. That does not include the export charge payable by the federal government of an extra $200 million. I just do not understand how they can say they are subsidizing the rest of the country when we are talking in terms of royalties amounting to $1¾ billion. Let hon. members on the other side get up and say those figures are wrong.

An hon. Member: What is your source?

Mr. Blais: My source is "Oil Week".

An hon. Member: What issue?

Mr. Blais: It is the October issue. Apparently the hon. member has not read it. It seems to me like cheap potato chips for hon. members to say that the province of Alberta is ready unilaterally to veto the agreement—because that is what they are saying. First of all, there was an agreement on March 31 to which they did not object. Hon. members suggest that it was all right for the federal and provincial governments to reach that particular agreement. But now they are objecting to it because, as they say, they did not agree that there ought to be power on the part of any government unilaterally to negate any particular agreement.

I fail to understand this and I object to it because, in fact, what is happening is that as far as natural gas is concerned, Northern and Central has a pipeline which serves that entire area. The area is being supplied now by Northern and Central. Gas is now being circulated all through southern Ontario and Quebec, even in Saint-Hyacinthe from which the hon. member comes. The company has indicated that it will be impossible to supply additional amounts of gas in the future. In my area there is strong dependence on natural gas for industrial consumption, but apparently they cannot anticipate receiving any increase in supply. I refer to a letter addressed to the Norfolk Hospital Association of Simcoe, Ontario, from the vice-president of marketing and sales of Union Gas Limited. It is dated August 6, 1974, and reads in part:

> Since late 1970 Union Gas Limited has been negotiating with its principal supplier, TransCanada Pipe Lines Limited, for additional volumes of natural gas from Alberta to meet the expanding requirements of its market area in southwestern Ontario. While additional contracts have been obtained, the volumes involved fall considerably short of satisfying the total potential demand in Union's franchise territory. Currently, TransCanada advises us that not only is it unable to provide additional supplies for expansion, but it is experiencing difficulty in contracting for sufficient new reserves in western Canada to sustain deliveries at present contract levels for any significant time into the future, and there is a possibility of curtailment in deliveries to its markets in one to two years' time.

Later in the letter we find this paragraph:

> Maintaining service at present levels to markets east of Alberta will cause shortages unless significant new sources from western Canada are brought on stream and made available to the principal consuming areas of the country.

This letter concludes by stating in the last paragraph:

> We regret very much having to give you this preliminary notification of a pending gas shortage. In view of the supply situation outlined above, we would ask you to advise us as to the possible effects on your planning and operations that any termination or curtailment of natural gas supply would have on your operations.

There is a shortage, according to TransCanada Pipe Lines. But let me read from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, November 2, under the headline "Pan-Alberta, TCP dispute jeopardizes gas for Ontario". It reads in part:

> Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd. of Calgary has decided not to sell its natural gas supplies to TransCanada Pipe Lines Ltd. of Toronto, which supplies fuel to the three distributing utilities in Ontario.

● (1630)

That would include Northern and Central Gas Company. Gas will not be distributed to my area in any additional amounts. Pan-Alberta is not private enterprise, in the Tory or Conservative sense of the word, but it is a state capitalist in the Conservative or Tory sense of the word. My area, as well as the whole of Ontario, is being directly threatened by Pan-Alberta.

[Mr. Blais.]

Mr. Schumacher: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude my remarks by saying that so far as I am concerned, the reason there is a wrangle in respect of this bill is the price. Pan-Alberta is concerned because if TransCanada Pipe Lines gets this extra volume, it will not bring up the price at the well head. Pursuant to an agreement to be reached between Alberta and the federal government—as has been the case in respect of oil—the price of that gas will effectively be brought up with the approval of all parties concerned, the producers and the consumers.

It is a coincidence, undoubtedly, that this particular article was published at the time this bill was under study. However, it directly indicates the need for the legislation which I trust, notwithstanding the effective opposition of the opposition parties, will be passed promptly and sent to the committees for study and approval. Then it will return to this House, where it will receive passage so that all its measures might be effected within the shortest possible period for the benefit of Canadians.

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has not used up all his time, I wonder whether he would permit a question. I should like to ask the hon. member why Union Gas and Northern and Central Gas will not negotiate with Pan-Alberta. Why do they insist on going through the TransCanada Pipe Lines' route when it is possible for them to negotiate with TransCanada and have TransCanada deliver as a common carrier, as Quebec has done?

Mr. Blais: They are negotiating. I have not been briefed concerning their negotiations. Perhaps the hon. member has some additional information which he could convey to the House concerning why they do not accept TransCanada Pipe Lines' offer. At any rate, for 18 years TransCanada Pipe Lines has established its markets through its distribution companies. At a time when there is bound to be a shortage in gas reserves in the near future, the province of Alberta should not use that potential shortage as a lever for its own private interests, to the detriment of the consumers in eastern Canada. That is a principle that this bill should recognize.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): First, Mr. Speaker, I feel obliged to correct some of the inaccuracies of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais). In respect of Pan-Alberta, which the hon. member claimed was provincially-owned, may I point out that 61 per cent of the shareholders of this company are residents of Ontario. With regard to the question of Union Gas being unable to supply its regular customers, the hon. member read from a letter that Union Gas sent, I believe, to a hospital association, in which it was said that they were unable to sustain deliveries at current contract levels.

If this means contract levels with regard to the price, small wonder; because the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) was moved to comment that natural gas was drastically underpriced and that if, in fact, it were to remain at this particular price level we in Canada would be wasting this fuel, utilizing it inefficient-ly, and therefore in the not too distant future we would face severe shortages.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): But I recommended price phasing as well.

Mr. Andre: The minister indicates he recommended price phasing. A year and a half ago, the province of Alberta indicated it wanted to see this brought about, but received no co-operation. Even at this late date I would invite the minister to consult the companies which own the reserves, and the province which administers them, to see if in fact they can work out an agreement for price phasing up to a realistic value without using the threat of this legislation.

The question of consultation and discussion in respect of energy, oil and gas supplies, with the provinces unfortunately is not a new issue. In fact, one of the few accurate statements made by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) was at the end of his speech when he said we must stop this chaotic approach to energy policy.

This reminds me of when I participated in the debate on second reading of Bill C-18 during the last parliament. Bill C-18 was the predecessor of this bill. I prefaced my remarks in that debate with the comment that it was with a sigh of relief I was rising to participate because we were finally seeing the beginning of the end of the federal-provincial confrontation on energy which has been going on for about a year and a half. Bill C-18 was accepted by me as the start of the process. But little did I know how wrong and how gullible I was to accept the word of the minister and the government in this respect. Let me quote from the remarks of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as recorded at page 1235 of Hansard for April 8, 1974, when he was speaking of the March 27 first ministers' meeting at 24 Sussex Street which produced the agreement which lead to Bill C-18. The minister said:

> I would like to join with the Prime Minister in asserting that federalism triumphed in reaching a solution to a problem which was at its heart a matter of relative equities and sharing within our country.

That did not prevent the government adding a twister to the legislation which arose from this agreement, namely, that if the government unilaterally decides that the agreement is no longer applicable for one reason or another, and if in future they are not able to work out an agreement with regard to the price of crude oil, then after July 1, 1975, the federal government can unilaterally impose an agreement without recourse to the provinces. That certainly was not part of the agreement worked out at the luncheon on March 27. It is at least of questionable constitutionality. Even more laughable—it would be more laughable if it were not so sickeningly facetious—are the minister's remarks as reported at page 1234 of Hansard for April 8, 1974, when he said:

> —government policy has been to articulate three principles: First, that the price of Canadian crude oil should move upward to encourage exploration and development in Canada and thereby ensure further availability of our own resources, which will necessarily be more costly because they are both physically and technically less accessible, and also to ensure a continuing capacity for self-sufficiency.

● (1640)

Just one month later the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) introduced the budget and on May 8 the government confiscated any additional revenue that might have been available to help in the hunt for oil and gas. So how can you believe this minister? On April 8 he says that the first and foremost principle of the government's national oil policy is that there shall be sufficient revenues to finance the hunt for oil and gas which Canadians will need, and one month later his colleague confiscates those revenues. As was stated by Mr. Fred Kennedy writing in the Calgary Albertan of Saturday, November 2—I am paraphrasing here—anyone who accepts a commitment from this minister that is not in writing and witnessed, deserves to be duped.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Andre: Let us look at the history of crude oil pricing in Canada, which goes back a long way. However, I will not go all the way back; I will go back only to January 7, 1973, when there was an exchange of correspondence between Mr. Getty, minister of intergovernmental affairs of the Alberta government, and the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in which the latter pledged that there would be the fullest consultation before the federal government would implement a system of crude oil export controls. One month later, with no consultation, with not so much as a "by your leave," the federal government unilaterally imposed export crude oil controls. That was the first warning, in recent times at least, that the government of Alberta in future had better get more iron-clad guarantees rather than just a letter, even though it was signed by the minister.

Then there was the energy policy that was brought down in July of 1973, and again I commend the officials of the minister's department for putting together an excellent document containing excellent advice. I think on page 9 of that document it is stated that no national oil policy can be contemplated without the fullest intergovernmental co-operation and discussion. It also said, I believe on page 14 of the document, that it did not appear practical to build a pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal to carry western crude to Montreal. On September 4, just two months later, without any consultation at all, the government introduced a new national oil policy freezing the price of western crude at $4 a barrel and committing the government to a pipeline to the Montreal market.

Mr. Alexander: Shame!

Mr. Andre: However, when they froze the price of crude oil, the National Energy Board discovered that they would not be permitted to licence exports as a result of the National Energy Board Act. So, very quickly, the government invented the export tax. However, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources repeatedly assured the province of Alberta and the Canadian public—in this House, on more than one occasion—that this was a temporary measure that would last only until January 31, 1974. The last such assurance was made on December 5, 1973. On December 6, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, in spite of all assurances, that the price freeze would remain intact until the end of the heating season.

I think that was the fourth or fifth broken commitment. There was the first ministers' meeting of January 22 and 23 in which the minister proposed a hairy scheme for sharing export tax revenues. That was laughed at. As a result of that conference, which produced nothing, there was a meeting on March 27 at 24 Sussex Drive out of which came the agreement for one uniform price for crude oil across Canada, based on Montreal with transportation differences for the rest of the country, from which came Bill C-18. Again I greeted that with a sigh of relief, except for the fact that it contained the twister that the federal government would still retain a cudgel with which they could beat down the provincial governments if they found it necessary. But then, just one month after Bill C-18, along came the budget which totally wiped out any agreement, any good will, any feeling that we are now, finally, working together as a nation for the national good.

Mr. Alexander: The minister isn't even listening.

Mr. Paproski: The minister does not care.

Mr. Andre: It is a sad history of broken promises and commitments. Small wonder that some westerners state that commitments from this minister should be obtained in writing and be witnessed. I might add that they should be bonded, as well. Not only do they freely break commitments and promises; they cannot even be counted upon to obey the law. For example, let me quote from the Mineral Transfer Act, 1930, as follows:

—the interest of the Crown in all Crown lands, mines, minerals (precious and base) and royalties derived therefrom within the province, and all sums due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals or royalties, shall, from and after the coming into force of this agreement and subject as therein otherwise provided, belong to the province—

It could not be more explicit: the royalties belong to the province. Then how is it that the Minister of Finance can introduce a budget saying that companies will treat as income for taxation purposes these royalties which the Mineral Transfer Act states belong to the province? I might add that there is another section of the BNA Act, section 125, which provides:

No lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

The hon. member for Nipissing has indicated that the federal government has jurisdiction over trade and commerce. There is no argument about that. But it is also very clear that natural resources belong to the province; and there should not be any argument about that. To what extent can one level of government, in exercising its rights under the law, impinge on the rights of another level of government? Surely common sense would indicate that the proposals contained in this legislation and those which have been put forward by the government totally contradict the law in respect of the provinces having the right of ownership over these natural resources.

Does ownership simply mean that one has title, but none of the privileges? Is an owner prevented from utilizing the lands or minerals that he owns to his own best benefit? If that is the case, what is the use of ownership if in fact some other authority, in exercising what it considers its legal right, can restrict you from exercising any of the normal prerogatives of ownership? If that were the case, ownership would be meaningless. Surely we have not come to that in this country.

In total, the performance of this minister, of his colleague the Minister of Finance, and of the Prime Minister in respect of our oil position, has been incredibly inept and basically dishonest. Small wonder that one hears so much talk in western Canada of alienation and separation. I do not want to dwell on the subject, but it would be a great tragedy if in their arrogance the members of this government, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Minister of Finance, underestimated the depth of feeling that exists. I and all my colleagues here and in the provincial government of Alberta are Canadians first and foremost.

● (1650)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): "But".

Mr. Andre: But, Mr. Speaker, there is a limit to how often one can take the abuse, the lies, the broken promises without some form of reaction, and that limit is now being reached. We want the federal government to demonstrate sincere concern for Alberta and for western Canada, and to show that their contribution to confederation is held in as high esteem as that of other parts of the country. We think that the problems of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia have not been given the attention they merit. There has been no consideration of the transportation inequities which have been raised time and time again in this House, and there has been no consideration of the effect of various other policies on the development of western Canada.

The hon. member for Nipissing quoted figures to indicate the wealth of Alberta. Perhaps he should look at some figures which show that in 1973 the average income of Albertans was $800 a year less than that of citizens of central Canada. There is a clear case of long-time neglect of the west, Mr. Speaker. The price of oil and gas has recently given western Canadians an opportunity to alter some of the traditional trends and to diversify their economy, develop secondary industry, provide a greater variety of jobs and maximize the benefits of gas and oil production.

We think those goals are consistent with national goals and that it is important to have strong regions. We believe a diversified economy is good for the country, yet everything we see coming from this minister and the Minister of Finance seems to work against that. It is to be hoped the new budget will put an end to this government's opposition and will bring more co-operation rather than confrontation.

Part I of this bill would give legislative sanction to history. In effect, parliament is being asked to put the stamp of approval on history. This is a misuse of its powers. I would implore the government to get away from this practice of legislating retroactively. Part II of the bill deals with the federal-provincial agreement. The hon. member for Nipissing quoted the testimony of the attorney general of Alberta when he appeared before the committee which studied the predecessor of this bill. The attorney general said no arrangement was worked out at the luncheon meeting which allowed the federal government unilaterally to discard the agreement if it chose and unilaterally to impose its own price regime. Such an agreement was not worked out at that meeting, he said. If that is not a breach of intent, or if it is co-operative federalism, Liberal style, let us put an end to it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That was specifically discussed.

Mr. Stanfield: It was not agreed to.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It was specifically discussed.

Mr. Stanfield: What kind of sophistry is that?

Mr. Andre: The minister says it was discussed. What kind of agreement was this?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is why you were a real failure. You are the loser.

Mr. Stanfield: I am a loser in many respects.

Mr. Andre: The minister has indicated that we are the losers. There you have it, Mr. Speaker. In a minority government I can understand a minister of the Crown sometimes getting his political objectives mixed with the responsibility of his office, and therefore taking decisions that are politically expedient and not in the best interests of the country. It is unforgivable, however, for a minister in a majority government to be thinking along those lines. When is the minister going to start being responsible for the energy produced in this country? When is the minister going to start worrying about this co-operative federalism that his leader is always talking about on the hustings? What an incompetent minister! He is there for no other reason than he was the first English member of parliament to support Pierre Trudeau for the Liberal leadership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, that provision was not agreed upon at the first ministers' meeting. It is contrary to any spirit of co-operative federalism. It may well be contrary to the constitution, as indicated by the attorney general of Alberta. It certainly is damaging to national unity. That cannot be understated. Part III of the bill deals with the question of gas prices. Despite all the verbal and written commitments to have the fullest consultation before new initiatives are taken on an oil policy or on an energy policy, the minister—without so much as "by your-leave"—brings forward this provision to control the price of natural gas.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Andre: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Are Alberta ministers asserting that there was no consultation about the federal measure with regard to gas prices?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there was not time to work out an agreement with the Alberta government. There was an indication of intent from the federal government; then it appeared. Is that consultation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes. Did we not consult—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: That is consultation? I will argue with the minister about gas. That is something he understands—consultation Macdonald style. Why is the price of gas going to be controlled, Mr. Speaker? I should like to get around to that question later, but may I call it five o'clock?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[Translation]

CROWN CORPORATIONS ACT

SUGGESTED INQUIRY TO STUDY ACTIVITIES OF AND LEGISLATION RESPECTING CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a special committee of inquiry on Crown corporations exercising financial, commercial or industrial activities be established to study the various Acts establishing such Crown corporations, the Crown Corporations Act, sections 76 to 88 of the Financial Administration Act, and all other laws concerning Crown corporations and to recommend to the House the adoption of a law regarding federal public enterprises; the committee should also study the following subjects without restriction (a) the legal rules pertaining to the employees of such corporations (b) their financial structure (c) the way in which they are financed (d) government control over said corporations (e) fiscal regulations (municipal, school, provincial and federal taxes (f) the status of the administrators (g) the privileges of such corporations resulting from their being "commissioned by Her Majesty" (h) the status of the subsidiaries of these enterprises (i) their purchasing policy (j) the problem of auditing by the Auditor General of Canada or by private auditors (k) the appropriateness of State intervention in the economic field in the form of enterprises; and all other matters concerned. (By unanimous consent was allowed to stand and retain its position).

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to introduce this motion. I want to apologize first for my voice which mingled with that of demonstrators during the weekend. This does not mean that we must approve them, but we have to put up with them anyway.

I attach a great deal of importance to the motion on Crown corporations which I am introducing today. I am doing so for the third time. Each time, we manage to convince more and more members to support it.

What is the purpose of that motion? It is not to oppose the creation of Crown corporations nor to gloss over the activities of those corporations, but rather to throw some light on this whole governmental business.

To be more specific, Mr. Speaker, and to show the importance of that motion, I may say that it is a well known fact that the federal government now owns and operates an extensive industrial, commercial and even financial sector. For example, the government develops uranium mines through its Crown corporation Eldorado Nuclear Limited, and coal mines through the Cape Breton Development Corporation. The State is also engaged in mining prospection through the Quebec Mining Exploration Company, and oil exploration through Panarctic Oils Ltd. The State operates one of the largest railway systems in the world through the Canadian National Railways. It also operates a number of road transportation companies through the Canadian National Transportation Ltd., and the largest hotels in Canada through the Canadian National Hotel Ltd. The State is also involved in air transportation through Air Canada and Eldorado Aviation Ltd., in overseas shipping through the Canadian National and the Société de Transport du Nord Ltée. Moreover, the State is one of the biggest producers of rubber in the world through its Polymer Corporation Ltd. It owns and operates one of the most extensive radio and television broadcasting network in the world through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It produces and sells electricity through Quebec Hydro and Ontario Hydro. It lends money at interest through the Industrial Development Bank, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Farm Credit Corporation and various deposit and savings funds. Mr. Speaker, based on the estimated figures to be found in the annual reports of these corporations, the turnover of the State at the present time amounts to nearly $20 billion per year.

Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely important area of financial and business activity for the government. By moving this motion dealing with Crown corporations, I wish to call the attention of all members to three very specific facts. First of all, because Crown corporations were created by the federal government, we feel they should be accountable to Parliament, so that each one would operate strictly within its own area of activity. Now the only information we can get from those corporations as members of Parliament is some kind of a summary of their activities included in their annual report. In other words, parliamentary control is practically non-existent. I will give some examples later.

Second, the government owns and operates at present in Canada a hundred or so industrial, business or financial public enterprises, with assets of well over $20 billion. This contemporary phenomenon of a trading State raises many problems, for example: what will be the status of the trading State? What is its legal status? Several members do not know. Moreover, is the trading State subject to public law or to private law and, in both cases, in what circumstances? Then again, Mr. Speaker, few members, even those who have been in the House for a very long time, could answer this question. Will it have a mixed status proceeding from both private and public laws? Indeed, is it the private or the public law which applies in the administration of those acts? Finally, what control does Parliament have on those Crown corporations? That is another important question, Mr. Speaker. Why can the Auditor General, who is a parliamentary official rather than a government official, not audit the accounts of all the Crown corporations, but only those of a few? And yet, he would be the ideal person to exercise this parliamentary control on behalf of the members.

Another question one must ask, Mr. Speaker, is this: the main sources of information for the members on those corporate activities are: the annual report, the questions put on the order paper and the motions for the production of papers. But in those three cases, there are some serious shortcomings. What do we do with the annual report that we get at our office? We glance through it, we examine it, we scrutinize it paragraph by paragraph, but it does not say any more than what is written in it. It is a summary on administration. Its figures are roughly lined up and fail to inform the reader or the member on the internal operation of the corporation involved or on the role it plays within the economy.

● (1710)

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion which seems most reasonable to me: reports should be referred to the standing committees of the House for consideration and review.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. members should be allowed to call officials of Crown corporations as witnesses in order to question them about annual reports. Thus would be recognized the important part hon. members play in the parliamentary control of Crown corporations. Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that Crown corporations administer over $20 billion a year, which is close to the federal government budget and that is why hon. members should have their say in that matter.

Some ministers will reply that all this is quite right but that it is still possible to ask a written question or, as is commmonly said, to put a question on the order paper.

In other words, the question on the order paper is the one the hon. member puts there. The questions may be technical but in all cases, and here I quote Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 4th edition, citation 181, para. (3), page 153:

A Minister may decline to answer a question without stating the reason for his refusal, and it is irregular to comment upon such refusal.

Mr. Speaker, this means that according to the rules, a minister could be justified in refusing to answer a valid question when, normally, the hon. members should get the required information.

Mr. Speaker, I moved this motion especially for the hon. members to become aware of how limited parliamentary control is over Crown corporations: I quote:

It happens fairly often that the official of the company or the minister refuse to answer. The main reasons that are invoked are as follows:

Internal administration problems—A public corporation does not have to answer questions dealing with matters of internal administration. For instance, in a public enterprise, management has sole jurisdiction over matters pertaining to the "appointment of personnel". It does not disclose information coming from personnel files of officials or employees.

Here, I refer to a speech made in Paris in 1946 by Sir John Anderson, on the subject of public corporations. I quote:

—Similarly, "it is not customary to ask Crown corporations (public enterprises) for information on their employees or other matters of internal administration.

Here I refer to the Hansard of the House of Commons, for June 23, 1963, question No. 663:

It concerns the salaries, amongst other things, of employees and officials of Crown corporations. I quote:

Employees' salaries—A public Corporation will not answer a question whereby it is requested to disclose the salary level of an employee or a group of employees . . . salaries are considered as confidential matters.

All we need here is to refer to Hansard reports for October 23, 1963, November 4, 1963, October 30, 1967 and December 20, 1967 to find examples of this type of answer.

On the salary matter, the Minister of Justice said:

"It is to be noted here that in the Public Accounts, while the individual salary of any Civil Servant above a given bracket is indicated, the salaries of all the employees of a Crown Corporation are grouped under one single item. A question in the House put to the responsible minister is virtually the only way to be informed of the individual salary of a Civil Servant or official of a Crown Corporation, if the minister is willing to reveal it." Recently, the CBC stated through the responsible minister, "it is contrary to the Corporation's practice to disclose the salaries paid to an individual".

I now refer to Hansard of January 15, 1969. And I could quote many other references to illustrate this type of answer.

With respect to fees and honorariums paid to officials, it says:

Fees and honorariums—A public Corporation will also refuse to reveal the fees paid to an individual: "It is not common practice to ask the CBC to disclose the fees paid to any individual."

At this point, I am referring to Hansard of December 4, 1963 and December 18, 1963.

And in a similar case, the hon. Minister stated:

The CBC informs me that due to the competition it has to face, it does not usually disclose the fees paid to the individuals it happens to hire.

And here, I refer again to Hansard, Mr. Speaker, but I will spare you the reference.

Fourth, and I quote:

Contract following call for tenders.—The public corporation will refuse "to disclose the names of companies or individuals submitting tenders or to give information on tenders received".

Internal studies.—It was also decided that "it was against practice . . . to disclose the names of individuals assigned to studies". The corporation considers such studies as "private documents" for internal use.

And here, I refer to Hansard of February 26, 1969, on page 5969.

Remuneration of the executive director.—"It is the practice . . . not to disclose any information from personnel records of officials and employees and this practice is supported by the Sessional Committee on Railways and the Shipping.

I refer here to the deliberations of this committee on December 20, as reported on page 5665, and on March 10, 1969, as reported in Hansard, on page 6387.

—This answer was given by Air Canada, the Northern Transportation Company Limited, Eldorado Nuclear Limited, Cape Breton Development Corporation and Polymer. However, the C.N.R. the C.O.T.C., the C.B.C., and the C.M.H.C. . . . disclosed the remuneration of their executive presidents. Therefore, there is no uniform and well defined practice.

I would also say to my colleagues on both sides of this House that it is not a partisan motion. Its aim is on the one hand to demonstrate to hon. members that Crown Corporations have a very important commercial, financial and judicial part to play in our society and that these corporations are the continuation of government activity and, finally, that their budget is over $20 billion.

Mr. Speaker, when a member of Parliament gets in touch with the Canadian Transport Commission, Air Canada or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, there is every possibility that, considering the well established practice in the House, he will not get an answer and most of the time the minister, even if he would like to answer, will have done so in private rather than publicly.

It shows, Mr. Speaker, that parliamentary control over those government creatures that are the Crown corporations is almost inexistent. On the one hand, the annual report is general and incomplete and on the other hand, questions on the Order Paper involve no obligation for the minister to answer and finally, the member of Parliament really cannot on his own authority, meet the chairmen of those corporations to get the information he wants.

So, Mr. Speaker, when the time comes for the House to approve estimates or subsidies to be applied against the deficit of the Canadian National or Air Canada or any other Crown Corporation, under the out-dated system that we have, the member of Parliament has the right, the obligation to approve subsidies to offset a loss but cannot, under the rules, make a corporation explain its deficit. It only does so in answer to a formal request from the minister who, then, must be kind enough to convey the information to us.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the motion any longer, so that my colleagues from both sides of the House will have the opportunity of expressing their views.

I just wanted to point out that this is not a motion for or against the corporations. My only aim is to have a special committee appointed to study the whole operation of the Crown corporations and their relation with Parliament, so that one day Parliament may have direct control over them.

Crown Corporations

[English]

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to talk to the motion before us in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). The hon. member also has on the order paper a very complex bill on this subject. I studied over the weekend and I must say that a number of the points it makes are very relevant and should be looked into further. It seems there are two basic issues involved here. The first concerns the principle of Crown corporations; the principle of state intervention in the economy through Crown corporations. The second deals with the accountability to parliament of these corporations.

I do not wish to take the time of the House debating the philosophy behind the setting up of Crown corporations, but I should like to talk about their accountability to parliament. Part VIII of the Financial Administration Act relates to Crown corporations and incorporates provisions dealing with the control and accountability of such corporations as well as certain financial aspects of their operations. The act defines a Crown corporation as "a corporation that is ultimately accountable through a minister to parliament for the conduct of its affairs". It establishes a threefold classification of Crown corporations and develops a systematic pattern of relationships between corporations, on the one hand, and parliament and ministers on the other.

A departmental corporation is defined as one that is a servant or agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada responsible for administrative, supervisory or regulatory services of a governmental nature. It is, in fact, an ordinary department of government which has been given corporate status. It is subject to the direction and control of a minister and must rely on parliament for annual appropriations to cover its financial requirements. An agency corporation is one that is an agency of Her Majesty in right of Canada, responsible for the management of trading or service operations on a quasi-commercial basis, or for the management of procurement, construction or disposal activities on behalf of the Crown. Like a department or a departmental corporation, it is subject to a considerable degree of ministerial control. Although no very sharp line of division can be drawn, a distinction can perhaps be made between a department as the servant of a minister and a corporation as his agent.

A proprietary corporation is one that is responsible for the management of lending or financial operations, or for the management of commercial and industrial operations involving the production of, or dealing in, goods and the supplying of services to the public. It is ordinarily expected to conduct its operations without appropriations. It usually has a considerable amount of managerial freedom, and such control as the minister or the governor in council exercise over it is comparable to that of a shareholder who holds all or a major part of the stock of a private company.

While the minister is not usually held responsible for the day to day acts of the servants of a proprietary corporation, as he is for the acts of the officers of his department, he is often given a statutory right to intervene to give advice or directions and to demand an accounting so as to ensure that there is an adequate measure of public control and accountability. A further distinction is that, since the amendments to the Income Tax Act in 1952, a proprietary corporation is subject to income tax.

A general pattern or blueprint of the financial relationships of Crown corporations with parliament and the ministry is set out in the Financial Administration Act, but this is not a complete and exhaustive statement of those relationships. Some Crown corporations are not listed in the schedules and are not subject to the act. Some are subject to specified sections of the act, while others that are listed are subject to it only to the extent that it does not conflict with the special statutes under which they were created or under which they operate. Thus, the Canadian Wheat Board, the Bank of Canada and its subsidiary, the Industrial Development Bank, are not listed in the schedules because of their special functions; they are excluded from the application of the act and are governed by the acts incorporating them.

When a Crown corporation is to be created, the usual practice is for parliament to enact a statute, which authorizes the establishment of the body and defines the corporate powers and purposes, outlines the basis of its financing and sometimes sets limits on its borrowing powers, determines the size and type of the board and sets the basis for the selection of members, the period of their tenure of office, remuneration, qualifications and grounds for removal. Some statutes, however, such as the Department of Defence Production Act, the Atomic Energy Control Act, the Research Council Act and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, contain provisions delegating the power to establish corporations to the governor in council, a minister or other specified authority under the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act. Perhaps it might be better that all these Crown corporations have their terms of reference clearly defined by parliament.

Canadian Crown corporations, following business practice, are usually managed by boards of directors. There is no uniform practice in dealing with the constitution of the boards, their size and method of selection, or with the tenure of office, remuneration and removal of directors. Provision for each corporation is made in light of its special needs and circumstances. I think the hon. member made a very good point. Perhaps the public does deserve to have closer scrutiny of the salaries paid to officials of Crown corporations and of their general hiring and management practices.

Appointments to the boards are usually made by the governor in council rather than by a minister, although a minister customarily makes the recommendations and in case of companies incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act he may actually make the appointments. It is not the practice to appoint ministers to the boards of Crown corporations. When departmental representation is required, civil servants are usually named, but the majority of the part-time members of boards are selected from outside the public service. The remuneration of board members is usually fixed by the governor in council. However, when a civil servant is named to a board, he serves without additional remuneration.

There has been some discussion by hon. members of members of this House sitting on the boards of Crown corporations. I think this aspect of a member's parliamentary life should be looked into. As a freshman member of parliament, I think it would be very useful to participate in decisions affecting Crown corporations which are involved in so much of the economic life of Canada. Indeed, one of my colleagues, a little later, may delve into this aspect of members participating on boards.

Except for a modest provision for making working capital advances to Crown corporations, the Financial Administration Act contains no specific authority for financing the capital and operating requirements of the corporations. The methods of raising funds for the capital purposes of the corporation are usually set out in the company's statute of incorporation, but provision may also be made in special statutes, as in the case of the Canadian National Railways, or in votes in annual appropriation acts, as in the case of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the National Harbours Board.

In general, capital requirements may be financed from internally generated funds and other reserves of the corporation, in so far as these are available and are not required by law to be paid into the consolidated revenue fund; from the sale of bonds or debentures to the public with or without the guarantee of the government; from loans, advances or outright grants out of the consolidated revenue fund; from the sale of equity stock to the government; or from borrowings in the private sector secured by the pledging of corporate assets. Where a corporation's funds are not sufficient to finance its operating requirements, financial assistance for all or part of its programs is usually sought from the government. This is usually extended through outright parliamentary grants unless there is a reasonable expectation that operating deficits will be offset by surpluses within a relatively short time.

Certain corporations have the power to borrow from the public. The instances in which they have been able to borrow from the public without a government guarantee have been confined to short-term requirements, and usually from the chartered banks with which they normally transact business. Their long-term borrowings from sources other than the federal government have usually required a government guarantee. Where such a guarantee is involved, parliamentary authority is required; in addition, the terms and conditions of the loan itself, as well as the guarantee, require prior approval by the governor in council.

Government loans to Crown corporations for the financing of capital expenditure programs, whether such programs involve the acquisition or construction of assets, the lending of funds to the public or the strengthening of a corporation's working capital, are, in almost all instances, interest-bearing. The interest rates for loan drawdowns are usually set quarterly on the basis of the cost to the government of borrowing funds for a comparable period, plus approximately one-eighth of 1 per cent to cover other costs not reflected in the interest rate, and these rates are applicable for the whole period of the loan. Usually, loans are repayable over the period of the loan, with periodic payments of principal and interest.

Where loans are made for the acquisition of fixed or physical assets, the repayment schedules are usually based on the expected useful life of the assets for which loans are incurred. In some instances the periods are stipulated in the applicable legislation. No attempt is made to deal with each individual asset and its expected life but, instead, with groups of similar assets. For example, in the case of a power plant, the amortization period is based on the expected useful life of the plant as a whole, rather than on its individual parts. Where loans to the corporation are for the purpose of relending to the public, the repayment period is usually based on the period or periods over which the corporation in turn receives repayment.

Controls operate in a number of ways, but the most significant are the provisions of the statute under which the corporation was created. These encompass the nature and constitution of the governing board and the appointment and removal of members or directors; the approval of budgets and proposed methods of financing; the determination of the criteria to be followed in ensuring that satisfactory accounting records are maintained and financial administration procedures followed; the requirements of an independent and effective audit; and the preparation and submission of adequate annual and other reports which fully disclose the activities, operations and affairs of the corporation.

It is here that I take exception to the remarks of my colleague from Lotbinière, in that I believe the reports of Crown corporations do, in the main, serve their purpose. They inform the members of the House and the general public of areas in which they have been active during the year and reflect the general record of the corporation. There are other areas of control such as the approval of bylaws, contracts and the salaries of senior officers, the right to issue directives and the requiring of information. Not all of these are of equal importance or of uniform application to all corporations.

The basic financial control of the Crown corporation is through requiring the submission and approval of budgets. Under section 70 of the Financial Administration Act all agency and proprietary corporations prepare annual capital budgets which are submitted to the appropriate ministers, the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance, for their recommendation to the governor in council. After approval by the governor in council, the budgets are laid before parliament. Major projects or expenditures are set out in the budgets, including estimates of proposed capital expenditures for land, buildings, plant and equipment, increases in working capital, amounts required for redeeming maturing indebtedness and, in the case of those companies which administer lending programs, the amounts required for making loans.

● (1730)

An estimate is usually made of the over-all cost of a program, of the estimated commitments for future years, and of the cash required for the year under review. Some indication is also given of the sources from which the funds required will be obtained. The approval of the budget does not constitute an authority for the corporation to borrow, nor does it signify an undertaking on the part of the government to lend or to guarantee loans. These powers must be specifically granted by parliament, either annually or in a general continuing authority, and the terms are usually subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Agency corporations are also required to submit their operating budgets for the approval of the two ministers, the appropriate minister and the President of the Treasury Board, but there is no specific requirement to lay these before parliament.

Proprietary corporations are not required to submit operating budgets, presumably on the ground that they should be freer than agency bodies in the management of their own affairs. Nevertheless, there are several exceptions. For example, the Canadian National Railways and, as the hon. member mentioned, the Cape Breton Development Corporation are required to submit both operating and capital budgets to parliament. However, the nature and magnitude of operations of both agency and proprietary corporations are subject to parliamentary approval when funds are sought to cover operating deficits.

Statutes of incorporation usually require a corporation to maintain an accounting system satisfactory to the responsible minister. Under the Financial Administration Act a corporation must keep proper account books and related records, and may make provision for reserves for the depreciation of assets, uncollectible accounts and other purposes, subject to the direction of the Treasury Board.

Annual statements of accounts are required, for which standards of disclosure and reporting comparable to those required of private companies are established. These are to be prepared in accordance with such directions as to form as the Treasury Board may give. In addition, a corporation must make such other reports of its financial affairs as the appropriate minister requires.

The auditor of a Crown corporation is usually designated in the statutes of incorporation, although some acts merely provide for an appointment to be made by the Governor in Council. When the designation is by statute the Auditor General is usually named, but when an act provides for appointment by the Governor in Council the choice in the past has been made from private auditing firms. However, even in the latter case the Auditor General is eligible for appointment; the Financial Administration Act provides that, notwithstanding any other act, he may be appointed the auditor or a joint auditor of a Crown corporation. I think this goes far enough to answer the point brought out by my colleague.

The Financial Administration Act gives comprehensive directions embracing both the accountancy and authority aspects of the audit. The auditor of each corporation must report annually to the appropriate minister, and the general form of his report is prescribed. Each Crown corporation must submit its annual report, together with its financial statements and the auditor's report, to the appropriate minister, who must lay its report before parliament within 15 days after he receives it, or, if parliament is not then in session, within 15 days after the commencement of the next session.

In 1951 the Public Accounts Committee recommended that the annual report of each Crown corporation should be referred for study to a select committee of the House, and that the annual reports of all Crown corporations should be published together in one section of the public accounts.

[Mr. Collenette.]

Usually some direction as to the disposition of surplus moneys of Crown corporations is given in the statutes of incorporation.

Agency corporations are usually required to surrender their profits to the Receiver General. The Canadian Commercial Corporation, which may retain for its own purposes all moneys received in the course of its business, is an exception, although the Minister of Supply and Services may direct it to pay over to the Receiver General any of the moneys administered by it that he considers to be in excess of requirements.

The proprietary corporations usually have a greater degree of freedom in using their own funds, and many are permitted to retain their profits. However, the practices followed differ from corporation to corporation. For example, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Farm Credit Corporation, and the Royal Canadian Mint may retain their earnings to establish reserve funds, but when the statutory limits on these have been reached all additional earnings are payable to the Receiver General.

The Northern Canada Power Commission may retain its surplus earnings, to be used, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, in the reduction of rates to consumers. The Export Development Corporation may pay excess moneys to the Receiver General on demand. The Financial Administration Act contains a variation of this provision, whereby the Minister of Finance and the appropriate minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may require a corporation to pay to the Receiver General any moneys considered to be in excess of requirements, such excess to be used to discharge any debt owing by the corporation to the Crown, or to be applied as revenues of Canada. This provision, however, is operative only when it is not inconsistent with any legislation applicable to a corporation.

The Minister of Finance exercises a general control over the designation of bankers and depositories for Crown corporations. Under the Financial Administration Act a corporation, with the approval of the minister, may maintain accounts in the Bank of Canada and in such banks in Canada or financial institutions outside Canada as he may approve. Normally commercial banking facilities are used, although in a few cases the Bank of Canada has been designated as the depository for a corporation's bank balances. There is a further provision in the act authorizing the Minister of Finance, with the concurrence of the appropriate minister, to direct a corporation to pay all or part of its money to the Receiver General, to be placed to its credit in a special account in the consolidated revenue fund.

[Translation]

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) is similar to the one I moved a few years ago, but, in fact, his goes further. Mine only suggested that there be at least one member of parliament on the board of directors of every Crown Corporation, to ensure a better control of the expenditures the government makes through its corporations. The hon. member for Lotbinière thinks that it might be convenient to form a special committee of the House to study every aspect of Crown corporations. It is a good suggestion, although I do not necessarily agree with everything the hon. member said. It seems to me that this question should have been discussed long ago.

[English]

When I say I do not agree with everything the hon. member for Lotbinière has said, what I mean is I think he has decreased his chances of having this motion passed by the House. It is not that I disagree with anything specifically in his motion, as I think it is an excellent motion, but the fact that he says we must have a special committee look into the aspects of each and every Crown corporation—at least that is the way I interpret it—means that we would have a committee studying all of these Crown corporations for a very long time. I do not know how many there are, but I think there are over 40. Therefore, for the simple reason of practicality I could not go along completely with the motion of the hon. member.

If the hon. member were to propose his motion in a different way so the House could consider asking for the subject matter to be referred to the committee I think his motion would be more acceptable to the House, and I would encourage him to do so. This is a subject that has been very dear to my heart since I have been a member, and I have spoken about it over the years.

I feel very strongly that as members of parliament we come here to represent the people of Canada and yet are unable to represent them properly simply because we have no control over certain aspects of government spending. It is suggested that Crown corporations must be autonomous and independent. We can all realize why, under certain conditions, a Crown corporation must be autonomous, but there certainly must be some kind of control, some kind of answerability, whereby Crown corporations must exercise responsibility to the people of Canada through their elected members who speak on their behalf.

Many times in this House and in committee we have asked a minister for some information, or have made a suggestion concerning a Crown corporation under his aegis, and have been told that that body is autonomous, is independent, and therefore he will have to refer the matter to that corporation.

In many instances the minister seems to have absolutely no control over such bodies. We could take almost any Crown corporation as an example. The CNR is an obvious one. The CBC is another. No one wants to control the press of this country. I am sure no one would suggest that the government should control the CBC. On the one hand while no one suggests the government should have control over the press, on the other hand such a body as the CBC should not have licence—which very often is the term used in the name of freedom of the press—to do whatever it wishes. There must be certain norms established, and I say this must come through the voices of the representatives of the people.

I wonder whether perhaps the hon. member would consider making an appeal to the government on the basis that it really is not necessary to have Crown corporations examined in detail by a committee but rather that we should have an opportunity in committee to examine all the general aspects of Crown corporations, and particularly the answerability feature.

In the past I have suggested that members of parliament should be members of the boards of directors of Crown corporations. This has been done in some provinces. It has also been done in some other countries. However, this has not met with complete approval in this House up until now. Perhaps this is not the answer, but at least it is a suggestion. It would seem to me that a special committee, such as the committee proposed by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), could be the vehicle to examine the feasibility and the pros and cons in respect of members of parliament being on those boards. The committee could examine all the other aspects having to do with the answerability of these corporations to the people of Canada through their representatives. So I would make that suggestion to the hon. member. Perhaps he might see his way clear to do this.

I rather think the government would be of a mind to accept that kind of approach. From what I understand—and I hope this is the case—more and more items discussed here in private members' hour, whether by way of notices of motions or specific bills, will be referred to committees, or at least their subject matters will be so referred. This does not necessarily mean that the government says it will grab the ideas proposed, but rather that it will allow such items to go to a committee for study. I believe this is a great step forward because, in the last few years, it has developed that private members' hour has been nothing but a time for members to come forward with their favourite ideas only to find that no one would listen, and that motions and bills would simply be talked out. It certainly is not my desire to talk out this particular motion. I simply want to say I would encourage the hon. member to use this approach to the government, and I would encourage the spokesman for the government to recommend that this matter be referred to a committee so that the general aspect can be studied in detail.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to discuss the subject of Crown corporations. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) is to be commended for his persistence. As he indicated at the commencement of his remarks I think he has more and more won approval from members of this House for the kind of action or stance he wishes to take.

The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) favours a somewhat different approach, namely, the appointment of members of parliament to boards of directors. When one realizes there are approximately 40 Crown corporations perhaps it is not appropriate to take this position. However, I do not think the hon. member for Cochrane would suggest that a member of parliament should sit on the board of directors of each Crown corporation. Most assuredly there are some corporations in respect of which I believe there would be some merit in considering his suggestion.

Having been a member of the Public Accounts Committee for some years, I am aware of the frustration experienced by members of that committee when it is felt that a particular Crown corporation warrants more thorough or in-depth investigation. I remember, I believe it was during the first parliament I was here, that of 1968-72, when we had an opportunity to study the expense accounts of CBC personnel travelling abroad, and also the expense accounts of CBC personnel travelling within Canada.

The Auditor General had conducted quite a thorough study at that time. He compared the hotel rates being paid in various places such as Winnipeg, Victoria and Quebec. I think it is worthy of comment that the Auditor General could not find fault with the personnel of the CBC. If anything they were found to have been quite frugal in the manner in which they used expense money, recognizing that after all it was the taxpayers' money.

The frustration we experienced was when the CBC management decided that something was to be filmed in Toronto and decided to move 14 or so personnel from Winnipeg to the Toronto area. All we could study was whether or not those 14 people had lived within the limits of their expense accounts in respect of hotel accommodation, taxi cabs, meals and so on. What we could not get at in that committee was the reason why it was necessary to have 14 people travel from Winnipeg to Toronto. We could not determine whether the personnel might have been available in Toronto, or whether it might have been possible to use some camera men, for instance, under contract. That was the type of frustration felt by the committee.

I think that is the type of problem the hon. member for Lotbinière and the hon. member for Cochrane are trying to solve, that is, that when board decisions are made to move personnel or to move them by a particular means of conveyance, a committee should have an opportunity to determine why such a particular decision was taken. This, I believe, is an example of the frustration experienced by many members of parliament in respect of Crown corporations.

To my way of thinking—and the hon. member for Cochrane touched on this—the hon. member's motion is too broad to be accepted by the government. In other words, he is suggesting a special committee of inquiry seemingly to look into all Crown corporations. Yet he was quick to point out that he is not challenging Crown corporations, he is not saying that there is anything wrong with them but that there might be something wrong. What he is saying is that we do not have an opportunity to do an in-depth study of Crown corporations under the present circumstances.

● (1750)

I was impressed by the research work done by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette). I must say quite sincerely that listening to his address today I learned a fair amount about Crown corporations. Obviously when asked to participate in this debate he did so seriously, and did a tremendous amount of research. I must also say quite frankly that my interest in Crown corporations has been fairly parochial. I was interested in the workings and machinations of Polymer, now called the Polysar Corporation. But I think the hon. member indicated a broader interest. He also showed us the manner in which one can check out and study budgets if one is moved to take that particular course of action.

I do not know how closely the hon. member for Lotbinière was listening to the address of the hon. member for York East, but I would commend it to him. There was a tremendous amount of information contained in it which he could study. He might say, "If that is the way that certain Crown corporations operate, I really do not think I am too interested in them. There seem to be enough safeguards, and if I want to do so, I can find out by either going to the minister, by putting a question on the order paper, or by attending the committee."

Listening to the hon. member's comments I found that he was good enough to point out that there were areas where it might not be such a bad idea to have a more thorough investigation into a particular Crown corporation, in support of the stance of the hon. member for Cochrane.

So we seem to be of one mind here. The only differences are in the methods or means of approaching this, whether we establish a special committee of inquiry, whether there is sufficient protection now to protect the Canadian taxpayer, or whether we need members of parliament or other people appointed to represent the government on these boards of directors and to report directly to parliament. I think that is the thrust of the motion we have before us today.

I support the idea that all these motions should not be talked out. In the six years that I have been here I have heard some excellent ideas advanced during the private members' hour. I have participated in several of them to the point where the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) once referred to me as the hatchet man in the private members' hour. However, I was sincerely interested in the subject matter of the debate and wanted to participate in it.

Unfortunately when one is on this side—and most of the motions emanate on the other side, which is appropriate because we here have other avenues of promoting our ideas—one ends up speaking for five minutes only and being called a hatchet man, whereas the individual who introduced the motion might have taken twenty minutes. This makes it difficult for us to express our judgment. But there are instances of ideas put forward in private members' hour being adopted, and probably this is what encourages the hon. member for Lotbinière to keep pressing the point he is making today.

Let me say, on a sad note, that when a Canadian destroyer had a fire and explosions on board, this came to my attention because one of the crew members on that ship was from my riding and he died in the course of the accident. Under the rules of the Department of National Defence, which were still a hangover from wartime, a sailor had to be buried on land closest to where he was killed, even though, as in this case, he had never set foot on it. Then there was the ridiculous situation of a man in the Canadian army who went on a course to Great Britain, and on the train from his port of landing died from a heart attack. He had to be buried in Great Britain although he had only just got off the boat which took him there.

The Americans, in spite of the great number of soldiers who were killed in the war in Viet Nam, established a policy whereby people killed on active service were brought back to their native land if their families so wished. I put forward a motion that the families of Canadian personnel killed in the course of performing their duty should have the option to have them buried in the place where they performed their duty, or brought back home.

Frankly, I am not getting off the subject, Mr. Speaker, but rather stressing this point to indicate to the mover of the motion that there is hope that motions such as mine and the one before us might be adopted and accepted by the government. If a bill is introduced, possibly it will not be accepted but the subject matter of the bill might be proceeded with and studied by a committee.

I thought the hon. member might be interested in a few facts. In reference to Crown corporations let me point out that today there are approximately 40 of them. When I did my research on that subject I found it mind boggling. I did not realize there was that much necessity for government involvement. I think the point made by the hon. member is good, that we have to keep our eye on these Crown corporations.

Let us look at the short period of ten years from 1963 to 1973. Legislation was passed to create a number of Crown corporations. For example, in 1963 the Economic Council of Canada was created; in 1966, the Company of Young Canadians; in 1966 the National Arts Centre Corporation; in 1967 the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, again in the same year the Canadian Film Development Corporation, the Cape Breton Development Corporation, the National Museums of Canada; in 1969 the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. I will not go on with them. If I were trying to kill time I could list several others that are here, but I do not wish to do that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You don't have to try.

Mr. Cullen: What disturbs me, and I am sure disturbs hon. members, is that from time to time legislation must be introduced to increase the powers of existing corporations to enable them to fill the changing demands of the areas which they were set up to serve. I am sure that this is necessary, but I think it should be scrutinized very carefully because I do not like to see the government getting involved in it.

When I see a Crown corporation expanding, I ask myself: is that not a role that could be better played by private industry? My view is that if it can be, we have no business there. Let private industry look after that. There may be areas where we must move in, and the one which we have heard about most is the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I think it was set up in 1967 to carry out the rationalization of the coal industry, and to broaden the base of the Cape Breton economy by making it less dependent on coal. I think this is where the government had an obligation to move in to help the area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes before I called it five o'clock I had made some comments which, with the indulgence of the House, I should like to withdraw.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) had made an off the record comment about my leader which caused me to lose my temper, and I made some comments regarding the minister's competence and how he came to occupy his present portfolio.

The remarks in respect to competence I do not withdraw; his record speaks for itself. The remarks on how he came to occupy the portfolio can only be conjecture on my behalf. I should like to withdraw those remarks and would prefer I had not made them in the first place.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I appreciate the hon. gentleman's sentiments. If I exchanged remarks across the floor in the same vein, I withdraw them as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: However—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not just a simple but? It is however!

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, Part III of Bill C-32 deals with the question of price controls on natural gas. From the minister's remarks it appears that he feels it necessary for the government to impose price controls on natural gas because the price is below commodity value and, therefore, there is a considerable likelihood that this valuable fuel would be wasted. That does not justify this approach, Mr. Speaker.

In violation of the minister's commitment to consult fully with the purchasing provinces before taking such a step there is provision in this part to allow him to decide unilaterally what the price shall be. We should ask why gas has not reached its proper commodity value now, and the answer is that a competitive market does not exist. There is a monopoly buying situation through Tran-sCanada Pipe Lines. The solution is to require TransCanada to act as a common carrier, Mr. Speaker. That would produce a multiplicity of buyers and suppliers. There would be a competitive market, and the price of natural gas would reach the proper level. Canadians would be spared the expense of a tremendous bureaucracy to implement this part of the bill, as well as the tensions of federal-provincial conflicts.

There are some fundamental questions that western industrial producers as well as the provinces would like to have answered, Mr. Speaker. Who would receive the additional revenues? Is the government going to invent some new kind of tax to skim off the cream? Why is it that the minister has not introduced general price controls on all energy? If there is in effect a national policy of price controls on energy, why are hydro, coal, wood, uranium and all sources of energy not included? Westerners might be forgiven for thinking that it might be because these other commodities have to be purchased from provinces other than Alberta.

Part IV of the bill deals with cost compensation, which is a tremendously complicated method of arriving at the subsidy level for oil imported by eastern producers. When asked in committee why there was such complexity, government spokesmen said they wanted to avoid paying some companies too much. So they came up with this complicated system which removed the incentive to shop around for the best price on the international market. That resulted in crude oil costing less in Montreal than in Toronto.

According to the national oil policy which came out in dribs and drabs over the past year there was to be a uniform price across Canada, based on the Montreal price less the cost of transportation. But now the Toronto price is higher than Montreal. That is a good thing for the people of Montreal, of course, but how is a pipeline justified in that case? I wonder if Interprovincial Pipe Line Company is having second thoughts? Why build a pipeline when the system in place gives Montreal a cheaper oil than would be the case if pipeline tariffs had to be paid?

● (2010)

Part V contains a provision that Bill C-18 contained, namely, that a federal civil servant can walk into the office of any premier in Canada and seize any files he chooses. That is an absurd provision, to say the least. It is another example of the arrogance of this government.

The saddest aspect of this whole energy federal-provincial confrontation of the past year and a half is what is happening to the country in terms of our future economic viability and loss of potential. Right now the oil and gas industry of Canada is, essentially, in neutral. It is fulfilling commitments made a year or two ago, but not undertaking any new commitments to explore and develop new reserves.

Statistics indicate about a 10 per cent drop in drilling activity. That in itself is alarming. We should be increasing our exploration and development in order that we will be self sufficient in the future. These statistics do not however show how bad the situation really is because the companies are in neutral.

[Mr. Andre.]

A lot of the expert personnel who are necessary for healthy exploration and development activity are leaving Canada. I refer to the drilling companies and their personnel. So far we have lost 37 or 38 rigs. These are long footage rigs, the most expensive and most difficult to replace. Even worse, we have lost the personnel to go with these rigs. We have lost seismic crews, geochemists, geologists and geophysists. These are Canadians who were born and educated in this country. They did not want to move, but things have come to a halt. In order to maintain their livelihood they have moved to Denver, Dallas or Houston.

People in the inudstry have indicated that if we went back to the post March 27 mood that existed in the pre-budget period when it looked like the energy situation was straightened out, it would take two years to restore the previous effort. We have lost two years, and every day of delay prolongs that.

In order to make any sense whatsoever, a national oil policy must have as its prime priority the development of sufficient supplies for Canada to remain self sufficient. We have the geological potential to be self sufficient in conventional supplies. We have the tar sands with their enormous potential, as well as enormous reserves of other forms of energy. It would be a tragedy, to put it mildly, if we did not develop this potential and did not remain self sufficient in the future. I might say there is a very good possibility we will not do so if things remain the way they have been, Mr. Speaker.

There is continual federal-provincial bickering and changing of rules. Commitments made one month are broken the next. All this has shattered the confidence of the industry. A severe decrease in activity has resulted. This country's long-term potential is being endangered. How do we get out of this situation?

It is essential that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the government start the ball rolling by making some gesture to indicate they have lost interest in maintaining this fight. The provinces would like to see it come to an end. They would like to see a mood of optimism and enthusiasm restored in the oil and gas industry. They would like to see these companies develop the reserves that Canada will need.

A good place to start would be by removing clause 36 of this bill which states the federal government can unilaterally impose its will on the producing provinces. Removal of that clause would demonstrate that the government has confidence in the goodwill and interest of Canadians in other parts of Canada in the future of this country, and is willing to gamble on co-operative federalism. If it made that simple gesture it would go a long way toward improving the atmosphere that exists, and putting an end to this ceaseless bickering.

I do not think it can be said often enough or loud enough that Canada is the only western industrialized nation that is self sufficient in energy. We have an opportunity that we have not had in the 107 years since confederation. We are in a good position vis-à-vis our competitors.

It is unforgivable that the government would be wasting its energy fighting and scrapping over who is going to get what chunk of the cream rather than concentrating on how we, as a nation, can take advantage of this opportunity we have now. It is unforgivable that that should be the prime motivation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). Instead of scrapping about the revenue, and worrying about how much will go to the producing provinces and how much to the consuming provinces, they should work this out. They are good people, those who are involved in the other governments of Canada. They are just as fine Canadians as those who come from Toronto Rosedale.

The opportunity that now exists will not exist in perpetuity. There is a limited time frame in which we must seize this opportunity. Any sensible Canadian who thinks about it will agree that the time is ripe now to stop bickering and get on with the building of Canada.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, when introducing Bill C-32, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) concluded by stating:

The objectives which it seeks to achieve are for the most part familiar to members as being now well-established components of an integrated national energy policy.

I challenge that statement. I believe this government in no way has shown an integrated national energy poiicy for this country.

We in the province of Ontario are particularly concerned about the government's handling of this entire question. In Ontario we need essentially two things. In energy we need security of supply. Secondly, we need a pricing of our energy that leaves us competitive, internationally, and with consumers of petroleum products in the other provinces of Canada.

In many ways the government has not suitably protected Ontario with regard to those two matters. For example, the bill we are debating this evening deals with transferring funds raised by the federal government through an export tax so that they may be used to compensate importers on the eastern side of the country. Surely we have to ask ourselves why.

Why is it necessary, in a country such as Canada which produces enough domestic oil to serve the entire nation, that we have to go through a complicated taxing and compensation plan in order to have a one oil price in the nation? It comes down to one very simple fact. While we have the domestic reserves in Canada we do not have the domestic transportation system to deliver those reserves throughout the nation. I say this because I believe the government could have put a suitable transportation system into place and averted the problem of having to deal both domestically and internationally with such a vital matter as the distribution of our available oil.

A year ago I remember being in the lobby watching television when our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came on and said in a firm voice that a pipeline between Sarnia and Montreal would be built. Yet there is still hesitation on the part of the government. As I say, it is time the government treated the building of a pipeline not only to Montreal but to the east as a national priority, and got on with the job.

It has been suggested by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the pipeline should be paid for by means of charges on the tariff to be borne by consumers in Ontario. I challenge this concept. What the minister is suggesting, in effect, is that the $180 million the pipeline will cost should fall on those who use it in the province of Ontario and that, in the event not one drop should go east, the entire cost would be a charge on the consumers of Ontario. We believe this is unreasonable and that the government should either work out a suitable arrangement with the interprovincial pipeline people for the building of the line, including government guarantees if necessary, or, failing that, build the pipeline itself. In this way security of supply would at least be accorded to the extent that reserves are available in Canada.

Let me touch on the minister's speech in another regard. In introducing the bill he mentioned that there is one oil price throughout Canada. I challenge this. The fact is—though I notice the hon. gentleman very cleverly glossed it over—there is not one oil price across the nation. For example in Montreal today oil costs 70 cents less than it does in Toronto. That is about 2 cents a gallon when translated into the refined product. Here again we are dealing with an aspect I find rather alarming.

The minister claims there is one price. But he does not make it clear that since transportation costs are approximately 70 cents, the price of the product in Montreal is about $6.50, and in some cases as low as $6.00, leaving a minimum differential between Toronto and Montreal of 70 cents per barrel. Translated into gross terms this means Ontario is paying more than $200 million a year more for oil than consumers in Quebec.

A pipeline must be built, and the pipeline must be reversible. A time may come when foreign crude is cheaper than oil we can produce domestically, or we may find that eastern resources will be available to people in Ontario. In either case we believe it important that a pipeline be built without delay so that Ontario may be placed in a more advantageous position.

When he appeared before the committee which was dealing with this measure, then known as Bill C-18, the minister made it clear that the price of oil in Montreal was to be $7.20. As reported at page 12:25 of the minutes of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works, issue No. 12, for Wednesday, April 24, 1974, Dr. Ian Stewart said the base price in Montreal would rise to $7.20. I believe that when this question is dealt with in the committee the minister should be prepared to explain why the figure has risen since April of this year as contrary to the minister's declared intention with respect to the one price policy he announced last April.

Another fundamental question dealt with in this bill is that of raising revenue through an export tax on one sector of the industry and using it, at least in part, to compensate importers of oil. I believe that in committee the minister should be prepared to explain what safeguards are intended to ensure that there will not be an international rip-off here. We must bear in mind that in many cases the multi-national corporations which, on the one hand, are exporting our oil, are, on the other, involved in the importation of oil to eastern Canada.

Again in committee last April, it was revealed by one of the officials in the minister's department that approximately 90 per cent of the oil involved in Canadian imports is oil imported into Canada by multi-national corporations which, in turn, are engaged in the production of oil in western Canada. Surely when we are dealing with hundreds of millions of dollars it behoves the government and parliament to be very sure there will not be any rip-offs in the international market at the cost of the Canadian taxpayers and the consuming public. Already there is a lot of rumour that posted international prices for oil are being undercut. It is rumoured that oil is available in some places at substantially below stated prices.

The minister must be in a position to ensure that "in between" operators are not making undue profits by gouging Canadian taxpayers and failing to give them the benefit of lower prices while, at the same time, receiving compensation at the taxpayers' expense.

There is a fundamental question here involving free enterprise and the constitutionality of what the minister proposes to do as well as what the provinces have done, and may do in the future, with respect to their natural resources. On this question I believe there is little doubt that the ownership of the oil in the ground or of other resources is vested in the provinces. I also believe there is little doubt that the provinces have complete power to legislate in respect of the oil in the ground and the royalties that they may charge. Both of those powers are clearly set out in the British North America Act. The provinces have complete power to legislate in respect of any oil rigs installations, refineries, storage tanks, pipe lines, etc. within the provinces, again by virtue of the British North America Act.

As the minister knows, these powers given to any province are subject to Ottawa's sanction, perhaps by having the Lieutenant Governor refuse his consent. But what is most disturbing is the fact that both the dominion authority and the provincial authorities have power to tax. For example, a province has the right to levy direct taxation within the province in order to raise revenue for provincial purposes; that is provided by section 92(2) of the British North America Act. But the parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction over the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation; that is provided by section 91(3).

It is readily apparent that in this situation two legislatures are dealing with the same matter, namely, revenue earned by those who produce oil, in the case under debate, or for that matter those who produce gas or any other natural resource in Canada. Surely it is wrong for the federal government to persist in a course of confrontation. That fact is that taxation both at the provincial and at the federal level could take more than 100 per cent of the total revenue earned in the primary resource field if the two legislatures saw fit.

In this respect I would point out that we in Ontario are very familiar with a case that was heard in 1909 in our Supreme Court, confirmed in the Court of Appeal and eventually in the Privy Council, a case that dealt specifically with the power of the legislature virtually to confiscate private property. In that case, known as Forence Mining Co., Limited v. Cobalt Lake Mining Co., Limited, Mr. Justice Riddell made the position very clear when he said the following:

> In short, the Legislature within its jurisdiction can do everything that is not naturally impossible, and is restrained by no rule human or divine. If it be that the plaintiffs acquired any rights, which I am far from finding, the Legislature had the power to take them away. The prohibition, "Thou shalt not steal," has no legal force upon the sovereign body. And there would be no necessity for compensation to be given. We have no such restriction upon the power of the Legislature as is found in some States.

Clearly, then, we are in a position where, if Ottawa persists in one course with respect to taxation, and the provinces persist in another course, there could be confiscation of all the earnings of the companies involved in producing natural resources.

The reason we in Ontario are concerned about this is that we believe, as I have indicated, that the first priority we must insist upon is security of supply. Surely it behooves this government and the provincial governments in the oil producing provinces to come to an agreement on the mode of taxation so that developers and resource companies can ensure we have sufficient resources in future years to enable Ontario and the rest of the country to continue their productivity without letup.

In this respect I think it is very easy for us to deal in figures of $6.50 per barrel, or $10 per barrel, or $8 per barrel, without realizing that as one of the main consumers the province of Ontario will be done irreparable harm unless there is a satisfactory reconciliation between the oil producing provinces and the federal government. Already the effects of the recent price increases are being felt dramatically in Ontario in terms of inflation and employment. I urge the members of this House to press the government to reconcile this question quickly, and on a satisfactory basis, so there is a minimum of consternation in the coming months.

In this regard I believe that the bill should be dealt with in committee of the whole so as to give ample opportunity to all members of the House to question the minister and his officials on any aspect of the bill about which they feel concern. Perhaps in this way we can get to the facts and satisfy ourselves that in truth the federal government is making an earnest attempt to satisfy all parties. Thus the Canadian consumer—and I speak as a resident of Ontario—will suffer minimum hardship.

In conclusion, I believe insufficient discussion has been conducted between the provinces and the federal government on this issue. I believe it is wrong for the government to assume that an agreement which was originally for a period of 15 months should now be embodied in an act of parliament without further consultation with the provinces to ensure that this is their wish. We are dealing with perhaps one of the most important subjects to come before this session of parliament. I hope all members will take a deep interest in it, that the government will stop being so bull-headed and will try and work out an agreement that is mutually satisfactory both to the producing and to the consuming provinces.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, we are again debating a bill that had a trial run in the last parliament and is now before the House with the addition of some clauses. At this stage I think it is wise that we, as a nation, take a look at our oil and gas position, and at the prospects not simply for the immediate future but for some years ahead. Perhaps this will be the last time this question can be debated in the House, unless it can be raised again when we are debating PetroCan.

It seems to me that this bill perpetuates a very comfortable, but short-sighted, situation. We are keeping our oil prices low for the next two or three years and encouraging consumption, while at the same time discouraging exploration and development of other oil and gas fields. As a result there is a movement of drilling rigs out of Canada. While the United States is increasing its exploration activity and its financing of oil and gas development, we in turn are decreasing our activity. As I say, we are encouraging consumption by keeping the price of our gas and oil below the world price.

At the same time the government is attempting to create one uniform price all across Canada. This poses great problems, and as oil and energy are interchangeable and can be replaced with electricity, coal, wood and other forms of energy, we are not allowing the market price to set priorities. Thus we will end up with abnormal strains in the industrial and financial part of our economy when we finally must reach world market levels.

● (2040)

Again this bill is a direct intervention in provincial affairs in that it attempts to wrest from the provinces the right to control their resources and sell them at the best prices available. The thrust of this bill is interesting in that it intends to pillory the western provinces in favour of central Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has carefully prepared the way by appointing to the supreme court individuals who are biased against the provinces, and particularly western Canada.

What about energy savings? At a time when the world is saving energy Canada has the enviable or disreputable distinction, whatever you would call it, of experiencing an increase in the use of gas oil in the 1970's. Contrast this with the United States which has enormous natural energy supplies which in the long run will likely be cheaper than ours.

President Ford indicated in Washington that if his voluntary energy conservation program is unsuccessful he will take stronger action. He wants to have one-million barrels a day reduction in oil imports to the United States, and has said that he will move to any other alternative, including the possibility of mandatory limitations to achieve that result. This clearly indicates what lies ahead for U.S. consumers. The public is being given a chance to find its own way to conserve energy.

Voluntary programs of this type have a poor record of success. When they are judged to be failures there will no doubt already be a reduced availability of gas at the service pump, and this will be followed by the introduction of a system of priorities in respect of access to supplies, perhaps with tax devices designed to discourage heavy consumption.

To this government and Canadians generally who are enjoying temporary easing of oil prices because of ample supplies, the United States problem may seem remote. Canadians are fond of telling themselves that, on balance, their country is self-sufficient in oil. This complacent attitude could lead to difficulty within three or four years and, unless Canadians think seriously about energy conservation, mandatory limitations such as those threatened by President Ford may have to be introduced in Canada.

The president of Shell Canada Limited has said that the production of crude oil and natural gas liquids from known reserves in Canada will begin to decline by about 1978, just four years from now. He also stated that if the demand continues to increase at its present rate Canada could become a net importer of oil before 1978. He went on to say that in the short term there is not much that can be done to increase supply.

The president of Shell also noted that the rate of growth in the demand for all types of energy in Canada increased from 4 per cent per annum in the 1950's to 5.5 per cent in the 1960's. As we become more mobile, more electrical and more automatic we become more energy inefficient. Most observers feel that in the long term, given significant development of the oil sands and of reserves in the frontier regions, Canada should be able to remain essentially self-sufficient in oil and natural gas, providing we espouse a conservative ethic now.

Conservation to many authorities means reducing the consumption of oil and gas liquids from the recent annual growth rate of 5.5 per cent to 6 per cent back to the 3.5 per cent to 4 per cent of the 1950's. This should not mean a change in the lifestyle of Canadians. Nor will it mean an absolute decline in consumption. However, when we are debating such things as an open-door policy on immigration, through which we could have a flood of immigrants who would certainly increase demand on energy resources, we must remember that this could well pose severe strains on our energy resources.

This change in lifestyle has been studied in the United States. The Ford Foundation has released the results of its $4 million energy policy project. The Mobil Oil Corporation criticized the low or zero growth recommendations contained in that report. We are now debating whether we should substitute small cars for large cars, how we should heat our houses in the winter and how we should cool them in the summer. I think it is often forgotten that one of the things that has made the lifestyle for Canadians much better in the last three decades has been the increased use of energy in heating homes and in transportation.

Transportation is the greatest area in which inefficiencies in energy use are to found. Air travel requires 10 times as much energy as buses, six times as much as trains, and four times as much as cars. Many industries could use coal instead of natural gas, yet this bill will allow natural gas to be sold indiscriminately at considerably lower than its market value.

This bill will increase the tendency for increased consumption of oil and natural gas, because those energy sources will continue to be priced below the world market. There is no valid argument against the suggestion that in a country such as this, with relative sufficiency, we can prevent unnecessary hardship to our consumers. However, there is no use burying our head in the sand, as this bill would imply, by saying there will be a gradual rise in oil prices to meet the world level. It should be made obvious that there must be a gradual increase in oil prices to the consumer to somewhere near the world level, and we should be given details as to when this will occur.

Let me turn for a moment to what our energy possibilities are in the short run. When Premier Lougheed, the premier of Alberta, Canada's major oil producing province, after meeting with the Prime Minister stated that he was apprehensive of an energy shortage in Canada in a decade, I believe that his comments should be taken with considerable importance. Other people in the oil industry are forecasting that oil production could start to decline at the end of this decade. It has been widely quoted that on the latest data regarding performance of oil fields operating at peak levels—and this has been the case for the last one and a half years—the outlook is even more sobering.

By 1983 it is likely that Canadian production will be able to supply only Canadian areas it has served traditionally, that is, west of the Ottawa Valley. This would be of great significance in terms of Canada's balance of payments. It seems likely that by 1983 or 1984 this could account for a deficit of several billions of dollars.

It is also considered that by the latter half of the 1980's production from Canadian sources will again be more than enough to supply the traditional domestic market. It is widely considered that even if exports stop, the peak provision capacity will only be increased by three or four years. To cut off exports we would have to balance the effect on foreign exchange and on over-all foreign relations between the United States and Canada, as well as the effect on the income of producing provinces through the service industries. We would have to take into account the fact that exports generate cash for future development.

We in this country have been lulled into a feeling that the oil sands will provide unlimited supplies of cheap energy, but all indications are that this recovery of oil will be slow. One plant capable of 100,000 barrels per day capacity in the tar sands, coming on stream every two years, is considered to be all that can be expected. One oil company president has stated that it is doubtful if more than one major plant can be built in the Athabasca oil sands every two years.

A major plant now under construction is intended to start producing 125,000 barrels a day of synthetic crude in 1977. The president of that company stated that the one clear signal to the consumer that the days are over when energy supply can be taken for granted would be if we were to allow the price of petroleum and of other forms of energy to find their proper market value.

There has been a widespread feeling that oil companies have been making too much money or too high a percentage of profit. Surely it would be better to devise a means of taxing profits when prices rise, particularly if they are too high in the present situation, in order to keep the price down as a means of limiting company profits.

We are now debating whether we should extend the Montreal pipeline. In my opinion this is one move that we should not make at this time. Obviously Interprovincial Pipeline is not happy with the possibility of building that pipeline. Indeed Interprovincial seems to feel that it needs further government guarantees before it will embark on the project. Apparently the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has stated publicly he believes in an adjustment in the tariff for all customers along the Interprovincial pipeline from Edmonton to Toronto and Montreal, and that in the end—it would be a better way to build a pipeline with an additional capacity of 250,000 barrels a day whether or not oil is available to the pipeline. In other words, those involved in the oil industry are not really sure there will be any oil to place in the pipeline even if it should be built.

● (2050)

This extension of the line to Montreal, which market is now served by foreign crude, is central to the policy of self-sufficiency announced after the oil embargo. Montreal obtains its oil mostly from Venezuela, while the Maritimes are served by the Middle East. A capacity of 250,000 barrels a day would fall far short of the requirements to meet eastern needs.

A more important consideration is that Interprovincial clearly has doubt concerning the availability of oil for a period of 20 years. Interprovincial raises the point whether the limits on resources are now becoming clearly visible.

What about the tar sands? Shell Explorer, the Canadian subsidiary of American Shell, wants out in respect of its half of the Shell Canada tar sands development because it doubts it can achieve an acceptable rate of return for the $500 million it would have to invest. The doubt arises from the expanding government control over the petroleum industry, which emerges from different events such as the federal-provincial tax conflict and the adoption of a policy of self-sufficiency.

It might seem to those people who want Canadians to own the oil industry that here would be an excellent opportunity for Shell Explorer to sell its share to some Canadian company, but an amount of $500 million is no mean investment for Canada at this time.

There have been frequent headlines in the papers in connection with this situation. These headlines point out, for instance, that droves of drilling rigs are leaving. This emphasizes what has been happening in respect of the exploration industry. Drilling activity has been reported at 10 per cent below the 1973 level, with the sharpest reduction in Saskatchewan, at a time when it should be expanding. As well, production in Saskatchewan has gone down by 73,000 barrels a day from a year ago. Mr. J. G. Wotherspoon, Saskatchewan Deputy Minister of Mines, stated that medium crude has been priced out of the American market. It was the export tax that priced it out, Mr. Speaker.

Alberta production is down 200,000 barrels. This reduction has come about because of the disinclination of Americans to pay the export tax in total. Unfortunately it has had its heaviest effects on the types of crude that we have in the greatest quantity, the heavy oils of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The question of the Montreal pipeline should be looked at again. Last winter the industry found it could move one-quarter million barrels a day into eastern Canada via the Panama Canal and by the Great Lakes. We might well consider this for the future. I think the security offered by this route is adequate. Indeed, instead of spending all this money on an interprovincial pipeline the money could be spent for the development of reserves in the Alberta tar sands, and the pipeline could be proceeded with later if there should be any oil to fill it.

What are the chances of the world price of oil being reduced in the next few years? They do not seem very great, although there are a few hopeful signs around the world. In today's paper it is reported that the Shah of Iran has said he would seek a 14 per cent cutback in oil prices, but he coupled with that statement an argument that the oil companies are making too much profit. I suspect he is only trying to cloud the issue, because the substantial part of oil profits finds its way into the coffers of some governments around the world.

Officials of the British Petroleum Company in an interview in Montreal suggested that it is clear the world can produce energy from a number of sources, beginning early in the next century, at rates as prolific as those of the energy-rich years of the 1950's and 1960's, although at substantially higher prices. They went on to say that some countries such as Canada, and Britain with its North Sea oil, could be shown on paper to be able in theory to achieve self-sufficiency in respect of energy.

But it seems likely that pressures, some of them related to resource technology as well as the resources themselves, will be such that no country should really consider itself self-sufficient. Canada is part of the North American continent, and we should not attempt to isolate ourselves from the United States in respect of energy. The natural flow is north-south in the great plains of North America with regard to gas and oil.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has flatly rejected any sharing with the United States, but the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has just returned from France where, among other things, he explored the possibility of expanded trade in which Canadian oil, coal and uranium could be substantial elements. I always thought these were part of the energy package. The Prime Minister no doubt wishes to break down some of the dependence of Canada on the United States market. This is not the first time a Canadian Prime Minister has wished to do this. However, the United States generally is in a position to return a greater trade advantage than could be had from Europe.

Canada at the present time does not need access to the United States market as it did previously. There are now genuine shifts in energy sources in the U.S. This, together with control of wastage and a desire to strengthen conservation measures, all combines to restrain demand. The principal strength of the United States is its capacity to organize and focus money and expertise in a manner peculiar to it.

Although the United States is now involved with conservation it will find new sources of energy. Indeed the world must find new sources if it is to exist. Canada could be the loser if it denied itself access to United States technology.

This bill does not provide any method by which the provinces can work out their taxation problems. We are awaiting with interest what this month's budget will contain in an attempt to heal the wounds of the May 6 budget. In the May 6 budget the federal government obviously declared war on the provinces which were producing oil and gas. The disallowance in the budget of May 6 of the provincial tax or royalty as an expense effectively placed those resources under the federal government. In western Canada this caused a growing realization of alienation. It will strengthen the idea which is gaining ground in the west that the west should adopt a much more independent position in the Canadian federation. If the resource industry is to settle down, the federal and provincial governments must come to some agreement.

The petroleum industry of Canada has pointed out that at the new Alberta crude oil price of $6.50 per barrel, and under current royalty and tax rules, sufficient cash flows are available for an additional 77 cents per barrel investment in the search for new petroleum energy. The industry also points out that the May budget proposals would have taxed away an additional $1.30 per barrel from the Alberta oil industry. The industry would suffer a loss on Saskatchewan oil production. It is obvious that there is a need for re-examination by the federal government of its tax sharing policy so that Canada will be better able to generate the capacity necessary for resource development.

It seems that much will have to come from the reinvestment by the energy companies themselves, and this will require tax regulations which would allow for a reasonable return and, at the same time, for a contribution to over-all exploration and development. There are those who believe that governments should do the investing, but all indications are that governments tend to be inefficient and prone to overkill in their control of oil companies whose profits are proverbial. It seems to me that outright government intervention and management should not be condoned when the industry can be controlled just as well by taxation and regulation.

In closing I should like to say that this bill perpetuates a principle that is wrong in that it encourages consumption and discourages conservation, exploration and the development of new oil and gas resources in our country. In the long run this will cause serious problems.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste Marie): Mr. Speaker I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-32, the petroleum administration measure, which is designed to impose an export charge on crude oil and natural gas to compensate the oil companies, and to regulate the price of oil and natural gas.

Listening to the comments of some of my friends in the Conservative and Liberal Parties it seemed to me that the old adage of "play it again, Sam" it put into practice because in the last parliament, the twenty-ninth parliament, we dealt with many of the same issues in what was then Bill C-18. The problem of energy in Canada has not gone away, is still with us, and it stands as a testimonial to the failure of the Liberal and Conservative federal governments to design a national energy policy to benefit Canadians.

I think it is important that in our discussion and analysis of this bill we turn our attention to what should be the components of a national energy policy. I should like to outline what we in the NDP believe are some of the essential elements in such a policy. First and foremost, we must come to grips with the issue of control of the petroleum industry in this country. For far too long we have welcomed with open arms, and without any real consideration of the long term implications, the multinational oil companies coming into Canada to develop our energy resources. As a result of that lack of forward looking policy in terms of what it means to Canadian control, we now find that 91 per cent of the oil industry here is foreign dominated. With respect to oil refining, foreign domination reaches 99 per cent. Is it any wonder then that there is a lack of a national policy that would benefit Canadians, and that instead the benefits are going to the multinational oil companies, most of which are based in the United States?

Let us look for a moment at what has been the policy of the multinational oil companies. First, their policy has been to export Canadian oil to the United States, and the more they can export, the higher are their profits. So it has been traditional in this country for us to get as much oil as possible out of the ground and to give it to the United States as quickly as possible. Therefore, for those oil companies the future supply of oil for Canadian needs has always been of secondary importance.

The second result of this lack of control over the industry by Canadians has meant that multinational oil companies have tried to charge the highest price possible. In other words, the cost of a barrel of oil or a gallon of gasoline is not based on the cost of production.

As the vice-president of Imperial Oil said last year in testimony before the Nova Scotia government, it is the policy of the oil companies to charge what the market will bear. When we analyse this—and the Americans have done this—we find that it costs the American oil companies, if my memory serves me correctly, about 6 cents to produce a gallon of gasoline. In other words, the idea is that the sky is the limit, and what you can get away with is perfectly all right so far as price is concerned.

The other element or trend in our energy policy here, because it is controlled by the multinationals, has been the movement toward a continental energy policy whereby Canada would continue to be the supplier of the raw material, and would ship it to the United States where it would be processed and manufactured into other products. So long as the policy continues that we must export our raw materials, of course we are exporting jobs, because where the jobs are created is where the raw materials are further processed and manufactured. Historically that has taken place outside this country.

Therefore it is the belief of the NDP that it is important to reserve this trend of the foreign domination of our oil industry, and to do that we propose a number of steps. The first is to have a national petroleum company. During the minority parliament we pressured the Liberal government as best we could to move in that direction, and indeed the minister does have a bill on the books. When you look at the bill for the creation of a national petroleum company you find that it looks pretty good on paper, but the question is: will all the powers in theory allocated to that company be in fact used?

[Mr. Symes.]

What we want to see is a national petroleum company that will enter into all phases of the industry, into the exploration, the development and the refining of petroleum products. I do not have visions of people such as the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) managing such a company. Obviously we would go where the expertise is, we would contract out to those with such expertise. But the point is, if we had a truly national petroleum company—

An hon. Member: How about multinational managers?

Mr. Symes: No, but we could contract out to Canadian well drilling companies, of which the hon. member from Calgary is one of the leaders. We would have a national petroleum company which, by getting involved in the oil market in Canada, could be a pace setter with regard to price, exploration and pipeline policy in this country. I think that is an essential first step.

This national petroleum company could also serve another very useful function, in view of the fact that we in eastern Canada are still dependent on imported oil. This company could buy oil directly and sell it directly to foreign governments, thus avoiding the multinationals and all the rip off in fees and profits that that entails. In other words, a national petroleum company Canadian owned and directed could strike the best deal for Canadians in terms of buying and selling oil.

It is very interesting to note the current world situation, Mr. Speaker. A few days ago in the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) admitted that in effect Canada can be blackmailed by foreign governments that have multinational head offices within their jurisdiction. We were discussing a proposed international oil agreement when this little tidbit of information came out, Mr. Speaker. This seems to me a frightful admission of a lack of Canadian sovereignty in an area vital to the survival of our economy. A national petroleum company would be the beginning of control of the industry; it would lessen and eventually end the domination and threat of blackmail by multinational oil companies.

It would be important to have a national petroleum company deal directly with foreign governments, especially oil producing governments, in light of what is taking place in the Middle East at the present time. We read in this morning's paper that the Shah of Iran is seeking a 14 per cent reduction in the posted oil price. He pointed out, however, because of our present dependence on the multinational oil companies, that there is no guarantee that the reduction would be passed on to the consumer.

Saudi Arabia has proposed a plan that would make crude oil cheaper for a national petroleum company dealing on a bilateral basis with that country and other oil producing states.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that to even the most rabid capitalist the concept of a national petroleum comapny has some merit in our present situation.

An hon. Member: No way!

Mr. Symes: I hear some noes from my friends on my right, so there are still a few diehards there. They are to be commended on their principles and sincerity, but they are still living in the nineteenth century. We do not have the free market that they assume we have still.

If we are to have a national energy policy, Mr. Speaker, we can no longer allow Canada to remain at the mercy of the pricing and supply policies of the multinational oil companies. We must move toward government control and ownership, and view all forms of energy as we view electricity now—a public utility. We cannot allow wasteful private competition in the energy field.

The second essential element to a national energy policy is to ensure security of supply. At the present time in Canada we are self-sufficient in oil, but because of past Conservative and Liberal government policies we do not have an oil pipeline to eastern Canada from the western oil fields. As a result eastern Canada has to import oil and consequently the country has been caught in the tremendous inflationary spiral caused by the crude oil crisis.

We are faced with some frightening prospects in the near future, Mr. Speaker. Canada currently produces 2,003,000 barrels of crude oil per day. In Canada 1,751,000 barrels a day are consumed, and 1,206,000 barrels per day are exported. We import 949,000 barrels per day. I studied oil company figures, independent studies and National Energy Board figures. We do not have the latest report of the National Energy Board, which is a shame, and I think the minister is concerned about that as well.

The latest predictions of oil availability and demand, however, indicate that Canada will no longer be self-sufficient by 1979—only five years away. Canada's oil production is declining, yet we are still exporting oil to the United States at an incredible rate because of a lack of government intervention and because of foreign domination of the industry.

At the same time that oil production in western Canada is declining, demand is increasing rapidly. Any sane, logical person must ask why we continue to export oil when predictions are that we are running short and will have to import more expensive oil from Venezuela and the Arab states.

There are many answers, Mr. Speaker. In the past the National Energy Board consistently has been over-optimistic about future supply. It has accepted oil company figures, and it is to the advantage of the oil companies to be optimistic about supply in order to encourage exports. There is no pipeline to eastern Canada as an alternative to the demand of the United States market, and consequently the exports go to the United States. There has been consistent pressure on the Canadian government and the National Energy Board from multinational companies to commit ourselves to exporting oil.

Another reason why we do not cut back on exports to the United States is that since we have had the current world crisis and the price has gone up, the Canadian government has become dependent on revenues generated by the export tax to compensate consumers in eastern Canada in order to keep their oil price below the high world level. The policy of continuing to export under these circumstances is self-defeating as we run short of domestic oil. Exports will decline, export tax revenues will decline, and meanwhile the demand for imported oil in eastern Canada will continue to increase. Where is the money to come from to compensate the oil companies and to keep the Canadian price lower than the world price?

The government has two options, Mr. Speaker. First, in the years ahead it can compensate the oil companies from general tax revenues. That means each and every Canadian will have to pay more in taxes in order to have a lower price in Canada than the world price. Or secondly, the government will have to let the price of oil in Canada rise to world levels.

The implications are astounding in terms of what that would do to inflation in this country. Every day our constituents complain about increases in the cost of food, clothing and other essential items, but if we were to let the price of Canadian oil rise to world levels they would see what inflation really means. Energy is the essential component to our total economy; if energy costs go up so do costs in every other area.

When we look at demand and production in this country, the future is not promising. In 1979 we will lose our self-sufficiency. In effect, we will be in a deficit position of 101,000 barrels per day, and by 1984—a year that has some other connotations—we will be in a deficit position of 970,000 barrels per day, and will have to import oil from the Arab states and Venezuela at a higher price.

Given this evidence, that we are losing production in the west and demand is going up, it seems to me imperative to begin to reduce substantially exports to the United States. The minister says the government is considering this, and that it may be a possibility. He is admitting that it may be in Canada's interest to cut back somewhat our oil exports.

I remind the House that the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works has another item before it. It is called an international oil agreement, and is an agreement between 11 consuming countries, of which Canada is to be a member. This international oil agreement is a 10 year treaty. It is important to note that in this treaty the United States has a voting mandate of 53 votes and Canada only has a voting mandate of nine votes.

Under the terms of this treaty, which the Canadian government seems ready to ratify, if an international oil emergency develops, that is, if there is a shortage in any of the 11 importing countries, Canada is then committed to continue exporting oil to the United States at its current rate of export.

The implications of this agreement are indeed serious if we are determined to cut back our oil exports to the United States. If we get into an emergency situation, Canada will lose control of cutting back exports to the United States. Conceivably, Canadians would have to undergo cutbacks and rationing to serve the U.S. market. We need to take a closer look at this proposed international oil agreement. I looks like the beginning of a continental oil policy.

In terms of security of supply, in addition to cutting back exports to the United States it is essential that we begin to build an all-Canadian pipeline to eastern Canada.

This pipeline should go from Manitoba through northern Ontario to Montreal and the maritimes. I advocated this on many occasions in the last parliament. The answer the minister gave me on why we could not build an all Canadian line was that it would take a year extra to complete over the proposed Sarnia-Montreal pipeline. We now have delays in the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline to the point that these delays equal the one year extra it would have taken to build an all Canadian route.

I also argued with the minister in the last parliament about the value of a Sarnia-Montreal pipeline as opposed to extending the existing pipeline from Toronto to Montreal. The minister argued we needed the Sarnia pipeline because it could carry 500,000 barrels a day. Now that pipeline is supposed to carry only 300,000 barrels a day, and Interprovincial is not even sure it can handle that. With an all Canadian pipeline, we would have the opportunity to open up a petrochemical industry in northern Ontario. More important, we would have a means of getting cheaper western Canadian oil to our eastern market, and we would be secure in knowing that it traversed only through Canadian territory. This again raises the issue of security.

I am astounded to realize that the Canadian government is now negotiating with the United States about the security of supply through pipelines. I always assumed we had a treaty with the United States guaranteeing security of supply for the pipeline that leaves western Canada via Alberta and Manitoba, goes to Chicago, and links up with Sarnia again. There is also a pipeline from Portland, Maine, to Montreal.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources now tells us we are negotiating with the United States for guaranteed security. Meanwhile, what do the Americans want? They want an oil pipeline and gas pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley. The implications are serious.

Our pipelines going through American territory are not secure. The Americans are in a tremendous bargaining position to argue they should have a pipeline down the Mackenzie. It really amounts to blackmail. An all Canadian route would certainly avoid that difficulty.

If we are to have guaranteed future supply we must begin to develop the Athabasca oil sands. We must do this on a concerted and energetic basis. In the last parliament the minister repeatedly said the Athabasca oil sands were the great salvation of Canada. It was a secure supply. We had to develop the plants, get them on stream and into production because of the time lag involved. I do not hear the minister touting the Athabasca oil sands as the great salvation any longer. It is important that we understand why there is this sudden silence.

Here is a golden opportunity for Canada to move toward self sufficiency. We have an opportunity at this time due to the fact that in one of the proposed developments of the oil sands one of the private multinational companies is pulling out. Here is an excellent change for a government national petroleum company to step in as one of the partners to develop the oil sands under Canadian terms, for the benefit of Canadians and not for the export markets in the United States.

[Mr. Symes.]

In the last parliament we asked for a 50/50 split of the export tax between the provinces and the federal government so that the provinces could have extra revenue to help develop, along with the federal government, energy projects such as the oil sands. This was not accepted. Under the current export tax there is a surplus of some $200 million this year. I wonder what the federal government will do with that surplus. Is it going to turn it back into energy development? It is important that we have answers to these questions.

Another way we can begin to move toward ensuring a supply of oil for future Canadians is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources seriously to advocate to Canadians the value of conservation of energy. I do not mean turning out the lights around Parliament Hill. We have to get Canadians to think conservation because, as I said, we are moving toward a lack of self-sufficiency within five years time.

It is interesting to note that the growth in demand for energy in Canada during the 1950's was 4 per cent per annum. By the 60's, the demand had grown to 5.5 per cent. Canadians consume energy at a rate five times higher than the world average.

This government has a responsibility to initiate energy saving policies in areas such as higher insulation standards for new homes. We need to encourage mass transit via bus and train. In terms of passenger miles, planes require 10 times as much fuel as buses, six times as much fuel as trains, and four times as much fuel as cars. Yet the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) is going full speed ahead with STOL, the short takeoff and landing aircraft. He should be putting more money into mass transit via train and bus.

To promote conservation the federal government should be urging the provinces to reduce highway speed limits to 50 miles an hour. A car uses between 15 and 25 per cent more gasoline at 70 miles an hour than at 50.

If the minister had the courage to urge Canadians to turn down their thermostats four degrees, we would save the equivalent of 900 million gallons of fuel oil a year, about 10 per cent of the energy used in heating. We should also begin to phase out the use of natural gas to produce electricity because it is so inefficient when used that way. Further we should discourage the use of electricity to heat homes because more energy is expended in producing electricity than is warranted when we consider the ratio of electricity needed to heat homes. Those are some positive steps the government could take to move toward a position of security in future oil supplies.

A third element of a national energy policy surely must be a pricing policy to benefit Canadians. In the last parliament, and even before, the New Democratic Party advocated a two-price system in oil. That is to say, Canadians would pay a lower price than the world price, and we would export our oil at the higher world price. As a result of that policy which was accepted in the last parliament, Canadians save approximately $5.20 a barrel for crude oil. However, we still got caught in an increase of sorts because the price of oil to the Canadian consumer had to go up in eastern Canada because there was no pipeline from the west. We had to import foreign oil.

To keep the price down to consumers the government said it would absorb the difference in price between what people were paying in eastern Canada, the world price, and what people were paying in western Canada, the Canadian price. The money would in turn be given to companies operating in eastern Canada to keep the price down.

• (2130)

To date the government has given some $900 million to the oil companies in compensation payments. I maintain this is a rip-off of the Canadian consumer when we consider what company profits have amounted to this year. It seems to me, in the light of these profits, that the companies could well afford to absorb a greater share of the increased cost of the oil imported into eastern Canada.

Let me give the House a few examples of oil company profits. The after tax profits of Gulf Oil in 1972 amounted to $64.2 million. In 1973 profits rose to $101.7 million, an increase of 58 per cent. In 1972 the profits of Imperial Oil amounted to $157 million. By 1973 they had risen to $228 million, an increase of 45 per cent.

Mr. Andre: That is a return on capital investment.

Mr. Symes: Moreover, for nine months since 1973, Imperial Oil profits have shown a further increase of 64 per cent. The figures for Shell this year are equally remarkable. In 1973 Shell showed a profit of $60 million; in 1974 the figure is $119.5 million, an increase of almost 100 per cent. Yet we are giving $900 million a year to these oil companies!

Even more striking than figures I have just quoted are some figures here which, so far, have not been brought out in this debate. They show the profits of these companies as a percentage of revenue. With respect to Gulf Oil, profit as a percentage of revenue in 1969 was 6.8 per cent. By 1973 the figure had risen to 9.6 per cent. For Imperial Oil in 1969 the figure was 6.2 per cent; in 1973 it was 8.6 per cent. This means that despite the export tax, despite the corporate income tax, our tax system is still allowing the oil companies to keep a larger proportion of their revenue. I argue that the oil companies cannot plead that they lack funds for exploration. They are very healthy indeed, healthy enough, in my opinion, to absorb some of the higher costs of imported crude.

In conclusion may I repeat that Canada is approaching an energy shortage which will become evident in four or five years. A serious crisis is coming and we, as members of parliament, must bear the responsibility to act in a meaningful, constructive and responsible way to meet this crisis. We must develop a national energy policy embodying public control to achieve three things: Canadian control of the oil industry, security of supply, and fair prices for Canadians along the lines I and my party have suggested.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I had not intended to take part in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on!

Mr. Cullen: The bill is a good one and I think it is necessary. As the last speaker mentioned, we have been over this ground again and again. I sometimes wonder, though, whether members of the opposition have ever taken time to read the bill and, if so, whether they have come to any conclusions about it.

Perhaps it would be useful if I were to remind hon. members that it concerns a charge levied on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs, and to regulate the price of Canadian crude and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

I have been waiting to hear from hon. members opposite either support for this proposition or opposition to it. Instead, I hear the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) telling us there is no point, now, in building the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal. Five minutes later the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) tells us that not only should it be built but that it should be reversible so that should the price of offshore crude go down, or supplies be found off the east coast, we might be in a good position to take advantage of these circumstances. So, we hear two differing points of view.

From the New Democratic Party we hear speakers hashing over the idea of an all Canadian pipeline to meet an emergency situation. Is it any wonder that the government must show leadership and bring forward a bill which speaks, not for Alberta or for Ontario, but for Canada? I listened to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), and I listened to the usual harangue by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) that royalties should be allowed as an expense of doing business. However, neither of them indicated what amount of royalty they thought was reasonable.

When the price was frozen at $4.00 a barrel, the provinces and the federal government got together and arrived at a figure of $6.50 a barrel which was felt to be in the common interest of Canada. It was a little less than Alberta wanted for its crude, and it was a little more than Ontario wanted to pay, but it was a compromise worked out to deal with the situation. What was the reaction of the provinces? Saskatchewan felt that the oil companies did not need the extra money and decided to take the whole of the $2.50 increase. Alberta, if I am not mistaken, took between 65 and 70 per cent.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated prior to his meetings with the Premiers of the western provinces that they should not try to take all of that increase and call it a royalty, and that if they did it would not be allowed as an expense of doing business. This was a reasonable position for the Prime Minister to take. He stated it early on so that the provinces would be aware of the federal government's position. Fortunately we had the strength to maintain that position, and when the producing provinces took the action they did, the federal government had no alternative but to say that it is not a royalty, that this is a total intrusion into another tax field, and it is not a legitimate royalty to be allowed as an expense of doing business.

Negotiations now have to take place to determine what, in effect, is a reasonable royalty. I make no secret of the fact—indeed, I spoke about this publicly during the campaign—that the oil companies should be allowed a reasonable royalty as an expense of doing business. Whether or not such a compromise can be worked out I do not know, but at this point in time to suggest that $2.50 of an increase, or 65 or 70 per cent, should be the royalty, is begging the question. That is why the federal government took the action it had to take.

Once again we have the selective memory of the opposition parties when they say the government has been lacking in leadership. I suggest they are really choking on that particular expression. They tend to forget that the price of oil per barrel in the world was quadrupled and, as a result, we had to meet an emergency situation. We did this in several ways. We did it by delivering the oil in a way which the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) said was so successful that he wanted it adopted as a permanent way of moving oil from the west to the east, namely, by ship, train and any other way. So that operation must have been comparatively successful, Mr. Speaker.

The position of the federal government is that we want a one-price system for oil in Canada, give or take a few cents to allow for transportation costs. Is the opposition suggesting that this is inappropriate? If it is, then hon. members opposite should stand up and say so. It seems to us that having a two-price system is a good move. We should have one price across Canada within the limits that I have indicated, and then impose an export tax, which is a legitimate tax, on oil we ship outside. This money would not be used to fill the government's coffers.

There is a surplus of $200 million now, but I have not heard any member say how that money should be spent. They view it with suspicion, and wonder what the federal government is going to do with it. Surely these members have an obligation either to say they approve or they disapprove on the second reading of this bill, which is approval in principle.

Then I hear opposition members harping on the fact that the minister suggested that one option open on the Montreal-Sarnia pipe line was that, in order to pay for the capital cost of the line, a flow through charge should be made to users. With respect, that is one option that must be considered. Another option is that Interprovincial Pipe Line go ahead and build the pipe line as they were going to in the first place. Another is that they get a guarantee of a flow through charge, with the federal government picking up any shortfall in amount. Yet another option is that the federal government build the pipe line, or that the federal government build the pipe line and sell it back to Interprovincial. There is a whole series of options which surely must be examined.

Much has been made of the fact that we were confronted with an emergency situation, yet construction of the pipe line has been delayed. It has been held up because the National Energy Board saw its responsibility. It knew this was an emergency situation, and it also knew that there was apprehension in the province of Quebec about environmental damage. So the board told Interprovincial Pipe Line to find another route, that it did not feel it could approve the present route. As I say, the National Energy Board saw its responsibility and had the courage and good sense to do what it did. Surely it has a responsibility to tell provincial pipe line companies where to build their pipe lines so there is as little impact on the environment as possible.

I suggest to the hon. member for Calgary Centre that the most ridiculous suggestion I have heard tonight in this debate is that we should withdraw clause 36. Somewhere down the line the federal government has to take its responsibility. It is endeavouring to negotiate, for the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta, a price for their oil. If this cannot be negotiated, would not the opposition be justified in saying to the government that it has reached the stage where it cannot come to any kind of settlement, so why not introduce legislation to set the price?

This bill does not set a price unilaterally. There are all kinds of opportunities, both for the consuming and the producing provinces, to negotiate a reasonable price. But if this cannot be done surely the federal government must take its responsibility.

Mr. Baldwin: That is price control. I thought you were against that.

Mr. Cullen: One thing we would have liked to control was the amount of money the Conservatives wasted in the last election, but we could not do that.

I have indicated my support for the bill, Mr. Speaker. I think we are rehashing a lot of debate that we have already had. Questions have been asked tonight about what is going to happen to the $200 million, and I think these questions can be answered in the committee. Perhaps we will even get some suggestions from the opposition about what we should do with the money. What portion of the price of a barrel of oil should the oil company get, what portion should the producing province get, and what portion should the federal government get? We have not heard any suggestions in this regard from the opposition parties.

Mr. Baldwin: There is lots of time; we have another week to go yet.

Mr. Cullen: I hear what the hon. member says from his seat, but since he is not participating in the debate I will take that for what it is worth. In my view this bill should go to the committee, receive careful scrutiny and then pass. To suggest that clause 36 should be eliminated, thus depriving the federal government of its leadership role, is an inappropriate suggestion for any federal parliamentarian.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has given us a studious commentary on Bill C-32. The areas of this bill with which I agree are already clearly on the record, and they have been placed there by other members of my party. Similarly, other members of my party have clearly defined their areas of stern disapproval. Those areas of disapproval were voiced a moment ago by the previous member who was quick to praise clause 36, to which I should like to come in due course.

Let me for a moment, however, examine the closing statements of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He stated that the objectives which the bill seeks to achieve are, for the most part, familiar to members as being now well established components of an integrated national energy policy. That is an interesting statement in itself. It is very cleverly worded. You cannot really tell whether the statement means "we had an energy policy", "we have an energy policy", or "we will have an energy policy".

The question of energy policy is a very interesting one and was the subject of much remark in 1972. In fact I can remember Doug Stewart, the former member for Okanagan Kootenay, speaking about the lack of a Liberal energy policy at that time. I wonder if that is why he decided to retire. In any event the stand of the leader of my party on an energy policy was very clear in 1972: he expressed the need for the development of an energy policy, a policy that did not exist at that time, and which really does not exist today.

Let us look twice or three times at this statement, and let us look at it for what it says, not for what it purports to say. Purporting to speak of energy as oil and gas, and only oil and gas, what it really talks about, in my view, is all sources of energy, be they oil and gas, thermo nuclear, water and its hydro electric end result, or coal and coke fired steam generators. These last two, coal and coke, as well as hydro electric energy, are of considerable interest to me and of concern to my constituents. They are also of concern to the people of the riding of Okanagan Boundary. I mention that riding because of the massive coal deposits which exist in Fernie and the Crowsnest area.

Why are the people of Kootenay West concerned? I do not think there are many senior members in this House, along with the people of my riding, who will have forgotten the Columbia River sellout, the Kootenay Canal with which we are now faced, the Kootenay dams, the Libby Dam with which we have been cursed, and the massive effect on the environment at Kootenay Lake and the Pend d'Orielle River. What is the reaction of the people in my riding to that of playing waterboy to the North American continent? I think it is viewed as a threat to the people that they will be blessed with another damned dam. They have had dams up to their necks.

What are these people doing about the situation? Let us look at the record of B.C. hydro and its proposal to put a dam on the Pend d'Orielle River. The people of Trail and Fruitvale and the surrounding area were sufficiently sensible to do their homework, and they succeeded in bringing that project to a halt until proper studies had been completed on the environmental, hydro electric needs, the end results and so on. I can assure you that the concerns of the people will still be directed in that way, whether it involves hydro electricity or coal.

When the minister addresses himself to a national energy policy I frankly do not know whether he speaks of an oil and gas policy or a truly national energy policy, and I am not sure what are the parameters of such a policy. I do not think anyone knows, except perhaps the minister.

This bill we have before us does not in fact speak for Canada but speaks for an arrogant, self-centred and dictatorial administration. For the record let me again quote from Section 109 of the British North America Act. It states:

Oil and Petroleum

All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the Union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situated or arise—

As the last speaker said, it is true that they were dealing at that time with a time frame far removed from the present, but that does not remove the responsibility on the part of the government to sit down with the provincial first ministers and do some real hard heart to heart talking. That does not preclude the necessity of some real hard bargaining. It is not good enough to say that a particular first minister will not agree. This all requires further dialogue rather than that type of confrontation.

What are the first ministers' responses now, and what will they do in future as our national policy expands so that we get into considerations of hydro electric generation, coal and thermo nuclear generation? These things are all covered under the general term energy, and this will affect all the provinces. The federal government will be involved, but the question is how, and under what terms?

Clause 36 of this bill is one that I think will give the first ministers of the provinces a future migraine headache. This bill represents a major precedent to the next step. I suggest that the next step, apart from laying the groundwork for policy in areas of energy source, will also lay the groundwork for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he entertains the government and the people with his forthcoming budget address. What will he do? The odds are that he will also move into the energy and natural resource fields with future taxation which will bring into effect, again by direct confrontation with the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, the whole question of resource taxation. I suggest the groundwork for that taxation is right here in this energy bill.

One might ask why I should be concerned about this and why the people of my riding should be concerned. I am concerned because of the vast resource of minerals in the riding of Kootenay West and the riding of Okanagan Kootenay, and because of the massive taxation that has already been introduced by a shortsighted provincial government. Reference has been made during the debate on this bill to a passage by Mr. Laskin. I think it deserves repeating at this time:

The respective taxing powers of dominion and provinces may not be used by either of them to sterilize powers conferred by the other upon its functionaries or substantially to impair their status.

My concern is not with the finer technical points or the major economic points to which experienced gentlemen have referred. My concerns are the concerns of the people of my riding whom I represent. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

URBAN AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY IN RESPECT OF GREEN SPACES IN CITIES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on October 7 I directed a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) regarding something which had arisen on a television program, namely, a theory he advanced in the course of "Question Period", that the government certainly would have to consider the adoption of a trade-off in respect of green spaces in Canadian cities.

At that time this indicated that the minister was at least considering the intrusion of development into green spaces. Subsequently the minister, in the course of his answer, indicated that at least in so far as the two places I had mentioned in the National Capital Area, namely, the Experimental Farm and the Ottawa green belt, he regarded these as areas of special sensitivity, and shared my view and the view of many other members of the House in respect of the necessity to preserve them.

I want to say that where we are dealing with the National Capital Area, which is certainly an area of special sensitivity, or with any other urban area in this country, we must regard, and government policy must look at green space in urban areas as a very precious commodity. It is becoming more precious each day as there is a tendency in our society, and in the planning of our society, to pack more and more people on to fewer and fewer acres of land.

Municipal development is becoming vertical rather than horizontal. Indeed we must consider the impact that this type of development will have on open space, a particularly agricultural land. The green belt and the Experimental Farm in the National Capital Area are precious for the reasons I have mentioned.

I do not want the minister or the government to feel that I regard those areas as sterile, or believe that they ought to remain dormant or fallow. I feel, however, that there are certain institutional uses to which these lands could be put.

I want to make clear that we regard the trade-off in respect of the Experimental Farm, the green belt or any other area in an urban part of Canada as a principle we would have to approach with great caution in order to ensure that there is open space available. There really is no open or green space available to those who live in high-rise housing, row housing, in condominiums, or in densely populated areas. That green and open space which normally is provided by one's backyard, or by the neighbourhood park, must be provided in those urban areas by green belt areas such as the Experimental Farm, or by other areas in other cities.

This matter is of great concern not only to the National Capital Area but to other areas. I hope the parliamentary secretary tonight will give us some assurance in respect of the policy of the government on the matter of green space in urban areas.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that the National Capital Commission is fully aware of the matter which he has raised, namely that we must preserve the green spaces of this area.

I can assure the hon. member that there is no question of replacing the green spaces already existing in the national capital region with buildings. On the contrary, proposals are presently under study in order to link these green spaces together and to have them penetrate further into the urban area, so that they are not isolated and remote. This approach might require an increase, and certainly not a decrease of green spaces and an adjustment of the limits of the spaces already existing.

As I said, some adjustments might be necessary at certain times, which means that parts of existing open spaces could be traded against new ones in order to achieve a better integration. But I can tell the hon. member that both quantitatively and qualitatively, green spaces are going to increase in the capital region.

I also wish to remind the hon. member that the NCC will very soon make public its planning concept for the whole region. This document, along with the proposals it will contain, will be studied by a joint special committee of the Senate and the House of Commons and of course members will have the opportunity to express their views. The long-term preservation of these resources must be ensured, and at the same time the public must have access to them, without spoiling or wasting them. The achievement of this objective implies the cohabitation of certain urban and rural environments. A typical example of this is, of course, the Experimental Farm in the centre of the city of Ottawa.

HOUSING—SUGGESTED MEASURES BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION TO CONTROL IRREGULARITIES BY OTHER AGENCIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I directed a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs on a very important problem in my constituency, namely real estate speculation and speculation activities on the part of provincial companies, that have led me to believe during the last few months that such behaviour left much to be desired. For the sake of my electorate, I sent letters and I followed the matter very closely. I have come to the conclusion that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not watching its expenditures closely enough whenever it guarantees or grants loans to provinces, which then use the money for public housing.

What prompted me, Mr. Speaker, to examine thoroughly the whole matter of public housing in my constituency of Ottawa-Vanier is that certain transactions show either a lack of qualification or of interest on the part of certain public servants whenever public interest and especially consumers' protection are concerned. I know that in the province of Ontario, proceedings are being instituted with the Ontario Housing Corporation and members will recall that I quoted the article from last Thursday's edition of Le Droit, saying that 15 officials have been indicted for receiving bribes and for collusion with contractors. According to that article, 9 other persons in the Ottawa or London area are likely to be indicted very soon.

When real estate speculation is practiced to the detriment of the interest of the community and in some collusion with provincial agencies, I think that speculation is unacceptable, and smacks more of theft than business. Indeed, that is exactly what is happening in my riding. That was the purpose of the question I put to the minister regarding certain transactions that benefited certain contractors. They made profits of about 155 per cent in an eight-month period. I have here a copy of the land register for a sale of $105,000 which, eight months later, increased to $273,000 for a piece of land on which a high rise for senior citizens was to be built.

I also know that the City of Vanier can buy land in my riding. In that city of one square mile land sells for $5 a square foot. I also know that the Ontario Housing Corporation pays $10 a square foot. I noted several cases of profiteering in my opinion and I asked the mayors of both municipalities of Ottawa and Vanier as well as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Ontario Housing Corporation for a list of real estate transactions made in the last three years.

I did that because the experience I gained as a school trustee gave me a certain knowledge of the price of land in my riding. At that time I did learn of lots which were bought by certain contractors at a price which, personally, I find quite scandalous.

I remember, in particular, a piece of land located not too far from the Cartier school, a composite school, which was for sale for some $35,000 and that the school board has refused to buy because they said it was too expensive; it was sold and sold again to someone else and finally, within eight months, it went for $273,000. That is the kind of speculation that makes me think that it is not only there that funny things are happening.

And what annoys me is that the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, the lender, is not necessarily an accomplice but controls are lacking; that is why I asked the minister here if he uses his powers of control over real estate expenditures made by the housing corporations and I am not under the impression that this is presently done in a routine way. I am under the strong impression, though, that as with all federal-provincial agreements, the federal government is paying the piper and the province is playing the tune.

However, in my riding, as in several others in Canada, there is now a housing crisis. I find the situation is tragic because, speaking in quantities, if land is bought for twice what it is worth and high-rise buildings are built where they have no business being built, only half of the housing will be produced.

And if the reasoning is simplistic, I think that money being what it is today, expensive and hard to come by, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should proceed with all the necessary caution and see to it that it can control its expenditures.

Within the shortest delay, federal government supervision over the use of funds made available to the provinces must be made more strict. The federal government must act to protect the common good rather than to favour all-out business. And to complete my question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the minister if he can give me the assurance that account will be taken of my remarks by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If you wish it, I can give further proof in support of my allegations.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) will be extremely interested by this information.

However, I would like to remind him that since 1968, Ontario, through the Ontario Housing Corporation completed its low rental housing projects under the National Housing Act with the help of federal government loans. Consequently, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation acts as a lender in its capacity of federal agency concerned. Previously, the federal and provincial governments were associated in these projects which were financed under another section of the National Housing Act.

According to the provision concerning loans (section 43 of the National Housing Act), the Ontario Housing Corporation is responsible for the planning of projects, for land banking and calls for tender or proposals.

As a lender, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation reviews on an individual basis applications for loans relating to those projects in order to ensure that they meet the criteria as well as the standards of programs.

As far as the land is concerned, the loan application made by the Ontario Housing Corporation in respect of every project indicates how much it has to pay for the land as well as the name of the seller. The application also includes an estimate of the land value made by an independent assessor. As part of its study, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation requests from its assessors an estimate of the value of the land to determine the amount of the loan. Therefore, in addition to the amount paid by the Ontario Housing Corporation, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation makes its own estimate in order to determine the amount of the federal government's loan. That amount is based partly on the value of the land as determined by the assessor, and not only on the amount paid by the Ontario Housing Corporation.

Under those circumstances, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has neither any reason nor any opportunity to learn the details of the transactions that have been carried out in respect of the land chosen for a project of the Ontario Housing Corporation.

However, no one of course is perfect, everyone may be misinformed, and as I said at the beginning of my remarks, the hon. member can be assured that if he will submit us some information concerning the pieces of land acquired by the Ontario Housing Corporation which in his opinion might justify further enquiry, I have no doubt that the minister would like the hon. member to impart the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with that information.

PUBLIC SERVICE—APPOINTMENT OF MICHAEL PITFIELD—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN CRITERIA FOR MAKING APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on October 8 I raised a question with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I asked if he would make a statement on motions outlining the principles which were now to be followed for appointments to the senior public service. I drew particular reference to Mr. Michael Pitfield, and asked the Prime Minister to indicate whether that appointment suggested a replacement of the merit system by the buddy system.

The Prime Minister ducked that question, and instead attacked my right as a member of parliament to ask about the appointment and credentials of an official who now has more influence than most members of cabinet, and whose only unusual qualification for that office appears to be his personal friendship with the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister indicated that an appointment at that level was at the discretion of the government. Of course it is, but it is the duty of this parliament and the members here to question the judgment that is used in exercising that discretion. That is a matter of concern not only to this House, but to people outside, including the Ottawa Journal, which wrote shortly afterwards, and I quote:

> Prime Minister Trudeau ... has shown remarkably bad judgment in choosing an intimate friend for a position so exquisitively sensitive. ... A Prime Minister needs to have friends and advisers around him whom he can trust completely, who will give him their first call on their loyalty. But the place for them is on his own staff, not in the public service.

That appointment started a precedent. It is inevitable that when the present Prime Minister leaves, so will Mr. Pitfield. Some other favourite of some other Prime Minister will come in. The senior job in the Canadian Public Service has, by this one act, been made a partisan political position. That act has changed our system of government and, in one stroke, threatened the political independence of the Canadian public service.

Mr. Pitfield's appointment is the most celebrated case, but it is not an isolated instance. That is the matter which is of grave concern to this House. His appointment is part of a pattern of moving political friends into a public service which can be respected and effective only so long as it is free from the suspicion of partisanship. Not only in this last month have we had the appointment of Mr. Pitfield to his high position, we have also had the appointment of Mr. Jim Davey, late of the Prime Minister's office and late of the Minister of Transport's office, to a senior public service position in the Department of Transport. We have seen the Hon. Paul Martin dispatched as High Commissioner to Great Britain. These people now enter the public service to join others like Timothy Porteous, Edgar Benson, Mike McCabe, Paul Gérin-Lajoie, and who knows how many others.

It is known to this House and accepted that for some time there has been a provision allowing the shifting into the public service of people who have served, in the senior executive capacity, political ministers and others. Because of the salary level at which these people shift, they inevitably go into the public service in a policy position.

I placed a question on the order paper to find out how many of these people there are in the public service and what areas of policy they influence. I did this because I think it is highly important to the system.

The practice poses three critical threats to our system. First, it destroys the balance which is so essential between the elected politicians and the appointed public servants. At the same time it threatens and jeopardizes the long range independence of the Canadian public service.

● (2220)

The second threat arises because it undermines morale in the service itself. It removes the incentive to excel. Indeed, it fosters an incentive simply to please one's master because excellence is no longer the standard which determines promotion; it is friendship which is now becoming the standard by which promotion is achieved.

The third threat is that it narrows the basis of advice on which national decisions are made. This is a diverse country, and the government should reflect that diversity. But it will not do so if the public service is to be formed in the image of a partisan prime minister.

I asked the Prime Minister to tell us the guidelines to be followed in making that kind of appointment. He has given us no guidelines. I also put a private member's notice of motion on the order paper in an effort to ensure parliamentary scrutiny of the growing powers of the office of the Prime Minister, which appear to be at the root of the problem we face today. What we must consider is not just a question of Mr. Pitfield's credentials; he is obviously a brilliant person, an able man. Nor is it a question of stopping patronage, which has been going on for ever and ever.

The Prime Minister, by this action, by this pattern he has established, is changing the very nature of the Canadian public service and the very nature of our system of government. He is bypassing merit, undermining morale, compromising an essential independence, and eroding the protection of regions or groups whose interests are not represented by the political government of the day. It is regrettable that the Prime Minister should have indicated, in putting aside this question, that he wants no attention paid to the process that is taking place. It is not too much to say that he is achieving by stealth changes of more significance and more permanence in our system than a change of government could bring about.

I believe this is an urgent question for the House to consider both in relation to appointments to senior levels of the public service and to the growing power of the Prime Minister, and I hope the answer from the parliamentary secretary will allow us at least to begin the process of examining the way in which our system is being changed.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly one of the shabbiest attacks I have had the opportunity to witness since I have been here in this House.

The hon. member who must certainly have at least one ounce of honesty, recognized that Mr. Michael Pitfield is, and I quote, "able and brilliant". Then what is he blaming Michael Pitfield for? I think he did not have the chance I had to work with Mr. Pitfield. For several months, I worked with him when he was deputy minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. May I say to the hon. member that I seldom met a man so much sensible to the performance of his duties, to the opinion of members of parliament and to the wishes of his minister and who did his duty in a way which, I believe, enhanced the prestige of his position. May I remind him that before leaving that position he had been Planning Director of the Prime Minister's Office. He has served as public servant for many years and I think it is utmost shabby to attack in such a contemptible way one of the most competent officials in the Public Service.

Does the hon. member mean that he is a supporter of the so-called in-breeding—it is done in External Affairs—and that public servants should be hired at 25 years of age after university graduation. I feel that it is quite retrograde. He only has to consider private enterprise. Every day, people outside are sought to bring in some fresh blood.

If I had to give my own view, I would say to him that it is unfortunate that it is not done more often in Ottawa. The establishment, and many studies have been made on that issue, exerts too much influence and one of the reasons is that there are not enough competent people from outside coming into public service at higher levels.

Even if the hon. member continues to tarnish the reputations of individuals such as the above-mentioned, without questioning their competence, let him do so! Does the hon. member suggest that the Hon. Paul Martin will not ably discharge his duties? If he thinks so, let him say it frankly. If he thinks that Mr. Paul Gérin-Lajoie does not ably manage the Canadian International Development Agency, let him say so—or Mr. Jim Davey!

Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, I think that the charges of the hon. member are shabby and completely unwarranted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

FISHERIES

STRIKE AT TRANSCONA PLANT OF FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the commercial fishing season in northern Manitoba opened on November 1, and in view of the fact that fish will be shipped to the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation at Transcona the employees of which are now on strike and that this emergency situation is effecting the total collapse of the commercial fishery in Manitoba, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That the Minister of State (Fisheries) take immediate and necessary steps to have this strike resolved.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CHARGES AGAINST IMMIGRATION OFFICERS BY HAITIAN FEMALES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the recent controversy regarding the deportation of Haitian citizens from Canada and the imminent dangers these people now face, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond:

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration be instructed by this House to report to parliament immediately on the progress of the judicial inquiry instituted by the minister a year ago into charges made by Haitian female immigrants about the immoral and despicable practices of certain immigration officials in Montreal.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion. Once again I have some doubt about the urgency and pressing necessity of the matter, however, there does appear to be some element of that and I try wherever possible to resolve the issue in favour of the proponent of the motion in view of the fact that the motion requires unanimous consent pursuant to Standing Order 43. Under those circumstances, the House having heard the motion, is there unanimous consent that it be debated at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent it cannot be accepted.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of extremely urgent and pressing necessity.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the government take immediate steps to investigate the supply sources of food liners and meat importers, the monopoly control of prices, the prices of feed grains, in short, all aspects of a situation which has nothing to cheer Canadian consumers up.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The house has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED NEED FOR MEASURES TO STIMULATE FOREST INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I take the opportunity provided under Standing Order 43 to propose a motion in respect to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity on behalf of the lumber industry in Canada.

As a result of economic measures applied by our traditional offshore trading partners in their fight against inflation, and as a result of the very inhospitable climate under which the construction industry must operate in our own country, due to high interest rates and monstrous costs of serviced land, the forest and lumber industry, one of the pillars of our country's economic stability, finds itself without a margin on which to base a viable operation. In view of the massive layoffs this has caused throughout our country, and due to the fact that many plants are shut down totally causing irreparable damage to dozens of small single industries and municipalities throughout Canada, I move, and this is seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West:

That this House instruct the government, and particularly the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to bring immediately before us measures designed to prevent a total collapse of the lumber and forest industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous agreement?

FINANCE

TAX CUTS ON CLOTHING—ASSURANCE CONSUMERS RECEIVING BENEFIT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would pose a question to the Minister of Finance who said yesterday he had received an assurance from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that in all cases clothing outlets are reflecting the removal of the sales tax on clothing. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that he is simply conducting a pilot study and thorough monitoring was not started until this week, I should like to ask the minister whether he stands by his statement that he received such an assurance from the minister, or whether perhaps his memory was faulty on that occasion?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my memory is not perfect in every case as the hon. gentleman knows, but what I thought I said yesterday was I have assurance from my colleague that he would be monitoring the area against which the sales tax reductions had been effected to see whether those sales tax reductions had in fact been passed on to the consumer. That is what I thought my undertaking to the hon. gentleman was yesterday.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. I asked the minister whether he had received the assurance that the minister has in fact been monitoring what has been going on, and that in all cases the prices reflect these tax cuts. I understood the minister yesterday to say he had not received any such assurance and then in reading Hansard today I find he said he had received such assurance. In view of a subsequent statement by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I find this difficult to accept. I therefore ask the Minister of Finance whether he in fact had received the assurance from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that yesterday he said he had received.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What I said was that I had received assurance from my colleague that the monitoring would be done. I have not yet received the results so I cannot give the hon. gentleman any clarification at the moment concerning whether the sales tax reductions had been passed on to the consumer. That will depend on the report I receive from my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. I do not wish to pursue this at great length, but the minister said he had an assurance which in fact he did not have.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not what I said.

Mr. Stanfield: I think the minister should read the question. Perhaps his trouble is that he does not pay as much attention as he should to what I say.

Some hon. Members: Hear! Hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether the attitude indicated yesterday by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate that it really did not make any difference when the irregularities were discovered, whether now or in several weeks time, meets the requirement laid down by the Minister of Finance in his budget which is that he would see that the consumer receives the benefit of these tax cuts. Has the Minister of Finance any way to assure us that failure to pass on the tax discovered in a few weeks or in a few months time would in fact benefit an anonymous customer who did not get the benefit of the tax cuts.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do want to be assured that the tax cuts are passed on to the Canadian consumer. This is the reason I asked my colleague to monitor those cuts to see what the result is. When those results are presented to him and to me I am sure the House will want to be aware of those results. I again want to say to the hon. gentleman that I do take very seriously what he says and perhaps more seriously than the Canadian people did in the last election.

REFUGEE STATUS OF HAITIANS—ALLEGATION BY UNITED NATIONS CANADA VIOLATED PROTOCOL ON POLITICAL REFUGEES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the serious decision reached by the United Nations High Commission on Refugees to study the possibility of Canada having violated the United Nations convention on political refugees, would the minister inform the House of the precise steps taken by his department to ensure that no Haitians who might suffer political retribution if they return to Haiti are in fact sent back.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not accept the preamble to the question.

Mr. Woolliams: No one accepts his preamble.

Mr. Andras: That is quite correct and probably quite wisely so, Mr. Speaker. The report by the news media of the statement by the Canadian representative of the United Nations High Commissioner is rather vague and a generalization.

I will be meeting with him very shortly. In the meantime I can only repeat what I have already said, that we are adhering to the principles of the statement contained in the United Nations protocol regarding refugees.

● (1420)

Any person who claims refugee status while in this country, whether here illegally or not, has his or her case reviewed on its merit in two ways, the first by reference to an interdepartmental committee on refugees, which includes as an adviser the U.N. commission for refugees' representative, and if that committee decides that the case has merit and the person is in fact a refugee for the reasons contained in the protocol, then that is the end of it and the person is landed. If, however, that committee decides that the case does not have merit under the terms of the protocol, then that person is denied refugee status but he or she then has the opportunity to make an appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board which has full jurisdiction to review this case as an independent judicial body.

HAITIANS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF THOSE ORDERED DEPORTED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Considering that the statement quoted in the press is not at all imprecise but very specific—I refer to the statement attributed to Mr. J. B. Lactot, U.N. representative of the refugee commission—and that he is quoted as having said "perhaps some of them should not have been" in reference to those who have been sent back, this sounds precise. In other words, he is making a judgment about those who have been sent back and, as he is quoted, he thinks a number should not have been so dealt with. I should like to ask, in view of the very serious consequences that might befall these people in their own country, whether the minister could undertake an investigation simply of those who have been ordered deported in recent weeks to ensure that none of his officials have made the wrong kind of decision in this regard.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): That decision is not made at the second level by my officials—these are not my officials. The Immigration Appeal Board was set up by this parliament as an independent body with its own jurisdiction and authority to deal with these matters. These appeal cases have been reviewed by the board members who have decided in their wisdom that some of these people are in fact not refugees. I would remind the House also that it was the decision of this parliament that economic hardship is not a criterion for determining refugee status. I would point out that even the person whom the hon. member quoted used the word "perhaps", and so, until I have spoken to the representative, and I am doing that very shortly, I cannot agree with the hon. member that the press report, or his version of the press report is in fact precise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

HAITIANS—POSSIBILITY SMALL PERCENTAGE GIVEN REFUGEE STATUS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): My last supplementary question is with regard to a statement by one of the minister's own officials who is quoted in the same article as having said that only 20 per cent of those under consideration will probably be given refugee status in Canada. Can the minister inform the House on what the 20 per cent figure was based? Have they reviewed all those who will be sent back or was this an arbitrarily reached figure?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will have to examine where the 20 per cent figure came from and also examine the statement, but could quite easily be in reference to those cases which have been examined in the first stage, that is by the interdepartmental committee on refugees which does not have the final say in this matter.

CONSEQUENCES OF DEPORTATION OF HAITIANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): If the minister would listen, I have something to ask him.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my question is more or less supplementary to that of the leader of the New Democratic Party.

The day before yesterday, as I was listening to a morning CKVL program originating from Montreal, I heard two priests, a Holy Ghost father and an Haitian priest, clearly indicate that some Haitians will be accused and shot without further ado the moment they arrive in their homeland.

Does the department concerned verify the discussions between the Quebec government and the Haitians who have been ordered deported as soon as possible? Has the minister directed his officials to delay the execution of the deportation orders as long as it has not been ascertained, for humanitarian reasons, that the lives of those people will not be endangered?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the situation as described by the hon. member, of the possibility of prosecution upon return to their homes for reasons of political or other activities, is exactly the kind of information and exactly the kind of circumstances that are investigated. At both or either levels of examination, that is the interdepartmental committee and the Immigration Appeal Board, if it is established that the claim on those grounds is valid, they are not deported. With regard to the other part of the question, people who have claimed refugee status, by virtue of the claim alone and no other action on their part, are entitled to be examined in the manner I have already described. Until the result of that examination is known, and a decision taken with regard to the refugee claim, no action is taken on the question of deportation.

[Mr. Andras.]

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

There is no doubt that some Haitians have already signed a form indicating that they were coming here for educational purposes and that they would go back to their country later on. If, after doing so, those people are threatened with death or an unfair trial, does the department take into consideration the eventuality of their being ill-treated once there, and will it take appropriate action in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent upon the person seeking refugee status to claim it. As I have indicated already, in every case where that claim is made it is investigated and no deportation is made until the validity or otherwise of the claim is established.

INQUIRY

FRESHWATER FISHERY—SUGGESTED ISSUANCE OF EXPORT PERMIT TO FISHERMEN

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce arises from the strike at the Transcona Freshwater Fish Processing Plant where negotiations are presently taking place. Would the minister consider issuing an export permit to a collective body of fishermen so they might investigate a market for fish elsewhere?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am unfamiliar with the circumstances of the inquiry but I shall look into the matter and give the information to the hon. member.

TRADE

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN IMPORTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COUNTERACT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the volume of imports of fully manufactured products has increased by 12.4 per cent so far this year over the same period a year ago, thereby displacing one-eighth of Canadian production from the Canadian market, would the minister advise the House what he intends to do to arrest this very serious trend which is materially slowing down Canadian production?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have been taking action on many fronts. I think the hon. member might be interested to know that since 1962 the increase in volume of fully manufactured goods has gone up seven times, whereas our other exports have gone up about or over three times. In other words, our increase in fully manufactured goods has been greater than our export increase in other products. We are not satisfied with that and I doubt whether we will ever be satisfied with our exports of fully manufactured products. Through amendments to the Export Development Act, through effective operation of the autopact, through the operation of the Foreign Investment Review Act and through a variety of programs aimed at supporting Canadian fully manufactured goods, we will maintain the present increase.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have expressed some discontent about the rather rambling and speechlike nature of the reply. We have to realize, however, that sometimes the nature of the reply is dictated by the nature of the question.

● (1430)

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to you, I cannot think of a question more important for the manufacturing industry of Canada than the one I just asked. The minister refused to answer any part of my question. I asked about imports and what he is going to do to stop the displacement of one-eighth of Canadian production in the Canadian market. The minister dealt completely with exports. I point out that, with an attitude like that on the part of the government, it is no wonder that exports are falling and imports increasing?

Mr. Whiteway: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think it important to remind the hon. member that we are a trading nation and we import as well as export. We have a favourable trade balance on merchandise account. Roughly one-half of manufactured goods produced in Canada are exported.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I had a supplementary question for the minister. Out of courtesy I allowed him to speak and then rose on a point of order, but Your Honour did not recognize me.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member no doubt will realize that in answer to his question the minister indicated that he would review all the circumstances, investigate, obtain information and report at a later time. There is always discretion in the Chair as to whether a supplementary question ought to be allowed. In the circumstances, I have decided that as the minister has undertaken to gather information in response to a question and report back at a later time and as, undoubtedly, the hon. member will want to ask further supplementary questions at that subsequent time when the minister reports to the House, I do not think it is fair to permit the hon. member doing the original questioning to ask supplementary questions both at the present time and at that later time.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I too, rise on a point of order. It is this: As so often happens, the minister has tried to mislead the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: I said he tried. I did not say it was deliberate; I said he tried.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the minister said that the government at present had a favourable balance of trade. That is absolutely untrue. At this very moment this country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is evident that the hon. member is trying to establish a point of order; perhaps the minister has tried to mislead the House, but I am not sure that either one has really succeeded. I think we ought to get on.

Mr. Hees: If the minister gets up I will really have something to say.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I submit that the hon. member has succeeded in misleading the House in that he misquoted me by saying I had said there was a favourable trade balance. I said we have a favourable balance on merchandise account, and that is true.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

USE OF SEAGRAMS JET BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister indicate if he is aware that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is now on an official visit to Israel, having accepted passage to that country on a distillery jet owned by Seagrams, Canada's largest manufacturer of alcoholic products. If so, can the Prime Minister indicate why the minister chose to use the distillers' jet?

An hon. Member: Is it going to get there?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know, but if I were to be flip I might say perhaps it was an attempt to save fuel. I was not aware of this until I learned of it this morning. I was aware, of course, that the minister had been invited to Israel by the Israeli government and that the Israeli ambassador had arranged transportation on this particular aircraft. I take it the hon. member knows of no better way of having a minister accept an invitation than by doing it in a way the inviting government proposes.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Minister of National Health and Welfare's much publicized attack on beer advertising made in a speech in this city last September when he asked, "Why should beer be advertised in the broadcast media when liquor advertisements are not allowed," does the Prime Minister believe there is no possible conflict of interest in the minister's accepting this hand-out, bearing in mind that while Seagrams are our biggest distillers, they have no Canadian beer interest, the brewing industry being in fact their biggest competitor.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to say there is no conflict of interest. Perhaps, if it will satisfy the hon. member, I will have the minister invited to Egypt and he can fly in Molson's plane on the next trip.

GRAIN

POSSIBLE REPEAL OR AMENDMENT OF CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the minister's answer given in this House on October 29, in response to a question by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar to the effect that any changes in the Crowsnest Pass freight rates in the months and years ahead will require legislation in this House, can the minister advise the House whether the government intends during the present session either to repeal or amend the Crowsnest Pass freight rates.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention on the part of the government to introduce such legislation in the present session.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

SUGGESTED DISCLOSURE OF ASSETS BY MINISTERS—ADEQUACY OF BLIND TRUST PROVISION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is the right hon. gentleman seriously reviewing guidelines on conflict of interest for himself and his fellow ministers, as outlined in the green paper on conflict of interest, and will he now insist that all ministers, together with himself, make full and complete disclosure before the Clerk of this House on both their own and their family's assets and liabilities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, guidelines for ministers were enunciated before the House last year and I do not recall the particular suggestion of the hon. member being made at that time in response to my statement. However, I would remind the hon. member that guidelines have been put forward for members of parliament. They have been suggested to parliament by the government and they are to be examined at leisure by a parliamentary committee. If this examination takes place, the government will be prepared to implement such legislation and it is just possible that if the suggestion of the hon. member has merit, it will be adopted by his colleagues and included in the law, in which case it will apply to ministers.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not feel that conflict of interest is more a House of Commons affair than one for officials of the Privy Council, and does he seriously believe that blind trusts, as outlined in the green paper on conflict of interest, constitute the kind of declaration which will seriously satisfy the people of Canada?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The answer has been given. A House of Commons committee will consider this matter. I do not think that was a proper question.

SCIENCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASED SUPPORT FOR RESEARCH IN UNIVERSITIES—POSSIBILITY OF MAKING A COST STUDY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of claims of Canadian scientists that the growth rate of National Research Council spending on university research in the past half dozen years has been only a fraction of that applying to similar programs in countries like the United States, Great Britain and France, countries which support their scientists, is the minister, together with his officials, considering a re-evaluation of support for scientific research in Canadian universities.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that this particular matter requires reviewing. Indeed, it should be viewed against the perspective of substantial increases in research funds granted in aid of universities and researchers in the late 1960's. At that time it was agreed government policy to devote additional funds which could be made available for research in areas which, on an international comparative basis, we appeared to be lagging. I am thinking of research outside of government and outside of universities, namely, in industry. The thrust of the government in assigning funds in this period has been devoted largely to increasing and improving research in industry; research in aid of education within universities has been held more or less stable. As a consequence, however, of rising prices and the effects of inflation, the sums dedicated to university research should be augmented.

● (1440)

Mr. Orlikow: Bearing in mind the claims of research scientists that the cost of research has risen substantially and that the increases granted in recent years have not, therefore, led to an increase in research activity—on the contrary, there has actually been a decrease—and that this situation has made it particularly difficult to offer opportunities to younger scientists entering the field, would the government undertake to study the actual cost of carrying out research work with a view to ensuring that the level can at least be held somewhat near that of 1968 or 1969?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I rise because I have been attempting to catch your eye in order to address a supplementary to the Prime Minister. I was greatly disturbed by the Prime Minister's flippant answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question of whether or not a further supplementary ought to be allowed is entirely within the discretion of the Chair, which is guided by the nature of the subject and the answer or answers given up to that point. While I may never satisfy all hon. members,

I have to bear in mind not only the importance of the subject but the desirability of getting round to as many other hon. members as possible. As I say, individual members may never be entirely happy about the way in which this discretion is exercised, but the Chair must decide and it can never, in my view, constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Stevens: My question of privilege is that I put this serious question to the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Some hon. Members: Order!

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED BIAS ON SUBJECT OF ABORTION—SUGGESTION ALLIANCE FOR LIFE GROUP BE INVITED TO APPEAR ON NETWORK

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): A question to the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. According to information given to me Dr. Henry Morgenthaler and the prohibitionists—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roy (Timmins): —and the pro-abortionists have had many opportunities to appear on CBC while the Alliance for Life group has been refused the same opportunity. Will the minister assure us that the policy of the CBC is not to promote abortion and will he see to it that a proper balance is re-established by ensuring the Alliance for Life group an opportunity to appear on the network?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am perfectly satisfied that the corporation has no particular bias on this subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Faulkner: However, I will make sure that the hon. member's representation is made known to the corporation.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED POOR SERVICE IN CALGARY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. In Calgary, a couple of weeks ago, the Postmaster General indicated that the mail service in that city had improved immensely and that the rating had gone up from a figure of 30 to 80, almost the highest rating possible. In the light of a recent mail test in Calgary which showed that approximately 80 per cent of the first class mail was delivered late and that 6 per cent of the mail was not delivered at all—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bawden: —though posted in the "guaranteed mail" boxes, will the minister explain this post office rating and tell us when this disastrous mess will be cleaned up?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): The hon. member conveniently failed to tell us who made the test and how many letters were included? I understand it was a newspaper and I think the conclusions were based on 20 letters mailed in Calgary. I would suggest that the hon. member, who comes from Calgary, should show a little more basic confidence in the ability of the employees in Calgary to do their jobs properly.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING BY POST OFFICE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): My supplementary is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the farce being perpetrated at the expense of the Canadian people by this misleading advertizing in the Post Office, will the minister tell us why he is not prepared to step in and end this dishonesty?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I think the remarks made by the hon. member have been particularly disproved by the Postmaster General, and I do not attach more importance to his second question than to his first one.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO STUDY FULLERTON REPORT—SUGGESTED CONSULTATION ON TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister with respect to the Fullerton Report which was released to members of the House yesterday and to the press on Friday. Could the Prime Minister tell us when a joint committee of this House and of the Senate will be asked to study the report and whether it will be given a mandate to ensure that the process of consultation between all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal, will be followed to the maximum degree, and, particularly, whether there will be consultation with the provinces, the regions and the local municipalities with respect to terms of reference of that committee so that all these interests can be represented during the course of the consideration given to this subject?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): According to my information there must have been a mistake in the preamble to the question. I am informed that copies were distributed to the members yesterday and that the press conference took place later in the afternoon, not earlier, as

I believe the question implied. As far as the setting up of the committee is concerned, the House leader did discuss this matter with me yesterday, indicating that such a committee would be set up later this month. He will be discussing its terms of reference with the representatives of the other parties in the usual way.

METHOD OF ARRIVING AT DECISION ON FUTURE STRUCTURE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With respect to the opening remarks of the right hon. gentleman may I say it is he who is misinformed as to the date of distribution. Be that as it may, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that the report recommends various changes which would have a definite impact on residents of the national capital region affecting, as they do, the power to tax, the power to plan, to educate, the administration of justice, representation by population, the language question and a host of other things, would the minister indicate how the final decision will be taken with regard to the future structure of the national capital?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I appreciate the brief resumé of the report given by the hon. member, which is a help indeed since it indicates the breadth of its scope. Obviously, this is a question which the committee will itself take into serious consideration while it is preparing various options for study by members of this House and of the other place.

AGRICULTURE

DESTRUCTION OF CANADIAN EGGS WHILE IMPORTS ALLOWED FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I wish to put a question to his parliamentary secretary.

According to Statistics Canada, 41 million eggs were imported from the United States last spring and 2,160,000 more are reported to have entered our country this week. Can the parliamentary secretary tell the House why American eggs are being brought out on our market while Canadian eggs are being destroyed in our warehouses?

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member that a commission has now been appointed to study egg marketing in Canada. I feel it would be very difficult to intervene before the report of that commission has been published.

IMMIGRATION

CONSEQUENCES OF DEPORTATION OF HAITIANS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister and Immigration, following the answers he gave today. My question relates to the deportation of Haitians.

In view of the fact that, according to a Geneva commission, the Duvalier regime is responsible for the death of 30,000 people over a period of 17 years and that a Haitian repressive legislation against communists includes all the people who are opposed to the regime, such as Karl Lévesque, a Jésuite priest, and all the officials of the Haitian Christian Community in Montreal, can the minister tell this House on what basis he can ascertain that a Haitian will not be considered as a suspect on his arrival in Port-au-Prince?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is the subject matter of a very elaborate, fair and just examination procedure which has been set up under Canadian law and which I might say is almost unprecedented throughout the world in its attention to this kind of situation, which deals with the application of an individual for refugee status on the basis either that he will face persecution on grounds similar to those mentioned in the representation of the hon. member, in which case he has a legitimate claim, or that he will suffer only economic hardship, in which case his claim is not valid.

The United Nations protocol quite clearly distinguishes between persecution on the grounds outlined in the protocol, and suffering economic hardship. The communications I have had from the United Nations high commissioner's representative in Geneva clearly indicates agreement that there has to be some mechanism by which you distinguish between persecution as outlined in the protocol and economic difficulty when a person makes an application.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I am sorry to see that the minister does not seem to have understood the full significance of this first question. I will therefore ask a similar one as a supplementary.

In view of the fact that, at the present time, between 850 and 1,500 Haitians are about to get a taste of the government's sense of social justice and humanism, is the minister waiting, before he changes his attitude, for someone to commit suicide in public, as was the case with Turenne Devil on February 14, 1974, in Miami, which induced the American government to stop all deportations to Haiti?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, where it is established that a person is in danger of persecution under the terms of the protocol, the interdepartmental committee on refugees would so determine and that person would be landed and not deported. If, however, that departmental committee does not so decide, the individual in question may still have access to an appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board. But it has to be clearly understood, I think, that not all people from Haiti, or all people from any other country who come to Canada and claim refugee status, are in fact entitled to do it under the terms of the United Nations protocol to which we are signatories.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask the minister when we might expect the inquiry commission report on Pickering airport which was concluded in June?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember having said or anybody having said that we were supposed to get the report in June. Perhaps I have misunderstood, but I hope we will have the report in the House before the end of the year.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MARITIMES—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN BUDGET OF DEPARTMENT IN VIEW OF NEEDS OF AREA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the minister's assessment, as quoted in the Globe and Mail yesterday, that $10 billion or $12 billion may be needed for capital development projects in the maritimes region, can the minister indicate whether or not DREE has made or is in process of making projections for an appropriate increase in its budget to look after these needs?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I was not speaking of moneys coming from public sources; I was simply talking about the necessary capital accumulation. So far as DREE is concerned, we have increased our budget annually over the last three or four years and hopefully will continue to do so; but the kind of investment that we are speaking of will have to come from sources in the private sector as well.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, a brief supplementary question. In considering the possibility of increasing the budget of DREE, has the minister indicated, has he thought about the contingency that allowance may have to be made for possible application by his colleague, the Minister of National Defence, for funds to keep this nation's armed forces from going down the drain?

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF COMMENCING NEGOTIATIONS WITH EMPLOYEES IN VIEW OF DECERTIFICATION OF COUNCIL OF POSTAL UNIONS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In view of the difficulties outlined by the hon. member for Calgary South arising from the delicate labour situation in the Post Office following decertification of the Council of Postal Unions by the Public Service Staff Relations Board, an action that automatically terminated their contract and which may delay the commencement of negotiations until late in December, based on his experience in labour negotiations would the minister indicate what action he has taken to determine ways and means of beginning bargaining before new certifications are issued?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, if I was flippant and honest I might say that I would burn a candle when I went to mass on Sunday hoping that everybody will stay on the job. The really important thing is that early in December new bargaining agents will be certified by the Public Service Staff Relations Board, at which time hopefully collective agreement negotiations will begin between the employers—in this case, the Treasury Board—and the newly recognized bargaining agent for the postal workers. The important thing is that in the interval the postal workers do not become demoralized by these constant attacks on their efficiency and remain in place until the due process of the law is followed. Hopefully we will then be able to come up with a collective agreement which is both fair to the taxpayer and fair to the workers.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REFERENCE OF FINKELMAN REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I might comment "how a far little candle throws its beam"; perhaps it will go as far as the President of the Treasury Board. Inasmuch as the Public Service Staff Relations Board issued the decertification, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate to the House when the Finkelman report will be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration so that MP's might have an opportunity to study thoroughly the relationships between government and its employees?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council has already established a committee and the Finkelman report will be studied by a joint committee of the House and the Senate very soon. I am surprised the hon. member was not aware of that.

Oral Questions

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF PERSONAL HEALTH CARE PRODUCTS—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I wonder whether he would advise the House if he has directed an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act to inquire into the evidence of unwarranted price increases in personal and health care products, as promised during the last session?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question. I doubt whether such a promise was made publicly. If the director has reason to believe that the law has been infringed upon, he may ask for an investigation, but such an investigation is always performed in confidence and it is not advisable to make it public before it is completed.

[English]

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister's predecessor the hon. member for Windsor West made a commitment on July 10, 1973 that he would cause an investigation to be made under the jurisdiction of the Combines Investigation Act, would the minister investigate these unwarranted price increases, which are going up almost as fast as food prices, and also the spread in prices between like products? This practice is hurting people who are finding it difficult even to buy food.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, it has been known for a long time that according to practice it is not advisable to make comments before the investigation is deemed to have been completed and I do not think any member of this House would like me to depart from this long established custom.

ENERGY

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON PIPELINE SECURITY—REQUEST NO DECISION TAKEN ON MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE UNTIL COMPLETION OF INQUIRY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Canadian government has begun negotiations with the United States on pipeline security, would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources assure the House that these negotiations deal exclusively with existing Canadian pipelines traversing United States territory and not with the proposed Mackenzie pipeline?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the treaty would cover any pipeline, whether existing or contemplated, crossing the territory of one state carrying oil or natural gas either from overseas or from one part of the other country to another part. The treaty would not be confined to existing pipelines, but it would be a general treaty dealing with this kind of pipeline arrangement now and in the future.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, my question was not related to treaties but to current discussions taking place. Can the minister assure this House that no substantive negotiations with the United States on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline will occur until the special inquiry of Mr. Justice Berger is completed?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I should explain to the hon. gentleman that the negotiations now underway are negotiations leading to a general treaty with regard to protection of pipelines. Having regard to the discussions on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, it is inevitable that in the exchanges we are having about energy relations between Canada and the United States this will be discussed. As the Prime Minister made clear in a statement in December 1973, however, any decisions that may take place in this country will be subject to all appropriate regulatory, and other approvals.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EMPLOYMENT OF RENÉ MANTHA BY FIRM UNDER CIDA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, almost two weeks ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated he would provide the House with a report on all the circumstances regarding the relations of the government of Canada with Mr. René Mantha, with particular reference to any application by Mr. Mantha for a full pardon, and Mr. Mantha's employment in Africa by a company under contract to CIDA. I am wondering whether that report is ready for the House? In order that I might slip in my supplementary question, if it is not ready would the Prime Minister give us an undertaking now to include in that report when it comes, or in a supplement to the report, an indication of the specific nature of any intervention on behalf of Mr. Mantha by Mr. Paul Desrochers or any official of the Quebec Federation of Labour, or by any present or former member of the office staff of the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot recall the question having been answered. Either I was not in the House or perhaps it came while I was in Europe, but I will take note of the question.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): And the supplementary?

Mr. Trudeau: And the supplementary.

PENITENTIARIES

RELEASE OF ROY KULLY FOLLOWING REPEATED OFFENCES—SUGGESTED TIGHTENING OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question involves the case of one of the Solicitor General's inmates originally sentenced in 1965 for the sex strangling death of a five year old girl. This prisoner was let out on a pass to participate in a children's play. At large for 20 days this individual murdered again and was given a second life sentence. Again this dangerous inmate was let out on a pass and recently committed armed robbery and forcible seizure. Can the Solicitor General advise whether Roy D. Kully was let out on repeated passes in accordance with some new regulations or is this another case of tragic negligence on the part of the Solicitor General and his officials?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will look into that case but I must advise the House that under the bill that we passed, the capital punishment bill last year, a convicted murderer is not eligible for a temporary absence pass until two years prior to his eligibility date for parole, which would mean at least eight years. I do not know what the facts of this case are but I will investigate. I do not know how he would be out on a pass.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the case just mentioned, and that cited yesterday by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, in which Montreal police are looking for one Arthur Gagné, a murderer also let out on a pass and is now suspected of participating in a double murder over the weekend, bearing in mind such tragic occurrences, will the minister now advise his officials to tighten up or eliminate procedures whereby passes are so frequently given to those serving life sentences for murder?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I must inform the House that measures have been taken over the last few years to tighten up on the temporary absence pass program. This was a very unfortunate incident which happened in Montreal recently and, as the hon. member knows, the man in question, Mr. Gagné, is a suspect in this case and has not yet been either arrested, charged or found guilty. From what I read in the papers the evidence is just fragmentary. Let me say that in addition to that, under the temporary absence program generally last year we had over 60,000 temporary absence passes with a failure rate of approximately one per cent, which is a very high rate of success.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: I am sure the families involved are not interested.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it is just unfortunate that there are incidents like this one, but we will continue to improve our program. I am not sure whether the hon. member is suggesting that we should end it altogether. I do not know whether that is Conservative policy.

An hon. Member: We want to know your policy.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN PROVISION TO DEAL WITH THOSE WHO HAVE BEEN TWICE CONVICTED OF MURDER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, because of the position I have taken for a long time in reference to people who have been convicted of murder getting out on these temporary passes I should like to put a supplementary question either to the Prime Minister, who is now leaving, or the Solicitor General.

Mr. Trudeau: I am not leaving. I am here. I was not leaving, I was just going to talk to another minister.

Mr. Hees: Well, you won't miss anything.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will consider changing the law so that anyone who is convicted of a second offence of murder and is sentenced to life it will mean life, that he is taken out of our society or, in the alternative, will he bring back capital punishment in respect of those persons who are convicted of murder twice in a row?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I saw several members in the opposition benches applauding that question. I must say I was on my way and did not hear the preamble, but I doubt whether it supported the conclusion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Ask it at caucus tomorrow.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is a very important one and has reference to the $500 grant—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member is rising on a question of privilege regarding not being recognized, I would be pleased to deal with it. But it is not the subject matter or the importance of the question that is involved, because every day there are several hon. members whose questions, I am sure, are extremely important but they are not recognized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to repeat that I have tried for several days to ask a question. If a parliamentary secretary is not to be recognized in the House for the purpose of asking a question—and the people of his constituency expect him to rise in the House once in a while and ask questions—I believe, sir, that you ought to tell the House that you will not recognize us.

Mr. Speaker: Indeed, I welcome this question of privilege for that very purpose. I have, of course, to consider whether some members of the House are eligible to use the time of the question period to pose questions to the ministry. It is obvious, certainly, that members of the ministry ought not to enjoy the privilege of being able to both represent the government in answering questions in the House of Commons and, in turn, to use the time of the question period to ask questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Similarly, the privilege, of course, of being elevated to the position of parliamentary secretary falls only on those among the government ranks. This extends to those hon. members, not only the recognition, prestige and advantage that comes from their position but the obligation of answering questions, because not only do they occasionally answer questions during the question period, but they do so on a regular basis during the "late show" proceedings at 10 p.m. when they answer for the ministry. I have taken the position, to which I hold, that those who are clothed with the responsibility of answering for the government ought not to use the time of the question period for the privilege of asking questions of the government.

● (1510)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, so that the parliamentary secretary will not feel isolated, may I take the liberty of asking the Acting Prime Minister to treat the parliamentary secretary with a little more respect and answer his questions privately.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on the question raised by the parliamentary secretary, I can appreciate the reason for which you have come to this conclusion but I would point out to you—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why don't you guys just sit down and listen for a change?

Mr. Sharp: —that parliamentary secretaries, when they are appointed to these positions, are not aware of this particular disability, and it seems to me that this question does deserve further consideration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is known as parliamentary reform.

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, certainly I do not expect you to act differently from the way you have in the question period, but I would suggest that this question might be considered when we consider the rules of the House.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to follow the stand taken by my colleague, I wonder whether before making a definitive rule on this question you would—

An hon. Member: It is definite.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —give members on all sides of the House an opportunity to argue this question before you. I have sat in this House for 13 years and the tradition of this House, supported by Speakers before you, sir—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question raised by the parliamentary secretary is of rather fundamental principle and of extreme importance in the conduct of the affairs of the House. I have indicated the reasons for my position, but I would very much appreciate being able to listen to the views of other hon. members who wish to express their opinions, because it is an important matter. I am certainly prepared, if the House wishes, to think about this matter further and receive representations at another time.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: However, at the moment, based on the understanding of the role and the privileges with which a parliamentary secretary is clothed, and therefore his special opportunity of access to the ministry in light of the position to which he has been appointed, I have expressed my own view and I am prepared at some other time to listen to further representations.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hope you would hold open this question to allow some of us who have feelings about it—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Sit down. You are impertinent.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I can see that hon. members on both sides of the House would like to make representations on this point, and I would appreciate being able to hear from them. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: The new C. D. Howe.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No. With the greatest respect, Your Honour, I would submit that you have come to a position without understanding the panorama of the views of the House.

An hon. Member: Are you questioning the Speaker's motives?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member for Edmonton West, when he was Speaker; the Speaker before that, Honourable Roland Michener, and the Speaker who preceded Your Honour gave the discretion to parliamentary secretaries to rise in this House and put questions to ministers other than their own, because they carried no responsibility for another department.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No. I am speaking on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might remind the honourable member that we are dealing with a question of privilege by the honourable member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) at the moment.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The views of the honourable member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on this subject are well known. We have argued this question before previous Speakers. I would ask Your Honour to allow the House to debate this point and to give a ruling on a future occasion. Then this whole question could be aired, as it should, because it involves the rights of private members who, despite the fact that they are appointed parliamentary secretaries, have no responsibility in the ministry, do not take that oath and owe responsibility to their ministers alone and to the Prime Minister. Through the traditions of this House they have been allowed to pose questions to other ministers for the past 12 years.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Earlier in today's session Your Honour had occasion to make rulings with regard to supplementary questions. Those rulings made some of us unhappy, but they were rulings by the Chair and we accepted them. If there were freedom in the House to challenge Your Honour on every occasion when an honourable member thinks he has been discriminated against, it would be a very chaotic place indeed.

I am surprised at the attitude of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), who should know better and know that from time to time in this House members of the opposition have challenged, at times successfully, the right of parliamentary secretaries to ask questions. Your Honour has put before us your particular position in regard to the discretion which is given to the Chair in respect of certain situations. Your Honour has exercised this discretion in various ways. You have seen fit—in my opinion and in the opinion of many of us in this House, quite properly—to exercise this discretion against the right of parliamentary secretaries to ask questions. There are very good reasons behind this.

I suggest it would be in the best interests of this House if the Minister of Finance and all members of the government would accept that decision, and then later during this or another session there might be a debate on the rules, when the matter could be raised. But Your Honour has made a decision, we have accepted it and the government should accept it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) says, quite properly, that he has been here 13 years. I have been here as long as that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, you have.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is the first time since the notorious pipeline debate that I have witnessed— the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) laughs. He has done more to destroy parliament than any other person.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1520)

Mr. Diefenbaker: I witnessed what took place in 1956 when ministers, not satisfied with the rulings being given, decided to undermine them. I have not forgotten; and it is more than 18 years ago since that that took place. Sir, you have made a ruling. We will not always agree with your rulings, but authority does not permit challenge in this House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —either directly by vote or indirectly by government representatives endeavouring to bring about an alteration after a ruling had been made. I have been here and seen Mr. Speakers come and go. You have discharged your duties in a way that has done credit to you and to parliament, and I deeply resent the attitude of ministers of the Crown, activated and encouraged by the Prime Minister who should be upholding parliament. The ruling is made, it stands. In no case should Your Honour permit himself to be trammelled by the desires of a government that, not satisfied with its majority, now wants to control Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this question because it is fundamental one. It affects the rights and privileges of a certain select group of people in this House. It seems to me that any ruling which would prohibit a parliamentary secretary from asking questions in this House would demote parliamentary secretaries to second-class status. We have constituents to represent, and I think that all members of the House—including those on the other side—would respect a parliamentary secretary who was trying to perform that function and the duty we have to our constituents, as do other members of the House.

The second point I wish to make is that in reading the rules of procedure of this House I am at a loss to find anything that constitutes prohibition against a parliamentary secretary asking questions.

An hon. Member: Mr. Speaker has ruled.

Mr. Cafik: I think Mr. Speaker can speak for himself.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Be that as it may, I am anxious, as I have said, to hear the views of those who have expressed a desire to comment on the subject, which is of some importance. I have stated my position, and I would appreciate it if hon. members who wish to contribute would do so, because I am anxious to hear them. I only hope that, respecting the subject matter of the debate today, we will keep interventions as brief as possible.

Mr. Cafik: There is no doubt at all that there is a long-standing tradition in the House according to which parliamentary secretaries have asked questions. I did so on many occasions in the last two years as parliamentary secretary. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said that the right of parliamentary secretaries to ask questions has been successfully challenged in the past. That is not true, to my knowledge. My right to ask questions has been challenged and I have always in the past been given that right by Mr. Speaker. I certainly hope I will be given that right in the future.

I think that it is understandable—this point has been alluded to by previous speakers—that parliamentary secretaries should not ask questions of their own ministers. Clearly, we have some special rights and obligations respecting our ministers. On the other side of the House, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), for whom I have a great deal of respect, has traditionally in the past raised questions regarding whether parliamentary secretaries should answer questions. But I have never yet heard him raise any question as to whether we have the right to ask them.

The point is that the opposition cannot have it both ways. Some members of the opposition do not want us to answer questions, and many of them do not want us to ask them in the first instance. But this is a change of rules in the middle of the tenure of a parliamentary secretary, and I do not think it is fair or reasonable to change the rules when members have accepted these posts with a certain understanding as to their rights and privileges in the House.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to give very careful consideration to this question. If it is the rule that we do not have that right, then I will raise a question of privilege based upon that ruling, because I think my rights as a member of parliament could be adversely affected.

Mr. John Roberts (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I rise as one who is not a parliamentary secretary, although I once was and, for all I know, may be again. I rise as one who would not, even if I could, challenge the ruling of the Chair, but I take it that you have asked members who are interested to express their points of view, and I would like to take a few moments to do that. Parliamentary secretaries do have an opportunity, as do all backbenchers on the government side, through various party means to make their points of view known to ministers. That prerogative has never been used as an argument for taking away from them the right to ask questions of ministers in the House. There is a difference between the position of a parliamentary secretary and that of a minister. Ministers are collectively responsible for the presentation of government policy and programs; they speak with many voices.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You're not kidding.

An hon. Member: From both sides of the mouth.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Roberts: Yes, they speak with many tongues, if you like; but they express a collective view for which they are responsible. Parliamentary secretaries are not part of the government; they are not part of the collective responsibility of the government; they are not bound by the obligation to speak with a common voice, as are members of the cabinet. Governmental responsibility, in so far as it exists, exists within the confines of the responsibilities of the minister whose parliamentary secretary one is. Outside the bounds of that responsibility the parliamentary secretary does not participate, nor does he have special access to the decision-making process of government.

But parliamentary secretaries have constituents and constituent interests which they should represent. I submit that it would be an extraordinary burden to place upon them to say they could not to be able to ask of ministers, as other members can, questions related to their constituencies or related to the interests of the country. Within the bounds of their departmental activities they do not have that right, but in the whole area of government they, as other members of the House, should have the right to ask for replies or to cross-examine ministers in the effective performance of their duties.

● (1530)

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, with great respect I submit that if it were your intention to deny those of us who have been appointed parliamentary secretaries the right to ask questions, I would suggest it would have been a very basic courtesy on your part at least to have apprised us—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: —rather than subject us to this public display of division in the House today.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Fairweather: What a rude woman.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it so happens that when this issue has arisen on other occasions it has been my view that, provided they do not ask questions of their own departments, parliamentary secretaries should have at least a measure of right in the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It seems to me, however, that an issue more important than that has arisen this afternoon. I refer to the authority and the prestige of the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I join the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others on this side of the House in protesting the fact that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) publicly chastised Your Honour—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —and put you in the position where you seemed to feel you should listen to debate on a point on which you had already ruled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I submit, sympathetic though I may be with the other view, and even though I may disagree with your ruling, that the question of your authority is far more important.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): For many years in this House, Speakers' rulings could be challenged and we had lengthy debates on them. But this House formally and deliberately changed Standing Order 12, so that it now reads in part:

No debate shall be permitted on any such decision, and no such decision shall be subject to an appeal to the House.

To say we are having friendly discussion of something that members did not know was going to happen does not get around the fact that what is happening today is that a decision of the Chair is being appealed. I bring to Your Honour's attention, also, the fact that in Beauchesne's fourth edition there are three comments on this point. The first sentence of citation 72—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I very much appreciate the intervention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) whose reputation as a parliamentarian is so well known. I must say, however, that to put the interpretation on this afternoon's discussion that it represents an appeal or an affront to the Chair would scarcely be a fair interpretation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I have outlined the view I have taken this afternoon and the view I propose to take throughout this session in respect of parliamentary secretaries asking questions during the question period. I have taken that position, and it is clear. That is my view. In addition to doing that, I made it very clear that I was interested in hearing representations from hon. members and I invited that kind of discussion. The discussion could scarcely be classified in the context of an appeal or in any way challenging the Chair. I am sure it was not intended that way by hon. members.

I have taken this matter under extremely careful consideration for a long time, not only for the short time I have been in the chair but during the two years I was a parliamentary secretary. It is not a matter I have considered lightly; it is one on which I have taken a clear and definitive decision. Parliamentary secretaries who continue to rise during the question period wonder, I am sure, why they are not recognized. I think it fair to take this opportunity to make my position clear. Having done so, I think it would probably be better to get on with orders of the day.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since I have already contended that your rulings must be accepted, I have to accept the opinion you have now stated, that what we are engaging in is not an appeal against your ruling. I submit, however, that since this place operates by precedent, this discussion today sets a precedent for future action. Any time a member, especially a cabinet minister, is dissatisfied with your ruling, he can stand and say, "Your Honour, I am not appealing but I want you to listen". I contend that the House Leader or the Minister of Finance cannot in this way criticize what you have done. Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 72(1), gives the answer when it says:

The Speaker's actions cannot be criticized incidentally in debate or upon any form of proceeding except a substantive motion.

There are other sentences in that citation. The final sentence of citation 72(2) is especially important with reference to the Speaker. It reads:

His prestige would be seriously impaired if he allowed himself to argue with members on the soundness of his decisions.

And subsection (3) reads:

If a member wishes to challenge the action or conduct of the Speaker on any matter other than an appeal from his decision—

The argument now is that it is something other than an appeal.

—he must proceed by giving two days' notice of a motion on the subject and by bringing the matter up as a separate question, except, of course, if it be a question of privilege, when it may be taken up as such.

The other brief comment I wish to make is this. In accordance with the law and the arrangement we made, this is to be a day of debate on a matter which is of concern to many members of this House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —but the President of the Privy Council and the Minister of Finance have denied us 40 minutes of debate on that important measure, by their interventions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful for your interpretation of the procedures that have gone on for the last 20 minutes. I want to say, through you, to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I rose—indeed, the leader of the House rose on even more specific terms—to inquire of Your Honour whether it was a firm ruling and hoping—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —if it were not a firm ruling, that we could argue the point. Your Honour has stated it is a firm ruling, and we accept it without question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: C. D. Howe.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There was no intent to provoke or to challenge the Chair, but merely to seek an opportunity to argue the question if the issue were still open.

An hon. Member: Better get the "blues," John.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

VETERANS' LAND ACT

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF TERMINAL DATE OF PROGRAM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to review the terminal date of March 31, 1975, now specified in the Veterans' Land Act, and to report thereon to the House within the time limit set out in chapter 3 of the Statutes of 1974.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

During the debate, I tried several times to be recognized in order to express my opinion on this important matter.

This discussion does not surprise me, because since the beginning of this session, especially, we have often heard—please note, Mr. Speaker, that I particularly wish to express my view on the matter raised by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay). I want to make it clear that I am entitled as much as anybody else to speak in this House.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Mr. Speaker, we have noted, especially since the beginning of this session, the behaviour of parliamentary secretaries who try more and more to ask questions during that period traditionally allotted to the members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Laprise: It is so true, Mr. Speaker, that on several occasions, some government members have asked Social Crediters to put questions to the ministers, so that they could make statements which the opposition members would not have to answer.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, March 28, 1974, this House had before it what was then known as Bill C-17, which is now chapter 3 of the Statutes of 1974, the effect of which was to extend for one year the period under which grants could be sought under the Veterans' Land Act. In closing his brief speech on second reading of that bill, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) said, as recorded at page 948 of Hansard:

I believe, Mr. Speaker, this extension will provide many veterans with the opportunity to take advantage of a program which was designed for them.

I draw attention to this final sentence of the minister's speech:

It should be made quite clear that we are not doing this as a favour to veterans but simply as a right which they have earned.

That statement of the Minister of Veterans Affairs sets out clearly the whole purpose of the debate which will take place today and, possibly, tomorrow. The purpose of this debate is to persuade the minister to stand by that statement, namely, that the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act are a right which veterans have earned. Perhaps, to be more precise, the purpose of this debate is to persuade the government to back the minister on what I believe is his belief, namely, that the provisions of the Veterans' land Act should be continued.

This is an unusual debate. It does not often happen that there is a debate on the floor of the House because an act of parliament provides that such debate shall take place. I would not contend that this is the first time in history it has happened, for—

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I point out that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) is in the chamber with a recorder. I think it should be removed from the chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the point is well taken. I am sure the hon. member will accede to our practice, which is against objects such as that being introduced in this chamber.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that our redistribution legislation provides that there are times when we must debate certain matters in this House. That statute requires us to do so. Indeed, there are other statutes which provide for a similar kind of debate. But this could well be the first time debate has actually arisen as a result of the written request of the required number of members.

The amendment under which we are operating today, which was written into the Veterans' Land Act amending bill of last session, provides that if at any time after September 30, 1974, 20 or more members request that the cut-off provisions of the Veterans' Land Act be reviewed, the House shall have the right to debate a motion, asking the Minister of Veterans Affairs to review the cut-off date of March 31, 1975, which is now in that legislation. Accordingly, there was presented to Mr. Speaker on October 17 a motion in line with that provision in the act, signed by 25 members of this House. Those 25 members happen to be members of the three opposition parties. I took the responsibility for getting signatures and I sought the signatures of a number of Liberal members, but for one reason or another they did not wish to put their names on the document. I hope that in the debate today Liberal members will participate as well as members of opposition parties and will indicate to the minister their strong desire that the Veterans' Land Act shall not die on March 31, 1975.

Let me go back to another bit of recent history. There is a long history behind the Veterans' Land Act and I suspect that my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), who seconded this motion, will recite some of the earlier history and some of the promises made in years gone by. But I should like to remind hon. members of the House of a few things that happened within the last year. In the latter part of 1973 it became obvious that many veterans were disturbed because the Veterans' Land Act would expire on March 31, 1974. Many questions were asked of the Minister of Veterans Affairs in the House of Commons. His answers always reflected his genuine sympathy for the veterans of Canada: There is no gainsaying that. Still, his answer as to whether the Veterans' Land Act would be extended beyond March 31, 1974 was always "No".

A year ago this week, on Friday, November 9, 1973, we had one of those rare occasions when a motion presented under Standing Order 43 was allowed: there was unanimous consent for it. It was a motion of mine, again seconded by my hon. friend who is seconding my motion today, the distinguished and gallant member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. The motion, as recorded at page 7693 of Hansard for November 9, 1973, reads as follows:

Veterans Affairs

That this House requests that the Minister of Veterans Affairs give urgent consideration to the amending of the Veterans' Land Act regulations to permit veterans to acquire smallholdings, even if the main purpose of most of the older veterans now applying for loans under the Veterans' Land Act is to meet their housing requirements, it being the view of this House that entitlement to a piece of this land ought to be the right of any veteran.

Hansard then records:

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

I recollect that that "Hear, hear" was expressed in generous applause. Motions under Standing Order 43 are usually denied. The Speaker made sure of its acceptance before he put it: he asked twice if there was unanimous consent. There was no opposition. Then Hansard records the following:

MR. SPEAKER: I believe there is unanimous consent. Therefore I will put the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

● (1550)

That was the action of the House of Commons on Friday, November 9, 1973, at which time we said unanimously to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) that we wanted the Veterans' Land Act to be continued and, in particular, that we wanted consideration to be given to veterans making application for loans under the act even though the main purpose was to meet their housing requirements.

In the weeks that followed, we earnestly hoped that favourable action would be taken in response to this unanimous request by the House of Commons, but the questions which were put to the minister from time to time did not elicit a hopeful response. On January 11, 1974, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe sought to put a motion under Standing Order 26. Permission was denied. He then put a question to the minister asking whether the view of the House expressed on November 9 would be acted upon. The minister's reply, while courteous and sympathetic was, nevertheless, quite clear—the Veterans' Land Act would not be continued beyond March 31, 1974.

Members who were in the last parliament will remember vividly—I certainly do—developments in the month of March. On Tuesday, March 12, my hon. friend from Newfoundland moved a non-confidence motion on this issue. That motion really put things into a tizzy around here. The motion said things with which practically every member of the House agreed. At the same time, it raised the question whether there would be an election over the issue—whether the government would be defeated, in which event the Veterans' Land Act would not, in any case, be extended beyond March 31, 1974. We in this party made it clear that we agreed with the words used in the motion, and that if the government refused to do anything about the issue we would vote in such a way as to bring the government down; but that if the government were prepared to bring in the necessary legislation to extend the Veterans' Land Act, we would vote in such a way as to keep the government here so that extension could be implemented. During the course of the debate on March 12, the minister stated his position. It is to be found at pages 434 and 435 of Hansard. He said this:

> The motion before the House today asks that the government consider the possibility of extending the March 31 deadline for qualified veterans to apply under the Veterans' Land Act. In case there should be any doubt left in somebody's mind, I wish to emphasize at the outset that I am quite prepared to give such an undertaking right now.

Later, the Minister of Veterans Affairs said, again:

> If, after looking at all the evidence, I can conclude that the deadline should be extended, then I would be prepared to so recommend.

Again, on page 435, the minister had this to say:

> Since this motion has been brought forward, I am certainly glad to listen to the discussions today. In the light of these discussions, I will be happy to consider the whole matter again and to make a recommendation to the government.

That was the story. There had been months of refusal on the part of the government. I think I am justified in saying "the government" rather than "the minister" because some of us are aware of the conflict the hon. gentleman has with other members of the cabinet. But for months we met with a refusal to extend the act beyond March 31, 1974. We thought our unanimous motion of November 9, 1973, had done the trick. But it hadn't. However, the motion the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe put down on March 12 did result in a firm promise by the minister that the matter would be considered.

That was on March 12, and the deadline was March 31, so things had to move quickly. Sure enough, on Tuesday, March 26, 1974, as noted at page 856, the Minister of Veterans Affairs rose and made a statement on motions to the effect that he was giving consideration to the whole matter of extending the act and that the necessary bill would be brought in right away. It was. On Thursday, March 28, 1974, we gave that bill second reading, consideration in committee of the whole, and third reading; and we passed it and sent it to the other place.

I regard all of this as one of the highlights of the minority parliament, one of the major accomplishments of the Twenty-ninth Parliament of Canada; the fact that we got the government to change its position with respect to this one feature of the Veterans' Land Act, namely, that it was to expire on March 31, 1974. The bill which this House passed on Thursday, March 28, 1974, extended the life of that legislation by one year, so that it now expires on March 31, 1975.

I refer again to the fact that when we were in committee of the whole on that bill, Bill C-17 of last session, now chapter 3 of the Statutes of Canada of 1974, I moved an amendment which would permit the matter to be raised again after September 30, 1974. That proposal was not only passed by the House but the minister himself, speaking in the debate on the amendment, said he and the government welcomed it. The only conclusion I can draw is that he welcomed the possibility that in the fall of 1974 the discussion would again come forward. I trust he still does. In any event, the motion was carried unanimously, it was written into the law of the land, and it is on the basis of that provision in the law that today's debate is taking place.

The only thing the House can do in this debate, formally and officially, is to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs to review the question of the cut-off date, now March 31, 1975, and report back to this chamber on the result of his review within 15 sitting days after this motion is passed by the House. In a few moments I want to refer to some of the other things I believe the minister should consider as well. But that is what the motion asks for, since by law that is all we can ask for at this time. I plead as strongly as I can that the House pass this motion. Passing it will not extend the Veteran's Land Act; it will not make any other change. But it will say to the minister that we want this matter reconsidered.

Last time we went through this, Mr. Speaker, the government was in a minority position. When the parties in opposition made their position clear, they carried some weight. The government wanted to be in a majority position so that it could do the things it wants to do. Well, it is in that position now, and I submit it has all the authority it needs to take action on the Veterans' Land Act. I hope members of the House, in all parties, will express the same views that they expressed last year, namely that this matter should be reviewed and the act extended.

Certainly, I would feel that if the motion were opposed, that if members on the government side were to do the unthinkable and vote against the motion, it would put in doubt the motives of a year ago when a minority government went along with what we were seeking. The more I sit and listen to the minister in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, the more I am satisfied that his sympathies with the veterans are genuine and that he is fighting for them in his department and in the cabinet. I think we owe to this minister the support of the House of Commons, and we can give it to him today or tomorrow, whenever this debate comes to a conclusion, by voting unanimously for this motion.

Now, sir, I have said that so far as the actual motion is concerned, all it can do is request the minister to review the March 31, 1975, cut-off date. I want to ask that he look at other things as well, and I suspect that most of those who will take part in this debate will do the same thing. I think he should take another look at the provision that set October 31, 1968, as the last date by which one could get a qualification certificate to get a grant under the Veterans's Land Act. I feel very strongly that this provision should be reviewed.

I believe the amount of money available as a loan under the Veterans' Land Act, which is fixed at a maximum of $18,000—less 20 per cent which the veteran must have, so it is really only $15,400—is unrealistic and unreasonable in light of today's costs. I also think the whole question of the size of lot that has to be obtained should be reviewed. In saying these thing I am admitting, indeed asserting, as all of us do, that times have changed and that although the Veterans' Land Act originally had in mind those veterans who wanted to go on smallholdings and do a bit of farming, raise a few carrots and potatoes if you will, what most of the veterans are wanting now is a piece of land on which to build a home and retire. I do not think it is an argument against extension of the rights under the Veterans' Land Act to say that is all the veterans now want. As we said in our motion of November 9, 1973, "it is the view of this House that entitlement to a piece of this land ought to be the right of any veteran". So I hope the minister will look at these other provisions to which I have referred, as well as the cut-off date.

If the Minister of Veterans Affairs has an alternative, if he is going to come in with a veterans' housing program that is equal to what we are asking for under the Veterans' Land Act or even better, then I will applaud him to the skies. In fact, I dared to hope that the 15 days' notice that we had to give of this motion and this debate might even have given him time to upstage this debate, and I wondered day after day whether he was going to stand up on motions and announce a veterans' housing program. If he gets up today and makes this announcement, the debate will not take two days; it will end almost momentarily. But if he is not prepared to do that, this House, as I say, will have to continue to debate the motion and the debate may become a struggle on the part of some of us to persuade all members of the House to back the minister, even if it is backing him against his cabinet colleagues, by voting unanimously for the motion and asking the minister to undertake the review that is asked for in the motion.

When the question of the Veterans' Land Act comes up, there are those who argue that its purposes have changed, that the veterans knew the law regarding the October 31 date, and so on. But there are veterans who feel that these arguments do not hold water at all. I should like once more to quote a few sentences from a letter written to the minister on January 28 of this year by Mr. E. F. Heesaker, dominion president of the Canadian Corps Association. The letter had to do with the extending of the March 31, 1974, deadline, but Your Honour and others will see immediately that it refers to the question on a long-run basis. These are some of the sentences in Mr. Heesaker's letter:

> We would like to point out here that there were many veterans who were not aware of the Veterans' Land Act or the university training program until after they had used up all their re-establishment credits. And, of course, they had to refund their re-establishment credits before they could become eligible for Veterans' Land Act benefits. So they were not trying to take advantage of two forms of rehabilitation, they were merely changing one for the other after they had learned of the existence of the Veterans' Land Act.

That, of course, is in response to a statement that on occasion the minister has made, to the effect that some of these veterans were trying to get more benefits than they were supposed to obtain. Later in his letter Mr. Heesaker has this to say:

> You say that you are satisfied that the vast majority of veterans who hold Veterans' Land Act qualification certificates simply took the precaution of obtaining such a certificate before the deadline of October 31, 1968.

Then, says Mr. Heesaker:

> This is just like the precaution they took in 1914, and again in 1939, to ensure that no enemy soldiers set foot on Canadian soil, except as a prisoner of war. However, they were not so cautious with their own personal safety.

There are just two more sentences in Mr. Heesaker's letter to the minister that I wish to read; they express the view of most of us in this House:

> In view of the above facts, we believe that a veteran should be eligible for benefits under the Veterans' Land Act until the day he dies. He offered his life in a time of crisis and this is little enough to give him in return.

I have already said that getting the deadline extended from March 31, 1974, to March 31, 1975, was an accomplishment of the twenty-ninth parliament. There should be no deadline at all on any veteran's right to assistance from this country to enable him to get a piece of land on which to have a home, even if it is only for the purpose of having a home in which to retire. If that is going to be realized, then we must do something about the October 31, 1968, cut-off date for obtaining qualification certificates. We also must do something about the amount of the loan, as well as about the size of the lot it is permissible to obtain under the Veterans' Land Act.

In my view, this is a very important issue. I am proud of the fact that this unusual procedure of our having a debate because a statute of parliament says we can have it happens to be on this subject, a matter of concern for the veterans of this land. I think it is significant that we are having this debate on the days just before Remembrance Day when most members of the House are wearing Remembrance Day poppies. I hope we will, in the course of this debate and by our decision on the motion, take a stand for the rights of our veterans that will support the Minister of Veterans Affairs in his battle inside the cabinet in attempting to do what these veterans are seeking. On their behalf, we seek either an extension of the Veterans' Land Act or a veterans' housing policy that will give those who served Canada the rights they have earned, the rights they really deserve.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, since I have been here, when we have had questions on veterans affairs I have had the privilege of speaking before my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am pleased to follow him now, and I commend him for his keen knowledge of the rules which brought about this debate on the motion we are considering today and shall be tomorrow. I am pleased to follow him because he allowed me to collaborate with him in seconding the motion he filed a few days ago. I am also pleased that the proposal has reached this stage—this was brought about and alluded to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—as a result of a non-confidence motion I introduced on behalf of my party on March 12 during the last session, a motion which had the effect of extending the expiry date of the Veterans' Land Act for one year. I know I am going to be repetitive, as I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but I think we must perhaps, during this one last opportunity we will have, repeat and repeat the need to correct a wrong.

The motion today is a very simple one which merely asks that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) review the terminal date and report back to the House within 15 days of the date the motion is approved by the House, with or without amendment. There should be no problem in having this motion accepted. I appeal to all members of the House, particularly those opposite, to support the motion. Having had the opportunity of reflecting on the events which have followed since last March, if I could have the opportunity again, my motion would then have read "that the government should repeal section 31 of the act"—that section which set the deadline of October 31, 1968, as the termination date for veterans who wish to qualify, and March 31, 1974, as the deadline for applications for those who were qualified and which through Bill C-17 was extended to March 31, 1975.

As it would have turned out, acceptance of that motion would have opened up the fact indefinitely and would not have necessitated this debate today, about which I am sure the government is not happy in any case. Little did I realize at the time just how much effect that motion could have had on the parliament of the day. Strategically, if it had been passed it would have defeated the government earlier and no doubt the historical events which have followed might have been different.

My main purpose, however, in having the motion presented was that I was sure the expiration of the deadline for the Veterans' Land Act was wrong, and I was confident it would have been supported by every member who sat here at that time. I am just as sure at this very moment that it would be wrong to phase out the act by March 31, 1975, and I will be just as sure when that time comes that it will be wrong, unless of course we can find a means of having the act further extended. It is not only wrong but, as I have said many times before, approval by this parliament for setting the deadline in 1965 was wrong, because by so doing the veteran citizen of Canada was denied a right. We broke a faith which had been given to veterans, and reneged on a commitment made to veterans by the government of the day and parliament. So it is with the greatest respect to those who sit here today, and who sat in the parliament in 1965, that I say we have all voted on many things that may be found to be wrong when time passes.

The government opposite uses the excuse, time and time again, that this parliament accepted the decision to set these deadlines, but there have been many laws passed by this parliament over the years that have been amended time and time again to meet changing conditions. We need go no further, in giving examples of changes in legislation, than the Veterans' Land Act itself. It was passed in 1942 with an original ceiling of $4,800. This was progressively increased to $40,000 for full-time farmers and $18,000 for small family farmers, commercial fishermen and smallholders. The repayment period has been extended from time to time to the present 30 years.

Even after 1959, when a time limit of 15 years was set after September 30, 1947, or after the veteran was discharged from the armed forces, the new Bill C-80 in 1962 was introduced to extend the date to October 31, 1968. Then in 1965, by Bill C-128, the additional section was introduced establishing the terminal dates I mentioned previously. Nor do we need go any further than the present Bill C-4 to amend the war veterans' allowances and civilian war pensions. This measure has been amended at least half a dozen times since I have been here, which indicates that the government realizes the need for change as a result of inflation and as a result of representation from veterans' groups and members of this House.

The bill which we passed for second reading is an excellent one and the government has been commended for it. Furthermore, Canada can be proud of it. So why is there a big hang-up in admitting that parliament was wrong in setting the terminal dates in 1965? Is it a crime to admit that you were wrong? Just think of the commendation the government would receive across the country if it were to extend and improve the measure as we are suggesting. Before I wander too far afield I should like to get back to this motion. I think it is important to point out a very significant feature; that is, that regardless of what happens, members of parliament in opposition can effect changes in the direction of government legislation if they feel it is in the best interests of the people they represent.

[Mr. Marshall.]

In the last year we were able to force, through our rules and procedures, an extension of one year to the Veterans' Land Act. The amendment subsequently introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave us the opportunity to demand this debate, and the government, even in its majority position, and inasmuch as it did not want it, had to accept it. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, you are to be commended for your decision to allow the debate. At least this gives us some hope for our democratic process. Perhaps after some sincere thought on the part of the government we will succeed in correcting a grave error, made some nine years ago, by bringing in amendments to the present bill to improve the inequities which exist, or by bringing in a new bill in respect of housing to meet the needs of our veterans.

The acceptance of this motion will not hurt anyone, let alone the government. All we are asking is that the minister review the bill and the expiry date. This will give him an opportunity to consult with veterans' organizations and, hopefully, he will agree that the matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, where we can call witnesses to get their views and thoughts on the subject. Although 15 days does not give much time for review, I am sure the minister has given enough consideration to the many questions we have asked him over the past couple of years. As a result, in reply to the majority of questions I have asked his only answer has been that he has the matter under consideration.

If I might digress for a moment, down in the maritime provinces, in Prince Edward Island, Cape Breton and Nova Scotia, there are so many MacDonalds with the same first name that they have to give them nicknames to distinguish one from another. In view of the number of times the minister has said that my questions were under consideration, I think they should call him Dan "consideration" MacDonald. I think the minister has received enough representations in the past month and has done enough considering himself to make a decision now. But in case this is not so, let me give him some of the representations that have been made to me. In my responsibility for veterans affairs on behalf of my party, I published an article in most of the newspapers in Canada. Although much of it might be repetitive, I use my prerogative to record the article in Hansard because it places in context how we feel about the government's direction to phase out the act. I quote from the article as it appeared in the Ottawa Citizen:

● (1620)

The government's recent decision to phase out the Veterans' Land Act by March, 1975, can only be regarded as a serious breach of a commitment made many years ago to Canada's veterans.

In 1917 before Vimy Ridge, Sir Robert Borden, then prime minister of Canada, assured Canadian troops:

> 'The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of your people at home, and it will always be our endeavor to so guide the attitude of public opinion that the country will support the government to prove to the returned men its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire, and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken faith with the men who won and the men who died.'

But how easily we, as Canadians, forget. Our changing society has brought us to a point where, now, our veterans are treated with somewhat less than the consideration they deserve. And while we take our affluence for granted, we also fail, in our complacency, to realize just why we have become a great nation.

Canada has been involved in three wars—and in each, men volunteered, served and died to protect this country. We remember these men on November 11 each year. But we are failing, in the process, to give just consideration to the thousands of men who served and who returned. We choose, instead, to treat these men apathetically.

It might be more convenient for the government to phase out the Veterans' Land Act. But its elimination will destroy a principle of justice and commitment that will only serve to dilute those things we hold dear as Canadians.

Phasing out the Veterans' Land Act is a breach of faith that will deny a great majority of the 140,000 certified veterans their right to compensation for services to this country.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs says it will cost $50 million to continue to administer the act. The figure is ambiguous because he is using it to reflect loans which come back to the government at the rate of $26 million per year.

The Veterans' Land Administration, comprising approximately 400 to 500 public servants, will be employed to administer the act until at least 1980 and probably many years beyond that. In contrast to the minister's statements, administrative costs are approximately $7 million a year. Continuation of the act will likely require another $1 million a year.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs says that many veterans are failing to take advantage of the act, but he has chosen to camouflage the real reason why. The fact is that under the present regulations, a veteran must purchase a one-half acre lot, in some cases less 20 per cent, but can borrow only $15,400 to meet the cost.

Today's skyrocketing housing and land costs prohibit most eligible veterans from meeting these requirements, and therefore, from taking advantage of the act. And, as a further injustice, the Veterans' Land Act has not been altered to meet inflationary demands even though improvements have been made, in this regard, to the National Housing Act and special housing programs for minority groups are improved from time to time.

The government also uses the argument that in 1965 parliament amended section 31 to restrict certification and qualification. But the government fails to perceive that parliament's passage of the amendment might have been wrong—which it was, in my opinion.

If justice is going to be served, the Veterans' Land Act must be preserved with the following amendments:

> Repeal of section 31 of the VLA which set deadlines of October 31, 1968, and March 31, 1975, for certification and borrowing.
> An increased mortgage loan ceiling from $18,000 to $35,000.
> A reduced lot requirement from one-half acre to that size commensurate with the requirements of the municipality in which the veteran decides to purchase.
> A revised downpayment from the present $2,600 to 5 per cent of the loan, as available under some present National Housing Act requirements. Freedom for the veteran to choose the type of housing best suited to his needs, such as, perhaps, a mobile home, or a condominium at a locale of his choice.
>
> Authorization of a survey in all parts of Canada to determine the standard of housing of those veterans on fixed incomes.
> Introduction of a program to provide rehabilitation grants, with forgiveness factors, to allow veterans to bring their homes to a reasonable standard of comfort.

Since I had this article published my priorities have changed, because I find across the country that many veterans of fixed incomes such as the War Veterans Allowance, disability pensions, and so on, who are living in their own homes cannot afford, at today's cost, to fix up their homes in order to make them reasonably comfortable. I want to thank the newspapers which published that article, even the Vancouver Sun which called me Jack Smith. I might say the response was overwhelming, and it pleases me that even at this late date our news media recognize the importance of some 900,000 veterans besides the additional million or so widows and children. Sometimes I become frustrated over the lack of attention shown by the press to veterans affairs in the House and in the committee proceedings. An exception to this is the Canadian Press, which I thank sincerely.

Let me give the minister and his government some food for thought. I shall quote from some of the representations I have received and which, in many cases, he has received as a result of this message. I shall skip the first representation because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to it. That was the representation from the Canadian Corps Association. There is another organization which presented a representation, the Federation of British Canadian Veterans of Canada. I shall not read the preamble. That association states:

> 1. The Veterans' Land Act should be extended indefinitely.
> 2. The Limits of Veterans' Land Act mortgages should be increased to 90 (ninety) per cent of the full property value.
>
> 3. That the qualifications date for the Veterans' Land Act should be reopened for an indefinite period.
> 4. The benefits of this act should be made available to all members of the permanent force, domiciled in Canada prior to enlistment.

That representation is dated October 21, 1974. All of us who say that this act has outlived its usefulness, and that no one is interested in it, should think again. Another representation from the Royal Canadian Legion states that at the twenty-fifth dominion convention held in St. John's, Newfoundland, June 2 to June 6 this year, the following resolution was passed:

> Therefore be it resolved that legislation be enacted—(1) to provide for the reopening of the October 31, 1968, deadline for one year, to enable those who missed the earlier deadline to qualify—

They refer to the establishment of the act and also to the fact that it should cover those qualifying veterans who are still serving in the armed forces, and that they should be granted one year after discharge in which to make settlement arrangements. They refer to extending the deadline to December 31, 1978. In their representation, they also ask that loans under part III of the act be increased and that the statutory ceiling on the Veterans' Land Act fund imposed under section 6(4) of the act be removed or substantially increased. They say that their resolution was sponsored by branches in all ten provinces, which indicates the great interest within the Royal Canadian Legion in this important matter. That refers to 410,000 legionaires. Let me refer now to a few individual letters. I have before me a letter which reads:

> I would like to draw to your attention the fact that among those now to be denied the benefits of the Veterans' Land Act are the serving veterans. As of last year there were some 2,700 eligible and qualified veterans still serving in the Canadian forces.

It is not generally known that, until very recently, we were denied the benefits of the Veterans' Land Act. The Minister of Veterans Affairs required certification that we would serve to retirement in the location where application was made. The Minister of National Defence could not give any such guarantee and as a result the serving veterans could not build a home. Now many serving veterans are posted abroad to Europe or on peacekeeping duties or are serving far from their intended place of retirement. The firm opinion of the serving veteran is that there has been a deliberate breach of faith by the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Recent casualties to Canadian forces members in Cyprus and Syria should serve to remind everyone of the nature of our commitment. No government should, in my opinion, be so unwise and shortsighted as to breach its commitments to those who served in war.

● (1630)

I have here a letter from the Canadian Fighter Pilots Association which reads in part as follows:

As a veteran of more than five years in the RCAF during World War II, I have maintained my qualifications to settle under the VLA. Now, as I reach my halcyon years, the need for financial assistance is just as real as it was in 1945.

It is apparent that this present profligate government is cheeseparing. VLA loans are not a give away program—such as LIP—but an investment of money with protected collateral.

Then he makes a reference to a nearby airport which will cost $1.5 billion. He goes on to say:

Yes, Mr. Marshall, I would like to be involved and offer you support.

This is indicated in every letter, all of them dated within the last month. I have here a letter that was sent to the Ottawa Citizen, which reads:

I am a serving veteran, registered and eligible for VLA consideration. I am presently serving at Canadian Forces Base Edmonton (Namao). Because of my present posting I am unable to take advantage of the VLA act to purchase a home in my chosen place of retirement—

I think the article should be sent to every Main-Brace Club, Canadian Legion and Air Force Association across Canada.

Then he says that he is grateful for the efforts made. I am quoting these letters, Madam Speaker, because they tell the facts better than we can. If we told the facts, nobody would believe us. I have here another one which reads:

There must be many veterans like myself who, of necessity, have lived in urban areas since the war ended and have not been able, for one reason or another, to use the benefits provided by the act but who look forward to retiring to a small town area. If the act is cancelled, those dreams go up in smoke.

That veteran speaks about the changes that he wants in the act, and says that he referred his proposals to his member of parliament who sits on the other side and is aware of them. Here I have just one paragraph of a letter from someone in Saint-John, New Brunswick. He writes as follows:

As a certificate-holding veteran I have been most frustrated in trying to build a home under the VLA. At this point I own a lot of 18,000 square feet on which I had hoped to build but there is such a difference in the cost of construction and in the allowable ceiling that I am unable to take advantage of the plan.

The cost of construction in this region is very high and I cannot see building the house I want and require for less than $50,000—which is over and above the cost of the lot already paid for—which, incidentally, cost $7,000.

The lot cost $7,000 so how can he build a home with $15,400 after he had paid $7,000 for the lot? I have many more letters, which I am picking at random, all supporting that stand and all asking the government to prolong the act, to increase the loan ceiling and to overcome the many inequities. The minister indicated in committee that he had an interdepartmental committee working on a new housing program for veterans. This committee must be progressing and I hope the minister will introduce its report before these two days are over. I had hoped he would have done it yesterday, because the government wants to use the time today and tomorrow for other legislation.

The other thing at which I am surprised is the secrecy involved here. We have always gone along with bills which benefit veterans. We in the veterans committee are known for non-partisanship. Last year I put forward a motion for the production of papers, asking for a copy of all material resulting from the first meeting of the VLA senior management team convened by the director general of Veterans Land Administration in Ottawa which took place from March 26 to March 29, 1973. I asked for, first, operational plans in the periods before and after the 31 March, 1974, deadline for new loan applications, and second, further implementation of management by objectives as the VLA style of management. So somebody must have been considering it over a long period, and for some reason or other the documentation was considered secret or classified and I was denied it. So I put the notice of motion on the order paper again this year and I hope that we will see it tabled.

The Veterans Land Administration consists of 400 to 500 dedicated experts in the housing area who are veterans. They are doing yeoman work, not only in handling accounts for veterans but also in giving advice and service to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and many other departments. They will continue their services until 1980. So why phase out this act when so much can be done? Under part II of the act, a veteran does not have to be qualified and he can build on a city-size lot. But how can he do it if he can only borrow $18,000 and has to make a downpayment of $2,600? Let us not lose these people; let us continue to serve our veterans, who number 20,000. They are settled and happy and are allowed to improve their homes by having their loans increased periodically. Why should we deny them that?

I could refer to many hundreds of letters and phone calls which I have received, directly regarding the feelings of many more veterans than I thought were concerned. I am confirmed in my thinking that there are enough veterans across this country who demand a change in the government's intention to phase out the act. Many of my letters are copies of those submitted to the minister and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and copies of many of those sent to me have been sent to other members of parliament, some of them sitting on the other side. If we believe in the democratic system, if we believe that our government and the members of this House are truly representative of the people, then we can do nothing less than support this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: I say to the government opposite that if they have an ounce of Canadianism in their souls, if they have any sense of consideration for our comrades and their colleagues on our side who want to support this motion—those who receive letters every day from their veteran constituents—and if they have any consideration for their colleagues who want to support this motion but probably will be commanded not to, they must support the motion. It will not hurt anyone, but, on the contrary, will help Canadians.

If the motion does come to a vote, the government should allow it to be a free vote in order to give all hon. members the opportunity to vote as they feel they should and not as they are commanded to; because if not, it will always remain on their conscience that they failed the veterans of Canada who fought for their country, not only those who lived and returned but those who remained in graves in other countries after fighting on behalf of Canada, and did not return.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Madam Speaker, I listened with pleasure to the two previous speakers and studied with interest the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for extending the delay allowed in October 1973 to veterans' applications for land purchases. As the period was normally supposed to end on March 31, 1975, I think, Madam Speaker, that it would be advisable to cancel that deadline, or at least to extend it for another 5 years. This additional delay would allow veterans who, for different reasons, were not able to avail themselves of certain advantages provided by the legislation, to benefit from a further delay.

I often wondered why the government wanted so much to end this program in March 1975. All things considered, none of the veterans, to my knowledge, imposed conditions for his presence on the battlefields or for the length of wars in which he so courageously fought and sacrificed the prime of his life. In wartime, our governments are prepared to grant anything for the defence of our freedoms. Unfortunately, when the trouble is over, the same governments forget, or seem to, all the sacrifices that were demanded of our brave soldiers. Once back in their country, the soldiers must keep on fighting, this time against those they so valiantly defended.

Madam Speaker, those are the reasons why I ask that the legislation remain in force for at least another five years and I gladly support the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

● (1640)

[English]

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, before I begin my remarks I should like to refer to an assertion by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) that veterans who served in the war and are now serving overseas were denied the privilege of being entertained by VLA. I should like to inform the House that this is not a true statement. My department sent people to foreign lands to make presentations to the veterans who were serving with our forces overseas: they were very well received. Many veterans thus had the opportunity to establish a home in the area they desired. I also wish to thank those serving overseas for that opportunity. I should like that to be known by this House.

Madam Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks by stating that the review requested by the motion which is before the House has already been carried out. I stated in the House on October 7 last that the whole question of the Veterans' Land Act was under careful study by the government. I think it appropriate that I outline a number of the factors which were of principal importance and relevance to this study. Some hon. members may not be aware of the fact that the Veterans' Land Act was enacted as a rehabilitation measure to assist veterans to engage in farming on a full or part-time basis following their discharge from active service in World War II. This is clear from the following sections of the preamble to the act:

> Whereas many men now serving in the active forces of Canada have recorded their desire to settle on land or engage in farming when hostilities cease, and it is desirable that suitably qualified veterans be encouraged to seek rehabilitation in the agricultural industry;
> And whereas part-time farming coupled with other employment is an increasingly important aspect of rural and semi-rural life in Canada;
>
> And whereas it is in the public interest as a measure of rehabilitation to assist in acquiring the ownership of farm homes by qualified veterans;
> And whereas it is the purpose of the dominion government to provide a measure of financial assistance to veterans on their performance of prescribed settlement conditions in order to promote their engaging in agricultural pursuits either as a full-time occupation or as a part-time occupation coupled with some other employment.

The original purpose of the act has been amply fulfilled. By March 31 next, 30 years will have elapsed since the end of World War II. After such a lengthy period of time, it is difficult to contend that there is any continuing need for the act to assist veterans to rehabilitate themselves for a career in civilian life. In this connection, I would remind hon. members that the act was one of three alternative rehabilitation plans. The university training plan was concluded in the mid-fifties. The re-establishment credit program terminated on October 31, 1968. The periods in which these two other alternative measures were available were considered to be adequate and appropriate. It seems evident that parliament had the same opinion about the Veterans' Land Act when it gave unanimous approval in 1965 to the establishment of a terminal date for phasing out new settlement in an orderly manner over a span of nine years. By next March, that period will have extended to ten years and, as I stated earlier, 30 years since the end of World War II. Any veteran seriously interested in settling on the land has had ample time to do so.

[Editors' note: See page 1089 for section of speech omitted at this point]

Earlier in my remarks I referred to the agricultural orientation of the Veterans' Land Act. It was on the basis of that concept, and on the experience of the Soldier Settlement Act, that the benefit provisions and other terms of the Veterans' Land Act were premised. With respect to land settlement in the post-World War II years, there is no question that the original concepts and provisions were sound and invaluable to the successful establishment of the many thousands of veterans who elected to seek rehabilitation in civilian life under the VLA program. However, with the technological socioeconomic and other changes that have occurred in the past decade or more, I do not believe those concepts and legislative provisions are relevant today—particularly when the principal, if not the only, desire of veterans is to use the act as a means of acquiring a retirement home, mainly in urban areas.

It is really unnecessary for me to point out that such use is inconsistent with the purpose and intent of the legislation, as well as being irrational in relation to the premises on which the financial provisions of the act were developed. In all the circumstances, Madam Speaker, and after the most serious further study of this matter, I wish to state that it is not the intention of the government to introduce admendments to extend the lending deadlines which are contained in the Veterans' Land Act.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I expressed the view a moment ago that an urban housing program for veterans who have reached or are approaching retirement from post-war careers is inconsistent with an agriculturally-oriented rehabilitation program which was designed to assist veterans following their discharge from wartime active service. This is not to say that many low or modest income veterans do not have needs in respect of housing. On the contrary, it is realized that many do and that their requirements or preferences are varied in nature. It is in recognition of that awareness, and of the greater relevancy of the provisions of the National Housing Act to those needs, that a study has been undertaken to examine whether special arrangements should be made to assist such veterans. Because discussions are still in process, I am not in a position to comment further at this time. I am hopeful, however, that it will be possible for me to do so in the not too distant future.

Mr. Forrestall: Why don't you extend it until the study is completed?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

VETERANS' LAND ACT

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF TERMINAL DATE OF PROGRAM

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to review the terminal date of March 31, 1975, now specified in the Veterans' Land Act, and to report thereon to the House within the time limit set out in chapter 3 of the Statutes of 1974.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for their excellent presentations and for the hard work they have done on behalf of Canada's war veterans in the past several years. I do not intend to speak at great length. I am sure the legitimacy of my views will be demonstrated by the large number of hon. members who share them. First, I would like to say that I am thankful for the opportunity to speak on this issue and grateful to my colleagues who have reopened this debate, for they appreciate the necessity for changes in the current legislation. And changes there must be, not only to the terminal date of March 31, 1975, but also to a number of other limitations in the bill. One change by itself would be useless.

First of all, if the intent of the act is to assist veterans in settling and building a house in Canada today, then the land size requirements and the limits on loans are ridiculous. The Canadian who can buy half an acre of land and erect an inhabitable dwelling on it for $18,000 would be unique, and awfully lucky, in view of the tremendous rise in building materials' and all other costs in the last six years under this government, a government that is apparently set against an increase in the loan ceiling for our veterans. Past members of the Canadian armed forces, even if trained in the area of real estate to the degree the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) envisages for present members of the forces, would find this an impossible task.

There is evidence of this fact in the 5 per cent over-all decrease in new house construction in the last fiscal year, compared to the previous year, and the 25 per cent reduction in Ontario. Suitable land cannot be found. The lot requirement of half an acre must be lowered to a reasonable size in relation to today's needs and land prices.

When one considers the unprecedented inflation rate prevalent since the last loan limit increase, I do not think there can be a case argued against raising this limit substantially. In order to stay in step with today's costs, I believe a ceiling of $30,000 is much more reasonable than the present limit and is, in fact, very necessary.

One of the main reasons for there being such a large number of veterans who have not applied for loans under the Veterans' Land Act is the simple fact that the terms were much too limiting for many of them to take advantage of the loan offer. Suitable land in favourable areas was just not available, hence the fact that 150,000 veterans who are certified eligible for loans have not yet applied. In order for these people to receive the benefits of this program, the application deadline of March 31, 1975, should be extended or lifted.

There is one further deadline that bears scrutiny. I am sure all the hon. members know the one to which I refer, which is the October, 1968, deadline for certification of eligibility. There are a number of reasons for this to be repeated, such as the number of misunderstandings that resulted from there being two deadlines in the legislation, and the lack of effective communication of the real meaning of this deadline to the veterans. All hon. members are well aware of the large number of veterans who have been denied benefits as a result of genuine, honest mistakes. A huge volume of mail has been received to that effect by all of us. These people are another group who cannot be arbitrarily denied benefits, because, if each case could be tried on its own merits, each would certainly be judged deserving of those benefits. If this revision were made in conjunction with those aims already stated, I believe a far greater number of veterans of Canada's wars would be able to receive genuine and well deserved benefit from the Veterans' Land Act.

When considering these changes, I think it is very necessary to remember that we owe the existence of this institution, and a great many others in this great land of ours, to the actions and heroics of these people. Had these veterans been stingy in deciding what they would give up in defence of their country, we might not be here today with the right of decision that we now enjoy. All members of the House should support this motion, I submit.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, at first glance the motion before the House might be considered routine. On inspecting it closely, however, one finds that it involves veterans. It seems to have become common practice since early 1973 for the opposition to divide the House on party lines on matters relating to veterans. I served on the veterans affairs committee in the last parliament, and I serve on it in this parliament. I have so served since 1968. I can say sincerely that the committee has been almost completely non-partisan and has rarely divided. Usually, all members have worked together and discussed a matter until consensus has been reached. That is why I feel so uncomfortable about today's debate. In the last two years we have witnessed a partisan approach to the problems of veterans. Fewer members of this House are veterans as compared with the last two parliaments, when I believe about 25 per cent of the members were veterans.

An hon. Member: Are you a veteran?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): An hon. member asks if I am a veteran. Let me refer him to the little red book, the Parliamentary Guide, and he will see whether or not I am a veteran. I have always been concerned about the welfare of veterans, and always will be. For that reason I support the minister in his endeavours.

Although fewer members now are veterans, we must not forget that the number of veteran members serving at present is considerably lower than the number serving in the first parliament after 1945. Nevertheless, the veterans affairs committee of the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth parliaments was perhaps one of the busiest committees of the House of Commons. Naturally, all committees worked harder because the rules were changed and estimates of various departments were considered in committee, not in committee of the whole.

Mr. Alexander: But you are a navy man, Joe.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Even so, the veterans affairs committee did a tremendous job. There was a tremendous spirit of co-operation among the parties and veterans' associations. That, essentially, was the spirit in which the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs worked, the committee on which many members of the opposition have been most active. As I said, the committee worked in a non-partisan way. Its efforts were bent to providing better pensions, better health services, better welfare services and more special assistance to veterans, rather than to partisan activities.

The idea of reviewing the terminal date of VLA is not new. It was extended in 1959 to 1962. In 1962 it was extended to 1968, and in 1965 it was extended from 1968 to 1974. In 1974 it was extended to 1975. I raise these points in order to reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) who was concerned about the Veterans' Land Act and suggested that the government is not doing as much as it might. I would remind hon. members that the Conservatives were in power in 1962, and if they had been as concerned then as they say they are today, they could have extended the act beyond 1968—to 1978 or 1980. There was no reason they could not have done so; they had the strongest government of any, with more than 200 members to support them. Now they are in opposition, they sing a different song.

● (1700)

The article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of March 13 was a good one. The author referred to this issue as a political sacred cow. I think he is right, and I believe hon. members on the other side are using it as such. This article should be read by anyone who has not yet done so. A lot of credit is given to the minister for the stand he has taken. Once again, members are being called upon to consider this act. We are proud of our Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) who has extended this legislation to March 31, 1975. He has always turned an understanding ear when requests have been made to him, regardless of political affiliation. He has always been most co-operative in trying to understand the veteran's point of view, because he himself is a veteran. We are proud of his wartime career. We are proud of his career as a farmer in his native province of Prince Edward Island. We are proud of his career as Minister of Agriculture in that province, and of the work he has done in this parliament for every one of its members and for every veteran in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): A year ago, the standing committee recommended that benefits to veterans who are incapacitated to the extent of 100 per cent be increased by relating them to a standard of living directly linked with minimum federal civil service wages. Some hon. members considered it would be very difficult for the minister to persuade his colleagues in the cabinet to accept this proposition, one which was first put forward in 1918 or 1919. The veterans' organizations had made representations on this subject for many, many years. However, the minister was able to bring forward this legislation in 1973.

We are proud of the way in which the minister has kept the budget of his department in line with the requirements of the men and women who are its responsibility. I note that in 1972 the budget provided for $432 million, and that for 1974-75 the estimate is $597 million—an increase of $165 million for the 200,000 people in this country who receive pension benefits at some level. Taking into account the minister's distinguished war record, I am sure most members of the House are willing to accept the hon. gentleman's word, coming as it does from one who is a veteran himself.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am entering into this debate at a late stage because I feel I should be at least on record as favouring the position taken by the mover and seconder of this motion. The question of the future of the Veterans' Land Act has been debated over and over again in the past two years, and it should now be clear to the government that its decision to terminate this important program was an unfortunate one.

My hon. friend from Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) has pointed out many times that to terminate the VLA would be to break faith with veterans who were told in all sincerity that their sacrifices in war would not be forgotten. There simply is no justification for ending this program. One reason which, in itself, is sufficient ground for its continuation is that there are still veterans who, for a variety of reasons, have not taken advantage of the act. All of us know the main reason why many thousands of veterans, qualified under the legislation, have not made application for loans. In the period immediately following World War II a man could buy a pretty nice home for $18,000, the limit placed on VLA advances. At that time, half-acre lots were plentiful in most parts of the country. A veteran could purchase an existing home, or build one himself, and still stay within the loan limit. There were homes on the market in almost every area, and building costs were within the reach of those who preferred to build.

All those conditions have changed. In the past few years, building costs have skyrocketed and at the same time it has been increasingly difficult for veterans to acquire existing homes. Moreover, it is no longer practical for anyone, veteran or otherwise, to expect to find a building lot anywhere near the half-acre size required by the VLA regulations. In fact, it is just about impossible to find a lot of that size in many areas of the country; and if he did find one, the average person simply could not afford to buy it. In any case, if money were spent on such a lot, there would be none left with which to build a house.

My hon. friends have already pointed out that the National Housing Act has been brought up to date from time to time; that it is now possible to get NHA loans of up to $30,000, or even more if one plans to buy a multiple dwelling. Under NHA, a purchaser can get by with a lower down payment than a veteran buying a home under VLA; and there are other directions in which the veteran is not getting a fair shake under this, his own program. The whole VLA program should be overhauled. It should reflect today's conditions in the housing market; it should also reflect the differing conditions which exist in various parts of the country. For instance, while it may still be possible to find a building lot large enough to qualify under VLA in some of the smaller communities, it would be ridiculous to expect to find such a lot in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal or any other city or large town. It is like saying to a veteran that he will just have to move to an area where such building lots are available, even if it means uprooting his family, giving up his job and leaving the area in which he has decided he wants to live. None of that makes any sense, but that is exactly what we are expected to accept as valid reasons why the VLA program should be phased out.

● (1710)

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), a very capable gentleman who I believe is trying to do a good job in his ministry, must surely realize that veterans have not been treated fairly with respect to the VLA program. While the minister cites the low percentage of eligible veterans who have taken advantage of the program in recent years, he does not tell us that the main reason is that the VLA terms of reference are so restrictive that they are not relevant to today's housing market. The lot size required is out of line with the established building lot sizes in most communities today, and the ceiling on loans of $18,000—I believe a veteran receives only $15,400 of that amount—does not cover more than half the cost of dwellings on the market in most parts of the country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, instead of rushing to put an end to this program, we should bring it into line with today's requirements and conditions, and then we would see whether or not these qualified veterans would come forward in large numbers to take advantage of it.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) concerning partisanship in veterans affairs. It has always appeared to me that veterans' legislation was based a great deal on non-partisanship, partly because as the minister indicated, in 1945 there was a large number of veterans. While the number of veterans since that time has decreased, it is safe to say that the members who have participated in this debate are well aware of fathers, brothers or relatives who served in wartime, and they well know the contribution made by veterans on behalf of this nation. Thus we have always treated veterans' legislation differently from any other.

The reason this discussion is taking place today does not have to do with whether or not the Conservatives decided that there would be a cut-off date, or whether the date was extended by a previous parliament. It goes back to a decision made in the last parliament. The last paliament was a minority parliament, and it was very easy for all members to be magnanimous in their treatment of veterans. I would point out to one of the previous speakers that part of this magnanimity arose from the fact that a commission sat for many months studying this problem and made certain recommendations that no Liberal government, at least in my experience, would have accepted, and I presume no Conservative government would either.

I therefore congratulate this Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) for accepting many of these recommendations, which have made the last years of many veterans much better. I think the reason these changes were made was that it was very easy for each party to put partisanship aside, and together make a decision that was fully in keeping with the needs and aspirations of our veterans, and indeed in keeping with our responsibility to them.

This has been a bad day for the veteran, Mr. Speaker. It has been a bad day for two reasons. First, I attended a meeting of the veterans affairs committee and heard the minister tell the veterans that he was not interested, or rather, to be fair, not that he was not interested, but that he did not believe it would be possible for him to extend the provisions of the act to those veterans who were not able to return to Canada after the first world war and stay for one year.

These people are now over 72 years of age. If you were 16 in 1918 you are 72 now, so we really are not talking about very many people. The minister said he did not think he could anticipate acceptance by his colleagues of an extension of the legislation to benefit those veterans who did not return to Canada for the specified 365 days. There are also several other minor amendments which the minister did not think he would be able to sell to his colleagues, and I suggest this may be because we now have a majority parliament, not a minority parliament.

I did not necessarily expect the minister to extend the date of this legislation, but I did think he would say to us that, although the legislation had to die, he was going to substitute a different type of legislation that would extend an advantage to a veteran and enable him to buy a retirement home with a grant of more liberal amount and, with a much smaller land requirement. But this was not the case.

The minister today sounded more like ministers of governments that I have heard over the years. This Minister of Veterans Affairs—and I say sincerely—has shown a rather unique willingness to examine propositions that have been put before him. Perhaps sometimes he has been slightly naive regarding the implications of such proposals when looked at in a positive way. But in saying today that the time had come to eliminate this kind of legislation, that if veterans are going to re-establish themselves they would have done so a long time ago, he reminded me very much of another minister of veterans affairs who spent a considerable time telling us that veterans' hospitals need no longer exist because there were not enough people to operate those hospitals, and that we should start giving them away so as to get better treatment for our veterans.

Most of the veterans I have talked to who have visited these institutions, which have been taken over by universities and other agencies, have not found that to be the case. The veterans' hospital was a unique institution. Quite often it was run by people who had served in the services, people who were dedicated to veterans' organizations, and who provided the type of service to veterans that may have been somewhat lacking in normal hospitals. This care improved their morale and gave them a better environment during the last years of their existence. I do not think the change we made in the hospital structure for veterans was advantageous.

If the minister is saying that those veterans who have not taken advantage of the Veterans' Land Act and smallholdings legislation should now come under the National Housing Act, I think he is being unfair if he is suggesting that this is to their advantage. Changes could have been made to VLA and probably would have been made. There really was no point in retaining the four-tenths of an acre stipulation, and perhaps we should have adopted the normal size acre in Parry Sound or New Liskeard, or wherever it might be. The lot might be 33 feet wide by 100 feet long, or 50 feet wide by 150 feet long, all depending on the practice of the community in which it is located. In any event, some fluidity should be adopted in that regard with relation to the vicinity or the community in which a person lived. This might not be of any advantage to veterans living outside organized communities, but perhaps that is what we should have done.

One fact that is not generally known to members of this House who have not been concerned with veterans over a period of time is that when veterans' legislation was established the money was put into a number of veterans' funds for use under the land act, and by various agencies regarding re-establishment credits and other things. In each case when those funds were returned they were not returned to the agency that provided the money but to the treasury. That means that a great deal of money goes to the treasury in this way.

Had we originally established a revolving fund under veterans' legislation the minister would now be looking after a sizeable account, and perhaps more consideration would be given to the reinvestment of that money for the benefit of veterans. Because this money goes back into the general account of the nation the amount does not appear to be very large. The return on VLA loans is very large but the output would be relatively small, and perhaps we should do something about the interest rate.

In the legislation we are considering there was another consideration not followed in respect of the National Housing Act. I refer to the restriction placed on veterans because of the advantage they were receiving over those who had to deal on the general commercial market. That restriction was that a veteran had to live in the house built under the Veterans' Land Act for a period, I believe, of at least 10 years before being entitled to full benefits.

Perhaps the government should have followed this practice in respect of national housing, and retained title in all properties for a 10-year period. This would have prevented speculation by individuals who built housing under government legislation. I agree that there might have to be some trade-off because of conditions of mobility which exist in respect of the majority of young people today resulting from job changes, transfers and the like. We would have to provide some flexibility in respect of that 10 year period to cover these changes in jobs, moves and transfers.

If we had some such restriction in respect of national housing it would not be possible for young couples to build a home and profit by the sale of that house in the first six months, perhaps the result of a breakup in their marriage. I suggest this has been the case, and many of these people have been able to double their original investment in a short period of time.

That is a situation which has not existed in respect of veterans' legislation, probably evidenced by the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is still one of the largest landowners in this country, holding more deeds to property than any other government agency. He probably has not considered the number of properties that require his signature to be transferred, but I imagine the number would be much greater than the number for which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) is responsible, even though he in effect owns or controls all the land in the right of Canada.

Controls of that nature restrict profiteering on land, and I am sure the specific control under the veterans' administration has prevented speculative purchasing by many young people. We could benefit from the extension of that type of legislation to the national housing field, with the result that benefits would be provided young people except for speculative purposes through quick sales.

I am not suggesting that all CMHC loans be transferred to the Department of Veterans Affairs, but loans under veterans' legislation have been administered very well over the years. This type of control has created stability for the individual buying property, and for the communities in which veterans live. In my home town most of the houses built under the small holdings legislation are still occupied by the people who built them, and I think this is true in a large percentage of the cases throughout the country.

I do not believe that members of this House are different from members in past years. I think the difference which now is becoming apparent is a partisan difference resulting from the majority position of the government. The amendment by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), was not considered last year to be partisan. The motion was supported unanimously.

This year the motion accepted unanimously by a previous parliament seems to have become a partisan thing. Apparently the minister will not agree to look at this piece of legislation extending the period of time. I think that by the one-year extension we probably made it possible for an additional 5,000 veterans to take advantage of the act.

Having regard to the original deadlines, surely anyone can admit that he was wrong. I was one of the individuals here in 1965. I was a member of the committee at the time, and heard officials of the department say there was no real advantage in continuing this legislation beyond the deadline as all the people were covered. The officials of the department have said from time to time they have not been busy servicing these loans as the number of applications has been dropping off. At that time we accepted their word and set the deadline for three years from then. During that time nothing really came to light which changed our opinion.

[Mr. Peters.]

However, when the 1974 deadline came in view everyone agreed unanimously that we should have another look at it. As a result we unanimously extended the deadline by one year. I suggest that the fact we have a majority government may be the reason for the partisanship feeling we have today. I certainly hope that is not the reason this legislation is not being changed.

In closing, I would say that as far as I am concerned I am pleased to listen to any suggestions the minister has in terms of changing the legislation. Over the years we have decided that the cost involved was too great to cover all small holdings, and we have found that in the case of many of the people involved it has been too difficult to look after the required amount of land. If I remember correctly the original stipulation was two acres, but we have reduced that. It was reduced two or three times. It now has been reduced to the point where a piece of property may be contiguous to another piece of property and thereby make up the required four-tenths of an acre. Over the years we have come to realize that what we are talking about now is perhaps a retirement home rather than re-establishment property for veterans. We realize that many people who are retiring do not wish to become involved in agriculture but wish to have a small retirement residence. This may be a first home. It may be a long distance from where the person conducted his business.

Perhaps this is a benefit we can give to some veteran who has not been able to obtain a home in some other way. He might wish to leave the locality in which he worked before retirement and move to another community where life is a little slower, and where he may find living expenses to be more within his means.

I suggest it is unfair to those who have not taken advantage of the provisions of this legislation for the government to turn down the request for extension. One of my colleagues just a few minutes ago mentioned that he is a veteran. He said that he knew of this piece of legislation, but that until he came here and heard the discussion several years ago he did not know there was a cut-off date. He had never heard about that. I think that sometimes inside this building we believe everything we have said here has been passed on to everyone in the country. That really is not the case. There are people who did not know the cut-off date was 1968.

If the minister wishes to continue in the jovial, genial and generous manner he displayed in respect of veterans and during the last minority parliament with regard to the Woods Commission Report and the changes that were made in respect of veterans legislation, I would like to see him say that he is in favour of eliminating the 1968 qualifying date, and also the other date.

If this were the case I do not think the minister would be overly generous. We would not be giving these people very much. We would merely be providing them with what they need in respect. of housing. At this period of their lives they probably are in a position to augment that to some degree. It will come back to us. We will hold the mortgages on those properties in any event.

Particularly in this month, Mr. Speaker, when people should be thinking of the evils of war and the penalties people must pay for war, I do not believe average citizens throughout Canada would feel the minister was abusing their tax dollars if he would reverse the decision that obviously he has taken. If the minister were to make the decision to extend this legislation I am sure the many veterans in this country who would have 5, 10 or 15 years in their own homes would beatify the ministry of this particular minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, this contribution on my part in the debate on the Veterans' Land Act, is the fourth or fifth one. I have no objection to my doing so or to the hon. members opposite doing so whenever it will be necessary in the House and wherever we are given the opportunity to protect the interests of those who fought with us during the dark years from 1939 to 1945 and later on the Korean battlefields.

Every time we do so, we like on either side to say and to repeat that it is without partisanship. I must admit I am doing so today in a partisan spirit, a spirit I feel for my former comrades in arms, especially at this time of the year, in November, where 37 or 38 years ago conditions were not as good, as easy, as peaceful as they are now in the world. Considering the community of interest that all veterans feel for their former comrades in arms, the handicapped or the disabled ones as well as those who never came back, we must earnestly try to find for the former a solution to the various problems they are faced with.

The problem facing us today is precisely a legislation passed in 1942 by the Canadian government in favour of those veterans, that is an act providing for their reestablishment on farms. It was extended and the first time we extended it with a time limit, it was in 1962 and it was not the liberals but a conservative government, which set a time limit to the renewal of the benefits granted under the legislation. I wonder whether my progressive-conservative colleagues can approve of that 1962 policy to limit the benefit period under that legislation and what prompted them to do so. Did they think that the veterans' needs would change some day? As for me, I trust those who set a limit to the benefits at that time. They thought that some day, a limit would have to be set to the benefit period and that an alternative would have to be found. As a matter of fact, if we look at the preamble of the act that I quoted in my speech on March 12, 1974, I said and I quote:

Whereas many men now serving in the active forces of Canada have recorded their desire to settle on land or engage in farming when hostilities cease, and it is desirable that suitably qualified veterans be encouraged to seek rehabilitation in the agricultural industry;

● (1740)

Mr. Speaker, already in the act the matter of required qualifications was raised without reference being made to competence; at that time however farming was a lot easier than it is today, because it is now an industrialized and mechanized operation, which is not easy for everyone to enter successfully.

The preamble of the act stated that a veteran, or a person wanting to enter that very honourable field, had to meet certain qualification criteria. I quote:

Whereas part-time farming coupled with other employment is an increasingly important aspect of the rural and semi-rural life in Canada;

During the years 1942-43 it was still possible for a healthy person to actually have two jobs, work eight to ten hours a day in an industry, a store or any other business, and also farm on a part-time basis. The veteran coming back home and raising a family is a lot more captive at home than when one reaches my age, for example.

It was already possible for a veteran to farm while at the same time having another job. However, the problem is quite different today in the month of March 1974 and the month of November of 1973 when one considers that, on the average, veterans are 59 or 60 years old. That is not the age when a person considers going into a new career, particularly farming, because when one considers today all the complications imposed on someone who has the training to enter that industry, one sees that the act concerning the establishment of veterans contains a very wise provision respecting a "prerequisite" in addition to competence. Later, in 1962, the government set certain limits. Admittedly, it was already recognized that there could perhaps be other solutions to the problem, and such an alternative is precisely what I want to talk about—the Farm Credit Corporation.

When the Farm Credit Corporation was established in 1959 by the Farm Credit Act, it is said that this corporation was created to replace the Canadian Farm Loan Corporation. Its major objective is to grant long term mortgage loans under favourable terms and conditions liable to help Canadian farmers establish family farms on a profit-making basis and to promote the development of a healthy and competitive agricultural industry.

It also administers the Farm Credit Act which provides for loans to groups or syndicates. If you examine the Corporation's annual report for 1972-73, Mr. Speaker, you will soon notice that the spirit prevailing when the Veterans' Land Act was passed is no more. The situation has changed a lot since then. The average loan granted by the Farm Credit Corporation in 1970-72 amounted to $35,173 compared to $28,430 for the previous year. Within one year, the average loan rose by approximately $7,000 and an additional 1,200 loans were granted.

What I want to bring to the attention of this House concerning the Farm Credit Corporation, Mr. Speaker, is mainly the spirit of the Act which provides that the person to whom a loan is granted must have appropriate training. This is not an undertaking that beckons when one is 60 years old.

And the proof that this is not an undertaking upon which one embarks when one is 60 years old is that when you consider the average age of those who asked for or were granted loans in 1971-72, only 5.4 per cent of the borrowers were over 54 years old. And of those who asked for or were granted a loan, the great majority, 75 per cent, were 35 or younger.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the age of those who are presently taking farms over to turn them into a profitable operation which will bring success to them and their family.

As a matter of fact, this is not a business venture that a 55 year old veteran who has worked for the Post Office or another department or for a private concern can successfully take over and manage. We have but to think of those who were brought up on farms who have devoted their lives to farming, who are now having problems making ends meet and feel they must resort to radical actions judged very severely by Canadians to demonstrate the problems they are faced with.

If the people that were trained for it and lived on a farm experience difficulties, imagine what hardships a middle-aged veteran will have to face.

Mr. Speaker, I did convince my colleagues that the veterans problem is that they did not avail themselves of the other benefits, namely the loan for starting in business or for university education. The minister would do a bad turn to the 80,000 veterans holding a certificate if he embarked them on a venture with exceedingly low chances of success.

Mr. Speaker, that is something I would not be a party to.

Those members who were here in 1973 will recall the efforts by the government and the minister of Veterans Affairs to promote the redemption of certificates by veterans, whether or not they had availed themselves of the statutory benefits. They will also remember campaigns aimed at Canadian Legion sections across the country, and advertisements in veterans publications, calling for the veterans to avail themselves of the benefits provided by the act.

At that time, some came forward for redemption of their right. Since 1968, Mr. Speaker, twenty thousand have availed themselves of their rights.

I wish those holding certificates could use them rather than feeling, as I and other colleagues do, that the time for applications under the act is over.

Since farming and rural settlement come to a much larger degree under the responsibility of another department, I wonder whether the Department of Veterans Affairs would not overextend itself if it went once more into a venture for which much expertise already exists in another department.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether insistence could not be made to bear upon the minister, in order that the very important problem of veteran settlement be reviewed, without developing an act that would restrict very dangerously the veterans' chances of success.

I listened this afternoon to remarks by my hon. colleagues opposite, as I did in March last or November 1973. I heard nothing in the way of a solution comparable to the one I just mentioned, that is considering the possibility that another department or agency might find the key to the problem, that is the continuance of benefits provided by the act.

[English]

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak in the debate on the Veterans' Land Act. I believe that in my constituency in Victoria, B.C. there are probably more veterans than any other constituency, at least on a percentage basis.

Along with my colleagues, I was rather shocked at the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) who said, at the start of his address, that the Veterans Committee has always been a non partisan committee on a non partisan subject, and then proceeded to be quite partisan himself.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McKinnon: I am sure that he regrets it, as we all do. I have been privileged to serve on some committees of the House that are nonpartisan, and it has always been a pleasure.

The minister made some comments that left me somewhat puzzled. I understood him to say in his speech this afternoon that there are some veterans overseas who might be qualified, and that his representatives had talked to some of them who had not seen fit to take up their options to purchase land under the Veterans' Land Act. I am somewhat skeptical of the likelihood of anybody wishing to buy land that he had not seen, and that in fact is in another country.

With regard to the remarks about the article in the Globe and Mail—and I have not had time to get it from the library since the hon. member from St. Boniface brought it up—let me point out that, so far as I recall, it pointed out that perhaps the VLA should be wound up because there were not enough veterans taking advantage of it. Surely that is not a reason for closing up VLA. That is a reason for looking at it again and deciding why they are not taking advantage of their options.

When you have on record between 125,000 and 150,000 veterans who qualified to purchase land under the Veterans Land Act and who ask for the certificate, and then you find that nobody is buying the land, I do not think you can say this means they do not want it. The truth is that it is financially impossible for them to buy the land.

I believe this Veterans' Land Act followed the Soldier Settlement Act of World War I, and until a few years ago the government supplied a mortgage of $15,400 and the veteran paid $2,600, making $18,000. The veteran could buy an $18,000 home provided it was on .4 acres of land, but a dwindling number of veterans have been taking advantage of this. Anybody who could buy a piece of property with a house on it anywhere in this country today for $18,000 must have an uncommon ability.

At the conclusion of his remarks the minister pointed out that the government is aware of the need for low and modest income homes. He said:

> It is in recognition of that awareness, and of the greater relevancy of the provisions of the National Housing Act to those needs, that a study has been undertaken to examine whether special arrangements should be made to assist such veterans.
> Because discussions are still in progress, I am not in a position to comment further at this time. I am hopeful, however, that it will be possible for me to do so in the not too distant future.

This is asking the House to cancel VLA in exchange for a promise about which the minister is not prepared to speak. It would have been much better if the minister had transformed his cloudy promise into legislation, and brought the legislation here as a quid pro quo for the Veterans' Land Act. In dealing with governments a bird in the hand is worth much more than a promise. It is the government which has permitted VLA to become unworkable. The government says nobody wants land because people are not applying for it. That is like saying people in Bangladesh are starving to death because they are not buying food. It is impossible for veterans to buy land and build a home now under the Veterans Land Act. It is sheer chicanery for the government to say the act is not needed any more because veterans are not taking advantage of it.

I should like to say a few words on how the act could still be used, Mr. Speaker. Many veterans, and I was one, stayed in the service after World War II. Because they were posted from one part of the country to another they did not buy a home but planned to do so when they retired. They are at that age now, and I am sure some of them are among the 125,000 to 150,000 certified veterans who have not taken up the option to buy land. Upon retirement they found they had a "Catch 22" bill—if they could find a property and put a building on it they could have a low term mortgage. Of course they were much too late.

The minister, and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), raised the question of veterans' hospitals and I should like to comment on something that was brought to my attention recently. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Timiskaming. The transfer of veterans' hospitals to civilians and civilian organizations has not gone well. In Victoria the coronary care unit of the veterans' hospital was closed, and now any veteran who has a heart attack in that hospital has to be taken to the nearby civilian hospital by ambulance. They are closing down the outpatient department and this leaves many patients, particularly the aging ones, in a terrible position. They consider the veterans' hospital doctor to be their family doctor; now they are turned away and told to go to a doctor of their choice.

The Department of Veterans Affairs convinced veterans' associations that the change was inevitable and they might as well relax and enjoy it. They also convinced the staff that they would be better off if the province took over the hospital. The only people they did not talk to or consider were the hospital patients. I believe this transfer to be a tremendous disservice and I want to put my objection on the record, Mr. Speaker. It is a mistake and it should be rectified.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, may I take a moment of the time of the House to say what a pleasure it is to have you in the chair. Your presence reminds me of a cavalry general who had done nothing in a battle. When asked what he had done, he replied that he had lent colour and dash to what otherwise would have been a vulgar brawl. I feel the same way about your presence here.

At six o'clock I had been speaking on the veterans' hospital in Victoria, and I have a few more comments on that topic before I yield the floor to others who wish to participate in this debate.

The decision to turn the hospital in Victoria over to the province was announced some six months ago. As to when the decision was made, only the minister knows, but it was made some considerable time before discussions began, I believe.

I am not in favour of hospitals having empty beds. I have no complaints about any efforts made to make fuller use of scarce medical facilities. However, I object to the fact that the treatment of veterans in the Victoria and Vancouver Island area is not of the same standard it was before the changes. Elderly veterans, who for years were accorded out-patient status at the Victoria hospital, are no longer able to get medicine at the familiar dispensary. They are no longer able to see their usual doctor who knew them personally and their problems. They feel insecure in the strangeness of the new rules and regulations. If they need minor surgery they can no longer be sure of admission to the operating theatre at the "Vets", particularly on Saturdays when the operating room is allotted exclusively to abortions. It is a sad commentary on our social values that this should happen.

In closing, Madam Speaker, let me return to the Veterans' Land Act. I remind the minister that many options are open to the government. I do not know what structures the government may have placed on the minister; certainly many options are open to the government, if only it will take them. Let the government rid itself of the idea that it can absolve itself of responsibility for veterans under the Veterans' Land Act by talking of the days when the act was used to settle soldiers on land.

Let us be honest. The provisions of the act were designed to provide shelter for veterans. The government should readjust its thinking and allow veterans to acquire modern shelter in modern times. Let it consider extending the terms of the Veterans' Land Act to cover the purchase of condominiums, the purchase of house trailers and of strata titles. The mortgage restriction should be changed. Instead of the $18,000 ceiling, the ceiling ought to be up to 85 per cent of the value of the holding. In other words, the government should cancel the existing ceiling governing the amount of money available for a mortgage. It should lessen the requirement for land. Really, you will not provide shelter for veterans if you insist on them holding .4 of an acre, or half an acre. The spirit and principle of the law are defeated by a technicality. In addition, the government should cancel immediately the 1968 and 1975 dates regarding the closing of certification to do with the purchase of land.

I submit that the minister should initiate, in consultation with veterans' organizations, a study to enable amending legislation to be drafted which will satisfy the real, present day needs of veterans.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on the motion to review the termination date, March 31, 1975, for applications under the Veterans' Land Act as at present specified in that act. Many members debating this issue are, like me, veterans of World War II, the war which we believed would be the last major conflict. Perhaps that is a slim hope.

During the past few years, particularly the last year, motions have been introduced to disregard or extend the deadline for applications under the Veterans' Land Act. Such motions are understandable, as they ask the government to give continued benefits to men and women who responded to their country's need in time of war. Such motions were considered carefully last year and turned down. However, the minister agreed to reconsider the matter. Finally, the official opposition brought in a motion of non-confidence. No one needs to tell me that that motion was not used as a political lever in an attempt to bring about the collapse of the government.

The minister had taken pains to make sure that every veteran who really wanted to, could avail himself of the provisions of the act. He was supported by the Royal Canadian Legion and other veterans' organizations in his decision. The official opposition said it had no wish to unseat the government; it moved its motion out of a desire to help veterans. Madam Speaker, I think they were speaking with tongue in cheek.

Also, the then NDP leader protested that the question of political advantage did not enter the minds of his party. He hoped the veterans would realize that the Progressive Conservatives were ready to play politics with the welfare of the veterans.

Mr. Marshall: We will remember that.

Mr. Railton: Personally I would have had a difficult time supporting the government if the minister had not reconsidered this matter. Why do I say this? When I was a certain age—it is close to the average of World War II veterans—I, myself, had taken out a VLA loan to help me buy some land and a house on the shores of Lake Erie. Indeed, at the time this matter was last discussed in the previous parliament, I did not wish to prevent any veteran from doing exactly what I had done. But my soul searching ended when the minister promised to reconsider the termination date for applications. So we, on all sides of the House, were able to vote for the motion with a clear conscience.

Since then I have had many inquiries from friends and constituents who are World War II veterans. I find that no one is very likely to be injured by closing off applications at the end of March, 1975. This gives me a personal freedom in not supporting the motion.

● (2010)

When one reads the preamble to the original act there can, I think, be no doubt that the government of the day wished to favour those young Canadians who flocked to the colours voluntarily and defended their country so gloriously. It can be seen from the preamble that the government wished not only to reward returning veterans after the second world war but also to create some incentive which would encourage young people to leave their jobs and join the forces.

[Mr. Railton.]

At this stage we know there are some 100,000 veterans who have bought property with the help of VLA. Almost half of these, about 48,500, are still living on those properties and are repaying their loans. Another 40,000 of those still on their land have finished paying their debts.

When one considers that although the average age of those returning from the war was 24 and that the average age of veterans is now between 55 and 60, we realize that these citizens have thus had 30 years to consider land purchase under the Veterans' Land Act. In my many years of practice in Welland since the war, I find that a great many of the veterans there are 60 years of age or more. Thus, Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether there are more than a very few veterans who will even consider using the VLA to assist them in buying a home. Though it is true the cost of land and housing is very high today, and a grant would certainly be of some help, other borrowing possibilities would need to be open to the average veteran.

The mover and seconder of the motion before us are well known for their compassion toward veterans. Indeed, I believe that any speaker in this debate must be described in the same way, as being compassionate. However, when I got over my personal hurdle last year and satisfied myself that the act was no longer needed for its original purpose I found myself against extending the expiry date, being satisfied that none of our honoured veterans is likely to be hurt if the date now set for expiry remains unaltered.

I have listened carefully to the speeches of hon. members opposite and can find no new point in them. The present extension was made in a minority parliament and there were, therefore, some special considerations which had to be taken into account. These no longer apply. Needless expense should be eliminated in these times of inflation and of a national situation which is so serious, and so the act should be allowed to expire. This would still permit some new commitments to be made in favour of eligible veterans in the next few months.

We belong to a group composed of only a very few countries which operate a Department of Veterans Affairs. Our departmental budget this year is around $600 million. This is evidence of our deep concern for Canadian veterans, even if nothing else is mentioned. In addition, we have today reported Bill C-4 to increase war veterans allowances in a very generous manner. It is possible that some method for the preferential treatment of veterans seeking to build or purchase homes can be worked out. I would support a new act to allow war pensioners and recipients of WVA to be helped in this manner.

Indeed it would be very nice if all veterans could qualify for some help under the National Housing Act. I do not know how this can be worked out; it would be up to the minister and the cabinet. In the meantime I should like to congratulate the minister on his compassion and also on his wisdom in the handling of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Madam Speaker, it is with considerable pride that I participate in this debate. May I begin by congratulating the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on the contributions they have made to this debate, as well as on their past interest and concern in all matters affecting war veterans.

I want, also, to join with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) in his condemnation of the opening remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), and to take issue with the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) for implying that partisan politics are involved in this debate. Since my election in 1972 I have been impressed by the non-partisan approach which has been demonstrated by all parties in matters which affect veterans. It is precisely this attitude which has prompted me to speak on the motion before us, believing this to be a forum in which reasonable attitudes and approaches will be recognized.

I might add that I join with the hon. member for St. Boniface in his congratulations of the minister who is recognized as one of our great heroes and outstanding Canadians. I know he is concerned about the welfare of veterans. Indeed, he has demonstrated this concern and compassion during his tenure in office. I am certain the minister will be understanding of and sympathetic to reasonable arguments which are presented in this chamber, and I am equally confident that his compassion and generosity will prompt him to see justice is served and that he will reconsider the statement he made this afternoon.

I think it is important to note and record in Hansard that members on both sides of the House have paid tribute to our veterans, emphasizing the contributions they have made to Canadian society. Again, I am hopeful that before this debate is over our action will demonstrate unity in protecting the rights of veterans with respect to this most important issue.

Despite the minister's statement this afternoon I still remain confident that at the conclusion of the debate he will recognize the importance of this legislation to thousands of veterans that he will also recognize the sincerity of the speeches made by those who represent the views of countless Legion members and veterans across Canada, and acknowledge that there is still widespread support for the continuation of the legislation. It is also my hope that the minister will not only extend the expiry date of the act but provide a vehicle for meaningful amendments which will correct existing injustices.

Personally I have not had the privilege of serving in the armed forces, but I have had the opportunity in my constituency of Lambton-Kent of having a warm relationship with the Canadian Legion, particularly in my home town of Wallaceburg where I was installed as an honorary member of their branch. I am proud of their traditions and the innumerable contributions they have made to the community.

Whether by accident or design, it is particularly fitting that this debate is taking place just prior to Remembrance Day. It is important to recall the purpose and meaning of that day when we pay tribute to those who made the supreme sacrifice in the name of freedom, when we extend our sympathy to the families and friends whose loss of loved ones has left permanent scars, and when we remember with pride the members of the Legion for the sacrifices they made, the traditions they hold and, above all, their loyalty to our country.

As parliamentarians, our words, acts and deeds must transcend this important day, and it is our responsibility in this chamber to translate not only our gratitude but that of the Canadian people into tangible results defending the rights of our veterans. I would say to the minister, indeed to all members in the House, that a generous response on the part of the government to this important matter would have significantly more value and meaning than all the words spoken by hon. members on Remembrance Day.

During the debate on the Veterans' Land Act on March 28, 1974, and again in his statement today, the minister—and I say this with all respect—attempted to defend his position by developing in some detail the original intent of the legislation. As reported at page 948 of Hansard for March 28, 1974, the minister said:

> I should like to remind hon. members that the original purpose of the Veterans' Land Act was to assist in the rehabilitation of veterans in the postwar period, following wartime active service, and to do so by helping them to settle on the land in rural or semi-rural areas as full or part-time farmers.
> The intent of the legislation in these respects was clearly spelled out in the preamble to the act, and I think it is relevant to quote the following parts of the preamble:
> "Whereas many men now serving in the active forces of Canada have recorded their desire to settle on land or engage in farming when hostilities cease, and it is desirable that suitably qualified veterans be encouraged to seek rehabilitation in the agricultural industry;
>
> "And whereas part-time farming coupled with other employment is an increasingly important aspect of rural and semi-rural life in Canada;
>
> "And whereas it is in the public interest as a measure of rehabilitation to assist in acquiring the ownership of farm homes—"

I emphasize the word "homes".

> "—by qualified veterans—".

This in fact is the crux of the debate in this chamber today, and resolution of this problem is essential if additional, meaningful amendments are to be forthcoming and, may I add, should be forthcoming.

I will admit that the minister is accurate in a legal sense in presenting this view, and I am certain that all members are well aware of the original intention of the bill. Approximately 30 years have passed since the introduction of the legislation, and social and economic pressures have diluted the original concept with its emphasis on a home in a rural or semi-rural setting. However, I must emphasize that the desire and need for the establishment of a home are as relevant today as they were 30 years ago.

Who was able to predict with accuracy the rush to urbanization? Who sensed the great threat to our rich agricultural lands and the necessity for planning to preserve this valuable resource? Who predicted the unrealistic cost of lots and homes, and the unrealistic legislation that presently exists to meet these needs?

The principle of homes for our veterans is as valid today as when the legislation was first introduced. Indeed the problem is more critical today in that large numbers of veterans are experiencing difficulties in finding a place to live during their retirement.

I would respectfully suggest that if legislation were being drafted today, as I am certain it would following a similar armed conflict, the preamble would once again emphasize the importance of a home as in the original legislation, but the details would be equated with the social and economic forces existing at the present time.

I realize that the minister indicated in his speech this afternoon that there would be a study to determine whether such a program should be introduced. I have great respect for the minister and I know he is sincere in the comments that he has made, but we have not seen the proposed legislation, and unfortunately we are dealing with the Liberal government and not the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Every member in this chamber has had representations from Legion branches and veterans asking for an indefinite extension of the date. Indeed, in the minister's speech on March 28 he indicated that very need, and I quote from the same page of Hansard:

In the current fiscal year, however, and more particularly in the last six months, there has been a significant increase in the number of loan applications. It is expected that the number of veterans who will have been settled this year will approximate 5,500—and there are a further 1,400 loan applications on hand awaiting appraisal.

I should add that this occurred at a time when the present qualifications are out of date in terms of current social and economic changes. I think it is significant to note that in the summer issue of "The Fragment" there is a full page ad on page 39 under the caption "Veteran's Land Act Extended to March 31, 1975 for Qualified Veterans". I commend the minister for this action but wish to underscore that such action implies the minister recognizes a large number of veterans are interested in participating in the program, and that the minister knows the terminal date of March 31, 1975, will not fulfil the veterans' needs. I say in all sincerity to the minister that his conscience cannot be sublimated by such an ad, and the ad is no substitution for action.

In the same summer issue of "The Fragment" there is an editorial entitled "Veterans' Land Act" which very concisely and succinctly summarizes the views of veterans and Legion branches across Canada. I should like to put them on the record of this House because they are important and express the situation much better than I could:

It seems obvious, from the reaction to the scheduled March 31st, 1974 deadline for application under the Veterans' Land Act, that this legislation can continue to serve a useful purpose for a number of years.

It is our contention that the issues have been unnecessarily complicated by figures and various data reports. We do not wish to oversimplify, but facts seem to speak for themselves:

(1) There are still many world war II veterans who wish to take advantage of this legislation.

(2) Should they wish to do so, they are required to repay their re-establishment credits.

(3) The cost to the taxpayer with regard to the Veterans' Land Act is negligible, particularly inasmuch as the mortgage rates for loans under part 3 of the act fluctuate with mortgage rates generally.

(4) Many of the veterans who now, or in the future, may wish to make use of the Veterans' Land Act could not do so in the years immediately following their discharge from the service, as they were attempting to rehabilitate themselves and were not in a financial position to purchase a home. If such persons are willing now to repay their re-establishment credit, it seems logical that they should not be deprived of the benefits of the Veterans' Land Act.

[Mr. Holmes.]

(5) Provisions under the act should be up-dated, in accordance with today's economy. It is to be noted that the government had no compunction about increasing the interest rates of loans under Part III when interest rates generally had escalated. It seems most appropriate that the government should also increase the loan ceiling in keeping with the upward revision in the cost of land and houses.

● (2030)

(6) The government should recognize also that the increased age of the world war II veteran population generally precludes individuals from the operation of a "small holding" which was the original basis of the requirement for one-half acre of land for a VLA mortgage. Also, the cost of land has increased to the point where the purchase of one-half acre would be prohibitive in most cases. Therefore the government should reduce the acreage requirement so that a VLA mortgage could be obtained by veterans wishing to build on municipal lots.

We are appreciative of the fact that the government has extended the deadline for a period of one year. It would seem appropriate now that:

(1) All Deadlines be removed from the act.

(2) The loan ceiling be removed on the amount available under VLA and this be made equivalent to the National Housing Act administered by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

(3) The one-half acre requirement be removed, so that a veteran could use the act for the purchase of municipal property.

In concluding, I should like to quote from the latter part of the minister's speech on March 28, 1974, at that time he stated:

It seems to me that when there is a reasonable doubt, we should not hesitate to decide in favour of the veterans. We must not forget that some years ago they did not hesitate when the survival or freedom was in doubt.

The minister went on to say:

I believe, Mr. Speaker, this extension will provide many veterans with the opportunity to take advantage of a program which was designed for them. It should be made quite clear that we are not doing this as a favour to veterans but simply as a right which they have earned.

I know the minister was sincere in making those comments earlier this year and I have no doubt that he holds those same views today. I place little credence in prophets and clairvoyants, but on this occasion I would implore the minister to use his good offices to ensure the fulfilment of those words.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Madam Speaker, judging from what the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has said, he would hold out some hope that veterans will receive some special consideration from the ministry of housing when he transfers his responsibilities to that department. It seems to me that what we should be doing, rather than transferring the kind of benefits we have traditionally offered veterans to a department whose record of success is meagre, to say the least, is transferring the responsibilities of that department to the Department of Veterans Affairs so that everyone in our population could appreciate or receive some of the benefits veterans have received.

In a few days across this country memorial services will be held to honour those who died in two world wars. The greatest tribute we can pay the dead, instead of paying lip service on that occasion, if we really want to honour the dead of our wars, would be by seeing to it that the benefits the veterans have received are extended to every member of our society. That would be a fine and lasting tribute, the kind of thing those men might have felt worthy of dying for, Madam Speaker. If the legislation we were able to implement on their behalf were extended to every member of society, that would be a great source of pride to every veteran in this country.

I am suggesting that we are going the wrong way. Instead of carrying on something which should be extended to all members of society we are now taking it away from the veterans, without enhancing society by doing so.

If we consider all veterans' legislation in this country I think most of us can take pride in the fact that our country behaved the way it did, in that veterans received reasonable treatment from their government. We can also take pride in the fact that many of the ideas which originated in respect of veterans' legislation, contained in the principle of assisting the veterans, have been incorporated in various sections of other legislation. For example, veterans receive hospitalization and medical care as a result of their service in the war. That coverage has been extended to all members of society. The question then arises, if assistance in other areas is the human thing to do in respect of veterans why should it not be applied to all members of society? I am sure that veterans would applaud that move.

Having regard to the field of housing, if programs in this area should be extended then why should any person be required to put a down payment on a home in this society? Is the credit of the average man so bad that we cannot trust him with a loan without a down payment? Let us consider what is happening because of this principle. If we do not move in that direction we get involved in all kinds of subsidies that probably cost a great deal more than a program which would simply permit people to obtain mortgage loans without a down payment.

In my opinion the cost of subsidization over the years is greater than a program which would simply allow people in our society to obtain mortgage loans. This would be of assistance to those people in our society who would work to pay off that mortgage, with the result that both the individual and the government would benefit.

The system we have in our society is not as good as it might be, and I have in mind various assistance and support programs. Under the veterans' legislation an individual who came out of the armed forces had the right to decide what he wanted to do with his credits. Such an individual could take a university course, he could apply his credits toward a small business loan in order to go into business for himself or become a farmer, or he could use those credits to buy a car or anything of that kind.

What are we doing under our present system? People should have credits in our society. If an individual has been lucky enough to have a nervous system which permitted him to get through high school he is able to use similar credits to go on to university. Another individual may not want to go to university, for one reason or another, but under our system he is entitled to nothing. That individual does not have access to credits in the way veterans did in past years. If such an individual wants to start a small business he does not receive that assistance. Of course we do have such things such as farm loans and small business loans, but for all practical purposes these are not available to the average individual. There is a tokenism there, but in fact the assistance is not available to that kind of person who applies.

We could benefit enormously if we took the principles of the veterans' programs and applied them to society generally. That is the direction in which we should be moving rather than dismantling a valuable program by turning it over to an agency whose track record has not been good. I have no confidence in the suggestion that the housing ministry is really going to do anything worthwhile for veterans. The benefits which have been extended to veterans over the years should be continued and enlarged for other members of our society, perhaps specifically for the benefit of the sons and daughters of veterans.

What we tend to overlook in our society is that there are many other people who might have offered their services, in fact many who did, but actually did not serve in the armed forces. Many of these people were at certain age levels that did not permit them to serve. In fact the government directed many of them to stay on the farm or work in industry rather than go into the armed forces. Many others were prevented from serving overseas or even in the armed forces because of poor health. Those people were no less patriotic than others who served in uniform. Let us take the merchant navy as an example. Many members of that group served at far greater risk than others in uniform.

I think a compelling argument can be made that all people in society who suffer because of a war, and not just those who put on a uniform, are entitled to the kind of benefits that were made available to the service men. I might give an example of the kind of man of whom I speak. Perhaps he will not thank me for pointing this out.

There probably has been no greater defender of the veterans' rights than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). No man has spoken more eloquently and feelingly about the problems of the veterans, or with more continuity and consistency than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. One would have thought that at the very least he was a general leading troops on the front lines when he talked about the war and his feelings in that regard. This is the kind of thing to which I refer. One did not need to be in a uniform to show one's patriotism and devotion to the country, although it is true that those in uniform have a special claim on our thanks.

I hope the minister will pay some attention to the representations he has received from many members in this House. It is not a question of merely letting something drag out. It is not a question of letting a program peter out; nor should we become involved in the argument that there are not too many veterans applying. What is far more important is the principle that has been established which, I think, in some ways is in our legislation for veterans and not for other people. That principle should be maintained and strengthened. It should be applied to all members of our society rather than letting it go into oblivion at this stage.

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, on this very memorable day I feel it is a privilege to be allowed to participate in this debate. I feel very comfortable tonight speaking in this House under this great canopy covered with Irish linen. I might say I am especially proud as a naval veteran to support the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). I proudly remember two very fine army people, my father and my brother, who did so much for their country.

I am left a little confused by the remarks of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), who, while praising the servicemen suggested that similar rights should be granted to the general public. These are privileges that only servicemen earn. I am a little confused by the mixing of apples and grapes in the same barrel.

In considering the representations of last March to extend the statutory deadline of March 31, 1975 for qualified veterans to submit loan applications under the Veterans' Land Act, it is essential to look at the matter having in mind the purpose of the act and its alternative relationship to other rehabilitation measures.

As indicated in previous statements which have been made, both in the House and before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, the Veterans' Land Act was not designed as a program of urban housing, nor as a part of a retirement program for persons reaching the end of their productive careers. Its basic purpose was to provide loans for the purchase of agricultural land, to be used on a full or part-time farming basis by veterans who were interested in this form of rehabilitation program on their return to civilian life following wartime active force service.

It was recognized that many veterans would neither wish nor find it practical to settle under the Veterans' Land Act. Two other programs were enacted: university training under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, and re-establishment credits under the War Service Grants Act. The benefits under these three programs were alternative one to the other. Each veteran had the right to choose which plan he considered would best serve his needs and desires. The Department of Veterans Affairs' university training program was concluded in the 1950's, and October 31, 1968, was the final date for veterans to use re-establishment credit benefits.

As has been mentioned previously in the House, virtually every veteran who has written about VLA has used either of the other two alternative benefits. Having regard to the basic purpose of the Veterans' Land Act and its alternative relationship to the other two measures, in 1965 parliament established deadlines to phase out VLA lending operations in a reasonable and orderly manner.

By next March more than 30 years will have elapsed since the end of world war II, and 20 years in the case of the Korean conflict. This is a rather fantastic length of time for this particular arrangement to continue. In the context of a rehabilitation measure to assist veterans to pick up the threads of civilian life following wartime active service, this has been a worthwhile program.

Reference has been made from time to time to the fact that some 125,000 veterans such as myself who hold VLA certificates have not applied for VLA benefits. I might suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that this has relation to the dreamer—and aren't we all dreamers—who imagined that he might have a little market garden some day, that he might also test the greenness of his thumb, and that he might even go to the growing of the grape. The words of St. Patrick who said, "—a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities" would only prove to him that he would not be able to utilize completely the VLA certificate to its fullest advantage.

[Mr. Flynn.]

An hon. Member: That was St. Paul who said that, not St. Patrick.

Mr. Flynn: Thank you very much. I was waiting for someone to correct me. Everybody is not in the throes of euphoria; they are wide awake. It is possible that the vast majority of these veterans simply took the precaution of obtaining such a certificate by the deadline of October 31, 1968.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs received some representations that March 31, 1974, was premature for qualified veterans still serving in the armed forces to apply. At that time the minister brought into the House legislation which extended the deadline to March 31, 1975.

In summary, I believe the terminal dates established by parliament more than eight years ago for the orderly phasing out of VLA lending operations were reasonable and realistic at that time. By next March approximately 140,000 veterans will have been settled, involving an investment of public funds of more than $1¼ billion. Those are impressive totals, and I suggest that they reflect the great popularity of this rehabilitation measure for Canadian veterans.

● (2050)

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpèque): Madam Speaker, it is my intention to be brief in my remarks, and I hope that I will not be repetitious. First, I wish to say that I support completely the point of view advanced by a number of members on this side of the House on this important issue. I believe that the crux of the matter is that governments have responsibilities. I do not speak here of any particular government but rather of the institution of government.

Surely a government should follow a code of conduct, the same as a good citizen. If we take as an example the responsibility of government in administering justice we find that there is one view on this subject. It is generally accepted, especially following our tradition of British justice, that justice for the individual is all important, and that the matter of cost, inconveniences or anything of that sort, is secondary.

For example, if a bank is robbed every effort is made to apprehend the criminal and to bring him to justice. Large amounts of public funds are used to ensure that the accused is not condemned unjustly, and that justice prevails. But for some curious reason although that view is generally accepted with regard to the administration of justice, an entirely different set of values comes to play in relation to the justice of administration. Here the view that seems to prevail is similar to what is said of a corporation: no soul to be saved and no body to be whipped, therefore no need for moral compunction. Governments are somewhat similar. However, they have a responsibility, and this is only one example. All too often, when we consider the justice of administration, we find that a kind of bureacratic syndrome sets it.

There are people who tend to say that since not many veterans are involved, it does not matter about them. In other words, it is all right to be unjust to a few. My view is that it is not all right to be unjust even to one person. All too frequently people suffering from this bureaucratic syndrome treat other people as statistics. We have heard it quoted ad nauseam that there are not very many qualified veterans who are applying any more, and also that the war in which they took part happened a long time ago, the war which qualified them for benefits under the act. "So there are two factors in our favour," the bureaucrat says, "one is that it happened a long time ago and the memory of it is receding." A whole new generation has grown up that does not know what we are talking about. No doubt they look on us who take part in this debate as a bunch of old crocks talking about ancient history.

The second view of the bureaucrat is that only a few veterans are applying, so it does not matter how unjust one is to just a few, to their way of thinking. This is the statistical approach to what is right and wrong.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The old numbers game.

Mr. MacLean: I do not think that that is valid, and I do not think the minister thinks that way either.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is blushing.

Mr. MacLean: I hope that the minister will be able to resist this bureaucratic approach. These people think that since there are only a few involved, it is inconvenient for the bureaucracy to have a set up that is shrinking. Bureaucracy must per se expand because one cannot build an empire with an establishment that is contracting. Therefore this is against the philosophy of the bureaucratic mind. They say, "It is inconvenient, so let us brush it under the rug, and perhaps next year, or some other time, we will justify it by saying that we will grant similar benefits under some other department of government." That is not good enough so far as I am concerned.

The fact of the matter is that the reason given that veterans are disqualified from these benefits simply because they did not establish their qualification in time is not a valid one. The reason they were late is not germane. Some of them perhaps are continuing to serve in the permanent forces and did not know where they would want to live permanently after they had completed their service. There could be one hundred reasons. That is not the point.

The point is that under the terms of the act there are still a few veterans who are just as qualified for these benefits as was the first veteran who applied when the act first came into force. It is the responsibility of all of us, and of the government in particular, to ensure that the contract with the veterans is kept, not only for the bulk of them, not only for the ones who applied early, but for everyone down to the last veteran who qualifies for this benefit, even if it is 50 years later. Time should not be a deciding factor in this. Therefore I hope that the minister will see fit to cut out this time limit entirely.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, may I first of all associate myself with some considerable pleasure with the remarks so ably presented on this resolution by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

At the risk of repeating some of the argument in support of the resolution let me relate this important issue to some of the complaints and needs of veterans and their families in my constituency of Medicine Hat. I know that the minister and his staff feel that after nearly 30 years there should no longer be a necessity for a further extension of VLA after March, 1975, and the earlier qualification deadline in 1968. In this regard I appreciate the remarks that the minister made in response to my comments and questions at the recent meeting of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs when we discussed the estimates of that department.

I want to say to the minister that there are still veterans in my constituency who do have reasons for not having become properly qualified back in 1968, and I admit that some of the reasons seem to be obscure. I can only say that those few should still be allowed to qualify, and they have earned that right as genuine war veterans. Perhaps the only reason I can suggest is that I know most of them personally.

● (2100)

The fact that they want to use this last VLA opportunity for a retirement home should not be held against them, or used as a reason for hastening the end of what has been a fine program for veterans. I know about this, Madam Speaker, because it has been my privilege to have had a VLA contract which was a substantial help to me over the years. That is why I suggest that the few remaining veterans of whom I speak should be entitled to have their records examined so that they can qualify. There are relatively few veterans left who could qualify under the 1968 terms, and perhaps a solution would be for them to be considered on an individual and personal basis by the minister himself.

In his speech today the minister threw out the suggestion that he may be bringing in a separate housing policy for veterans in lieu of the soon to be phased out VLA program. Until such a suggestion becomes official policy it seems only common sense and decent justice to insist that the present VLA policy and the extension of the 1968 qualification date be continued over an indefinite period.

If a special housing policy is pursued for veterans I sincerely hope and trust that the current almost complete lack of mortgage money is recognized and accounted for in such a proposed policy.

I should like to give one specific example from my constituency of a need for some form of VLA continued assistance. The veteran concerned is in the commercial trucking industry and wishes to erect a suitable building for his trucks—both as a shelter and as a shop—to be located on a small acreage. This, to me, is a perfectly legitimate use of his rights as a veteran, but I believe at the moment he is not being considered.

In the Medicine Hat constituency there are seven Royal Canadian Legion branches. These are located in the various areas and include Bow Island, Redcliff, Taber, Vauxhall, Foremost and Raymond, and my own in Medicine Hat, No. 17 Robertson Memorial Branch. In addition, the Empress Legion branch is only the width of the Saskatchewan River outside my constituency.

I am looking forward to next Monday, Madam Speaker, when I will march with considerable pride with my fellow veterans in our Remembrance Day parade. I would be less than truthful and sincere tonight, and on Monday, if I did not participate in this debate and report to this House that I have discussed these matters with all these legion branches and that their response has been that which I have indicated.

This House, in all sincerity, can do nothing less than support to the fullest the approach and philosophy suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce): Madam Speaker, first of all I should like to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) as well as to the Minister for Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) that I know the veterans of this country appreciate their concern and the opinions they have voiced many times in this House. They appreciate the non-partisan way in which veterans' problems have been brought before the House of Commons and the committee, and the attention they have received from members of all parties.

One thing I have noticed throughout this afternoon and this evening, Madam Speaker, is that hon. members who have spoken about the Veterans' Land Act and the amendment all have the responsibility of speaking for veterans. They have realized the devotion to duty and the work of the veterans in this country. I think we are all attempting in our own ways to reach the right solution. In this particular case, while I agree that many things are wrong with the legislation before us, I disagree with the means by which the opposition parties attempt to resolve the problem.

This is an act which I feel has served the veterans of Canada very well for the past 30 years, but which now has become time worn and, in many instances, has outlived its usefulness. I therefore support the decision of the Department of Veterans Affairs that the act be phased out with the final application date for loans to be March, 1975.

As I said in my initial address to the House, on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the men and women of the Bruce-Grey area have been among the first to serve the needs of Canada as a nation in time of war. Also I believe many have taken advantage of the moneys and grants available under the Veterans' Land Act, and now many with whom I have talked feel that something more comprehensive and more up to date should take its place.

I think in many ways we as members and as citizens of this country put off things that should be done. I read an article in the Globe and Mail which said that over the past 15 years successive governments have tried to close the books on the VLA because it had served its original resettlement function, and is being used now for a quite different and unintended purpose, to assist world war II veterans to acquire farms and homes for their retirement years. I do not think that is why the act was originally introduced, and I do not think an act that is amended over and over again can successfully serve the same purpose at a later date.

We need a new act, something different. By continuing to introduce motions to amend the act we eliminate the possibility of getting a new act, one that would serve the veterans of today as well as those of the first and second world wars.

I did not hear many of the members who spoke this afternoon discuss what would happen to the young people who have gone into the services in the past two or three years. I believe their entitlement has ended, so we must come up with something for them when they come out of the service. It seems that in talking of world war I, world war II and the Korean war we somehow implied that the men and women now in the forces are not as good as their predecessors because they do not have a war in which to serve. We must look at these young men and women as the reason why we do not have a war. In many instances their work has prevented a war.

One aspect that we must think about, even though the closing date on loans under the Veterans' Land Act is March 31, of next year, is that these loans are for up to 30 years, which means that the administrative program of the Veterans' Land Act will have to continue well into the twenty-first century. To illustrate further, as many hon. members know, lending under the Soldier Settlement Act of World War I ceased back in 1924, only six or seven years after the end of hostilities in 1918. I believe that there is still one outstanding account under that act.

While we know that the Veterans' Land Act took into account the lessons learned in the administration of its predecessor, changes in the national economy and the circumstances of individual veterans and their families ensure that public servants will be required to manage the current VLA loans until they are paid up, after the year 2000.

One of the reasons, Madam Speaker, that I would like to give in explaining my stand on the act is that, first of all, part of the act states that veterans can borrow up to $18,000. I am sure that all hon. members who are in the House at this time realize that the incredible sum of $18,000 in this day and age will not even buy a garage in most instances, and certainly not even complete the basement or any semblance of an adequate house at this point in time. Therefore, it certainly seems to me that, bearing in mind this limitation, a much newer and better approach can be made.

While the argument can and will be put forth that housing is the main concern now for the VLA, I submit that the act was directed mainly to allow returning veterans the opportunity of establishing themselves in the field of agriculture, should they desire to do so. I am very happy to say that many veterans in the particular area that I represent certainly took advantage of this opportunity, and have become respected and well thought of farmers and citizens of the community.

Anyone who has had associations with the farm market in recent years and months would find the amount of $18,000 not only insufficient but ridiculous to the point of being outright offensive.

I would also like to comment on the lot restrictions contained in the act. Half an acre is required if one is to qualify. This, in some instances, I understand can be reduced by about 20 per cent. Madam Speaker, we must face the fact that they just do not make lots of half an acre any more, and if a veteran were lucky enough to find one, $18,000 would be completely consumed in the purchase of the lot. He would not really be much further ahead in obtaining the home he seeks. For a veteran even to think of moving into the agricultural field with that minimum amount of assistance would mean, I am afraid, his being laughed right out of the community.

As the minister has said before and as, I too believe, we must look at the matter in complete perspective. First of all the Veteran's Land Act was not designed, even in the beginning, to be a program of urban housing, nor as a part of a retirement program for persons reaching the end of their careers. The basic purpose was to provide loans for the purchase of agricultural land, to be used either on a full or on a part-time farming basis by veterans who were interested in that form of rehabilitation program on their return to civilian life, following wartime active service duties.

Another important aspect which I feel we are failing to grasp is that the Veterans' Land Act was part of a triumvirate, or three-pronged attack on veterans' problems at that time. Now that the two other phases have been curtailed for some years, it is the only remaining program. This, I believe, should be dissolved and a better, more up-to-date approach found to the problems of providing adequate housing, if we want to be specific, for our veterans. The two others, of course, were the university training program under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act and the re-establishment of credits under the War Measures Grants Act. The benefits of all three programs were alternative one to the other.

That meant that each veteran had the right to choose whichever plan he considered would best serve his needs and desires. The university training program was concluded in the 1950s, and October 31, 1968, was the final date for veterans to re-establish credit benefits. With this in mind I made it a point in the past few days to contact many Legion branches in my area. A member of the opposition talked about seven Legion branches in his area. In my area we have 17.

An hon. Member: Send a copy of your speech to all of them.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce): I intend to, if you will send your branches copies of your speech. I was able to contact 14 of 17 branches in the Bruce-Grey area. Without exception the members told me that, as far as they are concerned, the Veterans' Land Act should be phased out and a new plan, which will fit the needs of veterans, brought in.

An hon. Member: Where is it?

Mr. Douglas (Bruce): I think, if you will give us a little more than 15 days, the minister will come up with an idea.

An hon. Member: Which minister?

Mr. Douglas (Bruce): Why, the very capable Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): How about that!

Mr. Douglas (Bruce): I concluded, from talking to Legion members in my area, that something better than the present VLA act is needed if we are to give the veterans of this country what they so richly deserve.

I would also agree that most of the veterans today who have credits under the Veterans' Land Act are in the position of considering retirement property and housing benefits. I am led to believe that a study is currently under way involving officials of Central Mortgage and Housing and the Department of Veterans Affairs to see if they can establish a much better program to replace the act, one with a new housing assistance program that would fit more aptly the current needs of such veterans who have been holding their Veterans' Land Act credits for the purchase of retirement property and retirement venture capital. We must look at this area seriously. This has been under discussion in one form or another for the past nine years, since the orderly phasing out of Veterans' Land Act lending operation was first proposed.

As of March this year, more than $1.25 billion of public funds had been allotted to veterans under the Veterans' Land Act, and over 140,000 veterans have taken advantage of the program. This is an indication that the initial concept of the legislation has now been fulfilled; and just as people who have served their country and their society well are given an honourable discharge and allowed to retire with dignity, so I believe the Veterans' Land Act can now be given just such an honourable discharge and allowed to retire with dignity, only to make way for more comprehensive and better legislation, made possible through the co-operation of both the Department of Veterans Affairs and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

This should be legislation which will provide our veterans, who wish to use it, with reasonable and proper retirement housing or retirement property, so that they can complete their time among us in a dignified and honourable manner, a manner fitting to the great debt that we owe them for their sacrifice and courage in our country's most desperate hour of need.

I for one would certainly back any proposal which gives the veterans a better deal in housing, in opportunity, in medical care, and in the care of their families and dependants. I believe that much more can be done to provide assistance for many veterans who now are reaching retirement age. I want to see their pensions improved; I want to see some of the fringe benefits made available to them that they so richly deserve.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I must at this time go against the proposal that the Veterans' Land Act be continued in its present form, or for that matter in any form. I submit that the act should be allowed to expire on March 31, 1975, and that a much better and more varied program should be introduced by the Department of Veterans Affairs, one which will provide the veterans of Canada with the land, housing and retirement benefits they so richly deserve and have earned.

● (2120)

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, while I intend to be relatively brief tonight I must begin by saying it is a privilege to have the opportunity of speaking on behalf of veterans in this, my first intervention in debate in the thirtieth Parliament of Canada.

I am sure everyone appreciates what has been done for veterans in Canada. We have heard many references to the Veterans Charter—how changes have been made through the years in order to bring the charter more up to date. I do not think anyone in this chamber would take the position that nothing has been done for the veterans.

I feel there has consistently been a measure of co-operation and non-partisanship when dealing with veterans affairs. I had the opportunity and the privilege of serving on the Veterans Affairs Committee a few years ago, and I certainly found this to be true at that time. Nevertheless, I believe there are still in our midst veterans who are suffering certain injustices. I realize that a discussion of these matters would be outside the ambit of the present debate but I look forward to dealing with them on a future occasion.

I think we owe a debt of thanks to my hon. friend from Humber-St.George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We know that, thanks to their efforts, we have this opportunity of making our views on this matter known to the government. Had it not been for the continued prodding of these two hon. gentlemen, along with others, I do not think the VLA would have survived the date of March 31, 1974.

May I hasten to say that I believe the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has the interests of Canadian veterans at heart, and if he had his way I am sure he would take the same stand as that taken by the two hon. gentlemen I have mentioned, along with other members on this side of the House. Unfortunately for him, for us, and possibly for the veterans of Canada, the minister has about 28 individuals in the cabinet to contend with, and I fear there are many occasions on which he has not been able to convince them that certain steps should be taken to meet the needs of veterans at the present time.

Why the government feels as it does is difficult to say. A great deal of money can obviously be found for things that are of less consequence than the measure before us, and it would seem to me that the idea of restricting expenditure is now being applied in an area to which in no circumstances should it be applied.

I remember the debate which took place in this House on March 28, 1974, when the minister introduced the bill to extend the VLA to March 31, 1975. My hon. friend from Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe said then, as reported at page 950 of Hansard:

> If the government were really sincere it would extend the deadline, increase the loan ceiling, and many more veterans would be served.

Later he stated:

> There is no earthly reason for phasing out this act until every last veteran has been served.

That is our position today, too. The program should continue until all who wish to do so have been given every possible opportunity to participate. My hon. friend went on to remark that unfortunately the minister was not with the right government. Well, Mr. Speaker, we know that those were the days of minority government when the cabinet was a little more responsive to the desires of the minister than it probably is at the present time. Now with the threat of parliamentary defeat removed it seems the government is prepared to dig in its heels and adopt the adamant position the minister has indicated, though such a position was possibly taken without his full agreement.

[Mr. Douglas (Bruce).]

My hon. friend from Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) made a request, and I should like to support that request. He asked that before the close of this debate the minister should take the floor and state that, in response to the pleas which have been made, he is prepared to go ahead and review the situation. A number of matters have been brought to his attention with regard to the act, and I shall not enlarge upon them. I shall simply mention the suggestions which have been made in order to reinforce the argument in favour of the motion before us.

We have been seeking (1) an indefinite extension of the legislation, (2) an increase in the ceiling on loans, (3) a decrease in the size requirement applicable to lots purchased under the act and (4) the elimination of the certificate of entitlement to qualify for benefits. These are improvements for which some of us on this side have been pressing. Again, recognizing the minister's position and his heroic service to the nation in addition to his understanding of veterans' problems, I would like to feel that these are proposals which he himself would wish to see carried out on behalf of those who served their country in time of need.

I believe it is reasonable to seek the indefinite extension of the act. Some have argued that the original intention was not to provide housing for veterans, and perhaps that is true. However, I ask the question: was the original intent of old age pension legislation that of providing income security? I do not think it was. The original intention was that the pension should be an additional benefit to supplement whatever income senior citizens had been able to provide for themselves for their retirement. However, it has now evolved over the years into an income security scheme that is the sole income for many individuals in our society.

● (2130)

So we ask the question: why cannot the Veterans' Land Act not become the major source of housing for veterans, rather than trying to devise a whole new program of housing for veterans, which I venture to say we will not see anyway? Why not use the mechanism that is already available? It would seem to me that this would be the sensible way to proceed, but unfortunately the government sometimes does not seem to operate in a sensible manner.

So we ask tonight: do we follow the example in the story that I remember reading when I was a boy at school—which is a few years ago now—of the dog that was crossing a little narrow bridge over a stream? This dog had a big bone in its mouth. He looked down and saw the reflection and it looked better than reality, so he dropped the bone, made a grab for the shadow, and lost the whole thing.

We are being asked to support a proposition tonight that we are going to have something better in the future for our veterans. We are not sure what it is, but we are asked to vote out of existence a plan that has some reality to it in the hope that something else will materialize and become reality in the future.

I also think the certificate of eligibility is a somewhat ludicrous requirement. As my colleagues have been emphasizing today, a certificate should be available to veterans as long as there are veterans who require the benefit of the provisions in this measure. I believe these men and women have proven themselves in times past. I believe they have satisfied the nation of their service. What more should we want our veterans to prove than the record that they have established?

Without belabouring the point any further I hope the minister will let the House know what he thinks of the proposals that have been advanced by members on this side. I trust that he will reconsider his announcement of the phasing out of this legislation and agree to the indefinite prolongation of this plan, which we believe will continue to be of great importance and assistance to the veterans of this nation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the minister rising for the purpose of asking a question, or on a point of order?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, if the House would permit me, I should like to say something for information purposes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister is aware of the fact that he has already spoken, and in speaking twice he would close the debate unless he has the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, Mr. Speaker; it is not the minister's motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is right, I stand corrected. But the minister has spoken, and to speak again he would need the unanimous consent of the House, even though it might be to give the House information. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Might I explain, Mr. Speaker. I was using notes when I spoke, and when I got my blues and checked them I saw I had inadvertently picked up the wrong page and omitted from my remarks a page of notes that I sent around to the various House leaders. It is important to my statement in general, and if the House would allow me to add three paragraphs I would appreciate it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): For the information of Hansard the insertion comes right after the sentence which reads: "Any veteran seriously interested in settling on the land has had ample time to do so." I then omitted the following: "It is a fact, of course, that the average age today of world war II veterans is approaching 60, and most men of that age are not interested in getting into farming but, rather, getting out. This is evident not only by the limited number who have settled under the full-time farming provisions of the act in recent years but by the number who have paid up their loans and terminated their contracts.

"In commenting on the extensive period that the Veterans' Land Act has been in operation, I think it is appropriate to refer to the Soldier Settlement Act, its predecessor for veterans of world war I. Settlement under that program, which involved the establishment of 37,000 veterans, was terminated in 1924. By next March, the Veterans' Land Act will have been in effect more than five times as long. More than 140,000 veterans will have been settled under its various provisions involving advances of public funds of over $1.25 billion.

"Apart from the comparative details I have just provided, I think it appropriate to make at least passing reference to the recent major changes to the Pension Act and the War Veterans' Allowance Act. I would point out, as well, that the estimates for veterans affairs this fiscal year is almost $600 million, the second highest in the history of the department. As I stated in the House on October 7 last, the record of this government in the field of veterans' legislation has been outstanding and is self-evident rebuttal of the statement made recently that our veterans are treated with something less than the consideration they deserve."

I want to convey to my fellow members my deep appreciation for their permission.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the legislation that we have on our statute books for veterans has been good and progressive legislation, and I do not think that this is the time to stop its operation. I should just like to make a few points about the question under debate this evening.

This country, including each and every citizen, owes a moral debt to all veterans and servicemen generally, and I emphasize the word "all". At the present time, wherever our servicemen are serving they are serving under undue stress and severe hardship. The debt that we owe our veterans has not been paid and probably never will be paid. To those who have lived to return from service and to continue as citizens of this country, we owe not only a moral debt but a great material debt.

I urge that instead of abolishing the Veterans' Land Act or reducing the present policy under the act, the policy should be extended in time and made available to all veterans. The structures respecting lot sizes should be based on municipally and or provincially approved lots. Like many veterans who are members of the House, I too will be sharing fellowship and comradeship on Monday next.

I cannot agree and I will not agree that this legislation is worn out. If the government intends to present other legislation in lieu of it, then the responsibility is upon the government to introduce that legislation forthwith. The entire House should be privy to the intentions of the government. We cannot erase veterans' legislation unless we are certain that servicemen will never go to battle again. We must retain our veterans' legislation just in case we have not seen the last of world war. If the act is not amended to extend the time and widen its provisions we will certainly be taking a step backward instead of a step forward.

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, as many other members in this House, I must say that it is an honour for me to rise in this debate on the motion introduced by our distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). When one addresses this House on veterans' affairs, there is no doubt that it is a very moving subject, and there is no doubt either that we can often let ourselves be carried away by our emotions and forget the facts.

It is not because a few of us here are veterans that we have necessarily reached the peak of perfection in terms of veterans legislation. One thing is sure, when one is both a veteran and a member of parliament, one is first of all proud to be able to say that we now have a minister who is probably, in addition to his qualifications as a minister, one of our greatest, most deserving and most dedicated veterans of World War II. We owe him special tribute, particularly for the work he has done and the dedication he has shown since his appointment to this high office.

We have only to listen to you to realize that you all have at heart the interest and the well-being of veterans of World War I and II. None of us wishes anything else than the good of our veterans and certainly I am one of those. It is a most moving subject which we could discuss for several hours.

As those who talked before me, on November 11, Remembrance Day, I too will attend the parade, as I have done every year and not only since I have been elected to Parliament. I have done so for a long time, as a member of the Canadian Legion, as a member of the Canadian Armed Forces, I will do my duty as a member of parliament, just as anybody else, and especially as a former member of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

That does not mean that when there is a decision to be made, only feelings are taken into account until the last minute and that we cannot be a little more realistic at a given time.

I listened to many members talking most sincerely as did the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). No hon. member in this House has any doubt about his sincerity and dedication towards the veterans of Canada. None of us entertain any doubt about the other members who talked tonight.

Now, I am chairman, and I am proud of it, of the standing committee of Veterans Affairs. I am trifling a little saying that I will now speak French because when I chair the committee I speak English so that I will get done more quickly. I know that I could also speak French and so feel more at ease. But I use English to better co-operate.

Today, we succeeded in tackling Bill C-4. It must not be forgotten that the third report of the standing committee has been tabled in the House at two o'clock, this afternoon, and all the committee members certainly deserve congratulations for their achievement. It will be always possible to improve the Veterans Affairs Department Act and especially the Veterans Land Act. I am quite ready to agree that there are pros and cons and that pros are 100 per cent commendable. The arguments against, at this time, the arguments of those who want to retain the present legislation and that the deadline be extended to March 1975 find much less support. That is for sure! But I know that some members opposite have said that the minister might not exert the influence he should in the cabinet. I do not entirely agree with that.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) does not look like a man who is ready to give up or to answer the veterans' problem with a flat refusal in the last remaining days. I am not disclosing any secret since I am not in the confidence of the cabinet or the minister. Apparently, the minister as any good veteran has a trump card hidden somewhere which will enable us once the legislation is phased out to carry on our work through a new formula and a new procedure which will perhaps assist a great number of veterans who have not yet taken advantage of that legislation.

I would like to quote statistics like all the others. I suppose that in such a debate we are likely to repeat ourselves. In the first place, we cannot refer to no other legislation than this one. Even what I have to say would compel me to quote some documents, some figures and some dates. I should honestly admit that it has been said already three or four times by some government members. I have never heard any member opposite say so. Nevertheless, one aspect of these figures strikes me. A previous speaker said that the laws have been amended and upgraded from the year following the war. Then a date came where we witnessed something extraordinary. In 1959, Parliament approved the cut-off date of September 30, 1962. I remind my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), of this fact.

In 1959, the cut-off date of September 30, 1962 was approved. If we recall, this government was not in power at that time. The opposition members are trying to tell us what to do. It seems to me that at that time, they had every opportunity to do what they are asking for today, under more difficult conditions. At that time, the issue was the eligibility to benefits under the Veterans Land Act. In 1962, we were not yet in power, let us not forget it, this cut-off date was extended to October 30, 1968.

We were then on the Opposition side of the House and we agreed with the government's proposals. The Act was amended to this effect in 1967 and 1968. The new cut-off date received a great deal of publicity. We will recall the many debates on this subject, the publicity made in newspapers as well as in all information sent to the Canadian Legion.

In view of the rehabilitation factor of the post-war years, people said that Parliament had approved the new cut-off date in 1965 in order to eliminate in a fair and methodical manner the loans granted under the Veterans' Land Act. It is on March 31, 1974, that the cut-off date was set to enable the veterans to get a loan for the purchase of a property. As everyone knows now, it has been repeated many times today, the cut-off date has been extended to March 30, 1975, providing that the construction work on a house or the improvements referred to in the loan request begin before March 31, 1976. I must say quite candidly that we repeat ourselves. I heard it all this afternoon. Any veteran by virtue of a sales agreement entered into with a director can ask for supplementary financial assistance, apparently up to a maximum provided for by the Act until March 31, 1978.

If such a loan application includes an amount for the construction of a home or other renovations, construction work must begin before March 31, 1979. It is believed that these new arrangements made possible under these provisions of the Act will be particularly useful to qualified veterans who are still in active service and who are not thinking of retiring before four or five years. If time allows it, I can give still more statistics. When the limit is set at March 31, 1975, that means that World War II will have been over for 30 years and, the Korean War, for 20 years.

It is quite difficult if this is analyzed in an objective manner with all sentimentalism put aside, to claim that veterans did not have enough time to ask for re-establishment funds provided for them after the war and active service. There are some, like me, who took advantage of the other advantages that were at our disposal. Some attended university, others used their funds to set up a business.

We must stick to this part of the Act; we all have been helped to date, those of us who wanted to be, and taking into account the agricultural emphasis in the Act at the time, there has always been a requirement concerning the minimum age required for part-time farming or for small acreages. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) talked about that this afternoon. Here again, I could go into lengthy discussions, but it was so well said by the hon. member. The limit was brought down from three to two acres. Today a final agreement has been reached allowing veterans to build a house on approximately 17,000 square foot lots. Until now, the veterans have got what they have been willing to ask for. To reduce or still to remove the acreage requirement has now given this new idea to some of our veterans. And why not take advantage of the legislation at the age of 55 and buy a house for one's retirement as a pensioner on a small piece of land in the suburbs, away from the urban centres? One could then take fully advantage of this act which allows one to build a house on a small piece of land at a price that is still debatable, because it is not easy nowadays to build under the existing legislation with a loan of about $18,000. Everybody knows that this figure is higher today because in our area, namely Pointe-aux-Trembles, in the eastern part of the island of Montreal, where lots are probably the cheapest right now, it is still possible to build a house for approximately $23,000 or $24,000. This is much more than the amount of $18,000 allowed under the act.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to let other members speak before ten o'clock. I had much more to say, but I humbly admit that I would probably be covering the same ground, since my colleagues as well as opposition members have spoken before me.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in conclusion that I listened with interest to the speeches of hon. members from both sides of the House. I am convinced that we are all sharing here the same concern about our veterans. I hope also that the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is probably keeping his trump cards well hidden, will be able some fine day to bring in some legislation on which the opposition for once will fully agree with us, since we already recognize that we must keep on helping our veterans.

I have complete faith in the government, the Prime Minister and his cabinet, and especially in his efficiency and his gumption.

[English]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first occasion on which I have risen to speak as the clock reaches ten o'clock. I do not share the confidence in the government that was so eloquently spoken of by the speaker immediately preceding me. As we approach the solemn ceremonies of November 11—

● (2200)

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Since I was busy giving part of my speech to the messenger, I did not hear with what part of my speech the hon. member did not agree. Did the hon. member specify? I would like to know.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): If I may, Madam Speaker, I just want to say that I am not as confident as the hon. member who spoke before me. He expressed his confidence in the government. With your permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION—CONSEQUENCES OF DEPORTATION OF HAITIANS—ATTITUDE OF THE MINISTER

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Madam Speaker, according to departmental figures, the Immigration Appeal Board is presently reviewing the cases of 828 Haitians who have applied for the landed immigrant status.

I understand that this Board has rejected up to now some 90 per cent of the appeals for those who came in after November of 1972.

As Canadian citizens and as citizens of the world, we cannot and we will not wait until we witness the massive deportation of some 900 to 1500 Haitians before we get moving and force the government into action, when we know how repressive is the regime they have in Haiti.

The Minister who still claims that he has no evidence that the deportees will be ill-treated once they are back in their country, cannot ignore the fact that the regime of Jean-Claude Duvalier indulges in the most dreadful whims in order to stay in power. The Minister cannot ignore completely the reports, available at any time, of those people, Canadians or Haitians, who lived there as missionaries or in other qualities, and who say they fear the worst for the repatriated.

I wish that the Minister could and would at least answer the following question:

Does he not think that the Haitians asking for political asylum in Canada have, by doing so, disapproved the Duvalier dictatorship and therefore can he not imagine the sad lot awaiting these Haitians as soon as they are back in their native country?

I ask the responsible minister the question of a Canadian reporter, and I quote:

> Mr. Minister, what does a Haitian forced to come back to his country after having been refused the statute of political refugee abroad look like at the Port-au-Prince airport in front of Duvalier protean militia?

The department tells us that only 28 Haitian immigrants formally applied for the status of political refugee in Canada. This is a legalistic approach of the matter. Don't we realize that many Haitians living in Canada, afraid anyway to be deported, do not dare to apply formally for such a status?

For goodness' sake why does the minister not set aside his legalistic attitude in this matter and avail himself, which would be every bit as legal, of that other provision of the act which gives the Immigration Appeal Board the discretionary power to make special concessions in the case of applicants when compassionate or humanitarian considerations warrant it.

If, to convince himself of the existence, if fact, of humanitarian considerations, the minister is not satisfied with the contents of the letters of Father Paul Dejean, head of the Montreal Haitian Christian Community office, if, as I say, the minister doubts the word of those innumerable persons or organizations who have written to him recently, he should at least discuss the whole subject with his former employees who worked over there or, to be more specific, with Mr. Mackenzie Wood, who was recently recalled home after having acted in Haiti as Canadian chargé d'affaires.

One way or the other the minister will surely be convinced that my concern is highly humanitarian in the case I am pleading here. The minister may hesitate to intervene, for fear of jeopardizing the success of the Canadian mission headed by Mrs. Michèle Mant, now in Haiti since November 2nd last and due to return here on November 17th. That mission expects to reap the fruits of the recent visit to Haiti of the president of CIDA, Mr. Gérin-Lajoie, and of our 4 million-dollar aid program.

If such is the case, and I have every reason to believe it is, why did the minister not use his influence with his colleague from External Affairs to delay the departure of that mission?

[Mr. Wagner.]

In any event, I ask the minister, in view of the probable success of that mission, and especially of the fact that Canadians in general, and more particularly the press, have only started a week ago to be interested in this record, to grant another extension in this matter.I appeal to him to change his decision. It is a matter concerning the social justice and humanism of this government, the Parliament, and all our country.

In closing my remarks, I would like to ask the whole cabinet, starting with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to meditate this sentence of the president of CIDA, taken from the brochure "Man First" of this agency, and which reads as follows:

> "An effective co-operation in the development of third world nations would give priority to the status of man in society and would center his activities on the will to meet human needs and aspirations adequately . . . because, finally, the value of assistance or co-operation must be measured in terms of the degree of happiness of the men who live in a society."

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I think all members of this House and most Canadians would have great sympathy for the plight of any people, and particularly of the Haitians to whom the hon. member has been referring. I want to reiterate, however, that any one in Canada, from Haiti or anywhere else in the world, who feels that he has grounds for fear of prosecution or persecution on returning to his own country need not feel that he is without recourse to the law. Any such person would have immediate access, by the declaration that he or she considers himself or herself to be a refugee, to an administrative and legal process which, as already stated, comprises a review of the situation he is claiming, by a refugee committee and, if necessary, an appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board.

No well-founded claim of refugee status will be ignored. By the same token, Madam Speaker, we simply cannot make a mass declaration. Indeed, not all Haitians in Montreal who came to Canada and are now in Canada illegally are in fact making claim to refugee status, and not all those who make claims, in the cases I have personally examined, are entitled to that status. Those who are entitled are being granted refugee status.

The bulk of the cases to which the hon. member referred are before the Immigration Appeal Board. That body has separate and autonomous jurisdiction to deal with those matters based on refugee status as defined under the protocol of the United Nations which I described earlier. Beyond that the board has authority in most cases for those people who came prior to August, 1973, to deal with the matter of deportation on humanitarian grounds over and above refugee status. The process of law is taking place; it is compassionate, and it provides for compassionate decisions.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—MARITIME PROVINCES—ALLEGED GLOOMY ECONOMIC FORECAST BY PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT—PARTICIPATION BY DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question directed to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) on October 28—which happens to be my birthday—concerned a story carried in the Montreal Gazette via the Financial Times. The story, under the byline of Clair Balfour, said that a special study was undertaken for the federal Department of Public Works. The story indicated that the study done for the federal Department of Public Works concluded that there was a good decade ahead for all regions of Canada but the Atlantic one.

The main predictions for the next decade as regards the Atlantic region were, first, that the Atlantic provinces will have slow population growth; second, that above normal underemployment that has constituted the normal historical pattern will still remain a major problem.

That is not saying much for DREE policies, is it?

Annual unemployment in the Atlantic region averaged 9.6 per cent during the 12 months ended last September. This, it must be understood, is not an accurate measure of the underuse of human beings as refined by labour force participation rates and discouraged workers dropping out of the labour force altogether, during the recurring downturn of the economy.

This underutilization of human labour becomes absolutely critical when the government overuses national fiscal restraint and tight money policies as it did in 1969 and 1970—the effects of which in the Atlantic provinces, and on heavy unemployment areas within it like Cape Breton, become absolutely critical in terms of human suffering and economic waste.

I have already noted in a speech to the House on October 15 that this general type of federal policy contradicts its regional policy and the effects of it, to repeat, are disastrous for the Atlantic region.

I plead with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) not to use that strategy again in his upcoming budget and, instead of bringing in a tight money policy, to increase the narrowly defined money supply by at least 8 per cent and make any fiscal cutbacks necessary to relate to provinces with low unemployment or, if you will, full employment levels.

The study done by the federal Public Works Department is supposed to have concluded that unless off-shore oil or natural gas is found, the Atlantic provinces seem likely to be again by-passed during the decade ending in 1985. Again, alluding to the speech of October 15 on the importance of offshore oil or natural gas to the development of the Atlantic economy, I said, as recorded at page 438 of Hansard:

Let them—

Meaning the politicians:

—not give the people exaggerated impressions to the effect that income and employment prospects from off-shore oil exploration will make that much difference to the region.

The study done by the Department of Public Works seems to fall into this trap. I ask the department to read "The Impact on the Regional Economy of Eastern Canada Resulting from the Potential Development of Off-shore Oil and Gas", the study done for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in April, 1972.

The Public Works Department study is said to predict that the Maritime coal industry will be revived. In that connection let me assert again that a major steel complex envisaged for the Cape Breton area is a much greater prospect for doing more for income and employment in the Atlantic area than off-shore oil developments. This will take advantage of our changing comparative advantage in geographical location, which is tied to the ongoing changes in the world's transportation technology and the growing importance of deep water superports.

Everyone, Madam Speaker, should realize that there are many obstacles to overcome and trade-offs to be made if the giant steel complex is to become a reality. Recently the Minister of Finance of the Nova Scotia government was quoted as saying in New York that in this connection the Cape Breton coal mines, now owned and controlled by the federal government through Devco, may be turned over to the proposed consortium of steel buyers who would have an important interest in the steel development.

I want to emphasize this evening, with all the authority that I can muster; that such a move would be absolutely abhorrent to myself and others who have seen the results of private enterprise in the Cape Breton coal fields in the past. Indeed, I would argue that even with the likelihood of economic viability for the Cape Breton coal industry in the near future, the federal government must make sure that funds are available to Devco to create preventive health facilities against the ravages of silicosis, as well as to correct the poor housing conditions that are the ongoing result of a private enterprise company town's past legacy to that area. It should be obvious to anybody who knows of the desperate and continuing economic insecurity in that area that Devco must play a large role in helping to diversify that historic section of Canada. I again ask the minister to table that study.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), a highly respected member of the thirtieth parliament, I wish to inform him that the study to which he referred concerning the regional economy of eastern Canada has not been carried out.

I have been asked to make a statement concerning an article that appeared in the Montreal Gazette on Friday, October 25. This article reported, in effect, that a study carried out by the department indicated that although the economic situation looked rosy for most of Canada for the next 10 years or so, this would not likely be the situation with respect to the Maritimes, barring some major development such as the discovery of large oil or gas deposits off the east coast.

First of all, let me state that the press report is fundamentally wrong inasmuch as no study of this nature has been completed by the department. It is true that a study is being carried out, but it is one very narrowly focused on the specific question of likely long term requirements for federal office accommodation generally across Canada, and geographically. One of the techniques the department has utilized in preparing for this study is that of sampling a broad range of opinions on likely developments, on a geographic distribution basis which would influence the demand for federal office accommodation.

The article in the Gazette merely refers to a summary of these opinions, and I repeat that they are just that—opinions. While they are possibly of some usefulness to the department as input into the continuous studies necessary for good forward planning, they are being cross-referenced with many other sources of information and will play only a minor role in the final picture which the department arrives at for long term planning purposes.

I would add that this is the first use the department has made of this particular sampling technique. As a tentative conclusion, I may say the technique appears to contain a fatal flaw in that most people, when asked their opinion as to the future, tend simply to project the present into the future. This defeats the whole purpose of seeking informed opinion on the likelihood of major changes over the long term and their probable impact. I might say, too, that once the study has been completed it will be used for internal federal accommodation planning purposes only.

In answer to the supplemental question, "Was the Department of Regional Economic Expansion consulted in the carrying out of this study?", I repeat that the study has not yet been completed; DREE will be consulted at length as the study progresses.

URBAN AFFAIRS—LAND ASSEMBLY—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO ASSIST MUNICIPALITIES RETAIN GREEN SPACES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see in his place the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. De Bané), my colleague and friend. I trust he will be able to give me a better answer than I received from his minister on October 7. I am not holding my breath, because time is going by and I am allowed only seven minutes.

The subject I wish to raise tonight relates to the question I addressed to the minister on October 7. I asked him specifically whether there was any government program to assist municipalities which were trying to retain green space which was privately owned and which would otherwise be lost to development. The minister failed to answer that question, but I think it can be taken from the transcript in Hansard at page 164 that, in fact, there was no such program. When I mentioned a specific problem in the City of Vancouver in the riding of Vancouver South, that of the Langara lands, the minister said:

> My ministry is working on that plan very closely with officials of the city so that the specific case referred to will come within the overall plan.

The minister is not here tonight. I have great respect for the hon. gentleman, but when he gave that answer he obviously did not know what he was talking about. The lands in question are lands owned by the CPR as part of the land grant made many years ago. They have been used basically as a golf course until now. Vancouver has been able to purchase some of this land, and there are about 100 acres left.

Vancouver has purchased from the Canadian Pacific development company the remaining acreage at a cost of $400 million, and the city authorities do not have the money to pay for it. As a consequence they propose to take 20 acres, incredibly valuable recreational land in the centre of the city, and subdivide it to pay for the remainder. Plans have been drawn up by a citizens' committee in the area in the hope of saving this land, and it seems to me the committee has a far more perceptive understanding of the value of this land than either the federal government or the other levels of government involved.

● (2220)

The result of their efforts was that the provincial government has been prepared to pick up two parcels of land, one for the adjacent Glengarry College for a campus, and another for a green space out of its green space fund, which leaves the city to pick up the remaining seven acres for $1.5 million. In effect this plan would give the whole of this acreage to the city of Vancouver for a cost to the city of $1.5 million.

During the recent election campaign the Conservative party was able to make a commitment that if we succeeded in the election we would immediately sit down with the citizens' committee, the city of Vancouver and the province of British Columbia, and enter into a shared cost program to pick up this remaining land, so that together with the province we would save this vital piece of green space in the city of Vancouver.

It is interesting to note that in the 1972 federal campaign the Liberal party had no trouble at all committing $30 million of their money—I do not know where they got it from, but I have no objection to their spending it—to acquire waterfront land for the city of Toronto for parks. I am completely in accord with this decision, but I cannot understand why such decisions are made on an ad hoc basis and always in the middle of an election.

At the same time I would point out that when the city of Vancouver was trying to re-acquire the Department of National Defence lands at Jericho during that same election, the Liberal party failed somehow to recognize the significance of this, and of course it was a matter of some concern to the city citizens of Vancouver to find $30 million spent in Toronto with nothing appropriated for green space in the city of Vancouver.

So my questions to my hon. friend tonight are specific. First, is the government prepared to come before this House and present to it any sort of plan whereby municipalities which are short of funds can be given federal assistance to preserve these green spaces which are already alienated and in private hands?

My second point is simply that during the election campaign the Liberal candidate and his workers in the riding of Vancouver South were very much in favour of saving this green space, and intimated that they would find federal help to save this green space for the city of Vancouver if the Liberals were returned to office. As you well know, Madam Speaker, they were returned to office.

My last question is this: if the citizens' committee, which as I said before is showing more thought and perception about the problem than anybody else so far, comes directly to the federal government and asks whether the federal government will sit down and discuss with them some means whereby a financial formula can be put together to assist them in saving this land, will the federal government find some means of assisting the city of Vancouver in what, when you get right down to it, is a last ditch fight for one of the few remaining green spaces in the third biggest city in Canada?

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Madam Speaker, I was most impressed with the strong representations of the hon. member for Vancouver South. I hope that during the period that I am Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs I will have occasion to go to Vancouver and see the situation about which the hon. member spoke so eloquently.

Mr. Alexander: Go tonight.

Mr. De Bané: I thank the hon. member for the invitation, and I hope I will be able to go there as soon as possible.

With regard to meeting with the citizens' group, the federal government is the government of all Canadians and we can meet with any citizens' group. But in municipal matters very delicate questions are involved, and primarily I think we should deal with provincial governments as well as with municipal governments. That is not to say that we should not also meet with citizens' groups.

I can assure the hon. member that the federal government is in full agreement with him that there is a need for open spaces in any new development. But one must bear in mind that overall control of land use is a provincial responsibility. Indeed, it is the usual practice of the provinces to require that a percentage of land for development be set aside for park use.

During the tri-level conference held last autumn, the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford), when suggesting guidelines for the land assembly program implemented by a province or a municipality under the terms of the National Housing Act, recommended that the profits from the leasing or the sale of the land be ploughed back into the project. Thus, land reserved for green spaces and other facilities, including the development of land for recreational purposes, as well as community-oriented buildings, could be provided under this program to the extent allowed by the profits from the sale of the land.

Moreover, under the terms of the new community program, the government is authorized not only to acquire the land, but also to include land for public spaces within or around a new community, or to use such land to separate it from an existing community.

Having spoken briefly on the means to ensure that green spaces will be provided in future land development financed under the NHA, I must now restate our concern for the older cores of cities. It is possible, since last year's amendments to the National Housing Act, for municipalities to undertake neighbourhood improvement programs to redesign and rehabilitate older core areas, and to provide open spaces and community facilities in them if this is the wish of the residents of the neighbourhoods when establishing priorities for the use of the available federal funds.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.
