At the same time, I would suggest that this is what should be done with respect to the Canada Pension Plan. I welcome—and I am sure most, if not all, members do—the introduction of Bill C-22 which will make a number of improvements to the Canada Pension Plan. One important improvement is to remove the employment test for those who are drawing benefits under that plan and are between the ages of 65 and 69. The bill does some other things as well, such as establishing a measure of equality between men and women—equality at death, at any rate—and it raises the year's maximum pensionable earnings so that a few years from now pensions payable under the Canada Pension Plan will be substantially higher than they are at present.

These moves are all in the right direction, although I do think there is still room for a very thorough study of the relationship between the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan. I think the CPP was a good move to get us out of those low pension rates that we had in the 1950s and early 1960s, but I think the day should come when we have universal old age security across the board in an amount even greater than is now possible by means of a combination of these two plans. But on the assumption that we have a few years to go before we can replace old age security and the CPP by massive old age security arrangements, one step that should be taken right now is to lower the pensionable age under the CPP to 60, as I have suggested already, for all those persons not in the labour market. By doing this with respect to the old age security and the CPP, we would take care of spouses, widows, spinsters, widowers and bachelors in the age 60 to 65 bracket; we would encourage persons of those ages, who by getting both old age security and CPP could consider retirement, to leave the labour market and thus open up more jobs for younger people.

These are the major things that in my view should be done in this session with respect to the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan, namely, raising the basic pension to $200 a month and lowering the eligible age to 60 under both old age security and CPP.

I have referred already to the inadequacy of the escalation formula which applies to old age security. For example, in October old age security and the guaranteed income supplement will be increased by a few dollars, but it is based on the extent to which the cost of living in May went up over the cost of living in February. We are eight months behind. In October, pensioners will get the extra money which they needed in May. In May they starved because they did not have it. So now they are still further behind. I think that two things should be done with respect to escalation. In this age of computers you can work out anything you want. Escalation should be related to needs in the current quarter, not to those of five or six months ago. The other thing that is still necessary—and some very important groups have recommended this—is that there should be a special cost of living index for senior citizens, based on what they actually have to buy, not on the whole range of goods and services and luxuries that are in the consumer price index.

So I urge that one of the pieces of unfinished business that we must deal with is putting escalation on the kind of basis that will meet the needs of our retired people. I would go further, but I suppose I might have to wait a session or two for this, and argue that escalation should be based on something even better than the cost of living. It should be based on the gross national product, the wage index, or any of those indices, provided it relates to the standard of living. What our older people are entitled to is not just enough money to continue to live at the same level as when they retired, but the right to share in the rising standard of living in this country which they made possible through their working years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In any review of pensions, which I hope will be given during this session and the remaining sessions of this parliament, I urge that a further look be taken at the situation of the blind and the disabled. We still have on our federal statute books the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act under which allowances are payable to persons who come under these pieces of legislation. They are payable by the provinces and Ottawa pays a percentage of the total cost, but the maximum amount specified in those two pieces of legislation is still $75 a month.

Back in the old days that level used to go up every time old age security went up, but with the bringing in of the Canada Assistance Plan, with all its virtues, something has been lost. Perhaps there is another way to provide income security for the blind and the disabled than under our present pieces of legislation, but I insist that this legislation be reviewed, particularly in respect of these two groups of people, the blind and the disabled. I do not know why in the 1970s we still impose upon them a means test. We hear much in this House about compassion and sympathy. A couple of ministers today vied with each other as to who is most sympathetic. What sort of compassion or sympathy are we expressing when we are saying to people who are blind or disabled, "You get a pension only if you meet the qualification of being totally disabled, totally unable to look after yourself, or totally blind", and on top of that apply a means test?

I will move on to another area about which members who have been around here for a while have heard me speak quite often, that is, the position of retired public servants. I also want to mention in particular retired Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel and retired personnel of the Canadian armed forces. These three groups have different pension plans but they are fairly similar. A few years ago we passed another piece of legislation which provided for the escalation of the pensions of all these groups. Again, it was good to get escalation but, again, it is always behind.

These pensioners, of course, do not get their escalation quarterly; they get it only annually. So when they get it they are not just six or eight months behind but 16 to 18 months behind. In one year they get the extra money they needed to keep up to the extra cost of living for the previous year. I feel that the whole escalation formula needs to be reviewed and revised.

I also feel that the basic way in which public service and other pensions are computed needs to be looked at again. Far too many public servants, some of quite senior level, are seeing people retire today on pensions greater than the salaries they had when they themselves were in the job. Public servants who thought they had given their working lives to the people of Canada through the federal government, and therefore would enjoy a decent and dignified retirement, are facing real difficulty.

I welcomed with a feeling of deep appreciation, almost emotion, the announcement made by the former president of the treasury board when he brought in the proposal for the escalation of the pensions of these groups of people as well as others. It was a tremendous accomplishment to get away from the idea of fixed incomes for pensioners. But, Mr. Speaker, present conditions require a review of this whole subject and I urge that there be such a review by the government in this session.

While I am talking about the pensions of retired public servants, retired RCMP and Canadian armed forces personnel, I should like to make a particular pitch regarding the pensions of the widows of these persons. This point applies to widows' pensions generally, including railway pensions, private pensions, and so on. I still do not know how there ever got started the idea that it was all right if a man and wife worked together and, if there was a pension earned by the one who was out working, if the husband died the pension was cut to 50 per cent for the widow, whereas if the wife died the pension stayed at 100 per cent for the widower. We have had that idea around for so long that it is taken to be a benefaction for the widow to get a 50 per cent pension.

I suggest that for the public service, the RCMP, the Canadian armed forces and private pensions generally, the idea should be accepted that if a pension has been earned and contributed to in cold hard dollars and earned by the work of the person involved, it should continue at its full rate to whichever spouse survives. This principle is expressed in resolutions presented by many organizations asking that pensions now at 50 per cent for widows be raised to 60 per cent or 75 per cent. Of course, in this kind of situation we accept compromise as a move in the right direction. I contend, however, that the day should come when a widow's pension should be the same as the pension of the widower if the wife dies first.

That leads me to the question of railway workers' pensions, Mr. Speaker. I was pleased that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro)—interestingly enough, during the election campaign—appointed Dr. Noel Hall as commissioner to study the whole question of railway pensions, both Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway. I was also glad to get his answer the other day that a report was expected in three or four months. I hope it will be the good report that I am sure it will have to be.

I do not understand how anyone could study the pension plans of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific without realizing the tremendous need for improvement. These pensions need to be put on the basis of at least 2 per cent for each year of service, no matter when the employee retired. Widows' pensions need to be made 75 per cent or 100 per cent. These pension plans must contain better provisions for early retirement, and there needs to be a review of the relationship between railway pensions and the Canada Pension Plan. If all of this is going to cost money, I suggest that the people who have worked on our railroads for the people of Canada are owned an obligation by the federal government to see that real improvements are made in their pensions. I will come back to this matter later in this session, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues will be joining in discussing it. I urge that just as soon as we get the report from Dr. Hall, real action be taken in this area.

I have moved in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, from my reference to the RCMP and the Canadian armed forces, but there is one other point I wanted to make so I shall return to it. One of the elements of discrimination that pensioners in these two groups feel is very unfair concerns the time at which escalation commences. The escalation of public service pensions takes place at age 60, and therefore the law still says that retired RCMP and retired armed forces personnel who may be retired, under the rules of the service, at age 48, 50 or 55 have to wait until age 60 before escalation commences, except under special circumstances that affect only a few cases. The government knows how strongly these people feel about this matter. The former president of the treasury board had to deal with them constantly. I hope that the new President of Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) has the compassion and sympathy that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) attributed to him this morning. I see my friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury), the former president of Treasury Board, smiling at me. I suppose he is telling me that he has lots of compassion now, too. I wish he had exercised it when he was in a position to do so.

I have already said, Mr. Speaker, that I welcome the introduction of Bill C-22 which will make amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. I want now to say that I welcome, too, the introduction of Bill C-4 which proposes to make amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I hope that, despite the improvement we made during the previous parliament and the one before that affecting our veterans, we will make further improvements in this parliament.

The amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act are good as far as they go, that is, establishing equity between male and female veterans, or the formula for escalation being attached to the ceiling rather than the allowance, but the number of dollars put in the pockets right away of those on war veterans allowance is not very much. I was interested to read the press release issued by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) a few days ago, particularly the announcement of what the amount would be in October, 1974, compared with what it was in October, 1973. It sounds pretty good when it is put that way, but in the meantime there have been adjustments in 1974, so that the difference between what these veterans are now getting and what they will get under the new bill is not very much. There is a lot of room for improvement in what we are doing for our veterans. We will get at this matter in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, where we always work together and do a good job.

There is one point I should like to press, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me the time comes in the life of a veteran, whether it be age 55 or 60, but certainly not much later than that, when there should no longer be a necessity for all the examinations required by the Canadian Pension Commission, or all the means testing done by the War Veterans Allowance Board. There should be a straight guaranteed annual income, and it should be better than old age security. In my view, it should start at age 55 or 60, but surely at some point we can say to our veterans that they have served this country and it is no longer necessary for them to go through all the medical examinations that are now required. We should certainly be able to say to them that it is no longer necessary to face the indignity of means testing or the indignity of being under the provisions of an income ceiling. We have tremendous room for improvement here and I urge that improvements for our veterans be made in this session of parliament.

I now want to say a word about government annuities. I confess that in earlier years it was a bit difficult to press the point about annuities because we realized they were contracts, and if one were to change the basis of a contract respecting a government annuity, one would open up a series of problems. However, any reluctance we had on that point has gone completely because the Minister of Finance has changed the basis with respect to Canada savings bonds. What is a Canada savings bond but a contract under which you agree to lend your money and in return receive a certain amount of interest? Yet the Minister of Finance has come along—and we all approve—and said to the holders of Canada savings bonds, "If you hold these bonds to maturity, you will get not only the amount of interest for which you contracted but an additional amount as well."

If that can be done with respect to Canada savings bonds, I suggest it can be done with respect to government annuities. So I contend that just as most other forms of retirement income are being escalated, income paid from government annuities ought to be escalated. I have heard a number of members make that point. Someone asked a question about this the other day, and the Minister of Finance said he would send the member a letter. It is the same letter he has sent to many of us, and it does not satisfy us at all. If the contract can be superseded in the case of Canada savings bonds, I suggest the same action should be taken with government annuities. I see the clock racing faster than it usually does, Mr. Speaker. It always goes faster when one is on his own feet.

I want to refer briefly to a subject I raised yesterday with the Minister of Finance, that of private pension plans. I have put a lengthy question on the order paper which asks for all possible information about private pension plans. I think that these must become the subject of a major study by parliament and the government. There are too many cases of persons finding that the money they have put into private pensions is not there to pay pensions when the time comes to retire. Too many of these plans are in jeopardy. There should be greater protection. Even the good plans, the ones that deliver the amount of pension contracted for originally, in most cases do not provide for escalation. I think federal legislation should be passed to provide that a pension plan is not a proper pension plan unless it provides for escalation, after retirement, of the amount a person is to receive.

In my question yesterday to the Minister of Finance, although I referred generally to private pension plans, I referred particularly to the chartered banks. I suppose the largest number of letters that I have received which say, "Please do not use my name, but . . ." are on this subject, on the inadequacy of bank pensions. I have received letters from retired bank managers who tell me what the banks fail to do with respect to their pension plans, and I urge the Minister of Finance to demand action on this matter.

I see you getting out of your chair, Mr. Speaker, so I shall sit down in a moment. I plead for something to be done in the whole area of pensions. Indeed, I plead that in this parliament we examine the whole field, the important aspects of which I referred to this morning, and really try to put our older people into the position they so fully deserve.

I thank the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain again for telling us the truth, that young people understand old people. I welcome the endorsation of that fact contained in the Gallup poll to which I referred at the opening of my remarks. I believe we will be meeting the wishes of the Canadian people if we take the steps I have suggested to improve the lot of our senior Canadians.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by congratulating you, as the Speaker of this distinguished chamber, upon your appointment. It speaks highly of you, sir, when we consider that after only six short years of being first elected to this House, you have reached this high position, obviously as a result of your sense of duty, integrity and knowledge of legal and parliamentary affairs and also, as you have shown in your first few days as Speaker of this House, because of your total dedication to fair play.

Personally, I am again honoured that the constituents of my riding, High Park-Humber Valley, saw fit to charge me with the responsibility of continuing to represent them in this House. I pledge to them now that I shall continue to work on their behalf, to the best of my ability. As we enter this new session of parliament, I cannot help recalling my thoughts on a similar day two years ago when the previous session of parliament began. Then, Mr. Speaker, as a new member I was impressed with the government's Speech from the Throne. I thought that the words of wisdom which were thrust upon us were great promises, and we were full of expectation. Those promises were soon to become only meaningless words. I cannot help regarding the government's pledges to this parliament in the same light.

It makes one wonder why the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), heading a government which has been in power for 11 years, should suddenly decide that now is the time to start moving forward. That is what he so regally stated in his opening address to parliament. One cannot help wondering what direction his government has been taking in the last 11 years, if only now he intends to begin moving ahead.

An hon. Member: The government only moves in circles.

Mr. Jelinek: It only moves in circles; I agree wholeheartedly. Let us consider, despite what the Prime Minister considers to be areas of national concern, those areas which failed to receive due consideration from this government which is now in full control of the legislative process. High on the list of priorities is the government's pledge to "wrestle inflation into the ground". Those are the government's own words. The reality, of course, is that not only has inflation not been arrested but it has galloped ahead, straining every sector of our economy and placing undue hardship upon each and every Canadian.

Food costs alone have risen at an unprecedented rate, and many on fixed incomes and the old age pension find it almost impossible to lead a life of self-respect and personal dignity. Is it any wonder that pensioners and, indeed, all Canadians gaze in disbelief at a government which has permitted over 25 million eggs to rot, despite national and world food shortages. Despite this, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) proclaims himself to be more popular than ever. The minister must have been held in low esteem if he now believes his popularity is high.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Certainly, the issues of inflation, food costs in particular and the state of our economy as a whole must be given highest priority. It is hardly necessary for me to expound on a subject of which apparently every Canadian, with the exception of the Liberal administration, is aware. The President of the United States felt it incumbent upon him, on assuming office, to call a high-level conference almost immediately with industry and labour. All this country received after the Prime Minister obtained a majority was an immediate three-month stalemate of the parliamentary process. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to quote part of a Globe and Mail editorial from the edition of the day before yesterday, which I find most appropriate:

> Yesterday—93 days after his third election as leader of the Canadian government—Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau with his colleagues in the House of Commons was busily engaged in the processing of a bill which would provide the moon and sixpence for west coast grain handlers.
> Yesterday—61 days after the tragedy of Watergate catapulted him to the presidency—Gerald Ford was before the United States Congress setting out the steps he intends to take to fight inflation which could 'destroy us as surely as any war'.

I find those comments appropriate to our times. Perhaps the Liberal government expected the inflationary situation simply to go away on its own. Perhaps it was embarrassed to face the situation and admit it had no answers and, obviously, no plans. Meaningless generalities and page upon page of non-specifics, as illustrated by the Speech from the Throne—will never be sufficient to deal effectively with the complex areas of concern facing this country today.

Where is there any concrete evidence that the government is ready and willing to "wrestle inflation to the gound"? Where is there any indication that a tough, but just and uniform immigration policy will be established? Where are the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, long promised by the government and certainly long overdue in our country? Can we afford to ignore situations such as arose in Toronto during the last postal strike, when approximately 48,000 unemployment insurance cheques were not even picked up and subsequent investigation disqualified some 25,000 of the claims? Is it any wonder that almost every Canadian is demanding a full inquiry into the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act? In my own constituency, for example, 99 per cent of those replying to a questionnaire favoured such a full investigation. And still there is no action by the government.

During the last wildcat postal strike and the Ministry of Transport firefighters' strike, millions of dollars were lost and thousands of Canadians suffered directly because the government has failed to deal with the illegalities associated with such strikes. The former President of the Treasury Board, the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Drury), in answer to questions I raised in this House last May stated that a government policy regarding illegal strikes in essential services would be forthcoming and that continuation of such strikes would not be tolerated. Has the government changed its mind in this regard as well, and is such illegal and unlawful action expected to continue unchallenged?

Mr. Speaker, I feel it is necessary once again to bring to the attention of this House the dismal financial circumstances which now surround the 1976 Montreal Olympics. Not only have initial costs risen far above the forecasts, but net proceeds from coin sales are falling far short of the expected $250 million. Results have been particularly disappointing in the United States, where large sales of coins were anticipated. As of April 1, with the main portion of the first of seven in the series completed, the net return, less reserve but including stamps, has been a meagre $2.5 million.

Even the most optimistic sales projections based on proceeds thus far envisage a deficit of at least $200 million, notwithstanding the success of the lottery program. Now is the time to face reality and accept the fact that a large deficit will be incurred by COJO, the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec. It is not good enough simply to expect the Canadian people to support the spirit of the Olympics and share the financial responsibility, as they will ultimately do. We find the Montreal city council authorizing the construction of Olympic facilities with moneys obtained from federally-authorized programs such as the sale of coins and stamps, and doing so without offering contracts for public tender. The time is long overdue for the federal government to take an active role in supervising the over-all financial administration of the Olympics, particularly as such matters relate to the Olympics financing legislation passed by this House. As a nation which has committed itself to the Olympics in Montreal, we cannot now wash our hands of the whole affair as the Prime Minister seems to be doing.

The air of secrecy which has surrounded the entire Olympics program from its inception, including the arrangements for the letting of the television contracts and the closed bidding on other contracts, must be dispelled, and the indifferent attitude of the Prime Minister must be changed so that Canadians may be able to lend their complete support to the 1976 Olympics. Only then will they see clearly the many benefits which will accrue not only to our youth but to our entire country.

There are many other areas which should be looked at, Mr. Speaker—areas which have long been contentious as far as Canadians are concerned. For example, the issue of abortion continues to divide hospital boards and interfere with patient-doctor relationships. It has sparked demonstrations both in favour and against, and has inspired mass advertising by those on either side of the argument. Yet the government is still afraid to clarify the issue by bringing it before the House for open discussion.

As a matter of record, Mr. Speaker, on November 5, 1973, I introduced in this House a motion which read as follows:

> In view of representations made to most members of the House over the past few days, not only in person but also by thousands of telegrams and letters, urging the House to examine the abortion laws now in existence in this country, and in view of the fact that this is a matter dealing with life itself, I move:
> That the government be instructed to form forthwith a committee comprised of members of this House to thoroughly investigate this entire area affording such organizations as the Alliance for Life and others, in fact all segments of our society, the opportunity to express their views in a matter involving the very lives of thousands of unborn children.

The Liberals felt at that time that this motion should not go forward, and it was defeated. I believe they did not wish it to go further because they felt it would be too embarrassing or too risky, too controversial, in a period prior to a possible federal election. An election did indeed follow. However, the party opposite now has an over-all majority and they know they will be here four or five years. The time has come to look into this serious question by means of a committee such as I have proposed. I urge all hon. members to look forward to the setting up of the committee in order to give a chance of participation to millions of Canadians who are interested in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is one o'clock. Perhaps I can continue after lunch.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, prior to one o'clock I had the opportunity of touching on numerous subjects, such as unemployment insurance, illegal strikes in essential services, as usual I touched on the Olympics, and I finished off by saying that the government obviously became afraid to raise the abortion issue. Naturally, I also discussed the inflation problem of which the whole country except, it seems, this government is totally aware.

I would continue on that line by saying that there were other areas touched on so lightly and superficially in the Speech from the Throne as hardly to constitute serious consideration. Can anyone really find a determined effort to curtail the excessive government spending which has grown out of all proportion under this Liberal administration? It is true that vague references and veiled promises have been made, but these are hardly sufficient to initiate cutbacks in spending by provincial and municipal governments, as this government is now preaching. Nowhere was there any specific reference to federal government cutbacks in spending or hiring programs, and I am wondering whether this government does not believe in the principle of example but relies on the "do as I say, not do as I do" principle.

I should like to quote a few statements made by Mr. J. Wilson, president of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, who spoke at a dinner last night. These statements are contained in today's Ottawa Journal. He said:

> The record of government spending, stacked up against spending in any other sector of the economy, leaves no argument against the contention that government is one of the major contributors, if not the major contributor, to the current inflation problem.

We all know that, Mr. Speaker.

> The civil service was increasing "at wartime rates" but without a national crisis to account for the attitude of the public to this growth—

It is doubtful whether citizens seeking more government services are really consciously aware that they are thereby demanding high taxation.

At present there are over 443,000 federal government employees. There are some 1.4 million people employed at all levels of government, and in fact one out of every seven Canadian workers is employed by some level of government. There has been no levelling off at the federal level, as promised by the Prime Minister some time ago. I suppose we are getting used to his promises that are never kept. Excessive government spending and empire building are the major causes of internal inflation, as we have said, and this situation can no longer be tolerated.

These are some of the things that one would have expected the Prime Minister to deal with in his initial address to this thirtieth parliament. But what did we hear? What subjects did the Prime Minister dwell on at length and consider so crucial? What does the Prime Minister always talk about when he wishes to shroud his administration's inability to cope with the real issues? Bilingualism, of course. And there is nothing wrong with bilingualism. But my God, surely with the serious problems facing Canada today, the fact that the Prime Minister considers bilingualism the most critical issue is completely beyond comprehension. But then, what better way to avoid the real issues facing this country than to create and talk about false ones?

I wonder whether any member of this House except the Prime Minister, or anyone in Canada believes that bilingualism rates more priority at this time for more government action than inflation or unemployment? Has bilingualism driven up the cost of food? Has bilingualism affected production in this country? Has bilingualism created unemployment? Or, indeed, has bilingualism affected our critical housing situation? On the one hand, we have a Prime Minister espousing the virtues of bilingualism for Canada. On the other hand, we have a Prime Minister who is reluctant to protect the rights of the English minority in Quebec by reversing that province's controversial, if not unconstitutional, Bill 22.

After spending hundreds of millions of dollars on bilingualism, are we now to look at nine bilingual provinces accepting bilingualism, and one province rejecting it? I wonder how the Prime Minister would have reacted had the province of Ontario, for example, legislated its own Bill 22 in respect of English. The fact is that the province of Ontario has recently taken the very responsible step of initiating French-language courses from kindergarten on. For the Prime Minister to say that Francophones of this country are being treated unfairly by the rest of Canada is, quite simply, ridiculous.

Let us consider, for example, some of the federal funds that were allocated as recently as last year. Under the Opportunities for Youth Program the province of Quebec received $28.5 million, compared with Ontario's $15.5 million, with an over-all Canadian total of $68 million. That represents nearly 50 per cent for Quebec alone—hardly an anti-Quebec situation.

Let us consider, also, Local Initiatives Program grants, of which Quebec received $80 million and Ontario only $31 million out of a total Canadian allotment of $202 million. Again, that is hardly anti-Quebec. The DREE figures are equally slanted in favour of that province and are also a matter of record.

I for one, and I believe there are millions of others in this country, am becoming sick and tired of the constant pressure by this government to cater at every turn to la belle province. I am not an English Canadian. I am not a French Canadian either. I am simply a Canadian, and I am proud of it. As some members know, I was born behind the iron curtain and escaped with my family at an early age to come to this great country, a country full of promise, opportunity and freedom. That is something we did not, and do not, have back in Czechoslovakia. I do not like the idea of the possibility of a language curtain being erected in this country, right under our noses, with the prodding of the Prime Minister. It distresses me to find this country divided by language instead of united by language.

Let me make it very clear that by no means am I against bilingualism. As a matter of fact, I would be more than happy to see more Canadians speaking both languages. I am presently taking French classes and therefore hope to add that language to the three I already speak. The answer, then, does not lie in forcing bilingualism upon any person or group of persons but, rather, by incorporating language training into the earliest grades of our school systems. As long as bills, such as that passed in Quebec, to legislate against any minority are allowed by the federal government to stand, our country will continue to be divided and will never show its truly great potential.

It is up to the elected officials to unite this country through co-operation, understanding and reasonable compromise, and not to permit any minority to suffer the injustice of restraint of freedom, whether that freedom be of religion, education or language. These principles are the very foundation of our country and must remain firm if we are to truly remain, as our national anthem states and, I hope, continues to state, "strong and free".

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I join those who have preceded me in this debate in extending sincere congratulations to Mr. Speaker on his elevation to the chair. I was one of those who had the duty of escorting him, resisting, to the chair. The way in which he has conducted our proceedings since then confirms my view that his modesty was excessive and that we should have overcome his resistance. I also wish to congratulate the two hon. members, the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Those two speeches were in the best parliamentary tradition and, I may add, in the authentic Liberal tradition of concern for one's fellow man.

All members of parliament, both newly elected, like the mover and seconder of the address in reply, and those who have been here for a number of years, are conscious of the unprecedented challenge presented to this institution to measure up to its responsibilities. In a system based on laws and not on power wielded by men, where government is carried on with the consent of the government, it is important that institutions possess the flexibility necessary to translate earlier individual concepts of human liberty into terms relative to today's mass societies and their challenges of mass communication and instant response.

I, therefore, have no hesitation in asserting that one of the primary tasks of this parliament should be the continuation of the process of reform of our procedure and structures which will enable us to discharge our responsibilities effectively. From the model parliament of Edward I to the sweeping revisions of our own procedures beginning in 1963, the history of reform is an attempt to strike a balance between the manifest need to sharpen parliament's capacity to respond quickly to public demand and the preservation of the fundamental principles of redress of grievances and control of expenditures. These are no mean objectives; they are the pillars upon which this institution depends. They were of urgent importance in Simon de Montfort's time when the barons asserted their right to represent the people against the exigencies of the royal exchequer; and they continue to be fundamental objectives today.

At this point, having outlined something of the nature of the problem, I wish to congratulate my predecessor as leader of the government in this House, who is also my successor in the post of Secretary of State for External Affairs—a post to which I am sure he will lend lustre and distinction—for the manner in which he discharged the onerous functions of his office while keeping to the fore the great and fundamental principles on which the institution is erected. My distinguished predecessor in office will agree, I am sure, that the inevitable growth of executive power, inevitable because of rising public expectations and increasing complexities of the problems facing the government, calls for a consequent strengthening and shoring-up of the legislative branch by rendering its deliberations more effective and more responsive.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And without destroying the rights of the opposition.

Mr. Sharp: Exactly. Cynicism about representative institutions is characteristic of our time. If parliament is to respond to criticism, it must be ready to adapt to change, to preserve the advantages of a system in which the executive branch can perform its essential functioning of governing while subjected to wholesome checks and constraints on the untrammelled growth of its power. Going a step further, it is not enough for parliament to be accessible, for governments to be responsible, for ministers to be accountable; not only must these things happen, they must be seen to happen, in order for Canadians to retain confidence in and continue to identify the management of their own destiny with our noblest institution.

By making parliament a more flexible vehicle of public participation, by emphasizing its function of informing and enlightening Canadians about the business of government, we shall be moving toward closer identification of Canadians with this institution and system which has served us well. This is essential, for parliament cannot accomplish its historic functions in isolation or by being shunted aside in a welter of conflicting demands for public attention. If parliament ceases to hold a position of priority in public affairs as the centre-piece of the democratic system, then parliament's capacity as a protector of our freedoms will be diminished.

In some emerging nations, populations grapple with the subtleties of "one man, one vote", while in other countries with a long tradition of democratic institutions, freedom is stifled. In vast areas of the supposedly civilized world, individual freedom has retrogressed to a level comparable to that of the Middle Ages. In many areas of the world a new age of darkness has encompassed man's aspirations. But everywhere the aspiration for freedom remains a flame in human hearts.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the members of this House: is there any parliamentary democracy that we know of that has had to erect a wall protected by barbed-wire or patrolled by armed guards to keep people in? There have been occasions, and there will be occasions in the future, of high drama, of inspiration and eloquence on the floor of the House. But it is in the day to day assertion of our freedoms, the rights and privileges of members, including the right to question, criticize and disagree, that parliament renders its most valuable service.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I apologize for interrupting, Mr. Speaker. I have been called out of the House on short notice. I shall be back as soon as I can. I would not want to be unfair to the minister in the very interesting address he is giving. Excuse me.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is always very courteous. I thank him. One of our greatest parliamentarians, Edward Blake, said 100 years ago:

> The privileges of parliament are the privileges of the people and the rights of parliament are the rights of the people.

The current reform wave—if I might so describe the process which began in 1963—was given new impetus in 1968 under the distinguished and purposeful leadership of the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) who, as leader of the House, ushered in sweeping reforms. My immediate predecessor, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), carried on the process in a minority parliament. Revision of parliamentary salaries—which will have to be considered again—increased and improved facilities for members, including research, control of election expenses—now in effect—an innovative and constructive approach to redistribution of parliamentary seats, and a landmark green paper on conflicts members face when outside interests may affect their independence in the discharge of parliamentary duties, are among the achievements of his tenure of office.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who will once again officiate as House leader of the official opposition, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that acknowledged expert on the rules, and many others made their distinctive contributions to these far-reaching reforms.

It fell to Mr. Speaker Lamoureux to preside over the introduction of the new rules with that wisdom and impartial judgment which made him an ornament to the chair. I am sure that you, sir, his successor in that high and crucial office, will exhibit the same qualities along with a flair for innovation already shown in your conduct of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, all of which will contribute positively to our deliberations.

To strengthen parliament's role as a vehicle of reasoned dissent when no institution, human or divine, is immune to critical scrutiny is surely the purpose to which we should be addressing our endeavours. It is important in this connection, it seems to me—and I hope I will have general agreement in the House—that steps be taken to increase parliament's accessibility and the ordinary Canadian's sense of participation. All Canadians are affected by decisions we take here, on the floor, and in the standing committees. The high court of parliament must in turn reflect the concerns and anxieties of those it represents in a tangible and visible way.

First, let me deal with the matter of the granting of supply, one of the primary functions of parliament. The 1968 reforms transferred the essential scrutinizing function of the committee of supply to standing committees of the House. Some, like the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), have felt that the present procedure does not permit the intensive and detailed scrutiny of major estimates which is parliament's right. Referral of estimates to appropriate standing committees has relieved the House of a great deal of the burden of routine scrutiny, while the principle of redress of grievances has been preserved and indeed amplified in the allocation of 25 days every year to the opposition parties. Nevertheless, it is important that the two great principles of control of expenditure and redress of grievances not only be imbedded in the system but that they be visibly a part of it.

I should emphasize that I do not think there should be any question at this time of returning to the old committee of supply procedure; the present procedure on the whole is superior. On the other hand, there may be occasions when particular estimates could be scrutinized in a committee of the whole House, and the government approaches the question with a flexible attitude. Indeed, within the next couple of weeks we will have an opportunity to experiment with this method of scrutinizing estimates pursuant to the special order approved at the opening of this session.

It has been said that government proposes and parliament disposes. In any parliament there are two major components, the party in power and the opposition. This produces a definite polarization in the conduct of House business—not always an idealogical or even political polarization—the polarization of the "ins" and the "outs". This is a healthy state of affairs when it leads to careful and well organized programs by the government and vigorous, positive and informed criticism by the opposition. As in all human affairs, ideal conditions do not always prevail, even in the high court of parliament.

Nevertheless, when it comes down to those critical periods when it is a case of making parliament work, both sides generally place partisan considerations temporarily to one side in the interests of the proper functioning of the institution. I anticipate no dissent when I say that this parliament will have to be made to work steadily and with concentration if we are to deal with the backlog of work before us at the beginning of this session. I am encouraged by the meetings I have already had with the House leaders of the opposition parties to believe that this is well understood by all of us as we try to arrive at a consensus on the time-frames within which government-sponsored legislation can be made to pass through the House and its standing committees.

There has been good success in the past several sessions in reaching agreement on methods and timing for dealing with legislation, and while we have not yet reached the state of organization prevailing in the mother of parliaments, the volume of important legislation in our last two parliaments is evidence that with goodwill and co-operation we are moving in the right direction. It is my view that we can go a good deal further in the organization of our business without weakening the effectiveness of the opposition in its essential function of critic and, as a by-product, raise the level of debate and give members on all sides a better opportunity of participation.

● (1430)

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his speech in this debate dealt with the use of the period devoted to oral questions. This 40-minute period is a routine procedure, as some hon. members know, of comparatively recent origin. I can recall watching from the officials' gallery some years ago when oral questions were very few in number and were prefaced by the words, "Before orders of the day I would like to address an urgent question to the minister". I can also recall sitting in the House when the opposite extreme was the case and there was no time limit: sometimes the oral question period lasted more than an hour, sometimes as much as two hours. Our procedure with respect to oral questions has evolved to conform to the nature and requirements of the Canadian House of Commons and it is without doubt the most lively period in our daily deliberations, the best show in town. This it should remain. In my view, however, it can be improved without losing its liveliness. The televising of this part of our proceedings would in itself help to discipline the questions and the answers.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Maybe we would get answers.

Mr. Sharp: The points that need most careful consideration are, first, the giving of notice of the opening questions to be put to the ministry and, second, the attendance of ministers. As a minister, I confess that I rather like the challenge of trying to answer questions without notice.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Or evade them.

Mr. Sharp: I also know that if I receive notice I must give better answers, and the supplementaries could provide the stimulus of the unexpected. Neither will the oral question period suffer in liveliness or in value if some sort of system is introduced that would not require all the ministers to be in the House every day so that each of them is present in case somebody, without notice, happens to address a question to them. I am not suggesting that we will revive the roster system, or anything like that. What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that this is a question for consideration, in the interest of the opposition. They can contribute to improving their own performance in the House by giving the ministers an opportunity—

An hon. Member: Gee whizz; thank you.

Mr. Nowlan: Thank you for that gratuitous advice; it is worth what we paid for it.

Mr. Faulkner: We are doing what we can for you.

Mr. Sharp: The designation of days on which particular ministers will be questioned makes sense from the point of view of this House, on all sides, including the opposition, and of course in the interest of governmental administration. It would make the question period an even better show.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister accept a question before he leaves that point? In view of his interest in the question period being a better show, as he puts it, would it not be a good idea for all the ministers to be here just to see what is going on?

Mr. Sharp: There is nothing that I enjoy more than being here to watch the fun, but there are occasions when even I put other business ahead of just watching, and I do believe it would be in the interest of the House and of the country if some way could be found to direct questions to ministers at particular times so they could be here well prepared and able to satisfy the curiosity of the members.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In a hedonistic pursuit of pleasure.

Mr. Sharp: The House will once again be asked to come to terms with the question of the redistribution of parliamentary seats. As hon. members know, there is a deadline of December 31 beyond which, under current legislation, consideration of this matter cannot go. I have reason to believe that there is sufficient consensus on this question among the parties, resulting from discussion in the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the last parliament, to enable a bill to be introduced in time for it to be approved before the end of the year, and that will be the government's intention.

The question of the independence of parliament, the freedom of hon. members from outside attachments which might exercise undue influence on the conduct of parliamentary business, is one which has been examined in the green paper on conflict of interest. It is the government's intention that the House, through the appropriate committee, once again be seized of this urgent question.

It is my concern to devise a more efficient and speedy machinery for supplying information adequately and accurately in reply to members' questions on the order paper. I would point out that we are not yet through the debate on the Speech from the Throne and already there are well over 400 questions on the order paper. I would solicit the co-operation of hon. members in avoiding duplication of questions, avoiding matters of minor urgency, answers to which could be obtained by simply asking the department, or matters of unnecessary complexity and amplitude. Many times—and I suggest this from experience in the House as a minister for many years—fishing expeditions which are enormously expensive and produce much irrelevant information can be avoided by advance consultations with the minister concerned or, if need be, with the President of the Privy Council.

Under the rules of 1968, the standing committees perform a major portion of the parliamentary workload. Under my predecessor as House leader, the performance capacity of the committees was strengthened by staff allocations and budgeting of time. I would hope that consideration might be given to stabilizing committee membership so that members can maintain a continuing attachment to committees in which they are interested. In effect, the practice of platooning memberships should be carefully examined from the aspect of its impact on the really serious and effective work being accomplished by a number of committees.

There will be agreement, I am confident, that the standing committees have become an effective medium for channelling expert and informed opinion on complex and involved questions before the House and in that respect, too, they are providing a useful parliamentary service. In my various ministerial capacities when I have appeared before parliamentary committees on many occasions, I have seen a gradual evolution in the functioning of these committees. When I think of how much more effective and informed these committees are today than they were, say, 11 years ago when I first entered the ministry, I feel that the rules under which we are now proceeding and the way in which parliament is using the standing committees make it evident that we are on the right track. Presumably we can do better, but I think we could do better if we had a more permanent kind of attachment to committees and a building up of more expertise on the part of individual members.

It would no doubt appear curious to present-day Canadians if parliament closed its doors against the media and persisted in viewing its debates as a purely private matter. Yet it was not until the middle of the eighteenth century that the principle was accepted of an overriding public interest in the fullest possible coverage of parliamentary business. Parliament once claimed the right of privacy against the Stuart kings, and even now there is nothing in the rules of procedure to guarantee the presence of strangers, even the media, in the House. Nevertheless, open and impartial coverage of the parliamentary process remains an essential element of a free, democratic society.

In an age when public assemblies are constantly in danger of being overtaken by events, piecemeal reforms are not enough; there must be a unifying element providing a matrix of dedication to the principle of participation by legislators, administrators and citizens. Since the number of Canadians who are able to participate directly in or attend important parliamentary debates is restricted by available time, cost of travel and lack of opportunity, for many the only means of participation is through coverage by the media. This brings me to the question of broadcasting the proceedings of the House of Commons. This question has been considered on several occasions by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and a number of important findings have been published, including those of the second report of the committee in June, 1972, which favoured television broadcasting in principle and recommended additional technical studies.

The report of the committee inter alia put forward the proposal that the television record should be produced as a kind of electronic Hansard, with production controlled by parliament and distribution in the hands of the final users, as is now the case with Hansard. It would appear to me that the House is in possession of sufficient information, both of a procedural and technical nature, to pronounce itself on the principle of television coverage and that the time has come for consideration of a motion to secure the judgment of the House in the matter.

In my view and the view of the government, it should be possible to bring to Canadians not only the opening of parliament, which is now in the way of becoming a tradition, on the nation's screens but perhaps one or two important episodes of parliamentary business on an experimental basis. I put this question to hon. members through you, Mr. Speaker: are we justified in continuing to delay the implementation of the kind of installations capable of bringing to Canadians a more vivid, more compelling and more complete record of our proceedings than has ever before been possible?

To me there seems to be only one answer to that question: we are not justified. The matter has been considered at length and I believe in this House there is an overwhelming opinion in favour of proceeding. This should be tested in the House of Commons by early consideration of a motion to approve the televising of our procedures. Whether the television record is distributed live through cable channels, educational television or existing national networks, or as a nightly or weekly summary of events in this chamber, is a matter for discussion. The overriding consideration is that the material should be made available both for purposes of public information and for future archival and historical use.

In opening its doors to the electronic age, parliament will be taking a step as fraught with historic significance and the possibilities of procedural evolution as the admission of verbal journalism in the eighteenth century. I am satisfied, for example, that some of the practices of this House—such as a series of statements on motions initiated by a minister—would not survive in their present form if they were conducted under the scrutiny of the television camera. It seems to me we could probably find a better way even before we permitted television into this House. Surely this is one of the procedures we should consider and improve.

It does seem ludicrous that television should be barred from the oral question period, but that ministers and critics from the opposition should appear outside the chamber to answer questions put by reporters in what amounts to a mock-up of the question period. Surely the public should be able to witness the real thing when the government faces its critics across the floor of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: None of that extramural TV.

Mr. Sharp: As one of those who has participated in many of these extramural encounters, Mr. Speaker, nothing would have appealed to me more than to appear on television answering the questions of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. It would have been a dramatic encounter.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is, if you had answered them.

Mr. Sharp: I wish to assure the House through you, Mr. Speaker—and I trust that what I have said reinforces this assurance—that the government wishes to proceed by way of consensus in reforming the procedures and structures of this House. In this connection, I should like to associate myself with the remarks made last evening by my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), and the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), who expressed themselves as being in favour of having discussion of the rules of this place conducted in public so that the public can participate and make its input to the reform of our procedures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Our concern is not so much the ability of the government to get House approval of its program, although this is a legitimate concern of any government, as it is to enhance the performance and reputation of parliament. No party gains if parliament falls into disrepute either because urgent legislation is unnecessarily delayed or because the opposition is prevented from discharging its essential critical function.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate you upon election to your high office. I have no hesitation in saying that I know you will preside over this House in the same manner, with the same diligence and in the same conscientious way as was ably demonstrated by your predecessor. In the same vein, I should like to congratulate Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel) upon the appointment to his high office. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos), the mover of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and the seconder, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee), for the way in which they performed their respective tasks.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian governments spend a considerable amount of all the income earned by business establishments and Canadian taxpayers. It has been established that this amount has now reached the 50 per cent mark. When I refer to Canadian governments, Mr. Speaker, I am including not only the federal government but municipal and provincial governments as well.

It is no secret that many Canadians share the opinion that we are today overgoverned, and in the last 25 years the size and power of government has grown in a most phenomenal way. In addition to the three levels of government, there are Crown corporations of many kinds, government-owned utility services, government-owned transportation services, government monopolies of alcohol, government-sponsored marketing monopolies, and government-financed broadcasting media and health plans.

The point I would make, Mr. Speaker, is that more and more power is being concentrated in the hands of government at the expense of the citizen. When all the government enterprises are added up, the rest of the Canadian economy is in a minority position. Most Canadians have failed to realize that we are in real danger of becoming a one-boss economy. It is well-known that most people are resentful and suspicious of all big establishments, big unions, large corporations, large governments and big utilities.

Some people ask, what is the difference between working for a hugh company and a large department of government? What is the difference, they ask, in being responsible to a company's shareholders and being responsible to a minister of the Crown? Why worry about huge governments? It is a question of relative size. In a truly mixed economy we do have a choice. As consumers, we can choose among competing suppliers and select those which give us the best value in price and quantity.

Someone once said that competition is the key to the welfare of the worker and the welfare of the consumer; that competition is the protector of the interests of the citizen. The point I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is that we are fast losing our freedom to choose between the government employer and the competitive enterprise employer in the marketplace.

Canada is fast moving in the direction of the 50-50 proportions of that famous stew which contained one horse and one rabbit, which is to say that the share of the private sector is steadily shrinking. This kind of thing should be reversed. It is imperative that we strengthen the competitive enterprise system, to enable it to do for us the jobs which it does best. This system has built in checks and balances which government operations lack. Industry, manufacturing firms, including the large multinational ones, are constantly exposed to the healthy cleansing action of vigorous competition in an open economy such as we have in Canada. Competition is the incentive and the force which develops both people and products.

If present trends continue, Mr. Speaker, the state will either operate or control all economic activity in Canada by the turn of the century. When we reach that point there will be only one employer, backed by the full power of government, to ensure that the monopoly cannot be challenged at that stage. One can predict that the one remaining employer will begin to dictate wages and working conditions. This is where we are heading. This is what will happen to us unless we demand that all government programs be confined to those activities alone which cannot be handled in any other way.

If the job can be done in any other way, government should step aside. The government's only job should be to set the rules and ensure that the rules are adhered to. The philosophy of the all-powerful state is unacceptable to the Canadian people. We all like a little freedom to make our own decisions. Further, Mr. Speaker, there are no guarantees that an all-powerful state would remain benevolent.

Long ago, Lord Acton said, "Power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely". Other voices are beginning to echo the same sentiment on the subject of the rights and freedoms of the individual citizen. One person, whose name escapes me at the moment, said, "The transfer of power from the individual to the state is sometimes expressed as moving from the private sector to the public sector. In fact, the truth is that power is being transferred to the government and away from the public, not towards it." United States economist, William Peterson,

> The problem of containing government power is an historic, universal and external one, . . . A free individual cannot exist in a society where the state controls all means of employment and income.

Richard Needham said in his column recently:

> Let Ottawa give real power back to the provinces, then let the provinces pass real power back to the municipalities. Local is beautiful, control is ugly.

On the CBC program "University of the Air," some time ago Professor W. C. Hardy of Alberta told us this:

> The world of the Roman empire in the first two centuries is almost frightfully similar to modern North America. As benevolent paternalism and bureaucracy took over, personal freedom tended to disappear. To the cost of bureaucracy was added the expense of the dole.
> There was an attempt to combine a subsidy to Italian farmers with charity to needy children. All of these expenditures had to be recovered from the taxpayer. To compound the difficulty there was an adverse balance of trade. The middle class was taxed out of existence. The same principle was imposed on farmers and labour. The welfare state had become a despotism.

History, Mr. Speaker, can repeat itself unless we are vigilant. One of the things which dulls our alarm mechanism is the evident sincerity of those who advocate even bigger governments. They have convinced themselves that they are the chosen keepers of the holy tablets; they are certain that they alone hold the secret of the public good and so are scornful and arrogant of anyone who dares to differ. Another factor is the skill of these advocates in selecting words which act as hidden persuaders. Everything they propose is "social". They call themselves "Liberal minded" or "Liberal Democrats", but they promote the planned state, which means planning the citizen too. Their opponents on the "right" side of politics are neutralized by always being termed "extreme" right.

This word-play is aggravating to those who believe that a liberal person holds that the individual is more important than the state. It is infuriating when one seeking to uphold individual freedoms is ridiculed as a reactionary, especially when the epithet is hurled by those who are actively promoting the centrally planned, all pervasive state, the computerized version of the feudal system. The financial damage done by big, overblown governments, Mr. Speaker, is ever apparent. It is increasingly recognized that inflation is one by-product. The statement that all inflation is either caused or condoned by governments is probably not entirely accurate. Nevertheless, back in 1966 the following statement was made by Professor H. W. Hutt:

> Nearly all inflations have been intentional calculated actions of governments. Inflation has been a slow, inexorable transfer of consumer freedom to the state.

In 1968, Arnold Hart of the Bank of Montreal stated:

> A substantial share of the blame for the excessive upward push on prices and costs must be assigned to our governments of all three levels.

Earlier this year, John Beare, an economist, pointed out that printing too much money starts the wage-price spiral in motion. He went on to say:

> The finger is usually pointed at "greedy" unions and "nasty" monopolists for the cause of inflation. The finger could more accurately be pointed at the institution which gains more from inflation—the government. Bigger government means more inflation.

Inflation is now around the 12 per cent mark in Canada, a level calculated to shake any Canadian able to grasp its implications. It is no answer to say, as this government has been saying, that there are countries which did even worse last year. This is true, but most of them cannot be rated serious competitors of ours in world markets. It is equally true that the United States, with which we do 70 per cent of our trade, had a somewhat better inflation record than we did. That is very much more to the point. It hardly needs to be pointed out that our economy is very much less efficient than that of the United States. Trade is vastly more important to us, which means that we can ill afford to allow our prices to rise four times as fast as they need to rise.

We cannot continue, as we have been doing, complacent in the knowledge that inflation is hurting our competitors too. The penalty is all too evident—a lot of lost business, plus a great many lost jobs. We can no longer contend with increasing inflation in our country, inflation which is force-fed by this government whose spending has risen year by year at a faster rate than we can create new wealth. Mr. Speaker, if we continue to expand the public sector and annually boost the expenditure of government at the present rate, both the private sector and the climate for business in Canada will suffer, our wealth-producing capacity will suffer and with it the national standard of living. To think otherwise is to deceive ourselves.

The Economic Council confirmed that spending on social and welfare programs is soaring and must be brought under control before it sinks all of us. Government spending, Mr. Speaker, has been growing close to twice as fast as our gross national product. The figures show that general government spending has been rising at least as fast as transfer payments from government to citizens. The main beneficiary of the welfare state seems to be the government. The injection of more money into a welfare sector never seems to eradicate the welfare sector. The costs, the failures and the dangers will not become less if this government continues to grow faster than we can increase the annual value of the goods and services we produce.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope that all of us during this parliament will have the wisdom to base our future policies in Canada on the premise that the more people can do for themselves the better, and the more we can limit the future growth of the government, also the better.

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): May I first join with other hon. members in offering congratulations to Mr. Speaker and to his deputies. I know they will carry out their difficult task of overseeing this House with the same skill as was shown by their predecessors. I should also like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Duclos) and the seconder (Mr. Lee) of the Address in Reply, new members like myself, who have set a high standard at the beginning of a new parliament.

I am pleased that I can follow in this debate the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), and that I can offer congratulations to him on his appointment. I should also like to say, as someone who has known him over the years, that I suspect there is no member of this House, with the possible exception of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has rendered more service to this country than the President of the Privy Council.

As a new member it is with feelings of some trepidation and awe that I rise to speak in this Chamber. I suppose it is a feeling known to all who have done so. Anyone with a sense of history must feel somewhat overwhelmed by an appreciation of the great figures who have spoken here, or in the Chamber which preceded this one, or in the British parliament itself. I suggest that no greater honour could fall to any Canadian than of being elected to this House and speaking to fellow members of this Chamber.

I am grateful that the right hon. member for Prince Albert is in his place. There is no one probably, in the history of this parliament—who has added more colour, more drama or more excitement to its proceedings, than has the right hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: Whatever else I may accomplish in this parliament I can at least say that alphabetically I lead the list of all the members since confederation. I do not know how long I can maintain that record.

I represent the constituency of Mississauga. There are some members who are perhaps not overly familiar with this community. Possibly there are some who cannot even spell it.

An hon. Member: What about you?

Mr. Abbott: I can most certainly spell it, and I can speak of it with enthusiasm because it is already among the major cities of Canada in size and importance, adjoining, as it does, the great metropolitan area of Toronto. There is a disposition on the part of the residents of that great and dynamic metropolitan community to look upon Mississauga as merely a part of that metropolis and to take it for granted.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Abbott: Just as we Canadians living on the border with the United States have a feeling sometimes that our own great community is overshadowed by the United States, so do those who live in Mississauga sometimes have a sense of being overshadowed by Toronto. But perhaps I might paraphrase the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and say that if the latter half of the 20th Century belongs to Toronto, the first half of the 21st Century will belong to Mississauga. In any case, the city's rapid growth and its promise of a brilliant future assure it an important place among the metropolitan centres of Canada.

Despite the growth of industry, business and other phases of activity which go to make Mississauga a splendid community, there are certain areas of concern. The vast growth of recent years has created transportation needs which have not yet been dealt with. Many people in the area find it necessary to commute either to Toronto or in a westerly direction, and the transport services are in dire need of improvement. I welcome the initiative which the government proposed to take in this field during the last election, along with the other measures which were promised, and we look forward to action being taken in due course.

I am sure many hon. members frequently visit the Toronto international airport in Mississauga. Originally that airport served a more modest community. However, it has been extended to the point at which it has become a great centre of transportation, a source of noise and smoke pollution. People who live near it are extremely concerned, and justifiably so. The present state of our thinking in this country is to regard the people, their well-being and their way of life as of primary importance, and not what is loosely called progress in a technical sense.

Today, people who live in an area which was relatively unscathed by the disturbance of aircraft taking off and landing find themselves very seriously inconvenienced. Thus, there was great relief among the people of my constituency to hear that the government did not intend to expand this airport further. Instead, another airport is to be built elsewhere in another part of the province. There may, of course, be complaints from residents of the area designated by the plan, and we must maintain an open mind. At the same time, I am dedicated to the proposition that the airport in Mississauga should not be enlarged to the point at which citizens have to deal with flight congestion 24 hours a day.

I should like to say a few words about one of the issues to which reference was made in the Speech from the Throne. I refer to the dangerous situation created by inflation. There is nothing which touches Canadians more drastically than this, and it is heartening that the government is dealing with this problem—

An hon. Member: "Wrestling".

Mr. Abbott: The word wrestling has been used. It might be noted that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) attempted to introduce some budgetary improvements, it was necessary to wrestle the Tory party to the ground. This proved to be a relatively easy task. Nonetheless, it was a time consuming job though, fortunately, it resulted in a stable government, one of which Canadians can be proud. I was greatly encouraged by the speech of the Minister of Finance.

● (1510)

I was greatly encouraged by the message in the speech of the Minister of Finance. I found it to be realistic, sound, sober, dealing with the problem, not offering any pat or magical solution, and taking note of the great suffering that a number of Canadians are enduring. People talk readily and easily about citizens on fixed incomes being the victims, but too often we pass quickly over this and fail really to consider what is meant by that phrase.

I was reading in the September 28 issue of the London Economist a paragraph that perhaps described the problem which in Britain is more severe but which cannot be overlooked as being akin to the problem we face here. The paragraph reads as follows:

> Although the society appears more concerned than before to look after the old and the unfortunate, which is only partly a reflection of the improved political strength of the pensioners, much of the older generation's sense of independence is being eaten away. The virtue of thrift is disregarded in the general compulsion to spend, the rewards of such savings as contributory pensions schemes are being wiped out in the inflation, so that men who retired only three or four years ago with pensions to keep their wives and themselves in modest comfort are now dependent on the charity of their old firms—if those firms are still making profits.

The Minister of Finance has stated what surely any sensible person in this House will recognize if he only reads his daily newspaper, that the fires of inflation are burning everywhere in the world, particularly in the western industrial world; and, if anything, they are burning with less severity in this country than in almost any other country in the western world.

The minister further indicated that this was no matter for comfort or tranquility. He has recognized the problem but said that despite all the world's economists being gathered, under the best possible auspices, no ready solution has been prescribed for treatment.

The President of the United States in his message dealt with the problem in a fashion that I think was responsible. It approached the situation with a number of formulas. Many have already been tried in this country and found to be helpful. He did not indulge in overkill, as the minister stated, and he certainly did not engage in a renewal of the bankrupt policies of wage and price controls which were so favoured by hon. gentlemen opposite.

I have been reading a book called "The Edwardian Era" by Andre Maurois, and one paragraph describing Arthur Balfour could perhaps be applied to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). It need not be added that Mr. Balfour was a very considerable figure in British public life as the Leader of the Opposition is here, and I hope this mildly critical passage has enough complimentary things to say. However, I felt it was curiously apt for the situation that we have seen in the last few months of offering a policy of incomes control to the Canadian people, notwithstanding that it was tried and found to be a failure elsewhere. Perhaps it is not as apt as it seems to me to be, but the paragraph reads as follows:

> Like Lord Salisbury, he was frankly conservative because he was gently pessimistic. He considered that a wise man contented himself by a gradual solving of the problems of his generation, with prudence and proportion, and always mindful of his own feeble powers of foresight and of the narrow limits of his field of action. He also believed that there were advantages in doing a stupid thing which had been done before, rather than a wise thing which had never been done. And that is the quintessence of conservatism.

If that is the quintessence of conservatism, I suggest that the Canadian people recognized that spectre and decided that they should return to a strong majority government, and I am proud to be on this side of the House supporting that government.

I am also glad that the Minister of Finance has promised that the government will reduce spending wherever possible, because I believe that government spending in excess is one of the great contributors to inflation. Government spending is not confined to the federal government; the provincial governments of this country have been spending with an open hand, at a rate far exceeding that of the federal government, especially the province of Ontario.

With regard to who is to blame for inflation, government must certainly take its share. Members of the government cannot turn to the business community and assert that they are chiefly responsible for inflation by profiteering, because the facts would indicate otherwise. Smaller and medium sized businesses in this country face very severe problems in terms of maintaining themselves. It is difficult to found a business. Extremely high labour costs and high taxation make entrepreneurship a far less welcome prospect than perhaps going to work for government. I think the government's program to attack this problem is very laudable.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I was further heartened by the promise in the throne speech that the government was going to address itself to parliamentary reform, about which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) spoke today. Needless to say, it is a presumption for a new member to rise and start pointing out defects in rules with which he has not yet become familiar, indicating that there should be improvements made. However, I think, like many Canadians who have read their newspapers, or seen parliament in action, that there is an unquestioned assumption that parliament can improve its performance. I hope I am not overstating the case.

It is not simply a matter of parliament improving its rules and so enjoying the comfortable knowledge that it is being more effective and efficient. The real point of it is that if parliament, in what may be difficult economic days ahead, falls into disrepute, if it becomes an object of contempt on the part of the general public, then the consequence will be that all our institutions of government, our courts and our systems of administration, will be also cast into disrepute. At a time when we want Canadians to be conscious of the dignity and strength of their governmental system we must strengthen our own parliamentary system so as to enjoy that confidence better.

Again, Mr. Speaker, may I thank Your Honour and the House for their indulgence, and I look forward, with my fellow members on this side and elsewhere, to the coming parliament.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset how very pleased I am to have the privilege of following the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) and I commend him for what I consider a very excellent speech. It is a tribute to the people of Mississauga who have successively sent very capable representatives to this chamber. I refer as well to my good friend and colleague, Mr. Blenkarn, whom, I am sure, the hon. member knows very well and with whom perhaps he had some very interesting experiences in the course of the last few months. While I may not agree with the hon. member's analysis of the throne speech and some other of the analyses he put before the chamber, I do want to say that his speech was enjoyed by members on this side and we certainly look forward to his participation in our future deliberations.

I want also to join with the many other hon. members of the House in paying tribute to Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome), who has been elevated to the Chair. I know that the hon. member for Sudbury, who is now the Speaker of this august Chamber, will discharge his responsibilities in a very distinguished fashion, and will not only bring honour to his friends and colleagues here, but indeed honour to his constituents and his family. It is a special honour for me to be one of those members of the class of 1968 who came to this House at the same time as Mr. Speaker. It is a tribute to him that, within such a short period of time, he has been able with his capacity, knowledge and legal experience to assume this very distinguished position.

● (1520)

Let me also extend my congratulations to those other members of the House who have been elevated to important positions; the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the Deputy Chairman who is the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), and my very good friend the Assistant Deputy Chairman, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin).

As I said at the outset, I certainly do not share the same feeling about the Speech from the Throne as expressed by the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott). In fact, I find the speech less than comforting. I find it to be somewhat distressing in that it offers no clear direction for the future of Canada's economy.

Moreover, the speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to which I listened intently and read very carefully, offers very little hope in the enunciation of a clear economic direction for this country.

Given these circumstances, with the philosophic rhetoric we were exposed to, we on this side of the House are lead at least to presume that we can only anticipate more of the same kind of economic mismanagement we have experienced under this government, and which has been its pattern since assuming office in 1968.

All I can say as far as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is concerned is that he is merely travelling about the country and the world attempting to seek out some kind of national or international consensus of economic matters. Certainly that is not the kind of leadership one would expect from a majority government, and certainly not from a party which supposedly placed before the Canadian people all the answers and solutions to our economic ills. We now see the Liberal party, having been delivered a mandate by the Canadian people, slipping back into a state of suspended animation. In that respect we need simply review the record to put things in perspective.

In 1968 when this government took over, inflation was running at 3.2 per cent. Today it is running at 11 per cent, and for the last quarter it was running at 14¼ per cent. We are now experiencing a zero rate of growth, a situation known as stagflation. We have the prospect of higher unemployment. As a matter of fact the forecast for 1975 shows unemployment running in the vicinity of 7 per cent.

We have an accumulated budget deficit that has totalled $2.3 billion since this government assumed office. We have government spending more than doubled, and a public service that has increased from 369,000 in 1968 to 434,000 at this point in time, an increase of something in the order of 65,000. We have a money supply that has been doubled without a commensurate increase in productivity, and a cost of living which has increased by more than 40 per cent since the government took over. I would ask the government through you, Mr. Speaker, are we to continue on this path which has produced a record of dismal economic failure, incompetence and ineptitude?

It is unfortunate that this country and this government have missed a golden opportunity to show the world that we can deal effectively with problems of inflation. The government should be doing a much better job because it does not have the same irritants that have faced other nations of the world. For example, it has not been faced with an energy crisis to the same extent as that which has faced the United States, the United Kingdom and Japan. This country has not had to fight a war in Viet Nam as did the United States, and we have not experienced a Watergate fiasco. In spite of the lack of these irritants which have faced some of the other nations of the world we constantly hear from the government the suggestion that Canada is doing as well or better than other nations. I suggest we should be doing much better.

The United States administration has just enunciated eight different points in the fight to overcome its inflationary dilemma. More than half of the factors contributing to United States inflation do not affect Canada, so the government is misleading the public when it blames inflation on an international phenomenon. Such an approach is nonsensical and, I suggest, dangerous. It is not good enough to take comfort in the fact that we are better off than the United States, Japan or the United Kingdom. The failure of the government to deal effectively with inflation constitutes a major threat to the economic and social fabric of this nation.

Inflation affects everyone. Some can live with it, some can recover their losses, but some just cannot overcome the difficulties, particularly those who are unionized, the pensioners, the veterans, small businessmen and young couples. They are not able to overcome the impacts of inflation.

I should also refer to the farmers who are faced with increased input costs of the order of 20 per cent. It is true that food costs to the consumer have increased appreciably over the last few years, but the farmers' share has been constantly declining. Their share of the food dollar is now about 36 per cent, with the other 64 per cent taken up by marketing, processing and transportation.

We all know the experience of the livestock industry. The industry has never been in a more urgent state of turmoil than it is in Canada today. We are experiencing what is in fact a war with the United States in the movement of cattle across our borders. We all know the serious position the cow-calf operator finds himself in. This segment of the industry is fundamental to the survival of the beef industry.

We know the record of the government in its mishandling of the beef industry, with export restrictions and ill-conceived management of subsidies. We know of the manipulations and the interferences by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the government in respect of the beef industry. If there has ever been a body that has harmed the beef industry of this country, surely it is this government.

The government has destroyed confidence in this industry. Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture admitted in the House that he knew nothing about beef. He said he had never raised a beef cow in 20 years. It is obvious from the manner in which he has handled the beef industry that he has rarely seen a cow, let alone a bull.

Considering the depressing prices of beef to the producer one must ask oneself why the price to the consumer continues to stay at such a high level? Perhaps it is time that Mrs. Beryl Plumptre made a report on this situation. It is certainly time that the government brought some stability and assurance to the beef industry. We do not need another marketing board; what we need is something now to help the cow-calf entrepreneur.

Several proposals have been advanced. The governments of the provinces have indeed advanced proposals which would be of assistance in respect of the cow-calf operations. I ask the Minister of Agriculture to tell the Canadian people and this House what he intends to do about cow-calf operations in this country. I ask him also for leadership in the matter of the movement of grain and in respect of labour disputes. Where is the leadership? Where was he when demurrage costs were piling up? Where was he when demurrage costs were piling up? There was a burden to the farmers during the railway strike. This amounted to $10 million. Then another $10 million was involved in respect of the grain strike on the west coast and on the Great Lakes.

Where was the Minister of Agriculture during these situations? He does not speak on behalf of the farmers. He acquiesces with the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. We have had the inflationary settlements of 65 per cent in respect of the Great Lakes, and 61 per cent in respect of the grain handling industry.

I am wondering what the policy of the government is in this regard because the other day the Minister of Finance suggested we should be careful because, in fact, there is a danger that settlements might go beyond that which is necessary to catch up with rising living costs. Wage increases over the next three years, according to projections about the rate of inflation, could ensure that there will be inflation in perpetuity.

If 61 per cent and 65 per cent are not inflationary, and do not accelerate inflation, I do not know what they are. We do not have a policy from this government containing any guidelines. Therefore we find ourselves in a situation where inflation will indeed get worse based upon the pattern set by this government.

So far as I am concerned the Minister of Agriculture has failed to defend the interests of the farmers of this country. He is submitting to his colleagues, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). His speech in this House reflected that.

As a matter of fact it seemed as if the Minister of Agriculture has been pleading for some mercy. If the minister cannot stand the heat he should get out of the kitchen. I represent a large segment of agriculture in the country, as well as in my own constituency, and I shall not fall for his superficial humility. In my opinion agriculture, like the transportation system, is in the biggest mess it has been for a period of 20 years. I mentioned demurrage costs.

I want to repeat that the Minister of Agriculture should be making representations to the Prime Minister and his other colleagues in the cabinet to the effect that they should defray at least a portion of those costs which have been incurred through no fault of the farmer. These costs have accumulated to the point that they represent millions and millions of dollars.

Then we come to the question of agricultural input. What has the Minister of Agriculture done in respect of maintaining the price of fertilizer and chemicals, which have doubled in price in the last year, or what has he done in respect of the price of steel which has increased 50 per cent in the last 12 months, or the price of twine which has increased four times?

What has the minister done about the availability of these products? It is bad enough that the price has increased, but many of these products are not available to the producer. Prices become secondary when availability is not there. Perhaps some form of a prices review board should monitor the effects of the pricing policies of these various corporations. Yes, Canada's number one industry, agriculture, is indeed in a mess. The egg situation is merely part of the over-all problem as a result of the philosophy of this government which still patterns its policies after the Task Force on Agriculture.

The government is still following the general policy of its marketing bill, Bill C-176, or programs such as Operation LIFT, supply management, and things of that nature. We now hear from the Minister of Finance that agriculture is to be expanded. Ever since the government has taken office it has been attempting to contract agricultural production. Its flip-flop policy has cost the farmers millions and millions of dollars. This is the type of leadership which leads agriculture down the drain, and leads individual farmers to financial ruin.

I now should like to turn to the matter of transportation. It is still a mess. It has not changed one iota since the last session. The government had an election platform which now has been abandoned. I find it appalling that some of the exotic and very aggressive proposals that were advanced during the election campaign have now casually been cast aside. These were proposals conceived in desperation, I suggest.

This situation has been known in this House for many years, but it has been more serious during the time we had the previous minority government. The fact is that we still have discriminatory freight rates. Nothing is being done about that. My party during the election campaign advanced a policy in this regard which we were prepared to adopt had we taken office.

We all know that the trackage and roadbeds in this country require upgrading. There is need for improvement in respect of the safety of our railroad lines. The other day the President of the CNR indicated that we require an expenditure of something in the order of $5 billion to improve our trackage and roadbeds. Does the government intend to do anything about this? The government must provide some of these answers and take action. The President of the CNR in a speech in Montreal the other day said:

> We are beginning to reach the capacity of our rail network and unless we begin immediately on large-scale programs of doubling our main lines in many parts of Canada and increasing the capacity of our yards we will not be able to maintain the level of service we are providing now. This is one of the biggest problems facing the future of transportation in Canada.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

There are problems. We haven't had solutions. What we require is action. The Canadian Transport Commission and the National Transportation Act need restructuring. Appeal procedures must be changed. The thrust for economic development must be enshrined within the National Transportation Act. Let us see some action now from this government in this regard.

Then there is the question of branch line abandonment. Branch line abandonment is frozen until the end of 1974. What is the future policy of the government in this regard? This government, which has had a mandate since July 8, still has not made an enunciation of policy.

What is to happen in respect of the freeze on freight rates which is to expire by the end of December 1974? What is the situation for the future in respect of the Crowsnest Pass freight rates? Does the government intend to abandon the Crowsnest Pass freight rates? What is government policy in this regard? The producers of this country must have answers to these questions.

What is to be done about the Port of Vancouver? And what is to be done in respect of improved grain handling facilities to which I referred in the question period today? A commitment was made in the Speech from the Throne that steps would be taken to facilitate the movement of grain this winter. To date we have had no answer action in this regard.

Any time the government finds itself in difficulty it speaks of nationalization. Now it is speaking of the nationalization of the grain handling companies, the co-operatives, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Manitoba Wheat Pool, the Alberta Wheat Pool and the United Grain Growers. These grain handling companies are owned by the farmers of Canada. Because there have been some difficulties in respect of labour-management relations members of the cabinet suggest that the grain handling companies should be nationalized. What is the policy of the government in this regard?

What is to happen in respect of the third air carrier policy? We heard much talk about this during the election campaign. As yet we have not had an enunciation of policy. What about air navigation in the north? We know that air navigation facilities in the north are far from adequate. We have lost too many lives and too much property has been destroyed for us to go along with this inaction of the government.

It is time that we got down to specifics. The government has a majority. It has a mandate from the Canadian people to carry out some of the lofty proposals which it made during the election campaign. Let it get on with the job.

There have been many studies carried out with regard to transportation, particularly in the last 18 months. I should like to remind hon. members that it was this government that allowed railway services to deteriorate. It was this government that failed to provide effective and adequate leadership in transportation policy which is so vital to the economic and social wellbeing of this country. It was this government that created the National Transportation Act which the minister now suggests is ineffective. It was this government which acquiesced in the downgrading and eventual removal of many railway passenger services.

It was this government that discouraged commuter lines, this government that did not accept the recommendation of an all party committee to re-establish railroad transportation in south western Ontario. The mess in transportation is this government's mess. We on this side of the House have just about had enough of the slick talk, the flippancy and the evasiveness that we have read from the Minister of Transport. It is time that we received a realistic answer from him. It is time that the minister took his portfolio more seriously.

I say the same thing to the Minister of Agriculture, and for good measure I will throw in the Minister of Justice. All three of these ministers have tremendous responsibilities.

An hon. Member: And tremendous weight.

Mr. Mazankowski: Those are important and vital fields, but I do not believe these gentlemen are treating their portfolios with the seriousness that is demanded. I urge them to discard their lackadaisical attitude and take a firm hold of their portfolios.

I want to deal briefly with some comments that were made by the Prime Minister in his speech. I think it can be said that he successfully engaged in a ploy to sidestep the real issues facing the country by talking about such things as parliamentary reform, the question period, electronic voting, television in the House, and constitutional reform. While these subjects may be important I do not believe they merit the same attention as some of the urgent social and economic needs of this country. Surely at a time such as this when we have gone through an election, during which the Prime Minister waged a vigorous campaign on the important issues faced by the country, and after experiencing a void of three months, we should have something more positive from him than we did.

The Prime Minister mentioned Bill 22. I want to touch on that matter briefly because I have been receiving a tremendous amount of mail from interested people across this country. I think the Prime Minister owes it to the House and the country to clarify his position more fully. It seems to me that the intent of Bill 22 is to provide a new approach to bilingualism.

Bill 22 as it affects the Official Languages Act is somewhat ambivalent. Under that legislation the application of bilingualism will vary from one province to the other. As the Prime Minister stated, as recorded at page 47 of Hansard:

> This government will stand in opposition by all possible means to any legislative or other measures liable to restrict the use on the part of citizens of the official language of their choice.

We have a clear indication from many learned gentlemen, constitutional experts, senior political observers, and many Quebeckers, particularly those whose mother tongue is neither French nor English, that this bill constitutes an abridgement of the rights of minority groups in that they are not allowed to send their children to schools using the language of their choice. I think that that is a very important issue. Perhaps it is part of the whole government attitude toward the ethnic groups in this country. I think this was demonstrated today when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) put his question regarding Valentyn Moroz. He made a serious request, one that certainly could have been honoured by this government.

He simply asked that representatives of the Ukrainian-Canadian Committee and a qualified physician visit Mr. Valentyn Moroz to determine the state of his health. Surely this is not too much to ask for. The minister's reply was that the right hon. gentleman's request was irresponsible. I think this is an insult. It demonstrates the cavalier and contemptuous attitude of the government toward many ethnic minorities in this country. We also see the downgrading of multiculturalism in Canada in the fact that the minister who was in charge of that portfolio was fired and not replaced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: We see it also in the discriminatory immigration laws according to which a central European, particularly one who is living behind the Iron Curtain, cannot legally immigrate to Canada.

I suggest that all these actions demonstrate the blatant contempt of the government for the many ethnic people of Ukrainian and Polish origin, and those from the Baltic countries, and I urge the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), to reassess their position in that regard because this country derived its greatness from the melting of many cultures, the result of which is a truly multicultural country.

The issue in Bill 22 in my opinion reopens a festering wound which could be avoided if the Prime Minister simply clarified the government's policy and followed the principles enshrined in the Official Languages Act. I think that if language is fundamental to the preservation of a culture, the restrictions placed upon English in the province of Quebec constitute a step toward the deliberate destruction of the English culture in Quebec. Bill 22 goes against the grain and spirit of the Official Languages Act as well as of the Bill of Rights, and the Prime Minister, as the leader of our nation the author of the legislation, should put forth his position more vigorously instead of stating his regrets about the bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Tell us about the situation of the French in Ontario. Do they have equal rights?

Mrs. Sauvé: I had to write my exams in English.

● (1550)

Mr. Mazankowski: We teach French in Alberta. The best we can say about the Prime Minister is that his position can only be described as one of partial acquiesence.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Do you have equal rights for the French language?

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes we have but I do not want to fan the flames of emotion, Mr. Speaker. I am simply putting forth my personal views and they may not be the views of my party. I say this with a deep love of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hon. member may continue, of course, if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank hon. members for allowing me extra time. I shall only take two or three minutes.

I want to talk briefly about the Senate reform that was mentioned in the Prime Minister's speech, and to commend him for some of the proposals he advanced. In my opinion, however, the Prime Minister could be doing Canada a great service by moving to restrict the excessive political participation that some of our senior Senators engage in, particularly in the matter of holding office in their respective parties.

I will not mention any names but I think it is fairly well known that many notable Senators of the Liberal Party engage in vigorous political activity, particularly at election time. I think it is time for Senators to appear as servants of the Canadian people and not servants of the Liberal party. In my opinion the actions of certain notable Liberal Senators constitute a blatant interference with the process of legitimate parliamentary democracy. I would hope at least, even if it is not legislated, that some hon. Senators would think twice before engaging in this sort of activity. Such actions downgrade the performance of the Senate and downgrade the performance of its individual members.

Surely the time has come when we should consider necessary parliamentary reforms. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) in his speech described at great length what he though was necessary to accomplish this. If we are to appear credible to the Canadian people, and if this institution is to appear credible, surely steps could be taken to restrict such blatant abuse as we witnessed on the part of some members of the Senate.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): As I begin my brief remarks today I want to extend, as have other members of this House, my congratulations to Mr. Speaker, and those associated with him, on their appointment to office. I am sure it is a great tribute to his electors and to his great abilities that he has been elected to that high office. I know we all wish him well and are confident of his ability to discharge his responsibilities to this House.

When I spoke earlier this week about the urgent problem of the grain handling situation in Vancouver I was a bit preoccupied with that situation and did not have a chance to extend my congratulations. On that topic I am indeed pleased that parliament moved expeditiously to end the tieup at Vancouver. It was a demonstration of this parliament dealing with a situation as speedily as possible. I must admit that in the early stages I was just a little concerned about the possibility of delay through filibuster or some other tactic, but fortunately that did not happen and I think members of this House are to be congratulated.

Particularly, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank and congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), his parliamentary secretary, and also the government House Leader for the leadership they showed as the legislation moved through the House and in committee. I think enough has been said for the time being on that topic. The grain is beginning to move again and that is good news for all Canadians, especially western farmers.

To all members of this chamber, Mr. Speaker, veterans and freshmen, I want to extend best wishes and congratulations on behalf of Assiniboia constituency. I know the people of my riding are looking forward to a busy and productive parliament.

I do not think I have to provide too much background to this House on the historic constituency of Assiniboia. In almost every parliament it has been a highly visible riding. It has a tradition of vigorous representation and, if I may beg the indulgence of the House, I should like to name some of those who have occupied this seat in this House. There were names like Ross Thatcher, Hazen Argue and, as he is still known in Saskatchewan, Tommy Douglas. They are still a part of that vigorous tradition. Traditionally Assiniboia has not been what one would describe as inconspicuous in this House, and I hope that tradition will continue in some measure at least.

I should like to make special reference in this Throne Speech debate to one particular former member for Assiniboia. He was a very special man and I think he especially deserved the designation "honourable member". He was a tireless worker dedicated to his constituents. He was well spoken and and when he spoke people listened because they knew what was being said had significance. I am sure many members here today, especially those of the class of '68, recall with a keen sense of pride Mr. A. B. Douglas who served Assiniboia so well from 1968 until his untimely passing in 1971.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Douglas was indeed a great Canadian and it is a privilege for me to follow him in this place. I suppose it was Ab Douglas more than any other person who demonstrated to me very graphically that this place can work and does work to meet the aspirations of Canadians; that things can be achieved here, and that a member of this House can with success strive toward a better way of life for the people he represents. It was that lesson, and more particularly the example of Ab Douglas, which helped persuade me eventually to get into this business in a full time way myself.

As a new member from western Canada on the government side of the House, Mr. Speaker, I would like to devote most of my time in this Throne Speech debate to a few thoughts about the role which western Canadians are playing in our great confederation, and about the legitimate aspirations which they have—I may say "which we have"—for the future.

It is necessary first of all to look back 100 years or more to the 1860s and 1870s, that bold and early period of nation building. The government of the day devised a total economic scheme to assist in the development of the country in that early period. Sir John A. Macdonald called it his national policy. It included agricultural and industrial strategies, a tariff structure, the building of a railroad, a system of freight rates and an immigration policy all designed to achieve one end, that of strengthening the fledgling economy of the new country. Central Canada was the core—the core of population and the core of industrial and economic development. The west was seen primarily as a vast storehouse of resources and quite literally the people there were intended to be hewers of wood and drawers of water.

As it was introduced to the House of Commons in the throne speech of 1879, the original national policy consisted of a new and extensive system of tariff protection intended to promote domestic industries and agriculture. It was coupled with plans to press forward with the construction of the transcontinental Pacific Railway, and with the promotion of new settlement in the great northwest.

The basic idea was that the tariffs would create a national market and that the railway would serve that market from coast to coast. The railway was to carry new settlers to farms in the west, and in turn to transport the new farmers' agricultural produce to the east.

Thanks to the tariffs, industry was to flourish in central Canada. That industry was to supply the western demand for manufactured goods, while providing a large urban market for western produce.

Certainly under this arrangement the west was designed to be, in fact, a hinterland—a storehouse of primary resources to be utilized as required by the flourishing industrial east.

The government of the day repeatedly referred to western Canada as its "great empire"—famous and useful for its rich soil, boundless resources and salubrious climate.

That policy, begun in 1879, has been followed for 100 years, until recently. Despite party affiliation, successive governments down through the years have followed it. By and large it remained unaltered. Nobody tried to amend it until our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made his attempt to alter it in 1973. You could say that attempt was long overdue. Indeed, it was. I am proud that it was the Prime Minister who is leader of my party who made that decision and took the initiative.

In the summer of 1973 there was convened the Western Economic Opportunities Conference in Calgary, a major historical event for the west and all Canada. For the first time in this country's history a national leader devoted the entire resources of the country to solving the particular and peculiar problems of one region. For the first time in our history there was provision for a full examination of what was wrong and lying at the root of western discontent or, as some call it, western alienation.

For the first time a national forum was established in which the government could study the problem with the political leaders of western Canada. For the first time we were given a commitment from the Prime Minister of Canada that the economic arrangement of things would change. The topics discussed are well known. They included agricultural policy, transportation, financial institutions subject to regional sensitivity, regional industry, growth built on the vast storehouse of natural resources in western Canada, and decentralization of industrial and government operations. As the Prime Minister said, never before have the resources of this country been dedicated, outside of wartime, to a single project like this. Work was done on these topics before the western conference took place. They were discussed at the conference, and work in this area has continued since then.

I know western Canadians are, as I am, impatient for greater changes to come about. We are anxious to see the initiatives begun during the western conference go forward. We are realistic enough to understand that we are dealing with a situation in this country which has persisted for over 100 years and we are not likely to turn the world on its head overnight, or even in a few years. Yet the first steps have been taken, commitments have been made and I am confident that, under its present leadership, the government will honour those commitments. Good progress has been made in the initial stages of carrying out the commitment. There is lots of work ahead and we are all anxious to get on with it.

We need, more than anything, good will and an honest, frank effort on all sides. I am referring to the way in which this country is organized. To overcome our difficulties will require good and honest effort. I ask opposition members of the House to make a special effort and offer constructive assistance, so that work following the initiatives of the western conference may reach fruition, and so that our legitimate aspirations, as raised at the conference, may be realized. I am asking opposition members to depart from patterns of the past. I hope I do not sound critical or negative.

We can attack and change two difficulties whose roots are in the past. First, a great many members from western Canada sit on the opposition side. The situation was somewhat altered in the last election; none the less, to a certain extent it continues as before.

The function of the opposition is to oppose. The difficulty is that Canadian people watching this chamber or listening to press reports of its debates—indeed, this applies to members of the press gallery who report our proceedings—may be under the impression that western Canadians are negative and critical. Such an impression does not advance our cause, especially if we want it to be known that something is wrong and needs changing. If change is to come we must have the co-operation and active assistance of people in all parts of this country. They may not be favourably disposed to offer that assistance if they constantly see western Canadians carping, offering negative criticism and, if I may say so, frequent cheap shots.

To give a specific example, Mr. Speaker, we have seen much press criticism of transportation. The government is blamed as much for snowfall in the Rockies as for problems relating to freight rates. Members can criticize freight rates legitimately, but there is not a heck of a lot the government can do about snowfall in the Rockies. Yet the people of Canada hear criticism offered under these two heads with equal vigour. The impression of the people may be that it is difficult to raise legitimate questions about legitimate grievances, and there are some.

Mr. Paproski: There are quite a few in Alberta.

Mr. Goodale: Indeed, there are. If we enlist the co-operation of all Canadians in solving our problems we may succeed. But we will not gain their co-operation if we fail to explain our problems.

An hon. Member: You don't understand what you are saying.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, if hon. members criticize the government as severely for snowfall as they do for our freight rate structure the government may move more quickly with regard to the snow problem but this, I suggest, would not be of much advantage to western Canada.

An hon. Member: Have you mentioned your ideas to the minister?

Mr. Goodale: I have, indeed, and I found him very receptive. If we want the rest of Canada to understand us, let us try to be constructive and positive in the ideas we put forward, and not always display attitudes which are negative or critical. Western Canadians are not negative and critical by nature, but constructive and positive. They want to build this country and be part of it.

I want to talk now about the opposition's attitude to this question of "selling the case". Again, it has to do with getting the co-operation of our fellow Canadians. To whom should we be selling our case? Since the benches opposite contain a goodly representation from western Canada, the opposition could be very much of assistance. Do we need to sell it in Manitoba, or in Saskatchewan, or in Alberta, or in British Columbia? I suggest not. The selling job, the information job, the arguments, have to be presented in Ontario, in Quebec and in the maritimes because these are the provinces we are asking for co-operation.

Where have most of the speeches made by the western members of the opposition been delivered in the last few years? Had a tally been kept I suggest it would be clear from an examination of the record that most of the speeches were made in western Canada. Madam Speaker, we in western Canada know what the problems are. There is no need for us to hear an explanation. The efforts of honourable members opposite would be more profitably spent if they were to devote their time informing the people of eastern Canada, and the rest of the country, why we need those adjustments in freight rates, why we need a better balance of industrial distribution, why we need regionally-sensitive financial institutions.

When we make this case to our fellow Canadians, and make it clearly, they are prepared to act. I ask the opposition to assist me, because I propose to take up that task. It is important for Assiniboia, and I hope to get the co-operation of my fellow members opposite, especially those who come from western Canada, in explaining our case to the rest of the country, because they will not understand that case until they know what it is.

I ask the opposition to take part in this new approach, because the government of which I am proud to be a supporter is determined to strive toward the achievement of a new role for western Canada—it really amounts to a new national policy—to see that we come close to meeting the needs and legitimate aspirations raised at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference.

[Mr. Paproski.]

The government, as I have said, is determined to succeed. Why? It is because the government, under the present Prime Minister has recognized more clearly than any other administration in Canada's history that strong, full and fair participation from each region of the country makes confederation strong, and makes Canada a better place in which to live.

I invite hon. members opposite to share that eventual success, because the effort will, indeed, be successful. Having seen the government in action during and since the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, and having been associated with some of the work which has gone on, I may say there is one thing which perhaps more than any other helped me make up my mind to run in the last election and become a supporter of the government. I believe it has been demonstrated that it is not a matter of sheer numbers or political power that guides the decisions this government makes.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Goodale: I have found—and this is demonstrated in the case of western Canada—that it is a matter of Canadians putting their ideas together reasonably and fairly. These adverbs are, perhaps, difficult for the opposition to keep in mind. Nevertheless, as I say, it involves Canadians putting their ideas together reasonably and presenting a case fairly to the government. The government, for its part, has demonstrated a willingness to listen whenever a case is made both fairly and reasonably, and a willingness to—

Mr. Reynolds: To study the question.

Mr. Goodale: —to take action to solve the problems. I submit that since action is to be forthcoming we need not be negative, carping or critical, but rather emphasize the positive and the constructive, and the opposition can contribute greatly to that job if they choose to do so.

Mr. Reynolds: We shall study it.

Mr. Goodale: Go right ahead. You will be where you are for many years to come.

I wish to conclude by saying to the House that I expect results from this parliament. I am very optimistic about what can be achieved here if we approach our task in a spirit of co-operation, and I believe that western Canada particularly can look forward to productive action in the years ahead.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Madam Speaker, it might seem rather strange to you, who so gracefully graces the chair, but though I have been in this chamber many times before, this is my first speech in a debate in reply to a Speech from the Throne. I don't intend to ask that the House extend to me the generosity it usually affords other uninitiated members of this chamber, for some of the matters I intend to raise may provide the odd reply or two. If they do, that is just part of the stimulation or purpose of this chamber.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: At the outset, as others before me have done, I sincerely want to congratulate one of our own on his elevation to the Chair. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has recognized the work he has done in this chamber in the past, and also—and I think this is more important—the potential he has for the future in this chamber. The position held by the Speaker is one of great importance to the proper functioning of this institution. There has to be balance and impartiality from the Chair because without it the House would soon get out of tune, and from the discord of debate, chaos and confusion would result. Further, if the chamber were allowed to get out of tune too much it would lose touch with the people and with the reality of this land.

I also wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Duclos) and the seconder (Mr. Lee) of the Address in Reply. They are two new members who certainly acquitted themselves well and showed great promise for the future. In congratulating them, I am sure that I and other members are really congratulating all the new members who are contributing to this debate.

I think it can be fairly said from the speeches we have heard in the last few days that all the new members—the new class of '74 on both sides of the House—have acquitted themselves well and in a most constructive way. This not only augurs well for their own political future, but it augurs well for the future of this chamber. They displayed a delightful blend of idealism mixed with political reality.

This necessary mixture after every election, infusing those who have been here before with the idealism of newcomers, gives us the potential for some of the juice that is necessary to give balance and new vitality to this time-weathered legislative institution.

Who knows, Madam Speaker—their energy and enthusiasm may even give new direction and relevance to this place. Let us not kid ourselves; we can do with a few changes around here. I was hoping for some more fundamental changes than occurred as a result of the July 8 election, but we live with the verdict of the people. Certainly I predict that after four years in this thirtieth parliament—and I also feel that since July 8 the same can be said—a lot more people in Canada will be wishing there had been a more fundamental change on July 8, and that the government opposite—not hon. members opposite but the government—which is so encrusted with the status quo and inhibited with graduates from the public service who have entered the ministerial ranks, had the potential, imagination and initiative to help resolve some of the fundamental problems facing the country. I predict that before the thirtieth parliament is over many more Canadians will wistfully yearn in retrospect that the change had been more fundamental.

Leaving aside the basic issue of which government is in and which government is out, I could almost put myself in the shoes of a new member. There are a few trappings around here in the pomp and circumstance that initiate a parliament that I think should be changed, and that are long overdue for change. Such a change would not substantially affect the deliberations of this House, but could go a long way toward bringing a tone and temper to this place.

There are pundits in the gallery, and sage philosophers across the land who come and look down on this chamber, write screeds upon screeds and reams upon reams of rhetoric about some of the inconsistencies, irrationalities and irrelevancies of this place. I must admit to those who have finally made it here, seeing it from the floor of the House and not from the gallery, that some of their perspectives might be emancipated.

Be that as it may, a throne speech debate after an election is for eight days an interesting time for all of us. The new members mix and meet with old members and with the officers of the House, and we all hear the different viewpoints of members on all sides of this institution. This institution is the personification of this land. It is the only institution wherein at one time you can say, in an allegorical way, that this country has a heart consisting of 264 vessels and with all the imperfections of any heart—with I suppose a little scar tissue around somewhere, and perhaps a little blockage of the arteries and veins. Nevertheless, this is one place where the representatives of the people can meet.

I think it is very necessary that we go through this so-called baptism of members, who sit here listening to others and begin to appreciate that there are obvious differences of opinion. Even though we do have the odd catcall from side to side those differences of opinion are based on a sincere belief that a particular point of view is perhaps a little better in resolving a problem than another point of view.

All of us are here to try to resolve in a collective way some of the basic issues confronting this land. I think it takes eight days for us to put our feet in the water before we start to swim along the channel of this thirtieth parliament in which we will all be working and fighting together over the next three, four or five years. An eight day throne speech after an election is a necessary and interesting vehicle that enables us to understand each other.

I must say I do question in terms of procedures whether it is necessary to have a speech from the Throne between sessions during the life of a parliament, when we have all got to know each other, when the issues are lined up and when we have started to debate legislation. In the last parliament I think there was a curtailment of that debate because there was not the necessity to explore and try to get the tone and temper of the land by listening to speeches in this chamber.

I should now like to come to a few oddities that, frankly, have always amazed me. We can begin by looking at some of the pomp and circumstance of this place. Some of this pomp and circumstance is based on the reality of history. For example, we see the Speaker designate dragged from the back benches by the Prime Minister, who puts his arm through the Speaker's arm and drags him, protesting, to the Chair. When I first came here I thought that was rather ridiculous, and did not appreciate it until recently. This whole performance goes right back to the days when the King used to chop off the head of the Speaker if he did not agree with him, he being the spokesman for the commoners of the land.

Then there are other forms and trappings which to me, Madam Speaker, have developed a sterility of ritual, where the conditioned response replaces any thought or reason. One is that which begins the proceedings of this House. I refer to the convoluted prayer which daily begins our proceedings and, in its attempt to cover all, as far as I am concerned, stimulates few, if any. I wonder whether a simple moment of silence for others, or a simple prayer for Canada, would not be more appropriate than the present litany that we "listen to" with our ears closed.

We then have the performance given by Black Rod. He has to knock to come in, because the last King that walked into a Commons chamber lost his head. I think the representative of the King—which in effect he is—should knock. I must say in times gone by I have watched the procession from the door to the Chair with the "Black Rod tango" of seven steps and a bow, seven steps and a bow. I find that difficult to rationalize.

Frankly, I think this business that we go through of receiving a message from the Governor General signed by his own hand, as a result of which we all jump up like puppets, like marionettes, is unnecessary. I suppose there is reason for it. I suppose it is respect for the sovereign, who is the soul of the land. We are the heart of the land. Perhaps there is some other force that goes on in perpetuity. We do not; we come and go with elections, but the sovereign of the land does not. I know other members make the odd grimace when we receive a message signed in the Governor General's own hand and we all have to stand and go through this little ritual.

These are a few of the things that have assaulted my sensibilities, and I think at times the sensibilities of others too. This sort of thing makes me really question how relevant it is today. If we have this kind of blind vision on some of the little things, we require tunnel vision on some of the big things.

Obviously, Madam Speaker, I want to talk about the Speech from the Throne and to make reference to a few things referred to by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I only wish the Prime Minister had had the intestinal fortitude to say on the campaign trail what, in effect, he said in this House in his one hour and 20 minute speech. I suppose from his point of view it was one of his more interesting speeches, certainly one of the most interesting speeches I have heard him give in this House.

I find it insulting to the nth degree that having fought an election campaign during which the economy was an issue—and this is something that affects all Canadians regardless of their station in life—the Prime Minister mentioned the word "inflation" only once during his speech. I think that is borne out by the record.

I think the Prime Minister's speech was more interesting in respect of what was left out than what it contained. In any event let us start with what he did say, because I want to cover this matter and deal with some of the problems facing the Department of Transport and Communications. If I have time I should also like to describe the virtues and the beauties of the riding I have the great privilege to represent.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

In the eyes of even those hon. members from other parts of the country, the Annapolis Valley is the most beautiful riding in Canada. Every member expresses a similar view about his own riding, but I assure you that I felt that way about the Annapolis Valley before becoming a member of this House, and I will feel the same way long after I have left. To anyone who has travelled in the east I am sure that the Annapolis Valley, whether it be in the spring, summer, winter or fall, is beautiful to the eye. The people there are most intelligent and some of the most emancipated in this country.

Mr. Stanfield: You've only got two hours!

Mr. Nowlan: My leader says I am limited to two hours so I had better get on with my remarks and leave that until later. Let me refer to some of the things the Prime Minister said in his speech on the Address in Reply. I have listened to other speeches he has made during throne speech debates in the past, and I remember particularly his speech in 1968.

The Prime Minister talked about reform of the rules of this House. That is a popular phrase among laymen one meets around the House. Of course there has to be reform. If we do not maintain reform of our own rules and procedures as an ongoing process, making things more relevant, we are not doing our duty. I commend the Prime Minister for focussing some attention on this matter.

I was here in 1969 following the election of another majority parliament in 1968. The present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) was then the House leader. He was popularly known then as "Thumper", probably because he went around trying to thump members of the opposition into accepting rule changes. Those rule changes resulted in a very acrimonious debate, particularly in respect of Rule 75A, 75B and 75C. Those members who were here then will remember that we fought against those rules long into the summer because we felt this was not reform but de-form of the House of Commons. We felt that the proposed rules would emasculate this place and that members would become political eunuchs in terms of any real contribution they might make here, on the floor of the House or in committees.

Some members I am sure feel we have made some good changes to the rules. There was a fundamental change in 1966 which, I suggest, adversely affected the rights and privileges of members of this House. I have in mind the change that resulted in the estimates of the various departments being considered by committees.

Before the change hon. members could question ministers about certain items of expenditures that had a direct bearing on their constituencies. At that time a member could get an answer under the threat of refusing to pass the estimates of a certain department. A member might not agree with the answer he received, but at least that was a step in the right direction. The member could then confront the minister with his answer six months or a year later, with the hope that something constructive would be accomplished. In any event the estimates were taken out of the House and I suggest this was a retrograde step.

The Prime Minister's reference to reform bothers me because of something I recall very distinctly that took place following the debate in 1969. The Prime Minister held a press conference summarizing the activities of that parliament. I cannot quote his exact words, but the reports indicated that the Prime Minister smiled and laughed when saying that he had certainly sucked in members of the opposition by asking for massive reform. He went on to indicate that after a long, protracted and acrimonious debate, which finally ended in a form of closure, the opposition accepted something else.

I am a bit worried when I am faced with that frame of mind on the part of the leader of the government. This is the same Prime Minister who a few years ago said that parliamentarians were nobodys. I suggest it is not surprising that many members of this House are suspicious about this type of reform. We must examine this whole matter of reform carefully before we unilaterally and fundamentally change some of our procedures.

Before we go too far down the road of parliamentary reform we should have the opportunity to express our opinions about the suggestion that we should allow television coverage of our procedures here. I personally believe that if we can resolve this question about television coverage in the House we will have taken a great step in the direction of making this place relevant. Perhaps in this way we can do more than has been done in the past by changing the rules.

Whenever one mentions the word "television" in the context of parliamentary procedure people begin to talk about the ham in everyone coming out. They say that everyone will be vying for position. I suggest that television coverage will prevent a lot of hocus-pocus on the part of members quicker than any change in the rules. It would effectively unmask the clowns and uncloak the fools. I think television coverage would result in every member of the House acting a little more like he does when he is at home, and would result in better attendance here than at home. Incidentally, hon. members are not often at home because they are either here in parliament or travelling around their ridings carrying out constituency business.

I think all the arguments that can be made against television coverage were made in the British House in 1737 in opposition to the presence of the quill, a reference to the reporting of those debates. At page 278 of the British parliamentary debates of 1737 to 1739 we find the following reference, and I might add that this is in a sort of old English, perhaps a bilingualism of that time. Someone was apparently reporting a speech in the House, and this is the report we find:

After which Mr. Speaker informed the House, that it was with some Concern he saw a Practice prevailing, which a little reflected upon the Dignity of that House: What he meant was the inserting an Account of their Proceedings in the printed News Papers—

I should point out that this reference contains some strange letters such as "f's, p's, ff's" and others. What he was referring to was an insertion of a printed report in the newspapers of the day. How long has television been with us; some 10, 15 or 20 years? The complaint to which I referred was in reference to printed newspapers. I like to complain about the press from time to time, but they do attend this place and write their reports. We have learned to live with the situation, the same as I suggest we will have to learn to live with television coverage.

Referring to these proceedings of the British parliament again it states:

—he had in his Hands a printed News Paper, which contained His Majesty's Answer to their late Address, before the same had been reported from the Chair, the only way of communicating it to the Public. That he thought it his Duty to inform the House of these Practices, the rather because he had observed them of late to have run into very great Abuses; and therefore he hoped that Gentlemen would propose some Method of stopping it.

Good gracious me! I suppose they thought this would likely give a false impression of how the gentlemen conducted themselves. I do not know if television coverage will give a false impression of the conduct of members in this House, but I suggest it will certainly focus the camera on this Chamber, as a result of which we will not be able to conduct ourselves in the manner that some of us have in the past. I for one believe it would fundamentally change the character of this place. It would certainly shorten debates. It would stop repetition. If a member got up and stumbled through his speech he would have something to think about as he might be on television that evening. Some of the catcalling, which I sometimes enjoy getting involved in, would have to be conducted with discretion.

Perhaps I should not waste my entire time on this subject, but I suggest that what was said during that debate in 1737 is relevant to any debate now in respect of television coverage. It is time we came back to the 20th century. That was reform in reverse.

I have many more things I wish to say but I do not know how much time I have remaining. I should like to mention something that is causing concern on all sides of the House. I do not think the Prime Minister appreciates this. In 1968 when he obtained a majority he was clear during the election campaign on two things. One was regional disparity. He said he would do something about it. The other was the official languages bill. He made it clear that if he were elected something would be done. Something was done. At that time he had a mandate.

However in 1974 there was no mandate to the government on any issue because the Prime Minister did not talk about an issue. All he did was promise this and that. He promised material things. He did not make promises in respect of philosophical issues or even economic issues which could be disturbing to Canadians. I think there is a real difference between what the Prime Minister did in 1974 compared with what he did in 1968-69.

On another occasion, because my time is running out, I should like to speak about the matter of transportation and communications. The Prime Minister did not mention much about that, or about bilingualism during the election campaign.

As I cross the country and travel around my constituency I find that people ask me to rationalize the situation in respect of Bill C-22. They wonder, when there is unilingualism in one part of the country, how bilingualism can be developed in the federal structures of the country. I find this question difficult to answer. There are other elements of this on which I should like to elaborate at some other time.

However, I should like to ask members of the House to go back to the debates on bilingualism in 1968. At that time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the Prime Minister, my leader, all leaders and most members who spoke on the Official Languages Bill adopted the very necessary principle in that bill, but the understanding was that there would be institutional bilingualism and not necessarily individual bilingualism. That is not merely a semantic difference. I believe in and I voted for the right of any person, whose tongue is either English or French, to be able to communicate or correspond with any bureau of the federal government in either native tongue.

The shift, however, has gone from institutional bilingualism as such. For instance, we might take the example of the unemployment insurance office in the Annapolis Valley where there were bilingual districts when I was the member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. Let us suppose the language composition was 80-10. Obviously a federal institution to serve that area should be staffed roughly in the same ratio. This does not mean that every person in that office should be bilingual, because that would be an impossibility, just as it would be very difficult in any area outside the central part of this land. I say this same situation is applicable across the country.

In the west where there are other language groups, such as German or Ukrainian, a quota system is being established so that there are people available to service different language groups at federal offices, whatever those offices might be. I notice that the former President of the Treasury Board is present today. I think he has a dual ministry now. I heard him say first that there would be red circling of 25,000 positions. Then later he said that there might be 50,000. Then again he admitted he was not sure how many.

Then, having said that, the minister said the easy thing. He said that after all since there were 50,000 positions in the public service one should not really complain about 4,000 or 5,000 of them. But when the designations and red circling involved bilingual positions, complaints were heard. I think the shift should be reversed.

In conclusion may I say that in my opinion Bill 22 is substantively bad. We may unfortunately see the bench mark of real linguistic development in this land because Bill 22, as it presently stands, puts the lie to the Prime Minister's campaign in 1968 when he refused to accept that there were two nations, and misrepresented our deux nation position.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, since this is the first time I have risen in my place to address this chamber I wish to take this opportunity to offer my congratulations to the Speaker on his elevation to that position. I want to assure the Chair that at all times it will have my co-operation in its performance of the arduous duties that lie ahead. I should like to ask the forbearance of this House until I have become familiar with its rules and procedures.

I wish also to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne for the masterful job they did in their maiden speeches in this House. Through you, Madam Speaker, on behalf of myself and my constituents, I should like to express my pleasure at the progress His Excellency the Governor General is making in his convalescence. We wish him a speedy and full recovery.

One of the best known public figures in our nation is the dean of this House, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I want to tell him how pleased I am to be here to hear him and watch him perform in this House. While I do not often find myself in agreement with his opinions I know he holds and expresses them with conviction. For that attribute, and for his dedication and service to our country and its well being, he has my respect and admiration. May I express to him and to his loyal and gracious wife my wishes for many more years of health and happiness.

I should also like to express my admiration for one other member of this House before I get to the main part of my maiden speech. I refer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He is known across the land as the embodiment of what a parliamentarian is supposed to be. He has made himself the formal expert on the House itself. I shall not hesitate to call on him for advice in trying to understand how the House functions because I must confess that at the present time it is rather puzzling to me.

I also want to express my great joy at becoming a member of the House, which I consider to be the noblest of Canadian institutions. It is an honour for which I must express gratitude to our party and its leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). But, most of all, I must express my gratitude to the electors of Northumberland-Miramichi for their expression of confidence in me to represent them in parliament. The people of my constituency are well known for their friendliness and hardiness, and it is indeed my privilege to be their representative here.

The constituency which I represent occupies much of the watershed of the Miramichi river and its tributaries, as well as the parishes of Carleton and Acadieville in Kent County, New Brunswick. The Miramichi river is famous the world over for its abundance of fishing opportunity, particularly for Atlantic salmon. Because of the importance of the fishery to the economic wellbeing of my constituents I am very pleased that the Prime Minister has, in fulfillment of an election promise, appointed a Minister of State responsible for Fisheries (Mr. Leblanc), and I am particularly gratified that the position is occupied by a fellow New Brunswicker.

The hon. member for Westmorland-Kent is well known for his ability, forthrightness and integrity. He has a difficult task to perform in devising policies that will answer the increasing demands of our population and those of the rest of the world for consumption of fish and fish products, and at the same time conserve fish stocks for future generations. In my judgment, that is an essential part of his mandate, but it is no easy task. I wish to congratulate my colleague and assure him of my support and co-operation.

I am also gratified that the federal government has undertaken a hydraulic study of the Miramichi river and bay to determine the engineering and economic feasibility of dredging the channel to allow larger vessels to proceed up the river to the towns of Chatham and Newcastle. I hope that this study will prove that dredging is feasible. If such is the case I shall expect the work to the carried out forthwith. The dredging of the channel is of utmost importance to the economic wellbeing of our area, so that its products may be moved on to the markets of the world at a transportation cost that is not prohibitive.

Although I am fortunate to live in and represent the area I do, we are not without problems. For many years the future of the ammunition depot, CFAD Renous, has been in question. After my election I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) to make a public announcement regarding the present and future status of this installation so that the employees there would be able to plan their future in an orderly fashion.

On August 23, 1974, the minister announced that CFAD Renous would close on September 1, 1978, and that the closure would be accomplished through a series of lay-offs spread over four years. The minister also committed his department to making every effort to ease the hardships by finding alternate employment for those who will not be eligible for superannuation without penalty. Most of those employees are veterans of world war II and the Korean war. Therefore, I strongly urge that Her Majesty's government consider, on an emergency basis, a satisfactory solution to this serious problem.

We cannot afford to lose an establishment which brings $2.5 million worth of economic opportunity into a rural area where other job opportunities are practically non existent. Since this situation has been brought about by a government decision, I hold the government responsible for showing initiative in solving the problem.

We are still plagued in northeastern New Brunswick with a woeful lack of television and radio production and transmission facilities. Indeed, to my knowledge New Brunswick is the only province in Canada that lacks of CBC owned facility. Northeastern N.B. is now served by Moncton Broadcasting Limited, operating on channels 7 and 12 whenever they are able to overcome technical difficulties. On September 27 the CRTC handed down a decision according to which the New Brunswick Broadcasting Company would provide CBC programming to northeastern N.B. on channels 12 and 7, while Moncton Broadcasting would provide CTV programming on channels 4 and 6.

But to the consternation of everyone in my constituency, CRTC has allowed these two companies a full year to work out the arrangements for the one to compensate the other for channel transfers. The same decision forbids the construction of the required facilities until a compensatory solution has been achieved. It appears then that the television service for northeastern N.B. is still two years away, and that is not satisfactory. At the same time that entire area in N.B. is without FM radio reception. I hardly knew before I came to Ottawa that one could listen to a radio station that was not 80 per cent commercials.

Many other proposals in the Speech from the Throne will improve the lot of my constituents. I was happy to hear the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) state in this chamber last week that he wants to increase protection for the consumer. I subscribe to his view that those who rip-off the little man for the sake of unfair corporate gains should be sent to prison. Surely they are as criminal as those who break the game laws. If the little man stole from the corporation presidents, he would very soon find himself before the courts. Justice must be even handed, and I have no sympathy for those who gouge the public.

I am sure that the veterans of this nation will be relieved to learn that their benefits will soon be increased, as will those receiving old age security benefits. I hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) will be able to find a way to speed up the deliberations of the Canadian Pension Commission. It is small consolation for a needy veteran to be told he will probably get a pension in six or eight months when the commission gets to his application. I do not intend this to be a criticism of the commission. I am sure its chairman and members are sincere and sympathetic individuals doing their jobs as best they can. I only hope that we can find a way to expedite the processing of the application.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member can call it five o'clock. It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Tuesday, October 15, at eleven o'clock.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: May I refer to the practice which has been followed with regard to the introduction and first reading of private members' public bills. On today's order paper there are listed some 158 bills standing in the names of various hon. members. It was neither practical nor possible for the Chair to review the provisions of each of these bills. May I therefore suggest to the House that we adopt the procedure agreed upon in the past several sessions, namely that we proceed to the introduction and first reading of those bills so that each may be scrutinized between now and its being called for second reading in order to allow the Chair to consider whether there is any defect in the bills in respect of the practices and usages of the House.

I suggest that by unanimous consent all public bills listed in the names of private members for introduction on today's order paper be deemed to have been introduced, given first reading and ordered to be printed, and to stand for second reading at the next sitting of the House, subject of course to a subsequent examination as to the regularity of each bill. Is the procedure to which I have referred agreed to by the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVISIONS RELATING TO CHILDREN AND UNMARRIED WOMEN

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-26, to amend the Civil Service Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

INDUSTRY

UNITED AIRCRAFT—CONTINUED TRANSFER OF PRODUCTION FROM QUEBEC TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under the provisions of Standing Order 26 to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the continuing transfer of production from the United Aircraft Corporation in Longueuil, Quebec, to the United States, such continuing action putting into jeopardy all future production in Longueuil and the wasting, therefore of over $70 million of federal grants to that corporation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was good enough to give the Chair the notice required by the rule two hours prior to the beginning of this morning's session. This has given the Chair the opportunity to consider whether the proposed motion comes within the provisions of Standing Order 26.

There can be no doubt, of course, of the importance of the subject matter of the motion. However, in addition to its urgency and importance hon. members will know that sub-section (5) of Standing Order 26 requires—perhaps it might be worthwhile to quote it as follows:

> In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration, Mr. Speaker shall have regard to the extent to which it concerns the administrative responsibilities of the government or could come within the scope of ministerial action—

The sub-section goes on to state, and I think these are the important words:

> —he also shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

● (1110)

In view of that language it has become a rather strong practice of the House—and specific reference has been made to this in the past—that only under the most exceptional circumstances should a motion be allowed under Standing Order 26 during the currency of the Throne Speech debate because of the ample opportunity provided during that debate for hon. members or other hon. members of their party to raise subjects of special importance in whatever manner they see fit. Accordingly, I might refer to earlier references, one of January 11, 1956 in which the subject of cash advances on farm stored grain was raised and reported in Hansard of that day. This was a motion under Standing Order 26 in which the Speaker of the day made the following comment:

> In my experience it has never happened in the House that while the Speech from the Throne was being currently debated a motion for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance under the new Standing Order 26 was agreed to.

The subject was similarly discussed on February 18, 1972 by the previous Speaker. Without going into the details I would simply give members that reference so that they might look at it. In this situation, the fact that the Throne Speech debate has two more days to run and the fact that although this subject is of a continuing nature and the problem has gone on for some time in the past, would lead me to the conclusion that the remaining days in the address should provide an opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of the government, in addition to which of course there will be available soon opposition days. There is, of course, the availability of today or tomorrow for the hon. member or other hon. members to raise the matter again.

As I say it is a matter of extreme importance. However, under the circumstances I feel the final words in subsection (5) of Standing Order 26 would make it impossible for the Chair to give the hon. member the right to proceed at this time.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—PROPOSED VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER—SUBJECTS TO BE DISCUSSED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister with regard to his visit to Brussels and the Europe Economic Community. I wish to ask him whether there is any change to be proposed in the relationship between Canada and the European Economic Community, and whether he will be presenting any set of specific proposals with regard to the trading and commercial relationships between Canada and the community.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is known that the Canadian government has made proposals to the community. They are in the form of an aide-memoire, a proposed type of trade agreement between the community and Canada. Discussions have been going on for many months now. I believe the proposal was made earlier in the year, in February if my memory is correct or perhaps even before that, discussions were proceeding.

The present attitude of the government is to try to keep in balance our desire to enter into relations with the community as a whole but also to keep advancing our bilateral relations with various member countries of the community.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister while he is in Brussels to discuss with the European Economic Community and its representatives any methods of aiding the developing countries in their present crisis which was underlined by the head of the World Bank, for example? Does the Prime Minister intend to take up with the European Economic Community any common approach to this problem that is creating such a crisis in the world?

Mr. Trudeau: In my bilateral discussions which I will have, and already have had, with the heads of state this is always a subject matter which I insist upon being on the agenda. I have not yet seen the final agenda with the community itself. I would think it most likely that since I would be discussing it bilaterally that I would also discuss this matter with the community itself.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister making specific proposals or simply having a discussion about this subject?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the specific proposals vary with the subjects. There is of course, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, going forward under the Group of Twenty, headed by the Canadian Minister of Finance, an attempt to work out some mechanism of recycling of funds which are accumulated as a result of the petroleum crisis. We are looking at possible proposals in the area of food which might be made at the World Food Conference. There is no specific proposal that I can put before the House at this time.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—PURPOSE OF VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. He will learn when he gets to Brussels that any chances that Canada once may have had for obtaining special consideration from the European Economic Community have been dissipated because of his government's attitude toward NATO which is largely made up of the same countries. Is the purpose of his visit not really a public relations exercise to try to divert attention away from the economic problems which the government is facing at home and unable to solve?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Do I understand the hon. member to suggest that I should not make this trip to the Community?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that at all. I have suggested for the past two years that the Prime Minister should try to repair the perhaps irreparable damage which his government did with NATO in 1968.

INDUSTRY

UNITED AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF REPATRIATION OF WORK TRANSFERRED TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the federal government has provided anywhere from $70 million to $130 million in various forms of assistance to United Aircraft in the last decade, could the minister inform the House whether his department was aware of the work being transferred from Longueuil to the United States during the past nine months by that company and, if so, could he also tell the House if such a transfer violated any agreements with the federal government and tell the House what the government intends?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had followed these events as closely as did the hon. member for Longueuil, he would have known that the situation had developed last May. Last May he asked me a question in the House and at that time I told him that, yes, I was aware that on a temporary basis certain work had been transferred to the U.S. suppliers, and secondly, that I had obtained assurances from the company that the work would be repatriated to Canada as soon as the strike was over.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATIONS IN RELATION TO WORK DONE IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): In view of the fact that the company had transferred roughly 40 per cent of its work to the U.S. plant and planned to transfer some 35 per cent of next year's scheduled production, which seems to me to indicate that they really do not anticipate settling this strike, I ask the minister in all seriousness whether, in the event that the company really plans to shut down its Longueuil operation, do the contractual arrangements made by the government with the company make it possible for the production of that engine, which was developed in a highly successful way in Canada, to take place in the United States independently of the will of the government of Canada?

[Mr. Hees.]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I indicated last week in answer to a question from the hon. member that I hoped to be able to make a further statement to the House with respect to the assurances that I was seeking from the company on both the repatriation of work from both the East Hartford plant and the other suppliers in the United States, and further assurances with respect to the expansion of the Longueuil plant.

I have a letter which I would be pleased to table from the president of the Canadian company which sets out the company's position that the repatriation has been already started, that the company has already taken steps by way of investment in the expansion of facilities, and that it would expect this coming year to be doing more work in that plant than it did in 1973 which was the biggest year ever.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary to the minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the assertion of the president of that company in Canada that under no circumstances will it accept the Rand formula on labour negotiations, which has been accepted by 90 per cent of the other companies in Canada, could the minister inform the House how he expects the company to carry out its obligation when that would mean there would be no settlement at all in the plant?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the continuing labour difficulties in this plant is of very considerable concern to the government as it is to all members, particularly the hon. member for Longueuil who seldom lets a day go by without bringing it to my attention. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that employment at this plant has been increasing in recent months. This is the reason why the company can give undertakings with respect to the repatriation of the work and the expansion of the plant.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to table a copy of the letter from the president of the United Aircraft Company of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 41 allows the minister to table the document at this time, and in fact it is deemed to be tabled at this time.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO CERTAIN PENSION PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Can he tell the House whether discussions are now under way with the provincial governments with a view to improving welfare legislation and helping more efficiently the handicapped and mentally retarded who until now have been rather sadly neglected?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I thank the hon. member for his question. I must say that indeed this matter has top priority in present discussions on the revision of social welfare legislation in Canada. We hope the work will be completed for the month of April next year.

[English]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister advise the House if the government, in consultation with the provinces, will give consideration to raising the national minimum allowance for the blind as well as the disabled? This has not been raised for years.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the work being done with the provinces at this time concerns all those in need. We are endeavouring to do away, as much as possible, with the categories known in the past in the field of social welfare, and to introduce a guaranteed income and an income supplement program to be applied as widely as possible without encumbering ourselves with those artificial divisions that created so many problems in the past.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED DENIAL OF JUSTICE TO MR. SAMSON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, when the liberty of the subject is in any way interfered with, parliament has a pre-eminent duty to act. I want to ask first, why Robert Samson, a mounted police officer who has now been held for 74 or 75 days one way or another in custody, has not been charged if there is any evidence against him?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter on which Mr. Samson was held and brought before the fire commissioner's inquiry in Quebec was the responsibility of the Attorney General of Quebec and the investigating police force which is the Montreal Urban Community Police Force. The Attorney General of Quebec and the Montreal Urban Community Police Force decided to proceed in that way. We have no responsibility or jurisdiction in the matter. I might say that on other grounds the RCMP dismissed Mr. Samson from the force. He had a delay in which to appeal his dismissal but he did not take advantage of that delay.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does not the minister know that he, as minister, and the government of Canada, should assure that a member of the force, as Mr. Samson was when these proceedings began, shall be protected from what is now apparently a perversion of justice. This has arisen in his being made to give evidence under the Fire Protection Act. This course, incidentally, is followed in other provinces but the accused has the right to ask for protection in respect of anything he says. Have the Mounted Police protested against this conduct which places a fellow Canadian in an impossible position and which is detrimental to the discipline and morale of the Mounted Police.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have personally discussed this question with the Attorney General of Quebec and this question comes completely within his jurisdiction. The RCMP is put in a difficult position when a member of the force is suspected of committing an offence. If it takes measures which seem to protect the man, it can be accused of trying unduly to protect a member of the force. On the other hand if it does not, it is open to the sort of criticism which has been raised here today. The matter was completely within the jurisdiction of the Attorney General of Quebec. I discussed the matter with him and he said that he had decided to proceed in this way. That was his response to me. He told me that proceedings will take place in the weeks to come which will justify his action. I will wait to see what is to happen, but he has taken that position.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the minister approve of the kind of drum-head procedure that has been followed to the detriment of justice and the ordinary dignity of an individual.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to comment on this case now because it is still before the Fire Commissioner and will proceed before the courts. But I have made my views known personally to the Attorney General of Quebec.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Tell us what they are.

Mr. Allmand: I will make further views known on the subject once the case before the courts has been concluded.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR LONG-TERM SOLUTIONS TO FOOD SUPPLY PROBLEM—ASSURANCE DELEGATION LED BY MINISTER

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It arises from his earlier reference to the world food conference in Rome, in March. As the World Food Conference to be held in Rome this November will be the first such conference held at a political and ministerial level specifically so that its recommendations will reflect the policies of the governments concerned, can the Prime Minister assure this House that Canada will be prepared to give the kind of creative support to third world initiatives for long-term rather than emergency solutions which we so badly failed to give at the World Congress on Population in Bucharest. Can he also assure the House that, this time, the Canadian delegation will be led by a minister throughout the proceedings.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the composition of the delegation and its terms of reference will be made public and the delegation will be led by a minister.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Transport. When will he table the report on Frobisher Bay for which we have waited so long?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope to have the report this week.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PURPOSE OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON TRANSPORTATION OF ALASKAN OIL ACROSS CANADA

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises from a reply he gave on Thursday, as reported at page 277 of Hansard. On that occasion he said the House was well aware of the attitude consistently taken by the government. We knew as long ago as July, 1973, that the government was just beginning to fight. We also knew that certain conversations were being opened up with the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please ask his question.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, are the conversations merely exploratory, to determine if there are sufficient clean-up materials in areas likely to be affected, or are they negotiations designed to keep tankers out of Puget Sound and the Straits of Juan de Fuca.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the line between conversations and negotiations is hard to determine at times. In this case we regard them as very important discussions or negotiations in an effort to protect, insofar as it is possible, Canadian interests in this respect. As the hon. member knows, it is a very complex subject. It is very difficult to indicate in an answer the variety of positions that have been put forward by both sides.

ENERGY

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH NUCLEAR POWER PLANTS IN NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a short but very important question I wish to address to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What is the status of negotiations between the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia on the establishment of nuclear power in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, our original hope was that we could have achieved a regional expansion of nuclear power systems by a second unit to be located in New Brunswick. The first unit would have been for New Brunswick purposes and the second unit for purposes of other provinces, including Nova Scotia. Regrettably, it was not possible to come to agreement on the second unit. I intend to have some discussions with the premier in the relatively near future in relation to the interest that has been expressed both in the press and elsewhere with regard to the possibility of a nuclear unit in Nova Scotia. Of course, the federal policy still remains, the offer of 50 per cent of the capital cost of the first nuclear unit in each province. Nova Scotia would be entitled to the benefit of that. Of course, it also remains federal policy to try to shift thermal power units from fossil fuels, particularly imported oil, to nuclear wherever possible.

EFFECT OF PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF NUCLEAR POWER STATIONS ON DEVELOPMENT OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER AND COAL RESOURCES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister indicate whether the negotiations that have taken place with Nova Scotia in connection with nuclear power are in any way endangering the negotiations that have been going on with regard to the establishment of Fundy tidal power as well as the development of our coal resources in the mainland of Nova Scotia which are there and have only to be used to produce additional electrical capacity for the province.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the Fundy tidal power, that would in fact be interruptable power because of its nature. It would not be as effective in a firm base as would a coal-fueled or nuclear station. With regard to the possible use of coal resources, particularly in the hon. member's constituency, I think it remains an important option for Nova Scotia as to whether to proceed the coal route at this time rather than proceeding with nuclear power. This is an important choice to be made.

BEEF CATTLE—SUGGESTED NEED FOR AID TO PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. As it is now more than two weeks since the four western premiers called for a crash economic aid program to help small and medium sized beef producers, since many will possibly be going out of business, is the Prime Minister in a position to announce programs that will aid these beef producers in western Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing to be added to what we have already done.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the fact the four premiers said that if something is not done almost immediately, thousands may go out of business resulting in higher prices for consumers, will the Prime Minister consider at least one of the proposals, a cash advance program similar to that already in effect in this country for grains?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I always consider proposals made to me by premiers very seriously.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the producers of this country will tolerate that type of answer. I want to know whether the Prime Minister will be coming forward with specific programs and, if so, when will he do this? If something is not done, many producers will be going out of business within the next two weeks.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is really no announcement I can make this morning beyond saying that the matter is being considered in cabinet.

GRAIN

INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE OF WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO DATE AND AMOUNT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. As the minister has already stated there will be an increase in the initial price of wheat board grain, probably before Christmas, will he now indicate how much of an increase he or the wheat board is contemplating and when that increase will be made.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is referring quite accurately to anything I have said. He may be referring to a remark in which I said, while I had earlier thought that consideration of an increase after January might be the most desirable time, I was giving further consideration to the timing of it. However, the question is now more when rather than whether the increase will be made.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I was under the assumption the minister stated in Winnipeg there would be an increase before Christmas. In any event, the minister has not answered my question which is relatively straight forward. When is he contemplating an increase and what amount will it be?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, my answer made it obvious that the when has not yet been decided. Obviously, the amounts have not yet been decided either.

WHEAT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON MODIFICATION OF TWO PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Having regard to the fact that wheat production in Canada will be down by some 13 per cent and this year the quality of the wheat will be of low grade variety, having the overall affect of reducing gross receipts to the prairie wheat producers, and given the fact that milling wheat for export purposes is now selling at $6 a bushel while that for domestic consumption is being sold at $5 a bushel, is the government giving consideration to modifying the two price wheat structure? If not, why not?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this is a long-term structure which ensures a floor as well as a ceiling. I think it is a very reasonable arrangement in terms of grain. This year there is a lot of lower quality and out of condition grain being produced. The challenge at the moment is to ensure that drying equipment is there to dry that which comes off damp. It is also a fact that world market conditions are such that the grain of lower quality which is coming off is actually selling at a very high price.

Mr. Mazankowski: Inasmuch as a differential of $1 per bushel could result in a loss of something in the order of $50 million to $60 million to the prairie wheat producers, does it remain the intention of this government to carry on this wrestling match against inflation on the backs of the farmers?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member fails to note that the overall arrangement, a seven-year program with a guaranteed minimum as well as a guaranteed ceiling, means there can be periods during which the producer receives a little less because of the fixed maximum. However, there are other times, just as there were from 1969 to 1972, when the producer receives more from the consumer because of the higher price which is being paid.

BEEF CATTLE—SUGGESTED CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES ON PROPOSED IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Because of the uncertainty in the cattle industry and the fact that the fall run is about to start, is the minister prepared to go to the United States to discuss the on-again off-again quota on imports and embargoes between Canada and the United States so the market might know what is going to happen between these two countries? This is very important to the fall run of cattle.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a meeting is taking place in Washington today with beef producers from all countries concerned, Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, the United States and others. We have representatives at that meeting. As far as our quota program is concerned, it is set for a year. We do not know what the United States is going to do. If the hon. member has any further information on what they are going to do, I would be pleased to receive it.

Mr. Horner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister posed a question to me, but he is Minister of Agriculture. Does he not think that he can do some good for the Canadian cattle industry by going down to the United States and talking with Secretary Butz of the United States so as to ascertain exactly what is the intention of the United States government regarding the export of Canadian cattle to that country?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, the United States government passed a law—I forget the number of the bill passed—back in 1962 by the U.S.A. which allowed them to hold hearings concerning the controlling of imports of any country that introduced controls that are liable to hurt American exports. The United States government has not said what it is going to do. I thought the hon. member had some knowledge that he was going to pass on to me.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Whelan: I point out, Mr. Speaker, that a week ago today I met with the United States undersecretary of agriculture in Boise, Idaho.

PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH QUEBEC BEFORE PASSAGE OF BILL 22

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that Quebec Premier Bourassa has emphasized, ever since he has been elected as head of the Quebec government in 1970, the profitability of cooperative and consultative federalism, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether the government of Quebec has consulted or at least informed him before putting into effect the language policy contained in Bill 22?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I already had the opportunity to tell the House Mr. Bourassa has discussed his projects with me in a rather general way, and I think some information has also been given at the ministerial level. Besides that, Mr. Speaker, I can only remind the hon. member that the government of Quebec retains its autonomy in fields of its jurisdiction. There has been some discussion but no comprehensive efforts to take action directly in a provincial jurisdiction area.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there has been political discussion rather than—I can see the right hon. member for Prince Albert is mumbling. He should feel free to speak up.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister says that Bill 22 is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. I thought that during the election campaign he expressed grave doubts as to its constitutionality when he was trying to get votes from other parts of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: As usual, Mr. Speaker, with this type of subject, the right hon. gentleman is wrong.

CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON TAXATION OF RESOURCE INDUSTRIES PRIOR TO BUDGET PRESENTATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister be making, or has he made, concrete proposals to the provinces in the present round of consultations regarding the taxation of resource industries before presenting his next budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been visiting the provinces, and will be again this week or early next week, to discuss with them the implications of proposals that I brought before the House on May 6. I will be reviewing options and hearing what options they have in mind. I want to say to the hon. member that these are not negotiations; these are discussions to put me and the government in a better position to review the budgetary posture before the budget is brought down later in this parliament.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question having to do with another topic. Would the minister release the evaluation study of the use in Canada of languages other than English and French, and in particular Italian, Ukranian and German?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will be indulgent enough to let me have a look at it. Before doing so, I do not think I can answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, we can see there has been a demise of the multicultural program since Dr. Stanley Haidasz has been fired.

POSSIBLE STRIKE OF ASSISTANT AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour concerning problems that seem to be developing in Air Canada with the walk-out of assistant air traffic controllers, continuing negotiations with CALPA, and there are reports that other personnel may be considering strikes or walk-outs. Has the minister any report to give us, or are we faced with another disruption of our country's air services?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, with reference to this particular dispute, since employees of the federal government are involved I think the hon. member's question should more appropriately be directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I will be glad to accept the minister's suggestion, though I keep in mind that on another occasion when I asked him a question concerning the CALPA negotiations he said I had the wrong department, and later on he had to recant and say that I was right in the first place. I ask the President of the Treasury Board what reports he has for the House and the country concerning the very serious situation that seems to be developing in Air Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, negotiations are progressing well at this time and I have nothing special to announce to the House.

POSSIBLE STRIKE OF ASSISTANT AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION AGAINST THOSE PARTICIPATING IN ILLEGAL STRIKES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I will direct to the President of the Treasury Board. It deals with statements made during the last illegal postal strike by the minister's predecessor regarding the possible prosecution of those taking part in illegal strikes in this country, and that, to use his own words, they would not be tolerated any longer. Now, we are faced once again with a disruptive walk-out by the assistant air traffic controllers, would the minister therefore indicate to the House what positive steps will be taken to deal with those taking part in these and any future illegal strikes as a result of the former minister's promise, or is the government changing its mind on the matter as well?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that the hon. member agrees on the statement made by my predecessor. We intend to put this policy in practice while using proper judgment according to the various circumstances we will have to face.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DOWNSVIEW AIR BASE—POSSIBILITY OF RELEASING LAND FOR HOUSING DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the shortage of housing in Toronto, does the government intend to give up excess land at Downsview air base so that some land can be made available for this purpose?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Defence is aware of the need for housing property in North York. Several years ago it released some 70 acres of land to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, but we have no plans to release any other part of Downsview as it is needed for operational purposes.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUNDS FOR ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM—AVERAGE EFFECTIVE RATE OF INTEREST ON MORTGAGES—POSSIBLE SHIFT IN POLICY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the reduction in the rate of housing starts on an annual basis by some 70,000 units, is the government giving consideration to increasing the budget of the assisted home ownership program to $1 billion?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the hon. member's figure, may I say we are considering every possible alternative so as to increase housing stock and reduce the decline in housing starts in the coming year.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that most mortgages have been negotiated at 9½ per cent interest rate, and more recently the rate has increased to 11½ per cent, will the minister inform the House as to the average effective rate of these mortgages?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I do not quite get the precise intent of the question, but I will check what the average rate might work out to. This is a matter of rather important concern and I will try and get the hon. member an answer.

Mr. Orlikow: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made by the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the government will intervene next year if housing starts drop below 200,000 units for the year, does this statement represent a shift from previously announced government policy of completing 250,000 housing units per year?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the government is always intervening in the housing market, but there has been no shift in policy. Our policy has been to follow the guidance of the Economic Council of Canada and try to produce one million houses every five years. We have exceeded that by some 250,000 houses, and that is almost double the rate. This housing policy will continue.

ALLEGATION QUALIFIED APPLICANTS REFUSED LOANS BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. A. D. Why is that?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would have to consider individual cases, but I should like to know about the specific one to which the hon. member referred. It is true that in respect of AHOP, if that is what the hon. member is referring to, funds are being rapidly used up, which proves the great success of this excellent program that was introduced by my predecessor.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will make an inquiry into that situation.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would also inquire as to why the Public Service of Canada is directing its advertising campaign for keypunch operators to housewives and students with no experience instead of hiring from the ranks of others who are already drawing unemployment insurance benefits?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, in order to obtain technicians we are hiring them from wherever they can possibly be obtained.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

POSSIBLE RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it seems the Prime Minister has disappeared momentarily and I do not know whether he is allowed to answer by long distance, but my question has to do with his remarks during the Throne Speech debate regarding the establishment of an acceptable amending formula which would allow us to deal with our constitution domestically. Has he conveyed this sentiment to the provinces, or discussed with them the procedures of an earlier conference that broke off two or three years ago in Victoria? Can he tell the House what steps will now be taken to achieve this desirable end?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker. There are to be consultations which will be on a bilateral basis with the various provinces. There will be no public occasion in the immediate future at which that matter will be discussed.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in light of the importance of this to all Canadians is the Prime Minister prepared to tell the House what proposals he will put forward to the provinces in order that Canadians might understand and accept those procedures to be followed in this regard? In addition, and in light of the difficulties at Victoria, does the Prime Minister propose to place any amendment on the table for the provinces to consider?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, and as I indicated in my speech on leaders' day, these discussions have been going on since 1926 and there are literally thousands of proposals and variations which can be discussed. My mind is open to any of them. At this stage I have indicated that discussions will be bilateral. These discussions will probably take place over quite a period of time before I will be in a position to indicate what the general direction will be, and that will eventually be made public.

COAL—PROPOSALS FROM NOVA SCOTIA FOR DEVELOPMENT OF MINES

Hon. Robert L. Has the minister of Energy, Mines and Resources received any proposals from the government of Nova Scotia regarding further development of coal mining in that province as a result of the minister's statement last winter that he would be prepared to entertain specific proposals from the provinces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to check the record before responding to that question, but I will undertake to do so and advise the Leader of the Opposition.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF FORCE IN EUROPE AS A RESULT OF BUDGETARY CHANGES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence which arises partially from comments made yesterday by the Maritime commander, as well as during the latter part of last week, regarding his concern in respect of reduced activity. In achieving a 30 per cent cutback in this phase of the current defence budget have the minister and his colleagues given consideration to any reduction in Europe?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the first thing that must be clarified is that the defence budget is not being cut, but is being increased. It is up at least $150 million this year over last year. It will continue to be increased. As we attempt to make allocations as between personnel costs, equipment costs and operations we must adjust the balance, and, as I explained to the House last week, that process is going on at the present time. Europe is not being considered in our present thinking as being an area where we would make cuts.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate whether in the requests he has quite apparently sent out for budgeting purposes in relation to a review of our forces' position in Europe for the next fiscal year, has he asked for some suggestion about how an acceptable cutback might be achieved in Europe next year?

Mr. Richardson: No, we have not done that, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—NATURE OF POSSIBLE GUARANTEE BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO ENSURE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the doubt now that the Montreal pipeline will go ahead, will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicate when this interprovincial matter was discussed in Cabinet, and was there any guarantee that the pipeline would be viable? If so, would he divulge that information?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the view generally at that time both in the oil industry and the regulatory agencies, that is the Alberta Board and the National Energy Board, was that the supply would be adequate over a period of time to meet the additional demands of the Montreal market.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, will the line be built with federal government guarantees if in fact the National Energy Board report on reserves proves there is insufficient oil to fill the line and make it viable?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I told the House last week, the nature of the guarantees, if any, is something which the company will be putting to us in the near future, and the government will, of course, have to make a decision as to the nature of any financial participation the federal government might undertake.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Friday, October 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Louis Duclos for an address to His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, when the allotted time ran out on Friday, I was discussing some of the problems that affect my constituency and constituents, and I should like to continue in that vein for a few minutes.

Let me turn my attention for a moment or two to the matter of police protection in Northumberland County in the province of New Brunswick. We seem to be experiencing a period of increasing crime which must be partially the result of the lack of police protection we have. The County of Northumberland covers an area of 4,720 square miles. To police that area we have a total of 22 RCMP officers and men. They are divided into three detachments, one at Newcastle, one at Doaktown and one at Neguac. I wish again to emphasize that the area which they must cover encompasses 4,720 square miles with a population of approximately 52,000 people. By comparison Parliament Hill is policed by 38 Royal Canadian Mounted Policemen, consisting of 28 constables, four corporals and one staff sergeant, in addition to the protective staff. As I said, the police situation in Northumberland-Miramichi shows very little resemblance to the situation on Parliament Hill. I would respectfully request the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) to look into the situation in Northumberland-Miramichi and carry on discussions with the Minister of Justice for the province of New Brunswick in an effort to increase the number of police officers for the protection of that area of the province of New Brunswick.

Now, I wish to express some of my reactions since becoming a member of parliament. I am impressed, of course, by these buildings which house us and by the various staff people who serve us. I am impressed by the cleanliness of these buildings, and the willingness of the staff people to help and assist us. I have found them without exception, to be industrious, courteous and conscientious, and I am happy to be able to commend them publicly. I am depressed, on the other hand, by all the hand-wringing and pessimism I witness in this chamber. When I listen to the predictions from the other side of the aisle, I have to wonder if this is Canada we are hearing about. I do not wish to pretend we have no problems. Indeed, we have. I believe we should bend every effort to solve our problems. But let us not over-emphasize those problems which agitate us. Of course, we have inflation, but we will not solve these problems by exaggerating them. I believe those who occupy positions of public trust have an obligation to speak with care. The fact is that Canada is having more success and Canadians generally are suffering less from the effects of inflations than any other industrialized nation.

When I consider some of the questions put during the oral question period and some which are placed on the order paper, I do not wonder why our people sometimes have such little respect for politicians. I do not believe we can expect the public to have respect for us unless we show by our actions and our words that we respect the position to which they have elected us.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be here; I am proud to be a Canadian, and I think we should proclaim some of our assets which are continually persuading so many people from many other countries to come here to seek their destinies. By all means, let us take our problems seriously, but let us not become so myopic that we trample ourselves to death getting away from the fire.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate you on your elevation to your high position. Your activities in the House in the preceding six years certainly merited your choice for higher things and I, as one privileged to sit in this House during the first few weeks under your jurisdiction, have nothing but compliments for the way you have handled yourself, for your fairness and for your general conduct as Speaker. The House has benefitted as a result and I congratulate you. I should also like to congratulate the other members of the House who have been appointed your assistants. They are doing their very best. They are doing a good job and I also congratulate them.

One principal reason for the zero growth in real production which took place in this country during the first six months of the year was the $1.2 billion increase in our trade deficit in finished goods which took place during that period. As we know, finished goods provide the majority of the taxes which are needed to finance the development of an industrial country, the return on industrial investment and the jobs which are needed to employ those who are continually becoming new members of the work force of a country such as Canada. As we know very well complete production of fully manufactured goods is the most important kind of process we can have. It seems strange that at the same time this government was allowing a $1.2 billion deficit in our fully manufactured goods to take place, this government was falling all over itself in an attempt to sell our raw materials to other industrial countries which use these primary products to feed their manufacturing processes.

Every time the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) stands up to answer a question in this House he proudly announces that we have increased our over-all exports. Of course, there are two things which must be taken into consideration when he makes those statements. In the first place, when he says we have increased our exports by 23 per cent this year he seems to forget the fact that inflation connected with those particular exports about which he is speaking has increased not less than 29 per cent and that, according to the figures of the agencies of government, our real exports have decreased this year by 5 per cent. I say that by far the most worrisome matter is the fact that the export of our fully manufactured products has declined very sharply and our imports of fully manufactured products from other countries have increased equally sharply.

As I said before, we have been increasing the export of our raw materials. Specifically during the first six months of the year our exports of crude production increased by $400 million and our exports of fabricated products, those products which have had one stage of manufacturing, increased by no less than $200 million. This steadily deteriorating situation shows clearly that we are now engaged in exporting employment instead of bending all our efforts to sell more finished products in the export market and thereby gain so many advantages for this country, such as additional jobs for our people, additional return on the capital invested in industry and additional taxes required to meet our very heavy expenditures in running our country. To sell more of our finished products in the export market, the federal government must introduce practical incentives to increase substantial improvements in the following fields: First, expanded export trade; second, increased productivity; third, more research and development; fourth, more processing of primary products in this country.

First of all, what must we do to greatly expand sales in the export market? Because of the country's great dependence on the United States market where we make 70 per cent of our sales and the steady move of that country toward protectionism, we must develop additional markets because if we do not we will place ourselves more and more in the hands of the American people. As their tendency toward protectionism increases, it is obvious that we will find ourselves in a more and more difficult position so far as making sales in the export market is concerned.

What must we do? Making sales on the export market requires doing four things well: first of all, going overseas and making personal contact with potential buyers; second, while overseas, finding out firsthand what is needed to meet the competition in that market; third, coming back to Canada and producing products which will not only match but beat that competition; and fourth, displaying those products which we produce effectively before potential buyers. The incentive that I suggest would allow producers to write off 200 per cent of all expenses connected with making sales trips abroad, displaying products at foreign trade fairs, and any other expenses incurred in sales promotion in the export market. The kind of incentive that I suggested will greatly encourage the kind of activity that I have described as being very necessary indeed, activity which is needed to increase export sales. Not only would all such expenses be completely written off in the year when they are made, but a considerable cash bonus will accrue to the company undertaking additional export activity.

Another thing which the government should do to help increase the sale of Canadian products abroad is to introduce "fly and buy" missions, whereby the important buyers from the principal foreign markets of the world would be flown to Canada once a year to see Canadian consumer products displayed in giant trade fairs in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and our heavy machinery in the factories across Canada where it is made. These kinds of missions will pay for themselves many times over in the future by way of additional jobs, profits and taxes which these additional sales will make available to Canada.

Next I would like to deal with the need to increase productivity in our country. As we well know, increased productivity makes possible the lowering of costs of production, which in turn makes possible lower selling prices, which produce more sales which result in more production, which produces more jobs. It is as simple as that, but nevertheless is very necessary. Increasing productivity requires the installation of new plant machinery and production systems. These usually cost a great deal of money, and in order to persuade industrialists to undertake a program of increased productivity, we must first convince them that they will be able to get back their costs, and then some, by making these usually heavy investments. To make this possible, the government should introduce a productivity incentive which would, first of all, allow industrialists to write off capital expenditures within two years and, second, which would provide a bonus to industrialists and producers generally at the end of the year based on increased productivity in that plant or in that operation during the past twelve months, compared to the base year which would be the year before the plan goes into operation. This kind of incentive has been very effective in increasing productivity in such countries as Japan and West Germany, where spectacular results have been achieved since the end of the second world war. There is no reason at all why equally satisfactory results cannot be obtained in Canada by a similar process.

Next, I should like to deal with what is needed to increase research and development in this country. One of the reasons we have had to rely so heavily on foreign capital in the past is that investment brought with it technology which was produced by research done in the country where the capital originated. We need more research and development in our country for two reasons: first of all, so that we will be able to rely less on foreign capital for our industrial development, and second, to win new markets because by means of additional research and development we will be able to lower costs, to produce better design and better quality, and to win new markets by a combination of any of these factors.

The incentive which I believe should be offered is to allow industry to write off 200 per cent of the cost of current and capital expenditures on research and development in excess of those made in the base year, which would be the year before the plan goes into operation. This would once again be attractive to producers and would induce them to undertake such a program because they would not only be able to write off the whole cost of the operation in one year but would receive a substantial cash bonus at the end of the year as well. Where this plan has been adopted, it has been very successful in greatly increasing research and development in the countries concerned. There is no reason why it would not be equally successful here in Canada.

Finally, I should like to deal with the need to process more of our primary products in this country. All of us here, all industrialists and all politicians in this country, have agreed for many years that we export far too large a proportion of our bountiful supply of raw materials. We send them to other countries which turn them into finished products and thereby gain the great advantages of increased employment, taxes and profits, gains which rightly should be ours. What is needed to bring about greater processing in Canada? We have talked about it for a long time but have done nothing in this direction. Thirty years ago the government of Ontario required companies which had been shipping logs to paper mills in the United States to process a far greater proportion of those logs in paper mills in Canada. This led to a spectacular expansion of the pulp and paper industry in Ontario and is the reason that we have such a large and thriving pulp and paper industry in this province.

What has worked so well in the province of Ontario with regard to pulp and paper will work equally well in the case of other primary products which are shipped out of this country in large volume at present to other countries for use in their manufacturing processes. It can apply to all of our raw materials which we produce across Canada. If we apply the same principle that Ontario did regarding the shipping of logs out of the province some 30 years ago and since that time, it can work equally satisfactorily for all raw materials in this country because of the great dependence which other countries have on Canadian raw materials to run their factories and turn out the finished products.

It is obvious that a certain proportion of our primary products should be shipped abroad in their raw state, but not nearly the proportion that is shipped today. I believe that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should now undertake an intensive study of what proportion of our primary products should reasonably be required to be processed in Canada. Having decided the proportion of our various primary products which should be further processed in Canada, we must produce an incentive to persuade those who normally export these primary products to process the proportion that is agreed upon in this country.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has provided grants which have proved useful in attracting some industry to areas of slow growth, but not nearly enough to reverse the persistent high unemployment tendency in those areas. In addition to DREE grants we need an incentive which I believe should be a graduated system of federal taxation under which in the first year of full operation the company concerned would pay no federal tax and would then start paying gradually increasing amounts until its fifteenth year when it would be paying full taxes. I have discussed this matter at length with producers all across the country who have convinced me that this additional incentive to the DREE grants would produce the results I have in mind.

The incentives I have outlined will pay for themselves many times over in the years ahead in two ways, Mr. Speaker. First of all, if they are applied and industrial production is increased in the way I know it will be, we can provide a greater number of jobs for the work force. By providing more work, the number of people drawing unemployment benefits will be reduced. In this way I am convinced we can save $1 billion per year of the more than $2 billion per year now paid out in unemployment insurance benefits.

The second way we can save money is by greatly increasing tax revenues. By increasing employment in the manner I have outlined, more people would be working and paying income tax instead of drawing unemployment insurance benefits and more commodities would be sold, resulting in additional commodity taxes. Greater production would decrease the unit costs and thereby give greater profits to producers. That would mean more taxable profits.

I believe a program of incentives is necessary and I believe it would do two things, Mr. Speaker. First, it would increase production to the point where it is approximately equal to the demand for products. That action would return inflationary pressures to normal. Second, it would provide the jobs which would reduce unemployment to somewhere around 4 per cent of the work force which I believe to be a reasonable level. That is the aim of all members in this chamber and it must be the aim of this government.

Mr. Speaker, this is a reasonable program and one which I have discussed at length with industrialists in all parts of the country. It is a program which will work and I put it forward for the consideration of this House because I believe it is the only kind of program that will meet the needs of Canada today and will restore our economy to the level which the people of Canada have a right to expect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate you most sincerely on your elevation to your high and important post. I express confidence, along with all members of this House, that you will do a magnificent job, following in the footsteps of your illustrious predecessor and, I am sure, will do as well if not better than everyone who has preceded you.

[Mr. Hees.]

I should like also to congratulate the mover (Mr. Duclos) and seconder (Mr. Lee) of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both performed very very well when giving their maiden addresses in this House.

Third, Mr. Speaker, as is traditional, I should like to thank the electorate of Ontario riding who managed to give me a slightly larger majority than I had after the 1972 election. I appreciate it greatly and will work as hard as I can to be worthy of the confidence they have shown in me.

I should like also to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for giving me the honour of working with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for most of the last two years.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Do you like powdered milk, too?

Mr. Cafik: His was a very important portfolio in the last parliament and dealt with the social needs of the people of Canada. The Health and Welfare ministry did a great job in increasing family allowances and old age pension benefits, and brought in a whole range of programs in the twenty-ninth parliament. I am sure the minister will do an equally good job in the forthcoming sessions of the thirtieth parliament on behalf of those people in this country who are in need or on fixed incomes.

I should like also to thank the Prime Minister for appointing me as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. His department has a lot of legislation to bring forward. A great deal of work has to be done to protect consumers in the marketplace and to make sure that the marketplace functions properly for the protection of the free enterprise system. That can only be done if it functions in such a way that the greatest number of people are served by the free interplay of competition.

The first subject with which I should like to deal is one that is linked to my own riding and that is, the airport that was proposed for Pickering some time ago. As all hon. members know, an independent inquiry was set up to look into the whole matter and I hope a report will be forthcoming in the next month or so. Whatever the recommendation of that independent inquiry, I urge the government to accept it. If the independent inquiry concludes that the airport is not necessary or is not properly located, then the whole proposition should be reconsidered. However, if that independent inquiry commission recommends on the other side of the question, then it seems to me their recommendation should be followed as well. This is a highly controversial matter, and I think if we are to look at it responsibly and objectively, we must give great attention to this report when it comes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You sold your riding out, Cafik.

Mr. Cafik: The second point I want to make in respect of the Pickering airport proposal, Mr. Speaker, is in regard to those people who had land expropriated. Some 18,000 acres of land were expropriated by the federal government for the airport and there have been a series of actions started under the Expropriation Act and outside of the Act in order to arrive at reasonable market values for the land. Obviously, any conclusion will never be satisfactory to all concerned and that is quite natural but it is my job, the job of the Department of Public Works and of this government to ensure that justice is done and that people are adequately compensated for the properties taken from them, reluctantly.

Until now the money paid to those expropriated was based upon market value or the department's judgment of market value. The two outstanding questions that have not been resolved are the valuation date of that market value and the home-for-a-home principle. The payments that have been made or offered to date are based upon market value determined as of January 30, 1973. A lot of water has flowed under the bridge since then. Some people concerned have not replaced their property because the government has held out the possibility that the airport would not be built. That being so, it is unreasonable to expect people whose property has been expropriated to replace it immediately after expropriation, because they have been led to believe that there is a possibility of their being allowed to stay on after the inquiry is over. Therefore, because these circumstances are unique, it is essential that we establish a new valuation date. It should be the date on which a person bought property to replace property he originally held. Or, at the latest, the date should be some day after a decision has been made and a report tabled about the airport inquiry. If it is decided to go ahead at that time, I believe the government will be obligated to state when the new valuation date will be. It should not be before the date of the decision and it could be as much as three months afterwards because, so far, the government has not yet given notice of possession.

My second point concerning justice has to do with the home-for-home principle. This has not been applied in any cases which have arisen so far. It has not been applied because it is presumed by those who interpret the Expropriation Act that market values will be sufficient to enable people to replace one home with another of equivalent premise. That may be all right in many cases but there are clearly exceptions to the rule. I wish to illustrate an exception which must be taken into account by the Department of Public Works. Of course, one can think of more than one exception.

I am speaking of, say, a retired couple living in what might be considered as a substandard dwelling, the market value of which may be $22,000 or $23,000, but which cannot be replaced for less than $60,000 or $70,000. We are obligated to give such people a home in which to live, if we take away the one in which they lived previously. There are other elements to the question which are difficult to resolve. If you give them a higher priced home because there is not one of lower value in the neighbourhood, what shall we do about the increased taxes they must pay? The husband and wife may have retired on a fixed income and have well afforded the home which was expropriated, because they had paid for it and the tax rate was low. If they are pushed into a subdivision, into a much more valuable home, who will pay the increased taxes? Their tax bill may rise from $200 a year in their old home to $900 or even $1,000 on the new one. In my view, the Department of Public Works is obligated to make up the difference for that couple during their lifetime.

Many other problems of this type must be considered in an understanding and humane way by those who administer expropriation proceedings, so that we can make sure no one is disadvantaged economically because property is needed for the public good. That is fundamental.

The question of rental rates is also important. In Pickering, in my riding, the province of Ontario began expropriating 25,000 acres of land adjacent to the airport site. It decided to charge those expropriated rent of only $1 per year. I prodded the federal government to do the same and it followed suit. The original agreement made with those expropriated is to expire on December 31, 1974. The province has extended its rent-free arrangement until June, 1975, to allow those who have children in the local schools to stay until that time. I believe that the federal authority should do the same.

However, there is a problem concerning equity. If you extend the rent-free arrangment ad infinitum or until such time as these people are asked to move if the airport is to go forward, some will have been allowed to stay for four or five years and others for only a few months, because some property will be used almost immediately by the Department of Transport. To get over the difficulty which will be caused by the fact that those who stay longest will gain most, I think we ought to establish some new kind of rental rate under which we can recover taxes and the amounts spent by the department in the direct control of the property. I am speaking of maintenance, policing and that sort of thing. I think that this type of rental rate would be reasonable. In doing this, we shall show the people involved that we are genuinely concerned about the difficulties which have been unwittingly inflicted upon them.

Today I shall speak mainly on housing, a subject which concerns me greatly. We have heard a great deal about high interest rates, the availability of mortgages and about land banking as a solution to the problem of housing. I do not think our difficulties fall under those headings. I do not think it is good enough to institute programs using federal, provincial or municipal funds which allow people to buy homes costing far more than they ought to cost. If we are to reduce the price of housing, we can only do this by increasing the supply of houses.

The three components which determine the value of a home are, the cost of land, the cost of building and the cost of services. Right now, the cost of land looms very large in the cost of housing. If we are to solve the problem we must take a long, hard look at it. A few years ago land in the area I come from was worth between $4,000 and $5,000 per building lot. Today one must pay between $30,000 and $35,000, and even more, for a building lot. Mr. Speaker, the land is there, just as it always was. It is no less available. What has given rise to this enormous increase in value? First, there is a lack of supply. Why, Mr. Speaker, when there is so much land available? I will tell you why. Our provinces and municipalities have failed to approve building lots in sufficient quantities to allow all who wish to build a home the opportunity to do so. Land is being held back from the market.

Let me illustrate my point with an analogy. If 100,000 people want building lots and the province and municipality only allow 5,000 to come onto the market—and they control how many lots are put on the market—it is obvious that costs will go sky high. Exactly this has happened. We must bring more land onto the building market more quickly. If you consider the enormous amount of red tape builders face and the enormous amount of bureaucracy which is involved in house building, you will realize the magnitude of the problem. If you want to build a house on a lot, it can take you from six months to six years to get approval. That is ridiculous. That, really, is the primary problem with which we must deal, so that everyone who wants to build a home may have the opportunity of so doing.

We are so caught up in planners, the OMB and all kinds of municipal and provincial boards that it takes years to get through, if you get through it at all. I believe we must have a tri-level conference to work our way through the strangling red tape which saps the life out of the potential home-owners in this country, particularly those who want to buy new homes.

A few months ago I set up a housing committee in my constituency. It included a number of experts and people who are concerned. We looked at this problem. When we started, everyone had the ordinary kinds of solutions. However, when I put it to them that the real question is this excessive delay, the need to open up the land, they unanimously agreed that if we could get a handle on that, solve that question and open up land in sufficient quantity, the price of a house would drop dramatically.

There is another problem in terms of land supply. That is the monopolies. Around our major cities, and Toronto is no exception, the vast majority of available land is held by a small number of speculators or builders. The percentage of land in this area is very high. I have heard that the figures are as high as 70 or 80 per cent. We need some teeth in our laws to allow us to bring that kind of monopolistic situation to an end so that the people are properly served rather than those trying to gouge the public.

There is another question in this regard which is important. Last May the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) introduced a budget. In that budget he proposed doing away with the tax reductions for carrying costs on undeveloped land such as municipal taxes, carrying charges and interest rates. That sounded very good. However, what is the effect of that? Providing that kind of legislation is directed toward the speculator and not the legitimate builder, it is good. However, if it is directed toward the legitimate builder, particularly the small builder, it will drive him out of the building business. We will have less competition in the housing sector a month from today than we have now. I know that is a fact. I strongly urge the Minister of Finance to carefully review that provision before introducing the next budget. What we must do is get to the speculator who is driving up the price of land. However, let us not at the same time throw the baby out with the bath water by driving the legitimate small builder out of business.

We must change our attitude toward development. We in this country are inundated with planners. One would think that when driving down our streets, we would see the most beautifully planned and organized municipalities on God's green earth. However, you do not see much evidence of the great planning that is causing so much delay to everything everyone wants to do. Therefore, we must change our attitude to some extent. We must be less concerned with all the bureaucratic red tape. We must look at this situation as it relates to human beings who want to build a few homes at reasonable prices. That should be the paramount consideration. In terms of planning, we are hooked on the idea that everyone wants to live on serviced land. We think everyone needs sewers, piped-in water, streets, curbs and so on. However, all people want is a roof over their heads, a home of their own which they can afford.

We ought to carefully consider the possibility of opening up strip development. There are rural areas where farmers can hardly afford to farm because they do not have enough capital for all the equipment they need. There are parts of their property along ravines and so on that do not lend themselves to agricultural use. I cannot for the life of me understand why we will not allow these people to build on this non-agricultural land if it is on agricultural property. It could have a septic tank and a well. People lived under those conditions for years; I suppose for thousands of years. I do not see any reason why we can not have that kind of development in this country. It will give people a better quality of life. They can have a home at a better price. If you opened up that kind of land for development, it would drive down the price of land dramatically. It would also be of help to the farmer. We should look at this proposal as well as all the expensive services. I agree they are needed in certain areas, but not all. If we opened up this kind of land for strip development, did away with the red tape and so on, the situation would be very much improved.

With regard to rural homes that are not on serviced land, we should take another look at the National Housing Act. Moneys are not available in the same quantities, with the same rules and regulations or as easily for people who want to build with septic tanks and wells. It is easier for those who want to build in a subdivision. The National Housing Act should be adjusted or the regulations changed to allow that kind of development.

To solve these problems in terms of land use and getting through the bureaucracy and because of the urgent nature of this matter, I suggest there should be a tri-level conference. The municipal, provincial and federal governments should get together and establish as a top priority the desire to provide homes at reasonable prices. The $30,000 to $40,000 range is high enough. This could be done if we were to cut the bottom out of the price of land and reduce the price of a lot from $35,000 to $4,000 or $5,000. With the right kind of approach by the three levels of government, I believe this could be done overnight.

As a result of the housing shortage, we have an opportunity to achieve another social objective. We can concentrate on the development of new homes away from the big cities. By building them around smaller existing communities, we will take the pressure off the big cities. This would not only have the beneficial effect of redistribution of the population across this country and away from our major cities which are now too large, but also in terms of quality of life.

Many seem to think that land banking is a solution to our housing problems. I do not agree. I do not think that land banking, at least what I have heard about it, is a very positive step forward. What frightens me is that the large cities like Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver will take advantage of it. They will buy all the land around them. By the way, this land has already been bought by speculators. What are we going to do, buy it back and give them a high profit or go beyond that area and bank the land? All we will do is drive up the price of land and the concentration of people more and more into the large metropolitan areas. I think if land banking is any kind of solution, we must attach to it the rider that it is really primarily designed to enable small municipalities to find land immediately around their outskirts for housing needs, and prohibit such land being tied up by the speculator and developer.

I have talked about land costs and I could go on and on, but the second component in the price of housing is building costs. Building costs have risen, but they are not unmanageable. The point I want to address myself to at the moment is the real hidden cost which is not understood by too many people in this country. I refer to impost costs, costs levied on builders and on individuals who want to build a home in a municipality.

To give an example of these hidden taxes, if you want to build a home in the largest city in my area, then without adding the cost of servicing and roads within the site, and so on, the cost, exclusive of acquisition of land, servicing costs and carrying charges on the land, is approximately $4,000 per unit. Municipal authorities and the provinces all declare that the cost of housing is too high, yet they themselves are charging $4,000 before you can even dig a hole in the ground. And you still have to pay for services. It seems to me that that sort of cost must become much more reasonable. For every one bedroom apartment in an apartment building in that municipality you pay $1,200 in the form of impost costs, which is a direct tax, without including cost of services. In the second largest community in my area the impost cost is $2,711 per lot, and I could go on and on.

It seems to me that when you take into account the impost cost at the municipal level, regional costs in our particular area of regional government, and over and above that the amount of bureaucratic red tape you have to wade through before you can get approval, you have an awful mess when you add them all together. That is the kind of thing we have to face. It is no solution to come forward and say we should subsidize interest rates, provide more money, and do a lot of other things. What we must do is to cut down the price of a house, and one place to start is right here.

I do not think it is fair or reasonable for a municipality to put the entire tax burden for all services extraneous to the site directly on to the shoulders of a handful of people who are trying to buy a new house in that municipality.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): They do not, not the whole load.

Mr. Cafik: They put on a good part of it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Well, that is different from saying the whole load.

Mr. Cafik: I do not think it is reasonable to put the whole of this impost cost on their shoulders.

I think we have also to give consideration to package sewage plants, upstream sewage plants and so on, so as to cut down costs. We should also open up more serviced land where it is needed. In addition to that, I think we need, on an urgent basis, to conduct a great deal of research into ways of disposing of sewage by electrolysis.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may have permission to go on till one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cafik: I think if we do the right amount of research, since we were able to put people on the moon, it will be possible for us to develop better ways of treating sewage, such as treating it on the site rather than through centralized sewage disposal units. This is a far better way of treating sewage from an environmental standpoint.

We need a real sense of urgent priority on the part of all levels of government in order to grapple with the problems to which I have only briefly alluded this morning. There is no doubt there are literally of hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are now paying more than they can afford for a home. I do not know how we will solve this problem, but we as a federal government, in conjunction with the other levels of government, ought to do what we can to see that the situation is corrected rather than aggravated.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the first and following sessions of the thirtieth parliament in the hope and expectation that we as a body will be able to provide some kind of leadership to the other levels of government in Canada in order to see that we cope with the housing problem in an effective way and overcome one of the very great and burdensome social evils of our time, namely the excessive cost of a home for Canadians.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question before one o'clock?

Mr. Cafik: Certainly.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thank the hon. member. I must say at the outset that I completely agree with much of what the hon. member said, but in terms of the responsibility of the federal government is he aware that during the last session of the twenty-ninth parliament an invitation was given to the federal government by the minister of housing of Ontario to participate in housing programs then being considered, and now being implemented, by the provincial government, so that provincial and federal schemes, which in many cases were parallel, could be integrated? There has been no positive response yet from the federal government. That is my first question.

Secondly, would the hon. member not agree with me that one of the difficulties that municipalities face in terms of the impost charges about which the hon. member spoke so eloquently is the presently existing inequitable positions of revenue sharing between the provinces and the federal government? Can the hon. member tell me whether or not the federal government is proposing any new initiatives to right the inequities in the revenue sharing positions?

Mr. Cafik: Firstly in connection with the second point, the impost costs and the inequitable sharing of the tax burden, I draw to the hon. member's attention that so far as I am concerned the inequity rests primarily at the provincial level. The province of Ontario has criteria that demand a certain balancing of industrial assessment, residential assessment and so on, which falls very hard on bedroom communities. They should resolve that question firstly with the municipalities.

The first question had to do with consultation at the federal and provincial levels. Obviously, my answer has already been given in my speech; I think we need a lot of consultation about the whole broad question of housing. The hon. member talked about co-operating with some existing provincial housing schemes, but it seems to me they ought to put their own house in order in that respect and open up more land, as well as get rid of the bureaucratic red tape which is causing the problem in the first place.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hardly an answer to my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Madam Speaker, I was eager to intervene in this debate. I know that the House understands my well-founded eagerness since it goes back to July 8 last.

Before sending special greetings to my fellow-citizens of Saint-Hyacinthe and replying directly to some comments made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in this House, I would first like to congratulate you, Madam Speaker, on your appointment and assure you, as do my colleagues in the House, of my co-operation in the carrying out of your new duties.

I also congratulate the Speaker of the House and would like to tell him that he will not have an easy task during this Parliament. It is not an easy challenge to take up, mainly because the people outside of this House are restless and demand solutions to their more and more agonizing problems. There will be clashes in the House too. The opposition will have to stand firmly on its guard. It will have to show its sincerity in supporting fair measures, but it will prove responsible in fighting ruthlessly in case the government remains as inert as during the first ninety days following the election.

Madam Speaker, I hope the Speaker of the House will set to work with objectivity and fairness. I hope the day will come when we will have an independent speaker free of any political allegiance.

Madam Speaker, I mentioned a while ago how eager I was to participate in this debate and you guessed, from my broad smile, that my eagerness stemmed first of all from the results obtained in that marvelous riding of Saint-Hyacinthe in the last election. That the population should renew the mandate of its representative by suddenly metamorphosing his previous majority of 698 into 5,478 is no every day occurrence.

Those people therefore deserve that I express to them today my gratitude and appreciation, and that I assure them that I shall live up to my promises.

Those commitments, more specifically those dealing with agriculture, the golden age and the industrial development in my riding, will be respected to the letter; during this Parliament I shall intervene when need be, as often as necessary, so that the people I represent are kept informed of the work accomplished and get satisfaction.

In agriculture, especially, the government will have to launch a "green operation"; as the saying goes, the time has come to give it all we've got. When one considers the proliferation of auction sales in Quebec especially, one soon realized why the farmers are growing angrier.

Recently, 2,000 of them, in front of the Quebec Parliament, exposed their grievances. Madam Speaker, let us not wait till those people, who rightly hope the governments will solve their problems, grow so impatient that they go beyond the bounds of reasons and are led perhaps into even more difficult situations.

Answers are available to agriculture's problems. I am not among those simply decrying the government on acting negatively in this House. The eastern region should first be guaranteed feed grain supplies at a fair price. Production costs should be controlled, prices and markets stabilized. As requested by industrial milk producers, their legitimate demands should be considered and met with.

Above all, Madam Speaker, the problem of seasonal labour should be eased, the change to younger generations made easier, and producers and their families ensured of a fair return, a reasonable profit and more fitting standards of living. This in itself would be quite an achievement!

We know what the aged request, and I expect the payment, starting from October 1975, of benefits to the beneficiary's spouse between 60 and 65 years of age is but a first step toward gradual and volontary lowering of pensionable age to 60.

As for regional development, I dare hope that the intention formulated in the Speech from the Throne to extend the application of the Regional Development Incentives Act will be reflected in one of the amendments to the "Ottawa-Quebec" general law, so that the area of Rouville within my constituency, like those of Saint-Hyacinthe and Bagot, will become eligible in all fairness to the grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The "Ottawa-Quebec" agreement must also be reconsidered to meet the expectations of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean region.

As for community transportation, I trust that the rapid transit system through Saint-Hyacinthe, Saint-Hilaire, Beloeil and Montreal which the Liberals were so keen in promising during the last election campaign and even before will finally become a reality in the near future.

These are some of the economic and social questions whose merit the constituents of my riding of Saint-Hyacinthe have asked their federal representative to plead and on which I shall strongly return very soon.

Like a great many other constituencies in Quebec and throughout Canada, Madam Speaker, Saint-Hyacinthe is suffering from the present economic climate which, should it last, would lead us straight to social chaos.

In my riding as elsewhere, the people are suffering from inflation through erosion of their purchasing power. Inflation has just been recognized as a disease in this country. All of a sudden in the Speech from the Throne this government realized that it existed, and required immediate solutions. Inflation suddenly became public enemy number one. So this government must act and deal with the effects and causes of inflation, those that can in any case be controlled within Canada.

Mr. Lucien Saulnier was quite right a few weeks ago when he stated in his report as special investigator in the MUCTC conflict, and I quote:

> Non-intervention policies in the complex situation of a drifting economy can only be disastrous for the weak, the non-organized, management as well as workers and the retired—it is a stupid policy.

Unless inflation is curbed, and unless it is dealt with with lucidity and courage, the gap between the rich and the poor will only widen, and one day the delayed intervention of governments in power will only be more costly than all they may venture to do right away.

For the moment, Madam Speaker, since the question can be asked, how is the leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) felt in this area?

I will come back in a few moments to that famous leadership that was indeed proclaimed from all housetops during the election campaign, and even on the station platforms waiting for the arrival of that train that used to boast about its substantiality and that is now filled with emptiness.

I hear the Minister of Environment (Mrs. Sauvé), who laughs at those things, who laughs when the inaction of this government is raised and who during the election campaign was running around not her own riding of Ahuntsic or the riding of Outremont where she lives, but the riding of Saint-Hyacinthe talking to farmers about farming problems and explaining that she had a farm in Saint-Charles in Saint-Hyacinthe, that she was affected by the fact that her alfalfa was completely burnt and realized all of a sudden that she rented her farm and that other people were farming it. She was concerned about this, but today it amuses her, as we talk about inflation.

I wish she would go back today to Saint-Hyacinthe and tell people there where we are with inflation. Perhaps she would go back with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) who was chief organizer in Saint-Hyacinthe, the big sponsor of the whole campaign. He talked to farmers and today, in order to get over their defeat, the Minister of Environment and the Minister of National Health and Welfare would perhaps want to go back and drink powdered milk and say so to the farmers, unless they want to follow the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who advocated putting vitamins in beer or promoting wine production. It makes quite a lot of projects.

This government we now have—I say that with reluctance, because I am sure it is not a government—these people in front of us, went to the people in July and indicated that the problem was inflation and the issue was leadership. Clearly, many Canadians endorsed that view. While it is fair to say that over 50 per cent did not, this government now has an opportunity to justify its mandate with the leadership it has promised.

I was touched by the rather naive reference in the Speech from the Throne to the lack of social unrest in Canada. I know all members of this House would join me in hoping that the facts justify that statement. I am sorry to see the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) leaving the chamber, because I have a few words to say which might interest her greatly. I see she is now coming back.

I am glad the House is consulting the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to find out whether it is true that powdered milk should be used to combat inflation. When the type of violence that surrounds the United Aircraft dispute in Quebec, the disruption of services brought about by the grain handlers' strike, the metro strike in Montreal and the transportation strike in Toronto can occur in a period of only a few months, it is only those who refuse to see the world as it is who can believe everything is well in Canada, that there is not the beginning of social unrest and that we can continue in the same way.

I remember when inflation was not as it is today, when railwaymen broke through the doors of parliament and postal workers walked for months on Parliament Hill. I remember when this House has been brought back to settle disputes which normal arbitration could not settle. Canadians have a right to know whether we have a government and parliament that is now prepared to face the continuing demands which must emerge when a free economy is saddled with an effective rate of inflation which attacks everybody's earnings, everybody's savings and everybody's future.

We must ask ourselves if this is the time for government and parliament to say only that things could be worse. We on all sides of the House have a responsibility to all the people of this country to say that things need not get any worse, and that we are prepared to take the measures necessary to ensure that they do not. It is the gap between those who have and those who have not that poses the greatest threat to the stability of our society. This government faces real, concrete challenges to the economic and social stability of this country.

If, as I mentioned earlier, inflation has become the major concern of this session, if leadership has become the main subject of discussion, as it was during the election campaign and during the past two years of minority government, this problem which most concerns us is not the only one. There are other problems for which the leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister is lacking.

I would now like to deal one by one with the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister who, in his wisdom, his omniscience, decided not to talk about inflation in his first speech. I notice that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Corriveau) is applauding because the right hon. Prime Minister did not talk about inflation in his first speech in this House. However, the farmers will think about it.

Very suavely and with obvious intelligence, astuteness and brilliance, the right hon. Prime Minister mentioned problems which could be used as a diversion, which could be used as a cotton pad drenched in chloroform to be applied on Parliament and the Canadian people. He thought he could put the members of Parliament and the country to sleep by not mentioning the number 1 problem and by talking instead about related problems which are also important, but which certainly do not have the priority that the problem of inflation should have.

Madam Speaker, the question of parliamentary reform was mentioned by the right honourable Prime Minister. What did he say about this? On October 2, he said, as is reported in Hansard:

—this institution must express the collective will effectively and completely.

And what is the right honourable Prime Minister suggesting to achieve this? Does he really attack the problem in depth or does he deal only with procedural issues, with the superficial? We heard him say that it would be a good idea for the opposition to give him questions in advance so that he may have the time to prepare his answers. In a way, this would make some sense. We would not get the silly and frivolous answers we are getting every day. But he says questions should be made in advance. Perhaps we should broadcast the debates in this House over television and radio.

Maybe the opposition members should limit themselves to two of three speeches, whereas they are the people's spokesmen in important debates. We should proceed quickly, as if speed meant efficiency. We should always be filled with wonder at what is going on in Westminster. And there is the Prime Minister, back in Westminster where he applauds all debates in the House. And half an hour later, we shall hear him coming back from Westminster from where he wants to repatriate the Canadian constitution. To me, those are inconsistencies in the mind of the Prime Minister.

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I hear them; they are as impressive here today as they were when they were travelling in Saint-Hyacinthe this summer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: Instead of encouraging superficial "procedurizing", the Prime Minister should have told the parliamentarians: first, let us proceed to give a completely new value to Canadian parliamentarianism. Second, let us do away with these abusive privileges of the executive which consist in hiding from the parliamentarians and the population certain things which should normally be known to all, as we have recently seen in the Supreme Court of Canada. Third, for example, he could have addressed himself to the problems facing the government which hides behind the pretext of state security whenever it does not want to disclose relevant facts to the federal administration. Fourth, the estimates could be considered spenly instead of being subject to the guillotine as is now the case. That would be a real reform in depth. Fifth, Parliament could be allowed to take part in decision-making affecting the national interest.

I am thinking, for example, of the debate on the Vietnam war; if, instead of being faced with of a unilateral decision, Parliament had been taken into the government's confidence, and if during out, we could openly discuss in this House the external relations of our country, the strategy that the government intends take, if the government could take the House in its confidence always evading the issue, then it could be said to be a parliamentary reform in depth which would go much further than simply requiring that members give notice of their questions or that our proceedings be televised.

There is another question on which the Prime Minister was evasive in an attempt to draw a red herring. He talked about repatriating the constitution. In his speech of October 3 that could be called his constitution repatriation speech, the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 46 of Hansard:

But I think it will be fairly easy to convince—

Oh, what paternalism! How things change when you have a majority!

the people in Quebec—

Now he is talking to the people in Quebec! He is going over the head of the Quebec premier, of the Quebec government. He is addressing himself directly to the citizens of Quebec. In a way, I can understand that he should bypass the premier of Quebec, but there are formalities one cannot do away with.

He goes on to say that:

—they no longer need to seek the help of Great Britain, that they no longer need to hide behind Great Britain's skirts when we discuss among ourselves political issues affecting us all.

• (1430)

It is our duty, Mr. Speaker, to be outspoken and let people know about Quebeckers' deep feeling in this matter. There is much more here than an amendment formula. We must get to the bottom of the matter and not delude ourselves. People should know that Quebec, the home of French Canadians, has always believed for the last 20 years or so that the insertion in the constitution of an amendment formula could make Quebec's political evolution totally dependent upon the will of a few provinces, and that before any agreement as to an acceptable sharing of powers between Ottawa and Quebec. Always fearful of a possible constitutional iron collar, Quebec up to now, thought it was more realistic to demand an agreement on redistribution of jurisdictions, so as to know first the content of Canada's new constitution, even if it meant having to study afterwards an amendment formula, but we should not proceed in the opposite way.

If Mr. Bourassa did not make it as clear in Victoria in June 1970, he nevertheless, like all his predecessors, colleagues and advisers, had in mind the support and continuation of that stand of Quebec on that matter. And, as a deeper analysis reveals, the matter is not and does not look as simple as the Prime Minister gave it to understand last October 2nd.

Acting as the leader of this House and of the government means that the Prime Minister must be daring and courageous, and may I say honest enough to speak up his mind thoroughly, to present this House with every aspect of the problem, to dare and deal with every serious hypothesis. That means raising again every constitutional matter, which the provinces as a whole, and especially Quebec, are not in a position to indulge in on many accounts. The head of the government should give federal-provincial relations a better image than is conveyed by the kind of relationship now prevailing between the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier), for instance, and his Quebec counterpart or the long delay in dealing with pertinent problems in the west of the country on matters of transportation and establishment of secondary industries. By the way, the estrangement of the western part of this country by the present federal government is a most serious matter which has to be thoroughly gone into.

National unity, Madam Speaker, implies setting priorities, and can only be built by answering daily problems; "structurizing" will follow, and "procedurizing" will come next. As for bilingualism, one is left wondering when the Prime Minister is speaking the truth. We do not know anymore. When is his policy on bilingualism a true one? Is it when he or his representatives set forth attenuating principles as they did during the first session of the last Parliament, or else today when it has a majority? Would he have lucidly and rationally reduced the rate of application of the "operation bilingualism" in the civil service following arguments but by insiders or else by Members of Parliament on both sides of this House, or did he resign himself to accepting the challenge, for electoral purposes, knowing full well that during an election campaign he could review his position? Is that what you call leadership, Madam Speaker?

I, for one, had accepted the nine points announced as attenuating principles in a spirit of justice towards the English-speaking people already working in the federal civil service, and also to avoid, in undue haste, questioning the ultimate objective of "operation bilingualism" in the federal civil service. I feel particularly at ease especially since I am a member of a party that has supported in the past and still supports the official languages policy, since I am serving under the authority of a leader whose tremendous efforts are not sufficiently recognized, the efforts he has made to familiarize himself with the French language and the Quebecois fact. I am all the more at ease because I sit with remarkable men, like the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) whose merits are not sufficiently recognized in Quebec, whose contribution to this country where the two founding groups of the Canadian community—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time allowed him has now expired. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has the floor.

Mr. Wagner: As my hon. colleagues suggest, perhaps I could be allowed to finish my remarks: I have very little else to add.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Do all hon. members agree that the hon. member should be allowed to finish his remarks?

An hon. Member: Two minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Wagner: I thank you, Madam Speaker, and I thank my colleagues on both sides of the House.

Having touched upon some of the points on which the Prime Minister dwelled, here is how it seems to me we should deal in depth with today's problems.

Bilingualism should not become a question of partisan politics. It seems that, in the province of Quebec especially, the minorities are dealt with equitably and that we are justified in expecting as much in the other provinces. That is all very well, and particularly on the occasion of the adoption of the renowned Bill 22, it was timely to recall that, during the last electoral campaign, in some regards the Prime Minister seemed to be of two minds.

When he was chosen candidate in the riding of Mount Royal, I remember that he said, and I quote:

[English]

I trust—I trust the Bourassa government—because they are liberals, they will do the right thing. You can trust us to talk to them to make sure they're doing the right thing.

Those are words at which I applauded wholeheartedly. Now the campaign is over; it changes men surprisingly. Today the Prime Minister says: Concerning Bill-22, if any citizen wishes to bring it before a court, he is welcome to try, but we shall not intervene.

Madam Speaker, I should like to make a last point. I think that the whole issue of leadership that was obviously the stake of the campaign leads me to the following conclusion. A few years ago, I had the opportunity, at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, to hear the Prime Minister ending his peroration with those memorable words: Finies les folies! And let us look at the behaviour of this government since the last election, during the last 90 days. When listening to the Prime Minister's speech, a speech that shows he is more preoccupied with the form than the substance, I wonder when this foolishness will end. For instance, when shall we see the end of those unfruitful fights between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who says to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) that he does not know what he is talking about when the latter says to Mrs. Plumptre: Well done! even though 28 million of eggs are rotten. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) talks about powder milk, when it is not about beer advertisements. When will the folly end? The Prime Minister himself says to everyone: That is solidarity, that is democracy! And the people of Canada wonder where is the actual leadership. When will we finish playing games?

We could continue like that endlessly. I have already exceeded the time I was given. I would have a few more things to say. I hope I shall have other opportunities to do so. However, I am eager to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wish he would tell us about his policies as well as his campaign in Saint-Hyacinthe because we shall hear it with great pleasure.

Madam Speaker, I thank you for your patience and I hope that during the coming weeks the government of this country will actually try to govern our country.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been some discussions about cutting to 20 minutes the length of speeches for the remainder of this debate. I do not wish to impose that limitation upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), and of course it would not happen unless he agreed to it, but I wonder if at some point it would be possible for us to agree to limit speeches to 20 minutes for the balance of this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The Chair has not been advised of such agreement. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has the floor.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, after the Minister of National Health and Welfare has spoken we would be agreeable to the proposal just made, in order that many more backbenchers could make contributions to this fine debate.

Mr. Horner: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I would not be so selfish as to say that when I have finished my speech, subsequent speakers should be limited to 20 minutes. However, I think the House rules are pretty clear on this point. In the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, speeches are of 30 minutes duration, and I think we should proceed in that way.

Mr. Basford: Who is the House leader over there?

[Mr. Wagner.]

Mr. Baldwin: We do not believe in mob rule.

● (1440)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to associate myself with all the previous speakers who have expressed their wishes to the Governor General during this debate. I would like to join in wishing a quick recovery to His Excellency. I am sure that all the members of this House hope that he will be able to resume his functions very soon and continue the excellent work that he had undertaken after his appointment a few months ago.

I would also like to join all the others who have congratulated the new Speaker of the House. I would like to assure him of my loyalty and wish him every success in his new duties. Finally, I would like to congratulate the movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I have heard and read their speeches and I must say that they certainly are to the credit of this House and of the government party.

Madam Speaker, I do not intend to take too much time in setting foot on the slippery ground of low-caliber partisanship on which the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) has tried to keep the debate this afternoon. The voters of Saint-Hyacinthe gave their verdict on July 8 and, as we are good democrats, we must respect this judgment. All those who worked for my party, on that occasion, have at least the knowledge that they fought an honest fight in this constituency. On another occasion, I am sure that they will want to fight the same way again.

I would like to take perhaps a minute to comment briefly on the speech made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). Almost throughout his speech I could see once again the reflection of the Progressive Conservative party in the sense that like his party he is alway late by a couple of months, if not a couple of years. I listened to his speech and I told myself, the hon. member must think he is back on the hustings in Saint-Hyacinthe. But July 8 is passed, there was an election, and we know the results. Or still I could close my eyes telling myself, my God, I must have heard that kind of sermon when I was young. Then I remembered that it was exactly the same tone of voice as used by the bishops in Quebec some 25 or 30 years ago when they were talking to their people. The only difference is that the bishops have changed since.

Unfortunately, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe following faithfully the Conservative tradition is still 25 or 30 years behind in that respect when he said that leadership was the problem during the summer election. The question was indeed solved by Canadians in a clear and firm manner on July 8 last. The hon. member raises again that question of leadership, as his leader did for that matter in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne when he introduced the famous amendment that we know. I understand that the hon. member would want to talk about leadership, and that troubles him. In that area he may be considered an expert and with the problems facing his party I understand very well the aspirations that may torment him once again. I hope that this time he will have enough foresight not to know the same fate he traditionally met every time he was approached for any leadership position.

This having been said, I will turn to what I would like to say in this debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I will have an opportunity to talk about the steps my department intends to take in the area of health and social security reform on different occasions during this session since we will have an opportunity to debate certain bills which were already introduced for first reading. But I wanted to take this opportunity to participate in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne to point out some of my concerns as well as some of the projects I am considering in my new capacity as minister responsible for the status of women.

As you know this government is strongly committed to the principle of equal opportunity and freedom of choice for all Canadians. At the same time we recognize that the current status of women in Canada does not always lend itself to this principle.

I am honoured to be given the responsibility of guiding government policy in this area and I intend to give a great deal of time and effort to bringing about the necessary changes in our laws and in society so that women and men will both be able to participate fully in all activities of life.

As stated in the throne speech, the government is committed to introducing wide-ranging legislation to bring about equality for women before the law. We are also planning a number of initiatives for International Women's Year in 1975.

During the last session of Parliament, my predecessor as minister responsible for the status of women, outlined the steps we were planning to take at that time. Unfortunately, we were not able to complete our program before that session came to a sudden end. Those measures which we had begun, namely, the amendment of the Canada Pension Plan to provide equal treatment of men and women and the correction of discriminatory provisions in a number of other acts through the omnibus bill on the status of women, have already been re-introduced. It is my hope that these two bills will be speedily passed.

In addition, a new Citizenship Act has been introduced. This bill, among other things will enable children to derive Canadian citizenship from either their mother or father. Under the present law, Madam Speaker, children in most cases take their citizenship from their father only. Other changes providing for equal treatment of men and women will also be made.

Of great importance in our attempts to bring about an end to discrimination will be the establishment of a human rights commission. My colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) will be introducing a bill to this effect before the end of this year. The legislation will set out the principles and procedures under which the commission will operate and will provide the necessary powers of enforcement. I am also pleased to announce that the government intends to recognize on this commission a large representation drawn from women.

The Minister of Justice will also be introducing amendments to the criminal code regarding trials for rape and other sexual offenses. We are all aware that the present law needs changing and updating to provide more protection for the innocent victim of rape. The amendments planned by my colleague would ensure that the details of an alleged sex crime and the name of the victim would not be used in the public press; encourage the greater use of the change of venue or location of the trail. In addition, they would also encourage exclusion of the public from the preliminary inquiry and the trial or portions thereof, and prevent, except in certain limited circumstances, the defense from attacking the moral integrity of the victim.

I should like to take this opportunity to bring you up to date on two other items that were mentioned in the previous Speech from the Throne. As these did not require legislative action, the government was able to carry out its intentions as outlined at that time. Specifically, the various regulations setting out the terms and conditions of employment in the public service have now been amended so that all discriminatory provisions have been removed. Moreover, I am pleased also to announce that a cabinet directive was sent by the Prime Minister to all Crown corporations last May requesting them to undertake positive action to encourage the assignment and advancement of more women into responsible positions and to inform the minister responsible for the status of women of their progress in this respect. We have already received replies from many of the corporations and they indicate a very favourable response. In this respect, it was learned last week that a task force on the status of women which has been set up by the management of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would table a preliminary report as early as October 18. It is my intention to get in touch shortly with other Crown corporations to assess what progress has been made as a result of the Prime Minister's letter of last spring.

Another item I should like to refer to is the question of coverage under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans for spouses who are not in the labour force. This matter is presently being studied by the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Board and the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I hope to have their reports this fall and will then want to discuss their proposals with my colleagues, the provincial ministers of welfare. I am sure the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs will also be interested in studying these reports. I can assure the house that it is a problem which has my close attention and I am working hard to find a solution that is acceptable to all.

I am also very concerned about the provision of child care services. As Minister of National Health and Welfare, even before I assumed the added responsibility of directing the thrust of government policy concerning the status of women, I was very pleased to announce that as a result of amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan Regulations in 1972, the full operating costs of day care services became shareable, including costs of equipment and supplies, and rent or depreciation on capital.

For all other welfare services, shareable costs are restricted to salaries and related staff costs. Thus, we participate further in the provision of day care than we do for any other social service that we cost-share with the provinces. We have also approved policy guidelines for these services which are designed to ensure that federal sharing is available to low and below average income families who need day care services. These guidelines provide for the establishment of income tested programs in line with the recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Most of what I have referred to so far involves the intervention of the legislator. However, I am very much aware that in order to bring true equality of opportunity for women we need a wide-spread re-thinking of the roles of men and women in our society. I do not think that many people would still want to deny women the opportunity to work as well as men, in whatever field they wish. We all know of women who have made outstanding contributions as businesswomen, doctors, lawyers, Members of Parliament and many others. This afternoon, a woman presides over our debates.

We have also read of those who are working as loggers, truckdrivers and in other areas traditionally assumed to be only for men. Recently we have seen a certain number of women join the ranks of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the first time. We congratulate these women, especially since we are aware of the difficulties they have probably had to undergo.

I would like to say here how happy I am to be a member of a party which has succeeded in electing eight female members of parliament in the recent elections. The government party by itself now has three women more than the whole House had in the last Parliament. Knowing the contribution which women have made to previous Parliaments. I have no doubt that the influence on our deliberations of the female members of this House will greatly exceed the influence which their numbers alone would command. And this is a good thing.

I know that other parties also presented female candidates. But it is not enough simply to present female candidates: it is also essential to get them elected. I can say that our party has made a conscious effort not only to recruit female candidates, but also to encourage them to run in constituencies where they have a reasonable chance of winning.

The ever increasing part women are playing in all our political parties is a most encouraging development, and our society should welcome healthy competition among all parties to see who will be the first to give Canadian women their full place. I, for one, am glad to see the Liberal party with a good head start over its rivals, and I know that the members of our party are resolved not only to maintain this lead but to increase it in the coming years. For both at the legislative level, and at the level of social behaviour in general, our society still has a long way to go in recognizing the equality of the sexes in fact as in law.

If there are any who still have any doubts in this regard, I suggest that they take a look at certain earnings statistics published by Statistics Canada. Is it part of the concept of human nature or an inevitable consequence of biology that the average earnings of Canadian women participating full-time in the work force should be about half that of male workers? We can surely imagine a better organized society in which this gap would not be so great.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

Our society in general, continues to assign certain roles to men and certain others to women. For example, from watching T.V., one could get the impression all women were pretty, young housewives who cared only about their waxed floors and sweet-smelling laundry. As long as we continue to assume that the rearing of children and the caring for the home is the only interest of women and their responsibility above and that men do not have to be concerned, we will be denying them complete freedom of choice. It has been said that the reason men are able to succeed in their chosen field is that they have a wife to support and care for them so that they can have time to devote themselves to their work.

But, Madam Speaker, women don't have wives. If they want to succeed in areas outside the home, they usually must take on a double burden.

This stereotyping of sex roles has also deprived men of freedom of choice. The expectation placed on them to succeed in the workplace at any cost, including long hours, has made it difficult for them to participate fully in family life. Our objective must be flexibility and accommodation so that all individuals, both men and women, can assume the role or roles best suited to their personality, regardless of sex. In achieving greater equality for women, we will also be freeing men to share the joys and responsibilities of parenthood.

It is with this in mind that we are planning for International Women's Year in 1975. We recognize that our objectives will not be achieved overnight. The process of changing attitudes is a gradual one and our efforts will continue as long as they are needed. However, we welcome International Women's Year as a time to give special emphasis to the problem.

The government's program has already been outlined in general. It includes an information and educational campaign to bring the issues before the public. There will be both general and specialized regional and national seminars, training sessions and conferences involving people from all walks of life, especially those who have not yet had the opportunity to consider the implications of change.

There will also be special exhibitions and cultural activities, publications and films. An increased amount of funds will be avilable for non-government organizations to undertake a wide variety of activities to mark the year. Legislation will be reviewed with a view to removing any remaining discriminatory provisions. Special efforts will be made to increase the number of women appointed to senior positions and to international meetings and conferences.

We have recently hosted a most successful U.N. Seminar on Machinery to Promote the Integration of Women in Development as part of our contribution on the international level.

The Government has earmarked additional funds in the amount of $5 million for International Women's Year. This amount is over and above funds allocated from within ongoing programs of many departments and agencies.

Given the present economic situation and the restraints upon additional government spending, this allocation of funds is an indication of the importance we attach to the activities we have planned for International Women's Year. We have also established a special secretariat in the Privy Council Office to administer some of the special activities. These activities are being planned and implemented in co-operation with the provinces and with members of non-government organizations to ensure that we reach everyone across the country.

Last spring, the Prime Minister wrote to his provincial colleagues asking them to designate someone in their governments as a point of contact. Already two federal-provincial meetings of officials have been held to discuss plans as well as bilateral meetings with a number of the provinces. In addition to taking part in some of our programs, it is my hope that the provincial and municipal authorities will do their share in reviewing legislation and rethinking attitudes in their respective areas of jurisdiction so that discrimination will be attacked at all levels and in all fields. As Minister Responsible for the Status of Women, I will endeavor to convince my provincial colleagues to encourage their respective provinces to participate most energetically in International Women's Year.

However, to make this year a true success, we need the participation of all Canadians. I hope that, as in Canada's Centennial Year, everyone will undertake a project of their own to promote the integration of women in the life of the country. I see the year as a time for all of us, men and women, to assess our attitudes and, where necessary, change them so that in fact, and not in principle, Canada is indeed a country of equal opportunity for all.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should first like to congratulate you upon appointment to your high office. I know that your respect for debate and your sense of fair play will stand you in good stead as you preside over this House. I might say that I believe the same is true of the Speaker himself; his respect for parliament and for fair play will stand him in good stead in the years ahead.

One can read the Speech from the Throne very closely but will see very little to solve the problems that Canada will face in the remaining years of the seventies, or even in the remaining years of this parliament. There is nothing in it to deal with inflation; there is no real indication of any concern for the difficulties faced by the various regions of Canada. It is suggested that by increasing the food supply we can somehow lower food prices, and I shall be dealing with that in a moment.

There is one sure way to cure inflation, and that is to work a little harder, be a little more productive, save a little more, and for all governments to spend a little less. There is no suggestion in the Speech from the Throne that the government is going to encourage Canadians to work a little harder, allow Canadians to be a little more productive, or that the government is going to curtail its spending one bit. The government says it is going to encourage greater food production and thereby lower food prices. An industry very close to my heart has a surplus of beef today, yet the farmer received approximately $120 a head less for a butchered steer than he received a year ago. The cost of meat on the counter is about the same. Where did this $120 go, Madam Speaker? Inflation gobbled it up. The packer took $30 and retailing and distribution costs accounted for $80 or $90. Yet although there is a surplus of meat, the price remains the same for the consumer because the government has allowed inflation to run wild.

There has been a great deal of talk in the recent past about eggs. Some people say their price is high, others say it is low. A couple of years ago we had a bill in the House known as the farm marketing bill, which set up CEMA. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) went on the radio in Ottawa and said that one man held up that bill for two years. Some consumers might be pretty annoyed that that man did not hold it up forever. I said that it would not work then, and I say it will not work now.

Why do I say that? I am not against marketing boards, but I do not believe that supply management will work in Canada. I said at the time that it might work in a small country such as Switzerland or Denmark; but who is so all-seeing and all-powerful on earth as to determine what should be produced where, and where the product should be marketed? I am not surprised that man should decide he has the wisdom to ship eggs from Newfoundland to British Columbia and somehow or other satisfy the customer. I am sure that if the matter had been left in the hands of the Lord, there would have been fresh eggs in B.C. at a cheaper price than letting man tinker with them. Why did it take the government two years to come to its senses and to realize this? I think the beef and hog producers are thankful that the bill does not apply to them, because man could have tinkered in their markets and made those markets even worse than they are today.

So far as government spending and a hard line on finance are concerned, thhe money supply has not been increasing in Canada during the last three months. But this, coupled with a wild extravaganza of spending, only creates greater hardship on the individual and the country—and it does not really matter which country it is. The individual has to pay higher interest rates because there is less money available, and the government is grabbing a great percentage of the amount that is available. That is what the government has been doing in the last three months—curtailing the money supply but not curtailing spending.

If the government did take a hard financial line it would improve the bond market, and anybody who has any knowledge of that market knows how bad it is. Perhaps such an attitude would improve the stock market, and anybody with stock other than the four-legged kind knows how bad it is. Perhaps this would improve the short-term interest investment field, allowing millions of Canadians to retain a little more money and thereby increasing the productivity of this nation. This is the only real long-run cure we have for inflation.

There was also mention of a transportation policy in the Speech from the Throne. Apparently the government has come around to thinking there should be greater competition between various modes of transportation. It is nice that it has come to its senses in this regard, but let us remember what happened in January of 1967. From January 9 to January 29, 1967, we heard speech after speech about transportation. At that time I suggested the National Transportation Act would not serve those regions of Canada where there is no competition between various modes of transportation. I repeated this fact over and over, but the government of the day plowed blindly ahead, saying that competition was sufficient. At that time I said the National Transportation Act would throw the prairies and the maritimes to the wolves—and history has borne that out. I will certainly be watching to see what action results from the reference to transportation policy in the Speech from the Throne.

I am more concerned about where Canada is going from this point on. In the late 1970s and through the 1980s Canada will be entering a period of unusual potential: we will have a highly mobile and well educated group of young people with a tremendous potential for production. Hopefully, we will not have significantly eroded our natural resources, perhaps mainly because of their abundance. Hopefully, we will have our population growth under relative control, at least to a greater degree than many countries throughout the world. I am sure we will see a keen worldwide demand for our foodstuffs as well as our raw and processed materials.

Perhaps the best thing of all will be our ability to attract capital through bond and debenture borrowings, based on our natural advantages, particularly if we manage to maintain a firm Canadian dollar. I think we can become more capital-intensive and prosperous without losing our equity ownership. I am sure we will be able to borrow on debt financing, but certainly we will not have to borrow for equity ownership if we provide an incentive for Canadians to earn more and to save more. We must ensure that ability to earn without allowing this government to take back all the earnings.

Let us take a real look at the situation in this country compared with countries around us. Many countries possess enormous natural resources and natural assets, but many of those countries have poor standards of living, far below the dignity level of most human beings. Why is it that Canada, with its natural resources, should and can enjoy a quality of life comparable to none? I suggest the answer to that question lies in the fact that our greatest resource is our people, their attitudes, morals, courage and ability. They have done much to appreciate and develop their skills. If we carry on as we have in the past, we will be discouraging these people. They will become reluctant to develop their skills and talents and will be more prepared to sit on their fannies and wait for the government to provide for them.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: An hon. member take exception to that. I suggest he consider that Germany was burned out during the Second World War and rose afterwards to become a wealthy trader and financial house. I suggest it did so because of the desire of its people to improve themselves.

We in this country have listened to people who say we can redistribute our skills and talents in one way or another in order that everyone may attain some kind of equality. I suggest it is pretty difficult to redistribute skills, natural aptitude, talent, tenacity, courage and moral strength. There are two basic directions we can take to tackle our mounting problems; one is socialistic, with state participation in all sectors, and the other is through a free market economy with over-all state control. Canada's greatest danger at the present time is that we are attempting to correct the situation which we recognize in this country through the socialistic route, that is, with direct intrusion into economic decision-making by all levels of government. This route is fraught with danger and is doomed to failure.

The fatal problem with this route is that the privilege is simply taken from the classes who have it now and is given to those who would like to have it. My friends to the left say they do not swallow this argument. They should consider for a moment the continual federal government interference in every economic decision in the past eight years. I refer to the egg marketing fiasco as a perfect example, but one could find similar examples in respect of oil, manufacturing, farm produce marketing and a host of other industries.

The basic problem does not change. All we see is a shift taking place. Communism, the inevitable result of state interference, is an archaic form of economy for an advanced nation, and it will provide benefits only for the immature and primitive society. If Canada is sincere about owning its own means of production, I suggest this is a simple thing to accomplish. To do so we will have to forgo some of today's benefits, making more effort to assemble capital. Since the government is the largest consumer of capital, this also means we will have to examine government expenditures with a great deal of care. Do we prefer to spend a great deal of money on those things in which the government is involved, or do we prefer to use the money to increase equity ownership? We cannot have the government doing everything for everybody and still have a country which allows John Q. Citizen to retain more money with which to purchase a portion of the factory or industry in which he is working.

We must ask ourselves whether it is wise to leave earned capital with those who have the ability and the skill to employ it and who wish to expand or transfer those funds for political purposes into areas of Canada where there is no possibility of development taking place. I listened to the speech which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has just completed, but heard not one word about developing Canada. He did not refer to the need for creating greater productivity in Canada. His was a good speech and he said some things that needed to be said, but he simply repeated what has been said by every government member who has spoken during this debate on the throne speech.

We cannot allow this great country to take the direct and negative route of controls. We must take the route of saving capital and streaming those savings into equity. Since in a rapidly changing society commodities have an average life span of less than ten years, if we move now we can become the owners of most of the equity within Canada.

Let us consider the situation in Japan, country with a very small land mass. It has very industrious people, with one of the fastest growing economies in the world. Japan has attained this position under what might be considered hopeless conditions compared with what we enjoy in this country. I suggest the basic secret is simple and obvious. The secret has a direct relationship to the attitude of the people. To some degree we have witnessed the erosion, by one government or another, of the attitude of the Canadian people compared with what it used to be, that is, a true blue Canadian attitude. One might refer to it as the working philosophy. It has been called many things. We must put greater emphasis on people. We must exhibit a keen desire to allow people to manage themselves. We must allow them to make a few dollars and determine how they should be spent.

I have often in the past thought that we have spent too much money in an effort to provide a higher quality of life to everybody, without encouraging people to make a contribution toward Canada. The federal government should show leadership in a positive direction by setting goals for the ten provinces, instead of being involved in judicial brawls concerning who should hand out most of the money to the taxpayer. One could cite, over the years, examples of government interference with the provinces. In one instance a court case is in progress: the Saskatchewan government is involved in a court case with the federal government. One need not mention the situation in respect of Alberta. Newfoundland is becoming involved at the present time. Instead of Ottawa being the referee, in far too many cases it has become the participant, competing with the province when the province is attempting to share in whatever prosperity there might be.

When Canada has needed a powerful central government to settle a dispute, the government has had to compromise its position because it is involved in the dispute. Decision-making in our country should be brought down to the lowest level. State socialism has a tendency toward the opposite. Private enterprise follows the proper course. We must begin to recognize some of these things. My friends to the left never agree that John Q. Public can make the right decision: they want to make it for him. Invariably, it takes three or four minds to carry out what John Doe could have done himself, and much more efficiently. Until a better control system is formed, the open marketplace, although it may have many difficulties and cause much concern, is still the best system and should be more adequately supported in Canada.

We might consider CEMA and the egg situation for a moment. Surely one can realize the difficulty. One might ask, how many eggs are 20 million? I do not look upon that as a great number, but I do consider it to be a great loss in human time when we consider that eggs can be shipped from Newfoundland to British Columbia at a cost of 19 cents. We may think we can interfere everywhere. We might be better off to study Hardin's law, which is simply that if the government makes one interference, it must make two or three more in order to catch up to the first one, and then it becomes a perpetual thing.

We have heard a great deal of discussion in the past few years about foreign investment. I think the amount of foreign investment which has taken place in Canada is alarming. From 1966 to 1969, the net capital inflow from the United States to Canada was $2.5 billion. The net capital outflow to the United States in interest and dividends from Canada during that period was $3.6 billion. We had a minus situation of $1.1 billion. I am alarmed at that. Seventy-six per cent of all companies in Canada with assets of over $25 million are foreign-owned. We should start doing something about this situation. Very little was said about it in the speech from the throne. I am concerned about the route we should take. The only practical and positive route would require patience and courage.

Intelligence and firm leadership is required, rather than immediate haste on the part of governments, which forces people out of foreign investment and also encourages Canadians to leave. This only brings about a greater degree of loss to Canada than is necessary. As I said earlier, any new product has a life span of something like ten years. Slowly and surely we should give Canadians a clear indication that they can invest, and they should be encouraged to invest, in Canada.

In order for Canada to control a larger portion of its destiny, we should not be afraid of multinational corporations. We should make certain many of these multinational corporations are owned by Canadians, particularly those who do business within Canada. In order to do this we must have low-cost capital. We have not had this in Canada because in many cases we have driven it out. This capital must be available at a competitive price, for a long term. It is more important to have equity capital than debt capital, since if we manage ourselves properly we can always borrow money.

I believe it is extremely important that Canada should have such equity capital. We are now concerned about the oil industry and that we may be net importers of oil by 1983 because government in the past two years has successfully driven out a huge portion, well over 50 per cent, of the skills involved in the oil industry. It would probably take another four years to entice them back to Canada to go to work and carry on exploration for oil.

Because of the nature of the society in which we live, Canada always has had a good supply of professional skills in the field of applied research and applied science. If we do not create the right climate for these people in Canada, they will leave. We also have had some difficulty with our Canadian banks. The Gray report pointed out clearly that Canadian banks have been more prepared in the past to lend to foreign concerns than to Canadians. They do not seem to trust the people who have special skills in applied research, and so on. We do not seem too think they are as great as people from another country.

The fundamental requirement for attracting capital and people, and trusting the judgment and skills of these people, is to create the proper environment in which the capital and knowledge can be put to work. Environment, in this case, can be defined as the position our government takes toward business and the marketplace system. The government should state its position as clearly as possible and deviate as little as possible over the longest possible term.

It is becoming increasingly important for the federal government to state its priorities, one of which should include an industrial policy. A clear enunciation of priorities should be given the Canadian citizen so that he may determine where is the best place to concentrate his effort or whether he should bother making any effort at all. One might consider what has happened in Canada in the past few years. We had a white paper on taxation which caused havoc in this country. We had the farm marketing bill which caused havoc in respect of the marketing of agricultural products. Then we had the involvement of the government, in one form or another, in manufacturing. Now we have the government's hand in the oil industry and we are told that by 1983 we may be a net importer of oil, while we have an abundance of oil resources.

What should an industrial policy include? Any policy being considered by Canada should be, in the future, only a Canadian policy if it is to be truly beneficial to the country as a whole. Why should we devise an industrial policy any other way? Regional policies will increasingly have a divisive effect in Canada. Every one of us in this House can think of policies which have been devised in the past which have been regional in concept. An industrial policy should be truly Canadian. We had an industrial policy which applied to regions all across Canada, within certain boundary lines. Some provinces were included, some not at all. This tends to divide.

Bargaining away any of the resources produced in one part of Canada to confer a benefit on another part of Canada is a dangerous act and leads to obvious divisions in the country. All parts of Canada are sufficiently sophisticated to understand the results of this type of action and should recoil against such political manoeuvring. As I was saying, this is a most dangerous route. Primary industry, resource industry and manufacturing industry which have an advantage in world markets should be encouraged to reach their highest economic level and bring maximum value to Canada as a whole.

Another recent alarming trend which I have observed is the sudden building up of tariff barriers. An industrial policy must state clearly our recognition of the fact that the world has been moving toward a system of lower tariffs and lower barriers. Canada is as yet a reasonably high tariff country and we will be under increasing pressure, as we have been in recent years. The other day I listened to a commentator speaking following the news on television. He asked, "What are we doing? Are we getting into a trade war?" One hears a lot of talk these days about a depression, but certainly if a depression takes place it will be preceded by a trade war. In my opinion, no commentator should be sitting in a high place, looking down at Canada, and asking, "Is this what I am seeing, a trade war?" An industrial policy should shy miles away from such a situation. We are master traders and we should be proud of our skills and our ability to sell. Certainly, many people derive their high standard of living in Canada from using these abilities.

I dealt earlier with the foreign takeover of a number of Canadian companies. In the past we have seen many takeovers of the Canadian economy by American corporations. Probably in the future the only change will be that the purchasers will be Japanese, German or nationals of other OPEC countries moving into Canada. If anyone is to be blamed for the loss, it should be the Canadian financial community, the people who control the money, not Canadian businessmen. Many members of the House have condemned our businessmen. However, in many cases it is not their fault; it is the fault of the people who are supplying them with the money. Where does the money come from to make purchases of Canadian companies? Studies indicate, as I stated earlier, that the greatest portion of these funds comes directly from Canadian banks. Canadian depositors have supplied the necessary funds for foreign takeovers. This was pointed out in the Gray report.

Businessmen are well aware of the fact that if a company can finance through relatively low-cost debt, then the value of the equity—that is, the share portion of the company—increases correspondingly. Generally, it is this lever which the company seeks for the investment of foreign money. In other words, we want to use foreign money for operating capital, but not necessarily equity capital.

I know my time is nearly over, but I should like to emphasize this particular point, that in the past we have seen the Canadian government attempting to take what might be called the political route, or a simplistic approach, of simply prohibiting takeovers by law. The problem of prohibition by law is that the entrepreneur becomes wary of initiating a business in the first place and decides, very wisely, to work instead for a foreign corporation or for the government. That is exactly what has happened. When you suggest you will prohibit a takeover, you automatically devalue the business concerned and automatically discourage someone from going into the same business. You destroy a little of the initiative, skill, tenacity and courage about which I spoke at the beginning of my speech.

The only approach that will work is to provide the Canadian entrepreneur, executive or proprietor, who wishes to build a Canadian corporation with a better deal to sell to a Canadian rather than to a foreigner. This keeps him motivated, and Canada keeps control of her industries. Unfortunately, one of the difficulties in developing Canadian industry is the staggering overhead of carrying the cost of Canadian government. This overhead shows up as one of the civilized world's highest tax burdens which falls increasingly upon Canada's productive middle class. How many times have I sat in the House in the past few years and heard it said that this or that budget is increasing the burden on the middle class! We cannot do that forever or we will kill the goose that laid the golden egg.

The salaries of people in the middle class are taxed at a higher rate in Canada than they are in the United States, and so are many of our companies. One cannot penalize a younger person who has initiative and drive for seeking out the highest reward for his efforts and services. These people do not really mind living south of the border, and in fact many of them go there and have gone there. We speak about the brain drain in this country. How many times has that expression been used here in the House? We have not really applied our thinking in considering the pieces of legislation we have passed, to finding ways to curtail the brain drain. In fact, in the past this trend has accelerated because of lack of a clear industrial policy, lack of a policy on foreign investment in Canada.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are ready to rise. I have many more thoughts to express to Canadians, but I will take some other opportunity to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in rising for the first time as a minister to take part in the debate on the Speech from the Throne, I should like, first, to express the wish that His Excellency the Governor General continues his recovery and that it be a full and speedy one. I also wish to compliment the mover and the seconder for their excellent addresses and, above all, to compliment this House on its wise choice of Mr. Speaker, whom I know personally and whom I hold in high regard, as does every member of this House. Also, I should like to thank all hon. members for their good wishes. I appreciate their thoughtfulness and I trust this spirit of goodwill will illuminate all the debates in the House and in the committee relating to my portfolio.

In this new job of mine, I wear three hats: as Minister of State for Urban Affairs, as the minister responsible to parliament for the National Capital Commission, and as the minister responsible for housing through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In the time available to me today I want to deal with each of these areas of responsibility, if time permits and hon. members will allow me.

The urban affairs ministry is the agency which provides the communication links among all levels of government and among all government departments and agencies which have an effect on the urban environment. The National Commission has a special responsibility for the national capital area as an urban community which has a very special significance for all Canadians and of which they can all feel proud. In another sense, it is a model community, a showcase within which the results of imaginative and innovative urban planning can be displayed. CMHC is an agency through which the government fulfils its obligations to ensure that all Canadians have access to good housing and a healthy and satisfying community environment. It administers a capital budget of substantially more than a billion dollars, but it is not simply a banker. It is in fact an instrument of the government's social policy in the field of housing and community planning.

During the past three years under my two distinguished predecessors, the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs has led the way in establishing a system of trilevel consultations involving the three levels of government at the national, regional and local levels. That system is a key element in our joint response to urban problems, and it is one of the mechanisms used to get more benefits, more cutting power out of our individual but harmonized efforts at managing urban growth. It means that the federal, provincial and municipal governments work with a common purpose, rather than at cross-purposes.

For the past 30 years Canada's rate of urban growth has outstripped that of every other western industrial nation and, if it continues at its present rate to the year 2000, we will be 90 per cent urbanized, with half of all Canadians living in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal. Clearly, this startling rate of growth is intensifying urban problems and spawning new ones. That, Mr. Speaker, is where our collective response must be directed—toward managing this rapid, unbalanced growth, not by imposing decisions on people but by providing attractive options. To meet this challenge, the concerted efforts of the federal, the provincial and municipal governments must be based on sound and achievable urban objectives, not vague theories or ill-conceived plans. I am happy to say we reached consensus on the general nature of those objectives at the second national trilevel conference in Edmonton last October.

We are concerned with the pattern of urbanization and the distribution of our urban population. We are equally concerned with restoring and improving our older centres to develop the kinds of services, housing and amenities they often desperately need to make them attractive places in which to live and work. But concern is not enough, and therefore we have developed many elements in our response to the urban challenge.

The Railway Relocation and Crossing Act, for example, has tremendous potential and we intend to exploit that potential to the fullest measure practical: to restore and revitalize our communities; to provide space for housing, for parks, for rapid transit corridors, for new commercial districts. This federal participation is in full recognition of and respect for provincial jurisdiction and with provincial priorities fully considered at all stages.

Another illustration is the new policy which now governs the management of federal urban lands and that includes a substantial amount of prime land in major centres. The federal government, as a major land owner in most Canadian cities, has reviewed its role as an "urban citizen" and defined a new set of policies governing the management of federal land and properties. We will ensure that the redevelopment of federal properties takes place in the light of their best urban use, rather than narrow, primarily financial considerations. These new policies will ensure that federal land as much as possible remains in the public domain. Further, local communities will be consulted during the analyses that will take place in planning the re-use of these land holdings.

Needless to say, the management of urban growth must take place within the context of regional growth strategies. They are as necessary to the effective handling of urban growth as is the trilevel co-operation in which we are actively engaged. Consequently, the federal government, through the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, CMHC and other departments and agencies, is involved in supporting the development of growth strategies for a number of urban regions, and it will support many more in the future as the provinces and municipalities formulate their plans.

One very special kind of planning is required in our port cities. We have a chance to reclaim our waterfronts, restore them to the use of our people and improve the capabilities of our ports to compete in world trade. The urban affairs ministry, together with other federal agencies, is examining the critical question of how port activities relate to and affect other urban functions. We have begun to do this, for instance, in Vancouver, Montreal, Thunder Bay, Halifax and Quebec City.

Mr. Speaker, I have given just a few tangible examples of how this government is proceeding with an effective response to urban growth in particular and to urban problems in general. It is a response which involves many federal agencies. It is a response which commits us to genuine and effective consultation with other levels of government. It is a commitment which I intend to carry out fully.

With regard to the special planning opportunities within the national capital region, I should like to remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that the NCC has had, and will continue to have, a major impact on the development, functioning and quality of life in this area which, apart from its national significance, is also a thriving city. In fulfilling this role, the NCC is proposing two interrelated federal development strategies—one for the heart, or core, of the capital and the other for the capital region as a whole.

A major objective of the core area planning is to link, physically and economically, the centres of Ottawa and Hull as the strong and dynamic heart of the national capital region which reflects and respects Canadian cultural life styles—a vibrant capital in which all Canadians feel at home and of which they are part. The major elements defining the image of the capital—the parliamentary, judicial and cultural institutions, as well as a major part of the federal administrative function—will continue to be located in the centre of the capital. At the same time, we will seek a diversity of land use in the core area, emphasizing residential use, as well as governmental, retail and other business activities.

In the wider national capital region, in face of the pressures of present and anticipated urban growth which could threaten the very quality of life as well as the role of the capital region, the NCC is proposing a framework of development for the next three decades, just as the Greber plan did for the last two decades. The planning concept for tomorrow's capital is not meant to be a master plan but, rather, a working document designed to focus intergovernmental and public dialogue toward a common set of development objectives. This document will be released within a few weeks. Such consensus is crucial at this time because of the various planning activities under way by other levels of government and groups in the capital region. A further study bearing on the development of the national capital region is the Fullerton report. This study deals with the administrative and organizational framework for the capital. In light of all these recommendations, proposals and plans affecting the area, the government is committed to the establishment of a special committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to consider questions relating to the future of the national capital region.

I would like to speak now for a few minutes about another extremely important aspect of my responsibilities, the goal of putting good housing within the reach of all Canadians in all parts of Canada. This year, because of economic conditions which are common to all countries, the housing industry in Canada will not be able to maintain the remarkable record of growth which has been established over the last few years. I will deal, in a moment, with the present housing situation in Canada and the action which the federal government is taking, and will take, to deal with it.

When I suggested a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians, by and large, are among the best housed people in the world, some hon. members opposite seemed to express some skepticism. That is their job. I should like to return to that theme now, very briefly, by citing some accomplishments of the last six years during the term of this government. During that time, Mr. Speaker, 1,350,000 new homes were built in Canada, while in the same period 700,000 new families were formed. We have not only been keeping up with the needs of new families for homes; our building rate has been almost twice that of family formations. This is fortified by the knowledge that in the last four or five years we have had no place in the bedrooms of the nation.

Mr. Gillies: No bedrooms, that's all.

Mr. Danson: In human terms, this represents not just 1,350,000 housing units but homes for almost 5½ million men, women and children. This record has been achieved, Mr. Speaker, not only by sound housing policies but by a housing industry which, in terms of efficiency and productivity, is among the best in the world. I want to preserve a competitive, viable house building industry in this country as an essential partner with government in fulfilling people's needs. It is a strong and efficient construction industry and financial community in this country that will deliver homes to Canadians.

It is my intention to use existing programs, and new ones which I am developing, to stimulate this sector and to make certain that it is productive, competitive and responsible. Governments do not build homes, builders do. We must provide the climate and support to make certain they do so for Canadians of all economic groups. We must exact the maximum leverage from every public dollar spent to unlock the greater resources of the private lenders and builders. The Economic Council of Canada told us that if we were to meet the needs of Canadians, we would have to build a million homes between 1969 and 1973. We accepted that challenge and we built 1,153,000 houses in that period, exceeding the ECC target by a substantial margin and surpassing 200,000 units every year.

I know very well, Mr. Speaker, that it is not enough just to build houses. We have to build the kind of houses people need and can afford. In the six-year period from 1968 to 1973, we produced more than a quarter-million units of housing for low income people, at an investment of well over $2.5 billion. If the significance of those numbers is not evident, let me add that it is more than three times as many low income homes as were built in the previous 22 years.

Housing itself, of course, is not our only concern. In the same six-year period we responded to the demand of Canadian municipalities for almost $.5 billion in loans for sewage treatment facilities, and wrote off 25 per cent of those loans as an investment by the federal government in the interests of clean water and soil and good urban planning. That is a record of which any government can be proud. It is still a matter of deep concern to me, and to the government, that good housing is not equally available to all Canadians throughout Canada; but we have made significant strides towards that goal and we are constantly increasing our efforts. If we have to weather a few bad months because of the prevailing economic climate, I see no immediate cause for despair and I am confident that before long we will regain the momentum which we have built up over the last six years.

I should like to share with hon. members the facts of the housing situation as it exists today and at the same time describe the actions which the government is taking and proposes to take to change the situation. Because of rising prices, high interest rates and the reluctance of private lenders to commit mortgage funds, the annual rate of housing starts is substantially lower than the record levels of recent years. We have attempted to improve the supply of mortgage funds in a number of ways. First, through the Assisted Home Ownership Program we have made public funds available to finance housing where it is most needed, good housing for people of low or moderate incomes. In spite of those who cried that it would never work, AHOP has been, so far, the most successful of our new social housing programs. I am grateful to my predecessor for introducing this program and for showing industry and the people of Canada that housing can be built at lower prices.

During the first nine months of this year we committed some $450 million for the purchase of 20,000 homes for some 80,000 Canadians. About half of these homes were new construction. Because of the remarkable success of this program, the available funds have been taken up sooner than we expected. However, I want to assure the House that as soon as additional funds become available, AHOP will be continued. Before the start of the next building season in the spring of 1975, new initiatives will be introduced to complement this very successful program.

So far this year CMHC has made direct loans amounting to more than $568 million to finance more than 27,000 homes—about two-thirds of them new construction. I announced a few weeks ago that we were prepared to put up $50 million at 8 per cent if builders in some of the larger cities would build housing for rent at agreed-upon moderate rates. I said at the time this would not be a panacea but one important initiative in dealing with a complex problem. It is evident, however, that it is not possible to fund all the new housing in Canada with public money.

Earlier this year we secured the co-operation of private mortgage lenders who agreed that high ratio loans should be available only for housing in the middle and lower price range. The lenders agreed that, for more expensive housing, down payments would be at least 25 per cent. At a time when mortgage capital is not readily available, this agreement has the effect of directing our financial resources to the creation of modest housing for more families, a strategy more consistent with our over-all national housing objectives. Over the years, the federal government has introduced many measures to encourage private investment in housing. Under CMHC mortgage insurance arrangements as provided for in the National Housing Act, private approved lenders made some $1.5 billion in loans to home buyers last year.

Last year legislation was passed to create the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation and to permit the creation of private mortgage investment corporations. These measures are intended to make residential mortgages more attractive and convenient as an investment and to bring more investors, particularly small investors and a largely untapped source of non-equity foreign investors, into the field. We must continue to seek new pools of capital which can be tapped for housing money, and step up the flow from existing sources. I have always felt that pension funds should be much more active in mortgage investments. I know their participation in housing has increased, partly because of the persuasiveness of my predecessors. But I do not think the full potential of these funds as a source of capital for housing has been reached, not by any means. I am going to pursue that possibility. I think the time has come also when we should consider seeking housing non-equity capital from outside Canada in a more active and deliberate way.

As a further step toward making better use of private resources, our success with the Assisted Home Ownership Program suggests to me that if it is going to achieve its full potential in enabling Canadian families to buy their own homes, ways may have to be sought to make use of private as well as public capital under similar terms and conditions. In this way, assistance could be extended to twice as many families than if we were dependent only upon available public funds. At the same time, the private sector would be further stimulated.

As a general benefit for people who are purchasing modest homes for the first time, the government has proposed a grant of $500 as a way of offsetting the building materials' sales tax, for people who are most in need of help. This was referred to in the last budget and I anticipate it will be proposed to the House again as soon as resources permit. I believe the proposal to inaugurate a registered home ownership savings plan is in the same category. I have great expectations for this plan, which would give a very substantial tax saving to young people who are saving to make a down payment on their first home. I would also hope that a means could be found to see that these funds, or a substantial part of them, are invested in residential mortgages, to further augment the capital supply and the housing stock and complete the cycle for which that money is being supplied.

We will, of course, continue our support and encouragement of provinces and municipalities for the public assembly of land to which we have committed $500 million over five years, particularly those projects which promise a quick addition to the supply of serviced land, and on terms which will encourage municipalities to speed up planned residential development. The first of this land will shortly be appearing on the market. We are beginning to see the results of that fine program which should assist us in a major way.

In that regard I propose to reintroduce into the House legislation which will continue to improve the federal program of assistance for sewage treatment facilities. As a means of helping to increase the supply of serviced land, storm trunk sewers will be eligible for assistance for the first time where they help open up new areas for residential development and provide lower-cost housing lots. This legislation continues the forgiveness provisions to the provinces and municipalities.

Hon. members are very well aware of the wide range of social housing programs now available under the National Housing Act. I have already referred to AHOP, which can be of special benefit to young families. Another important approach is through what has become known as the third force in housing, housing provided not by the government, not by the conventional housing industry but by local people helping themselves. Very often this housing is created for the elderly or for the physically or mentally handicapped. We give these public-spirited sponsors 100 per cent financing at favourable rates, a 10 per cent capital write-down and substantial grants to help plan projects and get them started. With this kind of help, of course, we expect these groups to create housing that will rent at a price somewhat below market rates and reflect interest subsidies and grants which are provided with public funds. We are now looking at other ways of helping these third force groups, particularly ways in which land could be made available to them at a lower cost, especially near the central cores of our major cities.

I am pushing ahead energetically with the program of rural and native peoples' housing which my predecessor announced in the last parliament and under which we are committed to create or rehabilitate, with the fullest possible co-operation of the local people, a total of 50,000 homes over the next five years. This program requires the agreement and participation of provincial governments, and I am pleased to say these negotiations are proceeding and agreements should be reached with most provinces before the end of the year.

For many people, of course, the only solution to their problems is public housing provided at rents geared to their income. I am sure this kind of solution will continue to be needed for many years to come. However, we are continuing to seek new ways of applying this program, particularly arrangements which will avoid creating so-called ghettoes and which will integrate public housing clients into the community without incurring any social stigma, and also enriching the lives of those people and their children.

All these programs offer the people of Canada not only help with their housing problems, but the widest possible range of options to select the kind of housing they will occupy and the way they will occupy it as owners, tenants or members of co-operative organizations. I do not agree that everyone is entitled, as a matter of right, to be provided with a house of his own by the government. I do believe, however, in equality of opportunity and that all Canadians should have equal access to the same options for solving their problems.

I believe that people, like governments, in selecting their options in these times should exercise restraint. I think there is adequate evidence that some of our present difficulties are created by a minority of people who have heated up the housing market by repeatedly trading up to larger and more expensive houses which bear no relation to their essential needs and sometimes not even a relationship to their cost.

I wish to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by reiterating the view of this government, that even though housing is a critical element in the economy of the country, it is not simply a commodity to be bought and sold according to the winds prevailing in the marketplace. Because it is an essential factor in the fundamental physical and social well-being of people, housing must be the subject of deliberate, consistent, long-term policy. This is why I reject any suggestion that housing funds are turned off and on to manipulate the economy.

Our financial commitments have not fluctuated; they have been consistently increased. Certainly, we must always be aware of the demands which housing makes on capital markets, its effect as a stimulator of employment and as a catalyst in the sale of a wide range of capital goods. These considerations, however, must be carefully weighed-off against a preeminent concern for people's immediate and urgent need to be decently housed, a need which cannot be deferred or delayed to accommodate economic or fiscal mechanisms.

Though I am a new minister, Mr. Speaker, I have the great advantage of being a member of a well-established firm. I mean, of course, the present government. It is a firm which, with respect to housing as in all other matters of public concern, enjoys the well-founded confidence of the people of Canada. Many Canadians are concerned just now about their current housing problems, but they have resisted and will continue to resist the efforts of those people who would magnify these difficulties into a national crisis. The people of Canada have confidence, Mr. Speaker, in a government which during its term of office has seen the creation of new homes for 5½ million people, far exceeding the population growth and the rate of new family formations.

The people of Canada have confidence in the government which accepted the challenge of the Economic Council to build a million homes in five years and exceeded that target by a healthy margin. The people of Canada believe that our present housing problems can be solved, and they believe they will be solved by the government which during its six years of office built three times as many low-income homes as were built in the previous 22 years.

The people of Canada expect solutions from the government which introduced assisted home ownership, neighborhood improvement, residential rehabilitation, rural and native housing, the widest range of far reaching social housing programs ever introduced in Canada and, I suggest, in most countries of the world. The people of Canada know that our housing difficulties will not be overcome overnight by some simple device pulled out of somebody's hat. It will require a sustained attack on many fronts, not by a single minister but by the whole federal team working with other governments, the financial community and with industry and people at the neighborhood level.

That is what the people of Canada expect of this government, and that is what they will get. They have every reason to face the months ahead with confidence and good hope.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I want to say a few words about United Aircraft of Canada Limited. The tragic unfolding of the United Aircraft story is a sad but perfect example of the problems of foreign ownership in Canada and the related failure of the federal government's corporate give-away programs to create permanent benefits for the people of this country. I will come back to this statement later, to justify it.

What is United Aircraft producing here and in the United States at this time? They are producing an exceptionally fine engine which was developed in Canada. The research for that engine was financed largely by the Canadian taxpayer, and the innovative ideas came from Canadian scientists and technicians. These engines can be used in small planes, helicopters, turbo trains, hovercraft and, of course, STOL aircraft. I am informed that by 1970 the company's production of this engine had cornered virtually 70 per cent of the world market in its class. All things considered, it is an exceptional accomplishment.

How was this project financed? Since 1965, the federal government, under the defence industry productivity program, approved $108,563,239 in grants. That was not loans, but outright gifts from the taxpayers of Canada. The company did, of course, put up some capital on its own. What has transpired since January of this year with this company in Longueuil? Early in the new year there was a strike. There can be no doubt that the reason the strike has persisted since the beginning of January, 1974, until now, the middle of October, is the profoundly anti-labour, anti-trade union policy of that company. The outstanding issue is the non-acceptance of the Rand formula, the recognition that once a trade union is democratically established, the check-off system for all members of that bargaining unit should automatically come into play. This formula has been accepted for more than 20 years by 90 per cent of all companies in Canada, where unions exist, as being an entirely equitable arrangement for working people. However, United Aircraft, both in Canada and the United States, rejects this highly civilized process for bargaining.

I want to put on record the attitude of this company's president toward the employees who produce these engines. I quote from an article by Wilfred List which appeared in a recent edition of the Globe and Mail. On the question of the democratic right to have a check-off, the company president said:

> Why should the union officers sit on their asses in their offices while we collect the dues?
> They already have the voluntary irrevocable check-off . . . So to hell with them. Let them work for the dues.

That is the president of United Aircraft of Canada Limited. That is the man who is responsible for a nine-month old strike. As I said a few moments ago, that kind of attitude at the management level went out of virtually all companies in Canada some 20 years ago. However, it remains firmly embedded at the top of United Aircraft.

The Quebec labour mediator appointed by the minister of labour of that province has described the company as being, to quote him, "intransigent" on this issue. He said he was told by the company that even if the men and women out on strike accepted every company proposal—wage levels, pension benefits, you name it—management said they could not, and would not, accept the Rand formula. Hence the description of the mediator appointed by the minister of labour of the province of Quebec of the company's attitude as being "intransigent", which I think is absolutely correct.

It is clear that the principal concern, in terms of labour matters, of this company that is owned in the United States is not its workers in Canada but the 60,000 employees it has in New England, principally in the Hartford, Connecticut, area. Those employees are now negotiating a new contract because their old one runs out some time next month, and the principal concern of the employees of the corporation in the United States is exactly the same as that of the Canadian workers in Longueuil, Quebec. That is to say, they want the check-off principle established. They want the democratic right to have dues collected from all members of a trade union accepted by the majority in a plant who benefit from that union's negotiations. It is clear that this company is using its Canadian workers as scapegoats for the real battle that it plans to fight and which it is now getting under way in the United States with its 60,000 employees there. Canadians are suffering because of a corporate concern outside our own borders.

In permitting this inhumane treatment of working families in Longueuil, what have been the economic consequences of this shutdown for some nine months? First of all, the company has admitted that it has shifted 40 per cent of its production from Canada to the United States. This point is not new, and it ties in with federal financing through gifts of this kind. When work was commenced on this engine project in the first place, after the engine had been developed at Longueuil, the first international sale in the range of about $1 billion was made to Iran. But instead of the sale being made by Canada, which had developed the engine, the company decided to build a new factory in West Virginia and to produce all the engines for sale to Iran in the United States. I have not checked the number, but my guess is that the number of employees working in the United States as a result of Canadian developed technology exceeds the number who are working in Canada.

As I have said, within the last nine months the company has transferred 40 per cent of its production to the United States. What does the company intend to do next year? According to a company official who was quoted in last Wednesday's Montreal Gazette, the company plans a 35 per cent reduction in production next year. According to that company official, the federal government has been kept informed all along of this cutback decision, and has been informed of the company's plans for next year.

In the House today, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) tabled a letter that he proudly held up and contended offered assurances to workers in Longueuil and to the people of Canada regarding their future prospects. This letter came from Mr. Stephenson, the president of the corporation. It was mailed last Friday, and I suspect driven down here at the minister's request. He probably got on the phone last week, after being questioned in the House, and said; "Please give us some wonderful assurances about your Canadian plans". He then got this letter from Mr. Stephenson. I do not think I exaggerate when I say that, in substance, it is worthless in terms of providing any effective assurances that work will be continued in Canada.

In the first substantive paragraph of the letter, which is the second paragraph, the head of the company assures the minister that it will begin to repatriate the work from the United States which they had already sent out of Canada, as rapidly as possible "consistent with maintaining an orderly flow of engines to our customers". That kind of qualification in the opening part of the letter is such that if they produced no more engines at all in Canada next year, they could refer back to this letter and say, "Well, we warned you in advance that it might not be possible".

Given the attitude that I referred to a minute ago toward its employees, and the fact that the company is totally unwilling to accept the Rand formula, I think it is beyond question that the company expects to break that union. It expects to break the labour force at Longueuil either entirely or to reduce it substantially to the point of having almost no economic significance for Canada.

Let me repeat that two days before this letter was sent to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, an official of the same company said in Montreal, on Wednesday last, that the company planned a 35 per cent reduction in their production in Canada next year. Surely that is a flat contradiction of the stated general purposes enunciated in the letter to the minister.

I want to raise some questions, Mr. Speaker, which have been unanswered so far in this House, and unanswered by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other cabinet ministers outside the House—questions that require an answer. First of all, how was it possible for United Aircraft to transfer the production of engines and associated technology created by Canadian scientists and technicians, and largely financed by the taxpayers of Canada, from Canada to the United States in the first place? Were there no safeguards to protect this investment by the people of Canada? If there were no safeguards, then there ought to have been. On the other hand, if there were, then why were these safeguards not enforced during the past nine months?

It seems to me self-evident that if the people of Canada are going to put up $105 million for a private corporation that is foreign-owned and produces products in its own country, we must ultimately have the assurance that the product will be produced in Canada. Judging from the transfer by the United Aircraft corporation of production to the United States during the past nine months, there were no safeguards at all in the contracts. I repeat, I do now know whether there were or not, and the government has not made the contracts available so we can find out. If there were safeguards, why was no action taken to stop this transfer of production?

My second question is: when did the government request United Aircraft to give assurances about its production plans in Canada for next year? This transfer of production has been going on for many months now. When did the minister really become involved in a serious way? Was it last week, after questions were asked in the House? Did he phone the president, who is an old friend, Mr. Stephenson—I understand they are good buddies—and get him to send off a letter to the minister because the matter might come up again in the House of Commons? Or did the minister become involved last month or six months ago? Surely this question is a relevant one.

If production has been lost to Canada and we have lost many jobs in the last few months, then surely the minister responsible for this program has an obligation to intervene. I now ask the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, when did he first go to the company for assurances about repatriating these jobs back to Canada? Related is the question, does the minister intend to reply to the letter he received from Mr. Stephenson asking for specific dollar commitments for next year? Never mind the general commitment of the company to do whatever it can. Surely, if the people of Canada are putting hundreds of millions of dollars into this corporation, the least we can expect is a dollars and cents commitment on the part of the corporation in terms of its plans for next year. Surely, the minister should not be satisfied with a letter written in general terms but should require the company to indicate that it plans to spend so many dollars in rebuilding the line and in producing a certain number of engines. This kind of specific detail is required and it is up to the minister to get back to the company to obtain that kind of assurance.

The third question that bothers me is a general one and involves the government's attitude toward working people in general. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said outside the House today that it did not matter to him—this is the logic of his argument—what kind of labour conditions prevailed in companies doing business with the government of Canada. The logic of his statement would seem to be that it did not matter if a company that was receiving millions of dollars in government grants had a profoundly anti-labour attitude, because this was not the minister's private domain; but, rather,—his domain was to ensure, or encourage the production of engines. I say that is a totally unacceptable attitude.

We passed legislation just a week ago which on the whole was equitable in terms of settling the grain handlers' dispute in western Canada. At that time certain ministers of the Crown, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang), made very fine speeches which sounded good in terms of their interest in the working people of Canada and the conditions under which they laboured. Yet today we have a minister of the Crown stating that in terms of our dealings with corporations and, I repeat, in giving those corporations millions of dollars, it really did not matter what kind of labour circumstances their employees lived in or worked under. I say that is totally unacceptable. By that I do not mean that the government of the day can be held responsible for every semi-colon or comma written into a labour agreement. That is not the point. What it can do is adopt certain minimum standards and make sure that any company which is a beneficiary of public funds at least meets those standards. Surely one of the standards must be that a corporation as anti-labour as the United Aircraft corporation should not receive financial assistance from the people of Canada unless it changes its attitude toward its own employees.

I would ask you, Madam Speaker, who speaks for the government in these matters: is it the Minister of Labour, or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? Is it a matter of their wanting to have it both ways?

Mr. Breau: That is a problem of Quebec.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member suggests this is a problem of the province of Quebec. Certainly it is partly a problem of the province of Quebec, but it was this government which made grants to that corporation, and it is this government that can now enforce certain conditions. That is exactly the attitude many have taken in respect of racism in South Africa, and it is similar to the kind of attitude taken toward Germany in the 1930s. This involves extricating oneself from a situation because of the legal niceties, but that is unacceptable. If we are to have nice speeches by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others about our concerns in respect of problems within Canada, surely we cannot tolerate one of the business-oriented departments of the government taking the attitude toward corporations in Canada that they can do what they want with the people who work for them. I suggest that is a totally unacceptable attitude.

Mr. Breau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Broadbent: Certainly.

Mr. Breau: Is the hon. member suggesting that whenever the government of Canada is dealing with a foreign corporation located in a province, it should have jurisdiction over the labour laws of that province or the collective agreements of the corporation?

Mr. Broadbent: By no means. If the hon. member had listened to what I said, he would know I suggested that in terms of grants provided by the federal government to corporations, it could set up minimum standards of behaviour, just as it did under the foreign takeover review legislation. It could set up certain standards of good corporate citizenship, and before a company received a grant from the people of Canada it would have to meet those decent, democratic and civilized standards or it would not get the grant. It seems to me that is precisely what this government is not doing, specifically in the United Aircraft case.

I come finally to my fourth concern. I do not anticipate this course of action—although the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said something outside the House today which suggested that the government might follow this path—but if the government should decide to nationalize the United Aircraft corporation, would it retain ownership of the patents which have resulted from Canadian research and development, or will the United Aircraft corporation be able to transfer production along with the patent rights to produce such engines in the United States, so that all that would be left in the hands of the Canadian government would be an empty factory?

My suspicion is that the latter will take place, that the Canadian taxpayer will be left with some concrete, some metal girders, and the workers with no work to do because the work and the jobs would have quite legally been shifted back to the United States. We do not know the answer to that question because the minister has not provided the members of this House or the public in general with the details of the contracts the government has entered into with the corporation.

I spoke a number of times in this House and outside, in 1970, about the federal government's research and development programs, stating that by giving about 80 per cent of such funds to foreign-owned companies, without having the stringent safeguards implicit in my remarks today, we as a country were simply financing growth in both technology and employment in the foreign countries concerned. We were not providing any permanent benefit for the people of Canada. I would ask whether the United Aircraft case is not a sad but profound example of more than $100 million misspent.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): First of all I should like to congratulate you, Sir, and through you the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) on assuming the high office of Speaker. I know that his qualities of fairmindedness, sound judgment and innate good humour will mark his tenure in office as our first commoner.

There have been a great number of interventions in this debate, many of a high calibre from new members of the House. The quality of these speeches is a clear reflection of the ability of men and women entering public life in Canada. Of all the interventions in this debate, perhaps understandably, that of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) drew the most critical comment.

His speech has been widely described as surprising because it was expected to deal with inflation. This was demanded by the situation. But the Prime Minister did not discuss the economic program of his government; he discussed bilingualism, constitutional patriation, reform of the procedures of the House of Commons, and amendments in respect of the tenure of members of the Senate.

The Prime Minister's speech should have come as no surprise. There was nothing puzzling about it. This was characteristic. This was the essential Trudeau. It was consistent with everything the Prime Minister has ever said about his priorities, or at least everything he said before the election of 1972.

The Prime Minister has always defined the problems of government as institutional problems. From 1968 to 1972 his main concerns were with the readjustment of constitutional relationships, the reform of parliament, and new techniques for decision making in the executive branch of government. The Prime Minister's commitment is not to the substance of public policy but to the reform of the institutional mechanisms by which policy is made.

It is the irony of his public career that he has made an obsession of his search for institutional rationality. He has an obsession with discovering and applying a scientific technique which will produce, in his words, "political instruments which are sharper, stronger and more finely controlled than anything based on mere emotionalism". Seen in this light the Prime Minister's speech ceases to be puzzling. Inflation did not receive serious attention in the Prime Minister's speech because it has never received serious attention in the Prime Minister's thought.

There are few members of this House who would challenge the desirability of establishing a Canadian mechanism for constitutional amendment. There are few members who would challenge the desirability of making parliament more efficient. That is not at issue. But we on this side of the House believe that the pre-eminent government priority in Canada today must be to deal with inflation.

Inflation is not some temporary problem. It is not some problem that has limited or short-term effects. Inflation is a problem which attacks the essential fabric of our society. It is a problem which breeds economic despair and social instability and, if left unchecked, political collapse. Democracy is far less threatened by the ponderous workings of this House than by the spreading and virulent disease of inflation.

Each day in this House, in the newspapers, on television and radio there is a litany of symptoms. The focus is, of course, on the short-term effects. But beyond the immediate suffering there is the more ominous erosion of the security of middle and lower-middle income earners. There is the destruction of savings and retirement funds, the threat of a poverty so widespread that only the wealthiest and most powerful members of society will be able to protect themselves.

The government's failure to show any leadership in dealing with inflation can only serve to aggravate the problem. Each day that the government fails to act it contributes to the psychology of inflation. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) have already made just such a contribution by implying, in their description of inflation as an international problem, that it is a problem beyond Canadian control. The consequence has been to persuade large numbers of Canadians that the government will not act.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have helped create an atmosphere in which it is widely believed that the only way to survive is to forget any sense of collective responsibility and fend for oneself. Thus, each new increase in wages or salaries provides a justification for another increase. Each new increase in prices provides justification for another increase. Labour can blame rising prices and business can blame the rising cost of labour.

Thomas Hobbes wrote that "Outside of civil states there is always war of everyone against every one". That may be a pessimistic view of human nature, but if fairly characterizes the consequences of inflationary psychology. Every man is set at war with every other man. Surely the government has a responsibility to bring this under control. The government is not powerless. It can deal with this aspect of the problem of inflation very simply. It can give Canada some moral leaderships. It can give the Canadian people a demonstration of concern, some evidence of its commitment to act.

Instead of boasting about how well we are doing, the Minister of Finance should tell us how we can do better. The Minister of Finance is like a man standing at the upraised end of a sinking ship telling those around him that they are more fortunate than those at the submerged end. It is time he realized that he is on the same ship.

Instead of feuding in public the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) should try to find a means to reconcile the interests of consumers and producers. The Prime Minister's tolerance of this dispute is a measure of his failure to understand the problem of inflation. These two ministers are offering encouragement to the kind of forces which are helping to spread inflation. Group is set against group. Interest is set against interest. There is no attempt to reconcile conflicting interests.

There is no attempt to educate, or re-educate public opinion to the necessity for mutual restraint. And that, Mr. Speaker, is the foundation of a healthy democratic society: a recognition of mutual interest, a willingness to compromise, to find accommodation. The Prime Minister ignores this necessity, to pursue his obsession with remodelling the institutions of government. And what does the Prime Minister intend with his reforms in our parliament? Every institutional initiative he has ever taken has had the effect of centralizing power in the executive branch.

One can only suspect that the Prime Minister and those around him ultimately define rationality as the process which recognizes their superior ability to decide. All will be rational when they are freed from the fetters of scrutiny and criticism, particularly that of the opposition. If that is not what they intend, let the Prime Minister tell us, instead of lecturing us on protocol, what he proposes to do to ensure that members on this side of the House can more effectively execute their responsibilities.

The existence of vigorous opposition has been held to be central to the preservation of a healthy parliamentary democracy. Every member of this House, not just those on the other side, is a representative of the Canadian people. Will the Prime Minister help members of this House to be more effective representatives? For example, will he guarantee public access to the publicly-financed reports on which government policy is based? Will he give committees the resources to conduct proper investigations? Will he instruct his colleagues and members of the public service who appear before parliamentary bodies to answer the questions which are posed to them?

Our previous experience with the Prime Minister's concept of institutional reform affords little confidence that his understanding of efficiency will produce more effective public policy. The Prime Minister's obsession with institutional rationalization during his first administration produced a complete restructuring of relationships at the highest level of the executive branch of government, and these changes were made, we were told, to permit government to develop more effective long-term policy.

Does the Prime Minister recall his announcement on December 24, 1970 that inflation no longer exists in Canada? The vaunted mechanisms for rational long-term planning failed to anticipate changes that have gathered momentum to culminate in the present inflationary crisis. The Prime Minister will forgive us if we are skeptical about the efficacy of his institutional tinkering.

There is no more compelling illustration of the failure of the new style of decision making than the tragic miscalculation made by his government in trying to restrict agricultural production in 1971. Canadian farmers only three years ago were paid cash incentives to reduce their production of essential grains, as the world moved toward a food crisis. Had there been even interim planning, perhaps Canada would now be prepared to make a significant contribution in terms of supplying leadership toward establishing a world food-security system which is so urgently needed. The government has failed both to plan ahead and to face its international responsibilities.

We have heard and read a great deal about the magnitude of the world food crisis. The statistics are appalling, frightening. Face to face confrontation with the ravages of famine is even more devastating. We know that at least 460 million people are unable to lead normal lives because they are permanently hungry. We know that 100,000 people died of starvation last year in Ethiopia. And we know that, for the first time in history, the world has only 28 days of food supplies in reserve.

World-wide inflationary pressures, drought, and a rapidly increasing world population daily aggravate the global disparity between supply and demand for food. No one country can hope to ameliorate significantly, let alone resolve, the threat to the survival of hundreds of millions of human beings in the decade ahead. But the "have" countries such as Canada have an overwhelming moral obligation to combat world famine by efforts, indeed by sacrifices, far surpassing anything we have previously contributed.

Long term planning in food production for domestic and international consumption must become a top priority. But this will not be accomplished by ad hoc measures, by temporary subsidies, or by an alternating disincentive and crash incentive approach to production. It will require strong governmental leadership which, to date, has been sadly lacking.

No better example of this lack can be found than in the "Western Producer" of August 22, 1974 which reported:

> Agriculture Minister Whelan was not very optimistic about Canada's willingness to contribute to feeding an underfed world. He reviewed what Canadians have already done and then said: "Canada does have tremendous resources to increase food production. But Canada does not have unlimited wealth to pay farmers the price required to push production to the limits of our ability and technology. Canada does not have unlimited wealth to set aside surplus production in storage or to give food away to less fortunate peoples in the world. But most important, I do not see the will on behalf of Canadians to make sacrifices that would be necessary".

If that is the view of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), and it obviously is, does he not accept a responsibility to challenge Canadians to develop our tremendous resources to increase food production? There is no leadership there in this mounting world crisis, just an abdication of leadership. Fortunately, that is not the view of Charles Munro, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and of the 45-country International Federation of Agriculture Producers, who said:

> Canada would have much more food for export to under-developed countries if the government could end the "boom and bust" cycle in the farm economy.

He went on to say that:

> As farmers we say we have the potential and the technology to feed twice as many people as we do now, but there has to be the political will to do it.

The key phrase is "the political will to do it". I am sure that if the Minister of Agriculture were to ask the farmers, he would find that there is the will on the part of the farmers and, if the Prime Minister were to ask the Canadian people, he would find that there is the will on the part of the Canadian people. But there is a real question as to the political will on the part of the government. The political will is lacking because the Prime Minister is so obsessed with institutional restructuring.

I see this lack of political will reflected in another area with which I would like to deal, namely, the plight of our native people. Completely overlooked in the throne speech, inserted as an afterthought in the Prime Minister's remarks, the native people and their grievances have been the subject of much discussion, analysis and indeed criticism in recent days.

At times it appeared that the welter of writing and reporting, the interpretations and misinterpretations, the obsession with who did what and to whom during the demonstration on Parliament Hill, would distract attention from the legitimate frustrations and aims of our native people. That demonstration riveted the nation's attention on Indian grievances—grievances which have been documented on many occasions by the native brotherhoods, grievances which have had numerous airings but few answers.

Briefs on housing, economic development and land claims have gone without ministerial acknowledgement for months; perhaps because they were suspected of presenting a biased point of view. But a recent government publication demonstrates succinctly and graphically, and surely entirely without bias, the bitter facts which underly native frustration.

Far more alarming than the native demonstration on Parliament Hill are the facts contained in "Perspective Canada", a compendium of social statistics produced by Statistics Canada in July of 1974 which provides irrefutable data to show that the social conditions of our native population are deteriorating, not improving.

In 1971, 25.4 per cent of families on reserves needed new housing, as compared with 19.7 per cent in 1965. In addition, twice as many houses were classified as needing major repairs in 1971 as in 1958. The minister in charge of housing will take note, I hope, that native housing is deteriorating both qualitatively and quantitatively.

This morning in committee we learned that there is a need for 20,000 new homes on Indian reserves, but this year only 2,000 were constructed, or one tenth of the actual need. This is less than one home per reservation. Is it any wonder that we see demonstrations and increasing militancy from our native peoples? To hear a cabinet minister admonish Canadians, as the minister who is responsible for housing did last week, saying that they should be grateful for their high standard of housing, must heap coals on the fires of Indian frustration.

The desperate housing situation is basic to the other severe problems the native peoples face, namely, health, education, and economic opportunity. What chance does a child have to get proper rest, to study, to learn a trade in a two roomed shack which is in need of major repairs? For far too long government has concentrated on unrelated programs in health, education and employment opportunities without linking them to adequate housing. I commend the statistics on native people in "Perspective Canada" to all those who are tempted to categorize and dismiss Indians as lazy, drunken and good for nothing.

A further indictment of the way in which successive governments have treated our native people is contained in a recent non-Canadian publication now exposing Canada's treatment of its native people to the world. Capsulizing 400 years of betrayal and neglect in hard hitting, factual terms, report No. 21 of the Minority Rights Group in Britain deals with Canada's Indians. The aim of this group, whose sponsors include such eminent humanitarians as Barbara Ward and Gunnar Myrdal, is to secure justice for minority groups suffering discrimination. Perhaps this devastating recital, by a highly respected London-based educational trust, of discrimination against Canada's Indians will shame us into taking the action that we have heretofore avoided.

Phrases such as paternalistic, bureaucratic deadweight, excessive administrative and government control, occur and reoccur. The report examines the dollar outlay on native people in the light of the benefits provided them. It states:

> The increasing expenditure on the Indian, and the creation of programs in new fields like community development, had less beneficial effect than might be expected from looking at the sums involved. Not only was the money still being spent for the Indian rather than by him, but remarkably little was actually being spent on Indians at all. In 1970-71, for instance, of $228.3 million expended in the Indian and Eskimo affairs program, $175.4 million was classified as "operating expenses". The main beneficiary of the increased budget, therefore, was an expanded government department—

The report quotes one Indian leader as saying:

> One wonders if the Indian people are not used to provide well-paying jobs to non-Indians.

The report also charges that:

> There has still not been a major transformation of Indian life. The Department of Indian Affairs is still a huge and costly vested interest and may wittingly or unwittingly obstruct the movement of power and resources to the Indians.

But more than money is involved here. There is the question of Indian rights and self-respect. As the report states:

> It will in the long term be far less costly, as well as more generous and more just, to let the Indians themselves try now, even if this means making them a special case for economic assistance for some years to come. They have been a special case of a different sort for 400 years. The government will have to be patient and courageous and far-sighted enough to realize that the symptoms of such deprivation will not, even in the most favourable circumstances, disappear overnight, and that another attempt to solve the Indians' difficulties with cut price solutions imposed from outside will inevitably create more intractable problems and necessitate still more expensive remedies in the future. There is a long history of failure, parsimony and neglect to be made up for.

The publication recounts how, immediately following his appointment in 1968, the former minister of Indian Affairs announced his intention of holding a series of consultative meetings with Indian leaders to discuss a radical overhaul of Indian administration. Two months later the government published its white paper on Indian policy, without consultation. The Indian leaders, so the report states, were surprised and disappointed. And I might add, angry at another betrayal by government.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because we have seen in the wake of the demonstration on Parliament Hill a ministerial meeting with Indian leaders, initiated by the National Indian Brotherhood. Regretfully, the government did not seize or see the opportunity to initiate such discussion itself. The outcome of this meeting, according to press reports, is that the leaders of Canada's registered Indians are to have regular and frequent access to a federal cabinet committee to discuss their problems. Optimistically, Indian leaders reported "It looks like we made a breakthrough". That is what they thought in 1968, and they were disappointed. Six long frustrating years of dealings with the Department of Indian Affairs followed, while their housing and health deteriorated.

The new minister has a heavy responsibility to assure that these meetings are designed to lead to the resolution of problems, and not just another mechanism to diffuse their impact. If this should occur Indians will seek other avenues through which to express their frustrations. This could lead to confrontations and violence which none of us want to see.

No amount of tinkering with executive and constitutional mechanisms can substitute for political leadership. Let the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) show us that he has the political will to tackle substance and not mere form.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Duclos for an address to His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset of my remarks that this auspicious occasion does indeed provide an honour and a privilege for me as a citizen of our great and growing nation. In my view, there is no single greater honour that can befall a native of his country than to be given the opportunity to rise and speak—without fear or favour—before the duly elected governing assembly consisting of his fellow countrymen from all parts and corners of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, it is an event which neither I, nor my family, nor I trust the electors of the riding of Scarborough West who elected me on July 8 last, will ever forget.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, with my particular political and community background, this occasion represents to me the focal point of the democratic process in our country in action.

I should like first to offer my congratulations through you to the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) on his election to the most distinguished and historic post that he occupies as chairman of this assembly. As a new member of parliament, I was most impressed with the background to this important office that was provided by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during his nomination address, and by the distinguished member from Sudbury in his speech of acceptance. In my view, Mr. Speaker, Canadians would be well served by an effort on the part of your office to publicize some of the interesting details and background of the significant role occupied in our governing process by the Speaker of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

To you, Mr. Speaker, member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), I offer my most sincere congratulations on your appointment as Deputy Speaker for another session.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) who, I am told, is the first woman ever to sit as Speaker of this House.

Her appointment is of particular importance to me for the hon. member represents the riding where, as a young Canadian of 22, I voted for the first time. That area is also the one where I was born and spent the first few years of my youth.

To the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne I want to express my congratulations for a job well done. I remember how in Montmorency, Quebec, where I lived for a while as a youth, I had considerable trouble in obtaining for my father the names of the candidates in the elections. I felt that, at the time, there was little information available on elections, especially federal.

● (1700)

Finally, Mr. Speaker, to the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I want to pay particular congratulations, not only for an inspiring speech made by a fellow new member but also on his election as a Canadian of a lineage that has played such an important part in building the fabric of our national society over these past 100 years, yet lies outside the area of the three main groups—French, English and North American Indian—that are so often assigned all the credit associated with the background of our great country. I refer to the Chinese element in our Canadian society, of which the hon. member has the distinction of being a direct descendant.

Speaking as a newly elected member of the Parliament of Canada, I want also to pay homage and show respect to two members of this House who, between them, have a combined term of service in our parliament in excess of 60 years. I refer, of course, to the dean of parliament, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and former Prime Minister of Canada and, if I may use the term, to the vice-dean and revered parliamentarian, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is one thing to be elected and re-elected to this House when representing the party that forms the government of the day; it is quite another story, I would suggest, to accomplish this feat over and over again when representing parties on the opposition side of the House. Mr. Speaker, the record of these two hon. members speaks for itself and in each case is an example of considerable significance to a newcomer such as myself.

I want to speak today in this debate on several issues that are of particular concern to me. The first of these relates to the state of our Canadian economy at this time as it affects the individual householder in my riding of Scarborough West. My constituents are, by and large, confused and concerned over the seemingly opposite economic trends that are developing in our Canadian society. On the one hand we are continuing to experience the seemingly insatiable thrust of the inflationary spiral which is producing such a significant effect on all householders, particularly on those who must rely on relatively fixed incomes or on incomes that are not subject to the same kinds of upward revisions generally assured to those members of the labour force who belong to well organized unions or other forms of employee associations. On the other hand we are seeing injected into this unpleasant and difficult situation the knowledge that our economy is no longer expanding at a rate to which Canadians have tended to become accustomed on a more or less regular basis, with some minor exceptions, since the days of World War II.

This is a most unusual and difficult problem. The hope is, obviously, that appropriate fiscal actions on the part of all levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal—coupled with natural corrections that will ultimately evolve in the marketplace, will suffice to see us through without serious dislocation of the existing economic framework that has been built up around our society over these past 30 years. Looking at the situation in realistic terms does, however, lead one to a legitimate concern as to just how long our Canadian and worldwide economies can continue at 1974 and projected 1975 rates of inflation before experiencing corrective measures whose ramifications might be felt over several years into the future.

There are no "instant pudding" solutions to the problem that we all recognize reaches well beyond the borders of Canada and North America and is clearly worldwide in nature. The important point, in my view, is that all levels of government, both within and without Canada, recognize the seriousness of the situation and attempt jointly to arrive at meaningful and carefully laid out short-term and long-term plans that will result in providing the kinds of leadership and direction in our national and international economic affairs that will, no matter how difficult to sell from a political point of view, impose on the governed those proposed solutions or courses of action that the best collective wisdom available will have deemed most appropriate under the circumstances.

In this regard, it is my view that what would be most inappropriate would be hastily contrived solutions, particularly those having strong nationalistic overtones and built-in long-term rigidities that are unable to respond quickly to continuing and ever fast-changing world circumstances. I say this because it is my belief that our worldwide society is beginning to experience, in economic affairs, the kinds of quick and sudden changes on an international level that we have been tending to experience of recent years in other aspects of our life. I seek and solicit leadership in this difficult economic environment from my national government under the direction of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

I feel that it is most appropriate and fitting, Mr. Speaker, that our own Minister of Finance should have been elected recently to chair the interim committee of ministers of the International Monetary Fund that has been established to undertake a penetrating, in-depth analysis of the free world economic environment. Hopefully, this will lead on a long-term basis to the kinds of recommendations on the national scene that will provide the basis for sound courses of action which will prove helpful to all Canadians. This is the kind of meaningful leadership that over the long-term will, in my view, bring credit to this government, to Canada and to Canadians as a whole.

In the short-term I ask simply that my government show a high profile of leadership in this difficult and delicate area that, while perhaps not satisfying all, will nevertheless provide the basis for shorter term courses or directions in our national economic affairs which will be in the best interests of the constituents of Scarborough West and of all Canadians, no matter where they reside. I am confident that this leadership has been indicated in the throne speech and has been further elaborated upon by the Minister of Finance in his recent speech before this House. In my view, this strong leadership will become even more evident over these next few months as progress is made in our thirtieth parliament.

The next issue on which I would like to speak is that of transportation. There are two aspects to this issue that are of particular interest to me—one is on the national level and the other on the local level. On the national scene, I welcome the positive and constructive measures that are being proposed to assist the average Canadian to be better served by the various forms of public transportation available to him. As one who has had the privilege of travelling with his family throughout a good portion of the more accessible areas of our country through the medium of holiday auto camping trips over these past several years, I am conscious of the continuing lack of adequate facilities to meet the real needs of today's automobile traveller. I am even more conscious of the disincentive that is built in for Canadians who wish to travel by means other than automobile within their own borders or those of North America.

In fact, there are real incentives, particularly in the area of air travel, for Canadians to vacation in those parts of the world that lie beyond the confines of the North American continent. We talk of the need to do innovative things in order to promote national unity in this country. We are willing to go to the extent of providing subsidies, in some instances, to encourage business activities within Canada and, at the same time, occasionally offer disincentives for those who may be conducting business activities which do not appear to be in the interests of promoting Canadianism. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is in our long-term interest to encourage Canadians of one creed or language, or of one geographic region or another, to get on the move and make a definite effort to meet neighbours to the east, west, south or north and, in the process, hopefully obtain a more comprehensive understanding of the wonders and potential greatness that nature and history have imbued on the geography and peoples which make up this great nation.

The other aspect of the transportation issue to which I would like to address myself, Mr. Speaker, relates to the local scene in my borough of Scarborough. The municipality of Scarborough today consists of some 375,000 residents and is the fifth largest municipality in Ontario. Current projections indicate a potential population of one million by the year 2000. This municipality, today at a half-built stage, may well become one of the largest single municipalities in Canada.

Contrary to the situation that prevails in so many North American cities today, my municipality is in the process of building a centre core, the showpiece of which is our fabulous new town centre opened by her gracious majesty Queen Elizabeth II during her Canadian visit in 1973. This municipality offers a unique opportunity to act as a testbed for a new national thrust in the field of urban transportation and over-all urban design, including parks and housing. I invite my good friend, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson), to look closely at the potential offered by Scarborough in considering new experiments that may now or in the future be conceived in relation to this aspect, bearing in mind, particularly, consideration of intermediate forms of transit that could supplement existing and proposed subway routes.

I would like to address myself to one more local matter relating to the municipality of Scarborough, and that relates to the continuing erosion of our beautiful Scarborough bluffs. These bluffs, Mr. Speaker, stretching as they do along the southern boundary of my riding and that of my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), where the land meets Lake Ontario, are a phenomenon not duplicated in many other areas of the world. The erosion problem is reaching alarming proportions, and in my view goes beyond a mere municipal or provincial problem. It is, I suggest, a national problem in that the geographic formation of the area involved is so picturesque and unique, and also in that these bluffs form the effective international boundary of the country, situated as they are on the north side of Lake Ontario.

I would request the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) and the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) to take steps to look into this particular problem and instruct their respective officers to make a report thereon which may, hopefully, lead to more concerted corrective action than has been evident to date.

The next point on which I wish to speak is that of over-all government expenditures. In the attempts over the past several years of elected representatives at all three levels of government to provide an increasing level of service in various facets affecting the lives of ordinary Canadians, we may have unwittingly moved closer and closer to a point, in terms of over-all government expenditures, that could be beyond the ability or willingness of the producing segment of our society to sustain. I believe this matter requires immediate attention at the three major levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal—and that the impetus for such action should emanate from our national government. I make this recommendation, Mr. Speaker, with no suggestion that we should not continue to evolve new, and improve old, areas of government services to the people. The point to be made is that the time may have come to consider substituting some new for old, rather than simply adding on in all cases.

I want to speak briefly on the matter of the provision of social benefits in monetary terms to the less privileged—economically speaking—members of our society. I commend efforts being made to re-establish the incentive to work philosophy in new areas of social policy as they are being conceived and developed. The work ethic continues to come under criticism, and in some cases attack, by certain minority groups within our nation. However, we have not as yet developed any other acceptable alternative to a healthy combination of the work-leisure ethic that assures an adequate level of over-all production of goods and services to meet both the direct needs of the Canadian consumer and his indirect or public-supported needs that are paid for out of tax revenues provided by the working segment.

While it is essential that our national government at all times lend a listening and sympathetic ear to all segments and individuals making up the fabric of our society, the parliament of Canada must at the same time ensure that close attention is paid to the encouragement and protection of the majority of the members of our society who, in the final analysis, must be relied upon to shoulder the combined burden of their own needs and the established needs of others.

As a Canadian who, by virtue of place of birth and later place of residence, has been fortunate to have had at least some exposure to both the French and English elements within our Canadian framework, I would encourage direct national government involvement in greater promotion of the teaching of both history and the French and English languages for future generations of Canadians—even if we were to start with those as yet unborn. In my view, these two essential aspects to a more mature understanding of the Canadian fact and way of life are at this point receiving completely inadequate attention at the more tender ages when learning experiences really get under way.

Particularly in the field of bilingualism, it is my opinion that we may be tending to place a little too much emphasis on the adult segment of our society, possibly at the expense of too little concentration at the earlier levels of youth where, in my view, it can be so much more effective over the long-term. I would go a step further and simply state that, in the interests of our developing nationhood, we may no longer be able to afford the luxury of avoiding some form of direction national thrust into the entire educational field in order to ensure the attainment of some basic pre-determined national objectives.

In concluding my initial remarks to this thirtieth parliament, and as a newcomer to the House of Commons, I would like to add my support to efforts that may be made over the next four years or so toward meaningful parliamentary and constitutional reform that will assist in more fully developing our national potential and leading to greater independence and a more mature interdependence among other nations of the world. As one small contribution to the matter of parliamentary reform, I would recommend consideration of changing the House rules in order to limit the time for the speeches in the throne speech debate to 20 minutes rather than the existing 30. This would have the beneficial result of enabling either a reduction from nine to six in the number of days currently allocated to this debate, or alternatively permitting some 50 per cent more members to speak and make their views known to this House and, through it, to the nation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to end my first speech in this House with the words I used to begin: it is truly an a honour and a privilege to express my views before so distinguished an audience.

[English]

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my contribution to the debate this afternoon, I am particularly pleased that Your Honour is in the chair. In offering my congratulations you will know I am most sincere when I say how pleased I am that the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) has been given this great responsibility. May I also tell the House that a few months ago I enjoyed sharing an open line program with him. I have questioned myself since whether that open line program was at all responsible for his assumption of this high office. To the Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), I give my congratulations on his accession to that particular post. If he does as well as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) in the last parliament, then he certainly will be doing a fine job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ellis: May I also congratulate the Deputy Chairman, the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), who seems quite capable of growing in that position, and the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), a gracious and charming Assistant Deputy Chairman, as I am sure all hon. members will agree.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ellis: Since the good people of Hastings have seen fit to send me to this august chamber for a second term, I want to relate some of my remarks to the type of area that the constituency of Hastings embraces. The county seat is Belleville, an urban area that is steadily growing and is moderately prosperous. New and expanding industries are coming in regularly. Just this past summer there was a new $4 million initial expansion. The amenities parallel the industrial growth, that is to say, there are parks, a river front, a new bay shore that all people are proud of, a museum, a playhouse, excellent facilities for senior citizens, and a bus service. It even has snow plowing and street lighting at least as good as any centre anywhere in Canada.

In addition, the rural area includes a number of small municipalities, each unique in itself, each with its own small industry contributing to the over-all economy of the area. In the very north, the community of Bancroft has a complete leathercraft industry that ships its products all over the world. Also uranium is produced there. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) knows that I have been continually after him for quite some time to step in and have this mine, which ran so well a few years ago, reopened. I applaud his statement regarding foreign ownership, but if the government wants to see some growth, this particular area can stand some assistance so it can begin producing now.

In the village of Marmora there is an iron ore production facility that is unique to eastern Ontario. It is being extended and could probably use some more support from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The village of Madoc is one of the largest suppliers, and up until a few years ago the only supplier, of talc in this part of Canada. The village of Tweed produces plywood. Those members of the House who are golfers might like to know that the laminated plywood golf heads on their clubs come from the grand old county of Hastings. Another municipality is Deseronto, which has various types of industries and a beautiful marina on the Bay of Quinte.

I mention all this because the government, particularly those on the treasury benches opposite, frequently forget that this is a part of Canada that pays a great amount of the tax that this country spends so readily. This is where its at. These people are the backbone, the very essence of Canadian life, and these are the people who are hurt when, in my opinion, the government makes stupid decisions to spend beyond their means instead of living within our budget. Furthermore, these people are made of sterner stuff; they are prepared to tighten their belts and to take strong measures. They are prepared to do so, but unfortunately the government is not.

In addition to those I have already mentioned, there are 20 or more hamlets, incorporated or otherwise, consisting of a dozen, 15 or 20 homes, that I should like to bring to the attention of the government. A couple of weeks prior to the opening of the House I travelled to every one of these small communities, and the story was always the same: they are as prosperous as the bungling and the mishandling of our natural resources by this government will allow.

There are little communities like Coe Hill and Shannonville, names that I am sure have never before been mentioned in this chamber, and I am not certain that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) had never heard of them before until this morning when I brought them to his attention. We are spending many millions of dollars on large buildings in the city of Ottawa and other centres across the country, but these little hamlets, with two or three rural routes running out of them, do need better post office facilities. Indeed, recent surveys show that they deserve better post office facilities, Mr. Speaker, but they are not getting them. I intend to press the Postmaster General until they do get them.

All hon. members have heard me brag about the rural areas in the county of Hastings and the fabulous cheese that comes from there. I have to admit, Mr. Speaker, to carrying literally tons of that cheese to Ottawa for consumption by various hon. members, and I have had no complaint about that which I have put in the lobby from time to time.

The throne speech mentions the need to increase food production. How can you increase food production when you cannot attract young people to the farms or keep them on the farms, with interest rates as high as they are now? The farm credit legislation is virtually useless to them; they are turned down for a number of particularly phony reasons. This is especially the case with an ambitious young man who because he wants to raise a family holds down two jobs: he is not qualified as a farmer in the eyes of the legislation.

How can you increase food production, Mr. Speaker, when the cow-calf operators are losing money at the rate they are today? They got into the business because the government gave them interest-free loans. Now the government tells them they have to pay the money back, and of course they do not have the money with which to repay the loans. My hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) the other day asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) if he knew just how serious this problem was. From the dairyman's point of view, even the animals that he used to sell at the end of their productive life and make a small profit on bring in only 12 to 15 cents a pound, a loss even at that.

How can you increase food production unless you give the dairy farmers a reasonable return on their investment? During the past year there was an increase in the subsidized price of milk. It was not enough, but it was not bad. Farmers at the time felt that if they tightened their belts a little they might be able to live with that price. But since then costs have again increased. What are we supposed to do? Are we to wait until next April 1, the very deadline, before we know exactly what the government's policy is going to be on milk subsidization?

The farmer really does not care whether milk is at $5 per 100 pounds or $10 per 100 pounds. As a matter of fact, he would probably far rather make 10 cents at $5 than lose 10 cents at $10. How can you increase food production? In fact, how can you expect anyone, young or old, to invest the $200,000 to $250,000 necessary without having some stability and some long-term policies in the field of agriculture? Farmers are businessmen. In my part of the country, particularly, this is so, and I think they are improving as businessmen. If you go back to 1954, one farm worker fed 16 of his fellow Canadians. In 1974, 20 years later, one farm worker feeds 56 of his fellow Canadians. Few other industries can cite such a record.

I want to make it clear, because I am not afraid to speak my mind on this matter, that I am not opposed to marketing boards. They are perfectly O.K. providing they are properly run. The Ontario Milk Marketing Board is an excellent case in point. It has brought stability to that industry. Its decisions are made in conjunction with the senior members of committees throughout the entire province, and only after it has consulted with all these people does it make decisions that affect the whole industry. This is not to say that some marketing boards are perhaps not run by idiots; but for the most part I am not opposed to marketing boards per se.

That might sound like I am a good friend of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). The minister and I agree on one point. He portrays himself as a friend of the farmer, and that is certainly how I stand. As a matter of fact the minister visited my riding recently, at which time I introduced him to the assembled people as not a bad egg. That seemed to suit the situation at the time.

The minister spoke at some length, and basically what he said was that he wants to improve conditions for the farmers. That is exactly what I want. At other times he has asked for increased food prices. There I think he is misguided. I do not think there is a need for increased food prices. One must remember that farmers are consumers as well as producers, and no farmer in this present day and age provides all his own food. They want lower prices, but they want to make a profit at lower prices.

Where is the stability this industry needs, and where are the long-term policies? Is the minister saying one thing in public and a different thing in cabinet? Is the cabinet not aware of the situation, or does it just not care what happens to the farmers in this country? Either way we are not getting the policies required.

This country will not have seen a crisis, whether it be energy or otherwise, until such time as it has experienced the crisis which will occur if there is no food available. If the problems that beset the dairy industry, the beef farmer, the turkey farmer, the egg producer and the grain farmer, with all our strikes, are not looked after now properly with long-term policies, mark my words, when the housewife goes into the market and cannot buy food for her family, then we will see a crisis. I do not care whether you blame the minister, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the cabinet or the civil service, I want them to get at these problems before it is too late.

On looking at the throne speech, I am afraid that the reintroduction of the Food Prices Review Board is not the way to solve these problems. This useless service is one that any housewife could perform. She knows how to go into the supermarkets and compare prices. You could send a group of students out and get exactly the same results. In my opinion the Food Prices Review Board serves only one purpose; it accepts and absorbs the scorn of which this government is properly deserving. These things are all related to the problems of my riding, and I am sure they are not much different from the problems faced by other ridings in southeastern Ontario.

For a moment I should like to move on to a subject in which I have some interest, and that is the Department of Public Works which, with its almost 9,000 staff and a budget of over $500 million, is one of the largest departments of government. It is also very vulnerable in that the end results of its endeavours are open to full public scrutiny.

In general the Department of Public Works is reasonably efficient and maintains a reasonably good image. Abuses and patronage in the department have been reduced greatly, if not completely abolished in recent years, but there are some changes and improvements which, in my opinion, are essential.

The main one is that budgets for space and service must become the responsibility of each government department, thus putting the Department of Public Works on an essentially revenue dependent basis. Much of the criticism of the department by the Auditor General involves space ordered but not used. There will be obvious economies in having the budget of each department reflect not only the amount of space but the quality and level of opulence. If the Department of External Affairs wants the biggest chocolate cake in Ottawa, the finest offices, then let us show this in its budget, and let that department be responsible for it. Let us not bury this in the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Acceptance of this proposal would allow one of the recommendations of the Glassco Commission which was never carried out to be implemented. That is to say, there should be a property accounting on both a quantitative and monetary basis, using proper accrual methods of accountings and recognizing depreciation when appropriate.

While answering to the Treasury Board in an over-all manner, all land and building services and management transactions must become the responsibility of the Department of Public Works. Keeping in mind current levels of involvement, there can be no justification for duplication of services such as found in the Department of National Defence, which still does a good deal of its own accommodations' seeking and construction.

In my opinion the Department of Public Works should be divested of all responsibility for a marine program. This is a duplication in fact and in function, if not in method of financing, of services provided by the Department of Transport, the National Harbours Board and the Departments of the Environment and Fisheries. If the Department of Public Works is called upon to act as contractor for these departments, that is fine, but it should not be the direct department responsible. The same can be said of the responsibility of the Department of Public Works for transportation programs. This is a duplication in fact and function of the services provided by the Department of Transport.

The fine arts program of the Department of Public Works, while admirable in concept, needs further refinement and greater input from public sources other than those directly involved. The public will not accept the use of rusty pipes and swiftly deteriorating free forms of plastic as art forms.

Under careful supervision greater use can and should be made of builder-proposal types of construction to reduce building costs and the parallel overhead costs encountered within the department.

With these few remarks about what I think is a very important department within the government, let me say I look forward to the thirtieth parliament with perhaps a bit of trepidation, but also with a good deal of determination on my part to make it work.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the population of the constituency of Chambly, I would like to congratulate you for having accepted the position of Speaker to which you have been appointed by this House. I would also like to congratulate my two colleagues who moved the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. members for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) and for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee). I believe that the quality of their speeches demonstrated that the contribution of the young members can be both serious and effective in this House.

I would now like to deal with the measures outlined in the Speech from the Throne and particularly with those to fight inflation. I am sure that all the members of this House recognize the need to protect adequately and effectively the most needy, all those who cannot protect themselves against inflation, and I am thinking about the senior citizens, the pensioners, the sole supports of families. Finally, there are those who, because they do not belong to a union or an association of some kind, cannot face the disastrous consequences of inflation. The government has clearly shown its intention to act in this area by implementing measures such as regular increases in old age pensions based on the cost of living, the increase of veterans' pensions and other measures already mentioned. Another group which we should seriously consider is the middle class which must often bear the heaviest financial burden of all these measures that are implemented to help those in need. To this effect, Mr. Speaker, I believe that our government will act to better distribute the cost of all these measures so that those who are already well of in our society will pay the greater part of the cost of these new policies that will have to be put forward to ensure a better redistribution of the wealth of this country.

For the middle class this government intends to make financial help available under its housing policy to reduce the cost of land and promote development, to help directly new owners through increased assistance to buyers of moderately priced housing who have not owned a home before, and also through initiatives to urge lending institutions to accommodate particularly those buyers who can afford only a small down payment.

Another area, Mr. Speaker, in which this government will act firmly will surely be the food area because it affects Canadians the hardest. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) will be the main artisans of that program since it will be a matter of monitoring excessive price increases in that area of the economy.

Another step mentioned in the Speech from the Throne is help to the small and middle businesses to increase our output. That program is most commendable because, however spectacular it might be at times to announce investments of the order of several million dollars and the creation of hundreds of jobs, it must not be forgotten that the present economic structure of this country is based first and foremost on small or middle businesses. It is only by ensuring the help required for its development that we can consider setting up a solid long term economy. To promote help for small and middle businesses we must first define what is a small businessman to be able to really understand his problem.

It must be kept in mind that a contractor with some fifty or a hundred employees used to be just a craftsman. Also that this craftsman who has become a medium-sized employer has often seen his business develop in spite of himself or without any control over its development.

Therefore, faced with his enlarged business, this contractor is often helpless when he has to perform some specialized work to ensure a smooth operation. Everybody agrees on that, but not on the means to meet those needs. The formula of assisting those contractors by increasing our public servants is quite questionable. I do not think it is the best way. I believe we should follow the example of Quebec which encouraged a few months ago, through the Minister of Industry, Trade, and Commerce, (Mr. Gillespie), the regrouping of some fifty contractors who will pay for collective specialized services.

The advantage of such a system, which already exists in a number of countries including France, is obvious. In France, this system proved highly successful, for it involved the regrouping of over 4,000 French businesses; after seven years they set up their own bank, the third largest in France. I feel this is an example to be followed. This system which proved successful should be applied here, for it has this advantage: both the small businessman and his firm are under the constant supervision of technicians they have hired and who, therefore, are their employees. So, they are not bothered, they do not have to spend much time on this type of work because it is a time-saving service for which they pay.

There are in our ridings some people—I know hundreds of them in mine—who, after starting as mere welders, found themselves, after a few years in business, faced with cost accounting productivity and general administration problems.

As for multinational corporations, a recent survey has shown that to carry out those duties, an average of 23 university graduates were hired. The small contractor, who must also meet those requirements, has surely not the means to incur those costs.

Too often, we deal with the small or medium enterprise as technocrats without ever having stood on an oil-stained cement floor or been in a place where some wood shavings were flying around.

It is easy for a recent university graduate who has no idea of an eventual loss to give to the contractor all the required good advice. However, since he has never experienced the problem, too often the contractor is frustrated by those entirely theoretical suggestions difficult to apply.

I will give you, Mr. Speaker, an example of that type of concern. I am referring to all those undertakings where today the craftsman becomes a businessman.

This businessman certainly needs specialized services, but he does not need to be told that he is unable to run a business, because he is an expert in his field of activity, he is a self-made man and one that should be respected.

There is another problem facing the small or average business, namely to find external markets. To do so, there again, the assistance of a number of government employees is offered. This service is rejected by the small or average business. The entrepreneur cannot, owing to his small volume of business or his limited production capacity, meet the demand of the external market.

In any of these two cases, one is looking for an example, for a course of action. I apologize for always quoting Quebec as an example, but the Department of Industry and Commerce has achieved some exploits in this field by grouping for exterior market purposes five or six competitors in a given sector. The lumber industry, in the Victoriaville area more especially, represents one of the fine achievements of the Quebec government. Its five or six competitors have met and, with the help of experts of their choice, they have succeeded in getting most interesting contracts on the foreign market, without for all that hindering the normal growth of their business or, as a consequence, that of their development. These are spheres of activities, Mr. Speaker, where I am sure, the government will know how to intervene with tact so as to increase the share accruing to the small and medium undertakings and thus keep this sector in good health, since their good condition will evidently provide us with an economy much more healthy, much less subject to vast monopolies and much more stable. This opens fields of activities where employees and employers are much closer and, in my opinion, in promoting this economic sector, we will be able to avoid conflicts such as the one we were compelled to solve recently.

Other very timely measures are put forward in the Speech from the Throne among which those proposed by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) who deserves special commendation for the way he has been handling his department since he took on as minister. Often in the past ministers of Transport were almost entirely concerned with rate increases, trying to balance such increases like real tight-rope walkers. The present Minister of Transport turned away from such a narrow attitude that has little long term efficiency; he looked at the very philosophy behind our transport policies, and so came up with the results briefly stated in the Speech from the Throne. It is essential in my belief that all parts of this great land be connected together, so that natural resources may be developed more easily in the most remote areas as the Northwest Territory, James Bay and so forth. This the minister understood, as I hope all members will indeed.

Moreover, I am sure that if we improve the transportation policy, we will be able to ensure a better balance in our economic development in every area of western as well as of eastern Canada and therefore enjoy a more even development than the one we know at the present time. Especially as regards the constituency of Chambly as well as the southern shore population as a whole, I believe that the Minister of Transport will be able to give us more details on the methods required to promote the development of public transportation in those suburban communities.

The constituency of Chambly already has on its territory the substructure required for the establishment of express trains such as the Toronto Go transits. We are longing for the planning and implementation of such a policy, that should not be long in coming, I am sure. Already the hon. members for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) and Laprairie (Mr. Watson) expressed their desire to offer a united front so that all our southern shore municipalities can be connected as soon as possible by these trains to that nerve-centre, Montreal, where a great portion of the people from cities such as Beloeil, Saint-Bruno, Saint-Hubert, Boucherville and others, are working. It is surely not by tying up millions of dollars for highway substructure that we will finally solve the transportation problem in an area such as ours.

The creation of an express train service will also enable us to solve the inter-city transportation problem between the southern shore municipalities. For instance, the Chambly-Saint-Jean stretch can be covered within 10 minutes by car, whereas by using the present public mode of transportation, the same journey to and fro requires 4½ hours. In 1974, that is unacceptable.

Mr. Speaker, considering the critical problem of public transportation, various levels of government have already examined that question. For more than three years now municipalities have been laying claims before the provincial government, which did not remain indifferent, on the contrary. It is already carrying out studies to determine the real needs and suggest better solutions. Considering the federal government's willingness to do something in that field also, I would subscribe to an increase of exchanges between the various levels of government, so as to achieve a better concertation of measures.

And I am convinced that the Minister of Transport knows this and that he will do everything to promote the necessary dialogue which will bring on the implementation of solutions as rapidly as possible.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, taking into consideration the benefits that my colleagues from the north shore of Montreal are reaping with Mirabel and all the development which stems from it, we on the south shore where industrial development is also going very well have another concern, and it is a concern shared by all the population of Chambly, it is that of environmental and pollution problems. The area that I represent is certainly one of the most historic of our country, the Richelieu river having always been a corridor which has put its stamp on our history. To put a greater accent on this area and also to make it better known to Canadians, the government of Quebec, through their planning and development bureau, have made a study on tourist development in the valley of the Richelieu river. The riding of Chambly has one of the richer inheritances. We have but to think of Fort Lennox, the Chambly canal, Fort Chambly, all the little churches which look out on the river such as Saint-Marc, Saint-Antoine and Saint-Denis and which were the authentic witnesses of the most important events in our history. Nothing must be omitted, Mr. Speaker, that could favour the promotion of these historic sites so that they might be better known by all Canadians. If we sometimes try to instill pride into the hearts of our young Canadians, they need only visit my area and they will easily find this kind of motivation.

Besides, this area has a most interesting geographical aspect. And this is why integrated touristic development of the shores of the Richelieu is required so that we might keep, near to Montreal, all the green spaces required for the leisures of a population who is too often tempted to go to the United States or elsewhere, while, right on their doorstep, all of nature's beauties are available for their enjoyment and this, without costing fantastic sums of money. To achieve this, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Canadian government to consider the possibility of reaching a supplementary agreement with the government of Quebec so as to see to it that the recommendations of the PLURAM study may take effect.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would once more like to tell hon. members how proud I am to represent an area like mine, whose population is most dynamic. It will always be an honour and a challenge for me to be worthy of my task of representing the riding of Chambly.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has graciously completed his remarks in somewhat under 20 minutes. Perhaps we could call it six o'clock and resume at eight o'clock with the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco).

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, in making my maiden speech in parliament I think my feelings at this moment, and the feelings of many other members who in the past rose to their feet for the first time, might best be described by verse 25, chapter 3 of the Book of Job which reads:

> For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me, and that which I was afraid of is come unto me.

First, I should like to join the host of other members who have voiced their sincere congratulations on your appointment. We realize that the appointment carries considerable responsibility, a responsibility which I believe will be exercised both with fairness and dispatch.

With reference to the Speaker and his appointment, his seeming reluctance to approach the Speaker's chair is, of course, steeped in tradition and history. I think all members of this House can offer the assurance that the Speaker's person will remain intact throughout this thirtieth parliament.

I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) not only for moving the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne but for the honour which he has brought to his family and his constituents.

All hon. members, and those from British Columbia particularly, share with pride the honour conferred upon the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) who seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I believe the hon. member is the second member of parliament of Canadian Chinese descent to be elected and he must, I suspect, be at once proud and humbled by the experience.

As you are aware, Madam Speaker, I represent the riding of Kootenay West in British Columbia and in describing its beauty, its attributes and its people, I can best summarize by describing my private philosophy in the recent election campaign. It was really quite simple—if I win, I win, and I shall have the opportunity to represent a wonderful group of Canadians, my constituents, and the opportunity to work with them and for them. If I lose, then I still win, for I will have much more time and greater opportunity to enjoy the beauty of my riding and the fellowship of its people.

Kootenay West riding is bordered at the south by the 49th parallel, to the east by the Purcell Mountains, to the west by the Cascades and the Monashee Mountains, and its northern extremity lies just south of Revelstoke and the Rogers Pass highway.

It is a riding of beautiful mountains and lakes, rivers and streams, some of whose names will have a sad but familiar ring in this House. I refer of course to the Columbia and the Kootenay Rivers, to the Arrow and Kootenay Lakes. The economic base of Kootenay West is its natural resources of water, minerals and timber, as well as the highly productive agricultural area surrounding the city of Creston. Some of our communities have names that ring loudly in the early history of mining in British Columbia. I refer to such places as Rossland, Trail, Nelson, New Denver and Silverton, Salmo and Ymir, Kaslo and Lardeau and the ghost town of Sandon.

Some names reflect the influence of our native peoples, such as Kootenay, the name of the riding, and Monashee, a mountain range. Still other names are a mirror of earlier times when the Russian people referred to as the Doukhobors moved into Kootenay West—names such as Poupore and Ootischenia.

Kootenay West and its communities have contributed much to the social and economic wealth of Canada. While many of its constituents are of Anglo Saxon descent, we have a large and valued representation from ethnic groups of Italian, Russian and Japanese descent. All of them contribute a great deal to the social betterment of our riding.

Kootenay West has produced such champions as Nancy Greene from Rossland, and the Trail Smokeaters, twice world hockey champions. Trail, I might add, was the founding city for the organized movement of boys' minor hockey, and the Kootenays have produced several champion hockey players.

Trail itself is the home of one of the largest, if not the largest, non-ferrous smelter in the world, and its wealth of experience and knowledge in metallurgy has contributed much to the scientific community. Cominco has also contributed much to the financial wealth of the riding and Canada, while its workers have donated time and energy in many different ways for the betterment of various communities.

In recent history we have been honoured by the presence in the riding of two prime ministers, and the man who should have been the third prime minister. I refer first to the visit in 1958 by the then prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

On that occasion I had the privilege of chairing a large political rally addressed by the right hon. member. I recall it as though it were yesterday. The prime minister was well into his speech when he was interrupted by four or five unfortunate women, referred to as Freedomites, who had stripped naked to protest I know not what. The right hon. member for Prince Albert rose to the occasion and said: "I have seen more than that back in the homestead in Saskatchewan", and continued his address.

In 1968 we were honoured by the visit to Castlegar by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). More recently, during the last election campaign we were again honoured by the visit of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who visited Nelson and contributed significantly to my election.

While nearly all the peoples of Kootenay West have contributed much to the social, economic and historical betterment of the riding, there are a few whom I should like to single out at this time. I am sure there is not a veteran member of this House who does not remember the "Squire of the Kootenays". I refer, of course, to the member of parliament who sat in this House from 1945 to 1968, the late Bert Herridge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: He was always a gentleman, always concerned for and about his constituents, and always respected by people of every political persuasion. Mr. Herridge contributed much to the proceedings and debates in this House, with logic, persuasion and humour. Mr. Herridge served during the first World War in the 54th Kootenay Battalion and was wounded in action. One evening when the troops were to stand down, a young lieutenant, towering over the enlisted ranks, instructed Mr. Herridge and his fellow soldiers to dig some pits for their own protection. For ever after, as Mr. Herridge once complained in the House, the lieutenant was always a step up the ladder above him.

He was, of course, referring to another native son of Kootenay West who also will be remembered by the veteran members of this House—a man who was born in Kaslo, who served his country, along with many others from Kootenay West, with distinction during World War I with the 54th Kootenay Battalion. I refer to the Hon. Howard Green, Privy Councillor and Queen's Counsel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Green was a member of parliament from 1935 to 1962 and culminated a long and distinguished political career as secretary of state for external affairs.

I should like also to mention the name of the last Conservative from Kootenay West to represent that riding. Mr. Billy Esling served the riding faithfully and well for 20 continuous years from 1925 to 1945.

The last member of parliament to represent Kootenay West was Mr. Randolph Harding. Perhaps few people realize that Mr. Harding, upon his election to parliament, had already served as an MLA in the British Columbia legislature for 23 years. Until his defeat in the last election, he had a record of nearly 30 years in public service, an indication of his dedication. He was especially concerned with matters pertaining to the environment and was very knowledgeable on this vital subject.

● (2010)

Finally, in describing Kootenay West, I wish to quote from the Parliamentary Guide of 1973. The final sentence on page 368 in the preamble to the description of ridings says:

> So the two Kootenays were not counted as existing for political purposes.

Surely the Prime Minister himself must have written that sentence, for it so perfectly describes the long standing attitude of the government towards Kootenay West and its people. It is a history of tax whom you can for what you can, but give as little as you can in return.

I now wish to make passing reference to the Speech from the Throne, what it says, and what it fails to say. On occasions too numerous to mention the Leader of the Official Opposition has taken the government to task for its well demonstrated and documented inability to reduce inflation. He has reasoned, implored and debated, and challenged the government to take action. In this House, on November 20, 1967, the Leader of the Opposition said:

> After rereading the minister's budget speeches in the last couple of years, in the spring of 1966 and in December, 1966, as well in the Spring of this year, I have to say that the government has been far too complacent about the dangers of inflation. The government has known for some time that an inflationary situation was developing. In fact, the minister himself referred as long ago as the spring of 1966 to the need for restraints.

Again on the same day the Leader of the Opposition quoted the Liberal Premier of Saskatchewan, who had said in reference to inflation: "Our own party as the government must accept responsibility for the primary blame." Now, some nine years later, a period longer than it took the allies to wrestle the Nazis to the ground, I sit in this House and listen to an exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister wherein the Prime Minister disdainfully declares he is still about to wrestle inflation to the ground.

Surely the Prime Minister and his government are suffering from the affliction of having been too long in office. It is usually found in the aged; We call it muscular atrophy. I state unequivocally that this government has not developed or declared a sound program to combat inflation but, rather, by continued increases in spending has failed to set an example for Canadians to follow.

If the government is not prepared to listen to the opposition, perhaps it will gear itself to listening to that source of the voice of the people outside parliament. I refer to the editorial pages of the nation's newspapers. Surely the government has the capacity to read and digest the contents of the editorial pages. Surely the government must be aware that not for months but for years the editors of the national newspapers have demonstrated their verbal indignation over the inaction of the federal government and its failure to take a positive and constructive stand on the number one issue facing this nation.

I honestly wonder how the Prime Minister can now summon the courage to face this house if he knows that the United States president has, in 60 days, set out to accomplish what the present government has not had the intestinal fortitude to attempt in nine years. Of course spending is necessary, but the point is how, where, when and on what. Certainly the government has not suffered from any largesse to Kootenay West. There has been none.

When, in 1968, a flood disaster struck the city of Trail and caused millions of dollars damage to its downtown business area and to the homes of many residents, the government was not moved to assist in any meaningful way. Its attention and our dollars went to such things as refitting and then scrapping HMCS "Misadventure".

I fail to note in the Speech from the Throne much reference to Bill 22, recently adopted in Quebec. When the Prime Minister addressed this House on September 15, 1968, he said in part that English speaking Canadians must not allow a single incident to cause them to forget the basic principle that linguistic equality requires all provinces to recognize the right of parents to have their children educated in the official language of their choice.

I agree with what the Prime Minister said in 1968. Obviously he no longer agrees with himself. Since he seems somewhat vague on the subject of Bill 22, is the Prime Minister suggesting by his silence a similar bill for all provinces?

Again, with reference to the Speech from the Throne, I note the intent of the government to renew the mandate of the Food Prices Review Board. I take it that this is a form of dentistry wherein the government will reline the gums but forget about the dentures. That is about all the dignity this mandate deserves.

On the positive side I am pleased to see the government adopting policies from my party, policies that were clearly spelled out by the Conservatives in the recent campaign. I refer to increases in pensions, war veterans' allowances—although the government has failed to say how large these will be—and in allowances for spouses aged between 60 and 65 of old age security recipients. The latter policy is a modified version of our party's avowed policy.

I am pleased to note that the government will make special efforts on behalf of individuals and specific groups who are ready and willing to work but tend to experience particular difficulty in finding regular employment. There are perhaps thousands of physically handicapped Canadians who hope the government is making reference to them. This also applies to many of our unskilled native peoples.

All Canadians are awaiting with interest the development of the government's new transportation policies. Certainly in Kootenay West we are interested. There is an early need for a municipal airport at Creston and Kaslo, and the extension of an existing runway at Nelson. We are pleased that the government is currently upgrading and paving the Trail municipal airport at Columbia Gardens. We have been fighting for this airport improvement for 20 years.

[Mr. Brisco.]

The people, business and industry of Kootenay West are also interested in the government's rail policy. As the government has said, "Transportation is vital to Canada, providing for the flow of people and goods that link and bind our regions".

Under existing policies of the Canadian Pacific Railway, rail, truck transport and telecommunication links are being steadily severed. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the minister responsible for regional economic development have heard or will shortly hear from me on this subject. It seems more than passing strange that an area such as Kootenay West, an area with an unfavourable economy, an area that qualifies for assistance under the DREE program, should suffer from rail line abandonment and diminished truck transport service at the hands of one company.

The government attitude toward environmental concerns is amply demonstrated by the six lines of vague rhetoric it devotes to the subject in the Speech from the Throne. Surely the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) is deserving of more attention. My specific concern and the concern of all Canadians, especially those on the Pacific coast, is the do-nothing attitude of the government toward the tanker route from Alaska to Cherry Point, Washington.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) did this country a disservice by saying from the beginning that the government would do something, because the government did nothing. Surely the demand for a double bottom on these oil tankers is not too much to insist upon. Indeed, it is the least the government should insist upon. I note that the government, according to the Speech from the Throne, has initiated a series of consultations with the principal groups in our society, including provincial governments. I note that the government will ask these groups how productivity can be increased. That is a wonderful idea. I urge the government to address the question of productivity improvement directly to the Minister of Mines for British Columbia.

The various taxes, supertaxes and royalties and other controls now in effect, or going into effect in British Columbia, have sharply reduced risk capital in B.C. mining ventures, and mining companies have virtually abandoned the province in the exploration for new mines. I urge the Minister of Finance to study seriously the economic effects of raw resources taxation introduced by some provinces before he even gives thought to additional and heavy federal taxation that would disallow provincial mining taxes from being deducted before federal taxes are calculated. Surely the mining industry will stagger under the load. Is this the productivity the government seeks to encourage?

As a new member of parliament it has been my privilege to observe the exchanges of question and debate for the first time. I have been depressed by the fact that some ministers of the government show little or no concern for the questions, and are flippant in their replies.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Do not be surprised.

Mr. Brisco: Is this really what Canadians expect from us?

At the same time I am heartened and encouraged by the genuine effort of some ministers who give every indication of answering questions with sincerity.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Name one.

Mr. Brisco: I would like to digress from the main text of my maiden speech for a moment and appeal to the government for specific assistance. If Kootenay West had what its constituents consider to be their fair share of government support, it would not be necessary to make this appeal. But Kootenay West has suffered from financial disparity for too long.

I appeal to the Minister of Transport to pay particular attention to the transportation problems of this riding, and I urge the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) to assist us specifically in the development of secondary industry. We have the workers, the electricity, the manpower and other essentials for the development of skill-intensive non-polluting secondary industry. Only through the untiring efforts of people in the community have we been able to attract any secondary industry.

Just as eastern Canada was at one time a rural area which later became industrialized, so also Kootenay West is a rural area which should have the benefit of further industry in order to establish a sound economic balance in the riding.

We do not ask for, nor do we want, a Los Angeles type of development, with homes and factories stretching to the horizons. What we do want and what we so desperately need, is employment for the sons and daughters of the people of the riding. Fifty per cent of these young people find it necessary to seek employment elsewhere. This, Madam Speaker, I am sure you will agree, is not adequate by today's standards.

While it is true that in this, my first address to the House of Commons, I have reflected doubts and concerns about the government, perhaps all of us can take heart and gain some measure of assurance from Proverbs, Chapter 11, verse 14:

> Where no counsel is, the people fall: but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, my first reason for wanting to participate in this debate is that the very early paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne make appropriate reference to the more than 2,000 Canadians who are giving dedicated service in peacekeeping duties in Cyprus and the Middle East. This evening I would like to enlarge on that statement. I would also like to speak about the other important tasks being performed by members of the Canadian Armed Forces. In particular, I would like to talk about the way in which we must finance and pay for the work being done by the armed forces, especially in these days of very high prices and rising costs.

I am certain that Mr. Speaker, of all people, will appreciate the importance of peacekeeping because he performs that function in this House every day. It is as a peacekeeper in the House of Commons that I wish to congratulate the Speaker on his election to high office, and also to congratulate the Deputy Speaker and you, Madam Speaker, on your appointments.

Mr. Baldwin: We haven't opened up hostilities yet.

Mr. Richardson: We have a peacekeeper for when we do.

It is several days since the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) moved and seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, but I recall their words very well. I must say that when the hon. member for Vancouver East was speaking about western Canada, he expressed some thoughts that are very close to my heart. I believe with him, however, that none of us are in this House as easterners or westerners. I think the mover and seconder of this address demonstrated very clearly that they can defend and argue articulately for their own areas, but they both do so as Canadians.

The Speech from the Throne speaks about the more than 2,000 members of the Canadian Armed Forces who are performing dedicated service in peacekeeping duties for the United Nations in the Middle East. It forcibly reminds us that casualties are still continuing. It is true that the 11 men who were killed and the 19 who have been wounded constitute the highest cost that Canada has paid in its peacekeeping role.

When a Canadian soldier is shot and killed in his jeep, for many it is a news story or a statistic. Just a few weeks ago I went to Rimouski to attend the funeral of Jean-Claude Berger. I must say that when you meet his mother and father, his brothers and his little sister, and particularly when you learn how the people of Rimouski felt about him as an individual, you realize that his death is not a statistic, but a measureless human tragedy.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I want to point to the hon. members of this House that when I attended the funeral of Private Berger at Rimouski, I expressed my most sincere condolences to Mr. and Mrs. Berger, conveying as well those of all hon. members on their behalf.

[English]

Despite the tragic human loss of this kind, and despite the other costs and difficulties of peacekeeping, I remain convinced that Canada as a nation and the Canadian armed forces have an important and useful role to play in supporting the concept of peacekeeping and in improving the practical methods of peacekeeping.

Whenever the problems and apparent failures are being discussed, I always find it useful to remind ourselves that peacekeeping is a very new concept in the totality of human history.

For centuries men in uniform have left their countries for only one purpose, to fight. Today some men in uniform leave their countries not to fight but to try to prevent fighting. I like to believe that we may be at the beginning of a new era. It may be a long time until there are more men in uniform committed to preserving peace than there are men in uniform committed to war, but that is the distant goal we must work toward. I believe it is a goal that is attainable by an enlightened people.

We should realize that because of what the Canadian armed forces are doing in a practical way and because of the moral leadership that Canada is giving to the idea and concept of peacekeeping, we could now be on the early part of mankind's long journey toward the end of war.

It is against this background of my belief in the peacekeeping concept, and my respect for what our personnel are doing in Cyprus and the Middle East, that I am looking forward to being there in just three weeks from now. I have visited our troops in Cyprus once before.

Mr. Forrestall: Why don't you take the committee with you so they too can see?

Mr. Richardson: When there is an opportunity to do that, we will take the committee. I expect to be questioned by the committee on my return. I hope to see firsthand the living and working conditions being experienced by our personnel. In particular, I want to be able to make some judgment about the number of personnel we should have in the Middle East working with the United Nations, especially in Cyprus. As the House knows, we doubled the number of personnel in Cyprus this summer on the understanding that this was a temporary commitment.

● (2030)

Mr. Forrestall: It has been temporary for ten years or more.

Mr. Richardson: Important as peacekeeping is, it is, of course, by no means all that we have to do in the Canadian Armed Forces. Our first task and our central responsibility are nothing less than to defend Canadian independence and sovereignty. Just as one example, a few days ago in this House the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) spoke in glowing terms of the assistance that he had received from the Canadian Armed Forces in identifying foreign fishing vessels.

Mr. Forrestall: Don't get off on that nonsense. How are they going to do it now with no fuel and no money to buy fuel?

Mr. Richardson: I will come to that in the course of what I have to say.

Mr. Forrestall: Tell us about fuel costs and money for next year.

Mr. Richardson: Next to the defence of our sovereignty, our second important task is to participate with the United States in the air defence of North America. This is a vital duty, and I am certain that the hon. member knows that some of our most highly trained personnel are involved in this task, using some of our best equipment. Here again, when we think of Canadian sovereignty, if it were not for Air Defence Command, if an unidentified aircraft flew into Canadian air space we would have to call on the Americans to locate and identify it. That would clearly be, I believe, a loss of sovereignty and independence on the part of Canada.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. Forrestall: Are you getting the 104's replaced?

Mr. Richardson: In the fullness of time we will have everything replaced.

Mr. Crouse: Even the government.

Mr. Richardson: But some of our equipment does not need replacing. I do not know whether the hon. member has had the privilege of flying in a 104.

Mr. Forrestall: You know damn well I have.

Mr. Richardson: Then he knows it is a great aeroplane and he should be proud of the fact that it is flown by Canadians.

The third clear responsibility and important task of the Canadian Armed Forces arise out of our belief in the concept of collective security and our commitment to play a useful and important part in the NATO alliance. I have visited our troops in Europe, and I am personally convinced that if the occasion arose they would give a very good account of themselves on the ground and in the air, an account of themselves well above their numbers because of their capability and individual training. They are career soldiers who cannot be measured just by the numbers that are in place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: These, Madam Speaker, are the four essential, central tasks of national defence. The serious question that is facing the government and the Armed Forces is how we can perform all of these important tasks effectively and adequately in times of rapidly rising costs. All of our costs, particularly our aviation fuel and heating fuel, have risen so substantially that we are really not able to carry out all of the tasks even within the increased budget under which we are operating this year.

There is sometimes talk about the way that the government has cut the defence budget. I think the first thing that should be made clear—and I started to make it clear in response to a question a short time ago—is that the defence budget is not being cut.

Mr. Forrestall: What nonsense.

Mr. Richardson: It is being increased.

Mr. Forrestall: What is the real increase in goods and services last year over the previous year?

Mr. Richardson: Let me give the hon. member the facts. Last year, fiscal 1973-74, our expenditures were $2,231 million, just more than 10 per cent of all the money that the federal government spends. This year, fiscal 1974-75, the national defence budget will be increased by more than $275 million, for a total of more than $2,500 million. This means that we will have more than $100 million of supplementary expenditure over and above the 7 per cent annual increase that was approved in the formula last year.

In light of these figures it is simply not true to say that the government is reducing the defence budget. I want to tell the House that it is not the government that is cutting back on defence spending; it is, as is known, inflation and rising costs that are preventing us from doing all we would like to do, even within a growing budget.

In looking for an answer to our problem I think it is necessary to study the breakdown of defence expenditures. They are in three main categories. The first is personnel costs, which simply means the cost of pay and allowances. The second is operating costs and maintenance costs, which means the cost of fuel, food, ammunition, and supplies of all kinds. The third is capital cost that is the cost of new equipment.

This year, speaking in approximate terms, it is important to grasp the fact that 67 per cent, or more than two thirds of the national defence budget was spent on personnel costs—pay and allowances; 22 per cent went for operating costs—fuel, food, ammunition and supplies; and 11 per cent was for new equipment.

It is my firmly held belief that, whatever our total expenditure may be, the current ratio between personnel costs, operating costs and capital cost is not the right ratio. In my judgment, we must spend a higher percentage of our total budget on new capital equipment and operations, and a lower percentage on personnel. I want to make it clear at this point that I believe this policy is designed to benefit the men and women who are now in the Canadian Armed Forces. Obviously it is also designed to increase our military capability.

I want to try to illustrate what I am saying, and I have to do this in a somewhat extreme way. Last year and the year before there were about 82,000 to 83,000 men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces. We could have had a force of 120,000, a force armed with clubs and baseball bats. They would not have been a very effective force. To take the other extreme example, one man in charge of a button that is connected to a series of missiles can control a big area of the world. So how is it possible to say that numbers of people is the yardstick, and that military capability depends on having 83,000 85,000 or any number of people? That is the real problem I want to make clear. If we are not talking about numbers of people, what are we talking about?

An hon. Member: Peacekeeping.

Mr. Richardson: No, peacekeeping is only one of four tasks. We are talking about military capability, and it is on that which we must really focus. As well as improving our equipment, and I have indicated we want to do that, we must reduce some of the commitments entrusted to the Armed Forces if we are to reduce numbers. General Dextraze has pointed this out on a number of occasions, and he and I are in complete agreement on this.

An hon. Member: That is not the way it is coming across.

Mr. Richardson: That is why I am speaking tonight, so it will be quite clear. General Dextraze and I agree that the Armed Forces are now over-tasked, and reduction in numbers inevitably means some reduction in tasks.

Let me make one other point. A reduction in the percentage of personnel costs as part of our total budget does not adversely affect the men and women now in the Armed Forces. In fact it does the opposite. The people about whom I am most concerned are the men and women now in the Armed Forces. What I intend and hope to do is to get more and better equipment, and more money to operate this equipment.

Mr. Forrestall: I wish you would. You can't even fly a helicopter safely any more because you do not have the money for training.

Mr. Richardson: Understandably there is some limitation in respect of the amount of money available. The only way we can improve the military capability and the conditions of the present members of the Armed Forces is to reduce the number of recruits taken in and put on the payroll. To state the equation in the simplest possible way —we are going to use the payroll that would have been used to pay someone not now a member of the Armed Forces to buy equipment and improve conditions for the people now in the Armed Forces.

We will have to make adjustments as we go along. Another point I want to make clearly is that in order to do this we will not be required to ask anyone to get out of the armed forces. We do not need to do that as we have 8,000 or 9,000 who, for one reason or another, mainly because of retirement, leave the Armed Forces each year. What is involved is simply a matter of adjusting the new flow. We can recruit 5,000, 6,000 or 7,000 and adjust our numbers based on the number of people we take in from the outside, and not on the number of people pushed out from the inside. This adjustment can be made easily and clearly to the benefit of the men and women now in the Armed Forces.

Mr. Forrestall: It still takes 200 men to run a ship and one man to drive a truck.

Mr. Richardson: In a word, our central objective is to improve our military capability. In my view this means that the Canadian Armed Forces must be "better and fewer". What we must aim at is an elite force made up of well fed, well equipped, well trained, well disciplined, well paid and well led and well motivated personnel. In other words, we need an elite force that is proud of the job it is doing for Canada, a force with a high morale, a force to which many more Canadians would be glad to belong. Regretfully we cannot achieve this overnight. We cannot achieve some of our objectives in a few months or perhaps in some cases in a few years, but at least we should recognize the concept and have the vision of the kind of Canadian Armed Forces that we want to build, and we should be working steadily toward that achievement.

I have tried tonight to speak about the great, essential and vital tasks of national defence. I have also tried to indicate the readjustment that may be necessary in order to achieve maximum military capability. Let me now conclude by adding another dimension to our thinking about defence expenditures.

When hon. members think about national defence and the taxpayers' dollars that go into it, they should understand that much more is done than the main tasks about which I have been talking. National defence is not only involved in protecting Canada, it is involved in a great deal more. The Canadian Armed Forces are involved in many specific ways, some of which I have just mentioned, in helping to improve Canada.

When a dollar of the taxpayers' money goes into national defence, taxpayers are really getting more than double benefit. The main tasks I have described are being performed. In addition the taxpayer is receiving a series of hidden or other benefits. The first one which comes to mind involves the whole area of educational and vocational training. Many people perhaps do not realize that the Armed Forces are the largest educational and vocational training institution in Canada.

Canada's armed forces are involved in training in 90 different trades including everything from welding, flying, cooking and teletype operations. Literally thousands of Canadian men and, I am glad to say, increasing members of women all across Canada are serving Canada better and also increasing their own standard of living. This is all for one reason; because they are trained in a skill in the Canadian Armed Forces. The cost of this training comes out of the national defence budget, so when we are talking about defence expenditures we must think about education. We are spending educational dollars as well as defence dollars.

I do not need to mention the great industrial benefits that flow from the national defence budget. In many parts of Canada industrial benefits flow directly from national defence expenditure. I could spend a great deal of time, as I am sure we all could identifying these in detail. Perhaps we do not do all things perfectly, but think of our contribution to our fisheries and the environment. We not only assist in the identification of oil slicks or ships dumping garbage in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, we actually have skilled personnel with special equipment to help clean up oil spills. So we are involved in protecting the environment.

The Canadian Armed Forces are also involved in the development of the north through the building of airports. We are involved in the operation of search and rescue. If we did not have a search and rescue capability in the Armed Forces we would be required to create one, which would probably cost a great deal more money than is now being spend for this purpose under the national defence budget. All these things represent benefits that flow from the defence dollar.

If we experience a flood, or a national disaster, such as the one in Honduras at the present time, the Canadian Armed Forces are there, ready and able to assist.

● (2050)

There are even such small things, relatively, as ceremonial events. If the Canadian people should wish an honour guard or a band, this is all provided out of our budget. Then there is our youth program, the cadets. We have also the physical fitness program, and our involvement with great sporting events such as the Pan-am games and the Olympic Games. The double benefit that the taxpayer receives for the defence dollar is not as widely realized as it should be.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. Forrestall: That is why you can spend more money and the taxpayers will accept it. It all goes back to them.

Mr. Richardson: That certainly is the case I am making. I appreciate the support from across the floor.

Mr. Forrestall: There is no support for your present position.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Speaker, since my time is running out I shall conclude simply by repeating that our four vital tasks are: protection of Canadian sovereignty, our participation with the United States in the air defence of North America, our work in defence security in NATO, and our work as a peacekeeping force. We not only perform those great tasks but also provide all these other benefits I have mentioned to the Canadian people.

We are improving Canada as well as protecting Canada, and I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, and fellow members of this House, that there is a group of men and women in Canada whose work means that they deserve even more respect than they have, and even greater appreciation than they receive. That group of men and women is made up of the dedicated and disciplined and hard-working members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Madam Speaker, since 1968 I have had the great honour of representing here in this House a well-informed, industrious and proud people, whose opinions, wishes and most legitimate aspirations I endeavour to reflect as faithfully as possible.

Spread out in no fewer than 47 municipalities, the people of my riding would dearly love to see their lot improved. They increasingly refuse to live like poors in the midst of abundance, wealth. For the most part, they live in villages, and those rural people know that public administrations, the federal government, do not concentrate their efforts in the right direction to help the people to be better off.

Hopefully, this our 30th Parliament should bear the stamp of innovations, of reforms appropriate to the needs of the times. We are going through extremely difficult and complex days. These times conceal a deep uneasiness from which could loom disastrous crises and catastrophies.

It is hardly the right moment to give as a pretext to our idleness the fact that an alarming international situation forces us to drift along with the world tide. Instead, we should strive to settle domestically our own problems with our own means. This 30th Parliament must respond quickly if it does not want to be swallowed up by social and economical crises that we could easily avoid if we had the courage to turn off from the beaten track.

Madam Speaker, without indulging in dark pessimism, I must admit that I do not believe this government is able to carry out successfully the tremendous work that is vested in it.

In 1968, the Canadian people as a whole believed for a moment that the new Prime Minister would introduce really new policies, through which his dream about a just society would materialize. Except for a few shy attempts at renovating, we have seen nothing, save legislation that often led to controversy, such as changes relating to the Criminal Code and concerning abortion and homosexuality, or still the all too notorious emergency measures of 1970.

After that, the Prime Minister's attitude changed. The cool and casual intellectual became a politician. Following his disappointment in the 1972 election, he even became a "political manoeuverer" and a demagogue. May I be permitted to prove these assertions with a brief analysis of the last election campaign.

Following the confusion that prevailed during the last Parliament, confusion resulting from the unquenchable desire on the part of our Progressive Conservative friends to launch an election, and maintained by reporters always on the lookout for new sensations, during summer, the die was cast, the people had to go through another election.

We expected to see in public a serious analysis of the economic situation, the suggestion of concrete solutions and the wish of the outgoing government to fill in certain gaps and face the inflation problems, the price spiral and the social injustice.

On the contrary, the Liberal strategists played vote-catching. We witnessed a backward propaganda game where trickery went alongside demagogy. The great defender of the worker's rights, the collaborator of Cité Libre, the swashbuckler of the Duplessis regime of the fifties, was being engulfed in petty stretches-of-roads politics and gut promises.

Madam Speaker, I was in my constituency during the election campaign where, in this day and age jets and satellites orbiting Venus, people were invited to see the train pass. Behind Margaret's charm and the little Trudeaus' innocence were deliberately hidden inflation, the extravagant price rise and unemployment.

The former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) came several times in the Champlain constituency and talked nonsense which often were within a hair's breadth of personal attacks, vulgar and pernicious comments.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) also came. More polite than his colleague from Saint-Maurice, he nonetheless stated that you had to be on the right side if you wanted to get grants, retaining walls and all the "goodies" promised by the Prime Minister in 1972.

That was a far cry from the just society of 1968! Making people believe that the government exists and administers only red ridings. Vote for Social Credit and you will get nothing! You must vote Liberal to get something. I said this during the election campaign and I am repeating it in this House; I challenge all members of the government to declare publicly in this House that nothing will be given to the riding of Champlain or to other opposition ridings under the pretext that only those who voted red are to be given any favours.

There follows one of two things, Madam Speaker: either favouritism is being openly flaunted as a policy or someone is a barefaced liar. The insults being flung at the people of this country are all the more inadmissible as the government administers with everyone's money and it is certainly not a favour when the people receive, in one guise or another, their own money. That is pure demagogy! I cannot put any faith in a government who gets elected by using such procedures.

During that time, the real problems are staying hidden. The government itself has created inflation. At first it was said there was inflation but it was not true. How could there be a lack of products when our country, overflowing with raw materials and offering all kinds of possibilities, had to deal with surpluses? Milk producers were penalized for producing more than their quota, grain producers were being paid not to sow, interest rates were allowed to rise to paralyze small industry, the number of unemployed was allowed to increase. There are the ill-conceived policies which sooner or later had to give way to inflation.

But adequate policies are still not being considered. The alleged explanation for the whole situation is that inflation is a world phenomenon.

Madam Speaker, that famous key phrase hides from people the possibilities of a government willing to solve the problems of production and consumption in Canada. I think that is laughing at people. Indeed how can we explain that there is trouble in Japan, Europe, or Africa? How can that stop trees from growing in Canada, cows from giving milk, grain from growing, and how can that empty our oil wells?

Madam Speaker, that is telling us things that are absolutely stupid since the true solutions will be found only when there will be a return to measures based on common sense, a policy based on a quiet elementary principle that this country must get down to work and produce everything people need. So it is not a matter of knowing what is happening in the United States, in Europe, or in South America. The question to be asked is rather the following, do we have what we need in our own country to produce the goods we need?

Madam Speaker, the answer to that question is the solution. We have come to the point where inflation is being created artificially. Madam Speaker, that is obvious. Many small dairy producers were forced out of business. Last week at least three beef producers in the riding of Champlain told me they were giving up their business because the income they derived from it is insufficient. If the government does not find anything to remedy that situation, in a year or two there will surely be a shortage of beef. Then that will really be inflation. That a country like Canada cannot produce all the beef, all the vegetables, all the sugar that we need, Madam Speaker, I think that this is scandalous.

And last week I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) if studies had been made to allow his department to help sugar production in Canada, to prevent us from falling into the hands of international monopolies. This is a very easy problem to solve in Canada. But, Madam Speaker, when at the same time we are told that if the price of sugar is increased twice, three times, four times and finally five times, this is due to the fact that sugar is controlled internationally. It is stupid to think this way when Quebec has so much land that could be used for sugar beet production. And only a few years ago, the producers of the Saint-Hilaire and Saint-Hyacinthe areas were not allowed to grow sugar beets. And last spring, in my constituency, the authorities simply refused to buy the products of maple syrup producers, so that some of them now have on their hands tons of unsold maple syrup. When a country like Canada, which can produce in abundance, must wait and see what will happen on the international scene, I say that its leaders are doing nothing to correct the situation and are irresponsible or that they profit from this situation.

Madam Speaker, it is time for us to see problems where they are, to find adequate solutions to these problems and to stop stirring up the population with all kinds of false problems.

The balance which must be achieved to prevent economic disasters has to assure adequacy of production for all the Canadian people. When one's country is larger than the United States and larger than all of Europe, with a population of only 23 million inhabitants, the mere reference to a shortage, to a scarcity of products, Mr. Speaker, is, and I say it once again, scandalous! We must at all cost rectify this situation.

Mr. Speaker, since the inception of Social Credit, our political philosophy has always been closely related to all current problems, for Social Credit is merely trying to take steps that will solve production as well as consumer problems. If at the present time, there is now a scarcity of products in some branches of human industry, we only need to promote production. However, it is not by allowing the interest rates to climb to 10, 12, 13, 14 or 15 per cent that we will accomplish anything, on the contrary. The more we will impede the development of small producers or of the small industry, the more acute will be the scarcity of products.

I cannot understand that all the governments which have been in office over the years can see only one weapon against inflation, namely allowing interest rates and unemployment to go up. They say: "Let us starve the people, this is the way to fight inflation." That is an absolutely stupid way of fighting inflation, Mr. Speaker. On the contrary, if there is inflation, a shortage of goods, there should be absolutely no unemployment. Everyone should buckle down and encourage production.

We can therefore no longer accept the same old excuses. It is unfortunate that the limited influence of our party should prevent us from telling people more about the real solutions that should be applied. But we trust that the serious leaders in this country, if there are any, will at least take the trouble of looking carefully into the possibility of applying economic reforms, which could prove to be the solution to all the problems we are up against. Let us not fear, if needs be, to set the example for the whole world, since a country such as Canada, with untold wealth, is in a position to prove that it is possible to produce, to give one and all a decent minimum standard of living. If any country can do it, Canada can. The possibility should also be considered of bringing about certain economic reforms with a view to solving what problems we face and especially to giving the people the better quality of life which they seek and to which they are entitled.

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to begin my remarks by adding my congratulations to those of my colleagues in the House and ask you convey them to Mr. Speaker on his elevation to the exalted role of Speaker of this House. I extend my congratulations to you too, Sir, and to our other charming deputy who was in the chair most of today. I had hoped that she would be presiding when I spoke. That is nothing against you, Sir, but I thought it would be rather nice for me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Certainly Mr. Speaker's elevation to the chair puts him in one of the three principal positions in this House—the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Speaker and the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). The Speaker has accepted great responsibility in assuming his share of the burden and, as they say in show business, the performance of the previous Speaker is a tough act to follow. However, we are all sure he will do an excellent job.

I also wish to offer congratulations to two new members, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee), who moved and seconded the Address in Reply in a very capable manner.

I wish I could speak in as glowing terms as the Speech from the Throne itself and the speech of the Prime Minister on October 2. Like my colleagues in the official opposition, I had expected the Prime Minister to follow up quickly and decisively on his election promises. I expected the Speech from the Throne to contain specific references to steps that the government planned to take to deal with the serious problems that have been with us since the present government come to power.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister promised to heal the wounds of the nation and to provide instant solutions to all its problems if only the people would return his government to power with a majority. Well, Mr. Speaker, the government was returned with a working majority, and we are all waiting for some sign that the Prime Minister was serious about wanting another chance to prove that he could and would govern responsibly. This is the third chance that the present government has been given to run our country, and I personally do not believe that this time will be any different from the others. It will probably be three strikes—and out.

In the last election campaign we heard much the same slogans and promises that we heard from the Liberals in 1968 and 1972. Some of the lyrics were different but the tune was the same. I am surprised that the Prime Minister did not enshrine his election tune in law and call it the new national anthem. We already have a title for it—"Promises, Promises, Promises".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I do not think I am unreasonable in expecting the government to present a Speech from the Throne that contains something more than generalities and red herrings. After all it was three months from election day to the opening of parliament. Surely the geniuses in the government's white towers could figure out, in that time, that all the promises of the last six or seven years were left unsolved. In fact, most of them had not even been dealt with seriously. I cannot believe it took three months to prepare a speech that skirted around all the current issues and problems.

I heard from a reliable source that the Speech from the Throne had been farmed out and written by some brain truster in Toronto who did not even know what was going on in Ottawa, or anywhere else in Canada for that matter.

Last year the Prime Minister appointed Mrs. Beryl Plumptre to head the Food Prices Review Board. I suppose he thought the higher prices for food would go away and stop bothering him. All of us now know that Mrs. Plumptre has bombed out. She solved her own personal problem because she gets $40,000 plus per year in salary. It suits her all right to be used to pass the buck for food price inflation from the government to the Review Board. Just the other day the government announced that her job has been made secure for another year. I suppose that is the sum and substance of the government's fight against inflation in food prices for some time to come.

That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. The people of Canada, the people of my constituency, will not be satisfied with this kind of nonsense in place of decisive action. I personally do not think that giving Mrs. Plumptre exposure on national television week after week is going to solve any problems, bring down the price of food, or even stabilize the price of food. I want to see some positive steps taken by the government. We have enough publicity seekers around already, people who go on national television one day telling us that the worst is yet to come, and the next day come back and tell us there is not much of a problem after all.

I was disturbed a few days ago when the new Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) made a public statement that there was no crisis in housing in Canada today, and that Canadians should consider themselves fortunate to be living in a country without a housing problem. Of course there is a housing crisis in Canada today, Mr. Speaker. Tens of thousands of people in Canada cannot afford decent housing, whether they are looking for rental housing or housing for purchase.

Rental housing has gone beyond the means of thousands of Canadian families, and every day that passes means that countless more thousands are being priced out of this market. Purchase housing has long been beyond the reach of the average working family unless two or more people in the family are bringing in good salaries. The costs of materials and construction are continuing to rise at an alarming rate, and when the present interest rates are added to these costs it is easy to realize why the average Canadian family simply cannot afford living accommodation that they have a right to expect.

This fact is easy to realize, Mr. Speaker, but as far as I am personally concerned, it is impossible to accept. I do not accept a situation in a country like ours where builders and money lenders are empowered to determine who can and who cannot live in a decent home. We are now in a situation in Canada where the builders and landlords dictate housing costs and they also determine rent levels, here in Ottawa and elsewhere. There are landlords who not only set exorbitant rents for their accommodation without any limits or restrictions being placed on their actions, but who also decide whether they will allow children in their apartments. In other words they can say to a prospective tenant, "If you plan to raise a family, go somewhere else".

A few days ago the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) pointed out that present CMHC policies seem to be directed toward urban construction and other matters related to improving the housing situation in the cities. My own riding happens to be rural in character and so I have a personal interest in this matter. This situation was further aggravated on October 1 of this year, just a week or so ago, when CMHC restricted its home ownership plan to new housing. This means that families who have a chance to buy older homes in areas such as my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka have been cut out of the Assisted Home Ownership Plan. This is discrimination in more ways than one.

In the first place buying a new home is almost always more costly than the purchase of an existing one, especially where families plan to acquire an older home and fix it up to suit their own needs and tastes. The Minister of Urban Affairs may not have a housing problem of his own, but I can assure him that thousands of Canadians are not as fortunate as he is in that respect.

I would just like to make one more comment about the change in CMHC policy with regard to the Assisted Home Ownership Plan. In the last few days I have heard of cases where people have been hit by this change and, in my view, it shows how cold and unfeeling this government is when it comes to dealing with individuals.

We have a situation in which the government has wasted hundreds of millions of dollars on many programs, one being bilingualism. Incidentally, the money applied to CMHC programs is not being pumped down the drain in the way so much other money is that is supplied for other programs. This money is being paid back to the treasury, with interest. Tonight the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is appearing before a committee. I had hoped to attend, but was unable to do so because I was selected to speak in the House.

At this point I wish to mention one or two proposals which were advanced by my party in the last election campaign, and which the government adopted.

An hon. Member: They were Conservative proposals.

Mr. Darling: Nevertheless, they were good ideas. We are pleased to note that wives of old age pensioners will be eligible to collect pensions at age 60. When I listened to the Prime Minister I thought this plan would be implemented in October. I thought that was fine. But when I read his speech, I noted that the date of implementation was to be October 1, 1975. That gave me an awful shock. That situation is disgraceful. The plan could have been implemented within two months of parliament being convened. Inflation is with us now and wives of pensioners certainly need that money.

Can we believe the government when it says inflation will be licked by October of next year? I do not think we can, which is all the more reason why the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) should speed the program up and implement it within two or three months. I am sure many members opposite feel as I do. Let them put pressure on the government so that it will find the money for this program much more quickly.

We also advocate that, in case of need, 55-year old wives of pensioners should be entitled to the pension as well. This program will not cost as much as some fear because many such wives of pensioners must obtain other financial assistance if the couple are to live in the manner to which they are entitled.

I am also happy to see that the war veterans allowance is to be increased. Again, this has happened because of pressure which has been kept on the government by my party's veterans affairs critic. This was one of my areas of interest in the previous session. The veterans have already done their fighting, and it does not seem right that they need to fight over and over again for every dollar of increased pension they receive.

I now wish to comment, and in so doing take pot shots at ministers, about labour unions which pursue their selfish aims at the expense of the public. Really, judging from what we have heard lately, the demands of some unions sound more like blackmail than demands put forward in collective bargaining. I do not believe the government has been sensitive about the rights of the majority of Canadians. It has allowed strikes in essential services to take place.

We hear a great deal from the NDP about special interest groups in industry and business. Of course we know that most of such thought is simply socialist gobbledygook. We should be directing our attention to those special interest groups in labour unions which are using blackmail and intimidation to force unreasonable demands on the government and the general public.

The unions seem to delight in keeping our country in a constant state of turmoil, and it is time we served notice on them that these minority factions will not be allowed to impose their will on the majority of Canadians every time they feel like it. Collective bargaining is not a divine right to run roughshod over the people, and unions will have to be told that they are expected and required to act just as responsibly as the rest of us. The average citizen in this country is getting impatient with irresponsible and destructive strikes, and I might go so far as to say that they are darned fed up.

I was surprised to note that the grain handlers' strike was settled by giving them a 61 per cent increase. As one of my colleagues said, that means that a sweeper in a grain elevator will now make about $7 per hour, or close to $12,000 per year. Many people in Canada's work force are not in unions. They have no one to speak on their behalf, and I can tell you they are giving that settlement a hard look. Other union contracts will be negotiated in the near future and some members of this House, as well as our newspapers, can take the blame for what will happen.

When we debated the grain handler's strike my friends to my left kept talking about the great big terrible grain companies. I may not know as much about the grain industry as my friends to my left, who seem to know everything about everything except how to get large numbers of their followers elected to this House. Their numbers are reduced and they no longer have the clout they had.

Mr. Nystrom: We have quality, not quantity.

Mr. Darling: Now they can spout their socialist philosophy because there is no danger of their being called to account.

Members to my left called the grain companies great big corporations. Actually they are co-operatives owned by farmers, as the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) mentioned in his speech. But many members here failed to mention that. The ordinary people of Canada, who may read what has been said in that debate, may think the grain companies are the same as other great cartels and corporations. Of course we heard a great deal about corporate bums, but we no longer hear about the corporate rip-off.

Many people in Canada who work very hard cannot bargain from strength. Some make but a meagre pittance. I should like to see the wages of some people rise. Some of them could combine and use their combined clout. I would like to see their wages increased by so much an hour.

● (2130)

The minister is now faced with an Air Canada pilots' strike. At the present time they are staggering along with a paltry $30,000 basic for the lowest paid pilot, plus fringe benefits. The super pilots are receiving $50,000. A nice increase of 10 per cent will be coming along.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member will permit a question?

Mr. Darling: I will when I have completed my speech, Mr. Speaker.

This is what a lot of people are wondering about. Money is going to the highest paid on a percentage basis. Where is it all to come from? It will come from the poor consumer in one way or another. It will come from the old age pensioner, those on welfare and those with restricted incomes.

It is time the most fortunate in Canada stopped to think. Yesterday a good many of us overstuffed ourselves while celebrating Thanksgiving. This is a very fortunate country—let us not kid ourselves—despite unemployment, poverty, discrimination, hunger among many, and regardless of the Prime Minister.

We in this country consume, directly or indirectly, five times as much cereal grain as the average citizen in Latin America, Africa or Asia. As Canadians, we must ask ourselves some very personal questions about what our help will be to those less fortunate than us. It might be well to emphasize at this time that a great many of our own citizens are in need of a basic wage that will enable them to live in decency.

Some of the highest paid people in Canada can be found without going too far from this Chamber. There is no question about that. Something should be done.

I was delighted to hear the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) speak this evening. I had the privilege of visiting Cyprus and Lahr, Germany, in February of this year. I talked to the troops there. I commend the minister on his troops. They are a wonderful bunch. But, without mentioning names or ranks, they were not over enthusiastic about the equipment supplied to them. They want more and better equipment. They certainly deserve it.

There is one other matter, and I will probably be baring my soul in this respect. I used to wonder why the devil Canada spent so much money on an army. It was not very big. I felt that the United States, that great country to the south, would protect us. They would not dare let anyone invade us.

Just two weeks ago I had the privilege of visiting armed forces bases along with NATO members from all over Europe. We visited Shilo, Esquimalt, Halifax and Camp Valcartier. I was most impressed. Although $2.5 billion is a hell of a lot of money, it certainly is not enough. That is it in a nutshell. We have to pay the piper. I hope parliament will find enough money to equip our great Armed Forces in the way to which they are entitled and should be equipped.

I know that a tremendous 10 per cent of our national budget goes for defense. However, if you match that against some of the NATO countries in Europe, I bet we are not paying too much. We are not too hard done by. I hope many members will look at it in this way. And when I say this, I include members on this side of the House too.

I say to the Minister of National Defence that when he appears before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts he will have a friend. I happen to a member of that committee. I believe it was one of my friends from the holier than thou group to my left—

Mr. Hogan: Thank you.

An hon. Member: Saintly sinners.

Mr. Darling: When I first came to this House I sat at the far end of the Chamber. I expected to see a halo over that particular group of 31 members. Now they do not require as large a halo. Of course, with the new member in that party maybe there will be a halo.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: One way of saving money would be to cut down on some of these mandarin palaces being built in Ottawa and other places to house government agencies. They are growing like a cancer. I visited the offices of a government agency in a town not too far from where I live. The official was not very high up on the totem pole, but when I went into his office, there were rugs like the one in this Chamber. You could put four Centre Block offices of members of parliament into his office. I will not refer to the Confederation Building where I understand some members have tennis courts for offices, at least members opposite. Money could certainly be saved if the government would quit extending its tentacles through more buildings.

The Ontario government has finally stated it is putting a ceiling on its civil service list. I hope that will be done here. I am not quite sure of my figures, but I believe there are between 330,000 and 340,000 civil servants here. That is a lot of people to have their noses in the public trough. The ordinary taxpayer has to foot the bill for that. We must do something to try to cut down in this area. We must show that inflation is more than just a word.

Members on this side will do their best to try and do what the people of Canada want, namely, save money and fight inflation. We know that during the election campaign we wrongly told the people there should be controls on prices and so on. Privately, every damned one agreed. The only exception is they said "not me". They wanted everyone else's wages cut but their own.

Something has to be done to try to keep prices down. I hope we will be able to do something in this parliament. The Prime Minister says that one of his top priorities is reconstituting and changing the House of Commons, futtering around with the Senate, and doing this and that. If things could be left as they are and we could get down to brass tacks, we could do something about inflation. Let's forget all about this damned gobbledygook of changing the House of Commons even though there are a lot of things I do not like about it. Your Honour should put a cross on the calendar. This is the first day this session we have not had a Standing Order 43 motion. I know which is the guilty side for the most part, and I am not enthused about that. These crazy 43's waste the time of the House. There are a lot of things that could be done to streamline the House, and I agree with the government on some of them. There is no question about that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I agree that 20 minutes for a speech is all that the Prime Minister needs. I do not speak often, but I do sit in my seat and listen to all this wonderful oratory that goes on and on, and darned few members ever stop before they are told to sit down. Having spoken for 30 or 40 minutes, they then ask how long have they got? One learned member of the House of Commons last year, who is not here today, represented an English riding, spoke French about half the time and recited poetry. That was the hon. member for Scarborough-something-or-other. So it is not necessary to be a most highly educated person to get back into the House of Commons. I hope that this parliament will get on with trying to do something that the people of Canada want done, and will not just waste time.

Miss Monique Bégin (Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, allow me first of all to congratulate you on your appointment. I should like you also to convey my best wishes to your colleagues, namely, the Speaker of the House and hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome), the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), and my colleague from the Louis-Hébert riding (Mrs. Morin).

This being said, Mr. Speaker, I shall never be able to "talk a blue streak" like my predecessor just did. I shall speak French, and I have not quite understood whether this means automatically that I shall be speaking poetically.

Within the past 18 months, Mr. Speaker, I have gone through two election campaigns. These will have actually cost the Canadian taxpayers some $70 million. The day to day administration of this House during that time will have cost them another $40 million, and I will have experienced not the pleasure but the regret to see some 35 major bills automatically shelved simply because the government was defeated. To sum it up, $110 million in less than two years and, it must also be pointed out, a remarkable number of pieces of legislation passed by a minority government. That is where lie the strength and the weakness of our form of government.

In my opinion, the paradox of democracy, and in the first days of this third week of sitting of this Parliament, my off-hand reaction is to ask myself how are we going to fulfill the mandate given to us by our voters. Every member is concerned about that. So I prepared notes right on the first day of the session on the urgency of a parliamentary reform. I have since listened with great interest to the speech made by the Prime Minister who chose to give particular emphasis to that problem. I also heard the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) and noted specially what he said about the question period in this House, the broadcasting of the debates of this House and committee work.

Incidentally, I want to stress the great interest I found in the question debated last Thursday night by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) and the answer given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid). I support my colleague from the opposition on the basic principle of freedom of information for members of Parliament as defined by him—the onus of proving confidentiality lying upon the government, which I think is the opposite of current practices. No need to add that I agree with him that nothing is more fundamental than to allow the public to follow the committee proceedings on procedure and organization and on the internal economy of the House. I will add further, at the risk of shocking the experts, that our senior civil servants and other civil servants should attend those discussions so as to better understand the role of members of Parliament and how we need their help and they need ours. I am sure they would be delighted to do so.

I cannot understand, and I beg your pardon, that the opposition and a number of mass media—except a Toronto morning paper that I shall not name—have managed to run down the Prime Minister's speech and to accuse him of lack of substance, of glossing over the real problems of today. Naturally, I would not say that the speech my hon. colleague from across the way has just made strikes me as a model in this regard.

I know full well why I was elected MP by the thousands of electors of the Montreal riding I represent. I know full well what they expect of me and what problems we must solve. But I want the Canadians to know how obsolete and even hypocritical is our way of solving those problems.

The Canadian people have elected us to discuss the price of eggs, to protect them against inflation. That is not hard to know. Of course, they want money to keep on circulating, and above else, they want to know they will not lose their jobs. They fail to understand why we do not control the companies that make excessive profits and exploit the consumers. At the same time, they are shocked, which may seem paradoxical but does them credit, by our slowness, our hesitations in helping the starving people of Sahel or Bangladesh, those who lose everything in a hurricane such as in Honduras, or those who lose their freedom such as in Chile, Angola, Rhodesia and South Africa.

What can I answer, Mr. Speaker, when women's groups ask me why the life expectancy of Indian women is 10 years less than theirs or that the life expectancy of Eskimo women is 20 years less than mine for example?

And what can be said, Mr. Speaker, to those who are caught in the infernal trap of usurious credit and who are not protected nor helped by any legislation to get out from under?

And what can an honest member do when he hears the report of the Montreal Diet Dispensary and is aware of the scandalous nutritional deficiencies among pregnant women and generally among poor families in the richest country of the world?

As a full-time member, I can only be particularly ill at ease with the procedure set by the Canadian parliamentary system which prevents me—and I intentionally dwell on that word—which prevents me from performing productive and responsible work. The clumsiness and the legalism—I apologize to my colleagues who have legal training—the clumsiness and legalism of our procedures are, I feel, unacceptable to any parliamentarian conscious of his responsibilities.

In a sense, I say without hesitation and very simply that the exterior forms and the usual practices prevent us from doing the real job, that is resolve the problems I mentioned a few minutes ago, for which 264 Members of Parliament have been elected, they have been delegated to serve the interests of twenty-two and a half million Canadians.

Every member has had the experience of having visitors in the galleries. Often, whole classes of children and teenagers come to discover their Parliament. What is their reaction? Here are some comments we hear: Miss, one would think that ministers are doing their best not to answer questions asked by members. Why do members ask such stupid questions? That was reported in this morning's paper. Why do all members leave the Chamber at three o'clock in the afternoon? How is it that members are reading or writing under the nose of the speaker in the House? It might appear candid to say such things here, but if they reflect the spontaneous reaction of the majority of visitors, they are scandalous for the House.

People who observe from these galleries, maybe once in their lifetime, as they walk through the town, the symbol of their government and our democracy, do not understand what happened and are confounded at the loss of time in our debates. Very often, they see us as children playing in a kindergarten.

I feel this view is absolutely right. I also find that we ourselves get lost in the intricacies of our own game. Clear demonstration of this happened during last Parliament where the bulk of members simply did not know how to use procedural possibilities, otherwise the government would have fallen much sooner.

I also find very telling the daily language we unconsciously learn as soon as we enter this worthy precinct and speak among ourselves, when we say for instance we are going to "kill a bill during private members' time", or we have to "sit through the late show". In this vocabulary, one might point to a number of other phrases, all telling of fallacy in the workings of Parliament.

It is clear then I see but one paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, the one about parliamentary reform, and for a very simple reason. If we do not implement rapid reform, we will never find the time to debate and vote the program in the 15 preceding pages, that is 60 or 70 bills, let alone talking budget.

And this program, excuse me if I say so, is far from being innovative. It only continues work undertaken since what I have been able to witness, that is in the preceding 18 months of government.

Certainly many members before me must have been impatient with the archaic parliamentary system, but I believe that surely this is not a reason to accept an inacceptable and unjustifiable situation that must be corrected anyway. In fact, traditions are lost if only because of the changes brought on by the age, occupation and seniority of the members. We might as well develop, with full knowledge of the case, new "rules of the game" adapted to the twenty-first century.

I did not have time to consult the Parliamentary Guide on this, but even if I myself have not reached the age of retirement in the year 2000 I think that there are others also in this House for whom the twenty-first century is not fiction.

My colleagues who have preceded me in this House, not during this session, but during preceding Parliaments, have put forth numerous reform projects especially during the last fifteen years. I have read many of them. One of the most interesting comes from the last session. It seems to be rather meaty even though it is but the beginning of a report which was co-signed by the former member for York Centre (Mr. Walker) and by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Just as they are, I am in favour of more respect for democracy, but I am quite incapable of finding where the essence of democracy lies.

For example, if I take the time allocated for speeches in the House, I do not see where 20 or 30 minutes per member, depending on the discussions, has improved the quality of democracy in Canada. It is very rare that a man—and this also means women—has a new idea. When one has one, it can only be brought forth clearly and briefly and, for me, 10 or 15 minutes at the most should be enough. Also, why should we all repeat the same things? Members of a same party can reach prior understanding to allow a smaller number of members to make public the views of the group, divided according to the subjects to be covered. Every speaker in the Parliament of Europe in Strasbourg, for instance, is allowed to speak for seven or nine minutes. I am thinking of the member who spoke before me, whose final words were: "This inflation is just a word". In my opinion, however, this inflation is actually thousands of words. Members of this House are strange beings generally struck on the day of their election with an uncommon illness, namely verbal inflation. I think we could reduce the time allowed for speeches in the House by half and therefore double the amount of time spent on parliamentary duties.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the work of committees. I shall do so because working on a committee is almost the very essence of the ordinary member of the House, it is the springboard, the platform, the place, the tool that he can call his own as opposed to other aspects of his parliamentary life such as, for instance, the question period which "is the ministers' property." For instance, I was struck by the fact that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—obviously it is his duty and the duty of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) to do so—stressed the matter of the question period. Those are the ministers' problems. As an ordinary member of the House, and no doubt I am expressing a view that we all share, whatever our party, as an ordinary member of this House, I spend hours working with the standing committees of the House.

I think that the remarkable reforms of 1969 intended to change the functions of the committees of the House are far from being implemented. Their spirit has been applied but they have not been implemented. Judging from what I have seen up to now, the 23 committees of the House cannot, at any rate, be considered as working groups. They are not groups, they do a very bad job and they have continuous partisan fights except maybe in two or three committees.

That has struck me because I earnestly admit that one of my main reliefs during my three months as a Canadian delegate to the United Nations last year was to be relieved from committee work. This is absolutely abnormal and I was surprised myself to have such reaction, but it reveals very well the "artificiality" laid upon us. I think that the rigidity we can observe during the committees concerning the time allotted and the order of speakers is against the good functioning of the human spirit. I am not an expert on procedure and organization so I feel free to express what the average citizen would feel in a House committee. A member of Parliament has there a tremendous opportunity to become an expert in some issus that interest him and for which he is prepared.

Mr. Speaker, before you interrupt me I shall say it is ten o'clock and ask you for leave to finish my speech later.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REPRESENTATION OF PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION AT GENEVA CONFERENCE—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am always overwhelmed by the multitude of my colleagues who listen to my voice at this hour. On the other hand, to those who are not staying I feel like Lady MacBeth who said: "Stand not on the order of your going".

Last Tuesday's question to the minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), concerning the Geneva Conference and the role of the Palestine Liberation Organization at that gathering was prompted by my continued interest and profound concern for the future of the Palestinian people.

There are many blunders, many failures, many moral wrongs in our age as in all preceding ages, but I believe nothing is a greater affront to our conscience than the Palestinian refugee question which has been a blight upon our record for the past quarter century. One and one-half million people driven from their homes or fleeing them in fear have languished in tents and shacks for 28 years. Discouragement, disillusionment is their lot. Children have grown to manhood knowing no home, knowing no hope. Not surprisingly in this life so degrading to the human personality disillusionment has turned to despair, and frustration to desperation. Not surprisingly the refugees ask: does any one care; will no one take up our cause?

The Arab inhabitants of Palestine were not consulted and, I fear, not considered when others decided that a new state of Israel should be set up in Palestine. I cannot here tonight discuss the violence and terror which went on in Palestine over the years prior to the carving out of the Republic of Israel—violence not by any means confined to the Arabs, or shall we say, the Palestinians.

But suffice to say there has been a painful, cruel lack of concern for the host of huddled refugees in the far-flung camps of the Middle East. UNRA has dispensed funds, but nothing like a decent lifestyle has been established, even if we set aside the vital question of the right of these people to a home of their own rather than a half-way hostel on a road which seems never to open up. Only in recent years has there been some recognition of the intensity and importance of the fate and status of the Palestinian refugees.

In this session of the General Assembly of the United Nations a recent decision was made to take up the general issue as a separate item for plenary discussion. The other day it was decided to hear a spokesman of the Palestine Liberation Organization at that great international organization in New York.

I regret that Canada found itself unwilling to join the vast majority of delegations prepared to hear a spokesman for the long suffering Palestinians. We took the familiar safety device of abstention. Of course there are problems, but there is a difference in this case. There is an interesting difference between our performance at ICAO or UNESCO. We know there are problems. All but one of the Arab states now seem prepared to look upon the PLO as the spokesman for the Palestinians and all present voted in favour.

[Miss Bégin.]

The government of Jordan has a different point of view from the rest of the Arab states. Does Canada agree with the Jordanian position? Canada is in the Middle East in the UNEF. Canada is a charter member of the United Nations. I believe we are wisely establishing new diplomatic missions in Arab states. Having long recommended such a move, I expressed pleasure on the opening of an embassy in Saudi Arabia. I am glad that Yemen is strengthening its diplomatic contacts with us. The appointment of an ambassador from Canada, stationed in Baghdad, is long overdue.

But what I should like to know is the view of the government on the situation referred to in my question, and I hope that the distinguished parliamentary secretary, my long time friend from New Brunswick, will tell us tonight what is the view of the government of Canada. What are we doing to make our contribution toward peace in the troubled Middle East? Let us never forget that Armageddon is located in that part of the world. How are we demonstrating our awareness of the new prospects for advancing the cause and the lot of the long suffering Palestinians? Such a tragic situation, so egregious an affront to human dignity, cannot go on forever; indeed it should not go on longer.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in November of 1973, during his visit to the Soviet Union the then secretary of state for external affairs expressed the view, which he reconfirmed in the House on November 26, 1973, that the Canadian government believes the Palestinians should be represented in one way or another at the Geneva conference on the Middle East. This is obviously necessary since the whole question of the future status of the Palestinians is a major element in any future and permanent settlement eventually reached by the parties concerned.

Canada has not advocated the attendance at this conference of the Palestine Liberation Organization itself. We do not believe we can prejudge the question of whether the PLO is the only legitimate representative of the Palestinians since this is an issue which must be settled by the parties themselves.

TRANSPORT—SUGGESTION FEDERAL GOVERNMENT JOIN IN URBAN TRANSPORTATION DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, although my question is in the area of industry, trade and commerce, allow me to just say that I could not believe my ears when I listened a moment ago to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) speak about the poor Arab refugees who have had no support from anyone in the world. Certainly they have had no support from the billionaire Arab interests in the Middle East except to finance propaganda. I think his was a disgraceful intervention.

I asked, in the House last Friday, a question about the Urban Transportation Development Corporation which is a corporation recently established by the government of Ontario. When I first learned of the Urban Transportation Development Corporation my reaction was one of regret that this corporation had not in fact been established by the federal government. The objectives of the corporation are very important for an urbanizing society. In my own area, the region of metropolitan Toronto, the problem of urban transportation is a critical one and new solutions are required, new and innovative technology.

A few years ago this corporation was established by the province of Ontario and the hope was expressed at the outset that there would be federal interest and participation in it. I am enthusiastic about it for a number of reasons. I am enthusiastic because it addresses itself to one of the most serious urban problems. I am enthusiastic about it because its approach is to look for innovation. It very rarely happens that new solutions are found by old line companies. It seems that companies that are practised, experienced and committed in transportation need some kind of a push or a boost to provide new ideas. This corporation can provide them.

I am enthusiastic about it because it emphasizes development activity within the private sector. It is not the intention of this corporation to be in business to produce goods or to produce services. On the contrary, the idea is to be a contractor; to generate and stimulate within the private sector a new kind of industry—an industry badly needed for the future of Canada.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I am enthusiastic about the corporation because it is already succeeding. It has already promoted improved production; it has already promoted some successes and already established some technology. It has already made sales outside Ontario and outside Canada even, in the United States.

I use my question, Mr. Speaker, as a method of urging the government of Canada to participate in this corporation. The province of Alberta has already undertaken to become part of it, though the details of its commitment and the role it will play financially and otherwise have not been publicly announced. I hope that the federal government will play a role at least as important as that of Alberta and, hopefully, the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government is very much aware of the importance of creating a national based urban transportation development corporation to assist in solving the urban transportation problems. Indeed, on two occasions in the Speech from the Throne the determination of the government to establish such a corporation has been stated.

The first positive step in this direction was the proposal by the former minister of urban affairs (Mr. Basford), at a trilevel government meeting in Edmonton that such a corporation be established. The purpose of this corporation was to bring together the interests of the federal government and the provincial governments in resolving a number of the urban transportation problems that faced various municipalities.

Many of these problems have a common base and the purpose of this corporation would be to identify these areas of common interest, to identify the types of equipment that might best meet these requirements, and to ensure that to the maximum extent possible this equipment would be produced in Canada. The government's purpose has been to join in the creation of a strong organization which had both federal and provincial participation which would assist industry to design, develop and produce transportation systems and equipment needed in Canadian urban areas.

The government has initiated discussions with all the provinces and there is general agreement that a corporation with these objectives would be beneficial and would contribute substantially to the solving of a number of urban transportation problems.

In considering the establishment of such a corporation it has been important to acknowledge the progress in urban transportation development that has been achieved by the province of Ontario and to utilize that experience as the nucleus for a nationally based organization. I am pleased to report that recent discussions with Ontario appear to have produced a basis for agreement. If such an agreement is reached the government plans, as a matter of priority, to place details for participation before the other provinces. I hope that the other provinces will find the proposed terms and conditions acceptable.

It is the intent of this corporation to provide leadership, and development and production of urban transportation systems that will enhance the social well being of many Canadians.

MANPOWER—DEVELOPMENT OF NEW COMMUNITY EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) and is in connection with the announced three year program that was going to be signed with the provinces. I am concerned about what is going to happen in regard to the unemployment situation in the Atlantic region in the meantime. Surely LIP grants and unemployment insurance benefits are not the answer.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary, or whoever is speaking for the minister, when are we going to get from the federal government a co-ordinated plan for the development of the Atlantic region?

When the federal government set up the Atlantic Development Board, ministers promised a plan and talked about it in their speeches. We were told a plan would be forthcoming. When they set up the Area Development Agency they promised such a plan for the Atlantic region. Also, when they set up DREE they promised such a plan. Now we are in 1974 and we, in Atlantic Canada, are still the poorest of all regions in this country, with the possible exception of the Northwest Territories.

I am afraid that the government has become so used to setting up special functions and institutions which can be used in the Atlantic region that it has forgotten that national policies such as those of fiscal and monetary restraint of the 1969-1970 period can wipe out any good done by these institutions. I fear that we shall see much the same thing again in the November 1974 budget. Such a budget, a repeat of 1969-1970, would erase a great deal of good that some programs for regional development and expansion have done. In other words, there is a contradiction inherent in the government's national fiscal and monetary policy and in its regional development policies.

I include the government's manpower policies in this general inconsistent behaviour toward the Atlantic region, so many areas of which are floundering on the shoals of lack of job opportunities. What I say is also true to some extent regarding the government's training and retraining programs which, in part, have become another form of welfare, of band-aid help which is not effective enough to meet the needs of regional structural changes which are necessary if there is to be reconstruction of the economy and sustained employment in that region.

It is time for all politicians of the Atlantic region to stop fooling the people in Atlantic Canada about two things. Let them not give the people exaggerated impressions to the effect that income and employment prospects from off-shore oil exploration will make much difference to the region. Second, let them not hold out the forlorn hope that Fundy tidal power is being seriously considered by this government as part of the answer for meeting Canada's energy needs in the next decade.

Let them, Mr. Speaker, develop a serious plan for the Atlantic Region which will take advantage of our geographical position, an advantage which has come about because of changing technology in transportation, and which has changed our relationships with the markets of the world. I am referring to the development of our container ports and our deep water ports. There are two in eastern Nova Scotia, and one of those, Gabarous, is in my riding. The site has been recommended by steel experts who have studied the subject for DREE as a prime site for a labor intensive steel complex.

I hope such developments will be included in a new redevelopment policy and plan which will also redevelop the basic resources of the Atlantic region and thus provide a real answer to the problems which have plagued Atlantic Canada for at least half a century.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) on October 8, let me begin, as he did, by referring to the community employment strategy, which is a long-term plan, as he indicated, to combat the problems of the chronically unemployed or under-employed.

The hon. member expanded on the terms of reference of the original question and referred in a broad sense to government policies. It is impossible in three minutes to speak of the impact of DREE on the Atlantic Region, although, without question, DREE has been successful in creating many jobs. Tonight I can only speak on behalf of the Department of Manpower.

Let me begin by talking of the community employment strategy which is aimed at helping specific groups which experience particular difficulty in keeping and finding regular employment. Some of these are the physically handicapped, the mentally retarded, socially handicapped, ex-inmates of mental or correctional institutions, people living in areas of chronic unemployment, and single parents. In the Atlantic area we know particularly of those in the second last category, people living in areas of chronic unemployment.

This program is being developed in conjunction with National Health and Welfare. Indeed, it is as a result of the policy paper the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) put out last year. One important aspect of it is that it attempts to involve the community in the definition and, indeed, the resolution of their specific problem. To my mind, that is a departure from what we have been doing up until this time. It will tell the community of the impact of our present programs on them and, together with them, try to seek answers to improve those programs and the employment situation in a particular community.

This is a long-range plan. It is one worth undertaking. It will have beneficial effects. However, it in no way indicates that there is any lack of appreciation or emphasis on our present programs or ongoing activities. We want to emphasize the extensive efforts that have already been made by Canada Manpower to reduce unemployment.

The hon. member referred to the Canada Manpower training program. He called into question its effects. I believe that program is certainly worthwhile. The hon. member will agree that in this time of rapid change it is very important that we keep our skilled people up to date. Canadian workers change jobs many times during their careers. It is incumbent upon us to provide continuously educational opportunities for them as they do this.

The $2 billion spent on training programs in the past represents a very successful investment. We have reorganized Manpower Placement Services. I can tell the hon. member that in my own area of Atlantic Canada, for example in my constituency, there has been a decentralization of Manpower services over the past year or 18 months. In my opinion this is of great benefit in meeting the local placement needs.

The department instituted a system of farm labour pools which was designed to ensure that crop harvests are not hindered by inadequate labour supplies.

The hon. member also referred to the short-term job creation program that had been recognized nationally, the local initiatives program. There is certainly agreement that LIP is not the answer to long-term unemployment. It was not designed for that purpose. It has been continually modified since its inception, and will be continually modified during the progress of this parliament, in consultation with members on both sides of the House. We regard this as important and effective. What I like better is the Local Employment Assistance Program which, I feel, has a long-term effect on many areas of unemployment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member because the time allotted to him has expired. The motion to adjourn this House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA'S ABSTENTION FROM UN VOTE CONCERNING PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the abstention by Canada's representatives on the resolution under which the Palestinian Liberation Organization was granted the right to participate in a special General Assembly debate on the Middle East in November.

Because of the government's lack of courage and tergiversation, and without having brought the matter before the House of Commons for consideration, Canada has been placed by its abstention in a position of being against the state of Israel whose people have suffered so terribly for many months from the ruthless guerilla attacks of the PLO. I would therefore move:

That this question be placed immediately before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Without there being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

REPORTS ON EGG PRICES AND CONSUMER INTEREST IN MARKETING BOARDS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. James. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I have given prior notice of my motion to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid).

On October 1, 1974, at page 15 of Hansard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is reported to have informed the House that the report of the Farm Products Marketing Council, arising out of the first report of the Food Prices Review Board on egg prices in Canada, which was released in January of this year would be presented shortly thereafter. Furthermore, on October 4, 1974, at page 132 of Hansard, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) is reported to have said that he would be releasing the Forbes report on consumer interest in marketing boards the following week. In view of the importance of these two reports to the special committee that is being set up to inquire into the activities of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, I should like to move:

That these reports be tabled at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There being no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED LOWERING OF INTEREST RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important and urgent issue.

Owing to the frightening reduction of investments in the Canadian economy as a result of overly high interest rates on short and long-term mortgages in Canadian banks, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the government consider the opportunity of asking the Bank of Canada to reduce gradually its interest and prime rates to chartered banks, in order that those banks may also act accordingly and reduce interest rates so that the Canadian people may enjoy short, mid- and long-term loans at more reasonable prices.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House had heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion cannot therefore be put.

PUBLIC SERVICE

APPOINTMENT OF MICHAEL PITFIELD—CHANGE IN MERIT SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek leave of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of press reports attributed to the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) about the appointment of Michael Pitfield and his own demotion from cabinet, and also in view of the necessity of preserving the merit system in the public service, I should like to move:

That the House request the Prime Minister to make a full and detailed statement on all circumstances surrounding the appointment of Michael Pitfield as Clerk of the Privy Council and secretary to the cabinet including the specific reasons for his appointment, whether or not the merit system was followed, the names of all senior public servants who were also considered for the appointment and the reasons that they were found unacceptable, whether or not Mr. Pitfield recommended to the Prime Minister that the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs be relieved of his post, and whether or not the Prime Minister will make additional appointments to high positions in the public service from among his friends and admirers.

Mr. Trudeau: What about changes in the shadow cabinet?

Mr. Baldwin: How about merit in the cabinet?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would remind hon. members of the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is an important device and an important rule for the benefit of members who wish to bring a matter to the attention of the House. To quote the rule, it provides:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

It is the custom, of course, to put such motions to the House because they cannot be moved without unanimous consent. Simply because they require unanimous consent, however, that is not evidence that motions put forward under that rule ought not to conform with the basic requirements of the regulations which are that it be a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I would remind hon. members that they ought to respect that part of the regulation. In this particular case, while I have some reservations about the urgency or pressing necessity of the subject, I am prepared to ask if there is unanimous consent that the motion be put. I should remind hon. members however that they ought not to attempt to extend the provisions of the rule.

This motion has been heard by the House. As it was proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be put without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent the motion cannot be put to the House.

Mr. Cossitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With due respect to the Chair, I would simply say in regard to this matter that I feel I am within the rules in presenting a motion at this time under the term "urgent and pressing necessity" when it seems to be a question that the merit system in the public service could be breached—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House was, in fact, asked for unanimous consent as the hon. member knows. Oral Questions.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED ADOPTION OF RESTRICTIVE POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question to the right hon. the Prime Minister relates to the statement made a couple of weeks ago by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration confirming that the government is examining the implications of the dramatic increase in applications for immigration. Has the government decided to change the regulations under which relatives of people already in the country can be nominated as immigrants? If this decision has been made, can the Prime Minister indicate briefly the nature of the change?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as was announced in the Speech from the Throne, a policy paper on immigration will be published in the new year. This will indicate some new directions which the government proposes and which we hope will be fully discussed in this House. As to any interim measures taken before then, all I can say at this moment is if any announcement is to be made it will be made by the government in this House. I would say that I can guarantee in advance that if such is the case it will not depart from the practice of government and of the law of ensuring a policy which is universal and non-discriminatory in its selection criteria.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether the cabinet has made a decision in principle that immigration must be cut or restrained?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in my view, the Leader of the Opposition should not attempt to ascertain what is going on in cabinet any more than his colleague from Leeds should be expected to challenge the Prime Minister on employees on the staff of cabinet.

● (1420)

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I always appreciate the help and advice of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: You need it.

Mr. Stanfield: In that case, sir, I appreciate it even more.

Mr. Hees: There sits paternalistic Pierre, always willing to help.

Mr. Stanfield: Despite the lecture from the right hon. gentleman, which I accept in good part, it is appropriate for a member of the House to ask the government whether a decision has been made by the government on an important matter of principle. Now that the Prime Minister has given me the lecture, for which I express appreciation, will he answer the question? Will he tell us whether a decision has been taken on the principle of restricting or cutting immigration to Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, obviously, there is disagreement here about practices in cabinet. I do not know what the hon. gentleman's practice was when he was leader of a provincial government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He did better than this government has done.

Mr. Trudeau: I assure the hon. member that if the government makes decisions which concern the public, they will be made public in the usual way and discussed with the provinces. As for other discussions or decisions which will be made in cabinet, they will remain subject to cabinet secrecy.

Mr. Baldwin: But you never decide anything.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF REGULATION ON RE-UNIFICATION OF FAMILIES ON POSSIBLE TREATY ON EUROPEAN CO-OPERATION AND SECURITY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the new immigration policy mean that Canada has changed its position on the re-unification of families being a condition precedent to a possible treaty on European co-operation and security?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, without commenting on the immigration aspect of the question, I assure my hon. friend that the objectives being pursued by Canada with respect to the re-unification of families at the European conference are still valid and relevant.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED ADOPTION OF RESTRICTIVE POLICY—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF NO DISCRIMINATION ON BASIS OF RACE OR GEOGRAPHY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In the light of various reports that a proposal is being put forward to pass restrictive regulations affecting particularly immigration from parts of Europe such as Italy and Portugal, and from the Caribbean, South America and Asia, will the Prime Minister assure the House now that no changes in the regulations are contemplated which will revert to the old system of discrimination on the basis of geography or race.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gave that undertaking in my answer to the first question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

ALLEGATION GOVERNMENT LEGISLATING BY REGULATION—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PRACTICE WILL CEASE UNTIL GREEN PAPER PUBLISHED

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister on the same matter. It seems to me that this is the second time the government wishes to legislate by way of regulation on an important issue.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Alexander: What's the problem?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Ask the question.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the promised green paper, the government is regulating by way of legislation. Many people, including members on this side of the House, take a dim view of that. Will the Prime Minister assure us that this sort of practice will cease until the views of the Canadian people have been known through the green paper. Will the government avail itself of that course, instead of doing things by this devious method?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the opposition is making in advance speeches it may want to make if the government ever makes a statement on motions on the subject.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is getting "snarky". I have the greatest respect for him. Will he give that assurance? Surely, a matter of such importance should not be legislated by way of regulation. I am asking the Prime Minister to give this House and the country some assurance that this practice will cease forthwith.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what practice the hon. member is referring to in his "snarkiness"?

Mr. Alexander: To legislating by way of regulation: That is the practice to which I was referring.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons passes bills which permit the government to adopt regulations. The hon. member should know that, in his "snarkiness".

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the Prime Minister giving me a lecture. I know he is the end-all when it comes to wisdom. However, my point is this. This government promised a green paper on immigration which was to be discussed by the Canadian people. In the meantime, they are legislating by regulation. This is the point I am trying to bring to the Prime Minister's attention.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor on a point of order. As I understand his point, he is complaining about the failure to answer or the quality of the answer given by the Prime Minister. It is the right of hon. members to pose questions during the question period. It is the right of ministers to whom the questions are directed to answer as they see fit or not answer at all. Any comment on the quality of the answer is fair comment. However, I do not see why a complaint about the quality of an answer or failure to answer, if that is what the comment is about, is in fact a point of order. It is a subject for comment. It is fair comment. However, I do not see it as a point of order. I am aware of no way in which the Prime Minister can be compelled to make any different answer than that which he has given.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF DELEGATION FROM BULGARIA

Mr. Speaker: May I take this opportunity to call attention to the presence in the gallery of a very distinguished delegation visiting Canada at the present time. The delegation from Bulgaria is led by their very distinguished Speaker, Dr. Bonev.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I can scarcely think, for the interest of the visiting delegation, that the question period could have started off with a more interesting or lively topic.

INDUSTRY

UNITED AIRCRAFT—REPATRIATION OF WORK AND EXPANSION PLANS OF COMPANY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. When the minister appeared before a committee of this House last night, he denied that my statement that United Aircraft had decided to cut back some 35 per cent of their production scheduled for next year was accurate. The minister denied that the company ever made such a statement. That has subsequently been denied by the company, a company official having said of the minister, and I quote, "He should know better." Has the minister had further conversation with the company in order to get straightened out? Second, and more important, has he attempted to get that company to reverse its position and live up to its obligation to provide the employment in Longueuil for next year that they should provide?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the hon. member would have wanted to get his facts firsthand rather than relying on newspaper reports.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: If he had done so, he would have learned from the corporation that no work has been transferred to other plants for some months and no further transfers of work from Longueuil are contemplated. Further, the level of work in Longueuil at the end of 1975 is expected to be 40 per cent greater than the average during 1973.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering all that is irrelevant—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I know it is difficult for the Minister of Finance to understand these complicated matters. The expansion plans for next year, which were based on research and development in part funded by this government, were going to be much greater than they are now going to be because of the cutback. The company official said that it was going to be somewhere in the range of 75 per cent next year and this is going to be cut back to 35 per cent. The minister has not denied that. He just tried to talk around it. That is surely the point. Is the minister saying to this House that that company is not cutting back in its expansion plans by some 35 per cent next year? If that is what he is saying, it is in fact a contradiction of what an official of that company has stated publicly.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have said that the company has found it possible to continue to expand its operations by repatriating the work which had been temporarily transferred. Further, there is every likelihood, on the basis of present expectations, that activity in the plant in 1975 will be 40 per cent greater that it was in the best previous year ever.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—CONTRACTUAL ARRANGEMENTS IN RESPECT OF CONTROL OF PRODUCTION OF ENGINE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I should like to ask the minister this question: should the company decide to cut back to a negligible point, even if it were 40 per cent above the one per cent it is now producing, what protection, in terms of contractual arrangements, does the government enjoy with respect to control over the rights to produce that engine, an engine which was developed in Canada? Could the company transfer indefinitely the right to produce that engine to the United States?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As I have already indicated, I expect that the transfer is very much of a temporary nature.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGATION THAT TOO MANY SPORTS EVENTS TELEVISED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State responsible for the CBC.

Last weekend, namely on Saturday the 12th, Sunday the 13th and Monday the 14th, the following programs were televised by the CBC network: at 1 p.m., one hour of wrestling; also, at the same time, one hour of golf. At 3 p.m., some baseball, five hours of it. In the evening, at 8 p.m. two and one-half hours of hockey followed by a football game that lasted approximately four hours. Sunday, we were entitled to eight hours of sports. Monday, another baseball game was televised.

Mr. Speaker, has the CBC become a "sportscaster" only? Does the minister intend to intervene and ask the CBC not to tax indefinitely the patience of the Canadian public, which is starting to have its fill of it?

[English]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is, no. As I understand it, officials of the Corporation will be appearing before the Parliamentary Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. If the hon. member has some thoughts as to how the program mix might be improved, I think he should put them forward there.

INCIDENCE OF BRUCELLOSIS IN SOUTHEASTERN ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR REINSTITUTION OF VACCINE SERVICE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): My question, of which I have given notice, is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In the light of published reports and other reports now in the hands of the minister concerning the serious incidence of brucellosis among herds in southern Ontario, especially southeastern Ontario, is the government giving serious consideration to reinstituting the vaccine service?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member gave me notice of the question only as I was entering the House. The reports I have received are to the effect that the national average of brucellosis infection for the whole nation is still very low. We are very concerned about flare-ups which are occurring in different areas, but until we find evidence that there is a better way of doing things than we are using at the present time, we are still controlling this disease by keeping the herds in quarantine and so on. We realize this is inconvenient to farmers, but we still think it is to the advantage of our world trade in cattle, because we have the most disease-free cattle population in the world.

Mr. Lawrence: I am obviously not talking about the national average; I am talking about the growing incidence of this disease in southeastern Ontario, particularly. Is the minister giving any more serious consideration than he has indicated today to reinstituting the vaccine service which was once in effect? Is he giving any serious consideration to this problem at all?

Mr. Whelan: There is no law against using vaccine. We do not recommend it because when cattle are exported it shows up in some of the tests, suggesting that the animals have contracted brucellosis when, in fact, they have not. So the countries which would normally import the cattle just wouldn't take them. It could hurt an $880 million business if we do not follow the regular procedure and make sure that our animals are disease-free. We have raised the level of compensation to farmers, we are speeding up our testing programs, and now that the cattle are in barns, in close confinement, we are able to do this much more effectively than we could before.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF HIGH COMMISSIONER TO UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman tell the House when an announcement will be made with respect to the appointment of a new Canadian High Commissioner to Britain?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Later this day, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, could I seek the indulgence of the House to correct an earlier answer I gave the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo. In the phrase "later this day" I should like to change the word "day" to "by the end of the week".

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFECT OF CUTBACKS IN PERSONNEL ON FOUR MAIN TASKS OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday, the minister identified four main tasks for the Canadian Armed Forces. Bearing in mind his intention to reduce the number of those serving in the forces and his statement that "reduction in numbers inevitably means some reduction in tasks", would the minister advise the House where the reduction will take place? Which of the four main tasks of the Armed Forces will be affected?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): We do not contemplate any drastic reductions, but common sense adjustments, and these will probably be in most of the tasks performed by the Armed Forces.

Mr. McKinnon: Is the minister prepared to specify the order of priority he assigns to the four main tasks? In other words, which of the tasks of the Armed Forces would be the least susceptible to cutback?

Mr. Richardson: I am presenting a number of alternatives to my colleagues. When the cabinet has reached a decision it will be made known.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

SALE OF FOYMOUNT RADAR BASE—REASON FOR REFUSAL OF BID BY PERLEX INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Supply and Services, in relation to the Foymount Radar Base. Can he tell us why the government, through his department, did not accept the highest bid by Perlex International Chemicals Limited of $1,542,360 and, instead, accepted a lower bid of $351,000, a decision which cost the Canadian taxpayer the sum of $1,191,360?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, we received eight tenders varying from $350,000 to $110,000, including one in the amount of $1,500,000. The International Perlex bid for $1,500,000, could not be accepted because a cheque for 10 per cent of the amount offered was not enclosed and because the financial stability of the company was not established to the satisfaction of the Corporation.

[English]

Mr. Dick: If the bid was not in order, in that the deposit at the time of opening the bid was insufficient, why was the bid not rejected outright in conformity with the rules of tendering? Why, instead, did negotiations go on through the minister's office, a practice which is not in accordance with tendering rules, in an attempt to have the bid brought within the possibility of acceptance?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, no negotiation was conducted in my office. Negotiations have been effected through the Corporation and then, because a tender does not comply with the Corporation's rules, there is no reason for us to reject all the others. In this case, we had seven other valid tenders.

● (1440)

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The minister has just informed us that no officials of his department conducted any negotiations, yet on page 3—

[Mr. McKinnon.]

An hon. Member: He didn't say that.

Mr. Dick: I am sorry, I meant officials in his office. However, on page 3 of the press release he gave today, it states that he did not meet personally, but officials of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and "my office" did meet with them. So perhaps he is now directing himself in an attempt to try to perfect his answer a little better than he perfected the original tender.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, I would simply say that because some people met officials of my office it does not mean that negotiations have been conducted there. Some representations have been made which were conveyed to the Corporation for consideration. Later on, they were rejected because they were not bringing anything towards the solution of a settlement.

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO QUEBEC FARMERS—REPRESENTATIONS BY PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Last week, over 2000 Quebec farmers invaded Quebec City to let the provincial Minister of Agriculture know about their dissatisfaction with the price they are paid for their products. Can the minister tell the House whether following this demonstration he has received representations from the Quebec Minister of Agriculture requesting financial assistance for those farm producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I received a direct representation from the Quebec minister, but I certainly have from Quebec members of our caucus.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether leaders of the Union des producteurs agricoles have made representations to him following that demonstration and the representations made to the provincial Minister of Agriculture?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that if I received a message from the provincial minister of agriculture for la belle province I have not seen it yet.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

POSSIBILITY OF RESTRICTED TERMS OF REFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in a position to assure the House that the already narrow terms of reference of the Food Prices Review Board will not be further restricted as outlined in that enlightened speech by the hon. member for Windsor West and, more particularly, in view of the statement by Mrs. Plumptre that she would resign if in fact the terms of reference were further restricted?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the terms of reference have not been narrowed at all.

An hon. Member: Are they going to be?

Mr. Ouellet: The terms of reference are the same as they were before the reference in the Speech from the Throne.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF FORBES REPORT AND REPORT OF FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the setting up of a special committee tomorrow to examine into egg prices, arising out of the report of the Food Prices Review Board, is the minister now in a position to table the report by Professor Forbes, chairman of the Consumer Advisory Council, and also the report of the Farm Products Marketing Council which conducted an investigation into egg marketing in Canada, and dealt with by the Food Prices Review Board.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I have the unanimous consent of the House I would be delighted to table the Forbes Report which was released today by the Consumer Advisory Council. As to the other report, my colleague the Minister of Agriculture will, I am sure, want to table it as soon as possible.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question, then, to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the setting up of a committee tomorrow to examine into the activities of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, and in view of the relevant nature of the special report of the Farm Marketing Council to that investigation, will the minister now table that report or assure the House that he will table it tomorrow since he has had it in his possession since last April?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the only reason it has been delayed, as I understand it, is that it was not printed and there were no copies. I understand it had not been printed because an okay had not been received and the printing did not go ahead during the summer months. The printing has now been ordered, and if the report is available tomorrow it will be tabled tomorrow. If it is not available I cannot table it. As soon as the printing is finalized, the hon. member can be sure that I will want to table it as soon as possible.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I should like to ask whether the minister has the unanimous consent of the House in respect of the tabling of this report.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has suggested that with the unanimous consent of the House we might now table the report the minister has in his hand. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR FUNDS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF EXPERIMENTAL SOLAR HOUSES

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of State for Urban Affairs give a high priority to any request by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for research funds which might follow the request of Professor Robert Swartman that the CMHC direct research money to the building of 20 experimental solar houses in various parts of Canada?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this application has been made under a demonstration project for 1976 and it will be the advisory committee of highly qualified professionals who will make that judgment.

REASON FOR CLOSING OF POLYSAR PLANT IN MALTON, ONTARIO, FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PREFABRICATED HOUSES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of State for Urban Affairs confirm or deny reports that the Canada Development Corporation is planning to close down its Polysar housing construction plant in Malton, Ontario, due to the fact that a shortage of serviceable land and the tight mortgage market has forced it to reduce production below the break even point?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from the president of Polysar to the effect that it was closing down its operations at the prefabricated housing plant. Part of the reason given was a shortage of serviced land, but I think there are other problems inherent in the process.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, would the minister explain why the Canada Development Corporation did not take prior measures to ensure the availability of adequate serviced land for the modular townhouses produced by Polysar before it arranged for the production of four houses per day and planned to increase that production to six houses per day?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the Canada Development Corporation does not report to me. In addition, it operates in the private sector particularly, as does Polysar. As all hon. members who have been in business will know, there are some awful mistakes in the private sector, too.

CANADA-CUBA ROUTE—POSSIBLE COMPLETION OF NEGOTIATIONS

In light of the significantly increasing volume of air travel between Canada and Cuba by charter and via the circuitous Mexico City route, is he now in a position to advise that the long continuing negotiations for a direct and regular Canada-Cuba service are approaching a successful conclusion, and when does he expect this direct service to begin?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge there are no negotiations with Cuba going on at this moment. Of course, there are charters going to Cuba once in a while, but that is all I can say.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS AND NATIVE PEOPLE ON IMPROVING HOUSING STARTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, if I can get his attention. In view of the statement yesterday dealing with Indian Affairs by the assistant deputy minister to the effect that the number of houses being built for native people represents only a fraction of the number needed, I should like to know whether officials of the minister's department are meeting with senior officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and representatives of the National Indian Brotherhood to determine whether the process of building homes for native people can be expedited in the very near future?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the brotherhood has given me its proposal on housing which is being analyzed by officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and my department. We are hopeful that we can make very significant headway in respect of this housing construction.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the position of the National Indian Brotherhood was presented to the department and the government last April, almost six months ago, can the minister indicate when in the near future they might reach an agreement, or when there will be further discussions, which might lead to an agreement, with representatives of the National Indian Brotherhood?

[Mr. Danson.]

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I hope to be bringing forward some proposals in this area within the next three to four weeks.

ALLEGED HOARDING OF PANCREASES FOR MAKING OF INSULIN—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, in view of reports that beef and pig pancreases, from which insulin is made, are being hoarded by at least one major Canadian meat packing plant, is the Minister of National Health and Welfare carrying on an investigation into this matter to determine whether this allegation is true and that the interests of all diabetics in Canada are fully protected, as they have been in the past?

● (1450)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for raising this question and for giving me notice of it. Indeed as soon as the news report was published in the press I asked my department to investigate the matter. The preliminary investigation which has been carried on seems to indicate that at the present time there is no evidence of hoarding, but my department is continuing the investigation and will be meeting with representatives of the drug industry, meat packers, the Canadian Diabetic Association and officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to pursue this matter further. I shall be glad to give a further report to the hon. member at a later stage as soon as I have this report. I might point out that at the present time contact with the main producer in Canada, Connaught Laboratories, indicates there is no immediate shortage of insulin in Canada.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

ALLEGED LACK OF FUNDS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the Farm Credit Corporation has only sufficient money to meet all its loans up to October 4, which is past, and since it is almost certain that the Farm Credit Corporation will actually run out of money by March 1975, I should like to ask the minister what his department is doing about this matter, which could develop into a very serious situation, in order to ensure that an adequate supply of money is channeled into essential areas so far as agriculture is concerned.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the amount of money that the Farm Credit Corporation lends has indeed doubled and nearly tripled this year, because it appears now that more people have confidence in agriculture and want to expand their holdings and so on. We lent over $186 million a year ago and $400 million last year. At the rate we are going it will be over $530 million this year, even above and beyond our most conservative expectations.

Mr. Murta: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Unless the minister can give me a more definite answer I would assume from his reply that he does not intend to do anything about ensuring that money is available for the Farm Credit Corporation up to 1975.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think there is an old saying that by your actions you shall be known. We have more than doubled the amount of money loaned to the corporation. You can be sure we will do everything we can to make it possible that any purchases of farms are allowed to be finalized before next spring, because in respect of any applications we are receiving now the money will not be needed before next spring.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON POSSIBLE BORROWING FROM ARAB COUNTRIES

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since artificial scarcity of oil supply has been allowing Arab countries to accumulate billions for the last 15 months, is the Prime Minister ready to meet financial representatives from these countries, who now have upwards of two billion to lend Canada, at cheaper rates than the American ones, thanks to last year's oil transactions and the money we gave them during the regrettable oil crisis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not refuse such a meeting were it proposed, if it should serve a purpose. But as the hon. member knows, the Minister of Finance is chairing an international committee which precisely is tackling the problem, and this country is doing all it can to help bring about a fair and balanced solution.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Is he opposed to the possibility of Canada borrowing from Arab countries at lower rates?

Mr. Trudeau: Could the hon. member repeat his question?

Mr. Rondeau: I shall repeat my question, Mr. Speaker. Is the right hon. Prime Minister opposed to the possibility of Canada borrowing from Arab countries at rates which are lower than the international or U.S. preferential rates?

Mr. Trudeau: Definitely not, Mr. Speaker. If the Arabs are willing to grant us interest-free loans, as the policy of the hon. member's party would have it, we should be willing to borrow.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary.

There is a difference between the preferential rate of the Arabs and the interest-free loan we have been recommending for a long time in this House.

Since the Prime Minister does not want either to accept this solution and since the Arabs have money to lend to Canada at preferential rates, which is unlike the Americans, is the right hon. Prime Minister prepared to consider this question? We can even provide him with the names of the financial representatives of the Arab countries.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

REASON FOR REDUCTION IN AMOUNT ALLOTTED TO CORPORATION IN ESTIMATES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture and is supplementary to the question put to him by the hon. member for Lisgar in respect of the Farm Credit Corporation. In light of the minister's optimism about the farm industry and its effect logically upon the Farm Credit Corporation, which optimism existed in the minister's mind a year and a half ago, could the minister tell the House why, in his estimates which are now under discussion in the standing committee, he is asking for the Farm Credit Corporation some 20 to 30 per cent less than was asked for in respect of the previous fiscal year?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has to understand the whole lending procedure of the Farm Credit Corporation. You use your revolving capital and borrow what you think you will need for the year. We estimated the needs for the year, but the farmers have shown more optimism even than the Minister of Agriculture.

FINANCE

ALLEGED ADOPTION OF TIGHT MONEY POLICY—POSSIBILITY OF COMMISSION STUDY OF ECONOMIC ACTIVITIES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would he kindly indicate if in fact we have had a tight money policy for the past three or fourth months in Canada as indicated by Dr. Raynald, Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada last Friday and in any event does he agree that there has been a reduction of 12 per cent in our basic money supply in the last three months.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the monetary policy has been that stated by the Minister of Finance on several occasions and I believe it would be incorrect to describe it as a tight money policy.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that it is now ten years since the last report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance would the Prime Minister now indicate if he plans to have another royal commission or a similar body study the financial side of the economic activities, especially monetary policies, bearing in mind that the Bank Act will be up for review shortly.

Mr. Trudeau: There is no such plan for the immediate present, Mr. Speaker.

SPORTS

MONTREAL OLYMPICS, 1976—REVENUE FROM SALE OF COINS AND STAMPS—RESPONSIBILITY FOR POSSIBLE DEFICIT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question, of which I have given notice is directed to the Postmaster General and deals with Olympic financing. Although the minister had indicated to me personally that the revenue for olympic funds derived from sales of coins and stamps is on target thus far, which should make us all very happy, perhaps the minister could explain at this time how COJO expects to reach its anticipated goal of $200 million in coin sales alone by 1976 when the biannual report tabled by the Minister of Finance shows the net proceeds, less reserves, as of March 1974 are a mere $2.5 million?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his courtesy. The figures he quoted are correct as of April, but due to the fact that there has been more salesmanship in recent months the sales are now $68 million, $23 million of which represent profit. The hon. gentleman will be happy to know that tomorrow $800,000 will be turned over to the Canadian Olympic Association to help it promote amateur sport in Canada.

● (1500)

Mr. Jelinek: Naturally, it makes every member of the House happy that things are proceeding somewhat better.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: Is the minister prepared to assure this House, now, that in fact there will be no deficit whatsoever, and perhaps he is prepared to absorb personally any that there is?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I can only reiterate government policy, that the federal government has no intention of sharing in the deficit, should there be any, from the Olympic games. My responsibility is limited to the sale of coins and stamps and to be able to turn over to COJO as close to $250 million as possible. That is the sum total of my personal responsibility as minister.

BEEF CATTLE—POSSIBLE CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT WASHINGTON MEETING ON PROPOSED IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the continued very uncertain atmosphere in the Canadian cattle industry, and in particular the current calf markets in western Canada, will the minister now indicate if it is the intention of his department to attend and participate in the hearings in Washington on October 25 that will ascertain what retaliatory action the United States intends to take as a result of Canada's global quotas?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if I heard the hon. member correctly, he asked what retaliatory action the United States is going to take. Did I hear the question correctly?

Mr. Hargrave: My question concerned the meeting that is to be held on October 25 in Washington to discuss U.S. potential retaliatory action against Canada's global policy on live cattle and beef. Does the minister, or do representatives of his department, intend to take participatory action in this meeting?

Mr. Whelan: It has not yet been decided. We are prepared to do so if it is decided that that is the best thing. We must make sure that we give them proper notice. We have been meeting with the Cattleman's Association—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What a mess.

Mr. Horner: Now, agriculture is in a mess also.

Mr. Whelan: We have ample time to make a presentation to them if we wish. We feel we are on very solid ground, and what the hon. member is suggesting may not necessarily be so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On the basis that the government will survive the vote after completion of the throne speech debate today, would the government House leader indicate what legislation the government will be putting forward to the House in the next three or four days?

Mr. Sharp: On the basis of the same confidence, may I indicate the business that we would like to be dealt with by the House in the next few days. Tomorrow, I hope that by unanimous consent we can agree to debate the establishment of the committee to investigate egg marketing. I have had discussions with the various House leaders and I do not think there will be objection to proceeding without the ordinary notice. After that is disposed of, we will consider Bill C-14, the federal business development bank bill, followed by Bill C-9, the bill to amend the Export Development Act. On Monday we would like to call Bill C-22, the bill to amend the Canada Pension Plan. If that is disposed of before we reach supply on Wednesday, I have in mind the possibility of calling Bill C-15 and Bill C-4 to use up the intervening time.

Mr. Baldwin: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would inform the hon. gentleman now that, as usual, we are prepared to compensate for delays in government activity and give our consent to proceeding tomorrow with the debate on the establishment of the committee. That, of course, is without prejudice to our right to seek to improve it or to reject it if we think that should be our policy.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Actually, I tried to do that at the proper moment a while ago but was unable to gain recognition from the Chair at the time.

In reply to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister directly criticized my right to question or to criticize appointments that he makes. I submit that it is the right and privilege of any member of this House to question or to criticize any appointment whatsoever made by the government or by the Prime Minister when the individual being appointed is being paid from public funds, even the appointment of Mr. Pitfield.

While the Prime Minister's remarks may be in keeping with his own attitude and wishes, they are not in keeping with the democratic process. I believe, therefore, I am entitled to regard my rights and privileges as a member of this House, and therefore indirectly the rights and privileges of all members of the House, as having been threatened by the Prime Minister, who is apparently seeking to arrogantly place himself beyond the bounds of criticism by elected representatives of the people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While the hon. member may regard the remarks of any hon. member of the House as perhaps threatening his rights and privileges, may I remind him that ultimately the guardian of the rights and privileges of every member is not the Prime Minister or any other member of the House, but is in fact the Chair, who I hope will be able adequately to safeguard the rights of all hon. members.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I just want to gently set the hon. member for Leeds at rest. If he reads my answer in Hansard, he will see I did not criticize his right to ask questions about appointments. I indicated that I doubted whether it would be good parliamentary practice for him to criticize movements in and out of cabinet. I do not think that is the right of opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order that is supplementary to the one raised by the hon. member for Peace River and directed to the President of the Privy Council. Since we have received notice from the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council that there will be reform of the rules of this institution, has the government House leader any intention of so instructing the committee on procedure and organization which, ostensibly, will be dealing with some of these rules and reforms; and if so, when?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is our intention in the next few days to try to get this committee organized. There are some estimates that should be referred to it. I agree with the hon. member and hope I will receive his co-operation in amending the rules of the House.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Louis Duclos for an address to His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Miss Monique Bégin (Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was submitting my views on parliamentary reform as an essential means of dealing with the concrete, complex and numerous problems facing Canadians. More specifically, I was addressing myself to the working tool of an ordinary MP—the committee work. I said that a standing committee is, unfortunately, not a working group. I spoke of the lack of flexibility in its functioning.

In my view, and I believe this is the raison d'être of standing or special committees, a committee should be composed of a small number of members of all parties who are interested in a given field of government activity and specialize in that field, to alleviate the work load of the House at large. It is a delegation of mandate from all members through Mr. Speaker to a necessarily restricted number of colleagues for reasons of efficiency. Therefore, expertise, special interest, relative stability of membership and a sense of national purpose and responsibility are, or should be, essential characteristics of committees. This presupposes a restricted number of members, because it is simply not feasible for 20 or 30 members, or even 16 as a maximum, to do this. I understand that this last proposal was rejected two weeks ago by the official opposition, without explanation.

If my understanding is right, committees are to study budget estimates, legislative measures or current controversial problems.

I still do not understand why no planning of priorities stemming first from members on the committee, and based on the priorities submitted by the government and on those submitted by members on the committee in their capacity as "specialized" members of the House, is being developed and adopted.

I regret to say, Madam Speaker, that our present debates are something worse than shooting clay pigeons in complete darkness.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: That is what I have been witnessing for a year and a half, and this Parliament is making a pretty bad start again. Procedures regulating that pigeon shooting appear precarious, mysterious and, earnestly speaking, still too encumbered by procedures and regulations of a House whose members are 15 times as numerous as a committee.

I understand the present credibility of committees is practically nil, and this is illustrated by two other facts: the fact that a committee is unable to initiate a task without a mandate from the Speaker, and the fact that reports from committees that are tabled in the House are not being used. As a newcomer, who still has a lot to learn, I am not convinced but I believe we might wonder whether a simple and quick mechanism should not be designed to enable a committee to ask for and obtain from the House the power to initiate complementary tasks deemed essential.

I believe a good report from a committee should matter once it has been tabled. Besides, the credibility of a committee and the seriousness of its activities should help shorten the duration of speeches by members of the House, as I suggested yesterday, on the third maybe even on the second reading of any bill.

Madam Speaker, I would also like to suggest that the third aspect of committee work—investigations—should be referred only to special committees or special joint committees of the Senate and this House with specific terms of references of the task force or project-oriented types. I typify here the investigation by the need to call witnesses other than ministers and their officials, as well as those responsible for our various government or parapublic agencies, to avoid standing committees getting lost in royal commissions of enquiry, and I think I know what I am talking about.

Thus two special terms of references given to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts in the first session of the last Parliament—needless to say that I am voicing here an entirely personal view—resulted in an imbroglio, and led us to hear respectively 32 and 21 witnesses on top of our regular work. Regular members on the standing committee could have been dispatched to a special committee to examine those two particular terms of references, eventually with other colleagues from the House of Commons.

Those are, Madam Speaker, a few of my thoughts that come to mind in face of the partisanship and the malfunctioning of committees. As a full time member of Parliament, that is the best instrument of work available to me, I would specify the instrument of work that the public can see, because I also consider the caucus as an instrument of work particularly valuable as a source of influence for all members on the government side.

So I consider the time I must spend in committee as important. I want those reforms as do a great number of my colleagues for that matter. The only thing missing is a consensus to avoid partisanship because I consider that the number of other platforms is quite adequate to accept during the time spent in committee to put the lid on or simply put in the freezer partisan passions, contentions for the leadership of certain parties I shall not name, and pre-electoral campaigns on everyone's part, including us.

Last night and again this morning I was told that I was a radical, or an activist. I should have liked to close my speech by quoting two paragraphs written by Alexis de Tocqueville who wrote a book, somewhat the way an entomologist would have done, on democracy in America. He describes our aptitudes as slightly too parochial, and our verbal inflation. Tocqueville wrote those words, which even now could prove embarrassingly timely, in 1835.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, like all those who spoke before me, I should like to offer my most sincere congratulations to you, to the new Speaker (Mr. Jerome) as well as to the movers (Messrs. Lee and Duclos) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I should also like to congratulate the new hon. members and wish them every success.

Madam Speaker, last spring the government was defeated on the budget. Since then, there has been a general election the results of which we are all aware.

● (1520)

This government has indeed a majority and the public impatiently expects some measures likely to restore a most precarious situation.

As a member of the opposition, I shall demand a great deal from this government in the interest, of course, not only of my constituents but also in the interest of every citizen of Canada.

I shall not explain at length why this government has been defeated, that belongs to the past, and I want to say that given the lack of appropriate measures that would have improved the condition of all Canadians, in view of this state of affairs, it seems that the government's defeat last Spring was warranted. In any event, the people have decided by a vast majority to give a new mandate to this government and I intend to respect the people's wishes, and since the absolute majority of my constituents have trusted me I would like to than them in passing, in a very special manner. And were it for them alone, I have a duty to fill in this Chamber and I fully intend to do so.

Is my duty as a member in the opposition simply to fight the government rightly or not, by mere tradition? Certainly not. Many members must think so. But to those who hold or who are tempted to hold that opinion, I dare say they are mistaken and that people expect from all of us much more objectivity that we have displayed up to now. And this is true for members on both sides of the House.

I think it is about time we accept to work positively and discharge seriously our responsibilities. I will describe some of these later on.

Madam Speaker, I have listened to a number of very interesting speeches. I noted the leader of my party demanded and will demand intensive action for the Canadians. I support him fully. We all know full well that despite the Speech from the Throne, there seems to be a blatant lack of specific measures to cope with a problem hurting all Canada, inflation. That concerns not only members of the House but also the great majority of Canadians.

I also have in mind a few points raised particularly by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), particularly on bilingualism which is a question that concerns me in a very special way. He discussed the importance of its implementation in the civil service which I strongly support. He hopes that this movement will soon be irreversible on a short-term basis in the civil service. I think that the right hon. Prime Minister's wish is shared by the head of my party and also by many members on this side of the House. Personally, I hope that this wish will come true and I think this will be a great justice rendered to those who are French-speaking and who have had complaints for a long time.

I would also like to discuss certain opinions that were given in this House concerning Bill 22. I would like to reassure those who are worried and tell them not to be too concerned with this bill that the Quebec government has recently adopted. I would also like to say that I will always do everything in my power to support the use of the French language in the province of Quebec. In my opinion, no hon. member can blame us on this point because I think that we can say that, as Quebecers, we have always respected the wishes of the minority. Anyway, we accept the situation of the majority in this country. And in the province of Quebec there are people who strongly wish to use the French language. It is a need. Besides, the Prime Minister has made his opinion known and I support him on this. Bill 22 does not seem to satisfy everyone in the province of Quebec. A certain group finds that the bill does not go far enough, another finds that it goes too far. In any event, I believe that we cannot condemn the majority of Quebecers for favoring the use of French. As Quebecers, we must demand, as the public service is doing, that the French language be used for the large proportion of French-speaking people in the country.

We could perhaps also ask ourselves some questions. I know that the government of Quebec has long requested that the federal government grant it additional powers for selecting immigrants. If the federal government had agreed, perhaps the government of Quebec would not have had to pass a law which seems very hard for a certain group even though it does not bother me, Madam Speaker. Perhaps the federal government should have replied by giving concrete examples to such requests from the Quebec government, which would have allowed Quebec to direct immigrants towards the French language immediately on their arrival in Quebec.

I also noted an important aspect of the speech of the Prime Minister, when he talked about amendments to our procedure and to the rules of this House and I have heard other members underline this fact. We must recognize that the present rules allow us to do stupid things, but they do not force us to do so.

We also know that throughout the years, we have used these rules as we liked, too often to gain electoral advantages. I therefore hope that I shall not shock anyone by asking this question. I believe that we have abused these rules. In my opinion, the Prime Minister has made a suggestion that is interesting but which could be improved, and in this way, we could also better ourselves.

Madam Speaker, regardless of the changes that we can make, if each member wants to use the rules in his own way, this House can always be prevented from being as effective as we would wish.

We will do something worth while first by changing the atmosphere in the House. But partisanship unfortunately exists too often. I do not want to blame anybody, because I could perhaps accuse everybody including myself of showing at times that tendency to agree or disagree with a measure according as it is electorally profitable or not. But I believe the people are greatly worried about the behaviour of each member in this House. That could be greatly improved before we consider changing the standing orders. That would improve tremendously the efficiency of this House and would arouse among Canadians much greater confidence than they now have towards parliament members or parliament itself.

That is regrettable but such is the system, Madam Speaker, and I often deplored it. We have a party system of course, and it is always regrettable to feel that the government is introducing measures which too often are unfortunately geared to electoral profitability. It is also a matter of regret to feel that the opposition tends as well to stand in opposition for election purposes. And such has been the case since long before 1968 and the government members who blame the opposition for adopting an inflexible stance did the same when the roles were reversed. We could have seen the same thing if the government had changed.

I believe we should sincerely consider our stand as parliament members, our responsibilities. What are our responsibilities as government members or as opposition members? As opposition members, I believe it is our responsibility to stimulate the government, to invite it, to encourage it, to force it to introduce measures taking into account the welfare of the population as a whole. That is the duty of a member of the opposition.

I want to emphasize them, Madam Speaker, because I have often had the opportunity of talking about them outside the House. As to the possible procedural changes, I suggest we must be willing to change ourselves first. We must confess that we have often failed—and I state this objectively—in respect of the aspirations of the Canadian people who gave us their confidence. It is therefore our duty to demand enormously from the government and to support the best pieces of legislation which are introduced. We must force the government into accelerating things, instead of looking for all sorts of ways to deprive it of an image which may be flattering during an election campaign.

I prefer to say to my constituents that I have seconded some measures, whether they came from the opposition or from the government, after being assured of their value, rather than saying that being in the opposition I had to vote against the government. I find such an attitude negative and I regret that because of a system, of an institution, of a tradition or a custom, we often find embarrassing the position we have to take. The system commits our conscience and I do not think this can be overstated.

On both sides of the House there has been some position statements which were embarrassing for the government members as well as for the opposition. I have had great problems in this area. Then as I still have a desire to serve society and the community that place confidence in me I wish to say, as this session begins, that I intend to maintain my freedom of speech keeping in mind the interest of society. Who could blame me for it, Madam Speaker? And I know that it is the desire of every member of Parliament, but because of the system, of the circumstances and a few other reasons, we often find it embarrassing.

We have the obligation to fulfill our commitments. As members of Parliament, and I think of the new members, we also have some aims. Those new members have the intention and the willingness to cooperate in the structuration of a more valuable society. I understand then. There are also the election promises, the commitments made during an election campaign. I, for one, was not afraid to say in my constituency that, if we had to form a government, as it could have happened, we should not hesitate to guarantee milk producers the $10.13 recommended since January 1, 1974. Furthermore, we promised to give the old age security pension gradually, at the age of 60.

If we had formed the government, through an agreement reached by the majority in caucus, I could have been told: You know, since we are in power, it is not so urgent; it would be better to introduce these measures before another election. As several commitments of the government will be carried out only before a new election, I would never have accepted a delay in keeping our commitments, in adopting measures which are so urgent. This is why it is so important to remind hon. members of their prime responsibility in this House, a responsibility which is mine as well and I would like it to be shared by all the members of the government who should soon be accountable for the promises they made during the last election campaign.

Unfortunately and rudely in certain cases, dishonesty is publicly shown every day, because it is customary and usual to believe that only a few individuals are involved and in reference to the government, that the cabinet has the jurisdiction and knows the truth and for some reasons that we all know, the members are compelled to give in because it is always dangerous and unfortunate to experience a possible setback when one does not comply with a decision taken by the cabinet.

We have in our party as in others some discussions which following a majority vote must define the policy of our political party in this House. However, this does not prevent us, and you will admit it, Madam Speaker, from upholding regional interests and fulfiling some personal undertakings as, I believe, many members have taken during the election campaign.

Convinced that the best evidence is examples, I could ask why the government refrains from giving a $500 grant to any new owner. The promise was made, I believe, on June 22. I will not ask the Prime Minister to make it retroactive to June 22, but I sincerely think that he was canvassing for votes when he made that promise. A number of my constituents spoke to me about it. I did not hesitate to say that I would support such a measure, but several were tempted to support the present government because for them a $500 grant for the construction of a new house was quite attractive.

Why does this government not undertake immediately at least to make it retroactive to the 8th of July? The Prime Minister was saying then that if he formed the government he would apply that measure. But when? In a year, six months? There are indeed thousands of new owners who will be deprived and fail to receive that subsidy, and perhaps the majority of them voted for the government. That might be unvoluntary dishonesty, but I do not think so. The Prime Minister is too intelligent, for that, Madam Speaker.

However, I blame the government for not responding. I think the majority of Liberal members would be quiet happy to give a subsidy of $500, retroactive to July 8 last, to those new owners. That is what I call equity but we do not have that.

Why did this government not hear the government of Quebec on several points? With indeed a sizeable Quebec representation why in the field of immigration, for example, did the Quebec minister not lend an attentive ear to the federal government? Why are we having so many difficulties in the field of communication in Quebec with a team including so many Quebecers? I think the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) openly supported the claim of $360 million made by Mr. Choquette with respect to protective services. How is it he was the only one to do so?

I do not hesitate to support the request made by Mr. Choquette in that respect. I know many Quebecers are tempted to support the request made by Mr. Choquette and the Quebec government. But because of a system and to respect a party line that province which gave such serious support to this government is betrayed everyday. I regret that attitude, Madam Speaker. I will shun today from blaming this government for its attitude but during this session I will come back on those questions.

So a formula should be found which would allow every member to vindicate in full freedom the interests of those who elected him, and to define more clearly perhaps the vote of confidence given to the government. Would it be sacrilegious, Madam Speaker, for the hon. members to be free to vote for one piece of legislation and to support another one which does not meet the needs of a region like mine or like one of another hon. member?

If such legislation is defeated in the House, why not require a confidence vote immediately? It is possible that an hon. member, even on the government side, is against a measure brought in by his government. But this does not mean that the hon. member has lost his party's or his government's confidence.

Because of completely regional commitments and interests, we may even be forced to vote against a bill. But this does not mean that we condemn our own party or that this party has lost confidence in its government. If we could define this fact by a formula, that others better qualified than myself could devise, we could perhaps give freedom of speech to the members of this House. Who does not want to have freedom of speech? We all wish it, and we have problems with the present system. Otherwise, we are forced to take part in so-called political games and, Madam Speaker, the public has had enough of this.

I have not accepted this, Madam Speaker, and neither have certain other members. We are often embarrassed by a system which has remained unchanged, by traditions that we do not want to lose, by what has become a daily practice. This is unfortunate because we are losing the confidence of the population, who wonders why Parliament is not more effective and loses so much time discussing certain pieces of legislation. It is not the rules that should be changed, but the attitudes of men and women. I hope that this session will see a much more objective Parliament that will stop fooling the population of Canada by accepting that this is our system and that we must keep it just as it is.

I believe that whatever legislation is brought forward in this House, it will be effective only if the attitudes and the mentality of those who make up this Parliament truly change. By accepting our well-defined roles, in other words, the freedom that we need, we shall stop leaving it to our poor people who have been waiting for so long and often die of suffering because the government or Parliament behaved too often more like politicians than businessmen.

Madam Speaker, if we take seriously our legislative duties and treat individuals with the respect they deserve, we shall behave quite differently and pass legislation which will benefit our people for many years to come. We must examine the possibility of granting the old age security pension at an earlier age. I am aware that, during the past election campaign, the Prime Minister did not reject the possibility of granting the old age security pension at age 63 or 64, whether on a conditional basis or not. We can easily imagine the happy results that such a policy would yield. It would then be less urgent to put such a measure into effect. It is unfortunate, Madam Speaker, but we must give a well-earned rest to those people and find work for the young who are disheartened by unemployment.

Furthermore, I wish to request from the Minister of National Health and Welfare special and additional funds for the New Horizons Program. This is a marvelous experiment. I had a chance to meet with many groups of persons asking for grants, and rightly so. I do not think there is any better social measure than that announced by the government a few years ago, but there is a problem, that is a lack of funds. I wonder if it will be possible this year to double the funds to meet the needs of all those senior citizens' clubs requesting a small grant to acquire the means and facilities they need so that elderly people may meet and enjoy life for a long time.

So, Madam Speaker, I think the minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) should seriously consider the feasibility of granting additional funds.

I would like also to deal with the difficult situation in which the farmers are, and which is due to the lack of proper action from the government over the last few years. Of course, we will have again the opportunity to discuss those problems on many occasions. But I wonder, Madam Speaker, if the hon. minister presently in the House will do something. I think he is aware of the agricultural problems and that he is not lacking good will in respect of the farming group. But I dare ask for his particular attention, keeping in mind the current state of stagnation in which farming is in Canada, and this in every area. I wonder to what extent there are some measures with a view to not only upholding but also upgrading farming. Lacking funds is of course a major problem, but to what extent should we consider the importance of stabilizing again that sector of activity which produces so many things across the country?

And if we do not tackle shortly the job of providing farmers with sufficient income, we shall repent dearly. I believe city dwellers should understand better than they did up to now how important adequate revenues are to the farmers. I therefore ask the minister to increase at the earliest possible date subsidies to milk producers, and to understand the importance of indexing prices to production costs. It may not be the best thing long-term wise, I agree, but we can no longer delay giving these producers adequate returns if we are to prove that we care about agriculture's problems. In so doing, we will be meeting the interests of all Canadian consumers.

Madam Speaker, I ask in conclusion that all members give some thought not only to the proposed changes in the standing orders, but to changing their own attitudes. How can we make government much more efficient, interesting and productive for society? With a little self-restraint, leaving partisanship to country hustings in areas where no problems exist but which have a lot of room for party bickering. We must first and above all care for the interests of the people who have long been awaiting action from their elected representatives. In this way we would much more deservedly carry on from our predecessors.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I must congratulate you on presiding over our deliberations this afternoon with such charm and competence. I also wish to mention the election of our new Speaker, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome). We have no doubt about his ability to make an outstanding contribution to the work of the House of Commons. His intimate knowledge of the House itself and of its committees system will stand him in good stead in the work of guiding the chamber. The mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne deserve our gratitude for reminding us once again that good preparation is still one of the essential elements of successful speechmaking in the House of Commons.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), who is at once my successor and my predecessor, set an excellent tone in his speech last Friday when asking us to consider ways and means of making the House of Commons more responsive to the growing demands on its time and energies. I wish him well in his exacting new responsibilities as I pay tribute to his many great achievements in the portfolio which I have the honour presently to hold.

I cannot look back upon the twenty-ninth parliament without a touch of nostalgia. A majority government is sensible, but a minority parliament is undoubtedly livelier. In fact, the past two years have been among the most interesting and action-filled in Canada's political history. The success of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in making the twenty-ninth parliament, despite the minority situation, among Canada's most productive, and in leading this party to a commanding position in the House of Commons, is certainly a marvellous indication of his mastery of the art of politics and must be included among the peaks of Canada's parliamentary and political history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I regarded my work as leader of the House in the twenty-ninth parliament as very important, bringing me, as it did, in close association with members in all quarters of the House. Many people thought that moving from the job I had to my present job was an elevation. I thought the work I was doing as the government leader of the House of Commons was useful and important, and probably as useful and important as any work I have done in the past or will do in the future.

● (1550)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: However, I am not now in that role and I want to say a few words about my new responsibilities. Hon. members may know that recently I had the opportunity of attending the General Assembly of the United Nations; a reappearance, I might add, after an interval of almost 20 years. That opportunity gave me a platform from which I could express the Canadian point of view on a number of issues. It also gave me an opportunity to hold discussions with a considerable number of foreign ministers who were attending the General Assembly. I want to deal briefly with only two of these meetings, one with the Soviet foreign minister and the other with the Indian foreign minister.

My discussion with Mr. Gromyko was held in a friendly and informal atmosphere. We covered a number of multilateral and bilateral subjects. In particular, we had a most encouraging exchange of views on the question of family reunification. We agreed that the situation had improved in the past few years, and Mr. Gromyko felt that the future would bring further improvement. Indeed, his positive approach prompts me to think that a more flexible attitude on the departure of people from the Soviet Union and on the movement of people in general may be forthcoming. It would be good if this attitude were to be adopted by certain other east European countries.

My conversation with the Indian foreign minister was, not surprisingly, devoted to the proliferation of nuclear explosive devices. I deplored the Indian nuclear explosion and Mr. Singh expressed its peaceful purpose. I pointed out that we saw no distinction between peaceful and non-peaceful nuclear explosions. Mr. Singh said that India had no intention of developing nuclear weapons. The exchange did not narrow our differences, but I hope I left in the mind of the Indian foreign minister a realization of the deep concern of the Canadian people over the consequences of that explosion. I urged that India give immediate consideration to ways by which the problem for the international community could be resolved.

My brief period at the United Nations, in addition to a number of these talks, certainly brought home to me quite forcefully the nature of the global problems facing us all today and which the United Nations is presently tackling. One need only mention three areas of profound concern in order to underline the relevance of the United Nations and the work of its members to the present concerns of the world. The three areas, of course, are the law of the sea, the world population, and world food problems.

Let me say a word about the law of the sea conference which I attended in August with my colleagues, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) and the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc). Our purpose in going there was to see for ourselves what had been achieved on the many issues of vital interest to Canada that were being negotiated at the conference. I found, and I feel my colleagues did also, that great progress had been made and that the conference had begun to reshape the law of the sea on the basis of radical new concepts, many of which have been pioneered by Canada.

For nearly 300 years, the law of the sea has been founded on the simplistic concept of total freedom of the high seas, not a freedom that goes hand in hand with responsibility as in any civilized system of law but an unfettered freedom based on laissez faire. I believe the Caracas conference demonstrated to all the world, in unmistakable terms, that the days of this laissez faire law of the sea are over. The negotiations made clear that the new law of the sea will be founded on three new, radical concepts strongly supported by Canada and by its delegation and, I believe, by all parties in the House of Commons. The first such concept negotiated by Canada and Iceland, and endorsed unanimously at the 1972 Stockholm conference on the environment, is the need to manage ocean space and the particular interest of the coastal state in such management.

The second such concept, also pioneered by Canada, is that of the economic zone, extending coastal state jurisdiction out to 200 miles for the purpose of conservation of fisheries, preservation of the marine environment and ownership of the resources of the sea bed. The third such concept, also strongly supported by Canada, is that of reserving the sea bed beyond national jurisdiction for the common heritage of mankind and for purely peaceful purposes.

At the Caracas conference we saw, for the first time, evidence of the willingness not only of smaller powers but of the major nations of the world to accept these new doctrines. In more specific terms, the Caracas conference revealed, first, a widespread willingness to accept a 12-mile territorial sea, already established by Canada, although further difficult negotiations will be required concerning rights of passage through international straits; second, the majority acceptance of the concept of the economic zone; and third, the acceptance of coastal state ownership and control of the continental shelf.

Not surprisingly, there remained differences of opinion as to the precise nature and extent of these new rights, but it is clear at least that under the 200-mile economic zone concept the overwhelming majority of states support the principles of coastal state exclusive management and preferential fishing rights of coastal stocks, guaranteeing to Canada's fishermen, for example, that they will be able to keep all they can catch. I must say that the highly migratory and anadromous species remain sources of great difficulty. As we know, relatively few countries produce salmon and we have not yet obtained majority support for a high seas ban on salmon. We are, however, engaged in very vigorous negotiations on this question and will be pursuing them even between sessions of the conference.

Differences of view remain, also, concerning the nature and extent of coastal state rights to preserve the marine environment and control scientific research; but at Caracas, for the first time, there were substantive negotiations on these questions which showed real promise of success. Similarly, Canada has not yet obtained majority acceptance of coastal sovereign rights over the sea bed and the 200 miles to the edge of the continental margin, but a large number of countries have supported our position and this support was extended at Caracas.

Canada has for many years exercised exclusive sovereign rights over the resources of its entire continental shelf on the basis of the 1958 convention on the continental shelf, of decisions of the international court and of the practice of states, and we do not intend to relinquish these rights. In sum, we have come a long way since those days when, just a few years ago, we began to attempt to alter the law of the sea. The success already achieved makes it evident that this is no time to be taking further unilateral action between two rounds of negotiations. The possibility of such action cannot be ruled out should the law of the sea conference fail, but it has every prospect of success. I believe we, as Canadians, can take some satisfaction from the leading role Canada has played and is continuing to play in this field.

As hon. members know, the conference will resume in the spring. At that time it is firmly hoped that the actual treaty drafting will begin and that perhaps later in the year of Caracas it will be possible to have a signing ceremony. There is one conclusion which ought to strike home among the fishermen of Canada; that is the overwhelming majority support for a regime of fisheries management including at least 200 miles. That certainly is a very major gain from the Canadian point of view.

Now may I say a word about another global problem with reference to the world population conference. I did not have an opportunity to attend this conference which was held at Bucharest last August. Such a conference, until recent times, probably would have been inconceivable. But nations, driven by the inexorable pressure of population on the world's resources, came together in the world population conference in an effort to define for the first time in history certain common principles and objectives to guide them in the population field.

The Canadian government decided as early as May, 1972, when it approved the Canadian position for the Stockholm conference on the human environment, to take part in the world population conference. Lengthy preparations for Canadian participation were made. Public hearings were held in six centres across the country. Consultations with provincial authorities took place. Account was taken of opinion expressed at numerous public seminars. From all this certain fundamental considerations emerged as guidance for the Canadian delegation at the Bucharest conference. I believe the validity of these considerations was subsequently confirmed by the proceedings and the results of the conference itself.

The first of these considerations was that in an increasingly interdependent world the population problem was a global one; it just could not be examined in isolation from such global issues as food shortages, the widening gap between rich and poor, the equitable and efficient utilization of resources and energy, and the intensified pressures on a finite environment. This conference must be seen in the context of other conferences, the conference on the human environment especially, the United Nations General Assembly session on resources and development, the law of the sea conference and the forthcoming world food conference. Bucharest was not a substitute for these conferences. It was incumbent upon the world population conference to ensure that the concerns of these other conferences were taken into account and reflected in its conclusions.

The second consideration was that the population problem is not only quantitative but is qualitative. As my colleague, the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé), who led the Canadian delegation, said, "Our subject is people; not only their global members but more importantly the quality of their lives." I would say, also, the quality of their attitudes. This double dimension of the problem was reflected in the agenda, which provided for discussion not only on population growth and trends but also on the organic relationships between population on the one hand and economic development, resources and the environment, the family and human rights, on the other.

Quantitatively the magnitude of the population problem can be illustrated by a few striking figures. It is estimated that the population of the world has increased, in absolute numbers, from 2½ billion in 1950 to nearly 4 billion today. It is expected to reach at least 6½ billion by the year 2000. When this problem is viewed primarily in this cold and stark perspective, the establishment of targets and growth rates to be attained over a fixed period of time by compulsive family planning and birth control may, rationally, appear to be the only real solution, especially in the overpopulated developing countries.

Qualitatively, however, the problem is affected by a range of complex factors. The majority of conference participants emphasized that reproduction behaviour and fertility patterns are conditioned by traditions, religious beliefs, cultural and moral values, and economic and social development in the domestic and international evolution. As is evident from the general statement to the conference by the Minister of the Environment, and from other Canadian interventions, the Canadian delegation was fully conscious of these factors and their place in the world population plan of action.

The third consideration underlying the Canadian position was the diversity of the population problems confronting the developed and developing countries and the various regions and continents of the world. Almost every delegation at Bucharest described at length their particular geography, demography and economic circumstances. The implication was that, while it might be possible to devise broad principles, it could be expected they could only be applied with the consent and the understanding of the sovereign nations themselves. I believe that motivated by these considerations the Canadian delegation was able to play an active, co-operative and useful role in all bodies of the conference. The delegation helped to ensure that the world population plan of action contained as balanced and realistic a relationship as possible between population and economic and social development.

While the Canadian program of international development assistance in population control has been channelled until now almost exclusively through multilateral agencies, Canada declared at Bucharest its willingness to discuss with interested parties the possibility of increased action through bilateral channels. The Canadian delegation provided leadership in obtaining recognition of the need to consider natural resources and the environment in the formulation of population policies and in giving full attention to the proper utilization of resources and the minimization of waste.

The world population plan of action, endorsed by consensus at the conference, reflects broad agreement of the international community on population issues. Only the Holy See, for doctrinal reasons, dissociated itself from the world population plan of action. Some observers have been critical of the outcome. Some, reflecting a western approach, expected a general international recognition of the problem of overpopulation. Others espoused the thesis of developing countries, that their population growth rates can only be brought into line with those of developed countries as a result of rapid economic and social development involving the transfer of real resources from rich to poor countries.

The most ardent defenders of both schools of thought seemed to share a high degree of conviction, dogmatism, anxiety and impatience which spoke of their deep sincerity but which tended to impair their political credibility. The fact is that the world population plan of action, imperfect as it is, represents a real achievement, an international consensus never achieved before in a highly sensitive field. It will be a useful charter upon which future action may be based on international, regional and national levels.

May I conclude by referring to another global issue that will be dealt with early in November at the world food conference in Rome. This conference is also held under the auspices of the United Nations. Like the population problem, the world food problem is massive and is not susceptible of one solution. There is, indeed, no single food problem: it arises from a complex interaction between human beings and resources in vastly differing societies. Many developing countries now face immediate problems of severe food shortages, high prices for food and other imports, and of rapidly vanishing foreign exchange reserves.

It is understandable that these countries will press at the conference for additional food aid, and that additional food aid will be necessary. However, it is clear to the government of Canada that the long-term problem cannot be met exclusively on these terms. Developing countries will have to devote much more of their own resources to food production and agricultural production. Undoubtedly, it will involve, for developing countries, upsetting long standing and and cherished goals related to industrialization and other major changes in their social and economic development schemes. In essence, developing countries will probably need to accord agricultural development the greatest priority.

This is one of the main issues before the conference, and the major objective will be to devise means of helping developing countries improve their production as a joint international endeavour. To this end, Canada must be prepared to give greater emphasis in its bilateral aid programs to agricultural development in developing countries. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) knows, we possess great technical expertise in this field which can be marshalled for this international purpose.

I mention one other point in connection with the world food conference because our position has not been finally clarified by the government. It is this: a number of proposals have been advanced for the establishment of funds and other institutional arrangements to assist in the development of agricultural sectors of developing countries. We would want to make sure that the institutions for channelling aid are so constituted as to make the best use of all funds available. If a proposal of this kind were to secure acceptance among donors at the conference, I am sure that Canadians would wish to take an active part in any such undertaking.

At the FAO conference in November of last year, certain proposals were made with respect to the co-ordinated stockholding of grain. The conference was attended by my colleague. If this proposal is raised at the world food conference, naturally Canada will want to give it support and urge its broadest possible acceptance. I have touched on very few of the problems that will be raised at the world food conference, but I hope the broad terms in which I have outlined them are sufficient to point up the great importance of this conference, for food means survival, and in this increasingly interdependent world it means the survival of us all.

May I say in conclusion that in all these forums—the law of the sea conference, the world population conference, and the world food conference—global problems affecting the welfare of all human beings are being discussed and grappled with. There is an interrelationship between theme and subject matter, and all are part of our effort to work toward global management of the earth's physical and human resources. Canada, as a member of the international community, will attempt to play a constructive role in grappling with these global problems.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question? The minister mentioned that he conferred with the representative of India and the United Nations, and mentioned one subject. Did they discuss the food shortage in India, and did the representative of India make any proposal to the minister with regard to the necessity for food, the amount involved or any specific proposal so far as Canada is concerned?

Mr. MacEachen: I think I can reply directly and frankly to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on this point. Our discussion lasted about 45 minutes and it was confined exclusively to the question of the nuclear explosion—the Canadian attitude and the Indian attitude. The question of food aid was not raised at that meeting, to my recollection.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, the minister referred at length to the law of the sea conference and said that the government had strongly supported such concepts as economic zones, and so forth. People in my riding are greatly affected by this conference. I would ask the minister to elaborate on what he means by "strongly supported". What kind of understanding was reached at the conference which would indicate strong support for protecting salmon and other stocks on the west coast from depletion? Fishermen in my riding and also people on the west coast are concerned about this question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I appreciate the hon. member's wish to ask questions of the minister. However, the 30-minute rule does apply. Although questions may be put to the minister and, of course, he may respond, it would have to be with the unanimous consent of the House, because the minister's time would in fact be extended. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I was distracted and as a result did not get the full impact of the question.

Mr. Friesen: I was referring to the minister's statement that we had strongly supported the concept of economic zones. I should like, on behalf of the people in my riding and fishermen on the west coast, to have an elaboration of what he means by "strong support." What kind of activities did they undertake at the conference which would ensure the preservation of the salmon stock and other fisheries?

Mr. MacEachen: In a sense, these are two related but separate issues. The first is the question of the economic zone, which involves the management of fisheries within the 200-mile area. Canada has not only supported that concept in its speeches and the activities of the delegation, but it is also continuing to press for management over the sea bed edge of the continental margin because in certain parts of Canada, especially on the Atlantic coast, the continental margin extends beyond the 200-mile limit. While there is overwhelming support for the 200-mile limit, there is still a great deal to be done by the Canadian delegation in gaining support for the additional parts. It might not apply as much to the west coast as it does to the east coast.

I think the work of the Canadian delegation in connection with salmon has been nothing short of—I was going to use the word "spectacular", but perhaps it is better to say it has been very impressive. I do not know if my hon. friend has seen the portfolio prepared by the Department of the Environment, which has been widely circulated, indicating in a very imaginative way the role and life cycle of the salmon and the necessity of undertaking a ban on its high seas fishing, and of granting to the state of origin greater rights and control over the whole life cycle of the salmon. I believe the efforts of the delegation have been real and solid, and we shall continue our efforts to obtain acceptance of this idea. As I have said, not many states have salmon, and they do not yet seem to be fully convinced of the Canadian position.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): First, I should like to congratulate Mr. Speaker upon his appointment. He lives just a couple of ridings to the north of me, so I am well aware of the splendid qualities he has exhibited over the years. I was intrigued by the reference of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) to Madam Speaker. How he, a bachelor, could have resisted all those charms over the years is more than I can understand, when it is clear that he recognizes them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, the only statement that really stood out in the Speech from the Throne was the admission that there was a bad economic situation throughout the world and that inflation was a worldwide problem. In my opinion, this ignored the fact that Canada is unique among nations in that it is self-sufficient in many things. Canada has its own food, it has energy, it has lumber, it has minerals, it has coal—and a great deal could have been done to control this country's inflation.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, we must face the fact that we are dependent upon exports. In looking over the latest statistics, I find that 50 per cent of what we grow and develop must be sold in world markets, sometimes competitively. It is interesting to note that we are losing those markets. Quantity sales are down, while dollar sales are up.

The Trudeau government promised to cut its spending but they were vague promises; there was nothing specific in them. In the same breath, the government said it was going to help home buyers. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no money with which to build houses, so how are home buyers to be helped? Housing starts are down by 60,000 from a year ago. That $500 election promise for people buying new homes has already been burned up by inflation. Housing starts are down; there is no capital available, so the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) is suggesting that we bring in foreign capital. He also says that if we do not control urban sprawl in the next ten years, half the population of Canada will reside in our four main cities. The increases proposed in social welfare programs are all good, Mr. Speaker, but there is plenty of room for a rip-off. Apparently one man was paid $11,000 on welfare and took off for a stay in Mexico. That raises the question of the accounting system. How efficient is it? This is what bothers people.

The Speech from the Throne also promised help for small businesses, and goodness knows it is needed when they are faced with the taxes this government demands. There was also talk of $500 million to be spent on transportation—railways, and so forth. There was, of course, a promise made every day or every other day, just whenever it would hit the headlines. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) now says this will not work, that the government cannot do it but the railways must do it. Is the government off the hook now? Just promises, promises, promises that cannot be kept, Mr. Speaker.

On top of all this, the government threatens businesses and blames them for inflation. It threatens to introduce a bill to control profits. But, Mr. Speaker, where is the evidence of big profits? People who invest in stocks do not get much out of their dividends. A company that pays dividends, pays 50 per cent corporation tax, and the shareholder is taxed on what he receives, so most of the profit goes back to the government in taxes. The government accuses business of profiteering, but where are the profits, and why are stocks at an all-time low? Probably the best test is the Canada Development Corporation which is owned by the government. How many millions of dollars has it lost for the Canadian taxpayer? I should like to know, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the government wants to find whipping-boys and never includes its own activities.

Perhaps the government will get the message from the Shah of Iran, who said the affluent industrial countries will have to spend less, work more, save more and be sure the people are not cheating when they are working. The shah wondered how we could pay more for people not to work than for those who do work. It is interesting to note that the President of the United States, Mr. Ford, felt that action to deal with inflation was of paramount importance. He stated that inflation could lick the United States more cruelly than any foreign power. He imposed a 5 per cent surtax on corporations and middle and upper income Americans with an income of $7,000 for single and $15,000 for married persons. He also moved at stimulating housing starts in a period of slump. What about Canada's slump of 60,000 housing starts, Mr. Speaker—and the government is not doing anything about it?

During the election campaign, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said that if he formed the government, within three months he would call together the provincial premiers, leaders in business and labour, and consumers and try to arrive at a consensus upon ways to control inflation. Yet here we are, on October 16, Mr. Speaker, and nothing has been done by this government to take such steps. President Ford suggested some things that could be done. Public works of special types could be undertaken when unemployment exceeds 6 per cent. Measures could be taken to reduce oil imports and to convert oil-burning plants to coal-burning and nuclear energy. Agricultural controls could be reduced. He also suggested it would be worth investigating ways of increasing automobile gas mileage, perhaps by as much as 40 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, to date Canada has done nothing regarding inflation, home grown or external. Surely a start could have been made by now. Was there any consultation with the Unites States? Not according to the remarks today of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). Government spending is one of the most potent sources of inflation. We have tremendous natural resources and raw materials in Canada, and only 22 million people, most of whom live within 100 miles of the Unites States border. All levels of government today are taking about 1 per cent per year from the private sector. Today it is getting close to 40 per cent of our gross national product. The government repeats that this is necessary because private industry cannot provide sufficient financing.

Government spending is a potent cause of inflation. The only answer, as some economists suggest, is to limit government spending to about 35 per cent of the gross national product. The printing of money should be tied to the increase in the gross national product. The printing of money is now largely uncontrolled by a slap-happy government. For example in 1950 the government spent about 25 per cent of our GNP. By 1960 it was spending about 30 per cent. Ten years later the figure had risen to 36 per cent, and today it is hitting the 40 per cent mark. In 1973, real growth was about 7 per cent, but the money supply increased by over 17 per cent. You may ask yourself, what's new? Why do we have these tremendous additional costs in certain programs, especially as not one major social service program has been implemented recently. We may have reached a point from which we cannot reverse ourselves.

Of great concern to me—the Secretary of State for External Affairs touched on this—is the fact that an ever dwindling work force will need to carry an ever larger tax load, and grow more food. If the population of Canada doubles, will this country be self-sufficient in food? I do not think so. Last year we imported $900 million worth of food. If our population doubled, would we become a nation of food importers? This problem will become very serious if the prediction that more than half our people will live in Canada's four largest cities is right.

In Canada, the fastest growing group is comprised of persons 65 years old and over. No longer are young people the fastest growing group. We hear talk of retirement at age 65 and of cutting retirement age to 60. What is wrong with us? Why are we doing this? Are we looking ahead? The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that adequate food and population control go hand in hand. He ought to have mentioned the tax load. Somebody must pay taxes for running the country. I suggest that the government establish a department concerned with geriatrics, because two million Canadians are presently over 65 years old. People should be able to retire on health grounds, physical or mental, before age 65. Some people at 50 are mentally and physically older than others are at 70. In future it may be necessary to scrap the idea of compulsory retirement because we need to retain skilled people in the work force.

No land on this planet remains undiscovered today, and the world is rapidly running short of food. The "knowledge explosion" has led to a phenomenal rise in the number of aged. Better health care, antibiotics and treatment facilities have given us a longer life span. Mr. Speaker, 2000 years ago, with the advent of the Christian era, a man's life span was 22 years. In the Middle Ages it rose to 30 years. At the turn of the twentieth century it was 50 years. Now it is more than 70 years for men, and 75 years for women. As medical science has improved, so has life expectancy. Soon life expectancy will rise to age 80 and over; it is still increasing. In the U.S.A. in 1900, one in 25 of the population was over 65. Three million Americans were in that age bracket. In 1960 there were 16,560,000 people over 65 years old, which is one person in every 17. Soon, in Canada, two million people will be 65 years old and over. These people will make up one in every 11 of our population. By 1980 the average American can expect to live to 80 years, and one in seven will be 65 or over. Further, there are several thousand centenarians living in the United States.

Northeast of the Khyber Pass area of northern Pakistan, which borders on China on the east and the U.S.S.R. on the north, is Hunza, an area containing about 25,000 people who live a rugged life and eat grains, cereals, fresh fruits, vegetables, milk, cheese, grapes and rice. It is claimed that Hanjakut males live to 120. The Russians, at the university of Kharkov, have under observation and study about 6,000 people who are over 100 years old. These observations raise this question: what about our quality of life? Must a man's declining years be spend in loneliness, boredom, frustration, and with the conviction that he is unwanted? Must the younger members of society who make up the labour force carry on their backs more and more taxes to support an ever increasing number of older people? Or, on the other hand, will we fully utilize the abilities, wisdom and experiences which have been gained over the years? Should we not use all those who are physically and mentally fit, as long as they can contribute, and want to, to society?

Is it not sad to think that we do not even shudder at the economic loss resulting from cutting a man off from his work? If an older person retires, we lose the benefit of all his education, all his skills and all his knowledge which cost so much to accumulate. Mr. Speaker, every day is a school day for all of us. Will we create a group of people who have been forced out of the work force at age 65 by compulsory retirement? Will we force them to deteriorate gradually? Will we see them not wanting to live, as the days ahead are too dark, while doctors with modern medicines keep them alive, often in homes or chronic care hospitals? How many of these people could be salvaged and kept active, working and earning as long as they are mentally and physically able to do so? Mr. Speaker, the work record of such people who have been maintained in the work force is excellent.

Leaving out entirely any question of humanity, the economics of the course of action I am suggesting force us to look hard at what is actually happening. We are destroying the productivity of persons 65 and over and we are losing their potential tax contributions. At the same time, we are loading more and more heavily with taxes a work force that will be growing smaller. The pill will see to this. In the long run, this means a lower standard of living for all Canadians.

I could give the House many examples of the great contributions which have been made by men and women over 65. I think of Mr. Schumaker, at Columbus. He started the Schumaker mine at Timmins. I met him first when he was 89 years old, at Columbus, Ohio. The next day the President of the United States was calling on him for counsel and advice. Winston Churchill sat in the British House of Commons when he was 87. Just think, what would have happened to the world if he had quit at age 65. Grandma Moses painted on her one hundredth birthday. Toscanini did some of his most brilliant conducting after he was 80. Bernard Baruch of New York, the confidante of presidents, worked in his office on his ninetieth birthday. Let me point to members of my own profession. Many doctors who retired at 65 in Canada have gone overseas to work in underdeveloped countries, where they are given the opportunity to exercise their skills and teach others.

Not only does a worker over 65 lead a much happier life when he knows he is still useful, but very likely he will be more healthy mentally and physically if he works. In that way he will add to the gross national product and pay taxes. In addition, if more aged people work, there will be a decrease in the number of cases needing custodial or chronic nursing care. This will reduce health care costs. In view of the increasing numbers of elderly people in our society and the great value of their potential contribution, I ask that a department of geriatrics be established in all medical schools of Canada. This is being done, or planned in many countries. Again we are lagging behind. I suggest that the health resources fund could finance such a project.

Diseases among those over 65 vary a great deal, ranging from those endemic in the aged to virulent diseases. In ten years it may well be that every seventh person will be over 65. Keep in mind that the population is about break-even at 25. Trained people and others are just starting to earn money at 25. Therefore, you have one person in every three or four who is 65 or over starting at 25 years old.

I ask this parliament to consider setting up a department of geriatrics. I believe it would be one of the most worth-while things that could be done for people aged 65 and over who are able, willing and have the skills and knowledge with which to undertake work. They could make a great contribution to Canada's economy. I plead not only for these people from the physical standpoint—and they would be a lot better off physically and mentally by doing this—but also from the economic standpoint. It would also keep many of them out of our institutions. This has been proved over and over again. We would also lessen the tax burden on the working force which is becoming smaller and smaller because we have to reduce the number of births due to the food shortage throughout the world.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said this was a very dominant theme in the organization which he attended and addressed. I say to my fellow members of parliament, here is the place to start something that will place Canada, and keep her, in the forefront of the world's health and humanitarian field. It will show the rest of the world that we are planning ahead and setting an example.

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, it is with great trepidation and, at the same time, a great deal of pride that I, as the newly elected member of the great constituency of Bruce, rise to address this august body of parliamentarians and outstanding orators. May I offer my congratulations on the election of the Speaker to the exalted post he now occupies. I am sure hon. members will agree that during the short period we have been in session he has shown unquestionable capability in his sincere efforts to rule over the proceedings in a completely fair and unbiased manner.

The mover, my seatmate, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos), and the seconder, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee), of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne are also new members and were probably, when speaking, as filled with trepidation as I am. I offer my congratulations on the wonderful speeches they made.

If I may, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the House special greetings from my immediate predecessor and former colleague of many members here, Ross Whicher, a member who I am sure, during his sojourn here impressed the House with his outstanding representation of the constituency and his ability to strike out at any injustice or lend complete support to measures he believed would provide a better future for the people of this great country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Bruce): The constituency I am so proud to represent is predominantly rural and agricultural. It contains many of the facets and backgrounds that go to make Canada the greatest country in the world. It is a country that has become, for untold millions of the world's downtrodden and oppressed people, literally the promised land. The responsibility now rests squarely on our shoulders to keep Canada the kind of nation the rest of the world can look to for guidance and responsible leadership.

Bruce constituency is predominantly of Scottish, British, Irish and German background, consisting of both small and medium sized industry, industry that goes hand in hand with the primary concerns of agriculture and tourism. It is now the largest producer of top grade beef cattle in Canada. The farmer, both large and small, plays a predominant role in the constituency's future.

The Bruce Nuclear Power Development has also added considerable stimulus to the economy of the constituency, but has brought with it a number of problems. The Bruce Nuclear Power Development employs a total, including construction and operations people, of approximately 4,000 persons. There is now a proposed expansion which will reach an employment peak in the period 1978-1979 of approximately 7,500 people. When the whole of the proposed expansion is completed about 1983, the permanent work force at the complex will be reduced to about 2,000 people.

The original Douglas Point power station, as it was known, was started in 1967. One heavy-water plant was started in 1973, and there is a large nuclear station now made up of four units, each having a reactor. The first one will be in operation by next year. The plant will be completed in 1978. There are three more heavy-water plants to come into production. Work is now under way on one of them.

The employees brought in to work at the development are both professional and trades people. I might point out these are people who are not available in the area and thus have to be brought in to accomplish the work load now before the constructors and the power plant development people. As I have said, this brings forth some problems with the labour force in the area. Many of our businessmen are hard-pressed at the present time to come up with help of any kind. Many of our small businesses are desperately searching for help and cannot find it. In many ways, they are right up against it. I would also point out that the constituency contains some of the finest beach area in the country. The beachline stretches from well below Kincardine on the south, all the way to the tip of the Bruce peninsula and back down the Georgian Bay side to the Sound, from which the city of Owen Sound derived its name. Included in the area is the well known Sauble Beach area and Tobermory, which is now, of course, the stepping-off point for the brand new ferry Chi-Cheemaun. It carries people not only from the Bruce peninsula but to the Bruce peninsula on their way to and from Manitoulin Island and its resort areas.

Hon. members can see from this that Bruce is a composite constituency, one made up of peoples from throughout the world. It is a constituency in which industry and tourism rub elbows and run hand in hand with agriculture. However, it is a constituency which in many respects is cut off from the rest of Canada and the rest of the province of Ontario at the present time, due to lack of adequate transportation facilities. It is with this fact in mind that I want to address part of my remarks to the portion of the Speech from the Throne concerning the implementation of improvements and the introduction of better transportation facilities, not only for the people of Bruce constituency but also for the people of Canada.

In many ways, the constituency of Bruce is a composite of the problem presented to the government of Canada and the people of this nation when, to my way of thinking, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways ceased to carry out their mandate and meet their obligations to the people of this country. That mandate was to provide, effectively and economically, passenger service and freight transportation throughout Canada, including areas which, while not of prime monetary value to the railways at present, did have significant and important value in the development of the nation and the start of the railway network.

Since the cessation of proper rail service throughout the area of Bruce, many attemps have been made to have this service reinstated, all to no avail. The transport committee held several sessions in the area, at which time many and varied organizations presented briefs, put forward solutions and tried as best they could to make clear to the transport committee and to the railways the inconvenience that the people of the area were facing.

It seems incongruous to me that in this great land of ours we should find people who are now literally cut off because they have made a decision, whether right or wrong, to settle, develop and plant roots in a particular area of this country. Not only are they cut off from ready access to large metropolitan municipalites; they are also, in many cases, cut off from medical assistance that is greatly needed. In order that the people of the riding may receive proper treatment for many of the diseases with which man is afflicted, fast, efficient and economical service to large metropolitan centres such as Toronto, Kitchener and London are needed. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that given the vast resources available in this country such a situation should not be allowed to exist any longer.

I should also like to refer to the speech the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) made in this House on October 3. He said:

It seems it should not take two or three hours as happens now to go from St. Hyacinthe to Montreal, if you can leave at 9.00 o'clock in the morning. That is awful. We can do better than that.

I certainly agree with the minister when he said: "That is awful". But I would point out to him and to the members of the House that the transportation situation faced by people in my riding of Bruce makes the two-hour time lapse from St. Hyacinthe to Montreal seems like a bed of roses in comparison. People travelling from Owen Sound or from Port Elgin, Wiarton, Southampton, and so on, to Toronto are accustomed to take anywhere from four to eight hours to travel the 200 miles or so. If the situation at St. Hyacinthe is awful, I am afraid I cannot quite grasp the word necessary to describe the situation we have in western Ontario.

Mr. Paproski: "Lousy."

Mr. Douglas (Bruce): That comes close. In some of the areas surrounding Owen Sound and Wiarton, for instance, any type of transportation to and from the large cities other than motor car or shanks-pony is all but non-existent. During the visit of the transport committee to western Ontario, a reporter from one of the large metropolitan newspapers in Toronto went to a small community in the northern part of the riding to see just how acute our transportation problem was. The gentleman in question must have displeased the local citizens, because they stole his cab. Three days later he still had not returned to Toronto, and if someone had not relented and given him his car, the latest press releases from that reporter to the Toronto Star would still be coming by pony express. Such is the acuteness of the transportation problem in this particular riding in western Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, this country has long pioneered in the use of aviation not only in Canada but in centres throughout the world. The aviation history of this country is second to none as far as development, promotion and the proper use of air space is concerned. It seems to me that since the takeover of the de Havilland Aircraft corporation by the government of Canada not too many weeks ago, the possibility of using the fine aircraft developed by the company, DHC-6 twin Otter, for the introduction of a commuter-type service to the large centres would certainly fit in with the plans and aspirations of the present government as far as providing adequate transportation is concerned.

To say that western Ontario and Bruce riding are the only areas to suffer from dire lack of transportation facilities would be an understatement of the problem. This does not mean, however, that the riding of Bruce or western Ontario should receive preferential treatment, for it is my belief that proper transportation systems such as this would benefit many areas of Canada and give them the development they need, as well as bringing them into closer communication with the larger urban centres. This would make it possible for immigrants to this country to diversify, to spread out and find that promised land they search so diligently for when they apply to come to this great country of ours.

It certainly seems to me it would not be stepping out of character for the government of Canada to set aside moneys for such projects in areas of this country where transportation is now anything but up to standard. We have been known to lend money to other countries of the world, to help them improve and diversify their transportation systems.

I suggest this is one area where charity might begin at home. Many of the Francophone countries of Africa have received loans from the government of Canada to set up just such a type of transportation system, using the de Havilland DHC-6 twin Otter and other aircraft of that type.

It is with this in mind, Mr. Speaker, that I look with favour upon the reference in the Speech from the Throne to improved arrangements for transportation studies and better transportation for the people of Canada, particularly for the people of Bruce and the surrounding municipalities of western Ontario. This improved transportation service for their produce and livestock is something that they not only richly deserve but, I feel, have every right to expect.

May I also at this time, Mr. Speaker, commend the actions of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in introducing into the House of Commons a bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. I would point out to hon. members on both sides of the House that the men from the riding of Bruce and surrounding western Ontario were among the first to serve in two great wars and provide this country with the protection from which its citizens received so much benefit, and it now seems to me very fitting that we should look to the future of our veterans and the dependants of men who have served this country well and honourably in two great wars.

I would also call attention to the contribution which has been made to the riding of Bruce by the native people who I am very proud to represent in this parliament—native people from the Chippewa band, the Saugeen reserve, and also from the Cape Croker Indian reserve. Men from both reserves were among the forefront of those volunteering their service to their country in time of war. These people have done much to enhance the prestige of the riding of Bruce, particularly in the Saugeen area where they have developed, and are continuing to develop, a fine beach-front area, with summer cottages, which people from the larger urban centres have the opportunity of renting for the summer period. The native peoples of the Cape Croker area, I am honoured to say, have provided the riding with some outstanding men and women who have continued in educational fields and have become a tribute not only to their race but to the riding as a whole.

Also, Mr. Speaker, as we are predominantly a rural riding I am pleased to see provisions are being made—this was referred to in the Speech from the Throne—for the betterment of the farm population, for in Bruce we take pride in being known as the beef capital of the province and we are fast approaching the point at which we are recognized, I believe, as one of the beef capitals of this country, if not of the world. Yearly production of cattle in the riding of Bruce stands at approximately 176,000 head. In addition to that, another 35,000 head of dairy cattle are in production. Our production of hogs is also on the rise and stands in the neighbourhood of 119,500 a year.

Therefore, it seems logical to me that if the riding of Bruce is the centre of beef production, then the young people of the riding will certainly have much to contribute in the not too distant future in supplying the needs of not only Canadian citizens but of citizens around the world as far as farm production is concerned. With this in mind, I hope that the government of Canada some time in the near future will take steps to see that young people are given encouragement and, indeed, much financial assistance, not only to remain on the farm but for many of them to return to the farms on which they made their way.

I am unhappy to report, as are many others from rural ridings, I am sure, that one of the prime exports of rural ridings throughout this country is our most prized possession resource—the young people of the riding. The young people are leaving these areas. They cannot get what they need there, so they leave. They leave to seek higher education in urban centres and, I am very sad to say, not too many of them return but look elsewhere for business and professional opportunities. With the help of the government of Canada and the members of this House, I hope we can provide these fine young men and women, not only of my riding but of many rural areas throughout Canada, with the opportunity, the encouragement and the financial assistance that would see them return to their homes and back to the land and the agricultural profession upon which we all depend so greatly.

Without the return of the young people back to the land of their forefathers in the not too distant future, the outlook for not only providing food staples for our own consumption but, most definitely, food staples for much of the world, will be in bad straits. The demand is growing year after year throughout the world for production of food. Without the young people on the farm—and our farm population is much beyond middle-age; much of it quite elderly—I am very sad to say that our production of food will be seriously curtailed, if not diminished to the point of starvation and we will be faced to a greater extent with the plight of so many in today's world.

We must all realize that there are many causes of war. People have listed hundreds of them. When you get right down to it, the one thing that will cause any person to fight is the threat of starvation. Such an individual will fight you before he starves. So we must get young people back on the farm. We must give them that opportunity. We must give them a fair return on their capital investment and the time they spend on the farm. We must also bear in mind that without a fair return on investment, no young person—indeed, no one—will return to or remain on the farm if his cash reserves dwindle and disappear, finding himself, for want of a better word, rich in possessions when he is dead.

Therefore, not only would an improvement in the transportation system benefit the farm population of my riding; it would also be of great advantage to the tourist industry—and the tourist industry is of prime importance to the riding of Bruce. Many of the people in that area depend heavily upon tourism for their livelihood, and without an upgrading of facilities and provision of proper transportation, many of them will find that they, too, must soon go elsewhere to continue their occupation and earn their livelihood. It is of the utmost importance, at least for my riding in Ontario—and, I might add, for many ridings such as mine throughout the country—that the problems of transportation be given high priority for action by the government of Canada.

I should like to divert just for a moment from my prepared text and speak primarily to those who, like myself, are new members of parliament. Since arriving here, many people have asked whether this is really all worth while, and what I can do as a backbencher. Much has been said of a backbencher, his thoughts and feelings. A former member, Gordon Aiken, wrote a very good book about the backbencher. If I might leave one message with my fellow backbenchers, it is this. Look around this House of Commons, and what do you see? We are all representatives of the people because we are the people of Canada from sea to sea and from north to south. We in the back benches and in the front benches represent every race, creed and colour. We are represented here by individuals with the prefixes Mr., Mrs., Miss and Ms. Some have a background of farming, of mining, fishing, lawyers and, yes, Indian chiefs as well. This is why we are important as backbenchers: we are the people of Canada. I think this is of importance to the government of Canada and it is why it is important for us to be members of this House.

If there is one aim for this government over the next few years—however long we are to be here—it should be to bring together the people of Canada. We, the representatives of the people of Canada, are divided on many occasions, as this country is divided, and it seems to me a shame that only in time of war do all the people of a land come together with a common goal. Perhaps we should soon realize that we are at war. Instead of the front lines being many thousands of miles away over the seas, our battles are being fought right here. Our battle is between democracy and democratic government and those ideals that would be forced upon us by others—government without the benefit of the vote, without the benefit of elections and without the benefit of membership in such a body as this House of Commons. We, as members, must realize that we are the front line soldiers and the people of the world look to us to see how, and why, democracy can, and does, work so well.

At the present time Canada is in an extremely fine position. It is a country in which democracy has worked, and worked properly. As a result of the unfortunate incidents which have occurred south of the border in recent years, I think now more than ever the people of the world will look to this country for leadership, for the right approach of government and for the association of people with the government. As a backbencher here, may I say that is why I feel it is such an honour to be part of this august body of legislators. We are in the front lines of the battle for freedom, and we have the opportunity to express our aims during this thirtieth parliament. We should all work toward uniting this country.

To those in the back benches who perhaps look to the cabinet and see people of high renown, let me say that those in the front benches should look back; they sit up front because we sit behind. Finally, I might say to hon. members on both sides of the House, at times the process of government has been likened to the action of a turtle. That is certainly not one of the fastest animals in the world but one, in the words of Aesop's fable, that slowly and steadily over the years has won the race. I would remind hon. members that the turtle, having the protection of an armoured body, stands still to protect itself but must come out of its shell in order to make any advance whatsoever.

Perhaps, like the turtle, the government of Canada and the House of Commons, in order to advance along a straight line must from time to time stick out their necks. Perhaps this thirtieth parliament would do well to adopt the turtle as its symbol, for I believe that now more than ever we must be willing to stick out our necks and make decisions. It will be of long-term importance to the citizens of this country if we are determined to reach agreement on many of the bills and proposals put forward in the Speech from the Throne, so that this country of ours can continue to advance and to set a precedent for the nations of the world. Only by doing so can we as a nation continue to grow and enable future generations of young people to look back with pride on the achievements of their forefathers.

I think that if nothing else, if this thirtieth parliament can draw Canada closer together and we can develop a common policy of being a leader in the world, then as that very famous parliamentarian, Sir Winston Churchill, said, if this country of ours does live for 1,000 years people will be able to look back at this thirtieth parliament and say, "It was their finest hour".

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker upon their appointments. I am confident that you, sir, will carry out your responsibilities with great skill and distinction. I congratulate the new members who so ably moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. At this time I wish also to congratulate the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Douglas). I want him to know that we will continue to ship cattle from our constituency to his, to make sure he can tell everyone in Ontario that his constituency is the largest so far as cattle population is concerned.

I am proud to be able to say I represent the most picturesque riding in Canada, consisting of large grain farms to the east and north of my constituency. It is made up of 75 per cent of the irrigation lands in Canada, spreading over and into my colleague's riding of Medicine Hat. The west end of my constituency is made up of the most beautiful ranching country in the world. It takes in the towns of Cardston, Pincher Creek and Fort MacLeod. Fort MacLeod is my home and is the oldest settlement in the province of Alberta. It is also the home of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which was established in 1874.

Last but not least, the most beautiful city in Canada is the centre of trade in my constituency. It is known as the garden city of Lethbridge. It encompasses the famous Nikka Yuko Japanese garden and the most modern community college in Canada. Recreation facilities are second to none. In addition, we have Canada's newest and most beautifully designed university, the University of Lethbridge. Also in this centre there are four new livestock processing plants which process more top-grade beef than any other centre in Canada.

The city of Lethbridge has many different types of manufacturing plants. Due to its unique situation in having manufacturing, processing and assembly plants, backed by Canada's largest feedlots and cattle ranches, and virtually no unemployment, Lethbridge is the envy of every member of parliament, including my colleagues in the official opposition. In Lethbridge we are very proud that we will be the host of the Canada Winter Games from February 11 to February 23, 1975.

One of the main concerns of my constituency is agriculture. In view of the track record of the last two ministers of agriculture prior to my arrival in Ottawa, we in our constituency are very thankful that we had strong representatives here to fight the very dictatorial Bill C-176. Then there was the LIFT program. What concerns the people of my constituency now are the answers received from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). Since I arrived here he has brought in tariffs and then taken them off. He has instituted surcharges and then taken them off. On the issue of DES he was asked a question in the House, to which he answered that any good cattleman could tell the difference between a Canadian cow and an American cow. He told the people they would have to buy cheaper cuts of beef. He said that they could buy round steak off the front quarter. He told us that the producers must have more for their product, and then he tells us that the consumer will have to pay more for the product.

I am not a Rhodes scholar, but it would seem obvious to me that if the cattleman is to receive more, the consumer would have to pay more for the product. Last week the minister told us that if milk was in short supply, we could buy wine. All these things concern the people of my constituency. When the subsidy program was brought into effect, fat steers were selling for 47 cents a pound in Alberta. I begged the Minister not to bring in the subsidy program, but it was brought in anyway. The minute it was implemented, the price dropped to 40 cents a pound. The seven-cent subsidy program which came into effect cost the Canadian taxpayer millions of dollars.

In respect of DES there were no answers. I have asked the Minister of Agriculture of many occasions to please institute an investigation into the grading system and its abuse, but nothing has been done. Not thousands but millions of dollars have been spent on reviews and on study groups to study the study groups, but there is no answer yet in this regard. I even have proof of abuses in respect of the grading system. Still there is no answer.

It is not necessary for me to elaborate on the egg issue. As far as I am concerned, all these programs have been detrimental to the producer and to the consumer. At the present time there is no faith in the livestock industry. Everyone must plan for the future. Previously, the attitude was that things would be better; but today, as far as agriculture is concerned, the attitude is that it is at its lowest ebb. When one considers the amount of land that is being taken out of production in central Canada every day, I believe the Minister of Agriculture will have to stop and listen because he will need the maritimes and western Canada, since these areas will eventually supply the foodstuffs of Canada.

The next issue which concerns the people of my riding is bilingualism. I have spoken to people in my province, in my riding and in the province of Quebec when I have sold cattle there. These people do not understand why bilingualism seems to be all right for the rest of Canada but not for Quebec. They condemn the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for not checking the constitutional legality of Bill-22. I drove to Magog Lake and Sawyerville, Quebec. I was lost three times. There was not an English sign on the highway.

If one came to my constituency he would see that we have bilingual signs. There are bilingual signs in Waterton Lakes national park. One area of concern is that although there were beautiful signs all through the park which blended in with the scenery, they were taken down. These signs had English on top and French on the bottom. They were taken down and new signs were put up. These signs are painted green, with white lettering. The English is on the left and the French on the right, because it was considered discriminatory to have the French under the English. This is costing the Canadian taxpayer thousands and thousands of dollars, and I think it should stop.

The only thing we should be looking for in our country is total integration, and I think that is what we are after. In 1905, people from the province of Quebec settled in our country, and so did the people from Ontario. I think we must stop this government and this Prime Minister adopting the attitude of "divide and conquer". This is splitting us up and I think we are all agreed that we do not want to split; we all want one Canada. Out west we are sure of one thing, namely, that this government can legislate to its heart's content but eventually Canada will develop its own North American culture.

The next issue of concern to the people in my constituency is the breakdown in our relations with the United States. I should like it to be known that I am definitely not anti-American; I am pro-Canadian. I think that we should be thankful that our neighbour is the United States and that we do not border Red China or Russia. I suggest that we come to our senses and realize who our largest trading partner is. I have seen the day when we really needed them so far as our livestock industry was concerned. We are now looking for reciprocal agreements. We feel that it is our duty to get along with our neighbour, whether it be across a barbed-wire fence or across a border, and we firmly believe that if the present trend continues—particularly if the socialist party here continues to keep the universities riled up, to keep a heavy concentration of union workers riled up, and to divert our attention to the United States and keep them riled up—there will be only one loser, and it will be us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hurlburt: Next I would like to make some comments about the biggest concern in Canada. We are all concerned about agriculture. We think we have problems with bilingualism and with the continued breakdown in our relations with the United States. But I say that the most serious problem we have today is the ever increasing trend toward socialism. Men and women in the public spotlight are constantly being asked to express their opinions on the thousands of governmental proposals and projects. They are asked such questions as: what do you think of DREE; what is your opinion of LIP or OFY; how do you feel about urban renewal? The list is endless. All too often answers to these questions seem to be based, not on any solid principle but upon the popularity of the specific government program in question. Seldom are men willing to oppose a popular program if they themselves wish to be popular, especially if they seek public office. Unlike the political opportunist, the true statesman values principle above popularity and works to create popularity for those political principles which are wise and just.

I should like to outline in clear, concise and straightforward terms the political principles to which I subscribe. These are the guidelines which determine now and in the future my attitudes and actions toward all proposals and projects of the government. These are the principles which, in my opinion, proclaim the proper role of government in the affairs of the nation. I believe that governments are instituted by man for the benefit of man, and that we hold men accountable for their acts in relation to them, both in making laws and administering them for the good and safety of society.

I believe that no government can exist in peace unless such laws are so framed, and not violated, as to secure for each individual the free exercise of conscience, the right to and control over property, and the protection of life. The proper role of government includes such defensive activities as the maintenance of national military and local police forces for protection against loss of life, loss of property and loss of freedom at the hands of either foreign forces or domestic criminals. The way to have a good and safe government is not to trust all to one, but to divide it among the many, distributing to everyone the functions which he is competent to exercise.

History has proven that each class or special interest group competes with the others to use the lever of governmental power in their favour, or at least to immunize themselves against the effects of a previous thrust. Labour receives a minimum wage, so agriculture seeks a price support. Consumers demand price controls, and industry receives protective tariffs. In the end, no one is much further ahead and everyone suffers the burdens of a gigantic bureaucracy and loss of personal freedom. With each group being out to get its share of the spoils, the result is that historically governments have mushroomed into total welfare states. Once the process begins, once the principle of the protective function of government gives way to the aggressive or redistributive function, forces are set in motion that drive the nation toward totalitarianism. It is impossible to introduce into society a greater evil than the conversion of the law into an instrument of plunder.

Students of history know that no government in the history of mankind has ever created any wealth. It is the people who work who create wealth. According to the Marxist doctrine, a human being is primarily an economic creature. In other words, his material well-being is all-important and his privacy and his freedom are strictly secondary. The Soviet constitution reflects this philosophy in its emphasis on security, food, clothing, housing, medical care—the same things that might be considered in jail. The basic concept is that the government has full responsibility for the welfare of the people and in order to discharge that responsibility must assume control of all their activities.

It is significant that in reality the Russian people have few of the rights guaranteed to them in their constitution, while the Canadian people have them in abundance, even though they are not guaranteed. The reason, of course, is that material gain and economic security simply cannot be guaranteed by any government. They are the result and reward of hard work and industrious production. Unless the people bake one loaf of bread for every citizen, the government cannot guarantee that each will have one loaf to eat. Legislation can be written, laws can be passed, but unless the bread is produced it can never be distributed.

Why, then, do Canadians bake more bread, manufacture more shoes and assemble more television sets per capita than Russians? They do so precisely because our government does not guarantee these things. If it did, there would be so many accompanying taxes, controls, regulations and political manipulations that the productive genius that is America's would soon be reduced to the floundering level of waste and inefficiency now found behind the iron curtain. I should like to quote Thomas Jefferson who, in his first inaugural address in 1801, said:

> With all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us happy and prosperous people? Still one thing more, fellow citizens—a wise and frugal government which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labour the bread it has earned.

The principle behind this philosophy of labour can be reduced to a rather simple formula. First, economic security for all is impossible without widespread abundance. Second, abundance is impossible without industrious and efficient production. Third, such production is impossible without energetic, willing, eager labour. Fourth, this is not possible without incentive. Fifth, of all forms of incentive, the freedom to attain reward for one's labours is the most sustaining for most people. Sometimes called the profit motive, it is simply the right to plan and to earn and to enjoy the fruits of your labour. Sixth, this profit motive diminishes as government controls, regulations and taxes increase to deny the fruits of success to those who produce. Seventh, therefore any attempt through governmental intervention to redistribute the material rewards of labour can result only in the eventual destruction of the productive base of society for more than the ruling elite, and that is quite impossible.

The following is a report as recorded in the Corydon, Indianna Republican in 1966 on Socialism in Saskatchewan. It reads in part:

> For a period of 20 years, from 1944 to 1964 Saskatchewan, Canada, across the border from Montana, had a socialist government, about the only one in North America, except Castro's. Here is an account of that stewardship in the words of the present premier of Saskatchewan, the Honourable W. Ross Thatcher.

Mr. Rodriguez: No more trips to Cuba, Ken.

Mr. Hurlburt: Not with you. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Thatcher is quoted as saying:

> In 1944, the socialists said they would solve the unemployment problems by building government factories. They promised to use the profits to build highways, schools, hospitals and to finance better social welfare measures generally. Over the years they set up 22 so-called Crown corporations . . . By the time we had taken over the government, 24 months ago, 12 of the Crown corporations had gone bankrupt or been disposed of. Others were kept operating by repeated and substantial government grants.
> During the whole period the socialists waged war against private business. The making of profits was condemned as an unforgiveable sin. What was the result? Investors simply turned their backs on the socialists. Dozens of oil companies pulled up stakes and moved out. Gas exploration ground to a complete halt. Prospecting in our vast north became almost non-existent.
> During the period Canada was experiencing the greatest economic boom in her history, Saskatchewan received only a handful of new factories.

An hon. Member: Did Bob Stanfield write this?

Mr. Hurlburt: No, he did not. A good Liberal premier, Ross Thatcher, wrote it. It continues:

> After 18 years of socialism, there were fewer jobs in manufacturing than existed in 1945—this despite the investment of $500 million in Crown corporations.
> During the period more than 600 completely new taxes were introduced, 650 other taxes were increased. Per capita taxes in Saskatchewan were soon substantially out of line with our sister provinces—one more reason why industry located elsewhere.
> The socialists promised to make Saskatchewan a mecca for the working man. Instead, we saw the greatest mass exodus of people out of an area since Moses led the Jews out of Egypt. Since the war, 270,000 of our citizens left Saskatchewan to find employment elsewhere.
> If there are any Americans who think that socialism is the answer, I wish they would come to Saskatchewan and study what has happened to our province.
> The Saskatchewan story deserves to become classic in the annals of political science and a study course in college classrooms throughout the United States.

The economic and social cannibalism produced by this communist-socialist idea will destroy any society which adopts it and clings to it as a basic principle—any society. In Canada we have travelled a long way down the soul-destroying road to socialism.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and I went to Cuba together this year. We visited Fidel Castro for 3½ hours. We saw where the government had taken over 70 per cent of the land. We found out that they were highly mechanized, with 23 per cent of the equipment being Russian, and that taking the land away from the farmers resulted in a drop in production. My friend from Nickel Belt who represents the socialist party thought this was a great way of life, but I did not want any part of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hurlburt: As Henry Grady Weaver wrote in his excellent book The Mainspring of Human Progress:

> Most of the major ills of the world have been caused by well-meaning people who ignored the principle of individual freedom, except as applied to themselves, and who were obsessed with fanatical zeal to improve the lot of mankind—in the mass through some pet formula of their own—

The harm done by ordinary criminals, murderers, gangsters and thieves is negligible in comparison with the agony inflicted upon human beings by the professional do-gooders who attempt to set themselves up as gods on earth and who would ruthlessly force their views on all others, with the abiding assurance that the end justifies the means.

An hon. Member: You are talking about Nixon.

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker, once again I am speaking to hon. friends on my left, especially my friend from Nickel Belt, Ontario. I think my friend from Nickel Belt should get down at his bed at night and thank God he lives in this country. He is a man who came from Guyana 14 or 15 years ago, who taught school in this country and has contributed absolutely nothing to it; but he has kept unions and workers riled up and now he is a member of parliament. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is a sad day for Canada.

Canada is a wealthy country. Even during the depression, Canadians ate and lived better than most people in other countries do today. In reply to the argument that just a little bit of socialism is good so long as it does not go too far, it is tempting to say that, in like fashion, just a little bit of theft or a little bit of cancer is all right, too. History proves that the growth of the welfare state is difficult to check before it comes to its full flower of dictatorship. But let us hope that this time around the trend can be reversed. If not, then we will see the inevitability of complete socialism, probably within our lifetime.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hurlburt: They are pounding and clapping over there, but it is getting weaker and weaker, Mr. Speaker. I think I might have convinced some of them to walk over and join us tomorrow.

Three factors may make a difference. First, there is sufficient historical knowledge of the failures of socialism and of the past mistakes of previous civilizations. Second, there are modern means of rapid communications to transmit these lessons of history to a large, literate population. And thirdly, there is a growing number of dedicated men and women who, at great personal sacrifice, are actively working to promote a wider appreciation of these concepts. The timely joining together of these three factors may make it entirely possible for us to reverse the trend.

This raises the next question: how is it possible to cut out the various welfare programs promoted by our government, which have already fastened themselves like cancer cells on to the body politic? Is drastic surgery already necessary, and can it be performed without endangering the patient? In answer, it is obvious that drastic measures are called for. No halfway or compromise actions will suffice. Like all surgery, it will not be without discomfort, and perhaps it will even leave some scar tissue for a long time to come. But it must be done if the patient is to be saved, and it can be done without undue risk.

The first step toward restoring the limited concept of government should be to freeze all welfare programs at their present level, making sure that no new ones are added. The next step would be to allow all present programs to run out their term, with absolutely no renewal. The third step would involve the gradual phasing-out of those programs which are indefinite in their term. In my opinion, the bulk of the transition could be accomplished within a ten-year period, and virtually completed within 20 years.

Mr. Gilbert: Is this Tory policy?

Mr. Hurlburt: No, this is my own policy. Mr. Speaker, I have run into a good deal of static from members to my left. It does not bother me, because I am proud to have been born in this country and proud to have been given the opportunity to earn a living in it. I have not been a charge on any level of government, be it municipal, provincial or federal. I just want the right to run my little farm at home without government interference, and I sure don't want anybody else interfering.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hurlburt: In closing—I am sure hon. friends to my left want me to continue—

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Hurlburt: —all I can say is, the time to act is now. We live in the greatest country in the world. We have the resources; we have the manpower. The government has been handed a mandate. All that is needed now is common sense and strong leadership.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) seeking the floor because he wishes to ask a question?

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, thank you for recognizing me. I have a few minutes in which to speak before 5.45. First, may I congratulate you upon elevation to your office. The act of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) is pretty hard to follow. You can now understand the great insight he displayed regarding his visit to Cuba. I was amazed by some of his comments, especially his saying I was not a native son of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I tell you that I contribute as much as any other Canadian, and I have all the rights of any Canadian. It bothers me to see the great Tory Party sending Mr. Bill Davis to Italy to garner Italian votes in Canada. At election time they do everything in their power to gain ethnic support, yet some members of that party stand in this House and pass slurs to the effect that I was not born in this country. Actually, the Liberal candidate in Nickel Belt in the last election campaign tried the same trick. He said I was a new Canadian and had no right to represent the people of Nickel Belt. Well, the people of Nickel Belt decided, and whether the hon. member for Lethbridge likes it or not, I am a member of this House, with all the rights and privileges he has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I have heard three throne speeches. This one reminds me of Alice in Wonderland, and of the little verse in the book which goes something like this:

"You are old, father William," the young man said,
And your hair has become very white;
And yet you incessantly stand on your head—
Do you think at your age it is right?
In my youth, father William replied to his son
I feared it might injure the brain,
But now that I'm perfectly sure I have none,
Why, I do it again and again!

Mr. Cafik: Is that where we have spent our research dollars?

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, it did not take much research to look into this Speech from the Throne. Actually, when I look at the speech I see so many paradoxes that I feel impelled to point some out. For example, in one part of the speech the government talks about peacekeeping. We take a great deal of pride in peacekeeping; but, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member will have another occasion to continue his remarks. I regret very much having to interrupt him at this time. However, it being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Stanfield: On division.

Motion (Mr. Duclos) agreed to.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the said address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada by Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I ask that we call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being agreed that we call it six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2.

At 5.50 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. EPP—ALLEGED CONFLICT BETWEEN STATEMENTS BY MINISTER AND PRIME MINISTER ON IMMIGRATION POLICY

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which I have given Your Honour. I put it forward on behalf of myself and every member of this House. My question of privilege stems from the practice of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) of continually making conflicting statements respecting release of the green paper on immigration.

● (1410)

As early as September 17, 1973, as recorded at page 6611 of Hansard, the minister made a statement on motions announcing the government's intention to invite briefs outlining the views of the provinces, the territorial governments, members of parliament and interested groups on matters relating to future Canadian immigration policy. This green paper on immigration was to be followed by a national conference on immigration population under the sponsorship of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The end result of this procedure was forecast by the minister at page 6611 of Hansard, where he said:

> The end result at which we are aiming is a comprehensive policy, to be expressed in new immigration legislation for submission to parliament.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the operative words are "for submission to parliament". The target date, as recorded in Hansard at page 6611 and as expressed by the minister, was "next spring". That statement was made on September 17, 1973. In reply to a question which I put to the minister on October 2, in this thirtieth parliament, regarding publication of the green paper on immigration, the minister replied, as recorded at page 36 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not think I was so precise as to say it would be tabled in the spring; I expressed hope that we would have it by the summer, and this might have been the case but for the election which was concluded in July.

Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked the Prime Minister if a decision had been made regarding changes in immigration regulations, and the Prime Minister replied, as recorded at page 440 of Hansard:

> As to any interim measures taken before then, all I can say at this moment is if any announcement is to be made it will be made by the government in this House.

The ink was barely dry on yesterday's Hansard when the Minister of Manpower and Immigration made a statement on this question, not in this House, not even in this country but outside its borders, directly refuting the words of the Prime Minister. In that statement the minister made it clear that the new immigration regulations and the legislation he was proposing would be non-discriminatory, would depend upon job availability, and the unification of separated families was not to be threatened.

In pointing this out, Mr. Speaker, I am not necessarily objecting to the proposed changes. This question is of interest to all Canadians and affects our future growth, the use of our natural resources and the type of country in which we will live, yet the Prime Minister and his government continue to ignore the rights of this House by making statements outside the House when in fact they have given assurances that such statements will be made inside the House.

I raise this question because it affects myself and every member of this House respecting our right to receive factual information from this government or, for that matter, from any other government. Mr. Speaker, if you find that I have a prima facie case of breach of privilege, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

> That all matters pertaining to the Prime Minister's and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration's continuing practice of making conflicting statements both inside the House of Commons and outside the House of Commons respecting the release of the government's green paper on immigration be referred to the committee on privileges and elections for study and report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, as he said at the outset, gave the Chair notice of his intention to raise a question of privilege. The notice was sufficient to conform with the Standing Orders but, regrettably, it did not in any way inform the Chair of the nature and substance of the question of privilege to be raised. Accordingly, I am ruling at the moment on the basis of having glanced at it for the first time this very minute.

It is, of course, a matter of concern to hon. members whether statements made in the House of Commons, or outside, are correct. It is, indeed, a matter of great importance to the nation. However, while it may be a matter of great importance and validity, and while it may be a very valid matter for discussion and debate either inside or outside the chamber, the fact is that whatever disadvantage such question may bring to one side of the House, or advantage—in the political sense—to the other side of the House, when such occurrences do take place or are alleged to have taken place they do not, under my understanding of the rules of privilege of the House of Commons, constitute a prima facie case of privilege.

I say, again, that these may be matters of importance and concern and matters for discussion and debate as, indeed, all such questions are. But I cannot see that they are matters which affect, in the general sense, the ability of hon. members to function as members of parliament, or affect their freedoms and privileges. Accordingly, I must find that there is not, in the circumstances, a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, just before the close of the sitting yesterday the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) made remarks which I feel should never have been allowed to be uttered without challenge. In other words, there was disorder in the debate. It is my understanding that it is not permissible for hon. members to cast aspersions on the character and integrity of members of this House. I would ignore the petty insult to myself personally, but I cannot ignore the gross and unjust insult to my constituents and to every Canadian born outside this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Nor can I ignore the insinuation, offensive to every teacher in this country, that as a member of the teaching profession one makes no useful contribution to our economy and society. We place great importance on the material trappings and traditions of this House. For example, one does not touch the mace. I submit that personal insults about one's background and personal contribution to this country should never be permitted. I call upon Your Honour to take appropriate action in having the hon. member for Lethbridge retract those slurs and scandalous remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Without being persuaded of the validity of the point of order at hand, for a number of reasons, I do see at least one other hon. member who wishes to make a contribution on the same point of order, if it be such. As I say, we are in difficulty. Hon. members are aware, of course, that a point of order, if it is to be raised, must be raised at the moment it arises. Nonetheless, I recognize the importance of the subject under discussion. However, at the moment the alleged disorder occurred in the House, the hon. member who has just spoken and who was the target of the remarks which have been put in question was, in fact, in the House. In addition, not only was he present during the course of that discussion but he followed the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) in the debate and did not take the opportunity to raise the point of order at that time.

Under the rules of the House, if one thing is absolutely clear it is that if a point of order is to be raised, it must be raised immediately the alleged disorder occurs. Accordingly, I have some reservations on the point. In any case, I will recognize the hon. member for Lethbridge on the same point of order and hear him before deciding.

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is this. I think if hon. members refer to my comments of yesterday they will find I said that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) came to this country from Guyana some 14 years ago; he was educated here and makes his living here. I think he should be thankful that he lives in a country such as Canada, and he should not continue to get union organizations riled up in order to be elected.

[Mr. Speaker.]

● (1420)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I can only reiterate my earlier remarks. The point of order, if it is being raised, ought to have been raised, in order to conform with our standing orders, at the moment the alleged disorder occurred. I feel the subject is closed. There is not a valid point of order. Accordingly, I feel we must go on to Routine Proceedings.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, when this occurred yesterday afternoon, it was about two and a half minutes before the closing hour. I must admit I was taken completely by surprise that any member of this House would stoop so low. I must admit that I am not familiar with all the procedures in this House. However, I am aware of personal insults.

Second, I do not see what the agitation of unions had to do with the debate. We were debating the Speech from the Throne. I do not see what remarks about where I came from, and what I do in this country, have to do with a throne speech debate.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MEMBER FOR LETHBRIDGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as Your Honour knows, I gave you notice under the rules that I wished to raise a question of privilege with regard to the remarks made last evening by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt). In a sense, the point has been aired. As a member of this House, I still feel I should, as a matter of privilege, object to the suggestion that because a member of this House was born in Guyana or anywhere else outside of Canada, it is, to quote the hon. member, a sad day for Canada that he has become a member of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I suggest that the strength of this country lies in the fact that we have drawn people from all cultures and all countries, and I believe this House of Commons should say that to the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On the question of privilege, the hon. member did, of course, give me notice. As the hon. member well knows, his question of privilege has not been followed by a motion. Therefore, it does not call for any action by the Chair. Under the circumstances, I do not propose to rule as to whether there is a prima facie case because it does not matter. The fact is there are very clear precedents as to what limits an hon. member may go in imputations against another hon. member. Under the circumstances, whatever place they may or may not be in, it is questionable whether it constitutes a question of privilege. In any event, no action is called for by the Chair under the circumstances. I feel the matter has been properly aired.

TABLING OF REPORT OF FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL ON EGG MARKETING

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table in both official languages the report of the Farm Products Marketing Council, as dealt with by the Food Prices Review Board, a study on eggs.

Mr. McGrath: You didn't give us much time to look at it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED PROCEDURE ON MOTION TO ESTABLISH SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON EGG MARKETING

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when announcing the business before the House for the coming week, I expressed the hope that by unanimous consent we could agree to debate the establishment of the committee to investigate egg marketing today. I would now like to read the motion that I hope has been agreed to among the House leaders and ask for consent that it be taken under consideration immediately after Oral Questions. The motion is as follows:

That a special committee of fourteen members be appointed to inquire into and report upon, with its recommendations, if any,

(a) the operations of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, and

(b) the performance of the several authorities having responsibilities with respect to those operations

That the members of the said committee be Mrs. Appolloni and Messrs. Anderson, Cafik, Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi), Fox, Goodale, Gray, Lambert (Bellechasse), Lawrence, Lessard, Mazankowski, McGrath, Murta and Orlikow.

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit when the House is sitting; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; and to engage the services of such expert staff as may be deemed necessary.

And that the said committee be instructed to make its reports to this House no later than December 16, 1974.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the text of the motion. The President of the Privy Council seeks unanimous consent not only to introduce the motion at the present time but also to transfer it to government orders for consideration as the first order of business later this day. Is the House agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF PENSIONS TO ALL PERSONS BETWEEN AGES 60 and 65—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. The urgency of the motion arises from the fact that many members are receiving numerous letters from persons between the ages of 60 and 65 who feel it is unfair that they are being left out of certain proposed legislation. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare be requested by this House to reconsider the terms of the proposed bill for the payment of old age security to spouses between the ages of 60 and 65 only in those cases where the other spouse is a pensioner and only on the basis of an income test, and that he give consideration to the introduction of a bill to provide for old age security to be paid to all persons between 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market.

Mr. Speaker: Again, I must say I have grave reservations about the acceptability of such a motion. The House is aware that under the Standing Order, the motions under Standing order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House but there is a tendency to overlook the fact that the order also requires that they be proposed as matters of urgent and pressing necessity. A request of this sort, to ask the government to consider changes in legislation in relation to something which might be done in the future, raises serious doubt in my mind as to whether it qualifies under the Standing Order as being of urgent and pressing necessity. Today, I propose to resolve that doubt in favour of the proposer of the motion, but I give notice that in future I shall give careful consideration to whether or not such motions qualify under the other aspect of the rule.

Under the circumstances, the motion being proposed under Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent before it can be debated. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be proceeded with at this time.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED NEED FOR IMMEDIATE AID TO BEEF PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The urgency of my motion arises from the hardships faced by beef producers in this country which are forcing them out of business, and from the fact that the prairie governments have had to announce assistance programs of their own in the last few days in order to keep these producers in business. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House requests the Minister of Agriculture to announce forthwith a program to provide immediate assistance to beef producers.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion proposed under Standing Order 43 requiring unanimous consent of the House for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be proceeded with at this time.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[Translation]

ENERGY

SUGGESTED CONTINUATION OF DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME TO CONSERVE ENERGY

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 26(2).

Since our economy is eroded by inflation which we are trying to fight by all possible means, I consider that to cope with that unfortunate situation while living under the sun as during the Second World War and while saving millions of barrels of oil to say nothing of electricity and since the experience of our southern neighbours was conlusive as 2½ per cent of energy was saved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House adjourn its proceedings to discuss a matter of urgent necessity, to wit: the passage of a measure to maintain the Daylight Saving Time and that it take the ncessary steps to that effect.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Rimouski gave the Chair the required notice thus enabling the Chair to study the motion carefully.

There is not doubt that the problem brought forward in the motion, that is, inflation, as well as the conservation of energy, is important. On the other hand, the problem itself and the suggestion of the hon. member for Rimouski have already been discussed repeatedly in the House before. I therefore feel the matter is not urgent. The Chair is aware that Daylight Saving Time will be discontinued at the end of the month, but as this happens every year it does not constitute a matter of pressing necessity as standing orders require.

There are two other difficulties as well. First of all, I have doubts on the matter of jurisdiction. Second, the program of the House has already allowed the hon. member to bring up his suggestion, that is during the debate on the Speech from the Throne; in fact he will also have a chance to do so later on, that is in the last three days of next week.

I therefore regret having to advise the hon. member that the Chair feels that it cannot accept his motion under Standing Order 26.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, while respecting your decision, I still want to point out to the House how important it is for our country to maintain Daylight Saving Time throughout the year. I suggest the government should introduce legislation to that effect: we will support it eagerly.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATURE OF CANADIAN PROPOSALS TO EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister which arises out of his indication in the House the day before yesterday, I think it was, that his government has submitted an aide memoire to the European Economic Community containing proposals to the community. I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman would table the aide memoire, or if the aide memoire is considered to be confidential, whether he would indicate to the House the general nature of these proposals and the form of association with the European Economic Community that the government is proposing. I ask this question in view of the possibly far-reaching consequences of this matter to the people of this country.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is something in the aide memoire which is a negotiating position of the Canadian government vis-à-vis the community. I am not certain without reflecting further on the suggestion whether it would help or hinder the negotiating position of the Canadian government, but I will gladly look into the suggestion and if no possible disadvantage can come to Canada from making the aide memoire public I will discuss the matter with my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister indicate the general nature of the proposals that are being put forward? As I understand it, the matter is urgent in the sense that the Prime Minister is going to hold discussions. Is the country to be faced with a fait accompli of far-reaching consequences, or are these relatively routine proposals that we can safely leave to the government to deal with without any necessity for general discussion?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the objective of the proposals is obviously directed toward the improvement of relations between Canada and the European community. That is the general nature of them. As to the details of the proposals, I refer to my previous answer: it is possible that it would not be to the advantage of Canada to make them the subject of public discussion at this time. However, I will gladly look into the matter.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to be too persistent, but is the government proposing some form of special association with the European Economic Community?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the intention. The agreement that is suggested is a trade agreement, the intent of which is to improve trade relations between Canada and the European community. There is a procedure for consultations proposed, but there is nothing as far reaching as the hon. gentleman suggests, and certainly nothing discriminatory against any other group of nations.

I might add that when I return from my visit to Europe I will be making a statement at some point in the House, if the House so desires, and the House will be informed of the nature of the discussions and the progress that has been made. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there will be no final position taken on any type of agreement of which he seems to be afraid without any report to the House.

EFFECT OF CANADA'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS NATO ON POSSIBLE AGREEMENT WITH EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. As the unwillingness of the European Economic Community to grant Canada preferential trade treatment, which was very fully reported in this morning's press, has been materially increased by this government's attitude toward helping to maintain world peace through NATO, is the government planning to adopt a more positive attitude toward NATO in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government's position on NATO has been stated previously on many occasions, and I do not think the hon. member can say as much for his own party.

NATURE OF PROPOSED EXTENSION OF POWERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister recently suggested that the powers of the Food Prices Review Board were going to be extended. I wonder whether the minister would inform the House whether or not this extension is going to include the authority to order roll-backs of price increases when they are found to be unwarranted, and if not, why not?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

CONTINUATION AND POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF WEEKLY PRICE SURVEYS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The minister's answer is consistent with other aspects of government policy. Can the minister inform the House whether or not the useful weekly survey of the Food Prices Review Board in the Ottawa area, which has had some effect subsequently in bringing down prices which one hopes is not a temporary situation in this area, will be extended to other parts of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): This was a pilot project, Mr. Speaker, and I am very glad of its success. It serves to prove that this board is indeed making a useful contribution, and I hope it will be possible to extend this type of investigation to other Canadian towns.

ALLEGED FAILURE OF RETAILERS TO REFLECT LOWER BEEF PRICES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister is at least batting 500. I have a final supplementary for the minister. In view of the fact that there is some evidence available now that the low prices paid to farmers for their beef products have not been reflected in the retail prices, would the minister take steps to have the Food Prices Review Board review the discrepancy between these prices?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): This matter is under review, Mr. Speaker. I am working in close consultation with my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and I expect a useful decision will be taken in the near future.

[English]

NATURE OF PROPOSED EXTENSION OF POWERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday outside the House the minister enlarged on an answer he gave me in the House in respect of any restriction placed on the Food Prices Review Board and at that time outside the House said it was planned to further extend the powers of the board. Is he in a position to tell the House precisely what he had in mind with regard to these renewed powers or new powers for the board?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the intention was to incorporate certain sentences in the Speech from the Throne to explain the activities of the board. These explanations were not intended to limit in any way the responsibilities and powers of the board. It is unfortunate that someone reading the Speech from the Throne may have inferred that the purpose was to limit the board's terms of reference. I have insisted that it was absolutely out of the question, indicating that I wanted to see the board cope with all sorts of assignments.

I feel that within its terms of reference, there is much the board can achieve. Its terms of reference need not be extended to make it more active.

HEALTH

SUGGESTED USE OF WINE IN PLACE OF MILK

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Since the recent increase in milk prices, ministers have suggested different measures to Canadian consumers. The Minister of Agriculture has advocated drinking wine instead of milk because it is cheaper. For the same reason, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has recommended drinking powder milk. Does he think it is as nourishing as natural milk and could he tell us how to have newborn babies drink wine instead of natural milk?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As minister responsible for the status of women, I will consider the second part of the hon. member's question.

As to the first part, Mr. Speaker, I never did recommend anything, I just said what my family and I do to reduce the price of our milk consumption.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture rises on a point of order.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if I heard the hon. member correctly—and if I did not I apologize—I think he suggested that I suggested that wine could take the place of milk. I never suggested that at any time. No one in his right mind would suggest that wine could take the place of milk. I did say, however, according to some surveys which have been taken, that wine could do some good for people who suffer from iron deficiency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: It also contains Vitamin C and I think Timothy said, if you look in the good book, that wine is good for your stomach and other ailments from which you might suffer. I also said that wine and beer could be made easier than milk. No scientist nor engineer has yet invented anything better than a cow which can transfer roughage into a healthful food on which man could sustain life if necessary.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must allow, I am sure, the hon. member for Témiscamingue to ask at least a supplementary.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

A moment ago, the minister said that due to poverty he uses powder milk at home. Since the minister was saying this on a point of order, would he tell us whether he intends to suggest the use of powder wine?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the grape industry in Canada is very important as also is the wine industry. Wine is imported into this country in concentrated form and I have several reservations about that.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF SCIENCE COUNCIL ON IMPROVEMENT OF HEALTH CARE AND INCREASE IN RESEARCH GRANTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, within the last four years the Science Council recommended to the government the shake-up of the health care structure to improve medical and health care services to all Canadians and also recommended an increase in medical research funds. My question directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is the following: because the delivery of medical and health care services has already collapsed for many low income Canadians and because many important research programs have already been cut, can we expect the minister in particular and the government in general to act immediately on these recommendations.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will take the trouble to read the document I tabled in the House which is entitled: "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians", he would find many recommendations that have been made along the line of those contained in the Science Council of Canada report.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION BEFORE PUBLICATION OF GREEN PAPER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister stated that any interim measures to change immigration regulations would be announced by the government in the House. Later he stated that the opposition could express its point of view if the government makes a statement on motions on the subject. In the light of the statement made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration yesterday, has the government changed its position and will any significant interim changes in the immigration policy be undertaken by the government which will be debated in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire if there will be legislation before the green paper. I understand from the House leader that there might be one small bill, but of course it will be brought to the House and debated here. I do not quite see the relevance with regard to the exchange yesterday, but perhaps I did not understand the purport of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Epp: Yesterday the Prime Minister was asked very clearly as to whether legislation would be brought to the House respecting any changes that are proposed by the government on the immigration policy. For some time now the government has carried on a study in preparation of the green paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Has the hon. member a supplementary question to pose to the Prime Minister and, if so, will he please pose it, otherwise we should be getting on to another question?

Mr. Epp: I asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that the green paper has been completed, any legislation making significant changes in the present policy on immigration will be introduced in the House prior to the publication of the green paper.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, there will be a very small bill on another subject than those which were discussed yesterday. But I must correct the hon. member with regard to something he said. The green paper is not completed, as he seems to assume. It will be completed in due course and brought before parliament.

POSSIBLE ABOLITION OF CONTEMPT OF COURT PROCEEDINGS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Justice, to whom I gave notice of my question so that he may give me a more complete answer.

My question concerns the appearance this morning before the Committee of Justice and Legal Affairs of Mr. Justice Patrick Hartt, the excellent chairman of the Law Reform Commission.

Is the minister ready to give the green light to the commission which wants to go ahead and make a priority study of a very current issue, the abolition of contempt of court proceedings, which the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec, following the example of many others in the past, including the right hon. Prime Minister and myself, have condemned as being outmoded and unfair?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I know that the commission itself will be willing to give consideration to including this important subject in its future workload and if I thought it wise to do so I certainly would not stand in the way of it accomplishing the task.

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF SUPREME COURT JUDGMENT ON USE OF SEARCH WARRANTS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary.

Have the assistants of the minister already studied or do they intend to study the impact and the effect of a judgment given recently by the Supreme Court to the effect that from now on the police forces may enter a residence and make a search without a search warrant, simply on the strength of information received?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member very kindly gave me notice of his earlier question but not of the so-called unrelated supplementary. However, I will be delighted to look into the matter and see if I have any comment to make to him on it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MINISTER'S POSITION ON LAND CLAIMS OF STONEY BAND IN ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR SIMILAR TREATMENT FOR JAMES BAY INDIANS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): My question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and it refers to the advice which he offered earlier this week to the premier of Alberta regarding the land claims of the Stoney Indian band of Alberta. In view of the fact that the minister stated that the federal government is satisfied that the claim is valid and that the province of Alberta should turn the land over without going through the courts, would the minister say whether he has offered similar advice to the premier of Quebec regarding the land claims of the James Bay Indians.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there are two different acts involved here, one for Alberta and one for Quebec, and the situation is different in each case. I am optimistic that the situation in Quebec will be resolved very soon in a satisfactory fashion. As far as the situation in Alberta is concerned, it is our understanding that it is the responsibility of the provincial government to turn back to us, the federal Crown land needed so that we can extinguish the acknowledged claim of the Indian people.

SUGGESTION MINISTER CONVEY HIS VIEWS ON INDIAN LAND CLAIMS TO PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the minister for his explanation with regard to the situation in Alberta, but given the fact that Mr. Justice Malouf in his ruling stated that the evidence shows that the rights of the Cree Indians and Innuit population of the James Bay area have never been extinguished, would the minister undertake to convey to the premier of Quebec immediately his stand on Indian rights vis-à-vis the provincial jurisdiction so that we can have a uniform approach to this question in all parts of the country?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think the premier of Quebec is well aware of the stance of this government on that matter, and that is the reason for which we have been supporting the Indian and Innuit groups in Quebec. As I said earlier, I am optimistic that the matter will soon be resolved in a satisfactory fashion.

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID TO WESTERN BEEF PRODUCERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the three prairie governments have been forced to announce cash assistance programs for the cow-calf operators and in view of the call by the western premiers for federal assistance, I should like to ask the minister now whether or not he will match the provincial programs or whether or not he will be announcing immediately some forms of assistance to the western beef producers.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with regard to what the hon. member has said about the western provinces, I understand that two of them have taken action to assist the beef producers.

An hon. Member: No, three.

Mr. Whelan: According to the information I have, it is two. I must remind hon. members that I must act for all these beef producers in Canada. They made a decision on their own; it is up to them, and I know that they are taking that decision on account of the feed stabilization program which we have initiated several weeks ago on our own.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the fact that they took the action because of the lack of any federal action, I should like to ask the minister the following question. In view of the many statements he made about stabilizing farm income, can he give us a commitment in the House that in the next week or two he will be doing something, or is it all just rhetoric?

Mr. Whelan: If and when any action is taken it will be on behalf of all beef producers of Canada. I cannot make an exception for one, two or three provinces. There are ten provinces and they all produce beef. Ontario is the largest beef producer in the nation, but they have not asked for that kind of action.

HOUSING

NEED FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State responsible for Urban Affairs.

The minister is well aware that the lack of appropriate housing for our fellow citizens remains a major problem.

Since the budget of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is now exhausted as concerns the financing of existing houses, and has been for some time, can the minister tell us if he was aware of this, and if so, what does he intend to do to obtain more funds to solve this problem?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the program has been tremendously successful, the most successful in the field of housing ever engaged upon by any government. Fortunately, the resources virtually lasted until the end of this building season so we should be able to continue with the maximum number of building starts. I expect to develop new programs or modifications of the existing program that will improve it still further and provide more starts next year when they will be needed at the beginning of the building season.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. With regard especially to the financing of existing houses for low-income people, has the minister any specific plans to carry out this program?

[English]

Mr. Danson: I am afraid I cannot announce anything specific for existing housing at this time. As the hon. member knows, AHOP did cover existing housing, but it has proved so popular and funds were being used up so fast that I thought it far more important to ensure that these funds be used to provide additional housing stock which should help everyone down the line.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR SERVICE BETWEEN EASTERN SASKATCHEWAN AND WESTERN MANITOBA—APPLICATION OF TRANSAIR FOR JET SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising from the cancellation of the air service into eastern Saskatchewan and western Manitoba last January by the Air Transport Committee with the approval of the government. In light of the promise made by the Prime Minister at his famous airport conference in Winnipeg on May 23 that this service would be restored and upgraded in the interest of development and employment opportunities, can the minister inform the House when this promise will be implemented.

An hon. Member: In the next four years.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): That is a fair assumption, Mr. Speaker. First, we have to buy two Saunders from the Manitoba government, something I signed for this morning, so we are in the process of achieving or realizing this promise.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Now that we are getting action on this matter at long last, would the minister also urge the ATC to consider immediately, or at the earliest opportunity, the application of TransAir to bring jet service into this region?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows very well the relationship between the CTC and the Department of Transport. This decision has to be taken by the Transport Committee of the CTC, not by the Department of Transport.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF OPERATIONS OF FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, this is my first question in the House and I am sure you can understand that I am nervous. I have never talked to the Prime Minister before.

An hon. Member: Neither has anybody else.

Mr. Hees: You will not get any answers either.

Mr. Whiteway: My question is related to fisheries but I am going to aim high and direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the livelihood of the fishermen in the Northwest Territories, Saskatchewan and Manitoba is in jeopardy, would the government undertake to review immediately the activities of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and in particular the activities of the processing plant in Transcona with the objective of moving the facilities to Selkirk and/or Gimli.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: There is another little part, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While I am most anxious to accommodate the hon. member on his first question, I do wonder about the patience of the other members who might not have asked their first question or might like to get on to some of the other business.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to mimic the Minister of Finance, and thought I could sneak in a little speech as well. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister is so often sniffing the thin air around the metaphysical peaks of political intellectualism—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Very true.

An hon. Member: You blew it!

An hon. Member: You started well and finished quick.

An hon. Member: That was the punch line.

An hon. Member: He never heard of Gimli.

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN OPENING AND CLOSING DATES OF TUNA SEASON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Fisheries and may I add my congratulations on his appointment. Can he advise if he is giving sympathetic and favourable consideration to the request of the tuna sports fisheries group in Prince Edward Island for a delay in the opening and closing dates of the Gulf tuna season, thereby giving a boost to the tourist and fishery industry of the province?

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, any question put by the hon. member would always receive favourable and sympathetic hearing. I have heard the arguments in favour of changing the opening and closing of the tuna season and I think there are valid arguments. I have asked that the fishermen and charter boat operators be fully consulted before a firm decision is made and this process is under way.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF TERMS OF REFERENCE TO INCLUDE MERCHANDISE OTHER THAN FOOD

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs following upon the question put by the hon. member for St. John's East. In this consideration of expanding the terms of reference of the Food Prices

Review Board and redefining its role, is the minister giving consideration to having the terms of reference apply to merchandise other than foods that are bought in supermarkets, such as health and personal care products. People of Canada are amazed at the spread in prices for like products and it appears there is some discrepancy in this area.

IMMIGRATION

METHOD OF CHANGING REGULATIONS—OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS TO EXPRESS OPINIONS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister is on the subject of immigration. In light of the importance of the present immigration situation, would the Prime Minister give his assurance that the changes in regulations will be made by resolution and that proper notice will be given in order that the House will have the opportunity to express its opinion on these measures?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the second part of the question I would refer the hon. member to my answer of yesterday that if a policy change is going to be made on an interim basis it will be announced in the House and the opposition will have occasion to express itself on those changes. On the second part of the question, the intention would not be to proceed by way of resolution but under the authority of the act which enables and empowers the government to make regulations.

MONTREAL OLYMPICS, 1976—AMOUNT OF REVENUE ANTICIPATED FROM SALE OF COINS—PAYMENT OF COMMISSION OR DISCOUNT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Posmaster General I shall direct my question to the former Postmaster General, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I have reference to the report filed two days ago by the Postmaster General with respect to the sale of Olympic coins which, incidentally, bear the name of the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, where it is stated that the revenue anticipated from the sale of the coins will be $644 million. I wonder if the minister could reconcile that with the fact that the act clearly prohibits the sale of any Olympic coinage in excess of $450 million?

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister who had to leave the House, I take notice of this question. As soon as tomorrow he will get a satisfactory reply.

[Mr. Marshall.]

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question which perhaps the parliamentary secretary could also refer to the minister. In the same report it is stated that no commission, discount or other advantage is to be allowed or given by the Postmaster General to any distributor with respect to Olympic coinage. I wonder if the minister could indicate if he is satisfied that no such advantage or discount has been paid indirectly by COJO or any other group thus ensuring that Canadian coinage is not being discounted around the world?

HEALTH

RECOMMENDATIONS OF SCIENCE COUNCIL—PARTICIPATION OF PRACTISING PROFESSIONALS IN WRITING REPORT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is supplementary to the question put by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. In view of the charges by the Canadian Medical Association that the Science Council report on health care delivery was largely written by non-practising professionals, what input did practising professionals have in the actual process of the study and in the subsequent recommendations that his department is bringing forward?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member but I missed the last part of his question.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what input practising professionals actually had in the evolving of this report and the subsequent recommendations that the department is adopting?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that this is a report by the Science Council which is not answerable to me but to the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Science and Technology. I am not, therefore, in a position to give the hon. member any information how that council, which is a semi-autonomous body, made arrangements for preparation of the report.

ENERGY

COAL—AGREEMENT WITH NOVA SCOTIA FOR INVENTORY PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who undertook to examine his memory or his files to see whether any proposal has been put forward of a concrete nature by the government of Nova Scotia with respect to the further development of coal mining in Nova Scotia. Can the minister give me that information today?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There has been an agreement between the province of Nova Scotia and the federal government, which is represented by my department in a technical capacity and by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in a financial capacity, for the examination of additional coal deposits in the province other than those now under the jurisdiction of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. In effect there is a coal inventory program under way with regard to possible coal developments in other parts of the province. The estimated cost is about $1.3 million and the time for completion of the inventory will be about three years. As I say, my department will be responsible from the technical standpoint for providing advice under the general financial aegis of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF PENSIONS TO PERSONS BETWEEN 60 AND 65 WHO ARE NO LONGER EMPLOYED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the justifiable complaints of many persons between the ages of 60 and 65 against the unfairness of their not being included in the proposed legislation regarding pensions, and despite there not being unanimous consent for the motion I moved earlier, will the minister give consideration to reviewing the proposed legislation and make pensions available across the board to those who are out of the labour market.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question several times.

[English]

When a statement was made announcing this measure, it was made clear that this was an interim measure to help couples, one member of which is over 65. It was stressed that, indeed, the problems to which the hon. member has referred would not be answered under such a formula. The solution is not through bringing about a broad expansion or lowering of general pension benefits to those who are 65, 55 or 50, but through a system of guaranteed income or income supplementation which would be payable to all, regardless of age, condition, or sex.

DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister himself has said, the Prime Minister pointed out these defects during the election campaign. Accordingly, can he now say how long the interim period will be before the guaranteed income is implemented across the board?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. member to the working document which was tabled in this House in April, 1973, which suggested a certain time span for implementation of proposals which, I hope, will be agreed to next spring by the provinces before implementation of the recommendations. As to what the timetable will be after that, I am afraid I cannot say specifically at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF APPOINTMENT OF ACTING DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the admission of the Minister of Transport that there is a substantial mess in transportation, can the Prime Minister explain the rationale, if any, of appointing as acting deputy minister of transport a man who has no experience in transportation and whose only claim to fame is that he made a mess of the Prime Minister's 1972 election campaign.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the person alluded to by the hon. gentleman is the one I have in mind, let me say that he was chosen by the Public Service Commission. It is a well known practice that exempt staff of ministerial offices are eligible to examination and acceptance by the Public Service Commission. I cannot see the basis of the complaint.

SUGGESTED DISCUSSIONS WITH PRIME MINISTER OF SWEDEN ON FREEDOM OF ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT INFORMATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister, who I assume will be holding discussions with the Prime Minister of Sweden, if he will discuss with that distinguished gentleman the provisions regarding freedom of access to government information which prevail in that country, hopefully as a basis for eliminating the concealment, deviousness and secrecy which afflict this government.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without conceding the conclusions of the question, I tell the hon. gentleman that guidelines which were adopted were made after careful study of the Swedish practice. We fell that ours are, in every meaningful sense, as liberal as theirs. I would be interested to hear of any other reforms the hon. member might like to import from Sweden.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say to the right hon. gentleman that there is a private member's public bill in my name on the order paper which goes far beyond the practice of this government or the government of Sweden.

Oral Questions

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST SINGLE WOMEN AND WIDOWS OVER AGE 60

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It was suggested, I believe, that provision would be made whereby a woman of 60 whose husband is over 65 and receiving a pension will be eligible for the old age security pension. I ask the minister, why is he allowing this discrimination against single women who are over 60 and widows who are over 60.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if anyone can be accused of discrimination, it is the hon. member, because this proposal will apply not only to wives, but also to husbands below 65 who may be in need. The provision will apply if one of the spouses is over 65 and will apply to both spouses.

As far as the other element of the question is concerned, once more the purpose of this particular measure is to make sure that once the spouse who earns the family income retires, a pension is paid. We want to make sure that the couple is not forced to live on a pension for one only. That is the objective of this piece of legislation and not that of paying pensions to everybody at age 60.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

APPOINTMENT OF REFEREE UNDER BILL C-12 CONCERNING GRAIN HANDLERS DISPUTE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour and has to do with Bill C-12. Has the minister appointed the referee under the terms of that legislation? If so, will he give us the name?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. A colleague of the hon. member's asked the question yesterday, or perhaps on Tuesday, and I replied that Mr. Justice Bayda of the Court of Queen's Bench, Saskatchewan, had been appointed.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am talking about the referee to be appointed under Bill C-12. I think the minister was referring to the Industrial Inquiry Commission. I am referring to the referee, sir.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): No, Mr. Speaker, it has not become necessary to appoint that referee. No word has been communicated to me to the effect that either of the parties that particular dispute is running into difficulty with respect to the interpretation of the collective agreement, as of this time.

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF MR. JUSTICE BAYDA

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there any reason why the full terms of reference under which Mr. Justice Bayda is working cannot be made public at this time?

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be pleased to give more amplification if that is desirable. As I indicated in the House, those terms will permit him to go into the whole history of labour relations in that particular industry, with a view to making recommendations for improvement and greater efficiency. In essence, that is what they are.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DISCREPANCY BETWEEN EARNINGS OF GRAIN HANDLERS WORKING FOR PRIVATE COMPANIES AND THOSE WORKING FOR FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Has he consulted with the President of the Treasury Board and attempted to deal with the serious discrepancy which has arisen because of the implementation of the Perry report with respect to grain handlers in Vancouver. The discrepancy is this: Grain handlers working for private companies in the port of Vancouver earn up to $2.50 an hour more than grain handlers working for the federal government in Prince Rupert. These grain handlers work under much more severe conditions. Has the minister discussed with the President of the Treasury Board the possibility of removing this very serious discrepancy?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on a matter in the labour relations field which does not fall within my jurisdiction. I think the hon. member would be well advised to direct his question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, has the President of the Treasury Board considered this serious matter? Has he considered the representations of the Public Service Alliance on regional pay differences and their serious effect upon employees in western Canada in particular?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, all federal government employees are covered by collective agreements. Procedures have been provided for to negotiate working conditions and wages and in the cases mentioned by the hon. member, the procedures apply and will apply and when negotiations take place the points made by the hon. member will then be discussed and agreements reached.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR APPLICATION OF LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAMS TO SAWMILLS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

In view of the problems facing the sawmill industry, which are resulting in the layoff of many workers in my area and elsewhere, could the minister tell the House if he has had representations from his colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to the effect that he might have a more considerable budget so as to allow him to give more grants to a greater number of projects with LIP programs and, if so, will he be receiving a favourable answer?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this year's budgets have been established and since the month of August we have been asking all departments to try and live within their budget. No such request has come from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

EGGS—COMMITTEE STUDY OF OPERATIONS OF CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY AND AUTHORITIES RESPONSIBLE THERETO

Mr. Speaker: The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), seconded by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), moves:

That a special committee of 14 members be appointed to inquire into and report upon, with its recommendations, if any,

(a) the operations of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, and

(b) the performance of the several authorities having responsibilities with respect to those operations.

That the members of the said committee be Mrs. Appolloni and Messrs. Anderson, Cafik, Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi), Fox, Goodale, Gray, Lambert (Bellechasse), Lawrence, Lessard, Mazankowski, McGrath, Murta and Orlikow;

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit when the House is sitting; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; and to engage the services of such expert staff as may be deemed necessary;

And that the said committee be instructed to make its report to this House no later than December 16, 1974.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) would follow the usual custom and practice of the House by rising in his place to formally propose this motion and speak in support of it. Perhaps the minister will honour us with his remarks later in the debate. In any event, it is rather unusual for a minister not to stand in his place and formally propose a motion to set up a special committee of the House to examine into and report upon the operations of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency.

On August 28 last, following the release of the second report on egg prices by the Food Prices Review Board, I issued a press release on behalf of the official opposition calling for a parliamentary inquiry into the whole matter of egg marketing in Canada and the rather startling disclosure which had been made at that time, namely, that some nine million eggs had to be destroyed because they had been allowed to rot in storage. I remember saying at that time that I thought it rather strange that these startling revelations should come so soon after the federal general election. I said then, and I repeat now, that this affair has all the elements of a deliberate cover-up.

When the Minister of Agriculture was carrying out his crusade and visiting rural constituencies in this country campaigning on behalf of the Liberal Party, millions of eggs were rotting in storage. It should be noted, Mr. Speaker, that was at a time when Canadians were paying record high prices. I submit the evidence clearly indicates the minister was aware of that situation. I said this situation has all the elements of a cover-up. It was a cover-up carried out to protect the Minister of Agriculture and to ensure Liberal votes in rural Canada. That is the only conclusion one can draw. However, if you are going to try to cover up rotten eggs, it is only fair to suggest that it is pretty hard to conceal the stench.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The revelations of last August shocked Canadians. At that time, Canadians were even beginning to accept high prices for eggs as a fact of life. Nevertheless, they were, and are shocked over that and subsequent revelations.

This committee inquiry which was originally called for by the official opposition will, in my opinion, not only establish maladministration by the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency and the Farm Products Marketing Council, but maladministration by the Minister of Agriculture. That is a serious charge, Mr. Speaker. In putting forward such a charge, one should ask: what are the responsibilities of the minister and, indeed, of the government in relation to this matter? The provisions of the statute, the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, are quite clear. They define the responsibilities. The statute should be clear in defining these responsibilities because this agency has been given the power of monopoly and is allowed to operate outside the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

The act provides—I am paraphrasing—that it is the duty of the Farm Products Marketing Council to review the operations of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency with a view to ensuring that CEMA carries on its operations in accordance with its objectives. It must promote a strong, efficient and competitive production and marketing in the egg industry and, further, have due regard to the interests of egg producers and egg consumers. The fact that it must have due regard for producers and consumers seems to have escaped the Minister of Agriculture. I refer the minister to section 6(1) of the act. In order to fulfil this duty, the council must, among other things, review the operations of CEMA and report thereon annually to the Minister of Agriculture. We already have a report from the Farm Products Marketing Council. In any case where in its opinion the circumstances warrant, it should report on a more frequent basis.

Clearly, the council has been negligent in its duties and responsibilities under this section of the act, and the minister has been negligent in not ensuring that the council carry out the reporting of this whole affair as required under the act. The council should make such inquiries and take such action within its powers as it deems appropriate in relation to any complaints received by it from any person who is directly affected by the operations of CEMA and which relate to the operations of CEMA.

The act describes remedial action to be taken by the council in respect of CEMA operations. If the governor in council or the Minister of Agriculture so direct, the council shall hold a public hearing into any matter relating to its objectives, that is, any matter arising out of its review of CEMA's operations, to ensure that those operations are carried on to promote a strong, efficient and competitive production and marketing egg industry.

There was no direction. There was no inquiry. There were no public hearings. As a matter of fact, the minister, apart from those occasions on which they were prodded into action, was strangely quiet throughout this whole rotten egg affair. The minister can no longer maintain silence, because the moment of truth has arrived. We intend to endeavour to establish that the minister and the Farm Products Marketing Council failed to carry out the provisions of the act. Had they done so, they might have avoided the need to hold the inquiry that is now proposed. But I suppose this would have been too much to expect from the present minister, who has earned the reputation of being the wailing wallah of the cabinet, and it would have been too much to expect of the Farm Products Marketing Council. All one has to do is look at the make-up of the council. The message comes through loud and clear. At least five of the six members are former Liberal politicians.

The evidence is clear that CEMA knew there would be a surplus of eggs in Canada as early as last January. I hope to establish this before the committee. The first general manager of CEMA is reported in the Toronto Star of September 25 last as saying:

The agency realized early last winter that by setting a guaranteed high price for producers they were risking the temptation in human nature to overproduce.

Another agency spokesman, James Fisher, according to the same article, insisted that the agency knew where the eggs were and knew exactly how many eggs were in storage at any given time. Thus, on its own admission, the agency knew there was a surplus, and then tried to cover it up. I hope the elements in the cover-up will come out in the course of the committee's hearings. In order to get this whole sordid affair into perspective it is necessary that we go back to the very beginning. On January 9 of this year, the Food Prices Review Board released its first report on eggs, in which it concluded as follows:

The prices of eggs in Canada have risen more rapidly in the last 12 months than those of any other group.

[Mr. McGrath.]

The Board went on to recommend that the prices of table eggs in Canada be lowered immediately. It went recommended further:

(2) That the present system of price stabilization should be altered.

(3) That egg marketing boards should be accountable to the public.

In this connection I would refer Your Honour and the House to the report by Professor Forbes which the government tried to suppress but which I released in this chamber some time ago.

(4) That the federal government should initiate an over-all review of the egg marketing process in Canada.

This was the first time the board had expressed itself in a clear, definite and positive manner. On January 10, the following day, I asked the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs what was being done about the recommendations in that report. In reply, the minister stated: "The government is looking at this matter on an urgent basis." It is interesting to note that the minister who gave that answer in the House is now a private member. I suggest he is a sacrificial lamb chosen to protect the Minister of Agriculture.

Again, on March 1, I asked a question about this report. The Minister of Agriculture told us he had asked the Farm Products Marketing Council to make a thorough study of the recommendations contained in the report of the Food Prices Review Board. Well, Mr. Speaker, I remember remarking at the time that in my view this smacked of conflict of interest. To ask the Farm Products Marketing Council, which has responsibility for CEMA, to inquire into the actions of its own creation is like asking Henry Ford to conduct an inquiry into the price of automobiles.

On May 2, the then minister of consumer affairs told the House he had been advised by the Minister of Agriculture that the report of the council was "expected very shortly". Well, the dissolution of parliament followed. On October 1, the Minister of Agriculture, in reply to a question I put to him, stated that the report of the council had been ready for several months. We knew that. We knew the report had been in the minister's hands since early in May. Then the minister told us it would be presented shortly. A few days ago, I rose under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to urge the minister to produce the report of the council so that hon. members might have a little time before today's debate, and also to prepare ourselves to undertake our responsibilities in connection with the committee hearings which are now proposed. Of course, this motion, like all motions under Standing Order 43, was denied the required unanimous consent.

What happened today? One hour before the debate was due to take place, the minister tabled the report which had been promised for so long. I see it has been mimeographed, hastily prepared. It is undated. It has probably been expurgated by the minister himself. I suggest it has been tabled without regard for the responsibility of members to prepare for the debate in which we are now engaged. How can we be expected to examine a report of this nature in one hour? Even on the basis of a quick glance at its contents one gets the impression that it is an attempt to whitewash CEMA. This is obvious, because it was prepared prior to the disclosure of the rotten eggs scandal, prior to the first disclosure in the Globe and Mail that nine million eggs had gone bad. This revelation in the Globe and Mail prompted a report that the number of eggs destroyed might be as high as 200 million, a figure attributed to the president of Export Packers of Toronto who was reported in the press to this effect on September 7. The same article quotes the Consumers' Association of Canada describing CEMA as "a mismanaged monopoly" and urges that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) abolish it and return to the law of supply and demand. That comes from the president of the Consumers' Association of Canada who wrote to the Prime Minister on September 13 regarding the element of cover-up. This is what the president of CAC had to say in his letter:

It does appear as well that there may to date have been a substantial element of the cover-up in this situation.

The president of CAC went on in the letter to call for a complete and candid disclosure of all the facts with respect to CEMA—which we have not had to date—and to ask for a judicial or parliamentary inquiry. The president of the Consumers' Association of Canada is not speaking for some local minority interest group; his is the only group which speaks for consumers throughout the country. The association's annual grant from the government has gone from $100,000 to $250,000 a year. I suggest that if the association is worthy of a yearly grant of $250,000 from the government, we should pay attention to what it has to say.

We are now going to get an inquiry, but let me just continue with the background. The Food Prices Review Board, in an unusual display of frustration over government inaction—I do not say this disparagingly or offensively, but God knows there have been many occasions for them to express frustration—released a second report on eggs, the number two report. We already have had the number one report, and we now have number two. Egg report number two was released by the board on August 28, and in it the board reaffirmed the recommendations contained in the first egg report. Then it went even further and accused the federal and provincial governments—here the board was getting very close to the minister—of permitting the mismanagement of egg marketing in Canada. The board then went on to say, if I may paraphrase the second egg report, that surpluses prove that the price to the producer is too high and should be lowered as soon as possible, again repeating the principal conclusions of egg report number one.

I think it is relevant and pertinent to quote this sentence from the report, especially in the context of the subsequent revelations contained in the report on marketing boards by Professor Forbes which the government had tried to suppress:

The marketing board approach to income support for egg producers which has been followed in the past year has proven costly to producers and to consumers.

The board claimed that in its opinion changes were needed in this policy, and it suggested two possible changes. First, it recommended that the government give consideration to implementing a short-term program of deficiency payments. Second, it recommended a long-term program of income supplements. We have yet to hear any reaction from the government to these recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board. The release of that report had some rather interesting side effects. The report was first preceded by a speech by Mrs. Plumptre—the outspoken Mrs. Plumptre—at the CNE on August 21, 1974, in which she blamed the federal government for "unjustifiably high prices" for eggs in Canada. That is a direct quote from the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board.

What was the reaction of the government to that speech? The Minister of Agriculture, in his usual folksy way, and I would say rather unchivalrously, referred to that speech by the lady as "hogwash". He went on to issue a warning to Mrs. Plumptre to get her facts straight, or else. Then he is reported to have said, with respect to consumer representation on marketing boards, that as far as the Farm Products Marketing Council was concerned, it would be over his dead body. Although physically the minister may be very much alive, I suggest to the House that politically he is as dead as the 28 million eggs that he allowed to rot in storage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Following the rude reaction of the minister, a rather unusual scene unfolded. There was a public dispute between two ministers of the government. Enter the new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). With the ink hardly dry on his commission, and to spread his wings and show the people of Canada that he was independent, that he for one was prepared to speak for the consumers of this country even if the minister would not, he took great exception to the Minister of Agriculture's rude remarks about Mrs. Plumptre. Then the Prime Minister entered the fray. When asked to comment on the spectacle of two ministers quarrelling and disagreeing in public, he said that the Minister of Agriculture was doing his job for the farmers and that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was merely doing his job for the consumers.

What a beautifully orchestrated scenario! It would make the Royal Ballet of Canada look sick. Here was the Prime Minister in the East Block calling the shots, telling his new consumer affairs minister to get out and flex his muscles. Then we had the great champion of the farmers. It would be humorous if it were not so phony. If we did have this kind of independence in the governement, it would be encouraging indeed.

What are the facts? The indisputable fact is that egg prices in Canada throughout this whole affair have been allowed to rise. They have risen more rapidly than any other foodstuff, and the minister knows that is true.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Rubbish.

Mr. McGrath: Tell that to your constituents when egg prices go up as they have been doing. I suggest that you will get some of those rotten eggs that are stored in Quebec thrown right at you.

So you have the paradox that in the midst of these rising egg prices, consumption of eggs has actually declined while production of eggs has been allowed to rise. If this does not smack of mismanagement, what does? Then there is the intriguing question of the 50 million eggs to be sold to Austria. I have not been satisfied that that has been rationally or amply explained to the public. A Toronto exporter stated that he received an order from Austria for 50 million eggs, but it was turned down by CEMA. Perhaps this gentleman will appear before the committee and give us the facts.

Mr. Whelan: I certainly hope he does.

Mr. McGrath: With reference to the minister's interjection, he's had it, and he knows it. Getting back to my own province, we have the story of the 250,000 eggs that CEMA shipped from Newfoundland to Surrey, British Columbia. Why, in the name of God, would we ship 250,000 eggs from one end of the country to the other at a time when egg prices in Newfoundland were soaring, only to find that when the eggs arrived in British Columbia they had rotted in transit? This was the result of mismanagement, since it took, I believe, three weeks for the eggs to get from Newfoundland to Surrey, B.C. Whose fault is that? Who takes the ultimate responsibility for that?

● (1550)

Mr. Whelan: Did CEMA drive the train?

Mr. McGrath: CEMA had an obligation to ensure that the eggs were received in good condition. This was not done. It is rather interesting, in talking about Newfoundland and British Columbia, to realize that here are two provinces which have already publicly threatened to withdraw from CEMA because they know it is not working, under the present administration, to the advantage of the consumer or the producer. There is public indignation in Canada, and rightly so. Canadians should be indignant. We would be a heartless people if we were not indignant because, at a time when millions of the world's population face starvation or malnutrition, millions of eggs were allowed to rot in storage in Canada through mismanagement, especially at a time when Canadians are paying the highest prices ever for food and are faced with increasing inflation.

We have revelation after revelation of eggs being destroyed and plowed into the ground because they have been allowed to rot, through the careless mismanagement of people who have been given a licence by the people of Canada to control the supply and distribution of eggs in this country. It has been estimated by a former moderator of the United Church of Canada that one egg would keep alive one starving child for one day. That is something to think about. If these eggs had been preserved in powdered form, they could have been supplied to the world, through the government's food program, to alleviate some of the malnutrition and starvation which exists.

It is not sufficient for the Minister of Agriculture to try to pass the buck. It is not enough for him to try to blame those who cannot speak for themselves, because the ultimate responsibility is his alone. I am sorry the minister has just stepped out of the chamber. The Minister of Agriculture is guilty of maladministration and neglect of his ministerial responsibilities under the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

I hope the committee will be allowed to carry out its mandate and to function without interference from the government of Canada. I have doubts in this regard, especially having seen the membership from the government side of the House. The membership of the committee includes the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Cafik), who has a reputation in this House of being the government's hatchetman in committees. From that moment on I became very skeptical about how much latitude this committee will have. However, should the committee be given latitude and permitted to carry out its inquiry unencumbered by government interference, it will show conclusively two things; that the minister is guilty of maladministration and neglect in the performance of his duties, and that he tried—and failed—to cover up this whole sordid affair.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party it is my intention to support this motion to establish a committee. I am not sure, however, that we should support the establishment of a committee if such is dependent upon the case put forward by the first speaker for the official opposition. I believe I would still be in doubt, in that circumstance, as to whether to support the motion.

The hon. member spent a good deal of time attacking the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I am certain there are good reasons for criticizing the minister. The hon. member also spent a good deal of time criticizing the action, or lack of action by officials of CEMA. I am also certain there is much to be critical of in respect of their action. But the hon. member gave us very little in the way of information about what should be done so that the consumer will get eggs at a reasonable price and the producer will receive a price which permits him to remain in the business of producing eggs.

We received from the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) very little of a constructive nature in respect of the basic problem concerning eggs in this country. We, as members of the New Democratic Party, are as concerned about the destruction of millions of eggs as we would be concerned about the destruction of any foodstuff, especially at a time when so many people are hungry, so many people are starving and when, even in an affluent country like Canada, there are many people in the cities, in the rural areas and among our native population who simply do not have an adequate diet. So we look with a great deal of concern and disappointment at policies which permit wastage and destruction of important foodstuffs.

If there was mismanagement on the part of CEMA, then the people of Canada should know what happened and why it happened. We must have these answers, not merely because millions of eggs already have been permitted to go bad but because we must know what happened in order to do whatever is necessary to avoid similar situations occurring. We must ensure that eggs are produced and distributed as efficiently and as economically as possible.

I want to say on my own behalf—I do not claim to be an expert on the production of eggs although I do represent an urban constituency where many people consume eggs—that I find this situation strange because when we have had surpluses in the past, whether in eggs, butter or any other foodstuff, governments—both Liberal and Conservative—have gone out of their way to dispose of the surpluses by selling them at bargain prices or at give-away prices to consumers in foreign countries. This was done even before trying to find a method to ensure that food supplies or commodities which could not be sold in the marketplace in this country went to Canadians who could not afford to pay the market price.

On this point I speak on my own behalf and not necessarily on behalf of my party, because as far as I know we have not yet worked out in detail such a policy. However, I should like the government of this country to consider establishing a system such as exists in the United States, where a substantial percentage of the surplus food is diverted to people who simply cannot afford to pay the retail price. It is done through distribution of food stamps. This would permit low-income people to obtain foodstuffs such as eggs which may be in temporary surplus supply.

The hon. member for St. John's East, speaking for the official opposition, seemed to endorse the position taken by the Consumers' Association and by Dr. Forbes in calling for the elimination of marketing boards, in this case in respect of eggs and, I suppose, in respect of other commodities; doing away with marketing boards and leaving the production, sale and distribution of food to, as he said, the law of supply and demand. If there is one area of life in which the law of supply and demand has not worked for the producer or for the consumer, it is the production of food. If you look at every product of the farmers of Canada in the last 25 years at least, you see cycles of temporary surpluses followed by shortages. A few years ago the minister in charge of the Wheat Board brought forward a plan under which we paid the farmers of western Canada $200 million not to produce wheat. A few years later there was a tremendous shortage of wheat. The price of wheat has gone up from $1.60 a bushel to something like $5.50 at present.

When the minister in charge of the Wheat Board asked the farmers of western Canada to get out of the production of wheat, they were urged to get into the production of livestock, which they did. Today, there is a temporary surplus of beef. The price paid to the producers of cattle in western Canada has gone down pretty sharply, at a time when the price of feed for their cattle is very high. The price of beef to the consumer has not been reduced. I suggest that it is not the farmer who is benefiting at present, nor is it the consumer: it is the middleman, the processor, the meat packer and the supermarket. That is what supply and demand forces bring about consistently—temporary surpluses and then shortages.

The beef producers of western Canada faced by reduced prices and the high cost of feed are getting out of the business. Hundreds and thousands of farmers in the three prairie provinces are selling their herds. This means that 2½ years from now there will be a shortage of beef and the Canadian consumer will probably pay 50 per cent or 75 per cent more for beef than he is now paying. That is the result of following the old nostrums of supply and demand.

Members of the New Democratic Party will not support the idea that marketing boards work against the interests of the producer and the consumer. It seems to us obvious that the producers of farm products—this includes eggs, beef, and everything else used in this country—need the input of a group of consumers, urban people who are working for good wages and are able to pay a fair price for farm products. If they are to produce wheat, farmers must receive a fair price.

Marketing boards have served a useful function in protecting the interests of the farmer. We are not convinced that wiping out marketing boards and leaving the production of eggs, or of any other farm commodity, up to the law of supply and demand will benefit consumers in the long run. On the contrary, we believe it necessary, if we are to provide the consumers of Canada with sufficient food at a consistent and fair price, that farmers be encouraged to produce more foodstuffs and be guaranteed a fair price for them. They must be able to buy feed and other supplies which they need at a price that will encourage them to stay in production and produce more than they have in the past. So we reject the proposal of the so-called experts that marketing boards be eliminated. We reject the idea that the production of eggs be left to the so-called law of supply and demand. We want marketing boards to work efficiently, in the interests of the producer, the farmer and the consumer. For this reason we welcome the proposal to establish a committee to look into the whole question of the supply and the price of eggs. We want the committee to get all the facts.

It seems pretty obvious that CEMA did not operate as efficiently in the interests of the farmer and the consumer as it should. We want to find out in what way CEMA's operations were misguided or less than fully efficient. We want to find out whether the relationship between the national marketing agency and the provincial marketing boards is as fair to producers and consumers as it should be. We want a thorough examination of the whole question. But we do not believe that the way to protect the interests of the producer and the consumer is to wipe out marketing boards. We do not believe that what is needed is a witch-hunt—for which, it seems to me, the hon. member for St. John's East is calling—nor that finding scapegoats will solve the problem of the price of eggs or help the producer or the consumer.

What is needed is a thorough, fair, objective examination of the question so that we can eliminate any inefficiencies. We believe that the consumer is entitled to purchase eggs at a price which he or she can afford. We believe that the farmers, the producers, are entitled to a price for eggs which will encourage them to stay in business and to produce more eggs—if we need more eggs, as I believe we do—without going into debt. If that means subsidies to the producers, we are not opposed to that; we would welcome them. If it means taking steps other than leaving the production, distribution and sale of eggs to the law of the jungle—for which, it seems to me, the hon. member for St. John's East is calling—then we will support any proposal which is fair to the producer and the consumer of eggs in this country.

We welcome the establishment of this committee. Indeed, we have called for it on a number of occasions. We are prepared to see that all the facts are brought forward and that concrete suggestions are made to meet the needs of the people of Canada, the producers and the consumers.

Canadian Egg Marketing Agency

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a question of privilege, Madam Speaker. I should like to set the record straight. I did not put forward the position that we favour a return to the law of supply and demand. I merely enunciated the facts as I have them at my disposal. I was quoting from the report of the Food Prices Review Board and I referred to the Forbes report. I do not think it was reasonable or fair of the hon. member to read what he did into my remarks.

Mr. Orlikow: On the point raised by the hon. member for St. John's East, Madam Speaker, I think today's Hansard will show very clearly that the hon. member did put on record the fact that the Consumers' Association of Canada called for the abolition of marketing boards and that Dr. Forbes is opposed to marketing boards. It is true that the hon. member for St. John's East did not say he agreed with the position of both those sources, but neither did he say he disagreed with it. I think any reasonable and disinterested person would, after reading his speech, come to the obvious conclusion, as I did, that since he quoted those two sources and did not quote anybody who supports the continuation of marketing boards, he supports the proposals made by those two sources.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I think we must view the events of the next few weeks in two lights. Perhaps I view what is going on at the moment in a different light from other hon. members, because I am closely connected with agriculture within this party and in private life. If this inquiry is conducted properly and the committee does its work well, it can be a very meaningful exercise. But in my opinion it is overdue. When I came to parliament in the fall of 1970, we were in the midst of debating Bill C-176 which set up the whole national marketing system that we are presently debating. What we predicted at that time has come about. Hopefully, the proposed inquiry will clear the air as far as producers and consumers are concerned.

So far we have not asked what we want from the inquiry. I suggest that if we are to receive any benefit from it, we must consider the relationship between CEMA and the national products marketing board, its relationship with provincial boards and the control exercised over producers in the provinces. The committee will also have to take the management of CEMA under careful scrutiny and discover why it made mistakes. Who were the people involved, and exactly what did they do? What is happening at the present time, and have any changes been made? These matters must be brought into the open by the inquiry so that producers and consumers will know what is going on.

Then we must ask some fundamental questions, such as whether the marketing boards presently established benefit producers in the long run, and whether they help consumers at all. My hon. friend from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) referred to the federal government's position in this whole matter, especially that of the Department of Agriculture. That matter must be cleared up. How does information flow from CEMA through the national board to the minister's office, and does the minister have any direct input in the discussions?

I hope the committee will seriously consider travelling to the provinces, because it is essential that the breakdown in relations between the federal jurisdiction and provincial jurisdictions in this matter be repaired. The provinces have the ability to make this program work, and we should meet with them if we are to do a thorough job of this inquiry.

Producers and consumers alike are sickened by the destruction of 28 million eggs. I do not know how many dollars that represents.

Mr. McKinley: Six million dollars.

Mr. Murta: How many people have thought of the other consequences of this action? At a time when protein was scarce, a great amount was thrown away. The grain that went into producing the eggs was wasted at a time when grain was selling at world record prices. If the inquiry is to be meaningful, all the facts must be laid on the table. We must start restoring confidence in our so-called animal agriculture, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murta: That is sadly lacking in the egg industry today, and also in the cattle industry. It is one of the matters about which the minister has been lax. I would point out to people who are pro-marketing board that this party is not on a witch-hunt. Many in this country think marketing boards are worth while. If agencies like CEMA and the national farm marketing board are to survive and be viable, they must withstand in the next few months the scrutiny of members of parliament and all Canadians. We must look at the question fairly, because only in that way can we show whether CEMA and the marketing board system in general are worth saving. I therefore hope that the committee which will examine this question will soon be allowed to do its work.

● (1620)

The theory of the marketing plan is quite simple. Every province was put on a quota based on its historical share of Canada's market. Each province, through its board, would allocate quotas to its producers. Egg prices would be set by board regulation rather than by supply and demand. Eggs produced under a quota that could not be sold at the fixed price would be paid for by CEMA. In turn, CEMA would finance its operations by a levy on all egg producers in this country. The provincial boards would collect the levies and pass them along to the national agency. In view of this, I think it is most important that the committee which will look into this matter should travel to each of the ten provinces and talk to the provincial agencies.

The national agency did, in fact, achieve its first goal. It kept prices up. But by mid-summer its control program had become, in colloquial terms, a leaky sieve. Producers who used to sell their own low-priced eggs were selling them to CEMA at a high price and letting CEMA sell them at a loss. Other eggs were finding their way into the market outside the legal channels at a good price and the levies were not being collected on them. By mid-summer, efforts by the provincial boards to hire more people to keep records, police producers and enforce regulations to prevent eggs from leaking out of official channels, proved inadequate. What happened? CEMA could not pay its debt because it could not sell its eggs. And as CEMA debts climbed, the agency's operations were placed under the direct operating control of the federal government's Farm Products Marketing Council. CEMA's original goal had been to coordinate the work of the provinces and set up a national pool, but its problem was that controls in each province had to be enforced by the provincial boards. That is an important point.

What happened was this: CEMA was not getting the kind of co-operation from the provinces that was needed, the result being that producers took advantage of the system. Agency leaders said that harsher legislation was needed to control producers, if the system was to work. In other words, we need to be tougher with producers or they will not make the system work. This concept involves supply and management. Some suggested a control system from the hatchery to the processing plant and everywhere in between. That seemed the only way to make the system work. Yet board leaders and provincial governments would not always given agencies the power to enforce the kind of controls which were needed for their industry.

Agency leaders admitted that the breakdown of the program resulted from failure to control all eggs. One CEMA manager charged that too many producers pay only lip service to the plan and evade its rules. Another CEMA official said that producers had created CEMA to manage their affairs but would not give it the authority to control producers. A provincial marketing board official said they were doing their damndest to control the surplus of quota eggs that were moving around the province.

Although the seriousness of the egg problem became apparent only this summer, the tell-tale signs were evident long before, in the early part of last winter. The marketing board official I have referred to said that the board has as many inspectors on the road policing producers as is practical, and that is is doing all it can to enforce quotas and penalize producers who overproduce.

I think it could be stated with virtual certainty that the whole concept of marketing boards in Canada is in doubt. The people of this country, rightly or wrongly, are asking questions about marketing boards. Many farmers are uncertain of the value of these boards. They do not know where they are going or whether they work in their best interests. Such questions are being asked in the rural communities of Canada. Officials involved with marketing legislation are also uncertain about what should be proposed. Hopefully, the deliberations of the committee will clarify some questions affecting marketing boards which play a large part in the production of certain commodities in Canada.

The hon. member who spoke before me said that members of my party never make constructive criticism; we do not say what ought to be done about marketing boards. Well, the inquiry will provide some answers. We hope to make marketing boards better, not to tear them apart. If they are worth saving, they are worth making better. May I make the following observations about marketing boards. Many boards and agencies, either through lack of purpose or failure to recognize opportunities, have not paid attention to the future of their industries. In effect, they have forgotten to invest in the future because of the pressures of today.

We need to reappraise the direction in which marketing boards are going and to examine closely the basic reasons for the existence of such boards or agencies. It might be advisable if the marketing boards now operating re-examined their organizations and rethought their programs. Boards and agencies in the development stage might take stock of a few basic guidelines and considerations before formalizing their organizations. Where marketing boards exist, their specific objectives should be tailored to the specific commodity or area of their operation.

If marketing boards are to achieve the objectives they have set themselves, they may need to adopt a more positive and aggressive philosophy. This applies to all marketing boards that I can think of. With one or two exceptions, we could put all federal and provincial marketing boards into the same basket. In essence, a board should be capable of taking advantage of each marketing opportunity as it presents itself. Boards should be aggressively market-oriented and aggressive merchandisers of their products, not just sellers or controllers. They should also consider identifying and segregating the various market segments with which they deal. For instance, there could be segments for fresh produce, processed materials and commodities for export.

In closing, may I say that if the inquiry is to mean anything, we must meet the challenge of developing and operating marketing organizations such as CEMA which, by being aggressively market-oriented, hold out the possibility of future growth and development for their particular industries.

However, when all is said and done, the future of marketing boards in this country depends almost entirely upon how well the commodity groups choose to use marketing boards, how well these groups adhere to the powers that marketing boards give them, how open these groups are with producers and consumers and, finally, how well each develops and upholds its own objectives and marketing plans within its area. If we can keep some of these guidelines in mind when talking about the whole subject of marketing boards, it will be a meaningful excercise that we will be going through in the next few months.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has a lot to account for, but whether he will start giving us any information today is another thing. When you come down to who is ultimately responsible for the present mess in egg marketing in Canada, the fault must be laid at the door of the Minister of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Murta: The hon. member laughs. I cannot think of anyone else. It must be the Minister of Agriculture. In the next few weeks we will expect the Minister of Agriculture to tell us in as much detail as possible what has happened in the past eight to ten months in this situation. Hopefully, we can take a broad look at marketing boards and supply management, not necessarily with the idea of throwing them out but with the idea of making them more effective not only for the consumers of this country but for the people they represent and work for, namely, the producers.

Canadian Egg Marketing Agency

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Madam Speaker, I would like to contribute briefly to this debate to second the motion now before us and to make a few comments which I hope will help solve this serious problem. The motion says that the committee appointed will be responsible for examining in depth all the activities of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency.

After the committee has done its work, I wonder if there will not be a suggestion to form another committee to examine the work of the committee responsible for examining the activities of the agency. This can go on forever.

Madam Speaker, I know that the problem of marketing farm products is extremely difficult to solve. I think it may even be one of the most difficult to solve, because so many people are involved in marketing farm products, so many people want to earn a living from marketing farm products that finally the prices go up, the consumers are dissatisfied with the prices they must pay, and the producers do not receive what they deserve. This is not a problem which has come up only in the last two or three years, it is an old problem but one which is always current.

It is interesting to note, however, that throughout the movement of these farm products across Canada, all efforts to put marketing in order has failed. I remember that when we discussed Bill C-176 establishing the National Marketing Council and creating marketing agencies, we examined very carefully all the aspects of the problem of farm product marketing. I must admit that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is making a real effort to communicate to the population the true situation by trying to make the consumers understand, or at least trying to make them understand, that the Canadian consumer is the one who spends the smallest proportion of his income on food.

I have just come back from a trip to Europe; living in some countries was quite a surprise and I noticed that the cost of living was extremely high and that food is the most expensive item for European consumers.

With the adoption of Bill C-176, Mr. Speaker, we thought we had found a tremendous solution, that we could hope that the Farm Products Marketing Council and the marketing agencies would manage to meet the needs of both consumers and producers by straightening out the marketing of farm produce. I feel the time has come for some authority to assert itself in Canada, because there is disorder, and where there is disorder, things do not go well.

In marketing, we have not yet managed to find ways of achieving the objectives we had set out for ourselves with the passing of Bill C-176. That is why I support the motion for the setting up of a committee to enable us to look into, seriously and as quickly as possible, all those problems and prepare an intelligent report, report which could for a change enable Parliament to pass strong legislation.

But I know already that as in the consideration of Bill C-176 we will be faced with the constitutional problem. It is a sad thing to see in our country how many problems remain unsolved because of the question of jurisdiction, the constitutional problem. At times we get the impression that there are borders between the provinces as there are between countries, that we do not speak the same language, that we do not live in the same country. If we wanted to make a serious effort a solution could be found which would bring to reason large multinational corporations which corner a market and control it in the most profitable way to them without any consideration for the needs of the consumers and the producers pushing for their rights.

When Bill C-176 was under consideration we suggested amendments to force importers of farm products to comply with the same rule of the game as Canadian producers with respect to marketing. Unfortunately, those amendments were not accepted and today, as in the past, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is still issuing import permits, and not always after consulting the ministers, not even the Minister of Agriculture who is responsible in Canada for the quantity and the quality of the food we get.

During the summer American eggs arrived on the Canadian market when we already had difficulties marketing our own production. Producers were offended by that procedure, and that automatically led to the destruction by the Farm Products Marketing Board of a considerable number of eggs. For my part, I am not shocked by that in view of the present system but, on the other hand, I am terrified by the fact that food is being destroyed when in our country there are families that do not have enough food to meet their needs. The situation is quite deplorable in that respect and I think it should be looked into seriously to see what is going on in that area.

Mr. Speaker, there is in Canada a board called the Food Prices Review Board. According to press reports, this board has spent up to now over $3 million and for what? What have been the results? The chairman of that board, Mrs. Plumptre, with the assistance of her officials has published quite interesting reports to show some deficiencies in marketing, and deplore that prices are rising in such or such an area.

However, since the board unfortunately does not have the necessary powers and has been unable to provide solutions to correct the situation, it is probably why the Minister of Agriculture once rightly and rather severely criticized the chairman of the board, a criticism which I endorse because I think it was necessary that a responsible minister of the Crown take position and say to the country that the board does not give the anticipated results. I read in the Speech from the Throne that the government intends to introduce legislation extending the terms of reference of that board. Mr. Speaker, I feel that consumers should be protected against speculation and even gangsterism in certain cases.

But, I would very much like to see that the board be given the necessary powers to provide punishment, and that it be done once and for all. This reminds me a little of the existing legislation on combines and coalitions. They resemble the statutes we see around Parliament hill, they serve no useful purpose. These laws have been passed by parliamentarians to deal severely against abuses committed by some companies that indulge in misleading advertising to make more profits at the expense of the consumers. Such companies are allowed to reap tremendous profits of about $300, $400 or $500 million and then they are brought before courts. The case is not heard for six, seven or eight months and when it is heard, as provided in the act, a fine of about $25,000 is imposed. All things considered, it is like levying a fine of two bits against a gangster who has held up a bank for $200,000.

What a mess! I call that a mess because people right and left draw upon farm products through trade, through some intrigue or other and consumers have to foot the bill. Unfortunately, as the people are not adequately informed, most consumers believe that producers are making huge profits and taking unfair advantage of them while it is quite the opposite.

I was reading a while ago, in a September statement from the Minister of Agriculture, a fairly well documented analysis of the egg marketing problem. I also had a look at a table showing that the egg producers' hourly wage is far from being as high as in other trades especially in the building or the automobile fields or in the industry as a whole. Those figures are such as to make one think and I believe that such information should be more widely published, so that the consumer could be better informed and able to cooperate with the provincial and federal governments whenever improvement measures must be passed and implemented.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to enlarge much longer on my comments because as a committee member, I will surely have the opportunity of speaking often enough in committee meetings. I wish to give my colleagues in this committee the assurance that I will bring all the attention that is necessary to make a worthwhile contribution so that we may make an intelligent report that will be, I hope, approved by Parliament. I also hope that we shall pass, once and for all, a legislation to give powers to the department, to the Minister of Agriculture, so that the marketing means given the marketing agencies by the provinces and the National Marketing Council may be worth while and so that it will not merely be a way of creating cushy jobs for friends and paying them fat salaries. On the contrary, public servants should do fruitful work so that the people as a whole would benefit by it.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I want to say just a few words about this motion before it is passed. Basically, I am in favour of the proposed inquiry, but at the same time I should like to raise a few questions which are of importance to those who come from farming areas. I do not want this committee to become a place in which marketing boards are attacked. Marketing boards have a place in our society and I think they should be strengthened as bargaining units for farmers. Farmers fought for about 40 years to establish marketing boards which could bargain for them effectively and see that they received fairer prices for their commodities.

Today there are dozens of marketing boards established in Canada, most of them under provincial jurisdiction. The way I see it, a marketing board should be analogous to the collective bargaining process available to workers. The farmer who is left on his own to fight the weather, the uncertainties of the world economic situation and an uncertain market, enjoys little protection. One of the few ways in which he can hope to bargain successfully is through a marketing board.

I shall not tolerate any attempts to erode the strength of marketing boards in the area of farmer protection. I do not wish the boards to become scapegoats because of the imperfections of our society. There are many factors which affect the price of a commodity. The farm unions and wheat pools, with the support of the party to which I belong, have for years campaigned in favour of strong marketing boards. I believe the farmer should enjoy the protection which marketing boards afford, and their activities should extend to all products, including beef, so that the producer is given a chance to bargain for the price of commodities sold in the marketplace. Everybody is bargaining except the farmer.

I would not want this inquiry to become the focal point for an attack on orderly marketing in this country. I know some groups would like to see CEMA and all marketing boards dismantled. If we ever get to that situation, then I will be standing in this House for as long and as often as I can in order to fight against it. The farmer deserves some presence in the market place, and as far as I am concerned he is going to get it.

If the farmer is to stay in business today, he needs a collective bargaining position. Look at what is happening to the beef producers today. As a result of free marketing and free enterprise, farmers are being driven out of the marketplace. Prices for their products are dropping. If the farmers had a cattle marketing board that would give them collective clout, if they had price supports and price guarantees, I suggest that the average farmer would be able to stay in production and make a viable living for himself and his family. The farmer needs such guarantees. He needs to know in the spring what he will get for his products in the fall. The farmer cannot rely solely on market forces and weather; he needs a marketing board to protect him.

We do, of course, run into problems with the operation of marketing boards, like everything else. CEMA, the first board of its type to be established in this country, has had problems. Eggs have gone to waste. However, let us examine what the alternatives are for handling surplus products. For example, why cannot we use these surplus products as foreign aid, or give them to the poor people of this country? Why is it that we always suspect that the farmer is charging too high a price for his products? It is also important that consumers realize that what he needs is orderly marketing. If the farmer is not assured of stable prices for his commodities, then he will not produce.

We have to take into account the ups and downs of the business cycle and the fact that we do have surpluses. These drive the small farmer out of business. When this is allowed to happen, food becomes scarce and prices are driven up. That sort of thing will continue until we have a system of orderly marketing in this country, until we have marketing boards and the producer is guaranteed a stable income. This would mean, in turn, that the consumer would be guaranteed the same price for bacon in the store one month as the next.

If we are looking for the culprits who have caused high food prices, I suggest that we look at the middlemen and the large food corporations, at other factors such as transportation costs, advertising and packaging costs, promotion and things like that. If the price of eggs is too high but the price that the farmer receives is such that it provides him with only a basic income, then perhaps the time has come for the government to begin subsidizing basic foods to a greater extent than it does today. If we get rid of marketing boards or erode their power and effect, we will only drive the farmer out of business.

We have been discussing both formally and informally the question of consumer representation on marketing boards. What, exactly, does this mean? Does it mean we should appoint a $40,000 a year housewife from among the upper class of this country? Just who are the consumers? What are their interests? Would they understand the position of the farmer? If we are to have consumer representation on marketing boards, then why not have consumer representation on the boards of corporations, among the medical profession and legal societies? After all, they too deal with the consumers of this country.

I am saying that we should look at this question in more ways than one. Let us not use this inquiry to channel an attack on orderly marketing and marketing boards. The Forbes report which was presented yesterday is being used to fight orderly marketing in Canada. I shall not tolerate this sort of thing, and neither will my party. We should have marketing boards, and their powers should be strengthened. The producer should have as much control and bargaining power in the marketplace as possible.

I suggest we should also look at the powers of such corporations as Safeways, Loblaws, the huge meat packing plants, and the CPR and their freight rates, as well as other farm input costs such as fertilizer and farm machinery. All these costs are reflected in the end price that the consumer pays for food. Our farmers and our workers realize that they have many things in common. We must strengthen the organization of our workers through their unions, as well as the organization of our farmers through farm organizations and marketing boards. I make that appeal as we send this matter to committee and I hope all hon. members will keep these factors in mind instead of going down a narrow back alley with an attack on marketing boards as their sole purpose.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, both outside and inside this House, by myself and by others. I said quite a bit about it in my speech the other day during the throne speech debate. I want to repeat only one thing. Several members have stressed today the kind of hearing they feel it should be. I am going to use the same story that I used the other day: I hope we do not enter this matter like the Texas hanging judge, Judge Roy Bean—"I am going to give you a fair trial and then hang you."

The House approved earlier today the putting of a motion to establish a committee, so let the committee go about its work in an efficient and objective manner. Let the nation get all the facts which it has not received to this date. That is why I am very much in favour of this hearing. I was not forced to agree to the hearing. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said to me, "Mr. Minister, you do what you think best". No one flayed me into making any decision such as this. It had become obvious to me that the nation needed the facts, that they were not being presented to the people in the manner which, as far as I am concerned, they should have been. Even what I said was not presented properly; half the things I said were misinterpreted.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Every member of this House, Mr. Speaker, has received a memo from my office outlining the history of egg marketing and also the principles and operations of a proper marketing board. I suggest that all members of the House of Commons who participate in this committee read that memo as well as anything else that will tell them about the principles of good marketing boards and what the egg history of this nation is really all about. Let us pass the motion and get on with the business of the committee as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867

MEASURE TO ABOLISH THE SENATE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that Bill C-205, to amend the British North America Act 1867, (abolition of the Senate), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), for seconding my motion for the second reading of this bill, but I had hoped the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) would do that. After all, there are few members in this House who feel as strongly as he and I do that the Senate should be abolished. At any rate, I am glad to see that the minister has returned to the House even though he is sitting in the back row.

A few days ago I had a conversation with a senator who is a friend of mine. Believe it or not, there are some senators who are my friends because they know that my opposition to the Senate is to it as an institution and does not involve any feelings against any of Their Honours who are over there at the present time. At any rate, I asked this senator who is a friend of mine whether he would prefer to be reformed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or abolished by me. His answer was immediate. He said he would rather be abolished by me.

As we discussed the matter it became clear that one of the reasons he made that choice is that he feels, as I believe other senators do, that one of the most insulting suggestions that has ever been made to Their Honours in the other place is the proposal of the Prime Minister for Senate reform along the lines of seven-year appointments subject to reappointment. One might ask what would happen to a senator appointed when the Conservatives were in power, if that ever happens again, whose seven-year term should expire when the Liberals were in power. Would the Liberal prime minister say to a Conservative that he has been a good boy and therefore he would be reappointed, or would he pass him by?

For that matter, what would happen to the fortunes of a senator belonging to the party of the prime minister if that same prime minister had some cabinet member he wished to get rid of, or if there should be too many members waiting in the wings? What chance would there be for a firm appraisal of the job done in the other place by those who are there under this seven-year "you are in and then maybe you are out" proposal of the Prime Minister? I suggest that my argument for the outright abolition of the other place is much kinder than what is being proposed by the Prime Minister.

This is not the first time I have moved the second reading of this bill. It has seldom reached a vote, although on occasion it did. Even though one has not had success in persuading this House to support the abolition of the Senate, I think it is a point which should be considered very seriously. My basic reason, as I have already said, has nothing to do with the persons who are there, or who have been there in the past or who may be there in the future if the place continues.

My basic reason for being against the Senate is that I believe in democracy. To be even more precise, I believe in parliamentary democracy. I believe it is proper for the laws of the country to be made by persons elected by the people of Canada. That is what we are in this House. We are 264 individuals elected by the people of Canada. We can make mistakes, but if we make mistakes we must go back to the people during the next election and answer for our mistakes. We are responsible back to the people who sent us here.

The same situation does not exist in respect of the other place. Each one of them is appointed by the prime minister of the day. The actual constitutional arrangement is that the Governor General summons individuals to the Senate, but the Governor General acts on the advice of the prime minister and on the advice of no one else. Therefore, when a person goes to the other place he has not been elected by the people. He is not responsible to any group of people. He is not even responsible to the prime minister who appointed him.

If a senator should be appointed now, he continues until age 75. If he was appointed before the law was changed, he is there as long as he lives. I do not know how anyone can justify that arrangement in the 1970s as being consistent with the principles of democracy and with the philosophy under which the laws of the country are made with the consent of the governed by persons who are responsible to those who sent them here.

I do not feel this is the time to reform the other place. It is not a time to change its rules, to change the method of appointment or to change the amount of work allotted to it. It is a time to face the fact that we are not in 1867 or in the century when the House of Lords seemed to be all right and we copied it. We are in the latter part of the twentieth century and getting close to the twenty-first century. Surely democracy has grown up and it is time for the country to be governed by the people through their elected representatives, and that means that nothing we do should be subject to veto by the other place.

I recognize that it is not very often the other place does veto anything done in this House of Commons. Many years ago Their Honours defeated the first old age pension bill. That alone struck me as strange, that at a time when they were on pension for life they thought $20 a month in the form of a pension for ordinary Canadians was something which should not be accepted. There have been a half dozen cases since then on minor points when the Senate has vetoed something done in this House. There was one case during the last parliament when the Senate amended a bill sent over to it. It is true that once we rejected their amendment, they did not insist on it. The fact is, however, that they have the power. The fact that they do not use it only makes the existence of the place ridiculous.

I know that a great deal of work is done in the committees over there. It is done by a limited number. Perhaps 25 or 30 of those in the other place are working senators. I pay tribute to them. I am one of those who spend a good deal of time around this building. I am here many times on weekends when there are not many members around, but I see some of those working senators here and I know that they apply themselves conscientiously to the jobs that are given to them. They have produced some good reports on land use, on aging, on poverty, and so on. They have participated with members of this House in joint committees that have produced good reports. But the desirability of having 15, 20 or 30 individuals working on surveys or reports is surely no justification for keeping 102 individuals, not only on a rather expensive payroll but in a position where they have the right of veto over what is done in this House of Commons.

This is the basic philosophical approach that I take to the whole matter. I think there is just no place for a non-elected body in a democratic parliament in this latter part of the twentieth century. Some persons who go along with me to that extent will say that perhaps the answer to that is to have an elected body as a second chamber. I have seen nothing to that effect in any of the suggestions that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has made, but I want to register my objection to that idea. I think we have enough stresses and strains in Canada already, when you consider the pulls there are between the federal and provincial governments and the stresses that exist between the federal executive and federal parliament. If we added to that a second chamber that had moral authority, we would just slow down the process of government in this country almost to a standstill. I do not think that that is the direction in which to proceed.

It is sometimes argued that we should not do away with the other place because it is a bulwark and a defence of the rights of minorities. That is a myth. In fact, no one stated that more forcefully than my friend, Senator Forsey, in a paper he wrote on the Senate some years ago. He said that in fact it was the most undemocratic institution in the world. On the question of the minority rights, he said that that was a myth. Minority rights are protected by the courts, by the House of Commons, and by the representation from the various provinces here in this House.

The other place is one of those institutions that we have had around and many people accept it because they cherish the thought that they might get there some day. To me that would be a fate worse than death. But just because we have had it all this time is no reason it should continue. I think what this House ought to do is to pass this bill, send it to the appropriate committee and let us study seriously the whole question of abolishing what we now call the other place or the upper house.

Some individuals may ask: have we the right to do it? The Senate is provided for in the BNA Act. We have amended the provisions respecting the Senate by bills that have been put through both houses of parliament. We amended it with respect to the age at which senators must retire, and if the Prime Minister is planning reform of the Senate, he will have to do it by a bill. I know, of course, that a bill could be passed by this House and that if Their Honours did not pass it, it would not become law. However, if this House did that a couple of times and the Senate overrode the wish of the elected people, it would not be long before they would see the light.

Upper chambers have been abolished in a number of provinces. In my province of Manitoba it was abolished way back in the 1870s. Nova Scotia abolished its upper house, and Quebec did so not long ago. Other countries have done it as well. I think that the sensible, realistic thing to do is for us to get rid of a chamber which really is completely outside the democratic process. I repeat my expressions of respect for many of the individuals over there, for the work that they do and for their conscientiousness. That is not the issue. The issue is whether there is a place in an elected parliamentary democracy for 102 individuals enjoying all the rights, privileges and authorities accorded to them, without any responsibility back to anyone at all.

So despite the number of times that my motions and my bills for the abolition of the Senate have been unsuccessful, I hope that this time, now that the issue of Senate reform has been raised by the Prime Minister himself, the House will agree to give this Bill second reading and let it go to the appropriate standing committee for thorough consideration.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

[Translation]

Mr. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I have listened most attentively to the argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) concerning this matter which was brought on many occasions to the attention of the House by the hon. member who certainly pleaded his case with considerable eloquence. This being said, Mr. Speaker, I am sometimes under the impression that the only way the hon. member could have his dream—which may have reached the stage of a darling dream—come true would be for him to accept at one time or another an appointment to the Senate, in order better to convince his new colleagues of the necessity to put an end to their own institution.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Never!

Mr. Fox: I hear the hon. member say that he will never accept such an appointment. I suggest that it is because this would hurt his true democratic convictions which are held in high esteem by all hon. members.

While listening to him, Mr. Speaker, I suddenly remembered this saying by John Stewart Mills:

[English]

On all great subjects much remains to be said.

[Translation]

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if this saying applies to the matter considered here and which has been studied several times during private members' business period in previous sessions. But the Senate is part of our political institutions and as such deserves to be considered by all those concerned with the continuous betterment of the Canadian democratic process.

The question of the Senate does not trigger any passionate controversy outside the House. I would even suggest that very few Canadians in a whole year care to listen to the debates of the Senate, even if quite relevant questions are sometimes discussed there. "Prologues Without a Play", said Walter Bagehot in his classic on the English constitution, referring to debates of some legislative bodies.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want my remarks to lead to confusion. I recognize wholeheartedly the presence in the Senate of distinguished Canadians. There are men and women who worked in all public and private sectors in Canada, men and women still making valuable contribution to community life in Canada. But their distinction is quite independent of their role as senators. Their contribution to the community precedes their appointment as senators.

Mr. Speaker, although the Senate once played a real part in Canada, serious doubt exists whether it still does today.

In a democracy, power should be exercised by representatives of the people. Such is the case in Canada today. Every time however we vote a piece of legislation in this House, the Senate goes through the unbelievable masquerade of going over it.

Some members may stress the usefulness of Senate investigating committees, and refer to a series of reports some of which were mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Those are highly interesting papers stemming from investigations.

That, however, is no sufficient reason for keeping an institution, if it has served its purpose. A series of ways could be devised whereby such investigations could be completed.

But let us go back to sources for a moment. The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, known as the Molgat-MacGuigan Commission, threw light upon this matter in its final report of 1972. I quote an extract from page 33 of the report:

> The Confederation Debates of 1865 prove that there would have been no Confederation in 1867, or at least no Canada as we know it today, if provision had not been made for the Senate. The Maritimes and Quebec were not prepared to join the union if there was to be only one elected House, based on population. Canada would be a federation, and not a unitary state. Consequently, if the Lower House were based on representation by population, there must be an Upper House giving equality to the regions.

Mr. Speaker, who could maintain that such a context remains relevant? The inhabitants of a province have their federal representative in this House and the position of provincial governments has gained so much strength over the years that it would be ridiculous to pretend that the population of a region relies upon its senators for its protection rather than upon its provincial government or its federal representatives.

The Committee on Constitution came to the conclusion, however, that it is necessary to reform the Senate rather than to abolish it.

● (1720)

I fully agree, to quote Lord Morrison of Lambeth, that if the choice is end them or mend them, we ought to end them. If we look to the mother of parliaments in Westminster, we see that the powers of the House of Lords have been severely curtailed.

I do not need to be reminded by members of the Senate of the other useful work they may do. I, too, have read the Canadian literature on the subject and have had the pleasure of seeing the Senate in operation. It seems clear there ought to be clearly established limits on their powers at the very least. On the whole, however, I believe the Senate ought to disappear for either it is a chamber, to paraphrase some of the wording of Sir John A. Macdonald in confederation debates, for registering the decrees of the Commons and therefore of no value, or an independent House having free action of its own, opposing, amending or postponing legislation and therefore, in my mind, an antithesis of democratic rule.

I like to think that some evolution has taken place since 1867. While the Senate as an institution may have been essential to our nationhood, this position can no longer be sustained in argument. The people of Canada are represented here by their elected members of parliament. The electoral process itself has been the object of improvements, particularly in the twenty-ninth parliament when a far reaching election expenses bill was passed. This will enable Canadians from all walks of life to run for parliament without incurring a crushing financial burden. Nor should the Senate be considered a secure haven for retired politicians.

Members of parliament who have served this country well should be adequately compensated during their tenure and should be entitled, on an equal footing for all, not to the advantage of the ruling party through Senate appointments, to adequate pensions. As for other distinguished Canadians, there are other ways of recognizing their contribution to the development and well-being of our country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the role of the Senate as a political institution of this country ought to be decided upon in the only manner fully consistent with the existence of parliamentary democracy.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you upon your elevation. I am pleased to see that this year the Chair has been staffed with members from the region I am pleased to represent, namely, northern Ontario. The Speaker, who is from Sudbury, will equip himself for his responsibilities with new confidence, justice and good humour. I am sure that all officers of the Chair will equip themselves for their responsibilities in like manner.

I first spoke on this particular bill, which has not changed in any particular, on the occasion of my second speech in this House. At that time I indicated I did not want to make a practice of speaking on this particular piece of legislation. However, at the beginning of the second session I found myself responding to the presentation of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I succumbed to the establishment of a tradition, and here I am again. I will try not to be repetitious in the points I advance, because I feel this is a very serious issue.

I have noted with a great deal of respect the contributions that have been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on this particular topic. However, I feel his main point has been—and everything seems to fall on this particular argument—that the Senate ought to be abolished because it is not an elected body. Once he states that fact and presents that argument, nothing else is of any real import; nothing else is of consequence, because the only aspect of the Senate that he finds regrettable is one that could be cured by amendment.

The thrust of this bill is the abolition, and the main reason for abolition is that the Senate is not an elected body. I responded to that argument the last time. I stated that our traditions in this particular constitutional establishment, namely, parliament, have been to have responsibility bestowed upon individuals not as elected members but as appointed members. One need only look at the Crown, the Governor General and the Lieutenant-Governors of the various provinces. They participate in the governing of this country. They are not elected, but appointed. That has been the time-honoured tradition.

As I stated in my two previous speeches on this topic, I fully agree that the Senate ought to be reformed. I feel very strongly that that institution does not now function as it should. Indeed, the Senate itself has offered very substantial suggestions with regard to reform.

I am somewhat surprised at the attitude of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. My research indicates that a member of the other place, Senator Croll, has been active for a number of years. By some strange coincidence, Senator Croll has been very active in that sector of our national business in which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is also active, namely, social security legislation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows that Senator Croll participated in the committee on aging, as well as the committee which studied the question of poverty. Indeed, he made representations that went very far in the direction the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is advocating. I suggest there may have been a bit of plagiarism on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in the propositions he was advancing in relation to social security and welfare legislation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or vice versa.

● (1730)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Senate committees on aging and poverty advanced greatly the cause of social security in this country.

I now wish to quote from page 319 of the Senate Debates of March 13, 1973. Senator Croll had the floor. Referring to the committee on aging he said:

After that came the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, from 1963 to 1967. That was a great plus for the Senate. The report was imaginative; it was a blessing for the aged. It is interesting to see what we said in 1966. Nobody else ever reads these reports, and now and then I feel better if I look at them. I should like to quote from that report, although I notice here some people who were on the committee and who know what was in it.

I will mention some of the recommendations made in that report. I agree with Senator Croll. The work of the Senate is not given enough publicity.

Recommendation (1) read as follows:

The committee endorses in principle the institution of an income guarantee program for all persons aged 65 and over—

Then, pensions were not paid to people under 70, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was advocating reducing the pensionable age to 65. Let me continue quoting Senator Croll, as follows:

—Then it goes on:

And the Senator quoted from the report:

The establishment of a technically competent body to study the income needs of older people and to develop a socially acceptable minimum budget for single persons and couples, which would be adjusted automatically each year on the basis of a suitable index of consumer spending or of earnings, with a review every five years to reflect changes in the relative circumstances of the working population and the retired population.

That proposal was almost realized. Senator Croll continued quoting from the recommendation, which suggested:

—that the program be administered and financed by the federal government.

—that the procedure call for the completion of a simplified income form annually and that the amount by which the declared income falls short of the established minima in any year constitute the benefit for the year following.

[Mr. Blais.]

We now have the guaranteed income supplement. I agree it is not based exactly on the recommendations in the report. I am quoting from this speech to show the influence of the Senate and Senate committees on legislation presented in this House.

As recorded at page 320, Senator Croll went on to say:

Honourable senators, we now come to the Special Committee on Poverty, 1968-72. The participants are in this house. Some senators may think that I am particularly prejudiced, and I may be. Why not? I tell you frankly that it is a bench mark in Canadian social history. It brought issues out into the open which cannot be ignored, and the report is not being ignored. We lit a fire that will not be extinguished. Our report was needed, it was provided, and it was enthusiastically received.

Let me say that the guaranteed annual income concept was really at the core of that report. Also, the concept advocated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is presently a subject of experiment in Manitoba, and is being negotiated between the provinces and the federal government. The Ontario government has instituted a program which is a feeble attempt to implement the recommendations in the Senate committee. Mr. Speaker, Senate committees have made substantial contributions to our society.

I do not think that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre can claim to be the author or originator of these particular policies as they were discussed in Senate committees. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre himself has said, the Senate established other committees. For instance, the Committee on Land brought about in large measure legislation affecting programs such as FRED, ARDA and regional development.

We cannot value these contributions in dollars and cents. They have led to a restructuring of our national fabric. I agree that only since 1958 have we made progress because of the work of these committees. Before then there was not much activity. I therefore suggest that in the Senate we see the potential for good which will affect the entire nation. I agree that the other place is not perfect. I suggest to the hon. member that we ought to strive to reform that institution so that its contributions may multiply and improve.

When I last spoke I suggested that the Senate has no tendency to suicide. On the contrary, senators want to live forever; that is our difficulty, and there is no way they will pass legislation abolishing the Senate. They will not stand for it, unless there is a reference to the country. That being so, why not encourage the government to reform the other place?

In the same speech on March 13 Senator Croll raised 12 points concerning Senate reform which I shall bring to the attention of the House as, evidently, they have not been discussed here previously. First he suggested that:

The present absolute veto power of the Senate over all legislation should be reduced to a suspensive veto for six months according to the following formula:—

This idea has been accepted. The Senate does not exercise any real legislative veto. The hon. member spoke of the privacy bill which was sent to the Senate, amended by the Senate and sent back to this House. Any veto the other place may exercise is a suspensive veto. I can think of no legislation which will be sent to the other place and with respect to which it will exercise its constitutional veto, although it has the power to do this. I suggest that the tradition now established should be enshrined in an amendment to the constitution.

On point 2 Senator Croll said this:

Point 2 deals with the distribution of senators. Here again I accepted what the Constitution Committee said because I thought that was the right thing to do and I could not think of anything better.

The distribution of senators should be as follows:

Newfoundland 6, Prince Edward Island 4, Nova Scotia 10, New Brunswick 10, Quebec 24, Ontario 24, Manitoba 12, Saskatchewan 12, Alberta 12, British Columbia 12, Yukon Territory 2, and Northwest Territories 2.

It is true that the two central provinces, Ontario and Quebec, exercise too much influence in parliament. Today we face difficulties concerning western alienation. We do not hear enough about eastern alienation although that, too, has become a real problem. I think different areas of the country should make representations about the fair distribution of Senate seats.

3. The supporters of any one political party should not comprise more than two-thirds of the membership of the Senate at any one time and the Canadian constitution should be amended as soon as possible to ensure this result.

I agree. It is not a fair situation where you have, in the Senate, no members from the party that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre represents, only 17 members from the Conservative Party, and the balance from the Liberal Party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one Social Crediter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blais: And one from the Social Credit. I do not agree that this is a good situation, Mr. Speaker. It is true that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has offered that for every Conservative member who wishes to retire now a new member could be appointed from the younger members of that party. That is a very good suggestion on an ad hoc basis, and I see here the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who would make an ideal Senator. He has the stature.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is a friend of mine and I do not like to hear him insulted.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Half an hour ago he was saying how he respected the people in the other place and that his intention to abolish that institution had nothing to do with the type of people in it. Now he says I am insulting the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. Between us, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is eminently pleased by my suggestion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Convey it.

Mr. Blais: Now we come to the fourth point.

4. The compulsory retirement age of Senators, present and future, should be 70 years. Upon retirement, a Senator should retain the title—

And so on.

I do not agree with that particular reform. I agree with the Prime Minister's suggested reform of an appointment for seven years, or a limited number of years, with the right of reappointment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If they are good.

Mr. Blais: Of course. The appointments would have to be reviewed and it would be part of the political process. There would be a heavier onus on the government to remove or reappoint, dependent on the circumstances. As soon as the government changed you could pull out Grits and put in Tories. You could do that every seven years, though in some cases you might have to wait two or three years. Everybody would be pleased if we got that ratio of two-thirds and one-third. Going on to the next point, Mr. Speaker, it reads:

5. The Speaker, the government leader and the opposition leader should be elected by the members of this House; the government leader by the supporters of the government; the opposition leader by non-supporters of the government.

I also agree with that particular reform. It would give independence to the Senators to elect their own House leaders both in government and in opposition. There would be some sort of coherence and, speaking from experience, there is nothing more stimulating than competition for various posts within one's own party. I say that is a reform which should be accepted. Then we come to the next point:

6. The government leader and the opposition leader in the Senate should serve for only one parliament and should not be eligible for re-election subsequently.

Again, I agree. I do not think there is much dispute about that.

7. The age of the government leader and the opposition leader in the Senate, and the Speaker, should not be more than 65 years at the time of election to that position, so that at the end of the parliament for which he or she is elected, he or she will still be under 70 years of age.

I think that is a minor detail which could be ironed out without difficulty, once the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre agrees. Then we come to the next point:

8. The government leader in the Senate should not be a member of the cabinet.

Again there is a suggestion that there might be some backdoor influence on the deliberations of the Senate by having one member sit in cabinet. To continue:

9. The government should appoint a Senator as a minister without portfolio for the purpose of liaison with the government.

Indeed such representation in the cabinet might be one which would permit the Senator to act with a certain amount of independence both in the cabinet and afterwards in the Senate, so that the Senate operation would be determined by the leader of the government party in the Senate, and the opposition party would then be able to offer its opposition in the normal way without having a direct link to the exercise of authority in cabinet by having the house leader in the Senate sit in the federal cabinet.

10. Minority groups have long been under-represented in the Senate. This should be corrected so that the multicultural character of the Canadian people will be reflected in the Senate.

I made that point in my first speech, Mr. Speaker. I advocate a Senate which would be composed of people from the various ethnic communities. I suggest certain communities are not sufficiently numerous in any given location to permit the election of a member to this House, and some cultural groups are not represented on public bodies for the same reason.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him in this debate has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, some hon. members began discussing the existence of the Senate in this House several years ago, when I was not even born, I think.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes.

Mr. Olivier: My colleague says yes.

After 30 years, we still do not know whether the Senate should be abolished, changed or maintained in its present form.

This afternoon, I made a point of studying some inquiries made by the Senate. A few solutions were put forward either in the final report presented by Senator Molgat or in the report of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who was then and still is a member of this House. I also examined a brief tabled by a student, and I should like to quote from it as concern the consequences or the reasons for abolishing, maintaining or reforming the Senate.

● (1750)

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that as the member for Longueuil, I do not know whether we should abolish or retain it.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox) who seemed in favour of abolishing the Senate. I also listened to another colleague opposite who is in favour of abolishing the Senate as well. Maybe you will find that I am slow in making up my mind, but they still have not sincerely convinced me of their opinions.

I would rather be in favour of some type of reform. Maybe the members of this House have not helped the cause of the Senate up to now by not trying to clarify its role. Some may have made fun of the Senate by saying: Listen, he is 50 or 70 years old, he is good for the Senate. We have sincerely tried to downgrade the role of some senators. I for one personally admire Senator Goldenberg who is an expert in labour relations and I believe that such a man is valuable as a counsellor who can pass judgment on pieces of legislation passed by the House of Commons.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if before coming to the conclusion that we are for or against the Senate, if we should not ask ourselves some questions, such as what will we do with present senators. There are some very valuable people there. It is easy, in North America, to say: We'll leave them their salary, and if they go away everything will be all right.

I think that for several senators, money is not the important thing. Their intellectual gifts are not to be found easily in Canada. They are advisors and some of their inquiry commissions have guided us and helped the House of Commons to make our decisions. These are arguments in their favour.

I should like to quote three remarks from a student, Mr. David MacLean, who appeared before a committee; he was asking himself some questions on the reasons for a debate on the Senate. I should like to quote parts of his report. First, the Senate has been progressively losing some of its prestige for several generations despite the presence of famous people in the Upper House. We make unkind remarks about some members in the House of Commons and our comments about the other place are perhaps a mere manifestation of jealousy.

Some members of parliament are jealous of others. I do not know if my colleague opposite is jealous because he was not appointed but, at least, he got a seat in this House. We are not empowered to appoint him but if he wishes so, I shall be pleased to support his nomination to the Senate. I think that this undue jealousy has played a great part in discrediting the contribution of senators. When I was a little boy playing in the street, I was already reading jokes about it in newspapers. Without having ever seen a senator, I imagined them walking with a stoop, leaning on their stick. They have been discredited one way or another by the media or the people in the House of Commons, whereas I think, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that everybody here will agree, that the matter of age has nothing to do with the ability of people. We might give them more definite responsibilities. Some people have proposed that senators be elected. I have also tried to see how an elected Senate would operate in the system we now have in Canada. We have here several parties, fortunately or unfortunately. But just imagine, Mr. Speaker, what the situation would be if the House of Commons passed a legislation and said: We are really representing the views of the majority of Canadians and we have been elected to defend the rights of citizens.

If the Senate was elected by opposition members and was entirely against us, we would say: "We are the ones who represent the people." I think that we will always be witnesses to serious conflicts which might generate several constitutional difficulties. Even the citizen would raise serious questions, because views given in the House or in the Senate are sometimes based on political considerations. I do not say that those views are not good. They can be biaised sometimes. I do not say that they are wrong, but they do not always give the full facts.

I think that if we tried to alter that role, we would be faced with more serious problems.

A number of persons have examined the role of the Senate and have said: "We will really try to renovate the whole system. We will try to inject new blood in the Senate."

A certain tradition has lasted long enough; when a member was tired of sitting in the House of Commons, or if there was one minister too many in the cabinet, he was transferred to the Senate and the matter was settled.

I think that kind of tradition has lasted long enough. I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that I would be in favour of that kind of solution. I would rather be appointed immediately, and not once I have become a minister. I would not resent it.

Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about the new generation of those who have been appointed in the past few years. People have been appointed who had never dealt in politics, who had not been elected members of the House of Commons. I am thinking of Senator Goldenberg who, I repeat, was extremely competent in his own field, who settled several conflicts in Canada, who was also of great help to us in dealing with problems, and who, in addition is counsellor for several members from all parties.

Several Senators are competent and apt to prompt members of the House into honest judgments.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that saying that one is in favour of or against the Senate is not the right way to deal with that problem. Considering the quality of the members of the Senate, I think we should ask for their opinion about it. Solutions would be a lot more constructive. Before making hara-kiri, they too will weigh every consequence of their action, including those of a personal nature for sure.

As I said before, those consequences do not seem to matter very much to them. Their preoccupations seem to dwell mainly in intellectual spheres. At that level, they are also in a way ombudsmen for citizens from every region.

Let us imagine, Mr. Speaker, and let us hope this will remain a blank conjecture, that a majority government be elected by two provinces of Canada only. If a government were to be elected by two provinces in Canada only, and if, moreover, that government used its power to legislate according strictly to its own will in favour of those two provinces, then the Senate would have a part to play. That is the kind of possibility which would make me think twice before abolishing the Senate, because I feel that those men could then play a protective role and represent all the areas of Canada.

If a government, because of the constitution, a democratic vice, took unfair advantage of the situation, the senators could say, because they are not answerable to the people: Listen, gentlemen of the government, you are in the process of favouring one part only of the country, because of your power—assuming the government had been appointed by two provinces only—you should perhaps start to be more realistic and think of the country as a whole.

To my mind, its role is much more—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I can understand that some hon. members should be eager to vote for or against the abolition of the Senate. Still, to my mind, the matter is more important—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. The time allotted for private members' hour having expired I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in July of last year I announced in general terms some important measures to encourage and assist further the establishment and growth of Canadian small business. In order to implement those measures Bill C-14 was tabled on October 7, 1974, to provide for the creation of a new Crown corporation which will bear the name "Federal Business Development Bank". The main body of the bill, with minor alterations, is the same which was tabled as Bill C-20 during the last session of parliament. Hon. members will recall that at that time that bill received second reading. Because there are a large number of new members in this parliament, and because there are two additional clauses to the bill, I think it wise to deal with the introduction of second reading rather more fully than otherwise might have been considered necessary.

I propose to deal with the bill under six different headings; the powers and the criteria governing the use of the powers of the Federal Business Development Bank; management counselling—services to be offered; management training; information services; organizational structure; and financing arrangements.

Before moving to these separate sections, I should like to provide a little background to the purposes and philosophy behind this new institution. It has been the result of a very careful assessment of the requirements of small business. This assessment has been based on the considerable experience which the government has gained with a range of programs designed to meet specific needs and which it has introduced over the years. What the Federal Business Development Bank does is to combine a number of these programs, give them new thrust and orientation, and provide a new organizational structure and guidelines under which it will be operated in a co-ordinated manner.

The new bank will provide a focal point for information, management counselling, training and financing. Small businessmen who need information on government programs will find such information available at the branches of the bank, some 60 in number right across the country. Those in need of management counselling to solve business problems will find it available at rates which they can afford. If financing is the requirement, small businessmen will find what loans are available under flexible arrangements if such financing is not available on reasonable terms and conditions from the private sector. Moreover, the new bank will develop and enlarge the present program of management seminars and, in general, provide management training courses in conjunction with the provinces, universities and community colleges.

While the Federal Business Development Bank will bring together the necessary facilities to meet the main requirements of small business, it will not meet all of them. When facilities outside the bank are required, Federal Business Development Bank personnel will be able to refer clients to the sources of the additional help they may require, and provide competent assistance to enable them to secure it.

In taking steps to create the Federal Business Development Bank the government is primarily concerned with the needs of small business which are not being met by the private sector on terms and conditions that the small businessman can accept. The intention is to supplement or complement these private services when, for one reason or another, they are not available to the small businessman. I would go further, Mr. Speaker, and say that the bank will be under clear instructions to encourage small business enterprises which have developed an appropriate degree of strength to secure future financing and counselling services from the private sector.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, the three key elements in the philosophy of the Federal Business Development Bank are: first, co-ordinated programs under independent management to meet the major needs of small business; secondly, the provision of a focal point where the small businessman can find a competent person to talk to about his problems and requirements; and thirdly, concentration on filling the gaps which exist in the private sector rather than competing with private institutions.

These elements are summed up in the objectives of the new bank, which you will find set out succinctly in clause 4 of the bill, and I can do no better than read them to hon. members:

(1) The objects of the Corporation are to promote and assist in the establishment and development of business enterprises in Canada by providing, in the manner and to the extent authorized by this Act, financial asistance, management counselling, management training, information and advice and such other services as are ancillary or incidental to any of the foregoing.

(2) The Corporation in carrying out its objects shall give particular consideration to the needs of small business enterprises.

I should like to turn to the powers, and the criteria for the use of these powers, in the bill before us. In order to carry out these objectives the new bank will require certain powers and an indication of how these powers should be used. With regard to financing operations the legislation provides the bank with a full range of powers to enable it to meet any financial need of small business. It will be empowered to make or guarantee loans, to enter into underwriting agreements, to make equity investments, and to engage in leasing—five separate financial operations.

● (2010)

The powers are similar to those now exercised by the Industrial Development Bank, with the exception of leasing, which is considered a desirable addition in order to equip the new corporation with a full coverage of the various kinds of financial resources which are available to present day businesses. Certain of the basic criteria to be set up for the use of these powers will also be basically similar to those of the Industrial Development Bank.

Financing is to be made available only when (a) a person is engaged or about to engage in a business enterprise in Canada, (b) credit or financial resources may not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions and, (c) the enterprise may reasonably be expected to prove successful. I might underline that third condition.

However, whereas the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that the amount invested or to be invested in the enterprise by persons other than the bank, and the character of that investment, should be such as to afford the bank reasonable protection, it is now proposed that this last mentioned condition should be replaced by one requiring only that the amount and character of the investment should be such as to afford a reasonable expectation of a continuing commitment to the enterprise by persons other than the bank. It is hoped that this will replace the note of caution struck in the previous act with a more flexible and freer approach to the needs of a small businessman in solving his financial problems.

The objective of the bank, coupled with powers and criteria for the financial services program, is designed not only to enable the provision of financing when it is not available from the private sector on reasonable terms and conditions, but also to encourage private institutions to provide such financing.

The decision on what are reasonable terms and conditions will be the responsibility of the board, as it is not possible to provide other than broad guidelines in the changing circumstances of the financial markets. While these powers, except for leasing, are similar to those under which the Industrial Development Bank has operated successfully for many years, it is expected that the new bank will make fuller use of them.

I confidently expect that the establishment of the new corporation, the scope for innovation and imagination opened up by the new responsibilities to be given to it, and the stimulation to thought aroused by the discussion and consideration that has led to our proposing the establishment of the new corporation will stir up new approaches to the financial needs of small business.

I would expect this to be particularly the case with respect to the providing of equity financing, where this is desired and required by a small business and is peculiarly suitable to its needs. This appears to be a better means than a loan of providing it with a suitable financial structure. With regard to term lending, no specific limitation is placed on the size of loan or size of business which may be financed, but general guidance is given that particular attention is to be paid to the needs of small business.

Under similar guidelines slightly over 77 per cent of the loans made by the Industrial Development Bank are for $50,000 or less, and the average authorization is now around $44,000. It is the government's intention that the Federal Business Development Bank concentrate its financing activities in the same way to meet the needs of small business.

The new bank will also employ flexible lending techniques in recognition of the sometimes difficult financial situation of small businesses. For example, consideration will be given to delaying repayment of principal for several years, and arranging repayment schedules with balloon payments at maturity. These are only two of a number of flexible techniques which I expect will be used to tailor the bank's financial services to the needs of small businessmen.

Hon. members may recall that I stated on July 11, 1973, that the new bank would build on the existing strengths and organizational network of the Industrial Development Bank. This will indeed be the case. The Industrial Development Bank has, at present, 68 branch offices operating out of five regional offices. These will provide the initial office structure of the new bank.

On the financial side the Federal Business Development Bank will start from a strong base as the outstanding loans and commitments of the Industrial Development Bank total more than $800 million. Its clients currently number more than 19,000. Thus the new bank will begin its operations with a strong organizational structure and a substantial clientele.

Although the new corporation is to have responsibilities in the field of management services additional to and different from the functions of the Industrial Development Bank to date, the new corporation will have a great advantage in being able to build these new services on the widespread organization of the Industrial Development Bank, and in drawing upon its long experience in the field of assisting small business. Working from a relatively small equity capital base, which has gradually grown to the present amount of $71 million, the bank has been able to supply over $2.7 billion of financing to approximately 41,000 businesses from coast to coast, representing employment estimated at more than 600,000 people. The Industrial Development Bank has now an experienced and devoted staff of approximately 1,400 people whose expertise will, of course, be at the service of the new corporation.

I would now like to outline the new aspects that this new corporation will be emphasizing. The first on which I should like to touch is the management counselling services to be provided by the proposed corporation.

The new bank will have the power to provide management counselling services, directly or through others, to persons who are engaged in, or about to engage in, a business enterprise in Canada, who meet criteria established by the board, and when such services will supplement other available services from the private sector. The bank will have the power to underwrite the cost of providing counsellors when the requirements cannot be met by the bank staff.

The management counselling service will initially be provided by the Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises—the CASE program—of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which will be absorbed into the new bank. However, officers in all branches of the bank will be available to provide a sounding board for ideas developed by existing or prospective small businessmen to assist them in working out a viable idea that could be the basis of a commercial plan. According to need, the small businessman could then be directed to the appropriate source of information, expertise, or financing to meet his need.

The bank will also have available counsellors who will provide detailed management advice in particular areas. This will be done initially by following the pattern already established by CASE in the use of retired executives as counsellors, and by the use of private counsellors when retired executives are not in a position to deal with particular assignments.

The CASE service is accordingly being expanded geographically in close consultation with the provinces, and the intention is to extend the coverage to the service sector in addition to the manufacturing and tourism sectors. In that regard I would expect there will be close to 1,000 retired business executives in the field in that CASE program by the end of this year, whose talents and experience will be used to help small businesses. I think it is one of the most imaginative and successful programs launched in a long time.

As the bank gains experience in the area of management counselling it will explore ways of improving, modifying and expanding these services. Here again I think that the new bank will have an important role to play. At the present time such services are being underwritten by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. This will be part of the co-ordination of a variety of services under one institution.

The new institution, therefore, also would have the power to sponsor, support or organize conferences, seminars and other meeting for the promotion of good management practices. In this area the prime responsibility of the bank will be to pinpoint the needs of small businesses which can be filled most effectively by training, and to meet these needs with the most effective training methods available. Consultation with provincial educational authorities, business associations, small businessmen and educational consultants will all be necessary to ensure that training initiatives are appropriate, effective and complete.

The training service will establish priorities, develop courses, or make contractual arrangements for the preparation of course materials by recognized experts, and assist provincial government departments in the implementation processes. It will also play a useful role in developing and facilitating the exchange of information on implementation techniques, publicity, teacher training and other related teaching aids.

To fulfill these responsibilities initially, the bank will take over the owner-manager training program of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The relevant courses are short and oriented to specific aspects of small business management. The Bank will also continue the one day small business seminars provided by the Industrial Development Bank at different locations across Canada, with emphasis given to small cities, towns and remote areas where such services are not otherwise available.

The fourth heading that I wanted to enlarge upon is the information services section. The new bank will have the power to develop and operate an information service, publish and distribute information relative to the mandate of the bank, as well as to provide advice on federal programs for small business and on assistance available to small business from others. To this end the bank will seek to establish close and continuing communication with provincial authorities.

This will be a major new thrust as the bank will act as a focal point for information on the wide range of federal services and programs designed to meet the needs of small business. The information services, to be provided locally through all offices of the bank, will be free to all interested persons and will be aimed at small firms that do not have the resources to seek out help from the multiplicity of specialized sources of assistance to small business—particularly those of the federal government. The services of the bank itself will also be made known more widely in this way. In addition to the immediate practical value to the inquirer, the information services will represent another two-way channel of communication between the businessman and the bank.

The activities of the information services will take several forms. The experienced local officers providing the services will give inquirers comprehensive information, competent advice, and direct referral on the entire range of federal assistance programs and services for small business. The bank will provide reference libraries and booklets on a broad field of small business management subjects, and will publish and distribute "industry profiles" containing typical costs and operating data for specific industries.

In this way it will share with the public the experience gained by the bank and its precedessors in dealing with thousands of small businesses over many years. A small business news bulletin highlighting various assistance programs, business developments and many other forms of guidance to its readers, will be distributed to many thousands of small business operators.

Now I should like to speak about the organizational structure. In deciding on a corporate structure for the new bank the government has had several considerations in mind. The first is that the new bank should have a considerable degree of independence in its day to day affairs. The second is that it should be guided by a strong top management that is well versed in business practice and familiar with problems peculiar to small business. These considerations have led to the decision to establish the Federal Business Development Bank as a proprietary corporation pursuant to section 66 of the Financial Administration Act. It will report to parliament on its activities through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

These same considerations were of importance in determining the number and composition of the board of directors. Ten of the fifteen directors will be chosen from the private sector to ensure broad business representation and access to business experience and expertise. To provide equitable geographic, cultural and population representation, two directors will be chosen from each of the five geographic regions of Canada. These members of the board will be appointed for a term of three years by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The remaining members of the board will be four senior federal officials, and a full time president who will also act as chief executive officer. A chairman, who will preside at meetings of the board, will be appointed by the board from among its members.

Provision is also made for an executive committee to deal with matters not specifically reserved for the board when the latter is not in session. Its composition is outlined in the bill.

I think the following is an important innovation. In order to emphasize the regional character of the new bank, and to ensure that regional and local views are taken into consideration in establishing the policy and operations of the bank, regional advisory councils will be established for each of the five geographic regions of the country. Each council will be composed of up to twelve members from the region, including the two board members, a senior bank officer and a senior DREE officer. Private members will be appointed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. These councils, while purely advisory in nature, will review the bank's activities in their regions and will make recommendations to the board of directors regarding the activities of the corporation.

I am convinced that these regional advisory councils will serve a useful purpose and will further accent the regional character of the new bank.

The organizational structure of the new bank will be a matter for the board to decide, but it can be envisaged that it will be built around its two major objectives of providing financing and management services. These two components will have to be well-coordinated at different levels of the bank's organization so that a fully client oriented and comprehensive service is made available to small business in Canada.

While the new bank will be able to build on the experience and organizational structure of the Industrial Development Bank, CASE and other programs which will be brought into it, it will be a big and probably lengthy job to structure a complete service which can meet the requirements of small business in all parts of the country. The government will ensure, however, that those who are put in charge of these services will be qualified to undertake their tasks with initiative and energy.

The next matter which I should like to touch upon is financing arrangements. The financing of the new bank will involve separate budgets for the financial services and for the management services operations. For its financial operations the bank will have an authorized capital of $200 million and a debt to equity ratio of ten to one. A capital budget for financing activities will be submitted each year for the approval of the Governor in Council. In accordance with this budget the bank will borrow at the Crown corporation rate for the appropriate term.

The management services element of the bank will be financed through parliamentary appropriations in accordance with the normal steps of the budgetary cycle.

The organization which I have outlined will, I think, enable the Federal Business Development Bank to carry out its mandate with a substantial degree of independence. However, its operations will be followed closely by my department which, along with other departments, will be represented on the board. It will also be possible for parliament to keep in close touch with the operations of the bank when appropriations are considered each year for financing the management services operations.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to my opening remarks in which I said there were two additional sections added to the present bill which were not in the bill tabled in parliament last spring. In the meantime the continuing growth of the Industrial Development Bank has led to its coming up against the statutory limitations in the Industrial Development Bank Act in its lending operations. Indeed, it has already reached the point at which it cannot make further commitments for loans in excess of $200,000.

The Industrial Development Bank Act places two restrictions on the scale of its lending operations. Section 15 of the act stipulates that the total direct and contingent liabilities of the bank shall not at any time exceed ten times the aggregate amount of the paid up capital and reserve fund. Section 16, subsections (3) and (4), stipulates that the aggregate of the amounts of the loans or guarantee liabilities outstanding in amounts in excess of $200,000 shall not at any time exceed $200 million.

On the basis of current projections it seems likely that the ceiling on total liabilities of the Industrial Development Bank will be reached some time next spring. Thus, after taking account of the lag between authorizations and disbursements, it is estimated that the Industrial Development Bank may find itself, early in 1975, in a position where it would have to curtail its lending activity.

The purpose of clause 59 of the Federal Business Development Bank Bill is to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act by increasing its authorized capital by $50 million, thus providing it with new lending power, and by repealing section 16, subsections (3) and (4), of the Industrial Development Bank Act. Briefly, the subsections of section 16 which are being repealed provide that the aggregate of loans exceeding $200,000 must not, at any time, exceed $200 million. There is no provision of this nature in the Federal Business Development Bank Bill and, in effect, this transitional measure merely enables the Industrial Development Bank to function as it would function after proclamation of the Federal Business Development Bank Act. You will note that clause 60 provides that clause 59 shall come into force on the day that the act receives Royal Assent.

I have rather comprehensively outlined the philosophy and main provisions of this innovative new institution for the assistance of small businesses in Canada. I look forward to the committee meetings at which time we can go into it in great detail.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I daresay this speech will set a record as being the shortest I have ever made in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Listening to the minister tonight I was very glad to see that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is going to continue the program of financial and technical assistance to small business which was started by a Conservative government a few years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: I should like to congratulate the minister on having the good sense to follow the successful pattern established at that time for small business. We in the opposition welcome this new bank which will provide loans and technical assistance, the two things so essential to the growth and expansion of such business.

We welcome the bill as well because the capitalization of the bank will be considerably increased from that of the Industrial Development Bank, thereby making more money available for loans to small business. The attitude of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has always been far more expansionist than the attitude of the Bank of Canada which, as you know, controls the Industrial Development Bank. It is to be sincerely hoped that the attitude of the new bank toward loans for small business will be considerably more expansionist than that of the Industrial Development Bank in the past which had a tendency to be very restrictionist. We hope this new bank will be freer in granting much needed loans to small businesses for work they have on hand.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, small business creates over 50 per cent of our gross national product, pays close to 50 per cent of the taxes collected by all forms of government, and employs more than 50 per cent of all the people who work in this country.

A great deal of capital is required to enable small business to expand and develop. The health of the economy depends very much on this expansion.

We in the opposition welcome this new bank and will be watching its operations very closely in the months ahead to make sure that it meets the needs of small business in the growth so necessary to the Canadian economy. If this should happen it will receive our commendation but, if it does not, it will receive our criticism. We hope it will benefit from the mistakes made by its predecessor which was too restrictionist on many occasions, and that it will adopt the attitude of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce over the years and be an expansionist bank making loans liberally—

An hon. Member: It is a Liberal bank.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, naturally anything I say about liberal is a small "l". We hope this new bank will be a credit to our economy in the months and years ahead.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees).

This bill was adopted in substance by this parliament last year and at that time our party supported it in principle. We intend to support Bill C-14 as well. This bill provides technical and counselling services to small business, as well as needed capital.

For years in this country small business has been ignored by different levels of government. It seems ironic that when the free enterprise system started to develop, it evolved from the small businessmen in this country. We have seen them develop into large corporations, then into multinational corporations vertically integrated, finding raw materials, processing them, developing transportation and so forth, but in the process other small businessmen have often been squeezed by the larger powers.

How can a small businessman in a small town compete with Safeways or Loblaws? Because of their size, large corporations can effect economies of scale, economies not available to the small fellow. In the past, governments have legislated more in the interest of the huge corporation, because it represents power. It is the old story: the squeaky wheel gets the grease. How true, even if the small businessman is hurt in the process!

Let me say this on behalf of the small businessman, Mr. Speaker. He is necessary in our society. In my constituency he plays a useful role. Besides, the small businessman offers a personal touch which you will not get from the large corporation or large bureaucracy. Also, in many small, rural communities, in the far north and in remote areas, the small businessman provides a sort of personal service not available from a large corporation. Many small businesses are family enterprises. They stay open long hours, but provide their community with a needed service. All the same, many small businessmen have gone bankrupt. Not being able to make ends meet, they have closed their doors.

I welcome the establishment of the Federal Business Development Bank. It should help the small businessmen of this country who urgently need help. A riding like mine contains many small businesses, many of which need help. I could elaborate on some of their problems, although the minister dealt with most of them. For instance, they face the problem of obtaining capital at reasonable interest rates, a problem large corporations do not encounter. The large corporation has access to financial markets, can re-invest retained earnings, and so on. The small businessman cannot do that.

Many small businessmen complain about lack of counselling services. I am glad to note this aspect covered by the bill, as small businessmen have lacked access to expert advice in their own fields of interest. One part of this bill is especially useful as, under it, small businessmen will more readily have access to such advice.

There are other areas in which small businessmen face difficulties. They cannot trade as effectively as the large corporation. We shall discuss the Export Development Act tomorrow. Such legislation has tended to favour the large corporation, and we have totally forgotten this country's small businessmen. I should like to see an amendment in this area. I want to see some sort of limitation, or ceiling introduced which will enable the small fellow to have some advantage from the Export Development Corporation. Actions like that will complement the legislation we are discussing. Unless we do something like that, the purpose of this and other similar legislation, will be nullified.

Let me also mention taxation, as that affects the small businessman. Let us bear in mind the bureaucracy with which he must contend. These are but some of many problems small businessmen face. Remember, private banks and financial institutions have lent less and less money to small businessmen in the last few years. Consequently, the latter found it difficult to keep going let alone expand their operations. That is why this bill is necessary.

One could say other things about this bill. It helps not only the small businessman; it helps also the banks and financial institutions of the country. If, under this bill, we provide low interest loans to small businessmen, we shall be releasing the money, such as it is, which banks and private lending institutions might lend small businessmen. In short, we shall allow the banks to use that capital which ought to be lent in part to small businessmen to make profits for their shareholders.

The sad part is that this bill will become a bit of welfare, a hand-out for banks. As it is, I think banks should allocate money at low interest to small businessmen. They should do the same in the housing field, and the same for farmers and fishermen. The government never made it mandatory for banks to allocate funds at low rates of interest to help those groups which most need help.

Indirectly, as I say, this bill will help our private chartered banks. I see the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) in the Chamber. He has often told us about the power of the chartered banks and their assets which run into billions and billions of dollars. The same could be said of the insurance companies and finance companies.

The time has come in Canada for the people, through their government, to make more decisions on how money is to be invested and what our economic priorities are to be. In the past, private chartered banks and similar institutions made these decisions for us. They did our planning. This is a problem we will need to face in the near future.

How will we implement such a suggestion? The Federal Business Development Bank might operate like a commercial bank, become publicly owned, and compete with the private chartered banks of this country. I should like to see that. It could accept deposits from Canadians and handle government accounts such as CMHC, the Canada Pension Plan, and so on, and really compete with the private chartered banks. Then we might see something being done to lower the cost of living and slow down inflation in this country. Besides, those who are staunch believers in free enterprise should welcome the competition.

If we did what I suggest, the new bank could compete effectively with the private, chartered banks. It could lend money to small businessmen at low interest rates, and lend money to farmers and fishermen. It could make available money for house mortgages at 6 per cent or 7 per cent, or at whatever rate we deem desirable and necessary. Why not do something like that? It would be a bold action, one which the country needs. In this way our people could confront the power of huge corporations. I suggest it is time we did so.

Apart from the reservation I mentioned I think this is a useful bill and I will support it. I look forward to discussing it in committee, and hearing the minister clarify some of its details.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, before Bill C-14 is referred to committee I could not miss this opportunity on second reading to congratulate the minister for his presentation. I see he only wanted to extend the old Industrial Development Bank, and I realized listening earlier to the NDP spokesman that the minister has already been urged to further enlarge the scope of that bank. But I wonder after listening to the minister why he did not simply introduce the necessary amendments to the old Industrial Development Bank with which we were used to work.

I do not know if it is because that bank was set up by another government in 1944 or because he wants to be able to say: I introduced a new bill and created a new bank. That is probably why because when I read the data, the explanations on the Industrial Development Bank it seemed to me tonight that I was hearing the Speaker in 1944 introducing the proposed Industrial Development Bank when he stated, for example, about the general conditions:

LET THE CORPORATION BE LOCATED IN CANADA

The bank can provide financial assistance to nearly all types of manufacturing and commercial businesses, both wholesale and retail businesses, primary or secondary industries, tourist and entertainment businesses, service, construction and transport businesses, professional services and others.

Only a few types of businesses cannot receive assistance from the bank because of the nature of their operations. Among those businesses are those whose function is to lend money and those which derive a large part of their incomes from the sale of alcoholic beverages. Furthermore, the bank does not make loans either to finance residential facilities or develop housing neighborhoods.

He talks about the aims and objectives of the bank. I continue:

Most loans made by the bank are for the purchase of land and real estate, for the construction, the alteration or enlargement of buildings . . . or the purchase of machinery parts and equipment.

It may happen that an undertaking, as a result of the purchase of equipment or other capital expenditures, has reduced its cash flow to an insufficient level. In such cases, the bank will consider its application for restoring it.

In principle, the bank does not advance capital to finance stocks or accounts receivable because this type of financing can be had from chartered banks and other sources of short term credit. Still, when an expanding business is short of cash flow, when it seems possible to grant it a mortgage loan, the bank will take into consideration application for a loan intended to improve the cash flow and add to the short term financial assistance—

And so, mention is made of financing. The bank can take part in the initial financing of new enterprises, as the minister said tonight when introducing his new bank.

The bank takes into consideration any application for a loan to facilitate a change of ownership under certain circumstances—

Thus, the terms and conditions of the loans are dealt with as they are this evening; in addition, the bank can lend or guarantee loans. The bank can also make surveys. With respect to the purchase of securities or contracts, the bank will provide financing. I continue to quote:

When part of the financing required by an incorporated company is provided by the bank under the form of a term loan guaranteed by fixed investments, the bank can, when advisable, assume an additional part of the financing by purchasing with the intention of reselling them to the owners or others subsequently, a number equity and preference shares or convertible bonds. However, generally the bank will acquire only a small number of ordinary shares from a company.

Mr. Speaker, all this shows the similarity between the Industrial Development Bank and the Federal Business Development Bank which the minister wants to create.

We are very satisfied with and support the amendments that give greater scope to the Industrial Development Bank. I think this will benefit all Canadians and small businesses. The bank already has a working capital of $349 million, which, with an added $200 million, makes up considerable assets that will give greater scope to the project.

If the Industrial Development Bank has so well served Quebec, I hope the new bank will do even better; a press release of April 25, 1974 reads:

During the three months ending last March 31, the number of loans granted by the Industrial Development Bank has increased by 34 per cent and their aggregate by 39 per cent over the same period in the previous year. During the second quarter of the current IDB's financial year, 387 loans have been granted to Quebec for a total of $20,280,000. For the same period last year, the figures were 289 loans, and a total of $14,571,000.

During the quarter ending March 31, the IDB has approved 844 loans to Quebec for a total of $42,434,000.

We realize therefore the work carried out by the Industrial Development Bank. With the assistance the minister has just granted the new bank, which will in fact replace that created in 1944, I think that Canadian owners of small and medium size industries will have every reason to be satisfied if the promises made by the minister in the House materialize. I repeat: if they materialize. If the former bank was useful to us in the industrial area, it left somewhat to be desired at the administrative level.

When the minister stated tonight that the purpose of this bank was first of all to inform people through training courses, I feel that the former bank had also advocated this project.

But we never had these training courses on an industrial or commercial level for new industries. I therefore hope that the words of the minister will become reality because it is not sufficient to give money, to finance a small industry. The best help we can give it is to tell it how to progress with new methods, how to develop and how to improve its technicians.

Talking about technicians, I hope the minister will not get rid of all the present personnel of the Industrial Development Bank. These employees should be used to provide industrialists and tradesmen with the advice that he has just mentioned.

We are now talking of lending money for financing purposes. Mr. Speaker, if we act like in the past as concerns interest rates, if we do not decide to lend money at a reasonable interest rate which will allow young industrialists and tradesmen to develop their industry without spending all their money on interests, I am sure that once again this bank will not benefit the small industrialist, because I cannot see an industrialist or a tradesman start in a new business by borrowing at rates of 13, 14 or 15 per cent. This is financially impossible!

This is why I call the attention of the minister on this. The committee must discuss the problem of interests. The interest rates on loans should be normal and not excessive, and when I talk about normal interest rates, I mean rates of 6½ or 7 per cent, even though the government may have to grant money because of this, to allow the industry to survive more than three, four or five years, as is now the case. Help has been obtained from the Industrial Development Bank. The industries that were helped survived for two or three years, in other words as long as they obtained help from the government. But as soon as they have to pay by themselves the interests that they are charged, they go bankrupt. This is simply advance warning to the minister. I know that, when the bill goes to committee, such matters will be dealt with, if the purpose is really to ensure the well-being, the progress and development of small business.

I congratulate the minister once more, in the belief that with a few amendments in committee, every small business man, whether in commerce or industry, will benefit.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to follow in debate the leading speaker for our party, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) who, with characteristic modesty, a modesty which has become his hallmark, did not indicate to the House that it was during the government of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), in which he was the minister of trade and commerce, that the program of which he spoke was started. He laid a cornerstone, I think, in a modern era of Canadian government, dedicated to the assistance of small business.

I spoke to the minister before the dinner break this evening and I told him I thought this was an excellent bill, and that the time had long since passed when the government ought to forget its passion for large business and large corporate enterprise and give some constructive thought to the problems of small business in Canada.

Although it hasn't been said before in this debate, and it does not take away in any way from the goodness of the bill before the House tonight, the problems felt by small business are due in no small way to the attitude of the government toward small business.

You have only to speak to small businessmen; they will tell you they have felt discriminated against by government. They feel the government looks upon small business with indifference, and they have reason to feel that way. They feel there is excessive regard given by governments generally, and by the present government in particular, to the supposed virtues of large size. They claim that the government is overly concerned with large firms, not because of their real contribution to the national wealth—and they do make a contribution—but because of a mistaken equation of great size with great efficiency. I think hon. members know that this equation does not necessarily apply. I want to repeat to the minister that I do not in any way detract from the qualities of the bill reforms, which I look upon as constituting a new beginning for small business.

Small business is indeed in trouble in certain areas of Canada. It is fighting a rearguard action in the economic sphere. In 1962, for instance, a 10.4 per cent share of the nation's income went to small business. In 1973, the share had fallen to 7.5 per cent, and I dare say when the statistics are viewed for 1974 we shall see a further fall off in terms of the share of the national income to small business.

Small businesses are a unique form of enterprise. They provide a productive outlet for the energies of Canadians who are enterprising people and who want to be independent in terms of their economic way of life. I believe they exhibit a greater efficiency when stacked, pound for pound, against large business. They have a capacity to become the specialist suppliers of large business and they add variety and service, a specialized skill, to the economic life of our country.

They provide competition. It cannot be over-emphasized that they do constitute a bulwark against monopoly in business, and they provide the means for the entry into productive business of many young people. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings mentioned the number of people who are employed in small businesses. They employ half the people in Canada. They are a large and developing source of employment. They provide for new directions and new methods of doing business, and they offer an opportunity for personal initiative which, in a society such as ours, is growing less and less.

I commend the minister for recognizing these things even though that recognition has come somewhat late. My experience with the Industrial Development Bank was as a solicitor, acting for people who applied to the bank for capital. I found that the greatest complaint among those of my clients who made application—and this was fairly general—was the lack of flexibility in the attitude of the bank toward the difficulties of small business. I do not suggest the officials were actively pursuing this policy. They were prudent, cautious, bankers.

Like the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings I hope experience will show that the movement of the bank out of the banking atmosphere and into the atmosphere of industry, trade and commerce will provide an expansionist viewpoint for the first time toward small business in terms of financial assistance.

I hope the minister can undertake, when he closes this debate, that the attitude of this bank when it functions will not be to stack against the number of loans the small numbers of business failures. Rather, I hope the bank will deal with this from the point of view of the amount of loans, because sometimes viewing it from the small amount of business failures among businesses which have been backed by the bank it may indicate an attitude of too great conservatism and not enough adventure by the government in the application of this fiscal agent to those whom I regard as some of the greatest adventurers, in the economic sense, that there are, namely, the small businessmen in this country. If there is to be an emphasis at all on the flow of capital from the bank to aid business, it ought to be in that direction. I hope this will be considered in the committee and that the minister and the officials of the bank will consider it as well.

Lastly, I should like to commend the minister and the government for looking at the regional aspect of the problems of financing Canadian small business. I am sure that the problems of Newfoundland are different from the problems of British Columbia, which in turn are different from those of the province of Ontario and, in some aspects, those of the province of Quebec. I think it is a very healthy thing that we are recognizing the difference that exist in our Canadian economy community.

I am very pleased to take part in this debate, however briefly, and to commend the minister and the government for bringing the bill before the House. I hope we will see passage of this stage today. I frankly regard it as a very important, innovative step and its real contribution will be brought to fruition if the proper attitude is taken by the administration of the new institution.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to speak on Bill C-14 this evening. This bill has the potential to help business expansion in Canada, and especially small businesses which I feel are the backbone of the nation.

The objects of the new Federal Business Development Bank are to promote and assist in the establishment and development of business enterprises in Canada through financial assistance, management counselling and training. With business failures totalling 1,412 for the first quarter of 1974 in Canada, it will be hoped that the development bank's management and counselling training will slow down the number of business bankruptcies.

A section of the bill which I favour is the appointing of regional advisory councils which will have a better understanding of Canada's regional needs than a centralized advisory group in Ottawa. Many aspects of the bill are similar to the Canadian investment credit incentives program which was introduced by the Conservative party in October, 1972. We in the Conservative party realized then that, with the fantastic amount of business failures in Canada, immediate and decisive action must be taken to assist small business in Canada.

Attempts at tax reform led the federal government to ignore the vital interests of small business, and yet small business in this country generates more employment, more real growth, more tax revenue, and bears more of the cost burden of government than does the so-called big business.

Full employment is a national priority, and for this we must look to those elements in our economy which are less influenced by technological change and that remain labour-intensive, such as small business. Far too much of this section of our economy is presently ignored and excluded from consideration by government policy, and excluded from the encouragement of fiscal incentives. Bill C-14 should encourage these incentives.

Assistance, financial and otherwise, unfortunately is not the only answer to help business grow in Canada. Commercial enterprises in Canada, large and small, are experiencing great difficulties in finding workers, both skilled and unskilled. Yet we have thousands on welfare and on the Unemployment Insurance Commission rolls, and we also have to import workers to help keep some industries going. Strange but true. Recently two motels had to close down in Banff because they could not find help. Until the work ethic is restored in Canada, financial assistance alone to business will not be sufficient to keep it going or expanding.

The introduction of the just society and the leisure society since 1968 has brought about this deterioration of the work ethic in Canada. The blame for worker shortage, while thousands are collecting unemployment insurance, lies squarely upon the Liberal government and its mismanagement of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

I would like to quote from a letter I have just received from the executive vice-president of the Winnipeg Builders Exchange as an example of the difficulties they have in finding manpower. They also point out how workers play games with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I quote:

> Three months from now our industry will again be entering that difficult stage where we are unable to obtain skilled manpower to work on our projects during the winter—a time of the year when large numbers of skilled tradesmen have been laid off due to the seasonal swings in the construction industry.
> This situation has worsened each of the past winters until it reached the point during January, 1974, where our association took an active role in the employment scene. We detailed completely the requests of employers for more than 100 tradesmen of varying qualifications; followed the applications made to both the union hiring centres and Canada Manpower offices; followed up weekly and in some cases semi-weekly for the placement of these people; and followed bi-weekly with the employers to determine the results they were receiving. The employers, on their part, kept detailed records of every person applying to them or sent to them for work, including names and addresses. We were then able to report to the Unemployment Insurance Commission the number who refused to work in their trade in jobs requiring their comparable skills.
> One of the results of this activity by our office—aside from the main objective of securing employees for our members—was that we were able to establish beyond any doubt in our minds that jobs were going vacant while skilled tradesmen qualified to fill those jobs refused to work and were drawing unemployment insurance benefits. Keep in mind that we are not discussing unskilled labour, but rather skilled tradesmen able to demand and receive the equally high rates of pay they later find it convenient to accept when summer arrives.
> Last winter, we had openings for carpenters within 50 miles of the city, but candidates forwarded by Canada Manpower refused the jobs when they found that they were outside city limits. We have shortages in several other trades as well, and only in the fields of the electricians and plumbers were we able to fill our needs.
> There can be no doubt that one of the greatest flaws in the current unemployment insurance regulations is the one which allows renewal of unemployment insurance benefits, or establishment of benefits, in a period of eight weeks. It is hard to imagine a philosophy that has hurt the national economy more in recent years than that voiced publicly by a former cabinet minister to the effect that people have a right not to work. That philosophy haunts industry even today, and has both increased costs and reduced productivity—both effects being large factors in the inflationary spiral which we experience in Canada today.
> While there are many aspects of the unemployment insurance regulations which we feel need revision, one of the most significant is that there should be an extension of the qualification period for benefits to a minimum of 20 weeks rather than the eight weeks under the current regulations.

This is just one example of what business people are experiencing across Canada, and immediate corrective steps must be taken to plug the loophole in the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, while we in the Conservative party support Bill C-14, it is not the complete answer for assistance to business in Canada. The government also has a responsibility to restore the work ethic in Canada.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to have this opportunity to speak on Bill C-14 and to express support for what I think is an outstanding bill, in view of some of the tremendous merits it envisions for small industries and small businesses. The government should be justly proud of the Federal Business Development Bank. This bill will help Canadians to extend their imaginations well into the market place. It is a bill with a particular emphasis on small business and developments, and is an attempt to act into law a philosophy that is long overdue.

This is a philosophy which says to every Canadian: "You are someone who counts; you are someone who matters". This philosophy says to the Canadian people: "Go ahead and dream, and the government will give support". I find it very easy to lend support to this bill because it is a bill that is steeped in Conservative thinking. It is the kind of thing which says that the individual matters. It is the kind of thing which places the individual in the forefront as he should be.

This is a sharp demarkation and departure from the traditional system of taxing people so that the government can think up and execute its ideas. I might submit that execution is what usually comes from dreams by big government under its own implementation. This is a great bill because the people of Canada become the thinkers and doers, and the government does what it must do. They all play a supportive role. This bill challenges people to seek the maximums of their potential. That situation is as it should be.

While I wholeheartedly support this bill I wish to take a few moments to outline a caution, to which I think we should lend particular attention. I say this with all due awareness that there is a regional advisory system or council set up to help administer this bill. The special concern I suggest is that we must be very attentive to the sparsely populated areas of this country. I would hope there is special concern not only for small business but for the sparsely populated areas.

In the first century of Canada's federated existence its rural and urban population ratios have completely reversed. One hundred years ago 80 per cent of Canadians lived in rural areas. Today over 80 per cent of Canadians live in urban areas. It is predicted that 95 per cent of all Canadians will be living in urban centres by the year 2000. If there is something that is obvious it is that government must bear the brunt of the responsibility for the fact that a large proportion of this country's population has been crammed and crowded into a few large cities.

Past policies of the two highest levels of government have had a tremendous influence on the rural exodus. To lend documentation to that, I point out that in the single decade from 1961 to 1971 over 179,000 people left the rural communities on the prairies. That means that in only ten years almost 200,000 people have vanished from those areas. I request that through this bill there be a real thrust to decentralize Canada. This means special help for the rural communities. They have, however, a serious handicap.

In some of the major cities of the country there are whole office staffs set up to assist the cities in obtaining assistance from the provincial and federal governments. The small towns throughout the country do not have that kind of staff. They operate with part-time mayors who hold other jobs. The way in which they can make application for and attract small businesses does not have such a degree of sophistication, and so I believe it becomes important that very special attention be paid to the small and rural communities.

A few years ago we heard the slogan that the land is strong. In the context that that slogan was used its real meaning was that people are strong. But I submit that there cannot be a concept of a strong land that is devoid of people. All across the prairies we see a mass exodus of people from the rural districts. The land is not strong if it does not have people. Small businesses and industries in those areas must have the kind of thrust that is extra-projected within the scope of this legislation.

We cannot afford to continue to lose 200,000 people within a single decade from the rural areas. That simply is too many. It is well for those who have driven across the prairies to note the number of dying towns. The fact remains that how they were set up caused them to be placed too closely together. Largely they were established under the historical notion that towns were far enough apart if one could load a sleigh with grain, drive into town in the middle of winter and be back home again before dark. That placed them at something like six to nine miles apart.

We who have seen these towns die know it is not a death that came about through suicide, or lack of desire, or lack of spirit on the part of the people in them. It is instead murder by technology and a murder by government which through its policies, caused the development of this country to be centralized in five major locations or five major cities. We must pay special attention to rural communities throughout the breadth and scope of this country.

There is a myth which exists in western culture that bigness is goodness. It is the kind of myth which we must do everything we can to end. If we take a look at the large cities in this North American continent we will note that almost everything associated with bigness, in terms of the size of cities, tends also to perpetuate negative behaviour. There are many things which exist in such a society which cause people to go to institutions because of negative behaviour. The growing ratio in this regard is faster than the growth in the size of the cities.

Rural people, of course, are no better than city people. I submit, however, they are just as good. The rural way of life is something which must be protected and not allowed to vanish from the Canadian scene. If the land is to be strong it must be a land from sea to sea, which means people from sea to sea, which means support for growth and industrial development all across the country. Canada cannot be allowed to go along as a malignant growth which clusters together like a cancer choking into one or two small areas all the development that this country is planning.

So, Mr. Speaker, I applaud the government for this bill. I think it has the kind of potential which can do a great deal to encourage the thrust of the individual and to encourage small business development all across the country. But I ask that particular attention be paid to the fact that in the smaller communities the assistance of government will be needed even in terms of helping to make applications to this bank, and much work is needed in those small communities.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, since I am in a particularly benevolent mood tonight I do not propose to ridicule the minister primarily because of the fact that the motion originally was a Tory motion. However, I think we must bring the minister back into the realm of reality. I believe he must recognize that this bill will not carry him and the small business enterprises of Canada into Utopia. He must recognize that this bill does not provide a haven for defeated Liberal members of parliament. I hope the minister does not dishonour himself by appointing to the directorships and as members of the council those people who are not worthy of promotion.

Because of the fact that there is a great potential in this bill for the development of small businesses in Canada, we realize they are very dependent upon it. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), my colleague, said that we will be watching the activity that takes place within the confines of this legislation. That is exactly right because many things can happen within the purview of this legislation that will not be to the benefit of small businesses, and if we hear any complaints from the government with regard to questions on the order paper, let me assure the minister that there will be further questions put on the order paper to ensure that this bill does what it is supposed to do.

Small businesses must make a profit and that "profit" should not be a dirty word in Canada, especially as it applies to small businesses. Also, we must understand that small businessmen must pay their costs, their outlays, their taxes and their interest before they can repay any principal on their debt. If the principal is not repaid, this legislation will not serve the function which it is meant to serve.

If this legislation is to do the job that it should do, the government must get off the back of small businesses. I emphasize that, and I hope the minister will go to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as well as to his other colleagues in the cabinet with that message. Small businesses deal not only with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce but also with the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Finance, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in some cases, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Transport, Information Canada, and Statistics Canada.

I should like to quote, in order that it may be on record, pertinent parts of speech by the chairman of the National Dairy Council of Canada. He has described very well what is happening in the dairy industry. I think that within the confines of the dairy industry there are more small businesses than in any other industry in Canada. This is what the chairman said:

> Perhaps it is my closer affiliation with the affairs of the Council during this past year that has made me more aware of this growing involvement of government into the commercial life of our enterprises.
> I don't intend to recite the innumerable problems and events that your council has faced on your behalf during the past year. You already know through your work on national committees, the resumé or the deluge of mail that you receive from our Ottawa office about the formidable task that, like some cancer, simply keeps on growing and growing.
> You know, there is at least one fault that the president has learned from the government since he moved to Ottawa—how to produce a mountain of mail. As chairman, I receive copies of all correspondence coming out of our Ottawa office weekly. I really don't know how many thousands of letters a year are produced but a very large number are involved directly with the subject on which I want to devote a few minutes. I am speaking, of course, about this expanding government involvement in our enterprises and what we as Canadian corporate citizens should be doing about it.

Then he went on to say:

> Listen to this—here is a partial list of new intrusions by our benevolent federal benefactors:

It is too bad that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is not here to hear this.

> Moisture content of cheese; fat content of butter and cheese; fat content on ice cream and frozen desserts; fat content on yogurt and cottage cheese; generic classification of cheeses; recall code procedure; companies act; competition bill; Environment Canada regulations; termination of the fluid milk subsidy; enlargement and extension of milk powder subsidy; Maple Leaf grade symbol; increase in support price for butter and powder; maximum coliform content for cheeses; preparation of brief for GATT; preparation of brief for Food Prices Review Board; report on the dairy industry by Dr. McFarlane; regulations for partially skimmed milk; seminar on the dairy industry held by FPRB; and emphasis on violations under Weights and Measures Act—

Remember that your compliance with most government programs generally adds to your cost of doing business. In addition, each new government act generally requires more staff to administer—staff means money—money spent by government means higher taxes on your business or you personally.

Talk to any of these small business operators and they will tell you that 10 per cent to 15 per cent of their office staff's time is taken up with filling government forms and filing them. The chairman went on to say:

> There doesn't seem to be anyone in Canada in charge of co-ordinating the overall federal government's concern and intervention in our industry. We've had Agriculture Canada, National Health and Welfare, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Statistics Canada, weights and measures, Environment Canada, the dairy branch, the Canadian Dairy Commission, food additives, etc., all get into the act and talk about developing more rules and regulations for our industry during this past year.
> Has anyone tried to assess the cost of complying with all the federal regulations being talked about? I am sure they haven't—
> Has the consumer ever been informed of how much this information is going to cost her totally and is she willing to pay? We know through research done at Rutgers and Penn. State Universities that date coding of milk alone will add up to 1 cent a quart to the total cost.
> Is the information meaningful and relevant? How often does a consumer ever get a quart of sour milk today? Is it really necessary to add 1 cent a quart to all the milk sold in Canada just to minimize the few incidences of sour milk which, when they do occur, are cheerfully corrected by the retailer?—

Facetious and farfetched? Probably, but one gets the impression that more and more people are being hired out of the productive sector of the economy and being charged with the responsibility of looking after those of us who remain in business and industry.

When you visit Ottawa and are told that it is the fastest growing city per capita in all the world—with millions being spent to house more and more bureaucrats who will produce more and more red tape to make it tougher and tougher for you to function, don't you get the feeling that enough is enough? More and more drones supported by fewer and fewer workers—

This is the problem of businesses today, and the government must get off the back of industry. As I said earlier, the dairy industry consists of more small businesses than any other sector of the business world in Canada. Unfortunately, government regulations and controls are forcing small dairy businesses to close down.

The minister must co-operate with his colleagues to get them to see the light so that small business enterprises in Canada can enjoy the co-ordinated efforts of the government, otherwise the grandiose attempt of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) in putting this legislation before the House will lose its thrust because of the shortcomings of his cabinet colleagues.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there are many greater business minds in the House of Commons than mine.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That's the trouble.

● (2140)

Mr. Marshall: I hope that the new Federal Business Development Bank will serve the purposes for which it is intended, but for the life of me I cannot see how it will do anything more for the small businessman than the many other programs which already exist under other departments of government, other than build another little empire to add to the bureaucracy and confuse further the potential businessman to whom it is supposedly directed, not to mention the added cost to the taxpayer in setting it up.

The Federal Business Development Bank is not much different from the present Industrial Development Bank other than the few fancy frills such as are contained in clause 21 wherein it provides management assistance to recipients of loans, and it is empowered under clause 22(b) to sponsor conferences, seminars and the like, and under clause 23 to distribute information relating to techniques, methods and practices for the successful administration of business enterprises.

Furthermore, this type of assistance is being offered under various other programs in federal and federal/provincial programs. An example of the duplication, Mr. Speaker, is that in most provinces in Canada there are many provincial development corporations, such as the Newfoundland and Labrador Development Corporation, which serve almost the exact same purposes. Of the $22 million in capital funds, $20 million has been invested by the federal government under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

[Mr. Towers.]

Here are the objectives of the Newfoundland and Labrador Development Corporation. I have already circulated a pamphlet to all hon. members setting these out. In order to overcome the lack of detailed information concerning viable opportunities for investment, lack of venture capital, and the failure of businesses to meet the demands for more sophistication in their approach to business development, a positive program for the development of small and medium-sized businesses was drawn up in 1973 to provide businesses with industrial intelligence; management advisory services; project information; loan financing for the establishment, expansion or modernization of programs; equity financing, and related services and assistance.

The corporation's affairs are governed by a board of directors with strong business backgrounds and knowledge of the particular economy, which works closely with the federal government. The main emphasis will be on financial assistance and management advisory services. However, there is vast scope for expanding activities and consequently there will be ongoing development work.

Then, Mr. Speaker, it designates the financial assistance available, term loans, and application requirements. We are all aware that most of our provinces have similar programs to suit their requirements.

Now, let us look at this new Federal Business Development Bank. Its objectives are almost the same—to provide financial assistance, management training, information and advice and other such ancillary services in order to promote and assist in the establishment of businesses in Canada, with authority to set up regional advisory boards to suit the particular region. Both of these agencies have the same objectives worded in a different manner.

Despite the various other loan programs such as the Small Business Loans, Fisheries and Farm Improvement Loans, Farm Syndicate Loans, Vessel Building Loans, Small Farm Development Loans, Capital Assistance Loans, Rural Development Loans, and besides the government guaranteed loans under DREE and the various agencies to assist the small businessman under the minister's department—such as CASE—there remains that vacuum which the minister and his advisers cannot recognize. That vacuum is the need to provide venture capital to small business.

The need is not to build another bureaucracy under another department, Mr. Speaker. All that will do is further confuse the small businessman. There will be more confusing and lengthy application forms to fill out, and all he will receive, as happens in most cases, is a form letter advising him that he does not qualify, without giving any reason.

Setting up a dozen more fancy corporations will not help. The need is to overcome the discouraging high interest rates, the excessive requirements for collateral, the lack of risk capital, the constant desire that seems to exist in the bureaucracy to refuse an applicant and get rid of a problem rather than to help him.

Going back for a moment to the Newfoundland and Labrador Development Corporation, this agency loaned out almost $5 million in its first year of operation. Along with other programs many millions have been injected, but even with this injection of funds Newfoundland still has an embarrassing 16 per cent unemployment rate in a population of only a little over a half million.

Over the years that I have been in this House I have taken the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to task for the lack of responsibility shown by the chartered banks of Canada with regard to small business loans, fisheries improvement loans and farm improvement loans. In reply to the concern which I expressed in the House I received the following letter from the minister, dated May 6, 1974:

You will recollect that during the debate on second reading of Bill C-14, an Act to Amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, Small Businesses Loans Act and Fisheries Improvement Loans Act—you pointed out that far fewer loans under these plans were going to the province of Newfoundland than to any of the other provinces of Canada. In response I undertook to have Mr. Claude Passy—

He is the chairman of the guaranteed loans administration, Mr. Speaker.

—investigate the points you raised on the spot in St. John's.

And this is what happens, Mr. Speaker. They go to the capitals and do not care about the other parts of the provinces where the development potential exists. The letter continues:

Mr. Passy advises that, after discussion with the senior official of one of the banks in Newfoundland, the following points were made:

1. The policy of the banks in Newfoundland is to participate in these plans.

2. In so far as the official's bank was concerned all applications for these loans made in the province were accepted and processed.

3. Small Businesses Loans. There are not a great number of small businesses in Newfoundland and, traditionally, such businesses have obtained all their credit needs through a commercial institution—largely the chartered banks. Banks continue to meet the needs and hence there are very few applications for or questions about the small business loans. It is only recently, within the last two-three years that the economy in Newfoundland has taken an upturn and it is expected that this may result in more demand for credit. In this connection you will be aware that the Newfoundland and Labrador Development Corporation was set up in 1973 to stimulate new industry and the development of small businesses.

As I indicated already, Mr. Speaker, the Newfoundland and Labrador Development Corporation does the very things that this new Federal Development Bank is going to try to do. Sometimes I wonder if most of the ministers in the government just say to themselves, "Program, program, who has the best program?" They all want a loan program in order to build an empire and see what they can do with Canada, but that is missing the point.

I will not go into more detail on this, Mr. Speaker, because I know some of my colleagues want to speak. The letter goes on to talk about farm improvement loans and fisheries improvement loans, but what it says is happening just is not happening, Mr. Speaker.

I say that the chartered banks, under the guaranteed loans provisions, just do not care about their responsibility; it is greater than just making as much profit as possible. They even go to the point of discouraging government guaranteed loans because, if the applicant is a good risk, they can give him a conventional loan and charge a higher rate of interest.

No, Madam Speaker, I repeat, the answer is not in forming new corporations under new departments of government which will compete with one another. The answer is not in spending more millions of necessary dollars to take over a similar agency which is fulfilling the same purpose. I say the answer is to amalgamate the various cumbersome programs now in existence and which are going off in the same direction through different avenues, and to recognize the initiative and knowledge of the Canadian who understands resource potential. Let us support his initiative with the capital he needs and with a little more faith and understanding as to our aims in building more small businesses, if we believe they are the backbone of our economy.

I think the government should either amalgamate existing programs, and there are many, or review them with the common sense purpose of expanding their requirement standards, so that we can meet the need of the small businessman, whether he be a farmer, fisherman, hotel keeper, sawmill operator or small manufacturer. I say that the only way we can expand small business is to ease the restrictions which exist and provide more venture capital to the prospective entrepreneur. In this way we will provide the opportunity which is lacking and, thereby, the job opportunities we need in Canada if we are to overcome unemployment and build a better nation.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am in general agreement with the thrust of the bill and feel that it may help some small business operations. I am inclined to think that the establishment of a federal bank for this purpose will be valuable.

From my observations over six years the operations of the IDB in my constituency have not been successful. I have become skeptical of the manner in which these loans are funded and placed. I find that there are fewer applications for loans than was originally anticipated when the legislation was brought down. Perhaps such legislation does not function well in a western rural riding like mine. Yet the IDB has been the only vehicle by which some businessmen in my riding have been given the chance to obtain federal government backed loans. Legislation of that type just does not function too well in certain areas, for reasons which may be inherent in the administration of this type of financing.

I have found, Madam Speaker, that the IDB has been hopeless in supplying the needs of my riding. The reason seems to be that service and similar industries have a very low priority with the IDB, which interests itself in industry and industrial projects. There are few industrial projects in my riding. I have found that because our projects are small, personnel often do not have the background of business experience, expertise and credit rating which the IDB seems to want.

Nearly always applicants for loans are beaten before they start because the officers of IDB always ask for a performance record which cannot be met. Often the individual has not been in manufacturing before. In my experience, once a business is started it can get along with capital generated locally. But the starting of these industries is the problem.

Indeed, there is considerable reluctance to expand any industry or business beyond what the individual or a family can handle, because of the great difficulty in disposing of a business at the end of the individual's working career. I have found that many relatively successful businessmen have been put in a position in which their businesses have become too large to sell. They cannot find buyers to take their businesses off their hands.

In other words, under our present economic climate a small business is usually regarded as a living only for its owner. I believe we shall see more of this attitude in future. That means that businesses will tend to remain small or disappear on the death or retirement of the owners.

This bill will be applied differently in the different areas of Canada. I think we are aware of the marked regional differences in this country. We have spent much time asking what is a small business. I have found, in discussions with members who represent constituencies in Ontario and Quebec, the central part of Canada, that a small business is looked on as one with 40 or 50 employees. In my part of the world a small business supports four or five employees at most.

The IDB, in conformity with the terms under which it operated, was not interested in small loans of up to $10,000 or $15,000, which small businessmen often needed. The IDB wanted to lend them a good, big chunk of money, $50,000 or more. I often thought the officers of IDB felt that a $10,000 loan was not contributing much, or was too small to be of value. I have found that civil servants often judge the success of their work by the size of transaction they handle.

If this bill can overcome some of the old administrative difficulties, it will become a valuable tool for helping small businesses. May I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I perceive that it is almost ten o'clock. Perhaps I could call it ten o'clock and continue tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DOWNSVIEW AIR BASE—POSSIBILITY OF RELEASING LAND FOR HOUSING DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to talk this evening in general terms about the future of Downsview Airport, which is in North York in the municipality of metropolitan Toronto. This area includes an important military distribution centre, a military airport and an aircraft frame factory and testing area which once was a wholly owned subsidiary of a British corporation. Now all these lands, over 1,000 acres, are owned by the federal government, and the use of the land has not changed for at least two decades.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

During these past two decades the greatest possible change of use has taken place in the lands surrounding this area. Farm land and waste land have been converted and become one of the world's fastest growing cities, the municipality of North York.

Governments and citizens tend to be critical of slum landlords and absentee landlords, on the ground that they lose touch with local standards and local needs. I say that in relation to Downsview, and other lands which the federal government owns in the municipality of metropolitan Toronto, the federal government itself is a slum landlord and an absentee landlord. In proof I wish to make two points.

Compare the way the federal government uses its land in Ottawa with the way it uses the excess land at Downsview air base. It had a lot of land in the Ottawa area that was surplus and unused. What happened? An agency was established, the NCC. This agency has established bicycle paths and amenities for the surrounding communities. It has, much to its credit, innovatively established a system of allotment gardens so that people who are stuck in apartments can rent unused plots of land to grow flowers and vegetables. All this takes place in the shadow of Parliament Hill under the watchful eye of the minister.

What is being done 250 miles away in Toronto with unused parts of Downsview Airport? Absolutely nothing. The vacant parts have laid in that condition for years.

As a second proof I wish to point out that back in 1970 the Department of National Defence itself recognized that there were 70 acres of land that were not required. It turned that land over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation to be put to some better use. We can think of a lot better use for that land in that area than simply lying vacant.

Four years ago two other government departments put a hold on that land. What happened to it? Absolutely nothing. It has just remained unused in the middle of a residential area where housing is badly needed.

Two important changes have taken place in the past few months which I hope will make a difference to the federal government. First, the aircraft plant has been taken over by the federal government. For the first time the federal government controls the destiny of the entire holding.

Second, a subway station and subway line are in the process of being built on the edge of this land. Imagine, people who live in Orangeville are travelling to Toronto to work. Their transportation involves three hours a day, back and forth, while their government has much of 1,000 acres of land vacant, and there will be a subway station right at the corner.

It is time the federal government asked itself whether this is the right place for an airport and a factory. I do not think it is. It is time to conform to what the local community requires and is doing. I do not have a comprehensive list of changes that ought to be made, but I wish to make a number of points.

First, there should continue to be a strong military presence in the area. The distribution centre is important. It needs to be manned. That use in that area is entirely justified. There is military housing surrounding it. That housing should be continued for that purpose. In fact, more housing should be built in that area for military personnel who very often have short-term duty there and cannot find alternative accommodation.

Second, a lot of attention should be given to the need for amenities and community facilities in that area because in some parts of the surrounding territory the municipality gave inadequate thought to the needs of the residents. This is a good way to make a contribution toward improving those communities.

Third, vast parking areas will have to be established there so that people can come to the subway station, park their cars and get into the city. Parking facilities will be required.

Fourth, this is an obvious place for a lot of housing, hopefully partly for veterans and military personnel. In addition, there is room for sensible, attractive low density and mixed density residential use. This is something that is badly required in the area. I could add that if the Veterans Land Act is terminated next March, it will be a measure of justice to the military of Canada and veterans that some provisions are made for them in this area.

Fifth, I wish to draw attention to the interest of some groups in metropolitan Toronto in establishing in that area the United Nations university campus. I think that is a fine idea. I would like to know a lot more before I agree with it, but I would note that one of the most attractive features of that proposal is they do not intend to put up a lot of new buildings. They recognize it will be near a subway station. Additions to the university will take advantage of empty buildings, and available buildings are located throughout Metropolitan Toronto.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): First, Madam Speaker, I should like to compliment the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) on his attention to local interests and constituency interests. Local interests add up to regional interests and are perfectly deserving of expression on the floor of the House. I also note his reference to the fact that the military presence is of importance to the area.

The department has received repeated requests over several years to give up the Downsview site. In 1970, after considerable pressure from the Borough of North York, 69 acres were declared surplus and turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. This parcel of land is the only part of the site considered suitable for housing development. However, the property has not been disposed of by the Department of Public Works, presumably because agreement for disposal by the Treasury Board Advisory Committee on federal land management is still awaited.

There is a continued requirement for Downsview by the Department of National Defence, and no plans are in offing to declare any other parts of the site surplus. However, as the hon. member said, negotiations for an exchange of property in the southwest corner are in progress between National Defence Headquarters and the regional municipality of Toronto to permit a right-of-way for a proposed subway and, at the same time, straighten out a jagged property boundary currently in existence. About four acres of land are involved.

Canadian Forces Base, Toronto, an Air Transport Command Base, is an example of a base which exists mainly for the support of units from other commands, notably the Naval Reserves (Maritime Command Units) and the Militia Air reserve squadrons. It is estimated that at least 50 per cent of the base effort is devoted to the support of the Naval Reserves, Militia units and Air Reserve Squadrons.

With regard to the Downsview site it is anticipated that there will be a continuing requirement for a base to support these reserves and cadets in the greater Toronto-Hamilton areas.

The department has a long-standing agreement with De Havilland Aircraft Corporation for the continuing use of the airfield. Until such time as there is a change in role or function of that firm, a requirement for the lengthy runways will continue. Then again, the facilities and the infrastructure at Downsview are relatively modern and functional—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but the time allotted to him has expired. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.11 p.m.

NOTICE OF MOTION REQUESTING REVIEW OF ACT

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I take a moment to draw to the attention of the House the notice of motion dealing with the Veterans' Land Act signed by 25 members of the House and filed yesterday with Mr. Speaker. The content of the notice of motion will be found at the end of the notice paper as printed in today's order paper.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PRIME MINISTER OLOF PALME OF SWEDEN

Mr. Speaker: May I begin by calling to the attention of the House the presence in the gallery of a very distinguished visitor, Mr. Olof Palme, the right honourable the Prime Minister of Sweden.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BIRTHDAY CONGRATULATIONS TO THE PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member for Prince Albert on a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons is a place difficult to understand by those who do not understand it. It is a place in which in strong disagreements we sometimes use forcible language and on other occasions are devastating in debate. Despite that fact, great admiration is felt in the hearts of all in this institution. I rise as one who is not casual about birthdays.

● (1110)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: When I came to this House first, under Right Hon. Mackenzie King, there was no old age pension to which to look forward. That was of deep concern to all of us who knew the vicissitudes of public life. That is no longer true, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will not have long to wait if some hon. members to my left are able to bring about changes in regard to old age pensions, that is when they may be secured and attained.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am happy on this occasion to say to the Prime Minister that I wish him well, happiness and good health. Indeed, if I may presume to say so on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, I extend to him a royal salute.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: And, lest that be misunderstood from the point of view of propriety or otherwise, "royal" is spelled with a small "r".

Sir, a few moments ago I looked up a book on astrology and found the Prime Minister was born under Libra. It is merely coincidence that Libra and liberal have some connection. Those born under Libra, I understand, are clever and have every possibility of manœuvre. That, too, in connection with the Prime Minister, is merely coincidence.

I hope that his trip to France will be fruitful and beneficial; and if, perchance, to reciprocate General de Gaulle's observation about Canada if he says, "Vive Saskatchewan" or "Vive Prince Albert", I will not object whatsoever. I only hope and expect that the welcome he will receive there will be like the one extended by General de Gaulle to Olive and me, when there on a state visit and with the full realization that that nation was one of the founding nations of our country.

Sir, I extend to the Prime Minister the warmest of good wishes, congratulations, and the hope that during the present parliament success will come by his leadership to this House and our country. Congratulations and the very best!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): On behalf of my colleagues, I join the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in sincerely wishing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the very best today, his birthday. I am sure the Prime Minister will understand if I refer to the point made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert concerning the word "Libra", by saying it is our sincere wish on the occasion of his birthday that the Prime Minister will return to the views he expressed so eloquently and with such vigour in the days when he was very active in writing for a publication known as cité libre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, I wish to join the two previous speakers in offering the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) our congratulations and best wishes on the occasion of his birthday.

Perhaps it is a coincidence that this time should have been chosen for his important trip to France, which is coming up shortly after his birthday, that he might prove somewhat more experienced through age, but in any event, I wish him a most fruitful and profitable trip, more specifically in terms of future agreements between that important European country and Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker I am always very happy to welcome the date of October 18th. It gives me the opportunity not only of reminding myself that I am growing wiser but also of hearing what the opposition parties really think of me.

An hon. Member: The day is not over yet.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I feel I must associate my well known personal modesty with this occasion and recognize that those good wishes are not addressed so much to Pierre Trudeau the individual as to the leader of the Liberal party. One thing is sure: the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) or the other hon. members who were kind enough to offer me their best wishes would not have done so 20 years ago when I represented the unions in the asbestos industry, as their lawyer, or when I was a mere university professor.

[English]

In those days I never received such tributes, not even from those colleagues over there who knew me. Therefore, I conclude that it is to the leader of the Liberal party that these good wishes are made.

I am particularly touched by the royal salute from a fellow member of the Royal Society.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I want to say in all modesty, Mr. Speaker, that I realize when these good gentlemen opposite wished me many happy returns of the day, they were using October 18 as a pretext to wish many happy returns for another day, which as leader of this party I thank them for, the day of July 8. I hope there will be many happy returns on that occasion as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED MISTREATMENT OF INMATES OF DON JAIL, TORONTO—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to bring a motion in accordance with Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Allegations have been made of invasions of fundamental human rights and police brutality directed against inmates of the Don Jail in the City of Toronto. The matter is, of course, of concern to the provincial authority but it is also of concern to all Canadians since these actions, if the allegations are true, would constitute infringements of the Canadian Bill of Rights passed by this parliament.

There is no room for the emergence in Canada of the grim story of the maltreatment of those in custody of the police which is all too common in other parts of the world. I therefore ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview:

That the Minister of Justice be instructed, in co-operation with the provincial authorities, to ensure that a full and thorough inquiry is made into allegations of brutality directed against inmates of Don Jail.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the contents of the proposed motion. Since it is presented under the terms of Standing Order 43, it cannot be debated without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, it cannot be debated today.

FOOD PRICES

ALLEGED CONFLICTING STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS—INVOLVEMENT OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD IN AGRICULTURAL POLICY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): May I put a question to the Prime Minister who has been the recipient of all those very well deserved congratulatory remarks? Having regard to all the conflicting statements made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Agriculture, will he tell the House which minister speaks for the government on the matter of food prices, a subject which is of some importance to this party and to the Canadian people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would be very happy to look into the matter if the hon. gentleman will send me the quotations which he feels are an indication of a contradiction in the policy of the government.

Mr. Baldwin: I shall not abuse the rules of the House by taking half an hour by setting out in detail the large number of contradictory statements which have been made. I am sure the Prime Minister is already aware of them, but he is not interested in them. Does he agree with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the Food Prices Review Board should involve itself in agricultural policy?

Mr. Trudeau: It depends in what sense. I do not think it is the object of the Board to make policy for the government, but in the sense that it should look into the prices of food, which is a product of agriculture, I suppose such an interpretation could be accepted.

Mr. Baldwin: Bearing in mind that the Canadian taxpayer is being ripped off to the extent of $25 billion to support this government in its peregrinations, will the Prime Minister not put an end to this political juvenile delinquency and attempt to carry out his constitutional obligation to co-ordinate government policy—if indeed there is any?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE REFERENCE OF FORBES REPORT TO FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. May I ask the minister whether he has in fact formally referred to the Food Prices Review Board the study by Professor Forbes into consumer representation on marketing boards, with all of the implications of that report?

(Translation)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): For the information of the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this board is not the responsibility of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is an independent body, and I am sure its members have already gone through this report and are studying it as earnestly as the hon. member himself.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED SHARING WITH SWEDEN OF INFORMATION ON OPERATION OF MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister inform the House of his government's intentions concerning the proposal made recently by the Prime Minister of Sweden that our two countries share on a bilateral basis pertinent information on the operations of multinational corporations in the two countries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a proposition which I understand the Prime Minister of Sweden has put on the agenda for our discussions which will be continuing this afternoon. I did have very pleasant and fruitful meetings with the Prime Minister yesterday. We did not reach that item of the agenda, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will study it with all the seriousness that it deserves.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

DATE OF PROCLAMATION OF PART II OF ACT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister inform the House when the government intends to proclaim Part II of the Foreign Investments Review Act which would give the government authority to review the expansion of foreign owned firms already existing in Canada into unrelated areas of business, a crucial part of the bill which has not yet been proclaimed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was made clear at the outset when this bill was brought before the House—a very progressive measure for which I am happy that we have the support of the hon. gentleman's party—that we would proclaim the other parts of the bill as soon as the administration of that part could be discharged with fairness and efficiency. I would say that this will be relatively soon.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION PERMITTING REVIEW OF EXPANSION OF FOREIGN CORPORATIONS INTO RELATED AREAS OF BUSINESS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister give assurances to the House that the government is at least considering, and hopefully positively, introducing legislation which would permit the government agency to review the expansion of existing foreign owned firms into related areas of business—that is, areas in which they are already actively involved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That is an area that eventually we will want to consider, Mr. Speaker. But as the hon. gentleman knows, the areas already covered by the act as it exists, and which will be proclaimed, are very considerable and extensive, and this later stage may not be reached in the immediate future.

ENERGY

FEASIBILITY STUDY ON CONSTRUCTION OF PIPELINE TO BRING NATURAL GAS FROM ARCTIC TO EASTERN CANADA—DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Can he advise the House whether the committee responsible for the polar gas study into the feasibility of a pipeline through the Arctic to eastern Canada has completed its study and submitted its report?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I must say that this is a joint committee set up by the oil companies. I am afraid the committee has yet to submit its report on the situation. We have obtained some information on its study with respect to the crossing of sounds in the Arctic, but the final report has not yet been submitted to us. Of course, this report would be prepared for the joint committee of the oil companies and not for the government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—PROPOSAL TO BE ADVANCED BY PRIME MINISTER—PURPOSE OF VISIT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister arrives in Brussels next week and learns first hand that the European common market has no intention of giving Canada preferential trade treatment, has the Prime Minister a proposition to lay before the EEC which he feels confident has a good chance of getting the EEC to reverse its present stand on this matter? If so, would he advise the House what line of argument he will be taking?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to advance a line of argument at all. We have no intention of asking for preferential treatment. Therefore, the hon. gentleman's assumption that it will be rejected is false, based as usual on a false premise.

● (1130)

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister has said he is not going to ask for that preferential treatment he has been advised he will not receive, what is the purpose of his visit? Is it just a public relations visit?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is to receive fair treatment.

Mr. Hees: Don't you think we get it now?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. gentleman should know that the relations between the European community are on a privilege exchange basis. The entrance of Britain into that community, and the admission of other countries like Sweden with free trade in the industrial sector could have serious detrimental consequences to Canadian trade. We want, therefore, to be sure through negotiations that we are treated fairly and that the community is truly outward looking rather than inward.

Mr. Hees: So you have given up before you have even started.

PUBLISHING

POSSIBILITY OF HAVING CANADIAN WEEKLY MAGAZINE IF TAX CONCESSIONS TO "TIME" AND "READERS'S DIGEST" WITHDRAWN

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, if under section 19 of the Income Tax Act tax privileges are withdrawn from Time and Reader's Digest publications, has the Secretary of State been informed that a Canadian owned national magazine publication will come on the market immediately on a weekly basis?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think the most precise answer I can give the hon. member is as he knows, having canvassed this situation quite exhaustively last night in the committee, that I have been told by reliable sources that in fact there are two groups looking at this matter, one of them very seriously, as well as a certain number of others, but the state of their examination is not as developed as in the case of the two I mentioned.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, is this on the assumption that were these privileges to be withdrawn enough advertising revenue would be directed to a Canadian publication to make it viable on a weekly basis?

Mr. Faulkner: Yes. The argument has been developed that if the exemptions were eliminated, and this $17 million in advertising revenue was thrown open, a substantial part of it would relocate, to the support of a Canadian news weekly, but that would obviously depend on the quality of the news weekly, the time of its publication and other like questions which are difficult to be too definite about.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT SUPPORT OF WILDLIFE ORGANIZATIONS IN COURT ACTION TO STOP GARRISON DIVERSION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I bring to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs a matter of immediate and serious concern, namely the fact that the United States irrigation scheme known as the Garrison diversion will, according to the Canadian Wildlife Federation, and its national president, Mr. Orville Erickson, have the effect of increasing the salinity of two Manitoba rivers, add to the polution of a third and speed the process of eutrophication of Lake Winnipeg with its large fishing industry. As the government has apparently decided not to intervene, will the minister make a statement on this matter, indicating particularly that because 200,000 Canadian sportsmen desire to take legal action the government will consider providing counsel and assistance through the Minister of Justice to this federation, thereby enabling the question to be brought before the courts for determination in the interests of our country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman refers to the Garrison diversion. The Canadian government has, of course, taken a position on this matter, indicating through an exchange of notes with the United States government, and through discussions which made the point very strongly, that Canada does not accept any injury to its waters from any such diversion. That is the general position. In respect of the particular point raised by the right hon. gentleman, I will be happy to consider it and provide an answer at a later date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I approve of the stand taken by the government of Canada which apparently has been cavalierly brushed aside by the government of the United States. The project is now being launched in a way that cannot possibly be prevented unless action in the courts is taken. I am glad of the assurance of the minister that he is going to look into this matter because one-fifth of a million Canadian sportsmen cannot be wrong.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PRICE OF ANTIFREEZE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION—SUGGESTED PUBLIC DENIAL OF POSSIBLE SHORTAGE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the price of automobile antifreeze now ranges all the way from $7 to $11 a gallon, would the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicate whether his department is investigating or intends to investigate the reason for this price spread.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this matter has been under consideration. It seems that the main reason for the price increase is the world shortage of ethylene. I know that several representations have been made to ensure that the Canadian public will not suffer from excessive price increases. For the information of the hon. member I would say there is no reason to believe that there will be a shortage of this product this winter, but we ought to tell consumers to watch prices and be sure that such prices will be reasonable.

[English]

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the public generally was led to believe that the reason for the price increase and the price spread was due to shortages, and in view of the admission by officials of the industry both nationally and at the local level that there will be no shortages, would the minister give specific details of that investigation in order to satisfy the public that price fixing did not take place?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, some provincial authorities have already made statements to this effect, in particular the responsible minister in the Quebec government. If the hon. member wants further information, I shall be glad to provide it as soon as possible.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FORT GARRY HOTEL, WINNIPEG—ALLEGATION OF EMBEZZLEMENT BY CHIEF ACCOUNTANT—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. On radio station CJOB in Winnipeg this morning investigative reporter Peter Warren charged that the chief accountant at the Fort Garry Hotel in Winnipeg has embezzled at least $23,000 from the hotel through credit card manipulations. Will the Prime Minister launch an immediate investigation into this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With the greatest respect, I have the utmost difficulty in trying to relate that matter to the jurisdiction of a minister in this House.

An hon. Member: He doesn't stay there.

Mr. McKenzie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Fort Garry Hotel comes under the jurisdiction of the Canadian National Railways, which is a direct responsibility of the Minister of Transport. Mr. Warren has also charged that there is poor security and poor accounting procedures at CN hotels, and that there have been no proper audits conducted for the past seven years. These are very serious charges and I do not think we can ignore them.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): I will take notice of the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

SITE OF HEAVY WATER PLANT IN WESTERN CANADA—DATE OF COMPLETION OF FEASIBILITY STUDY

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the previous parliament the minister indicated that a feasibility study would be launched respecting the siting of a heavy water plant in western Canada. I should like to ask the minister whether that report has been finalized, and when he is considering the publication of that report.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I think that the correct description of the situation would be that when the demand for additional supplies of heavy water has reached the point at which a further plant is required, a site in western Canada would be favoured. Atomic Energy of Canada have given attention to this in general terms but since at the moment the demand has not reached that point, there is no immediate study of the kind implied in the hon. gentleman's question which will be coming forward at an early date. It is really a question of general availability and the comparative benefits of the sites in both Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Oral Questions

BASIS OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON OIL TANKER ROUTE THROUGH STRAITS OF JUAN DE FUCA

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the minister's statement in the House on October 10 that discussions are continuing between Canadian and American officials regarding oil tankers on the west coast of British Columbia and in view of Premier Barrett's statement that negotiations with the United States are carried out on the basis that an oil spill is inevitable, can the minister advise the House whether the government has concluded that it is unrealistic to expect the Americans to abandon their plan to bring oil tankers through the Straits of Juan de Fuca?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: Is Mitch showing you how to fight?

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise us whether continuing discussions to which he referred on October 10 relate to the removal of tanker traffic from the Straits of Juan de Fuca, or do they relate only to the prevention and clean up of oil spills?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian approach is twofold in this connection. One is to undertake contingency planning in the way of developing an environmental plan applicable in the future. The second aspect is to search for alternatives by which American supplies can be guaranteed. Both of these are proceeding simultaneously. We believe that it is quite important to make the necessary contingency planning in any event with respect to the environment, but the two approaches are being simultaneously pursued.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CONTINGENCY PLAN AND EQUIPMENT TO DEAL WITH OIL SPILL ON COAST OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. Can the minister tell the House what if any contingency plans and equipment are in readiness and are planned in the event of a major oil spill in Georgia Straits or the Straits of Juan de Fuca?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Contingency plans do exist in my ministry and in the Ministry of Transport for this kind of unfortunate accident.

Mr. Friesen: Would the minister then table not only the plans but an inventory of the kind of equipment in case of such contingencies arising?

Mrs. Sauvé: I think it would be difficult to table existing contingency plans but the Ministry of the Environment has a rather complex retrieval system for all the equipment which exists in Canada, where it is, at what time and with what speed it can be brought to the scene of an accident.

[Mr. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines

Mr. Baldwin: Like a glacier.

CAPABILITY OF EQUIPMENT TO DEAL WITH OIL SPILL ON COAST OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. Can the minister advise the House whether, in the opinion of the government, the present equipment available is capable of containing and cleaning up a major oil spill such as would occur if one of the oil tankers from Alaska should spill its oil load?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): It is difficult for me to say whether the equipment that does exist now would be sufficient in a hypothetical situation. We have continuing studies on the improvement of existing equipment and I think the greatest difficulty occurs when waves and sea conditions interfere with the usefulness of the kind of equipment we have now.

POSSIBILITY OF FUNDING MUNICIPALLY OPERATED STOREFRONT OFFICES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the government's commendable proposal to open storefront offices in urban areas for consumer services, could the minister advise the House whether or not he has still under consideration the funding, in part at least, of municipally operated storefront offices or consumer offices to augment the service that is being provided in the department? I have particularly in mind the one in the township of Nepean which is a forerunner of its kind and for which an application for funding is still outstanding.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will consider the question. The suggestion seems quite interesting, but I must admit to the hon. member that unfortunately the budget of my department for that kind of operation is quite limited and as hon. members opposite have suggested on several occasions that the federal government should restrict its expenses, it makes my task still more difficult.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to thank the minister very much for that answer and I want him to understand that our application was very limited as well.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEVEL OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON PROPOSED OIL TANKER ROUTE THROUGH STRAITS OF JUAN DE FUCA

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it is related to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South. In view of the minister's statement in the House that discussions are continuing, would he advise us if those discussions are taking place at the ministerial level or if only officials of his department have been carrying on these negotiations with the United States?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at present the discussions in pursuit of the objectives which I have mentioned, at least in the last two months, have been carried out at the official level. Further discussions are proposed in the course of the next few months to continue developing the measures that are now under consideration. I believe these discussions have been useful, and if necessary, they will be conducted at a higher level.

PARTICIPATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN DISCUSSION ON SUPPLYING NATURAL GAS TO STATE OF WASHINGTON AND FINDING ALTERNATIVE TO OIL TANKER ROUTE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): In view of the fact that British Columbia has recently entered bilateral discussions with the state of Washington concerning the supply and price of natural gas, would the minister advise the House whether there was any federal participation in those discussions or any co-ordination of those discussions in terms of the energy supplied to the state of Washington with a view to finding an alternate route to the Juan de Fuca route? In other words, has this government in fact entered into quid pro quo discussions, or have Canadian concessions been offered to avoid that route which is entirely within American jurisdiction?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In answer to the first part of the question, the discussions that have been undertaken with respect to the supply of gas to the United States from British Columbia have been co-ordinated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and conducted with the full knowledge of my department. In answer to the second part of the question, there have been attempts, which have not yet been successful, to provide adequate supplies to the refineries which would eventually be supplied by the tankers, but they have not been successful because no alternative supply is visible at this point.

DRUGS

GOVERNMENT EFFORTS TO PUBLICIZE HARMFUL EFFECTS OF MARIJUANA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that many Canadians now feel that this government, by relaxing its regulations on the importation of marijuana, is obviously paving the way for approval of the use of this drug, can the minister explain what steps if any his government is taking to make the harmful effects of marijuana known to the youth of this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will get acquainted with the position of the government when a bill is introduced on the matter. I have already clearly indicated that the government position will remain that stated by my predecessor in 1972. As for the specific question asked by the hon. member, I remind him that the program on the non-medical use of drugs has been in operation in my department for several years and that several million dollars are earmarked each year for the control of the non-medical use of drugs.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN LEGISLATIVE PROVISIONS DEALING WITH USE OF MARIJUANA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice on the same matter. In view of the growing number of reports as outlined in the most responsible United States medical journals, on the harmful effects of marijuana use, can the minister offer any reason or explanation for contemplating relaxing the penalties for importing marijuana and for removing the importation of marijuana from the Criminal Code? Also, is the minister not aware that his most recent steps have amounted to a virtual government sanction of the importation of this harmful drug?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I would say most emphatically that the hon. member is misstating the situation. Offences in relation to marijuana are not presently contained in the Criminal Code but are in the Narcotics Control Act. The contemplated action is to remove them from the Narcotics Control Act, where they are associated with the harder drugs, to the Food and Drug Act but to retain the offence of possession. The bill which will be introduced in the House will deal in other ways with the various penalties and I think hon. members will have adequate opportunity at that time to express views on it.

ALLEGED MISUSE OF CANADIAN AID TO DROUGHTSTRICKEN AFRICAN COUNTRIES—POSSIBLE CONTROL MEASURES

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that Canada will be contributing some $230 million within the next five years to assist the six countries of Africa's droughtstricken Sahel region, and in view of the fact that some very serious doubts have been raised about the proper management of these funds in Africa, has the minister developed any control measures to ensure that they are expended in proper fashion and if so, what type of controls has he considered?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the hon. gentleman's question with respect to the misuse of funds in the Canadian aid program. In connection with the areas to which he refers, the normal controls exercised by the CEDA organization are in force in these countries. We are also making a special effort to derive from the countries themselves some greater input into the proper use of the funds. The hon. gentleman has drawn his concern to my attention and I will be happy to look at the matter with more care.

Is the report that Mr. Justice Bayda will make on labour relations between grain handling co-operatives and the unions expected to be the first move in a government plan to nationalize the grain handling system, a move that is the subject of increasing speculation on the prairies?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker. The investigation to which Mr. Justice Bayda has been appointed is strictly related to the terms of reference as indicated by my colleague the Minister of Labour.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSITION OF CANADA ON PARTICIPATION OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION IN UNITED NATIONS DEBATE ON MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of Canada's position on the admission of the Palestinian Liberation Organization to participation in the United Nations Middle East debate, can the minister tell the House whether Canada accepts the legitimacy of this gang of self-confessed murderers and terrorists?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the vote which my hon. friend mentions with respect to the participation of the PLO in the plenary session of the United Nations was placed by Canada in a consistent policy of abstaining when this issue has been before either the United Nations or the agencies. I want to make it clear therefore, that there has been absolutely no change of policy in this respect. My predecessor and the Prime Minister have stated more than once as Canadian policy, that the Palestinians have rights in the over-all peace efforts that will be undertaken for the Middle East—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —and that the Palestinian people ought to be represented in one form or another at peace negotiations. With respect to the PLO itself, the Canadian explanation made it clear that the Canadian government did not wish to prejudge the form of the representation of the Palestinian people at any such conference. In fact, the Canadian explanation recorded firmly, and without ambiguity, Canada's refusal to prejudge both whether the PLO should be one of, or the only, representative of the Palestinians. We have taken the consistent position that this matter should be settled among the parties concerned.

Mr. Hees: You are getting more like Mitch and Paul every day.

Mr. MacEachen: That is a good tradition.

SUGGEST REVIEW OF ACTIVITIES OF FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING BOARD AND POSSIBLE RELOCATION OF TRANSCONA PLANT

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. Would the minister undertake immediately to review the activities of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Board and in particular the operations at the Transcona processing plant with the view to relocating the Transcona facilities or constructing additional plants in Selkirk and/or Gimli?

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I would of course undertake to review any suggestion made by hon. members. We are having some labour difficulties at the Transcona plant at the moment but I hope they will be resolved. As for the possibility of relocating, I will look into this matter but I would not offer the hon. member very much hope at the moment.

PERCENTAGE OF FISH FROM SELKIRK PROCESSED BY TRANSCONA PLANT

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on this subject. Could the minister tell the House the amount or the percentage of fresh fish that comes out of Selkirk to the Transcona plant?

Hon. Allan J. EXPORT OF WATER TO UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF FORMER MINISTER'S POSITION ON EXPORT OF WATER

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of what has happened with regard to Lake Michigan, the Garrison dam, the Skagit, and so on, does the minister intend to initiate discussions with the United States on this and other projects? Also, can she explain the former minister's statement, to this effect:

> Lest it appear that the present government is playing a dog-in-the manger role with Canada's water resources, let me make it clear that we have been active both on the international and federal-provincial fronts, taking positive action—

What action is that or was that?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the exact position to which my predecessor was referring. Any matter which arises between Canada and the United States concerning transboundary waters is dealt with through the appropriate existing mechanisms.

Mr. Wenman: What are they?

Mrs. Sauvé: In particular, the International Joint Commission.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FACILITATE DELIVERY THIS WINTER—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT AID IN REPLACING SNOWPLOWS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the reference in the Speech from the Throne to steps which will be taken to facilitate grain handling this winter, does the government intend to bring forward legislation in this regard or, alternatively, is the minister prepared to make an immediate definitive statement about steps to be taken to facilitate grain deliveries?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not anticipate that steps for facilitating immediate grain delivery will require legislation, neither do I anticipate making a definitive statement at this time. We are examining a variety of steps which will be taken to improve our transportation capacities throughout the winter in order to assure that the full amount of grain we want to move can be moved to port.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the president of the railway employees union earlier this month said that all CNR snowplows are at least 30 years old and need replacing, does the minister contemplate making any contribution or becoming involved in the replacement or provision of snow removal equipment and the like?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there is no intention at present on the part of the government to spend money directly in connection with both of those matters.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR ABSTENTION FROM VOTE IN UNITED NATIONS ON PALESTINIAN RESOLUTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary and directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It relates to the abstention of Canada from the vote on the Palestinian resolution. That having been done without parliament having had anything to say about it, which was a slap in the face for Israel, why was it the other day, when I endeavoured to raise this and have it discussed in the House, that Liberal members including a member of the cabinet said "no" and denied unanimous approval for discussion of something that has placed the Jewish people in a shameful position.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful to mention that the vote which Canada registered at the United Nations—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Abstained from, you mean.

Mr. MacEachen: —which was registered, was in company with a good number of other friendly and responsible powers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the United States?

Mr. MacEachen: In no sense was it intended that the abstention, as suggested by my right hon. friend, would put Israel in any disadvantageous position. The Canadian policy with respect to Israel is well known to my right hon. friend and has not changed—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is bi-focal.

Mr. MacEachen: —by one iota by that vote and the right hon. gentleman knows that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the unusual capacity of the minister to read what is in somebody else's mind. May I tell him he is so mistaken because, always, the policy has been pretense toward the Jews in Canada in the face of stands taken opposed to Israel in the United Nations.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED REQUIREMENT OF NUTRIENT ANALYSIS ON LABELS OF ALL PROCESSED FOODS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of current problems concerning food and food costs, has the minister's department considered requiring that all processed foods for human consumption carry a guaranteed analysis on the label?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I recently announced tentative regulations made public some ten days ago to provide for increased nutritive content in many food stuffs. These regulations have been proposed and are now being dscussed with both the industry and all those concerned before they are made official. They will bring up substantially the nutritive content standards presently applicable on many food products. If the hon. member is interested, I will send him a copy of these draft regulations.

[English]

Mr. Malone: My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. First, may I say that I am pleased with the answer given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. However, since the federal Department of Agriculture requires processed feed supplements fed to pets and domestic animals to carry a guaranteed nutrient analysis, will the minister assure us that he will share these views with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I ask this because it is important to know the percentage and nutrient value of additives, if human foodstuffs are to have the importance that we give to domestic animal feeds.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I are always concerned about the health of the nation. The hon. member can be sure that we are very concerned and will try to make sure such things are looked after, as we generally do.

GRAIN

IMPORTANCE OF RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT TO PRODUCERS—SUGGESTED DISCUSSION WITH MINISTER OF TRANSPORT ON LIFTING FREEZE

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. As the freeze on rail line abandonment will end on December 31 this year and as the whole question of rail line abandonment is of vital concern to prairie grain producers and residents of the prairies, will the minister advise the House whether he has held discussions with the Minister of Transport and whether discussions have been or will be held with the railways prior to lifting the freeze?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, very lengthy discussions are being held between the government and the railways. In addition, my colleague, the Minister of Transport, is this weekend speaking with the ministers interested in this aspect of transportation from the western provinces, with a view to determining the appropriate course of action we should take as the January 1 date approaches. We have also received recommendations from the Canada Grains Council which has taken a serious and hard look at this question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO REDUCTION IN NATO FORCES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Prime Minister. In his absence may I address it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday, when replying to the member for South Shore, the Prime Minister said that he did not intend to take steps next week in Europe which would lead to a withdrawal of our NATO forces in that area. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs enlarge somewhat on that answer and assure the House that it is government policy not to reduce or withdraw our NATO forces in Europe for any reason in the next two years?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government with respect to NATO has been frequently stated. It exists and if there is any change in that policy, it will be announced in the House. But the policy stands.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I did not finish my speech last evening and I called it ten o'clock. It may have been that Madam Speaker did not hear me, because she recognized another hon. member. I think I should be the first speaker today.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the House would agree to allow the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) to conclude his remarks.

Som hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, last night I stated that I agreed with the general principle of this bill, but found there were serious problems respecting its administration. I wish to speak for a few moments about the necessity of bringing forward bills like this. The obvious reason is that there has been in the past few years a great change in the capital markets of this country. I think it can be said that in the past money was largely saved and lent in the community in which it was generated. A survey of businesses taken 25 years ago in the community of Dauphin would show they were started with money raised locally. In other words, local capital assisted local business. However, this is no longer the case. We expect the government to step in and provide capital. This is necessary because the practice of registered retirement savings funds, employees pension funds, annuities, mutual funds, and so on, have contributed to the pooling of capital in the large commercial centres of this country. This has been a significant factor in the urbanization of our country.

The time has come to take a second look at the formation and pooling of capital in this country. It is interesting to note that the Investment Dealers Association of Canada recommended to the government the introduction of a plan similar in concept to the registered retirement savings plan and the assisted home ownership plan, both of which are tax deferral savings types of plans. This points up the fact that we are continuing to accept a tax system which is basically a pitch against savings and in favour of spending. Our tax system is a deterrent to saving. A good tax structure should generate enough savings after the payment of taxes to carry on the country's business. The fact that we are involved in this situation shows that our economy is not being run well enough to generate the savings which are necessary for our continued growth.

Much of our inflation can be attributed to government spending. This is made possible by the capacity of the tax system to generate revenue at rates in excess of those projected. The government seems to be caught on a treadmill. They believe that in order to encourage Canadians to save, they must allow them to do it on a pre-tax basis. That is one reason this bill has been brought forward. This measure has been necessitated by the failure of our savings system to provide capital for small businesses. Small business needs much more than this bill in order to be viable. It is caught up in government regulations, labour relations and the fact that it is becoming increasingly difficult to run a small business.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to address myself to the bill to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank. As all hon. members know, the proposed bank is to take over the functions of the present Industrial Development Bank. The Industrial Development Bank has been of benefit to Canadians and others in the establishment of small, medium, and in some cases large businesses in this country when conventional funding has not been available. There are some thoughts I wish to put on record so the minister will have an opportunity to study them before he appears before the committee.

It would be useful to have the allotment of loans in number and amount broken down into more detail than is provided on pages 14 and 15 of the 1973 annual report of the Industrial Development Bank. When this matter goes to committee, the minister and his support staff should indicate the number of applications approved and the number of loans made in each category from zero to $10,000, $10,000 to $20,000, and each $10,000 range through to $100,000, as well as $100,000 to $250,000.

My concern is that many people believe the Industrial Development Bank lends money to large industries rather than small businesses. The average loan made last year was in the neighbourhood of $48,000. Perhaps it would be appropriate to study this aspect of the bank to ensure that loans are being made to small, individual businesses in Canada.

There has been concern in my constituency, and I understand in other parts of the country, about the amount of red tape involved and the material required by the Industrial Development Bank. I presume the documentation required by this foster child, the Federal Business Development Bank, will also be too onerous for the small business borrower. To prepare the material for a loan of $10,000 to $12,000 requires lawyers and accountants. This eats up a goodly portion of the money borrowed. It is self-defeating to a degree because the whole of the money borrowed does not go into the business; it is eaten up by professional and other studies to determine whether the loan should be made.

It would be appropriate if the regulations under which the proposed bank will carry out its mandate called for less detailed information for small loans and proportionately more for large loans. It would cost less to provide a small amount of information in applying for a small loan, and proportionately more for a greater amount of information required for a large loan.

The Industrial Development Bank is referred to as a bank of last resort; it is a bank for people who have been turned down by conventional lending agencies, trust companies, finance companies, and so on. These are the people who end up at the door of the Industrial Development Bank. This would indicate that applicants were turned down by the conventional lending sources because those institutions were not prepared to take the risk. It therefore appears that the government, by funding the Federal Business Development Bank, is providing money for more venturesome risk enterprises. This is good, and I believe all Canadians appreciate the fact that the government is making these funds available.

In the past, the Industrial Development Bank has been, possibly, too concerned about getting adequate collateral for the loans it has made. It wanted the entire business establishment as collateral, plus an arm and a leg of the principal shareholders, in addition to any other movable or non-movable asset that could be found. In fact, they required more by way of collateral and guarantee than the conventional financial institutions. I hope the officials of the new bank will adopt an easier attitude toward requirements for collateral and personal guarantees, while still using their best business judgment.

There is another matter which concerns me. The federal government is now, of course, involved in lending money to Canadian business to assist the establishment and development of business enterprises in this country. Members in all quarters of the House applaud this decision though in effect it is a housekeeping measure, renaming and redirecting an existing institution.

[Mr. Dick.]

It should be borne in mind that the conventional lending institutions in Canada, including trust companies and chartered banks, have earned for themselves a strong reputation of helping to finance the sell-out of Canada to foreigners. This has been well documented. I believe most members of this House are aware of instances in which small Canadian firms desiring to expand have had their applications for loans declined by conventional lending institutions. Unfortunately, in these circumstances it frequently happens that United States firms are interested in buying them out or acquiring control. Then if the United States companies turn to the same financial institutions, they find they can get the loans which were denied the original Canadian applicants. This is most unfortunate.

I believe Canadian banks and financial institutions should be playing a more active social role in the development of Canada by and for Canadians. I hope that when the Bank Act comes up for review, a strong, hard look is taken at the way in which the banks in particular are hindering the development of Canada by Canadians. Perhaps there should be forced upon them by the government some restructuring of their philosophy. I am not a person who wants to meddle in business affairs because I believe business can handle itself as a general rule. On the other hand, the government was elected by the people of Canada to provide guidelines within which business should be allowed to operate.

There are one or two statistics I should like to cite in this connection, figures taken from the November, 1970, issue of the Survey of International Business, an official publication of the United States Department of Commerce; they may be somewhat out of date now, but they are nonetheless of interest. They show that in 1963, United States affiliates in Canada generated no less than 83 per cent of their financial requirements in Canada itself, and only 12 per cent in the United States, and that by 1969 the amount of capital generated in Canada had risen to 93 per cent, leaving only 7 per cent to be imported from south of the border. This means, of course, that Canadian institutions are supplying the funds needed by United States affiliates.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we should do well to consider what Canadians are thinking about foreign ownership in Canada. A poll was taken in the spring of this year by the Gallup organization, the question being: would you favour, or oppose, legislation which would significantly restrict or control further foreign investment in Canada? Nationally, 69 per cent of the Canadian people favoured legislation to control the expansion of foreign ownership. The region in which an affirmative vote was lowest was Quebec, where 54 per cent of those polled were in favour of the legislation. In Atlantic Canada, the figure was 69 per cent; in Ontario, 72 per cent; on the prairies, 71 per cent; and in British Columbia, 77 per cent. This establishes clearly enough that Canadian citizens wish the government and parliament to give directions and guidelines which would increase Canadian control and restrict foreign ownership of the economy.

All parties in this House pay lip service to the merits of Canadian ownership; they favour the idea that Canadian lending institutions should promote Canadian ownership to a far greater extent than at present. Well, we are now setting up a financial institution to be funded by the government of Canada out of moneys contributed by the taxpayer to the consolidated revenue fund. Yet there is no word in the bill before us which would keep it in line with the intent of Canadians as expressed through polls and by spokesmen from all parties in this House.

I suggest, therefore, that the minister in charge of this bill should himself propose an amendment during the committee stage, one which I believe would prove acceptable to everyone in the committee. What is more, I believe it would be endorsed by the entire Canadian community. What I am suggesting is an amendment to clause 4(1) or to some other clause as might be required. For example, "The objects of the corporation are to promote and assist in the establishment and development of business enterprises in Canada as long as the said business enterprises are owned by Canadian citizens, or landed immigrants within the meaning of the Immigration Act, or a Canadian company, 51 per cent of which is owned by Canadian citizens or landed immigrants". I think that within the scope of the legislation as now drafted, the fact that an application can be made by a foreign company to use the funds of the bank to foster further purchases of Canada by non-residents is regrettable, and I believe an amendment of this nature would be appreciated and accepted by all parties in this House.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to be negative in my approach to foreign investment in Canada. We know we need foreign investment in this country. But it would be much better for Canadians if this investment were financed by money from outside our borders rather than by using our own resources to buy us out.

If an amendment such as I have proposed is put forward and carried in committee or at report stage, it would also have another beneficial aspect; it would make the entire resources of the new Federal Business Development Bank available to Canadians or to landed immigrants who own Canadian companies. In other words, instead of 50 per cent ownership being held by Canadians and 50 per cent by foreign-controlled enterprises or foreign nationals, Canadian ownership would be 100 per cent. It would be money that the government is willing to lend Canadians to help make Canada grow and to build up Canadian ownership of our economy. I, for one, think this would be a very advantageous step.

Some people might say that the government should not involve itself in business decisions. May I point out that the government of this country, as sanctioned by parliament and the people, have already directed themselves in this matter. Today the government are requiring Canadian content in television and radio broadcasting. They have already instigated legislation, now the law of the land, requiring a certain percentage of Canadian ownership in our banks and certain financial institutions. They already require that our uranium companies remain under Canadian control. I think it would be very beneficial to the country and to the bank if this small restriction were imposed. I do not think it would send any shock waves or tidal waves through the business community, but it would guarantee that all the funds of the new Federal Business Development Bank would be available to Canadian citizens and Canadian-owned companies to enable us to own more of this great land of ours.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make a few brief remarks in connection with the Federal Business Development Bank. In looking over the bill, I note that in clause 4(2) the following is provided:

> The corporation in carrying out its objects shall give particular consideration to the needs of small business enterprises.

I think that is an important consideration. There is a need to finance small business in Canada, particularly in western Canada where we do not have, at least in my own province of Saskatchewan, the large type of corporation. I note no interpretation is given of the term "small business enterprise" and I think it would be valuable if such an interpretation were provided in the bill. I also welcome the provisions in the bill pertaining to the managerial advice that might be given to businesses, in the form of counselling and training. This will be welcomed by small businessmen who do not have access to the kind of information and training that is necessary to properly carry on such business.

The basic effect of this bill is to transfer the functions of the Industrial Development Bank from the Bank of Canada to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which I look upon with mixed feelings. Generally speaking, I would think that the Bank of Canada would look upon a business loan in a businesslike way, whereas I am concerned about the kind of bureaucratic build-up that is occurring in many of our government departments today. I hope that by putting the Federal Business Development Bank under the portfolio of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce we will not end up with a bureaucratic nightmare.

I also hope that the board will develop a policy and use the facilities of the bank for the general interest of all Canada, and that it will not be used as a means of furthering the interests of one region of Canada as opposed to another. When the IDB came into being a few years ago, it was initially very popular among the business community in my constituency and was welcomed. But in recent times the IDB has been used less and less. In the province of Saskatchewan, people have been turning to the provincial government organization known as SEDCO—the Saskatchewan Economic Development Corporation.

This situation has concerned me somewhat because SEDCO sometimes requires the transfer or sale to it of certain of the capital stock of the corporation it is lending money to, with the result that the government is getting its fingers into the pie. It is not taking such shares as security for the loan but, rather, is taking them as a condition of making the loan, and the government remains one of the owners of the small business concerned.

I suggest that one of the reasons there has been a movement away from the IDB is that a great deal of documentation is required before a loan is approved. This sometimes takes several months, and businessmen are not always in a position to wait several months for a decision. If a businessman is developing a new business, he is not in a position to wait this length of time, in view of the weather conditions in my part of the country. Not only is lengthy documentation required, but as my learned friend who spoke before me mentioned, assets are tied up, including one's arms and legs. The IDB requires stringent personal guarantees and there are many other restrictions. Having talked to accountants in my own constituency, I am convinced this is one reason small businessmen have not been using the IDB.

I believe the lending policies of the Federal Business Development Bank should be economical and that the amount of accounting and legal work should be at a minimum. I believe that the requirement for security should not be restrictive. I hope this will prove to be a bank that businessmen will be able to go to and get a decision as to whether a loan will be approved without undue delay, with the result they will know where they stand.

I have nothing further to add except that I am in support of the bill and will follow with interest the progress of this bank, over the years.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

EXPORT-DEVELOPMENT ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE AUTHORIZED SHARE CAPITAL, CLARIFY DEFINITIONS AND POWERS

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-9, to amend the Export Development Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I understand the minister is going to speak for the government.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I had assumed that there would be unanimity in respect of second reading and reference to the committee, but if hon. members would like some indication of the scope of the bill, I should be pleased to make a few remarks. The purpose of this bill to amend the Export Development Act is to encourage further expansion and diversification of Canada's foreign trade. The impact of these measures will be particularly significant for Canada's capital goods manufacturing and service industries. It is through the development of these industries, to which continuing export markets are so vital, that we can in turn foster the development of Canadian industrial technology and employment opportunities.

Let me also emphasize at this juncture that the size of the financial resources needed is determined not by the control or ownership of the supplier Canadian company or by the financial strength of the foreign borrower-buyer. The size of the financial resources needed is determined by two factors: (a), the vitality and entrepreneurship of Canadian businessmen, big and small, who have identified and are going after export opportunities. Small Canadian businessmen and small Canadian businesses participate as direct beneficiaries in a major way through the operations of the Export Development Corporation. And (b), by the kind of competitive financing provided to their foreign competitors by the government institutions of their foreign competitors.

We are trying to upgrade our raw materials prior to export to assure that the value added in the upgrading process takes place in Canada. We are also striving to increase the export of Canadian manufactured goods for the same reasons. If we are to be successful, the market opportunities for the products of our capital goods industries must be attacked on an internationally competitive basis.

Continued growth and competitiveness of the capital goods and service industries is crucial to the health of the Canadian economy. Hon. members are all aware that Canada has one of the fastest growing labour forces in the industrialized world and one of the largest export sectors, relative to the whole economy, among industrialized countries. The capital goods industries provide many jobs for Canadians either directly or through the demand for components and raw materials. A healthy and growing capital goods industry will be an important element in the continuing implementation of job-creation policies.

In addition to these ongoing needs, should there be a contraction in foreign demand and more intensive international competition in the export markets, a strong export development program will be an essential element in maintaining Canada's international competitiveness and the employment that would be the result.

The Export Development Corporation is a Crown corporation whose purpose is to facilitate and develop export trade by the provision of export-oriented financial facilities. It was established in 1969 as the successor of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. The functions of the corporation are: to make loans to foreign buyers of Canadian capital equipment and services on terms and conditions which are competitive with those offered by other major trading nations in support of their exporters; to insure Canadian firms against non-payment when Canadian goods and services are sold abroad; to guarantee financial institutions against loss when they are involved in financing an export transaction; to insure Canadians against loss of their investments abroad by reason of political actions.

Eighteen months ago, in April, 1973, the House passed amendments to the Export Development Act which provided for an increase in the ceiling on long-term loans and guarantees. At that time the minister of industry, trade and commerce said this was an interim measure and that a more comprehensive bill was being prepared. That comprehensive bill, Bill C-10, was presented to the House during the last parliament but was not considered because of dissolution. Bill C-9 which is presently before the House, with one minor technical change, is the same bill that was given first reading in the last session of parliament as Bill C-10. This technical change was made to avoid potential confusion between the application of the definition of "foreign customer" to the export credits insurance sections of the act versus the long-term financing sections of the act.

The main purpose of the bill, however, remains the same as Bill C-10, and again I commend it to the House. That is, to provide for increases in the corporation's financial ceilings in each of its areas of activity. These increases are required to sustain the expansion of successful Canadian exporter activity and it is intended that these increases serve the requirements of the Canadian exporting community for several years.

In addition, there are a number of technical and administrative amendments proposed, the purpose of which is to clarify some definitions and improve some administrative procedures where experience has shown that a change will enable the Export Development Corporation to serve Canadian exporters and investors more efficiently. I do not propose to deal with these administrative amendments in my remarks today but, rather, will leave them for more detailed elaboration in committee.

The export credits insurance facility applies mainly to exports of commodities, manufactured goods and services which are sold on short and medium credit terms; that is, up to five years. The present ceilings total $1 billion. This is made up of $500 million for the corporation's risk—sections 24 to 26—and $500 million for the government's risk—sections 27 and 28—the latter being for situations that are not normally appropriate for the corporation's account but which, in the opinion of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the cabinet, are in the national interest. It is proposed that the ceiling for each of these sections be raised from $500 million to $750 million, increasing the total export credit insurance facility from $1 billion to $1.5 billion.

When speaking of expanded EDC activity, attention is usually focused on the growth of its long-term lending. I shall be speaking of this shortly. But it is also important to realize that there has been important growth in the sector of exports covered by the insurance program. In 1973, the volume of exports insured was $565 million, more than double the amount of five years ago, and prospects are that the volume of coverage for 1974 will exceed $700 million. Consequently, there is need to increase the insurance ceilings to provide adequately for continued growth in the years ahead.

The facility for long-term loans and guarantees applies to exports of capital goods and services which customarily justify credit terms in excess of five years. The current ceilings total $1,950 million, made up of $1,500 million for section 29—corporate account—and $450 million for section 31—government account. It is proposed that these ceilings be raised from $1,500 million to $4,250 million for section 29, and from $450 million to $850 million for section 31, increasing the total lending ceiling from $1,950 million to $5.1 billion.

This increase may be startling to hon. members, and indeed it is one of major significance. The dimension of the increase is a function of two factors: a change in the definition of the ceiling and, more importantly, a reflection of the remarkable success of Canadian capital equipment and service suppliers in winning contracts abroad.

Hon. members may recall that last year there was considerable difficulty in comprehending exactly where the corporation stood in relation to its ceiling for long-term lending. This was because the ceiling as currently defined relates to notes outstanding and not, as we now propose, to signed loan agreements. The difficulty arises because notes become outstanding as the corporation makes disbursements, and this often extends for a very considerable period of time after the signing of a loan agreement; in some cases as long as five or six years. During that period the corporation is also receiving repayments on signed agreements, which reduces the gross amount of notes outstanding. Consequently, the net amount of notes outstanding that will ultimately result from a given level of signed financing agreements is, practically speaking, always less than the total amount of those signed agreements. Therefore, we are proposing to redefine the ceiling in terms of signed agreements net of repayments—a number which can instantly be ascertained and related without confusion to the ceiling.

The most important reason for increased ceilings, however, is the remarkable continuing success of our capital goods and services producers in winning overseas orders. These exporters include suppliers of engineering and technical services; transportation equipment such as ships, aircraft, locomotives and off-highway vehicles; telecommunications equipment; heavy duty electrical goods and power generation equipment, including our CANDU nuclear power system; foreign industries equipment; steel mills, and a variety of other items related to such areas as chemical pollution control and scientific research.

Our manufacturers have penetrated new foreign markets and developed a momentum of success which has resulted in the employment of a significant number of skilled Canadians. An essential element of this success has been the availability of internationally competitive long-term financing from EDC. During the 1960s, long-term financing averaged approximately $50 million a year, but in 1970 it reached $100 million. It has grown markedly in each subsequent year, and in 1973 signed loan agreements totalled $463 million.

Prospects for 1974 are that EDC's long-term lending will exceed $1 billion. This is expected to be made up of approximately $650 million under section 29, and some $400 million under section 31. This is an unprecedented level of capital goods export activity, but all current indications are that these levels can be sustained and in fact may grow in future years. Therefore, the levels of the new ceilings being proposed are necessary to accommodate this activity, and it is expected that they will provide a reasonable period of some three to five years before the ceilings may again have to be reviewed by parliament.

The need for the new ceilings is more urgent than might appear on the surface. The $1 billion of 1974 lending relates to projects which have been before EDC for a long period of time. In addition to this, there is more than another $1 billion in the pipeline at various stages of development. New projects continue to come forward every day. The point is that there is a long gestation period between an initial inquiry seeking confirmation of financing availability and the signing of an agreement. EDC is virtually committed against its present ceilings and difficulties could arise if new legislation is not forthcoming at this time. It is important to ensure that we do not risk disruption in the continuity of our capital goods export sales.

The foreign investment insurance program was established in 1969 and is the newest of EDC's facilities. The current ceiling is $150 million and it is proposed that this be increased to $250 million. At present, there are some $30 million of policies outstanding, with a further $125 million of projects under active consideration. The amount of the proposed increase in the ceiling is intended to provide for future requirements over at least a three-year period, and will facilitate the entry of Canadian firms into international joint ventures.

Such joint ventures are suited to Canadian commercial policy and the development policies of most foreign governments because local knowledge and capital supplied by resident partners can be blended with Canadian capital and engineering technology. In fact, in most countries today a joint venture is the only viable vehicle for facilitating Canadian investments in foreign markets. The joint venture ensures a foreign country of a real commitment on the part of Canadian engineers and management and protects the Canadian equity position.

An expanded foreign investment insurance service as provided by Bill C-9 will help to encourage and facilitate sound Canadian joint ventures in other countries. It is a fact of life that official support is provided by all major countries in support of their exports. These arrangements exist to make financial services available to cover risk and provide credit terms which are more favourable than the facilities normally available in the private sector. The existence of such official support means that Canadian exporters need the same package of financial services in order to compete effectively.

These services are needed because the foreign buyer considers both the commercial contract and the financial terms offered and then compares this over-all package to that offered by, for instance, the Japanese, the Americans or the French, all of whom provide substantial support for their exporters. Hon. members should be aware that lack of fully competitive export financing facilities in Canada would critically impair the ability of Canadian capital goods and services industry to compete internationally.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose for lunch I was just making the point that hon. members should be aware that lack of a fully competitive export financing facility in Canada would critically impair the ability of the Canadian capital goods and services industry to compete internationally.

It should be emphasized that the services of EDC are not provided to buy foreign orders with cheap financing; that is, EDC only matches foreign competition, it does not undercut it. EDC financing is only available for exporters who are thoroughly competitive on the commercial fundamentals of price, quality, delivery and after-sales services. With the continuing need in Canada to provide skilled employment, a healthy capital goods order book will be a valuable hedge against the possibility of contractions on foreign demand. In such a situation, the international competition for export orders will be intense. A strong EDC program will be an essential element in maintaining Canada's international competitiveness.

In the discharge of this very important function, EDC will work increasingly closely with the Canadian chartered banks and it is EDC policy to seek maximum private sector participation in a loan, consistent with providing internationally competitive financing.

The combination of private sector and EDC financing is structured in each case to match the financing offered by the official support institution of other competing countries. EDC lending is basically undertaken on the authority of its board of directors. The board of directors is composed of senior government officials as well as representatives of the Canadian private sector. EDC operates according to commercial criteria. It does not make imprudent loans to secure capital goods business at any cost. EDC requires that the terms of the loan be appropriate to the transaction and consistent with international practice, and that the project for which the loan is made is commercially viable. EDC is prudent in arranging for the security of its commitments and frequently obtains unconditional government or central bank guarantees of payment.

Hon. members are aware that the government's proposal for a Federal Business Development Bank—which was dealt with just before the present bill was introduced—is to assist small businesses in their domestic endeavours. We also have the program for export market development and, in addition, a complete range of EDC services to assist small businesses in their export activities. There is a very considerable degree of small business involvement with the export credits insurance program. At the end of 1973, 939 insurance policies were outstanding. Of this number, 727 were short-term relating mainly to sales of consumer goods, and 212 were issued for capital goods and services. Fifty-six per cent of the consumer goods policies were issued for an annual export sales volume of under $100,000, while 33 per cent of the capital goods policies were for sales of goods and services each under $100,000.

In addition to these insurance facilities, EDC also makes long-term loans or guarantees directly to foreign borrowers to finance exports of capital goods and services sold by small Canadian business. For instance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), announced earlier this year in Winnipeg that EDC made a loan of $500,000 to Poland for the purchase of pre-stressed concrete manufacturing equipment from Spiroll Corporation of Winnipeg.

As a further indication of EDC's ability and willingness to assist small business, the corporation—and this is a very recent decision of the board—will provide financing for capital projects irrespective of size, including those below $1 million, provided of course that the project warrants long-term financing on the basis of internationally accepted criteria. In the past, some hon. members have focused on this particular facility and alleged that, in dollar volume, few loans seem to have been made in support of sales by small businesses. When the situation is properly analysed, one realizes that long-term financing—that is, on terms in the range of 5 to 15 years—is generally appropriate, whether speaking domestically or internationally, for larger transactions.

I have pointed out that in the short and medium term credit areas, EDC is heavily involved with small business through its insurance program. This is not to say, however, that small business does not benefit importantly from the long-term financing facility. The exporter of record may often be a large firm located in a major industrial area, but the chain of sub-suppliers extends to all parts of Canada and down to the smallest of Canadian manufacturers. This effect is reinforced by EDC's minimum 80 per cent Canadian content policy. For instance, a CANDU nuclear power system sale would involve upward of 200 Canadian suppliers, with contracts ranging as low as $500.

Our success in sustaining high employment and meaningful growth over the longer term will depend on our success in stimulating the growth of the right kind of industries. For the 1980s and beyond, these are industries that do more than just create jobs. They must create jobs for an increasingly well trained labour force which, in turn, is essential in order to keep Canada in the forefront of high-technology industries. But it is these industries that more often than not depend on continuous access to foreign markets in order to stay competitive. Just one example is our engineering consultants. An increasing number of them are working all over the world, and indeed so they must if they are to stay pre-eminent in their fields. It is, of course, precisely in this sector of high-technology capital goods and services industries that EDC support is essential. If this support were withdrawn or curtailed in the interests of short-term considerations, the damage to our long-term development prospects would be out of all proprotion to whatever short-term benefits might be realized or thought to be realized.

To put it another way, either export markets are essential to the long-term well-being of a particular company, or not. Where they are essential, the company must maintain and try to expand its foothold in foreign markets on a continuing basis. International business is much too competitive to allow us the luxury to venture abroad when it is convenient, for instance when economic activity is slack at home, and to stay out of foreign markets when domestic demand is brisk.

Also, in considering an expanded rate of activity for the EDC at a time when inflationary pressures are still strong in Canada as elsewhere, it is important to differentiate between what economists are fond of calling macro-economic and micro-economic considerations. Anti-inflationary fiscal and monetary measures, to be effective, must affect the aggregate of economic activity. But it would be a serious mistake to attempt to further strengthen these measures by depriving individual companies of EDC support and, hence, of their ability to compete abroad. It is for this reason that I am proposing increases in EDC insurance, lending and guarantee ceilings that are quite substantial. The Canadian firms who utilize EDC's services continue to be required to meet stringent criteria relating to the benefit of an EDC-supported transaction to Canada and Canadian industrial development objectives.

Once an applicant meets these criteria, it would not make sense economically, nor would it be fair to individual exporters, if ceiling were set too low relative to expected demand. Of equal importance, the annual allocation of funds to EDC must of necessity reflect not only the trade opportunities available to our firms, and our long-term development objectives, but also the realities of domestic monetary and fiscal policies. Hon. members should appreciate that what is sought is a balance between the situation of the moment and the requirements of Canada's future.

In conclusion, let me emphasize that the Export Development Corporation has an essential role to play in the industrial development of Canada. The next few years are critical in this development, but they hold considerable opportunity to develop export markets as our own manufacturing industries build on the base of our resources. The provisions of this bill will ensure that the facilities of EDC are available to capitalize to the fullest extent the opportunities of the coming years.

Hon. members will recall that last year the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that a general review of the corporation's activity would be possible when this bill was brought forward. The House may consider that this should be done in the standing committee. The minister has indicated to me that he looks forward to that opportunity.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, would the minister accept a question? I was wondering if the minister could confirm, or otherwise, the present liability ceiling under section 29 of the act and referred to in section 30 of the existing act. Has the corporation stayed within that ceiling? What are the liabilities of the Export Development Corporation as of today?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, rather than answering that question off the cuff I would prefer to consider it carefully. There has been some confusion about our liabilities in terms of ceilings—whether they are net or gross, refer to loan agreements or to the sum total of notes issued to date. Rather than give an offhand answer, I prefer to seek advice.

● (1420)

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the principle of assisting exports by making loans to foreign customers who buy Canadian goods and services has long been supported by members in all parts of this House. In putting this principle into practice, the emphasis should be on helping small and medium-sized Canadian producers make export sales abroad because of their greater need for this kind of assistance. I think all hon. members agree that the big producers are far better able to arrange, through regular commercial channels, the financing necessary to make sales in the export field. Therefore, the chief objection which the official opposition finds in the legislation before the House is that it contains no provisions to make export financing available for orders of less value than $1 million.

I checked this recently with an official of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He has charge of these matters. He told me that this is not in the bill, but it is a corporate procedure followed by the Export Development Corporation and that in fact the Export Development Corporation does not provide export financing for orders below $1 million. This makes it impossible for small businesses to participate to the extent they should in obtaining export orders.

In the United States, the Export-Import Bank places no lower limit on the dollar value of a sale which it will assist. It carries out this kind of assistance by means of its Co-operative Financing Facility, which the Export-Import Bank outlines as follows. I quote from their operational directive:

> With its Co-operative Financing Facility (CFF) the Export-Import Bank of the United States helps make credit available to small and medium-size purchasers of U.S. equipment and related services through banks in their own countries.
> The CFF concept is simple: Eximbank arranges the co-operation of financial institutions (CIs) abroad to extend loans at their own risk to purchasers of U.S. exports. Eximbank in turn lends these CIs half the funds at a low rate of interest—currently 6 per cent per annum. The CIs provide the other half from their own resources.
> If a CI wishes to borrow its half of the financing, Eximbank can assist by guaranteeing repayment to another lender of these funds.
>
> The CFF accomplishes the following:
> It brings Eximbank financing to the doorsteps of small and medium-size enterprises that might not otherwise be able to purchase U.S. goods and services. All a buyer need do is call on a CI in his own area. The CI's familiarity with the customer's credit standing and local market conditions enables it to reach a decision quickly on the loan request.
>
> The CFF enables a CI to—
> 1. Broaden its lending capacity;
> 2. Increase its resources;
> 3. Develop new relations with existing customers; and > 4. Attract new ones.
> It helps U.S. suppliers expand their exports and services to enterprises which lack experience in financing overseas purchases. Many enterprises find working with their own bank the most convenient way to obtain their financing.

The next part is very important.

> There is no upper or lower limit to the size of an export loan within the agreed total.
> A cash payment by the CI's customer of 10 per cent is required for each transaction. Thus, Eximbank's portion of an export loan will equal 45 per cent of the export sale.

Thus, we see that by making use of the commercial banks in the countries concerned, the Export-Import Bank achieved two very important objectives. The first is that by having the local commercial bank cover half the loan, the capital which is made available by the government for assisting the export program can be spread over twice the volume of contracts which would otherwise be possible. The second benefit is that there is no need for a lower limit to the size of orders that can be handled, because the local bank investigates the credit worthiness of the proposed transaction and, because of its local knowledge of the applicant and the project for which the financing is requested, there is no problem in handling relatively small orders.

The program I have described has worked very satisfactorily in the United States for many years, and losses have been minimal. There is no reason why such a program will not work equally well in this country. It would provide a much needed service, which would greatly increase the ability of small and medium-sized Canadian producers to obtain export orders which are essential if production and employment are to keep up to a satisfactory level in this country. The benefits of such a program are obvious: it would bring increased employment, taxes and profits because of the additional business for this country.

In order to greatly assist small and medium-sized businesses to obtain export orders by the use of export financing, I intend when the bill reaches committee to move an amendment. This amendment will incorporate into the bill the original intention of parliament that there should be no discrimination against small and medium-sized businesses in the form of a floor below which credit terms are not available for potential export orders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: As hon. members know, and as I said earlier, the Export Development Corporation which this bill deals with has placed the lower limit at $1 million. This is the minimum order which it will finance. The second objection which the official opposition has to this bill is that in making export financing available, the government does not give preference to Canadian companies as opposed to large multinational corporations. These corporations, as every member of the House knows, can afford to provide the export financing they need through regular commercial channels. We believe that export financing, which is made available by the government should go primarily to Canadian companies, particularly to small and medium-sized companies. My very able and distinguished friend, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) will be dealing with specific aspects of these matters when he speaks later in the debate. I am sure he will do an excellent job, as he always does.

● (1430)

In conclusion, I say the time is long overdue for the government to stop expending its main efforts in helping big business which is well able to look after itself, and it should begin at long last to help small business which greatly needs this kind of assistance in order to expand and develop and thereby strengthen the whole of the Canadian economy. Knowing that all members of the House strongly support small business in its endeavours to expand and provide more jobs for our fellow Canadians, I very much hope that when I introduce in committee my amendment on behalf of the official opposition, it will receive strong support from all members of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin).

Mr. Drury: Perhaps before the hon. member for Greenwood speaks I could answer the question that was put to me by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister does not have the floor, but I am sure the House would give its consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drury: Under section 29, the amount of notes outstanding as at September 30, 1974, was $710 million, which compares to the existing ceiling of $1,500 million.

Mr. Stevens: May I put a further question to the minister, following that answer?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Again, the hon. member knows we are not in committee of the whole and our procedure can be only altered by consent. Does the hon. member for York-Simcoe have the consent of the House to ask a further question?

Mr. Brewin: Just one question.

Mr. Stevens: The minister has told us the amount of the notes outstanding. I asked what liabilities the corporation has agreed to undertake that is the actual wording of the section—not notes.

Mr. Drury: Since, unfortunately, there is some confusion as to the definition of the term "liabilities", I would suggest to the hon. member that this technicality would better be cleared up in committee rather than in the House.

Mr. Stevens: Still no answer.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the party that I represent will not oppose this bill nor delay it, despite some misgivings we have about it. First, I should like to state that I entirely share the sentiments expressed by the spokesman for the official opposition, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). I share his apprehension that the funds provided under this legislation will not go to small business. We think that is where they should go, because they are the people who need the money.

It must not be forgotten that this whole act embodies a scheme of subsidization. This may be necessary in a competitive world, but we think a close scrutiny of the scheme should be undertaken with a view to finding out who is getting the subsidy—whether or not the benefit of the subsidy is going to companies who need it. I believe there is far too much bastard socialism, if I may coin a phrase—

An hon. Member: That is what we say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brewin: —under which the government dispenses taxpayers' money to people who have no real need of it, people who are well fixed to carry on their undertakings without government assistance. I hope the particular form of subsidy under the legislation we are considering will receive close scrutiny in this regard. Again, I recognize that in the competitive system of trade which exists in the world today, Canada cannot be the one country which abstains from a form of subsidy, but I believe an attempt should be made to diminish its level under international agreement, even if it cannot be removed entirely. However, the main emphasis of what I have to say concerns a different subject. I want to talk about the political implications of the bill before us in the international world, rather than about its strictly economic effects.

Some two years ago the government put out a paper on foreign policy, listing a number of goals. One of these goals was economic growth, another was social justice and a third, I think, was peace and security. The provisions of this bill and, indeed, the objects of the department which produced it—the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—seem to be exclusively concerned with economic growth. We do not, of course, deny the importance of economic growth, but we do insist there are some issues of social justice which should take priority over economic growth, in the basic interests of our country as well as of the world as a whole.

In a speech he made in June to the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, in effect, that the basis of Canadian foreign policy would be considerations of a humanistic and compassionate nature. The right hon. gentleman spoke with extreme eloquence, and no doubt I have not captured his exact words. But what do we find in this bill? We find that loans are extended to countries without any consideration being given to the political consequences of so doing. If the minister were here, I imagine he would say that these considerations of a political nature are rigidly excluded from any judgment as to who should and who should not be given a loan. We think that this is wrong, and I should like to give an illustration.

• (1440)

A little more than one year ago, on September 11, 1973, a military coup took place in Chile. We believe that Canadian policy under this act may be used to bolster the regime which came into power at that time. Social justice was forgotten. Since the coup, a consistent pattern of violation of human rights and the total suppression of democratic institutions has developed in Chile.

Mr. Gillies: Four hundred per cent inflation.

Mr. Brewin: Exactly. Many of us have received personal and well documented accounts of the present reign of terror—arbitrary arrests, detention without trial, systematic torture, and summary executions. I could cite authorities, but I think they are well known—for example, Amnesty International and the International Commission of Jurists have made reports fully substantiating what I have said.

The Canadian government almost immediately—and perhaps it was within its rights to do so—recognized the military junta. The then minister said that recognition does not imply approval. But economic aid does imply approval. I believe that economic aid to the military junta in Chile in the form of grants, loans, credits and investments strengthens the position of an oppressive regime in that country.

The military junta has embarked upon a program of free enterprise. It seeks foreign investment. While it does, the cost of life's basic necessities rises uncontrollably. Wages and most incomes are controlled and depressed. Unemployment has multiplied as the result of mass firings and student expulsions. Trade unions and other means of representing the rights and needs of working people have been repressed and made illegal. So foreign aid enables this junta to continue its repressive policy.

Which international institutions are doing this? One of them is the Export Development Corporation which we are discussing today. As long ago as September, 1973, the same month as the coup, an export credit of $5 million was arranged for the purchase of de Havilland aeroplanes. This was not cancelled, though no deliveries had been made at the time of the coup. We would like an assurance from the minister at some stage that the Export Development Corporation is not going to continue a policy of financing repression and suppression of fundamental human rights by this sort of aid.

Then there is the question of private enterprise. I believe that part of this act is used to insure against loss of investments abroad through political risks. I do not know what is meant by "political risks", but it is a pretty broad definition, so evidently some political judgment is involved in granting this insurance. For example, it was recently announced that Falconbridge Nickel Mines were considering a $300 million investment in copper production in Chile. Well, I suppose that is their business. If that is what they want to do, then they should do it. But I do not think they need one dollar of support from the public treasury in making that investment in Chile, and I hope they are not getting it under the guise of some foreign insurance or foreign loan made available under concessions granted by this act.

The main point I am trying to make is that this act should not operate in isolation from other policies of the government. If the policy of the government, as the Prime Minister says, is based primarily on social justice, then considerations of social justice must come into the external operations of the Canadian government.

There must be adequate co-ordination between the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—a department which, by its very name, considers merely economic matters—and the Department of External Affairs, CIDA and other appropriate agencies, to ensure they are working together to build a better world, rather than using this agency to protect and sustain regimes that we abhor and which have been denounced by international tribunals.

These are the sort of doubts, difficulties and hesitations that we have about this type of legislation. It is not new legislation. The bill before us is amending legislation that increases the capital available. We do not think now is the time to seek to strike at the principle of the act, but we do urge the government to look into the questions I have raised and to give assurances to the House so that we can support what should be a program of assistance to small and medium-sized businesses in Canada to expand their exports. This principle is admirable and it has our support. But we do not want to find ourselves giving subsidies to people who do not need them, for purposes that we do not approve.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this bill I should first of all like to note for the record that I am very disappointed that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) did not think that this bill involving some $5 billion of lendable Canadian funds, justified his attendance in the House today.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on a point of order.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, I just want to point out to the hon. member that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) left this morning with an economic mission for Brazil.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: If I may continue, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Apologize!

Mr. Stevens: In no way will I apologize for a minister of the Crown not being in the House when we are considering a matter of this magnitude.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the hon. member that it has never been considered relevant to question the absence or presence of members or ministers.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In answer to my question as to what in fact is the ceiling under section 29 of the existing Export Development Act and whether that ceiling has been exceeded, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury), acting for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, indicated that the notes outstanding at the present time amount to $710 million as of September 30, I believe he said. I point out that at the end of December, 1973, the notes amounted to $541 million, so we can see there has been an increase of approximately $160 million in notes.

I think it is significant that we have had demonstrated to us today how little ministers of the Crown really understand the operations of the Export Development Corporation. The fact is that Mr. Granby stated in Vancouver yesterday that they are lending over $1 billion this year alone. If you were to add this $1 billion in 1974 to the amount of loans outstanding at the end of December, 1973, it shows total liabilities and loans are over $1.5 billion. The current ceiling is $1.5 billion. In short, once again the government has violated the law of the land in its anxiety to dish out funds around the world through this corporation.

I think it is particularly pertinent to note that if the definition referred to by the Minister of Public Works is interpreted the way he desires then parliament was misled when the government last introduced this bill. At that time the ceiling under Section 29 was $850 million. We were told that if we did not pass the amendment loans would exceed that ceiling within a few months. Yet today we are told that loans as of September 30 still amount to only $710 million. In short, if he is right in his present interpretation, there was no need for the amendment to the act in the early part of 1973 because loans are still below the old ceiling.

My colleague has already mentioned two very important changes we would like to see in this bill. When considering this legislation we should also consider what has taken place in respect to the administration of the Export Development Corporation. It is nice to sit and listen to the syrup handed out by the minister about how beautiful it is to have this type of lending facility. I noticed that he did not tell us about the champagne parties that take place at the EDC offices every time one of these agreements is signed, but we should point out to the Canadian public the kind of loans the corporation has been extending.

Would the average Canadian be willing to lend his pro rate share of $82.4 million to Iran? I would be very interested in knowing the reaction of the average Canadian to that question. Last spring $82.5 million in Canadian funds was loaned to Iran so that country could rebuild or build a forestry industry. The cost of this money to Canada through the EDC was something in the neighbourhood of 9 per cent to 10 per cent. As we all know, even Canada Savings Bonds are yielding 9¾ per cent. If you add an administrative charge of 1 per cent that means a total cost to the Canadian treasury of 10¾ per cent for the money the government of Canada has to borrow. The average cost of loans to Iran was 7 per cent. One can see from that alone that the Canadian public has been subsidizing Iran to the extent of 3¾ per cent on the $82.5 million loan.

For what purpose does Iran need money when, in the current year, it has enjoyed a budgetary surplus of $8 billion? If anybody should be lending funds, Iran should be lending them to Canada.

In this regard let us look at an article appearing in the current issue of Newsweek. We must keep in mind that not only $82.5 million was loaned to Iran but there have been several other loans made to Iran, for example a couple amounting to $2.1 million at 6¾ per cent interest, the benefactor in Canada being General Motors Corporation, the largest multinational corporation in the world.

While this government has chosen Iran as the recipient of almost $100 million in loans. The article in Newsweek points out that:

—the Shah . . . spearheaded the oil-producing nations' move to quadruple prices and . . . has since argued that the already stratospheric cost of oil should go even higher.

The article goes on to point out:

—even as the Shah was lecturing the superpowers, his emissaries continued to use their wealth to buy influence in the west—pledging $75 million to America's foundering Grumman Corp. The strategy fitted neatly into the pattern that the Shah has drawn for himself since the oil-producing nations imposed their embargo. Iran already has the largest military force in the Persian Gulf, but the Shah has set out on a damn-the-cost buying spree to increase his military arsenal. Last year alone, Iran spent $4 billion for U.S. weaponry, making the Shah the No. 1 foreign buyer of American military equipment.

Just imagine, we are lending money, nearly $100 million, to a country which in turn can afford to buy $4 billion worth of military equipment from the United States in one year. That is almost double the total national defence budget of this country for one year.

That money was used to buy 80 Grumman F-14s, 209 Phantom jets, 500 attack helicopters, 700 tanks and six destroyers. One official was quoted in this Newsweek article as having said:

"The Shah's power is growing enormously . . . We may be creating a Frankenstein monster."

The article goes on to state:

In addition to his store of U.S.-supplied arms, the Shah has built up the world's largest Hovercraft fleet, capable of landing a battalion of troops on the Arab side of the gulf within 25 minutes.

The article then states:

The Shah is also using his immense oil wealth ($20 billion a year) in other ways as he seeks to expand his sphere of influence. Iran has pumped $3 billion into Italy for joint business ventures, $1.2 billion into Britain in industrial loans, $1 billion into France in partial advance payment for five nuclear reactors and more than $7 billion into developing nations . . . The Iranians have also given $1 billion to the the World Bank, $1 million to George Washington University to train Iranian students—

Later the article goes on to state:

The Shah has also turned to private companies in seeking an outlet for his cash surplus. Less than three months ago, Iran purchased a 25 per cent interest in West Germany's giant Krupp Steel Works for more than $100 million.

Perhaps that is how our money was used, to pick up that 25 per cent interest for Iran in the Krupp Steel Works. The article then states:

Such massive investment at a time when Iranian oil prices are helping to undermine the Western economy may seem contradictory. But, in fact, it is in keeping with the Shah's tendency to play both sides against the middle.

I suggest that no other government has been an easier mark than the Canadian government in respect of this type of soft-lending activity.

The article goes on to speak of the opulence of the Shah, stating:

"At one party in a sizeable palace, everything that was not actually gold seemed to be marble or something equally precious. And the tiered rose garden leading to the olympic-size swimming pool was straight out of a 'Great Gatsby' set—as were the expensive-looking guests."

I point that out because it is typical of the present Liberal government. It adopts something which is good in concept, and certainly it is good to support Canadian exporters, particularly our small ones, but that does not mean that millions of dollars should be loaned to countries, such as Iran, which are obviously not in dire straits. Let us think of the consequences of a billion dollars being loaned this year alone.

● (1500)

A billion dollars this year, as was pointed out by Mr. Granby, compares with $50 million, a year in the 1960's. In today's inflationary times, on the average loan that the Export Development Corporation is making we find that the real dollars that will be returned to Canadians, after you put in an appropriate deflator for 1973—and I only use 1973, not 1974—result in a $576 million lost on $1 billion worth of lending activities by the time these loans are repaid in real buying power.

Second, I have already indicated that when we borrow at 9¾ per cent, charge a 1 per cent administration charge, and then lend the funds at 7 per cent, we are losing almost at the rate of 4 per cent a year on the loan itself. When that calculation is added to the one that I have just done to give us real buying power with respect to $1 billion worth of loans, we find that the Canadian public will have either subsidized or lost its buying power to the extent of $918 million in respect of the $1 billion that is being put out by the corporation this year.

Surely it is madness for a government to act so irresponsibly, bearing in mind that my figures are based on the assumption that all the loans will be repaid. The fact is that the Export Development Corporation already has loans in default on its books. It already has loans which have required renegotiation in order to put them into an apparent current status. I would suggest that this is a Crown corporation that deserves extensive study, review, and better management than we have been seeing over the past few years.

I have referred to the fact that we borrow these funds to put into the Export Development Corporation, but here again I think the extent to which the government has been borrowing funds in Canada is often not realized. Before it took power the total liabilities of the present federal government were in the $30 billion category. In 1973 those liabilities amounted to $51,695 million. These were the gross borrowings of the Trudeau Liberal government. I understand that by the end of this year they will be nearly $55 billion in size. In short, in a peacetime period the government has incurred liabilities on behalf of the Canadian public to the tune of approximately $25 billion.

Now we have legislation before us in the form of this bill in which it is contemplating one Crown corporation alone having the capability to lend up to $5 billion of Canadian taxpayer's funds. Surely my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), are justified in saying that this legislation deserves close scrutiny when it goes to committee. I say "when it goes to committee" because obviously, with the brutal majority that the government has in this parliament, there is nothing that members on this side of the House can do effectively to restrain the arrogant, incompetent management shown by the government today.

An hon. Member: But it is you who called the election.

Mr. Stevens: When we refer to this type of funding, let us think of what $1 billion, and certainly $5 billion could do if it were spent within Canada. Every time one of our large urban municipal centres comes to Ottawa and asks: have you funds to help our urban transportation or help with our sewage and water capital expenditures, the answer is a flat no. Think what would be the effect if part of the money that is being earmarked for those multinational corporations could be earmarked for some Canadian activity, for example helping municipalities develop urban transportation systems, or sewage and water systems.

There is an energy crisis in the country. Would it not make better sense if this type of funding were made available here instead of being lent to the tune of almost $100 million to oil rich Iran? Would it not be better if we tried to use some funding to help in the production of atomic plants in this country, or in the development of new energy sources? We must bear in mind that not only are these kinds of funds being denied to urban centres but we find that there is a great deal of discrimination.

Just before this bill came up for second reading we dealt with the bill that is transforming, in some ways, the Industrial Development Bank. What a contrast there is between the government's attitude when its friends in the big business community need help and assistance, and its attitude when the small businessmen of Canada need some help and assistance.

I have indicated that the average interest on loans so far of the Export Development Corporation is around 7 per cent per annum, and yet the average loan of the Industrial Development Bank is at 11 per cent at present. We find that the loans through the Export Development Corporation in the last year which I have reviewed benefitted only 43 customers in Canada, but the loans through the IDB benefitted 16,075. What a distinction! The average loan made by the Export Development Corporation—including the one to Iran—is $23.3 million, but the average loan made through IDB is $45,000. That is the Trudeau government in action. You can certainly see where its sympathies lie.

I notice that in introducing this bill the Minister of Public Works said that all they are doing is simply following the competitive practices of various other nations in the world and that we have to keep up our end. What nonsense! Let me point out that in today's Globe and Mail, if the minister has not already noticed, it is said that the World Bank is lending its funds at 8 per cent. So why are we still lending funds at 7 per cent? Who is leading to whom? Perhaps certain of the investor nations in the world are correct in saying that Canada has done more to help soften financing than any other industrial nation in the world. That is a far cry from the suggestion that we are simply following. I suggest that we are doing an awful lot of leading. We are into reckless, irresponsible lending activities in this type of financing.

I mention this because, as I have indicated, with the brutal majority that the Trudeau Liberals have in parliament they can put through this type of legislation. They can run the Export Development Corporation as they see fit, and I suggest that over the past few years it has been poorly run.

But I want it placed on the record that while we are forced to pass this legislation, because we have no alternative, there will be a day of reckoning and this House, or certainly a subsequent parliament, will have to explain to the Canadian public why there have been write offs of tens of millions of dollars in loans that are being made at the current time to countries that will never repay the debt. In any event, the fact is that with buying power falling as it is, in an inflationary period such as the one in which we are living now, we cannot win if the Export Development Corporation continues to act as irresponsibly as it has done in the past few years.

I hope some skill will go into the operation of this corporation. I hope too that the government will at least give us a better opportunity than it gave us last time at committee stage to hear witnesses, to question certain of the officials of the Export Development Corporation and to get a few of the facts—even the ugly facts—out on the table concerning this operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my comments will be very brief because I know little about exports. I listened to what the minister had to say earlier and I want to tell him that we are entirely in favour of referring this bill to a standing committee of this House for thorough examination to make it more readily available to Canadian companies because under the recommendations this measure is designed to amend the Export Development Act to increase the authorized share capital of the Corporation from $125,000,000 to $400,000,000 and to permit the Minister designate to subscribe for shares with payments out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund;—

—or the taxpayers' credit—

—to permit the Corporation to borrow up to ten times the aggregate of the authorized capital and the amount credited to the capital surplus amount; to broaden the definitions "foreign customer", "instrument" and "investment in a foreign country" for the purposes of the Act in the manner prescribed; to increase the maximum potential liability of the Corporation under sections 24 and 25 of the Act and under sections 13 and 13A of the Export Credits Insurance Act from $500,000,000 to $750,000,000;—

Mr. Speaker, as I said a while ago, I listened with great interest to the minister's speech. He stated that we do lack export facilities, which has lost us several foreign markets because, as the minister said, we lack organization and export facilities.

He said that Canadian companies must have access to the export services to be able to compete with other countries. He even mentioned the employment opportunities that the adoption of this bill would bring to the country.

The minister even established a parallel with Bill C-14 to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank by saying that this bill would help Canada's small and medium-sized businesses. But if we are content to listen to the minister and do not read each line of the bill, we shall say: What the minister has just said is great. This bill will protect the small businesses through the Federal Development Bank. After reading Bill C-9 and listening to the explanations given by the minister, I thought that small businesses would finally have the protection that they have needed for many years.

Mr. Speaker, this bill includes no provisions for orders lower than $1 million. This is why, after hearing the spokesmen for the Progressive Conservative and New Democratic Parties, I wish to associate myself with them and ask the minister to bring an amendment to this bill, because it is impossible to do so in committee, which amendment would make the provisions of the bill available to the small Canadian industries. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for small industries to benefit from this act if its provisions are restricted to $1 million orders.

The small industries who have sales of $400,000 or $600,000 will not be able to benefit from this act. In my opinion, this is very important and I therefore wish to comment specifically on this subject and to defend the small industry, because since my arrival in this House, I have heard people say: The small industry will finally be protected. When it comes to acting, Mr. Speaker, it is always zero. It is always the same old thing.

The hon. member who spoke before me said to the minister that in the past the Export Act had greatly favoured the multinational corporations. And how! If it is true that we loaned $17 million to 43 companies, there cannot be many small businesses that got the benefit of these loans.

That is why it is urgent to call on the minister today so that he can go before the committee to reduce this amount in favour of small businesses so that, as the minister himself said, they may also sell on the export market and benefit from these loans guaranteed by the taxpayers's money.

If we do not manage to amend this law in this way, it will be detrimental to our Canadian businesses. It is useless to work and discuss and especially present laws that we say are made to favour small business when it is quite the opposite that happens. All I want and all I hope is that the minister will introduce these amendments himself before the committee and that he will make this law more accessible to small businesses so that they might at last reach the adult stage and not always die as teenagers.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will make a note of these remarks. I am only hoping for one thing, but I hope the minister will grant our requests.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (1520)

Mr. Speaker: I understand that there is some disposition among hon. members to call it four o'clock.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, it was hoped that we would proceed to the consideration of the amendment to the Canada Pension Plan, Bill C-22.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENTS TO DEFINITIONS AND PROVISIONS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-22, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Veterans Land Act

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say on behalf of the whole House that one of the reasons we agreed to the second reading of the Canada Pension Plan bill without debate is that we debated it fully last spring, and all parties are anxious to see it proceeded with as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that is well understood. As the House is in such a co-operative mood, if we go on for a few more minutes like this we shall clean up the entire order paper. I understand hon. members are disposed to calling it four o'clock now and advancing the time of private members' hour. Before doing so I wish to return to a matter I mentioned this morning.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

VETERANS LAND ACT

NOTICE OF MOTION REQUESTING REVIEW OF ACT

Mr. Speaker: I might say at this time, and perhaps House leaders might take note, that this morning I drew attention to the filing of the signatures of 25 members pursuant to the amendment to the Veterans Land Act. I had intended to go on to say that the provisions of that amendment would require, upon the filing of such notice, the setting of a time for debate not more than 15 days from the date of the filing. I did not go on to deal with that obligation placed on the Chair to set a date for debate 15 days hence, or within 15 days.

The understanding of the Chair was that House leaders would be in consultation with one another about arranging a schedule, and that they would make arrangements to accommodate the date which is required within the terms of that notice. If there is any difficulty in that regard the Chair can be consulted and would, if necessary, appoint the necessary day for the commencement of the debate.

I understand that there is a disposition in the House at this time to call it four o'clock, advance the commencement of private members' hour and finish it one hour hence, on the understanding that at 4.25 we will call it five o'clock and conclude proceedings of the day. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to private members' business as listed on the order paper, namely, Notices of Motions, Public Bills and Private Bills.

ENVIRONMENT

SUGGESTED INSTITUTE OF HUMAN ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider setting up, in co-operation with the provinces, an Institute of Human Environmental Studies to determine, among other matters (a) the degree of air, soil, water and noise pollution the human species can tolerate without serious effects on physical and mental health (b) the type of environment which stimulates the most desirable qualities of physical and mental health in the human species (c) the type of national development which would give satisfactory environment to the greatest possible number of Canadians (d) the minimum of modifications to the present day indiscriminate and largely unplanned growth of our metropolitan areas necessary to put within reach of the inhabitants of these areas a quality of environment which would provide (i) adequate housing (ii) adequate recreational facilities, including parkland (iii) adequate social infra-structure, such as transportation, education, hospital and recreation facilities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have no illusions that what I am about to say will cause a sensation, or even that it will arouse interest, especially at this stage on Friday afternoon. However, I feel a strong urge to put forth my views on what I consider a question of vast importance to Canada even if nobody notices what I have to say, and even if mine turns out to be a lone voice crying in the wilderness.

I consider that, in the long run, the greatest tragedy that has happened to our country since World War II has been that most of our national growth has taken place in a few large centres, instead of being more evenly spread throughout the length and breadth of this great country. The tragedy has been deepened by the fact that most of this growth has been haphazard and irrational—growth for growth's sake—with no clearly defined objectives of benefit for this or future generations.

Almost three-quarters of our population now live in cities and towns. This is not necessarily bad, but it is forecast that by 1980 nearly two-thirds of all Canadians will live in 29 major urban communities, and one-third will live in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

I am a countryman living in the countryside, representing a rural riding, and you may wonder, Mr. Speaker, why I should be concerned. I am concerned for two major reasons. I do not believe that the megalopolis is the environment in which the average person who makes up the mass of people has a reasonable prospect of attaining an acceptable quality of life. Nor is it an environment in which the average person can attain that measure of self-fulfilment and sense of purpose that is necessary for contentment and peace of mind. I think the present generation senses this.

I noticed a phenomenon in my constituency in Prince Edward Island where log cabins are being built on odd pieces of land here and there. Young people are going back to nature and living in the most primitive ways. These are not local people from nearby farms or communities. In almost every case they have come from Montreal, Toronto,

New York or Los Angeles. As a result of this phenomenon, my closest neighbour has come from Los Angeles.

It is at least arguable that it is a pity so many Canadians and future generations are condemned by fickle chance to be forced to live in the kind of environment created by the megalopolis.

As far as national growth is concerned, we as a nation have taken the course of least resistence. We have let our country, like Topsy, just grow. I am not against growth. I believe that the very essence of life at any level is planned, programmed, meaningful growth toward a known objective for a beneficial purpose. However, I do not believe in wild, malignant, open-ended growth like that of a cancerous cell—growth for growth's sake.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: Humanity has been on this planet for a long time. If we represent that span of time by one day, 24 hours, we will find that the first cities come into being at about five minutes to midnight. Therefore, in the whole development of humanity, cities have had a very short experience.

In the past cities have been the nurseries of civilization as we know it. However, most of the advantages of the early city—security, ease of communications and ease of transportation—are no longer valid. I think that perhaps modern technology has made the megalopolis as obsolete as the medieval castle was made by the development of the cannon.

We should also note that the record of all past civilizations has been that they collapsed when they became highly urbanized. We should try to determine if there is a cause and effect relationship here. It may be only coincidental, but there is reason to believe that one follows the other. In any event, since the development of the modern city is so new in our total experience it is dangerous to assume that the human race can evolve rapidly enough to adjust to the ever-accelerating rate of change in our environment caused by urbanization.

I believe we are not fully aware of all the effects overcrowding and stress have on human beings, either from a psychological or physiological point of view. There is statistical evidence in growing amounts which would seem to indicate that the megalopolis is not the most desirable or beneficial environment for the human being.

For example, the impact of crime seems to be highest in urban centres. Drug abuse follows the same trend. We seem to have the highest rate of emotional instability and poor health in urban centres, especially where they contain slums and poor housing. We have the recent phenomenon of riots, protests and urban guerillas. Indeed, it could be argued that civilizations of the past collapsed after they became over-urbanized.

The second reason for my concern is that the rampant growth of a few large centres is not only creating horrendous problems for them in such fields as housing, pollution, crime, health, the cost of living and so on, but is at the same time sapping the vitality of the rural and small town segment of Canadian life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: The services needed by the population—government services, medical institutions, and educational institutions—are, I believe, being unnecessarily over-concentrated in our large urban centres. For example, I believe the federal government's services are over-concentrated in the capital region.

Urbanization on the scale presently taking place ignores the fact that man is part of the web of life. Very high concentrations of human beings give off pollutants, and in modern civilizations the amount of pollutants given off is larger per capita than it used to be. The amount of pollutants given off is so high and in such concentration that it cannot be assimilated or purified by the process of nature. The processes of nature are swamped in this regard. Water, soil and air pollution result, to say nothing of pollution by noise. Many of our unplanned, rapidly growing cities are, from an ecological point of view, festering sores on the face of mother earth.

I believe there is an optimum size for cities. I do not know what it is, but I have the notion that many of our larger Canadian cities have probably passed that size already. For a city to boast that it is the most rapidly growing community in the world is like someone saying he has the fastest growing cancer in town. It is not necessarily a good thing. We should be astute enough to realize that bigness is not synonymous with quality. The dinosaurs found that out, and they are now extinct.

Some of our cities are already collapsing under their own weight as far as financing and administration are concerned. The result is they have to be subsidized by provincial governments. Provincial governments in turn have to be subsidized by the federal government. The net result is that rural and small town Canada ends up subsidizing our largest urban centres.

I am a strong believer in the philosophy that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. We should not be proud of the large segment of our national wealth which we now deem it necessary to apply for cleaning up pollution and that sort of thing. It would have been much smarter to have taken preventive measures some years ago. That would have made this unnecessary.

If we do not take preventive measures now, the problems will become insoluble. The situation is extremely serious. The question is what to do about it. Can anything be done about it? We would be met immediately with the argument that it is not a federal responsibility. The cities and municipalities are a creation of the provinces. Of course there is a divided jurisdiction but I think this is an issue which has to be faced in the national interest before we can make any real progress toward the improvement of the urban environment.

In December, 1967, the prime minister of that day made the following suggestion:

> Before we can make any real progress toward an improvement in our urban environment we must first improve the planning of the environment. The need for such improved planning has already been widely recognized. To help meet this need I would like to propose the establishment jointly by the federal and provincial governments of a council on housing and urban development whose functions, generally, would be to gather and publish comprehensive, objective and regular assessments of housing and urban development needs across the country and to suggest priorities of need and plans to meet them.

The federal government is prepared to participate at once in the establishment and maintenance of such a continuing council.

That was an excellent suggestion but, as far as I know, it died right there and nothing ever came of it. I believe there is growing evidence that the direction in which we are moving is bad. Can we do anything about it? Can we reverse the trend? I think we can. After all thousands, perhaps millions of people, migrate to the large cities not by choice but because of economic pressures. That is where the jobs are. Of course the question is: why are the jobs there?

I believe the jobs are there because industries decide to settle in or near the large population centres from their own selfish point of view—the profit motive; considering only the balance sheet. They have no responsibility for facing the many problems which are generated by their decision to locate in an overcrowded area. They do not need to worry about where employees are going to live, who will build roads for them to travel on or schools for their children to attend.

I believe that if a tax, even if it were only symbolic, were levied on such enterprises commensurate with the social problems they create their decisions would be different, and we would find these industries locating in a more dispersed fashion to the benefit of all Canadians. We might then be able to contemplate sensible, even growth throughout the country, something which would put the problems of pollution control, housing, education, medical care and all the other requisites for a good life within our capacity to meet.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is a particular pleasure for me to rise to take part in this discussion because I am a new member of parliament, and I am pleased to have had the opportunity to participate both in the debate on Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and even this early in other business of the House.

I am interested in the proposition put before us by the hon. member opposite. I think he shares the concerns felt by many Canadians, and I want to say to him that the majority of the concerns he put forward are those which I, too, share. I think the only question which I would raise is whether we really do need another institute, commission, or other type of bureaucracy to do this. In my opinion I think the concerns brought forward are being addressed and researched by the Ministry of the Environment, a ministry being led by a most capable minister, and I think those concerns are being well expressed both in the government and to the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milne: I understand that the procedure followed during this hour is such that members can express personal points of view they may hold on the subjects brought before us. In that context, I would like to make two or three comments on the question of the environment, respecting its importance and some of the things which should be more or less obvious, although the environment cannot be the only thing about which we are terribly concerned.

I have some background in environmental matters—in fact I have done some studies in that area. I have practised some of the concepts that environmentalists raised a number of years ago, perhaps even before this was a very popular thing in which everybody wanted to be involved. So, Mr. Speaker, I think I have an appreciation of the overall view of how important the environment is to us.

If we fail to take note of how important the environment is, and fail to do some of the things we must do at this point, then our entire future, indeed, the very nature and shape of this country, will be greatly affected.

Certainly the government recognizes that fact. If it had not done so it would not have set up Environment Canada and, most important of all, it would not have made the announcement it made very recently to the effect that all major projects pertaining to the government would be subject to an environmental assessment before they could proceed. I think this is a proper procedure, bearing in mind that some of the projects in which we will be involved over the next few years will have very great environmental impact on the country. It is only right and just that a body which has some depth of knowledge should look at these projects purely from an environmental point of view.

I would like to raise two concerns which this subject brings to my mind. One is in the area of energy. I said, when making my maiden speech, that by the year 2,000 we will be using two and one half times as much energy as we are at the present time. That is a rather incredible fact when one stops to think about it. Frankly, very recently concern has been expressed as to whether we have the adequacy within Canada to meet some of the energy needs which will arise in such a short time—a period of perhaps another 25 years.

One of the things which I think is not fully appreciated is that, in the past, the environmental concern relating to energy has been in almost direct opposition to those who care very much about conservation and efficient utilization of energy. I say this because much of the environmental concern has led industry, which is a very large user of energy, to change from coal and crude oil to natural gas. In fact a large amount of the electricity used in Canada is generated by natural gas.

I think this was a logical decision for industries to make when they were faced with meeting environmental regulations. After all, natural gas is a commodity which is reasonably priced and which does meet environmental concerns. But in a country which has a lot of lower grade energy it does seem to raise the question of whether it would not have been better in certain instances to have tackled the environmental program head-on through the use of increased technology.

Would we not have been better to have used such energy sources as coal and heavy crude oil more effectively and thus not be so concerned at this point in time about whether we have an adequate supply of natural gas? I would remind the House that perhaps much of the energy concern, or crisis as it is called in the United States, was brought about by this very situation, the very fact that much of its industry, including a great part of its electrical utility system changed its input of energy from coal and heavy crude to high grade energy such as natural gas.

With the scarcity which has developed they now experience a problem which it is difficult for them to overcome. We are very fortunate in this country, of course, to have an abundant supply of uranium. It seems to me that using uranium, and using it through the CANDU process, answers very well the two concerns at the same time, that is, the concern of the environmentalists and the conservation of energy, which is equally important.

I want to raise another question and that is the relationship of the environment in the large urban centres to the environment in the very fragile part of the north of this very large country.

When the debate on the Mackenzie valley pipe line comes before the House and the country, I think it will centre mainly on the aspect of environmental assessment and the impact that it will have. I remind everyone that it is difficult, unless we are really prepared to pay the price, to have it both ways. As a person who lives in an urban centre I can understand that we want a much better environment within our large and growing urban areas. But we must realize that in achieving this, it will have an impact on the environment in the far north. We must also understand that if we are to preserve the environment in the far north and keep it intact, we must perhaps be prepared not to have such a high quality environment in the urban centres. Perhaps the proper decision will be made, that we should have concern for both. But all Canadians will have to pay in order to honour both those commitments.

Another area of concern is the conservation of first-class, prime agricultural land. I seem to sense that many of the projects being thought about and evaluated at this point in time, such as utility power lines, highways, pipe lines and urban growth, are subject to environmental assessment. If one thinks about this, and about all the other aspects of environmental assessment, it leads one to the conclusion that the best place to locate many of these facilities would perhaps be on our best agricultural land, where the impact is least on the environment.

I think that this is the wrong approach. The best agricultural land that we have in this country is a very precious commodity, a commodity that should have at least equal consideration with environmental concern. After all, we have an expanding population to feed in Canada. I also think we have a moral responsibility to help feed the many millions of people in the world who need our agricultural products. The point that I want to make is that we must take a very balanced view in order to make sure that we look after both aspects.

I was interested to hear the hon. member opposite express concern for the environment within the large urban areas, which is a good point. I should like to see it extended to include concern for the health of Canadians. I was alarmed to read in the minister's recent publication that the cost of health care for Canadians has now reached something like 9.1 per cent of personal income, or over $300 for every man, woman and child in Canada. In the same publication the point is made that part of this is due to the environment in which we live.

Surprisingly, it is stated that nearly half of hospital bed time is given over to sicknesses due to stress, perhaps due to our life style in this highly urbanized society in which we live. Suicide is now the second most frequent cause of death among people aged 15 and 30. I guess I am repeating some of the arguments made by the hon. member opposite who related that over 90 per cent of all Canadians now live on less than 7 per cent of our land, while 80 per cent live in or close to large urban centres.

We must realize that we are living in times of stress, with much pressure on the family unit. In this regard we must make a serious assessment and determine its impact on the environment. We must fund and carry out studies that will tell us how big our urban centres should be allowed to grow, and how much the level of stress should be allowed to rise, so as not to reach the point where it becomes of concern to us all.

May I raise one other matter into which concern for the environment should be projected. It is a matter in which I am very interested, and about which not too much is known. I refer to labour-management negotiations. It would seem that on the surface the number of difficult settlements of labour-management disputes should be decreasing. After all, we have more affluence in this country perhaps than ever before. But really, Mr. Speaker, the opposite is true: we are having more difficult settlements, both in terms of finance and in terms of number.

It seems to me that most of this difficulty relates not so much to the financial aspect of a settlement as to the work environment, to the fact that we take an individual and put him in a situation where he is just plain bored, where he is dehumanized, and feels a total loss of identity. Such a worker feels he is not really participating in any area of creativity, whereas he was previously.

Our society is really to blame for that. We are fast becoming a society of big business, big government, big unions—just plain bigness. This is a very difficult thing for the individual to cope with, and I contend we should be doing some environmental studies within the industrial setting. We should study noise levels, colour, sense of accomplishment, creativity and that sort of thing which will affect productivity in this country, which will perhaps allow the individual to have a greater sense of accomplishment, and perhaps improve the physical and mental health of our workers.

Another matter which we should consider is uniformity of application of environmental regulations. It seems to me that we have a situation where Canadian companies are competing with each other, where some companies are faced with stringent environmental regulations and others are not. In fact, some companies are attracted to areas where there are lax environmental regulations, whereas other areas practise environmental concern very highly.

To this end, a few days ago I was pleased to note that the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) started to publish some national guidelines. These guidelines will be of great help, not only to the provinces and authorities that will administer them but to industry as well. If industry meets these guidelines then there will be some degree of uniformity of environmental standards all across Canada.

In spite of concern in this country for the environment, I think we are very fortunate in Canada. We have a good degree of lead time compared with some other industrialized countries in the world. We can do something to preserve our environment so we will have a better future. I hope that a good deal of the spending by the Minister of the Environment, and by industry itself, will be directed toward environmental research.

It seems to me there is a clear role for the federal government. It should show leadership in conducting research into the environment and into hardware to help preserve the environment. The carrying out of this role is the single most effective way of getting industry, on a voluntary basis, to upgrade its environmental standards. I do not think it is being fair to be hard on industry when industry has very little confidence in the type of equipment that is available to preserve the environment.

Before my time is up I should like to say that no one more than myself appreciates the concern for the environment expressed by the hon. member opposite. We need to work very diligently on improving our technology and giving leadership to industry. We should move away somewhat from the focus of the past, where we dealt essentially with air and water, and look more at the human side—job satisfaction, the health of Canadians, and improvement of our national productivity. We must concern ourselves about solid waste and other matters. We must seek a balanced solution to our environmental problems since there are other problems of equal importance.

I conclude by saying that the matter raised by the hon. member is of concern. That concern is shared by everyone in this House. I should just like to put the proposition to him that all these matters are being very adequately analysed by the Minister of the Environment at this time.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): This afternoon we are discussing a motion by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) to set up an institute of human environmental studies to explore and make recommendations in respect of various aspects of pollution of the environment. In reading over the motion I see that it is rather detailed, involving many areas, and contains considerable merit.

I think environmental pollution is a subject about which everyone has an opinion. Very much like motherhood, everyone is in favour of protecting the environment, but when it comes to proposing practical solutions and, more important, when we in the government are asked to do something about it, the history of protection of the environment in this country is indeed sad.

When we talk about the environment we must not forget the world situation. We must look at Canada in context with world environment. We see a pretty frightening situation on a world scale. The real problem in respect t o pollution and preserving the environment boils down to our basic concept of a belief in growth. If we analyse the individual attitude in Canada, and the Canadian government attitude, we must conclude that for sometime we have accepted the concept that growth per se is good, and we have ended up with a situation in which it seems we are headed on a collision course as far as the environment is concerned.

Looking at the world scale, because we are not an island unto ourselves and will be affected by what is happening to the world environment, we find that the human population on this planet is growing by about 70 million people per year, demanding more food, water, fuel and so on. We have a responsibility in the world community, especially in these days when we see the spectre of starvation in Africa and South America, to help our fellow world citizens.

Yet when we look at our own country and our attitude toward consumption I am afraid we can be indicted as being some of the worst gluttons as far as resources are concerned. For example, if we were to extend the living standard in this country on a world scale, the demand on the resources of this planet would be astronomical. If we were to project Canada's standards worldwide, by the year 2000 the world would need about 1,300 per cent more aluminum, 900 per cent more copper, and 700 per cent more iron than we now consume. Yet when we look at world deposits of precious fuel minerals, coal for example, we find that we only have projections for three to four centuries, and for petroleum and natural gas projected reserves for only the next 70 or 80 years.

Some say we can turn to nuclear power, but here we encounter the problem of storing radio active material, and problems again of pollution. The people of Pickering are worried at the moment about the whole business of cooling the nuclear plant there, resulting in hot pollution in our water system.

In May, 1969, the United Nations pointed out that because of our lack of concern about the environment, already on this planet 1¼ billion acres of arable land have been lost to mankind through mismanagement. The reliance of modern technology on the combustion of fossil fuels has brought a 10 per cent increase in atmospheric carbon dioxide over the past century, and this could rise to 25 per cent by the end of this century. In North America alone automobiles account for 60 per cent of the air pollution of the continent. Yet how many of us are not so endeared to the automobile that we would try other forms of urban transportation in order to lessen this pollution, or pressure industry to go ahead full speed on anti-pollution devices for automobiles?

What I am saying is that we must be concerned with world environment rather than just looking inward, being concerned just with the environment in Canada. When we look at our environment we do not see a very encouraging record. It is all fine and good to set up an institute to carry out additional studies on the environmental situation, but if existing provincial and federal governments had applied the law that is already on the books with some vigour, we would be a long way down the road in cleaning up the environment.

The trouble has been not only a lack of will among provincial and federal governments to get serious about anti-pollution legislation, but there has also been a lack of coordination between the two levels of government. We have many overlapping and competing agencies, and because we have different provincial standards of pollution controls industry plays one province off against another, saying it will not locate in a certain province because its anti-pollution laws are too strict, but will move elsewhere. It is important that we have national pollution standards. This can only be attained by vigorous action on the part of the federal government, and I am sorry to say that this has been lacking to this day.

Canada has additional problems in respect to our international boundary. In my constituency, which borders on the Great Lakes, there has been real difficulty in getting co-operation between American states, the U.S. federal government, the province of Ontario and our federal government in order to clean up the Great Lakes. Already Lake Superior is endangered by the deposit of asbestos fibres or taconite tailings near Duluth, Minnesota. It seems to me we just cannot rely on the federal government to look for national standards in this country. There has to be active co-operation with the United States.

Why have we not been more serious in this country in grappling with the problem of pollution? In addition to a lack of coordination I am afraid that politicians and many Canadians have accepted the propaganda of many offending industries, that to adopt strong pollution, control would mean the closing down of plants with ultimate unemployment. This myth should be put to rest once and for all.

For example, in the Unites States the federal government carried out a very comprehensive survey to discover the effects of a strong pollution control system on the unemployment rate. The finding was that only .05 per cent of the total working force would be affected by tough anti-pollution measures against industry, and that this low rate of unemployment could certainly be offset by creative anti-pollution employment programs for those people who may be thrown out of work because of the closing of some very antiquated and badly run industrial plants.

For example, Mr. Speaker, there is a great need in this country to upgrade and build new sewage treatment facilities at the municipal level. We could employ thousands of Canadians in our labour force to do a very worthwhile and significant job of dealing with that one problem of pollution. I am afraid that all too often Liberal and Conservative governments have bowed to the pressures of some of the large corporations and business concerns in this country when it came to proposing tough anti pollution legislation.

I remember very vividly the Conservative government of Ontario, when it was first elected in 1971, saying that it was going to bring in tough laws against disposable bottles, but here we are in 1974 still awaiting some kind of significant legislation dealing with that problem.

In the few minutes that remain I should like to propose some solutions. I think it is important that what we say here today be considered seriously by the Minister of the Environment. First of all, to do something significant about pollution control we need national standards for environmental quality, and these standards must be set for air, water and land. But the point is that they should be set based on the biology of the environment and not on what is technologically possible.

Besides having standards we must become serious about the penalties that we impose for the violation of these standards. How laughable it is when a large corporation is fined $200 for violating some anti pollution law. It spends more than that on paper clips in a year. How Corporations must laugh at our seriousness in tackling the problem of pollution when our penalties are so minimal!

The second thing I would propose is that the cost of pollution control be met either directly by the offending party, or by a subsidy provided by the government. In the case of a subsidy, it should certainly be made public for our scrutiny. I think we should also have the government institute low cost loans to municipalities and some industries for sewage treatment plants and plant clean ups. This is vital. Also, as I mentioned earlier, non-recyclable throw away consumer products should be phased out by law.

I also think that the Department of the Environment should co-ordinate and enforce all environmental control legislation. The department should be given the task of scrutinizing all activities in the country for their potential environmental impact. But if we are serious about the problem of growth and how it contributes to the ruining of the environment and to pollution, we must embark on a program of conservation, especially of our non renewable resources.

Fossil fuels and scarce minerals should be conserved. Near my riding of Sault Ste. Marie is the riding of Sudbury, and there is situated the great International Nickel Mine. I have seen projections which show that with the high rate of exploiting the nickel at that mine right now the mine's life is only some 30 to 35 years. Many minerals should be recycled rather than just dumped. To this end we need research to develop a comprehensive policy of recycling.

Our energy demands must be reduced. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) is talking about conserving energy in this country. I would like to see a really forceful program, not just tokenism such as turning off the lights around Parliament Hill.

I think that resource developers must also assess the potential effects of their projects on the environment before undertaking them. We have learnt to our dismay what has happened to the Mackenzie River delta because of the Bennett dam in British Columbia. No surveys were carried out prior to that construction, and the federal government stands condemned in the eyes of the Canadian people for the whole process of the development of James Bay and the lack of prior environmental studies there. I fear that within the next couple of years the whole issue of the Mackenzie Valley gas pipeline will be rammed down our throats without proper environmental studies being done first.

We should also set aside ecological reserves in the wilderness to prevent the total disappearance of many of our species of animals in this country. We should also undertake research of all Arctic environmental problems, and also in regard to population and the problems of growth there. Canada could take a leading role to initiate, through the United Nations, an international conference to promote the stabilization of the earth's population. We must conduct research into human settlement problems, particularly those of the urban areas, to prevent overcrowding and the megalopolises that have plagued so many people in the over-industrialized areas of the world.

I commend the hon. member for Malpeque for his attempt to bring to the attention of the government the seriousness of the problem of pollution in this country and the need to protect the environment. It seems to me that we must no longer be content to measure progress by industrial growth or the gross national product because short term gain often brings long term damage.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, the points mentioned by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), and enlarged upon in his speech this afternoon, are certainly of those which seriously concern Canadians.

Though public attention is concentrated mostly at this time on such extremely important matters as inflation, energy supplies, food products, on a national and international basis, it is imperative that factors related to the environment not be neglected in the overall steps to be taken in achieving our society of tomorrow. As I shall explain briefly, those factors are now the subject of serious and imaginative attention on the part of the government.

The extent of the problems referred to in the motion of the hon. member for Malpeque indicates the complexity of the points he made. Social, economic and scientific factors must be considered together if we are to determine what constitutes a satisfactory environment. There is no simple or magic formula to tell us exactly what a satisfactory environment is. Mr. Speaker, all one has to do is glance back at the last two decades to see what today's citizens want in the line of housing, transportation, education, health care and leisure, and to realize that we have come a long way beyond the public opinion of barely a few years ago. And what the public will be calling for tomorrow will still be very different.

There is also a new concern, that of seeing the economic development adjusted to the cost of environment. Those costs are more readily accepted as part of the normal costs of economic development. What will be the conditions in some twenty years?

Finally, it is important to know better what effects environmental pollution has on health. The matter is related to the scientific field and consequently it is not liable to change. However, once the basic facts are known, some social pressures could demand periodical changes in the control standards which are the result of such knowledge. In addition, as the scientific methodology is improving, new discoveries can lead to different conclusions about the consequences of environmental pollution on the human and ecologic systems.

Much work is under way in those various fields not only in Canada but also in other countries and performed as well by international organizations.

In Canada, a number of specific steps have been taken in this area. Mr. Speaker, I think it is useful to refer, as a starting point, to the government's decision establishing the Department of Environment and the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, which is now under the very able leadership of the new Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson). On the one hand, the former has been designed as an operating department with specific responsibilities in the extension and review of measures relating to air, water, soil, fisheries, forests and wildlife. On the other, the latter has been set up as a kind of policy architect in an area generally considered as provincial in jurisdiction.

A good number of other federal departments and agencies retained responsibilities over environment, but the Department of Environment has been given the mandate to coordinate all federal activities relating to environment. A positive effort has been made in this area to ensure a more effective coordination between the various departments and generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, this measure has been useful. This is mostly the result of a series of mechanisms and the good will of the people involved in the environment problem.

As to the particular questions mentioned in the motion introduced by the hon. member for Malpèque, among the activities most directly related to the federal government are those of the National Research Council Joint Committee which is investigating the scientific criteria regulating the quality of the environment. This committee is made up of experts from government, industries and universities. Its aim is to collect and evaluate scientific information throughout the world concerning the effects of pollutants on living organisms and human beings. Such assessments constitute a solid basis for institutions like the Department of the Environment when controls are required.

That department has also come up with a process permitting it to review and evaluate environmental protection. It has been conceived so as to make sure that federal activities in the environmental field be scrutinized as to their probable impact on environment before being given approval.

Mr. Speaker, the speech I had intended to deliver was much longer. It would have been of special interest to those who are not familiar with Boileau's language, because they could have heard the latter part of it in the language of Shakespeare.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would invite the hon. member to resume his seat. I regret to have to interrupt him, but the time provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

THE LATE J. G. MacKAY

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to inform the House of the death of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island, the Hon. J. G. MacKay.

Mr. MacKay had been Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island for just over five years, having been sworn to that office on October 6, 1969. He had been looking forward to release from his responsibilities early in the new year and it is particularly sad that he should not have been able to enjoy the well-earned retirement for which he was undoubtedly planning.

Mr. MacKay had been active in the life and public affairs of Prince Edward Island for many years. He was first elected, by acclamation, to the Legislative Assembly of the province in 1949. He was re-elected four times thereafter. He entered the cabinet of the province as minister without portfolio in 1952 and was minister of public works and highways from 1955 to 1959. In many roles he rendered a distinguished service to the life of the province and the community in which he lived. I am sure all hon. members would wish that the sympathy of this House be extended through you, Mr. Speaker, to Mrs. MacKay and the members of her family.

Hon. members who were here in 1966 at the time of the death of the Hon. Paul Comtois, then Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, may recall that the death of a lieutenant governor in office presents a constitutional problem. There is no provision in the British North America Act under which an administrator may act during a vacancy in the office of lieutenant governor. To permit the operations of government to proceed, it will be necessary to advance the appointment that had been planned for the retirement of Mr. MacKay from his office. I mention this so that members of the House and the public may understand the reasons for what might otherwise appear to be unseemly haste in filling the office that has been left vacant so suddenly.

● (1410)

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak for all four members of parliament from Prince Edward Island when I say that we were all very saddened to learn of the passing of the much beloved representative of the Queen in our province. In this post, as in his many positions of responsibility throughout a long and exemplary life, his record is one of cheerful and untiring service.

The late J. George MacKay was a life-long resident of my constituency. I express my sympathy to his many friends and neighbours, whom I have the honour to represent. On their behalf, and on behalf of all Prince Edward Islanders, I wish to extend to his widow and family and to his executive council, our sincere sympathy in their great loss.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party members of parliament, I wish to join in extending our sympathy to Mrs. MacKay and her family on this sad occasion.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, most willingly I make mine the eulogy just voiced by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), who informed us of the untimely death of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island. Very briefly his life can thus be summed up: his lamp has burnt out. He is beginning to see his Creator. I am convinced that he has believed and that now he sees everlastingly.

STORMS

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—EMERGENCY MEASURES TO ENSURE SAFETY OF RESIDENTS—COMPENSATION FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A question to the Acting Prime Minister who is, I am sure, very aware of the violent storm which hit Nova Scotia over the weekend. Has the federal government taken any special measures to aid the people of the province who have suffered damage or who are threatened with damage as a result of the storm?

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The minister from Prince Edward Island and some of the other ministers have been held up as a result of this storm. We are awaiting their return before considering the question just raised by the Leader of the Opposition. In any event, we have not yet received any request for help from the government of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Stanfield: I am always anxious to see the people of Prince Edward Island helped as well, but my question related to the people of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Muir: There is a more important island down there—Cape Breton.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he has taken any steps to inform himself as to the dangers the storm has created for the people of Nova Scotia and, also, whether there have been any preliminary discussions originating with the government of Nova Scotia with regard to financial relief for those who have been injured or who will be injured.

Mr. Sharp: Before I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance to deal with the question the hon. gentleman has just asked, perhaps I should apologize—I was thinking about the minister from Prince Edward Island. He will be reporting on conditions in the Maritime provinces generally. We have not as yet received any requests from the other governments.

Mr. Muir: There is a minister from Cape Breton, too.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The national emergency planning establishment is keeping the federal government advised of the situation almost on an hourly basis. It is anticipated that the provinces affected may seek financial assistance and if they do there are established procedures laid down. The Leader of the Opposition mentioned Nova Scotia. The base figure for that province is $800,000 and guidelines are laid down for sharing over and above that figure. The items in respect of which compensation can be paid are spelled out fairly clearly.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Can the parliamentary secretary tell us whether there is any present danger to residents of particular communities in Nova Scotia? For instance, in Cumberland County to the best of my knowledge supplies of electricity have been cut off for close to 24 hours and indications are that electricity will not be restored for at least another 24 hours. Water supplies have been cut off for Springhill and Amherst and there is real concern for the ability of people to maintain themselves in present circumstances. What emergency steps are being taken to ensure the safety and wellbeing of these residents?

Mr. Cullen: Well, first, with respect to institutions, it was felt there was no requirement to evacuate major institutions due to the storm. Communication is being maintained wherever possible. I might say that in addition to reports which have already appeared in the press about one farmer being killed when a barn collapsed, we have reports of five deaths, including those of four fishermen who are presumed drowned. Both the federal and the provincial governments are on top of this situation and endeavouring to take care of the type of emergency to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): May I address a question to the Acting Prime Minister based on the fact that Cape Breton Island bore the brunt of this storm with the result that many families are now without homes and are being housed in high schools and elsewhere? Is there an arrangement whereby on the site examination can take place by federal officials, in co-operation with the provincial authorities, to ascertain whether much needed financial assistance can be provided as quickly as possible, so it will not be a period of months before assistance is given?

● (1420)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has pointed out, there is a formula under which the federal government comes to the aid of communities where the cost is in excess of a certain amount for each province. I can assure the House that so far as the federal government is concerned we will act as promptly as possible, having in mind the primary responsibility of the province.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED MISLEADING ADVERTISING BY UNITED AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In Saturday's Ottawa Citizen there is an advertisement by United Aircraft Corporation, which also appeared in other newspapers across Canada on the same date, in which the corporation stated that it has received some $70 million in aid from the Canadian government. That is stated in the opening sentence of the second paragraph. In the immediately following sentence the advertisement states that "most of our federal contracts call for us to make repayments to the government".

In view of the fact that the $70 million funds referred to are exclusively grants, and in view of the statement by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce before a committee last Tuesday in which he referred to the same sums of money as being grants, not loans, would the minister investigate the ad that I have just referred to for misleading advertising purposes?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter of interpretation. I do not object to asking my officers to ascertain whether there is a violation in this case.

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING BY UNITED AIRCRAFT—DEDUCTIBILITY OF COST FOR TAX PURPOSES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Would the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whether or not this kind of advertising, essentially political in nature, is a deductible tax item for this corporation—that is to say, that it is paid for by the people of Canada? If that is the case, would the government take steps to change the tax law of Canada in this respect?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will see that this question is brought to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue who is responsible for the administration of the tax laws.

COMMUNICATIONS

EFFECT OF STRIKE AT QUEBEC TELEPHONE COMPANY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Communications.

Since the Quebec Telephone labour conflict is already many weeks old and consequently slowing down the economy of eastern Quebec, which is already faced with a very high rate of unemployment, and considering that this company is now under the wing of an American company, can the minister tell the House whether he has spoken with the Quebec Ministers of Communications and Labour with a view to finding an equitable solution and putting an end to the conflict as soon as possible?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I recognize with the hon. member that the situation is very distressing for an area which does not need special difficulties in view of its permanent economic problems. However, the hon. member must be aware that the company falls under provincial jurisdiction, not only where labour relations are concerned but also from the point of view of telephony.

I have had no contacts with my opposite number in Quebec, nor with the Quebec Minister of Labour, but I am sure if they felt our Department of Communications could be of any help to them we would be only too happy to assist them in their efforts towards a solution to the conflict.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

In view of the seriousness of the situation, would the minister indicate whether he is prepared to order an inquiry into the dealings of the multinational General Telephone and Electronics Company, which controls Quebec Telephone, in order to throw more light for the public on the real causes of that deplorable conflict and solve it as soon as possible?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the question.

SPORTS

MONTREAL OLYMPICS, 1976—AMOUNT OF REVENUE ANTICIPATED FROM SALE OF COINS—PAYMENT OF COMMISSION OR DISCOUNT

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Postmaster General has given the Chair an indication of his intention to reply to a question which was asked one day last week.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe asked a series of questions about olympic coins, one of which I believe was based on an interim report I tabled pointing out the anticipated sales in the amount of $644 million under this project. The hon. gentleman is accurate in stating that the law limits the face value of coins sold to $450 million. The difference between the $450 million and $644 million can be attributed to the increased demand or unexpected demand for premium sets, including the packaging, and the fact that most are being sold at a premium rather than at face value.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister to elaborate in two respects. First of all, he gave an explanation as to the difference between the $600 million some odd figure and the $450 million face value. I should like him to relate that to the report that is already in hand which indicates there is only a 5 per cent premium mark-up on the coins sold to March 31 of this year compared with a 43 per cent mark-up in the projected figures. The second and most interesting point on which I should like him to comment is this, has he in fact satisfied himself that there has been no commission, discount or other advantage paid by COJO or anybody else in respect of the sale of the coinage to the distributors?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, COJO has nothing to do with this program. I can assure the House that there is absolutely no distributor, no outlet, no chartered bank and no individual who is able to obtain olympic coins at any discount whatever from face value. The private distributors, the people around the world who specialize in coins, do get a discount between the selling price and the $5 value coin. For instance, they may be sold at $7.50, so the price would be somewhere between $5 and $7.50. Under no circumstances are we permitted to give a discount on the $5 face value and respect the law. I assure the House and the hon. gentleman that the brokerage price or discount firms are permitted relates to their share of the premium rather than any discount on face value.

FINANCE

INSTRUCTIONS TO COMMERCIAL BANKS CONCERNING OPERATIONS IN EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that it is generally recognized that one of the most important factors in international inflation is the operation of the European Common Market, what instructions are given to Canadian commercial banks through the Bank of Canada and the department about plans for operating in that market?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice and ask my colleague the Minister of Finance to answer it as soon as he returns.

ENERGY

OIL—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS CONCERNING EXPORT TAX—POSSIBLE LOSS OF UNITED STATES MARKET

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent cutbacks in United States demands for Canadian oil due to our oil becoming increasingly less competitive in the United States market, and in view of the expected appearance on the United States market in the near future of newly discovered oil from Mexico, is it the intention of the government to continue export taxes on Canadian oil at the present level?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be aware that the government indicated it would be prepared, at least in relation to heavy oil, to exercise the remission procedure under the Financial Administration Act, commencing on November 1, for the remission of some of the taxes paid on heavy oil. The reduction in the export price, which in due course would determine the reduction in the export tax, is a subject upon which the National Energy Board makes recommendations from month to month. The Board will be making such a recommendation within a few days. I will have to await the board's judgment in this case.

● (1430)

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the reduction in demand has been principally in other oils, in addition to the heavy oil to which the minister referred, and as the government obviously has nothing planned to make our oil more competitive in this diminishing market, I should like to ask the minister is he not familiar with the way in which the principle of supply and demand operates, and also the fact that customers once lost are very hard to regain?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think I should point to the hon. gentleman that what he is proposing is that we in Canada should apply to our oil the United States price control system. I think we in Canada should determine what the fair international price is for our product and should not have it determined by the United States administration.

Mr. Hees: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That is not at all what I intended. What I am saying is, does he not agree it is good business practice to make our commodities competitive so that they will sell in satisfactory volume instead of having that volume continually stripped away?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if it is a free market, that is one question. If it is a diktat by a foreign government, that is another question altogether.

OIL—SHARING WITH PRODUCING PROVINCES OF FIFTY PERCENT OF EXPORT TAX—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON TAX ON ROYALTIES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister. Prior to the arrangement made that the surtax is to be used or paid to the consuming provinces to assist them in respect of the price of petroleum, the minister said before the standing committee that 50 per cent of the tax collected prior to that agreement would be returned to the provinces. Has that money been returned to the producing province of Alberta as well as the producing province of Saskatchewan, and how much money has been returned to the treasuries of those provinces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying that in respect of the export tax which was exigible between September of 1973 and January of 1974, there was indeed an undertaking to return 50 per cent of that revenue to the producing provinces which has been done. As to the balance, we indicated we would invest that in energy related projects in the province, and as recently as a few weeks ago when I met the Alberta ministers I pointed out to them there was an account outstanding there and we would be happy to talk about co-operative energy investments together.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the minister talk about co-operation. I am wondering now if he has had serious talks with the Minister of Finance who is meeting with the premiers of western Canada at the present time in reference to that budgetary provision wherein the federal government would collect federal tax on royalties and under that condition would not permit the producing companies to use that as an expense in respect of taxable income. I know this is a budgetary matter, but has there been a conversation between the ministers in light of the headlines in the past week in western Canada which state that 96 per cent of the drilling companies owned by Canadians are pulling out of Canada and going to the United States or Mexico to drill for oil.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the minister and I and our two departments have been in close touch on the appropriate tax regime for the industry in Canada. Of course in the last several days he has been consulting in this regard and I have not yet had an up to date report from him. I would anticipate that on his return.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—SUGGESTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the upcoming World Food Conference which is to take place in Rome in a little over two weeks time. I wonder whether the minister is in a position now to indicate whether Canada has arrived at a position, when this position will be made public to the Canadian people and whether or not he has had an opportunity to review two national conferences which have been held here, the Agro conference in September and the Conference on Non-governmental Organizations about ten days ago?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian position to be expressed at the World Food Conference early in November is presently being considered by the government and decisions ought to be taken very shortly.

Mr. Stanfield: They will have to be.

Mr. MacEachen: I have had an opportunity to review the conferences to which my hon. friend has referred. In fact, I attended briefly part of the proceedings of the first conference.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of this conference not only to the peoples of the world with regard to food requirements over the next decade but to Canada itself cosidering its own food production capabilities and its technological skills, can the minister indicate whether he is prepared either to intervene in the debate later today on my own motion in respect of establishing a world commission on resources or referring the subject matter in this particular motion and other matters of a similar nature relating to the World Food Conference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that the minister as well as others might be able to give their opinions so that there would be a well defined position before the minister, with his officials, attends this conference in Rome?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have already expressed certain tentative views about the deliberations of the conference in my speech on the address in reply. I congratulate the hon. member for giving members of the House an opportunity to express their views. I would hesitate to interrupt that debate before it has reached its full hour's duration.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—REASON FOR DELAY IN DEVELOPING GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. I heard what he said in the House about the conference and I would ask the minister whether there is any justification for the government waiting so long before reaching a position with regard to a matter of great importance to Canadians and the world. Is there any reason, in fact, for the government not having its position already developed in respect of the food conference, because on the surface it looks like something which ought to have been settled some time ago. What is all the difficulty?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian position has been under consideration for some considerable time. It has been the wish of the government to take into account the views of quite a variety of organizations and individuals, including the conferences mentioned by the hon. member for Egmont, before taking a final decision on the attitude to be taken. The government realizes the importance of the conference, not only to Canada but particularly to the developing countries of the world and its attitude will be conditioned by that realization.

SOCIAL SECURITY

RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS ON PENSIONS WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES—POSSIBLE AGREEMENT WITH UNITED KINGDOM AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that several years have gone by since the government launched an effort to secure reciprocal agreements on pensions with a number of countries and in view of the fact that thus far only one such reciprocal agreement has been put into effect, can the minister say whether the government is now prepared to activate this program in the hope that the reciprocal agreements might be reached fairly soon.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): At the present time, Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada is actively engaged in negotiations with those of a number of other countries concerning this. However, in such negotiations, the basic issue remains the same, that is, how much are other countries willing to give in exchange for the outstanding benefits available in Canada to retired people, as compared with those available in other countries. There are a number of countries anxious to avail themselves of all the Canadian benefits but unwilling to grant as much in exchange to those available to their nationals living in Canada. We always come across this problem in such negotiations.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the indications that there is a meeting of minds between this country and the United Kingdom and perhaps also between Canada and the United States, can the minister give any hope that agreements with either of these countries might be effected soon?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, there were discussions again recently concerning this among Canadian and British officials. However, there still remains the basic problem I just mentioned, namely whether the United Kingdom will grant anything in exchange for the extensive benefits presently available to Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just activate the program.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF WAR ORPHANS UNDER SPONSORSHIP OF PROVINCIALLY APPROVED HOMES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration relates to some undertakings he gave several months ago on the admission of war orphans to Canada as a humanitarian measure without the necessity for such orphans being adopted, that is, being admitted to Canada under the sponsorship of provincially approved homes. Can the minister bring the House up to date on that, particularly the undertaking given in Calgary last June.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to get more details from the hon. member on precisely what kind of information he wants. I can say generally, with regard to the application of Mr. Maurice Spring in connection with institutions he wished to expand at Springhill, we have examined this very carefully and have expressed great admiration for his motives but have indicated regretfully that it is a matter of Canadian immigration policy not to encourage the immigration of orphan children to a destined institution no matter how commendable. We look with more favour upon the situation where children can go into an adoptive relationship with mothers or fathers in this country.

POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING COUNSEL FOR PERSONS FACING SUMMARY DEPORTATION—REVIEW OF CASES BY MINISTER

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In a recent speech to the Alberta Chamber of Commerce on October 7 the minister referred to Canada's policy of clearly informing foreign workers of certain rights and responsibilities while in this country. In the light of these admirable sentiments may I ask the minister if he is prepared to take the initiative to permit individuals faced with summary deportation procedures, adequate time to obtain and properly instruct counsel?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the whole matter of immigration procedures, policy and legislation is under intense review now and as has been indicated—

Mr. Baldwin: It has been for the last five years.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it has been under investigation since 1952 and this government is going to do something about it.

Mr. Hees: You are getting as bad as Herb Gray and you know what happened to him.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. It is certainly time something was done about it. In those cases where individuals are treated unjustly, or there is suspicion they may be treated unjustly by special inquiry officers at summary deportation hearings, what steps does the minister take to redress cases of that sort and what is his method of review?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member or any other hon. member will give me specific instances I will ensure a thorough examination of the practices of special inquiry officers is undertaken. I must say that they have a tremendous undertaking, acting in the interests of this country and generally speaking they do a very fine job.

Mr. MacKay: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and further to what the minister said just now, I want to bring to his attention that I wrote him a letter which I sent to him by hand on July 22. It dealt with one of these cases but I have not had a satisfactory response.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT ON USE OF SEARCH WARRANTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, he having had the opportunity of reading the rather extraordinary judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in connection with search warrants in which the court concluded that one's home is indeed not one's castle, which is of course the essence of English common law. By this judgment, without a warrant, police may under circumstances enter one's home. Would the minister look into this question to the end that this right be returned to the position that it has always believed to have been, namely, that one's home is sacred and only a search warrant can be used, except in the case of rapid pursuit?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have had a chance to look at the decision of the Supreme Court. Of course that court found the justification for entry being permitted into the premises in the common law itself as well, in circumstances where a person suspected of having committed an offence was being pursued or sought. Those circumstances certainly do merit some special action on the part of law enforcement officers. I did notice, however, that the judgment raised the question of whether we might, by alteration in our rules in regard to warrant, provide at least in certain circumstances an alternative to the form of obtaining a warrant in order that they have it in hand if they do, in fact, find it necessary to enter premises. We will be giving consideration to that question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister recognizes that as one of the characteristics of a police state. I am not suggesting that exists in Canada. However, those who operate as police are able to invade one's home regardless of the circumstances. I hope that the government, at the earliest possible date, will bring in an amendment to ensure that that judgment shall, to the extent necessary, be altered so that the rights of Canadian citizens will not be lost to the police.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I did indicate that we would give consideration to whether the existing form of warrant is adequate for that purpose. I should like to disassociate myself entirely from the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman that the decision somehow indicated that entry would be possible in any sort of circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is pretty nearly wide open.

Mr. Lang: The case was specifically related to the right to enter when there was reasonable grounds for thinking a fugitive from the criminal law was being harboured. Those are pretty narrow circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to hear the explanation from the minister because he started off his answer originally saying that he had not read the judgment.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make clear to the right hon. gentleman that I said I had read the judgment, not that I had not.

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING TELEVISION STATION IN RIMOUSKI

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications.

Could the minister tell the House at what time a second TV station will be inaugurated in the Rimouski Area?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, that is for the CBC to decide and I do not report to the House for the corporation. In the absence of my colleague the Secretary of State, I shall take note of the question and have an answer in a few days.

ESTIMATES

REASON FOR FAILURE TO INDICATE INCREASE IN COST OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN MONTREAL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board who is responsible for the preparation and tabling of the estimates. Would the hon. gentleman advise if the estimated cost of two large public buildings in Montreal have escalated? I refer to Place Guy Favreau where the cost has risen from $42 million to $173 million and the postal complex which has risen from $56 million to $184 million. If that is so, why was there not a notation or addendum to that effect in the estimates recently tabled so that hon.

members would have it before them later this week in the debate on estimates.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we have proposed as a first step all estimates submitted to Cabinet starting from dissolution up to the beginning of this session of Parliament. Those are the estimates tabled. The next supplementary estimates will be submitted to the House in December next.

PUBLIC WORKS

REASON FOR DELAY IN TABLING ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the hon. gentleman advise this House why he has not laid before parliament the annual report of the department which is due within 21 days after the opening? Will he do this before debate starts on Wednesday and not conceal the information any longer from the House?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

● (1450)

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, subject to checking my recollection I think I do recall having signed a document forwarding to the Clerk of the House the annual report.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My staff phoned the minister's department today to ask for a copy of the report and were told it will not be ready or available for one week.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for that information.

Mr. Hees: The old pork barrel is in operation again.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REASON FOR ALLOWING TANKER TO LEAVE ST. JOHN'S IN VIEW OF FINANCIAL POSITION OF OWNER

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Has the minister caused an inquiry into the situation which arose in St. John's over the week-end, whereby a foreign supertanker whose application for return to Britain had just been denied by the federal court authorities, whose parent company had declared bankruptcy and which had an outstanding fuel bill for $300,000 was somehow able to leave port and leave in her wake an RCMP patrol vessel. Why was precautionary surveillance not undertaken? Will the minister make information on this matter available to parliament?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not a report on the matter but will get one as soon as possible.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR FUNDS TO REPAIR STORM DAMAGE TO SMALL CRAFT FACILITIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. In light of the excessive damage done to breakwaters, skidways and the like caused by the week-end storm in Nova Scotia, would the minister consider treating this disaster in a special way by requesting additional funds for this type of reconstruction and repair, otherwise the small craft harbour development program will be delayed for another two or three years.

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have already asked for some information, following representations by an hon. member. I hope, God and the weather willing, to go to Halifax this evening. I will make it a point to bring this matter up with officials of my department, as I am the last one who would want to see any delay in bringing about improvements under the small craft harbour program.

STATUS OF WOMEN

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S YEAR—REASON FOR CHANGE IN PROGRAM DIRECTOR

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State, if such a minister is present. What has been the minister's response to a telegram from 75 delegates to a consultation here in Ottawa to prepare for International Women's Year, who deplored a change of the head of the program which is to take place within a couple of months of the beginning of International Women's Year.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the question and try to get an answer for the hon. member as soon as possible.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, while the minister is kindly taking note, will he give us an explanation for the timing of the reclassification of the position involved. When will the new appointee start to work, and will she be full time?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON TANKER ROUTE FROM ALASKA—CANADIAN POSITION ON SAFETY STANDARDS FOR TANKERS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has to do with questions which have been raised here in the last few days concerning the tanker route. Has the Canadian team engaged in discussions with the United States taken exception to or protested against the reduction of safety standards in shipbuilding, involving, for example, the double-bottom standard, which the United States authorities had undertaken to ensure.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure whether I understand the full implications of the question. With respect to double bottoms, I understand there has been some divergence of view on the part of experts on both sides of the border on the question.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As it is obvious to the House that no objections have been raised, is the Canadian team prepared to suggest safety standards of design for ships which will enter our waters and could endanger our shores.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian team has put forward and has under discussion with the United States the over-all environmental protection plan, including all aspects of the protection of the environment. My hon. friend can assume that that particular point has been looked after as well.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NATURE AND PURPOSE OF CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON MEASURES TO COMBAT INFLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and has to do with the conference coming up on October 30, I believe, between the federal government and provincial premiers, which shows that the Prime Minister has found out that inflation is very serious in this country. Has the government yet adopted any sense of urgency on this matter and, if so, is the Prime Minister going to present to the premiers a specific and updated timetable, to get an effective national policy under way, or will we continue, and I say this with great respect, with a dog-eat-dog society?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the meetings that are being arranged by the Prime Minister with his counterparts in the provinces are part of an approach that has been announced over a period of some weeks. There is nothing new about this. He has not, however, succumbed to the temptation to have a summit meeting in which there will be a vast assembly of people who will engage in talk and nothing else. The approach of the government toward this is one of careful planning and the kind of action which we hope will be effective. It is a problem of the utmost complexity and is unprecedented, and the kinds of ideas which have been put forward by the opposition on summitry are now outdated.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Acting Prime Minister has to express any sympathy for the unacceptable attitude of the Prime Minister in the past. May I ask this question: Is the process of consultation clearly aimed at establishing nation-wide consensus on voluntary guidelines? If so, is the Prime Minister going to make that clear to the premiers and exchange views on what guidelines should be sought? Is this on the agenda, sir?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the negotiations which will be carried on at many levels—the Prime Minister with the premiers of the provinces, the Minister of Finance with his counterparts, I hope the Minister of Labour with representatives of labour unions and various ministers with the business community—will be to put forward what the government conceives to be the nature of the problem we now face.

Mr. Stanfield: And what is that?

Mr. Sharp: It will be to seek the views of the various groups in the community so that there can be an approach which has some chance of being accepted generally.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are two years too late.

Mr. Sharp: The government does not intend at this time to press for wage and price controls or that kind of approach which the people of Canada turned down, as the hon. gentleman knows very well.

Mr. Alexander: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is it not amazing how enlightened this government has become after July 8?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE NEGOTIATIONS WITH BRAZILIAN COMPANY ON PURCHASE OF ARMOURED VEHICLES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Keeping in mind that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is in Brazil, will the minister inform the House whether his department, or the government, is negotiating with a Brazilian company, Engeheiros Especializados, on the purchase of $200 million worth of armoured vehicles?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, no we are not in any such negotiation that would be nearing a purchase. We do, of course, examine sources of supply in all parts of the world.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

ALLEGED SALE OF GOVERNMENT PURCHASED OIL TO COMMERCIAL COMPANIES

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. In his absence may I direct it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns the 21 million gallons of heating oil the government purchased last year for approximately 90 cents a gallon. Can he explain to the House why the government had to sell that same oil back to Canadian Oil companies for 15 cents a gallon.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my information is that the hon. gentleman is wrong in that respect. It has been used by the Canadian government in its own establishments.

Mr. Reynolds: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister saying it is fact that none of this oil has been sold to Canadian oil companies?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would have to confirm whether any of it has been sold to them. In general, it is being used in Canadian government establishments rather than being put back on the market.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

EFFECTS OF SUPERSONIC AIRCRAFT ON UPPER ATMOSPHERE—POSSIBILITY OF CANADA REFERRING QUESTION TO UNITED NATIONS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the recent Massachusetts Institute of Technology study, commissioned by the United States Department of Transport, that warns about the dangerous effects of supersonic transports to the upper atmosphere and in view of the news over the week-end that the Ango-French Concorde landed on Canadian territory, can the minister advise the House what is the government's policy regarding landing rights for supersonic aircraft?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the Minister of Transport could tell the hon. member more about the policy than I can. As for the effect such aircraft would have on upper atmosphere ozone, the hon. member will be interested to know that a team of Canadian scientists is participating in an international study of this problem.

● (1500)

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question. Can the minister advise how these studies have proceeded and whether in addition to these studies Canada intends to take any steps to raise this important international matter before the United Nations?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I think we will wait until we have the results of these studies before we enter into the steps the hon. member is suggesting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Richardson.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLICY STATEMENTS BY SPOKESMEN FOR GOVERNMENT—MINISTER'S APPROVAL

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What is the working relationship between the minister and Mr. Ivan Head of the Prime Minister's office, a spokesman on foreign affairs? Specifically, does the minister see, or approve in advance Mr. Head's policy pronouncements such as those made to the press on September 25 and October 15?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I doubt the urgency of the question. That question might have been relevant in September, but in late October it is a bit obsolete.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: My working relationships with the Prime Minister and Mr. Head, who works for the Prime Minister, are excellent.

AGRICULTURE

GROUND BEEF—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT HIGH FAT CONTENT AND EXCESSIVE BACTERIAL COUNTS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of substantial evidence revealed in last night's CBC program "Market Place" that there is widespread violation of federal regulations governing the fat content of hamburger, and excessive bacterial counts, and in view of the large number of cows now coming to market in Canada, which provide the bulk of our hamburger and ground beef, has the minister taken the necessary steps to ensure greater surveillance of this aspect of our meat trade, in particular to ensure there is no repeat of the rotten egg situation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows full well that in Canada we have one of the best inspection services. I did not see the program last night. I will have to check the substance of the program. If in fact it appears the federal people responsible are not doing the job they should, they will be checked.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

GROUND BEEF—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF JUNE 6 REPORT OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the recommendations contained in the report of the Food Prices Review Board on ground beef which was released on June 6, and in light of the shocking revelations made last night in the CBC program "Market Place" just referred to, showing diverse amounts of fat content and bacterial count, notwithstanding federal regulations, as the minister responsible for the Food Prices Review Board, what steps is he taking to implement the recommendations contained in that June 6 report?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope the adverse publicity given on TV last night will have salutary effects.

On the other hand, my department's officials have already taken action against the persons who violated the regulations. In particular, I asked that very special attention be given to these inspections and we will not fail to take action against those who will not comply with the rules.

HEALTH

ALLEGED HIGH BACTERIAL COUNT IN GROUND BEEF—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE REMEDIAL MEASURES TAKEN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister now in a position to assure Canadians that his department has the inspection capability to enforce the food and drug regulations in Canada, and will he take steps to examine these very serious charges of shockingly high bacterial counts in ground beef which could, according to the researchers, cause poisoning to Canadians? Can he give assurance that he is taking steps to have this shocking situation remedied?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take steps to determine whether the bacterial counts come from the CBC program "Market Place" or from the stores. I will advise the hon. member of the results.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of the absence of 11 cabinet ministers. Can the government House leader inform the House if we have today witnessed the beginning of the roster system? If so, when might we expect a list indicating the days on which ministers expect to be in the House?

Mr. Sharp: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. The reason a number of ministers are absent today is that they are on government business in various parts of the world, including various parts of Canada. If the hon. member would give me a list of the kinds of questions he wants to ask, it would help greatly in expediting the business of the House. Possibly the other House leaders could do the same.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of the Chair on this point of order. I was recognized to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which I did. I rose to ask a supplementary question. It is my impression that a member has the privilege of asking a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may know that despite the freedom I try to let hon. members enjoy during the question period, nevertheless there are certain limits, even on the oral questions, as to what ought and what ought not to be asked, and whether by an oral question or by a question on the order paper. In every case, the judgment of the Chair must be exercised as to the number of supplementaries, if indeed any, ought to be permitted, in the interest of other members who also want an opportunity to ask their questions.

The hon. member well knows that the question he asked was of very questionable character vis-à-vis its qualifications as a proper question to be asked in the question period. For that reason, and using the discretion of the Chair, I did not recognize the hon. member for a supplementary. I did not feel his question ought to be followed by a supplementary in preference to other members who wanted to ask questions.

INDIAN OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING LEASES, LICENCES AND ROYALTIES

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-15, respecting oil and gas in Indian lands, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the House was advised in the Speech from the Throne that the government intended to introduce legislation respecting oil and gas on Indian lands. Bill C-15 was given first reading before this House on October 7. It is my pleasure, as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to bring the bill forward for second reading today.

It is a bill which merits the support of all members. All of us are aware of the recent turmoil in oil and gas prices, markets and distribution. All of us are aware how essential it is for Indian bands and people to participate fully in the Canadian economy, getting all the benefits they can from the lands set aside on their behalf. This bill is intended to ensure that equitable benefits from oil and gas production on Indian lands go to the Indian people.

Let me give the House a brief history of oil and gas production on Indian lands so that I may demonstrate how important this legislation is to a great many Indian people—important as a tangible indication that the people of Canada are determined that Indians shall receive the fullest benefits from the resources on their reserves. Most of the wells now producing on Indian lands were drilled between 1947 and 1956. Exploration, drilling and production were governed by regulations under the Indian Act. They were structured to conform closely to Alberta's regulations, for it was in Alberta that the major oil finds were made. They adopted the Alberta model of low royalty rates and long-term leases of 10 and 21 years. Under this plan, the bands received cash bonuses, royalties on actual production, nominal acreage rentals and compensation for surface rights.

This worked well over the years when the oil industry was relatively stable, and it fitted into the oil and gas environment where the wells were located. The need for change was made clear last year when the oil crisis erupted and it became apparent that the regulations of 1966 were not flexible enough to meet the situation. Difficulties arose when it became necessary to consider revising the regulations and it became apparent that the Indian Act was not a sound basis for applying the kind of controls and flexible approach which the situation demanded. It was agreed that new legislation was necessary to make certain that the regulation of this important resource was consistent with the best interests of the Indian bands concerned. The leases entered into under existing regulations called for royalty rates which were not consistent with the new situation, and these rates were locked into those leases. The royalties were determined by agreements which did not—indeed, could not have foreseen the changing times.

It is evident that this inflexible situation requires action and that only legislation will serve the Indian needs. It is essential that the royalties be adjustable without delay when circumstances in the industry change. it is imperative that Indian bands receive royalties which the latest market situation warrants, just as others do. Oil and gas resources on Indian lands cannot be allowed to provide windfall benefits for those operators fortunate enough to have their production coming from Indian reserves. All the oil producing provinces have enacted legislation to amend royalty scales as well as to establish elaborate marketing and production controls of various kinds. Indian bands alone are caught in a situation where regulations cannot be quickly adjusted to the new turn of events.

Fortunately, a study team had been appointed before any oil crisis was visualized. The team included the solicitor for the producing bands, the solicitor for the Alberta Indian Association, and experts in the oil and gas field. The study team worked fast. On March 28, 1974, an order in council set new rates of royalty and established the principle of variable royalties so that rates could be altered to meet changing conditions. This was an interim measure. The present bill was drafted to follow up the provisional changes made by the order in council and to establish the framework needed. It is too bad it could not have been introduced and passed—for I am sure it will be passed quite quickly—before prorogation. However, that was not to be, and the next best thing is the early introduction of the bill which I am presenting today.

Bill C-15 provides a framework for the future regulation of oil and gas activities on Indian lands in the best interests of the bands. Dealing as it does with this one resource, Bill C-15 in no way conflicts with the government's commitment not to amend the Indian Act until the Indian people's proposals are put before the government, the House and the Canadian people. Far from conflicting with the principles of the Indian Act, the bill provides solid benefits to Indian people. Let me summarize its objectives: It reiterates the principles set out in order in council PC 1974-732 which increased royalty rates significantly. It elaborates the scope of the authority contained now in the Indian oil and gas regulation. It set aside the royalty provisions of the existing oil and gas contracts and provides for royalties to be prescribed from time to time by order in council, thus giving the flexibility needed in an ever-changing situation. It enables the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, after first getting the approval of the band concerned, to enter into special arrangements for reducing royalties where conditions warrant that step. It provides that all oil and gas rights granted on Indian reserves may be subject to legislation which is suited to the industry conditions of the day.

In early 1974 there were consultations with the Indian bands about proposed changes in the regulations. The more important proposals concerning royalties have been brought into effect through amendments to regulations. This bill ensures that in the future the regulations will be more flexible and responsive. This bill is concerned mostly with the future. The oil and gas resource is a "once only" proposition. Once the oil is removed from the ground, it will not again enrich the band. Oil and gas production is a relatively shortlived proposition. The Pigeon Lake Indian reserve has oil which was estimated in 1969 to be good for 30 years production at the then prevailing rate. Today, five years later, it is thought these reserves will decline drastically in the next three years due to increased production. The greatest possible return must flow to the band when the oil is taken from the ground and is lost to them forever.

Indian bands will receive, in royalties, about $40 million this year from this important resource. Last year they received $9 million. As oil and gas production declines, there may be a reduction in this income, although with prices being the way they are, no one can tell for certain what the future will bring. Royalty income is based on production and the current selling price of conventional oil and gas. Several reserves are known to be underlain by many millions of barrels of very heavy crude oil. When technology improves, and the price is right, we can expect to see royalty income from this resource flowing into band funds. The bill before us anticipates the day when that happens, for such a particular resource will require flexible approaches, being different in many ways from what is produced today.

The bands which enjoy oil revenues will certainly make as good use of the money in the future as they have in the past. Many hon. members—especially those from Alberta—know, for example, how the Enoch, Sawridge and Hobbema bands have improved their communities in economic, cultural and social terms with the benefits of oil income. Others have done the same.

Canadians generally will, I am sure, want to see the Indian people enjoy whatever benefits they can from the reserves set aside on their behalf. Oil and gas were not foreseen in Alberta when the Indian reserves were set aside. They are an accident of time and circumstances. For a people who have generally suffered through the accidents of time and have repeatedly lost their struggles with circumstances, it is an important principle that this bill sets out. The principle is that parliament will do its best to see that the Indian people get the greatest possible benefits from the resources set aside on their behalf. The government believes this bill is important to the Indian people and hopes the House will support it in that view.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Does the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) wish to ask a question? The minister may certainly accept a question if he so desires.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister spoke about royalties being changed under the new bill or the regulations. When the federal government charges royalties—not the provinces, because I assume we are dealing with a resource on federal land, not only on reserves but also in areas outside provincial jurisdiction—can the minister assure the House that the producers, the drillers, will be able to write off as a legitimate expense any royalties collected by the federal government, rather than paying tax on a federal tax, as is now the case under the arrangement whereby the federal government presently imposes its tax on provincial taxes?

Mr. Buchanan: Basically, that does not involve a decision to be taken by my department. We are aware of this question and have been engaged in discussions with representatives of the industry with regard to it. However, it is a matter which will be dealt with by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he introduces his budget.

● (1520)

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That is the kind of nonsense of which this government is guilty. They are ruining the resource industry of this country. This bill will do nothing.

An hon. Member: That is hardly a point of order.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I had not thought to commence my debating in this House with this particular bill. I say that, not because I am not interested in it; there are, in fact, Indian bands and Indian people in my constituency and the area that I know so well who are interested in this bill and in the proceeds and royalties derived from petroleum wells that have been drilled. However, some of the most concerned people in our party are not here today because they did not expect the legislative program to proceed as rapidly as it has. This is probably an indication of the extent to which—he was different in his role as Secretary of State for External Affairs—the present government House leader (Mr. Sharp) has been made more mellow and his task smoother so that it has become, in the best political sense of the word, even more slippery so far as the conduct of House business is concerned. Perhaps the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), the former House leader, may derive the same benefit. Who knows, even the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), at one time House leader, might become a good House leader if he has experience in external affairs.

I am glad to speak following the minister, whom I wish well in the responsibilities that he has assumed. His is one of the most difficult tasks facing any government. We in this country have to come to grips with the problems of the Indian people. I do not say "the Indian problem" because I think there are a number of Indians who have problems, as there are a number of white people and non-Indians who have problems. But the Indian question is a difficult one, as all of us who were here for the opening of parliament are aware. We know what could happen and we know the dangers inherent in the relationship between the government of Canada and the Indian people. But knowing the minister, I think he will do his very best. He had the advantage of getting his start in the city of Edmonton, in the province of Alberta, and he has not been in the east long enough to have all of those good qualities buried under the weight of eastern problems which we all see from time to time.

We must look pretty carefully at this bill, for it is not quite as simple as the minister indicated. In the first place, it is probably the forerunner of other matters that will arise in the future. I am not going to go into them. There is the Mackenzie Valley pipeline and the rights of the Indian people there in connection with petroleum reserves. In addition, the Indian people face many other problems with which the government of Canada will have to contend. I think it has to contend with them on the basis that the long period of wardship, of trusteeship, must now come to an end and the Indian people must be deemed to be qualified to deal with their problems as they see fit. This does not mean that they will not make mistakes, as we have made mistakes in the past. But if they are not given the opportunity to find their own methods of dealing with their difficulties, then they will stay as our wards for a long time—a situation that is undesirable both for them and for us.

Although what I now say is probably a little irrelevant, it is nevertheless related to this whole question. Just a few days ago I had the pleasure of accompanying the new Lieutenant-Governor of Alberta, Ralph Steinhauer, himself a full-blooded Indian, into the Rainbow Lake area in the Assumption district where there is a band of Slavey Indians who have petroleum reserves in respect of which the government has been receiving royalties from time to time. On my visit there I met with people I have known for 15 to 20 years, such as Chief Harry Chonkolay, his wife Elizabeth, and many others. Some I met for the first time almost 40 years ago when I went into Fort Vermillion country. At that time we went by boat. There were no roads, railway or aircraft and so I walked 30 to 40 miles into the area and first met some of these people.

They have done a pretty fair job of trying to conduct the affairs of their band. They have had problems with the department and also with the white people who have gone into the area, but generally the chiefs and the band councils have brought the affairs of their people along with a moderate degree of success. In speaking to the chief at the banquet given for His Honour, I learned of the difficulties facing them. He told me, "We are older; we are getting on in years. We have managed the affairs of our people, with their consent, as their elected representatives, and have negotiated with the government for many years. But it is time to yield our place to young men and women and let them manage the affairs of the band instead of us".

Their complaint was that as they looked around and talked to the young people, they were told, "We do not want the job. The government of Canada and the representatives of the Indian Affairs department have not over the years conducted themselves in a way that lends itself to a reasonable arrangement being arrived at between our people and the rest of the people of Canada so that in due course the Indian people can, if they see fit, take their place with the other people of Canada or, if they see fit, stay on the reserve". These people read about and watched on television the violence at Kenora, British Columbia, and in Ottawa. In light of this, these young people are most reluctant to take upon themselves the responsibility of acting in the band councils, in the councils of the Indian people, and of carrying on in the same way as did their parents, not wanting to use methods of violence, anger and hatred, but of reason, compromise, understanding and co-operation.

This bill might well be an indication of the government's intentions regarding the Indian people. We may be able to go back to the Indian people and tell them that the government has changed, that it is prepared to negotiate with the Indians and give them responsibility for conducting their own affairs. We may be able to say, "We ask you, the young people, to take your place in the councils of your own people and to conduct affairs for them". For this reason I attach a great deal of importance to this legislation.

I am confident there will be other bills to follow. There is even talk about a complete revision of the Indian Act. One young gentleman who has been prominent for some years in the councils of native people in my province—he was originally from my constituency—namely, Harold Cardinal, has with the aid of Indian councils taken it upon himself to provide a model Indian Act. He was here with it not long ago at the time of discussions with the minister and his colleagues.

I use that fact to illustrate that many of these young people are competent, knowledgeable and capable of taking their place as representatives of the Indian peoples. They are still suspicious of the extent to which the federal government and the federal department, with a long and sad history of colonialism which I hope has now ended, are prepared to accept them in a relationship which will vest in them the right, at long last, to handle their own affairs. For that reason, while we shall not oppose the passage of this bill, we follow that course dubitatio; we go along with it, but we are a little doubtful. We will use the opportunity in committee to examine in close detail some of the reasons, consequences and factors which relate to the application of this legislation.

For the reasons I have mentioned, I would refer the minister to clause 3 of the bill. I do not intend to go into the bill in great detail, as that will be done in committee, but to illustrate the point I am trying to make it is essential to refer to the legislation in that we are dealing with its principles. The bill purports to seek ratification and confirmation by this House of certain regulations purported to have been enacted by the governor in council under the Indian oil and gas regulations passed pursuant to section 57 of the act. At first blush, many of us wonder why it is essential, if these regulations have in fact the force of law, having legally been passed and lying squarely within the competence of the governor in council, to come to this House asking parliament to ratify and confirm regulations which to all intents and purposes have the effect of law. I hope the minister will respond to this question, if not when he sums up, then certainly at the committee when he makes his opening statement.

Most of us have been around here long enough to know very well the extent to which this government in particular, and most governments, provincial as well as federal, have steadily eroded the right of parliament to legislate. We know the extent to which governments have taken unto themselves, by almost every bill which is passed, more powers to legislate by order in council, thereby encroaching steadily upon the rights of the representatives of the people. I do not see any great rush by this government or this department to come to parliament and say that, because it passed regulations six months or a year ago, it now thinks it is essential to come back to this high court of parliament for ratification and confirmation. This is the first question the minister will have to answer.

We will want to examine precisely what the government has done, what operations it has carried out and what contractual arrangements it has entered into pursuant to these regulations, to ensure that they are in fact proper, legal and beneficial to the people for whose purposes they are alleged to have been passed. That is primarily a duty and a responsibility of the committee which will be dealing with this subject.

Clause 4 of the bill establishes the point I am making. It provides that the governor in council may make regulations. This is the regulatory granting of power which this House is being asked to approve, and it is enormous in extent. At this point in time in our relations with the Indian people, I am wondering if we can reflect to some extent our desire to limit some of these powers, rather than giving them to the governor in council without inhibition. Can we not reflect our desire to bring in the Indian people and their band councils who, I trust, will be the beneficiaries of the regulations to be passed?

I will not be a member of the committee and will not have the opportunity or the privilege of participating in the discussion, so I throw out these suggestions in the hope that some of my colleagues who will be members will give them thought. For example, the bill provides that the governor in council may make regulations respecting the granting of leases, permits and licences for the exploitation of oil and gas, as well as the terms and conditions thereof. I should like to see inserted in that clause—and of course we cannot do it here—wording to the effect that the governor in council may, after consultation with the Indians and their band councils, make certain regulations.

In respect of the granting of leases, permits and licences, is there any reason why this right cannot be vested in the band councils themselves? Perhaps there is a reason. If there is, I hope the minister will point it out to the committee. The reason may relate to the intention of the government in respect of the proceeds of these royalties, and in this regard I think there is an onus and a responsibility on the government to spell it out. These people have been wards of the government for a hundred years. Surely they should now be allowed to assume responsibility for and to deal with their own affairs, making their own mistakes even as we have done. Why should we not allow the Indian people or band councils to make or grant leases, permits and licences for the exploitation of oil and gas on Indian lands? As I understand it, these band councils, through a proper democratic process, have been duly elected to carry out the responsibilities of the Indian people, subject to pressures, even as we are in this House, from the people who elected them. The same argument would apply to the clause dealing with the disposition of any interest in Indian lands necessarily incidental to the exploitation of oil and gas. Why should not the native people and the band councils be the ones, rather than the governor in council, to make these dispositions?

I will not go into the subsequent clause in detail because I think the wording speaks for itself. It refers to regulations providing for the seizure and forfeiture of any oil or gas taken in contravention of any regulations. I think this is an area in which the governor in council should operate. However, I think the wording should make it clear that the governor in council shall seek the consent of the band councils and Indian people affected. That is the case I am trying to make, and I again suggest that the minister and the government respond by pointing out the reason this step should not be taken at this point in the history of the relations of the Canadian government with our Indian people.

In clause 5 there is a principle which I do not like. It may be explained by the minister in the committee. However, it provides that the oil and gas obtained from Indian lands after the coming into force of this legislation is subject to the payment to Her Majesty in right of Canada of the royalties prescribed from time to time by the regulations. This raises the entire question. The minister attempted to go some distance along the road by giving an indication of what these royalties should be. My party, and I am sure many of the Indian people, would be interested in knowing, through the form of a complete and detailed statement, what royalties have been secured and what payments have been made to the government, which I hope the government has held exclusively in trust for the affected Indian bands and band councils.

We would also like to know the extent to which these payments have been diminished with regard to royalties paid to the provincial governments because of changes in the price of petroleum products over the last few months. I do not blame the minister for this. However, I have in mind the situation which prevailed in this country, starting almost a year ago, when we came up against the so-called petroleum problems, the shortages and the doubts which existed in the minds of so many people in other countries as to whether there would be enough petroleum, oil and gas for the western countries. I also have in mind the escalation of price which followed. I would have thought, therefore, the minister would have told us how much money has been lost, if any, to the Indian people because the amounts paid in respect of royalties were substantially less than the amounts paid the provincial government.

Having in mind the increased prices, have the Indian people suffered a substantial loss and, if so, do they have an action for damages against the federal government? It is not necessary for one to be a lawyer to know that if one has a trustee to whom he gives certain rights, through power of attorney, to do things on his behalf, and the trustee acts negligently or foolishly resulting in a substantial loss of money, there may well be a perfectly valid action for damages against the trustee. I know it is not easy to sue the federal government or to tackle city hall. I am not in any sense accusing the minister of misleading the House, but I wonder whether this may be one reason for the clause I referred to earlier. Could there be a potential action against the federal government, and could the effect of this legislation be to vindicate the federal government in what it proposes to do under the regulations? That may have been the intention.

I practised law long enough, before I was induced to enter politics, to know that what governments do is not always right. I have had some measure of success even in suing the federal government, because the federal government sometimes legislates in haste, without due regard for the law and therefore sometimes leaves itself open to legal action. This might very well be the effect of the passage of some of the regulations the government is now asking parliament to ratify.

The minister should realize he is being given notice that the committee will press him closely on this issue as well as on the other issues I have mentioned. That is all I intend to say now, Mr. Speaker. I hope the minister understands that our party will let this bill go to committee. Some of my colleagues may want to make a contribution to this debate. They have knowledge of the issues and may wish to make some comments. However, it is our hope that the bill will in fact receive second reading and go to the committee. I believe I am entitled to express a final caveat to the effect that the minister may expect the closest scrutiny and questioning in the committee. In fact, it will be a great start to his ministerial career.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, unlike the last speaker, I do not come from a constituency in which there are very many native people, but I do not think that is a reason for not participating in this debate. I believe the welfare of our native people should be the concern of every Canadian.

I should like to commend the minister for his approach to this whole task. I express once again my earnest hope that during this parliament a substantial advance may be made toward giving the native people the measure of justice of which they have been deprived in the past. I do not for a moment doubt the good intentions of the minister in bringing forward this particular legislation. He explained it is for the benefit of the native people in that they may receive a greater share of the royalties. No one could carp or quibble about that good intention. Unfortunately, however, we need more than merely good intentions.

I find this bill to be very sweeping in its provisions. I agree with much that has been said by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). There are few subjects more sensitive and important than the whole question of Indian lands, including mineral rights and gas and oil royalties. It is not only a sensitive, but also a highly complex subject. Before parliament takes the responsibility of passing this legislation, in my judgment there should be the most searching scrutiny.

In this bill I think I see traces of what I regard as paternalism on the part of the department, through the power of regulation, in respect of the control of these matters. I want to see a greater indication that the Indians themselves will be given a measure of management and control over their resources. We want there to be full consultation. I had a short conversation with the minister. I understand that before the government drafted this bill a study team, including the solicitor for the producing bands and the solicitor for the Alberta Indian Association, made some recommendations. I wonder whether such consultation is wide enough. Having been a solicitor myself, I know how busy solicitors are and how apt they are to keep these things to themselves. It seems to me full consultation means a little more than merely telling a few lawyers what this is all about and asking for their comments or recommendations. I wonder whether full consultation has taken place, because this matter affects not only the Indians in Alberta but a whole complex situation which stretches across Canada.

The hon. member for Peace River pointed out that clause 3 of the bill provides that certain regulations which are not specified or described—the minister did not tell us what was in them-are to continue as though they had been passed by parliament. But parliament has not passed them, Mr. Speaker. Parliament has not even seen them. I do not think we should agree to the proposition that something has been done by an act of parliament when such is not the case. Of course, in committee we can find out what the regulations are. I understand that most are designed for the protection of the native people and some are designed to give a measure of control to Indian bands. I do not want to go into the long unhappy history of our dealings with the native people, but I do want to know exactly what the regulations are. Should they not be subject to full consultation and the undertakings which I understand were given by the minister or his predecessors, namely, that no change would be made to the Indian Act without such consultation?

I understand that various groups of Indians across Canada are studying these matters with the assistance of scholars and researchers. One might wonder how we have reached this stage without consultation. Although the regulations are to provide protection for the Indians, they are only part of the legislation, so far as I can make out, until revoked by the governor in council. If we have something that is protection for our native people, why should it be subject to change overnight? That is a question I should like answered if I were an Indian. I am not suggesting the minister would reduce that protection; I am just giving my opinion that the wording of the bill gives rise to reasonable suspicion.

I agree with the hon. member for Peace River also, that clause 4 gives the widest possible scope to the making of regulations. This, again, hands the whole subject over—without a hint that anybody is to be consulted—to control by the regulations. Everybody knows that the regulations are prepared in the department, and this bill continues that sort of control. It is interesting that only one clause refers to the band council. Clause 5(2) reads:

> The minister may, with the approval of the council of the band concerned, enter into a special agreement with any person for a reduction of royalties payable under subsection (1).

I thought the main purpose of the legislation was to increase the amount of royalties payable, not to reduce it. This is the only clause which contains specific reference to the approval of the band council. As the hon. member for Peace River asked, why is approval of the band council not incorporated into the other clauses dealing with what is basically the property of the Indians themselves? Clause 5(1) ends with these words:

> —payment to Her Majesty in right of Canada of the royalties prescribed from time to time by the regulations.

There is not a hint there of anything to be held by the Crown in trust for the Indian people. If that is the intention, why not say so and give an assurance to the Indian people that they will benefit? As beneficiaries, they can then assert certain rights which in my judgment they justly claim. The whole bill seems to ignore the sensitivities of the Indians, Mr. Speaker, and I think it must be changed in committee to make certain matters explicit. Let us make it clear that the royalties are there to be used. I can understand that in certain circumstances they should not be paid directly to the Indian bands concerned, but to the federal authorities. However, that principle should be made clear.

The bill is vague in other respects, Mr. Speaker. It has been asked how it fits in with the federal-provincial transfer act of 1930 which I understand applies in the prairie provinces and, in the eyes of the Indians, confers upon them certain explicit rights in respect of gas and oil. When they see this bill, containing power to do almost anything, will they not consider some of those rights lost to them? Such questions can be answered in committee to some extent, but I think they should also be made clear to parliament.

I would urge the government to seek a wide cross-section of Indian opinion before a bill so vital to their interests is made law. This party will be glad to co-operate in any way we can. It is important that, even with the best intentions, we do not add to the suspicion and feeling of paternalism created by such legislation. Sometimes the Indians feel they are kept out of the process of making basic decisions. I believe it is the minister's intention—it certainly is ours—to get away from the era of paternalism and dependence so that our native people can decide questions for themselves.

We have a new minister, and perhaps now is the time for him to point out to his officers just what he wants. He should ask that the act be redrawn to ensure that Indians and their band councils are consulted and their right to the royalties held in trust for them is stated in the legislation. He should ensure, with regard to the section which purports to provide that these regulations—which parliament has not even seen—are to have the total force of legislation passed by parliament, that parliament is fully informed of the intent of the regulations and that the Indian people know exactly the effect upon them of the legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about Bill C-15, an act respecting oil and gas in Indian lands.

This bill concerns me somewhat since there is an Indian reservation in my constituency following the troubles in the province of Quebec concerning James Bay, I think that the presentation of this bill is giving rise to some apprehension. I have always urged that the Indians be treated with equality and justice in Canada. Since my election to Parliament, when I look at some of the bills brought forward and at the role of the administration in some fields, I become even more apprehensive, Mr. Speaker. We keep saying that we should give back to the Indians their power of administration since we feel they are mature enough to administer themselves. This is what I believe, Mr. Speaker, but this is not what happens actually. I see a striking example of this situation every day in my constituency when I see the manager who is a white man administer the reservation as if it were his own. When he thinks that an Indian can injure or become as educated as he is, because some Indians are educated, he quickly drives him out of the reservation. I say "drive" because he is given a job 200 or 300 miles from the reservation at double or triple the salary he would get on the reservation to prevent him from influencing his people.

As for the others, the government hires them so that they cannot say anything about the administration of the reservation. In this way, the white men take advantage of the Indians on our reservations, and we accept this and think that it is a good thing. Nobody says anything, but the Indians keep protesting to no avail.

That is why I am warning the minister. I know he is still full of good intentions. Today, he brings forth a small bill, but I believe that small bill of a few pages will stir up a big discussion. With regard to the discussion that will and must follow, I am sure the minister will consult the chiefs of the Indian bands because legislation is being passed which concerns their lands.

Indeed, clause 4 says this:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations
> (a) respecting the granting of leases, permits and licences for the exploitation of oil and gas in Indian lands and the terms and conditions thereof;

The governor general "may". Therefore, he has the right to do so. I will not go as far as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and say that the band chiefs should give out those permits and licenses, because the government must retain authority in Canada, but he must exercise it democratically. It is not enough to merely say that the advice of the Indians authorities will perhaps be sought, that they will be consulted. Indeed, let us have worthwhile discussion with them, let us be sincere with those people as we should be with all Canadians.

I heard it said a while ago that the Indians were somewhat apprehensive whenever the provincial or federal governments were introducing bills such as this one. If I were an Indian myself, I would be justified in being apprehensive. Knowing how many times they have been taken in, I believe I would be concerned myself. That is why I am asking the Minister to be very cautious, to be extremely careful and to try for once, with his bill, to do justice to all Canadians including our native people, with the respect to our neatural resources, with respect to the expropriation of sections of their lands so that we will not have to use public funds, as was done concerning the James Bay project, to give those groups a chance to be heard in our courts.

Mr. Speaker, even if this bill does not amount to very much, I hope that when it is considered on third reading the minister will supply more information on it, which will enable us to vote in a more intelligent way, because the object of today's vote is to refer this bill to the committee for examination.

Actually, we do not accept the principle of this bill. We must provide for an agreement which is absolutely necessary if we want to undertake the development of natural gas deposits and the exploration of new oil reserves, because it will be absolutely necessary then to go through Canadian territory. But this should be done in all fairness and the owners considered as equals and given whatever they are entitled to.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) upon his appointment. I am sure he recognizes, as do other members of the House, that he has accepted an important challenge on behalf of the people of Canada. What will happen with regard to Indian affairs in the next couple of decades will be most important to our country, as I am sure he is well aware. We hope that the minister's work will prove fruitful and will enable our Indian people to be integrated into the mainstream of Canadian life.

I shall preface my remarks by saying that the government has introduced this bill with good intentions. I commend them for that and for other good pieces of legislation of this kind. Our concerns regarding this bill have been referred to by previous speakers. I shall mention only one or two major issues. I am concerned about how extensively the Indian people will become involved in Canadian life as a result of this legislation.

It seems to me that for too long the government has played the role of foster parent to the Indian people, a role in which the Indian people have been subservient to government. I believe this bill intends to give them a better deal for their oil and gas royalties. Nevertheless, from my reading of the bill it is apparent that the government will decide the rate of royalty, when and where development will take place, and so on. Consequently, the Indian people will still be left out of an important process, that of decision-making. If they are to fit fully into the mainstream of Canadian life, we must recognize that these people must participate more fully in decisions affecting their own lives. We can say this for sure: if there is one thing that must become an increasing part of government, it is to begin to think less and less about the rights of specific groups of people and to think more and more about the broader context of human rights. We see this bill brought forward again within the framework of some kind of "Indian" context. If we viewed it simply from a "people's" context, we would see that the need for putting these people into a greater decision-making role would then be necessary and brought forward.

We are about to enter into a period of increasing ferment among the Indian people. I believe we are going to enter into that period of time because those people in any society who are the most suppressed are simply not in the position to agitate or create ferment. It is only when you come close to breaking into the mainstream of life that real agitation and "boiling-over" of a society begins to take place. I am very suspicious that at this time in history we are about to enter into a period when the Indian people, because they have developed significant leadership within their own groups, are going to want more and more of the action. The problem is that we in this country have a very long tradition of government making the decisions for them.

I see the bill and this legislation as another example of the Indian people being promised greater benefits. That sounds good. However, they are not really being told that we are granting to them the privilege of making those decisions. That is what will resist a real upheaval; the granting of greater and greater degrees of responsibility to the Indian people. This bill looks as though we are saying to them, "This is the way we are going to do it today because it is the way we did it yesterday." This seems all right in the close context. However, if we extend it long enough, it in effect says, "We are going to do it this way because it is the way we did it 100 years ago". That is where the danger lies.

Indian people all across Canada have shown a great deal of leadership in the last decade. This should move the government to respond by extending to them a far greater degree of responsibility than is displayed in this bill. I would say essentially what is at hand is the question of self-concept. That is not a quality that anyone gives to someone else. It is something that people develop from doing. It is something that grows out of oneself when one feels he is worth something.

This is another bill in which the government says, "Let us make the decisions because we are going to make good ones." I feel very good about the intent of what they want to do. However, I am rather concerned that the real issue here in the development of the whole Indian society requires that they become a people who have pride in themselves. This means they have to accept a full degree of responsibility in the development of their resources and have more to say about the extent of the royalties and when the resources will be developed. When this bill goes to committee, and before it comes back for third reading, what ought to be considered is a much more extensive degree of involvement on behalf of the Indian people, in terms of the development of these resources. These comments are essentially singular to that point. While I agree with other speakers who preceeded me, my singular point is that this legislation, in its intent, is good.

When it goes to committee, it needs to be broadened in respect of guaranteeing to the Indian people that they will not only receive greater financial benefits from the government, but they will be guaranteed by government a much higher degree of participation. They must be guaranteed that government will be even more subsidiary to the native people's decisions, than the reverse. Even though it might grant them more financial gain, it will not give them the kind of psychological gain that is, at this period in history, the most important of all considerations.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the sending of this bill to committee. However, a number of comments have been made, and I want to make more, that ought to be made here and borne in mind in committee when the bill is sent there for consideration.

I find all amending legislation confusing. You get a bit of a thing which refers back to the main bill and then to orders in council. You have to assemble all the bits and pieces in order to create a whole piece on which to base any comment. I did that this morning. I scurried around. Thank goodness there is such a thing as a photocopying machine, because I was able to gather together all the various orders in council referred to here. I was then chased back to earlier orders in council, which I managed to find. That referred me back to the Indian Act. I managed to get the relevant sections of that act. I have them in front of me. It has turned out to be a very confusing assemblage of documents.

Even the Indian Act is seated on more complicated documents than just an act of parliament. It goes back to the incorporation of the provinces in confederation. In each of the incorporation acts of the provinces there is a provision covering Indian lands. They are not all the same. We have a great collection of documents that somehow or another we are expected to digest and deal with in six clauses in this brief bill and come to a resolution. I do not believe it is fair to the Indian people, who will be the main beneficiaries under this bill, that we do things in this way. If it is confusing to me, when I have all the facilities of this House at my disposal, to gather together these documents. How much more confusing is it to the Indians who are not here but are watching and will be following the debate to see what we are doing about what is theirs?

Some of those who spoke before me asked whether the Indians were consulted. That is one of the questions I wanted to ask. I hope the minister will answer that question. I am not sure whether the Indians were consulted in the preparation of this brief and confusing bill, because it seems to display— this has been mentioned by others, also, notably by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin)— a form of paternalism which has marked the attitude of governments toward the native people. I submit, for the consideration of the House and the minister in particular, that this paternalism underlaid the events on the opening day of this parliament.

The new minister had evidence at the opening of this session that there was unrest. There is, obviously, unrest. Those manifestations were not made apparent simply for the joy of it. The minister has evidence that there is something seriously wrong. I hope we are embarking upon a new era of relations with the Indian people, approaching them in a different way, consulting them and having them take part in the administration of their own affairs. There are several bands in my riding. They are managed by able, competent administrators, people who enjoy the confidence of the membership of the bands. These are the people who must be consulted.

I should like to comment on one or two of the clauses of the bill. I notice that in clause 2 mention is made of Indian lands. Indian lands, we read, include lands which have been surrendered in accordance with the Indian Act". This led me right back to the Indian Act to find out just how it is that land can be surrendered, and under what terms. What is this about Indians surrendering their land? It is part of the paternalism we should, surely, be getting away from. Surrender is obviously only exercisable under the terms in which the Indian land originally came into the hands of the provinces, so we are left with the acts of accession of the provinces to confederation. Surrender could be in absolute or in qualified terms and involves some or all the rights attached to these lands—surface rights, subsoil rights, water rights, the right of passage, and so on. Are we sure these are the same in all the acts of accession of the provinces? I am not sure. These are questions which ought to be raised in committee.

The hon. member for Greenwood pointed out that the only reference to bands has to do with the case in which there is to be a reduction in royalties. I find this most peculiar. I wonder why there was no provision in the original regulations for determination of what the royalties should be—an increase or a reduction, whatever might be determined. We should look into this question a good deal more carefully. There must, of course, be provision for consultation with the bands. As to the word "surrender", once again let me suggest this is a word we must try to avoid.

I wish the new minister well. He is faced with a new movement among the Indian people, one which is likely to be extremely difficult to deal with. I want to assure him he can count on the co-operation of the party to which I belong, provided he takes the Indians into his confidence.

My hon. friend from Peace River has mentioned the uncertainty surrounding the validity of the original regulations, those of 1966. Clause 3 begins with the words "For greater certainty," and so on, and immediately refers to a number of subsections and section 45 of the Indian oil and gas regulations "expressed to have been made pursuant to paragraph 57(c) of the Indian Act." Well, 57(c) provides that certain regulations can be made. Why must this be repeated in the bill before us? Are these not valid regulations? I certainly hope they are, and I gather from the look on the minister's face that he hopes so, too. Because if they are not, we may be in serious trouble.

Later on in clause 3 we read that these subsections, and so on—

—shall for all purposes have and continue to have, until revoked by the governor in council, the same force and effect as if they had been made on that day—

In other words, on March 28, 1974, Mr. Speaker, I found that this order in council is simply an amendment to the original one. It says that subject to these regulations, the royalty on oil and gas shall be collected in such manner as may be prescribed by the minister. Here, again, we find the great patron of the Indian people. He is acting on their behalf, with or without consultation. I find this wording to be most unfortunate.

Just for fun, I compared the new regulations with the old regulations. I found that the provisions of clause 4 of the bill before us repeat some, but only some, of the articles of the original order in council. Why only some? Why does the bill not repeat the whole of those provisions so that parliament may know what they are, so that we, together with those who, hopefully, will benefit from the royalties may know exactly what needs to be done in order that the royalties may be collected. If hon. members read through paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) they will find a repetition of much of the original order in council which is published in volume 100 of part II of the Canada Gazette of July 27, 1966. I might just as well put that on record in Hansard because I believe it is relevant to the proper consideration of the bill before us.

In short, it seems to me this is an untidy piece of legislation. I do not doubt the minister's good intentions; I have confidence that he intends to go about dealing with the problems of our Indian people in the proper way. Nevertheless, I think he should have tidied up this legislation before presenting it to the House. In any case, the proposals certainly deserve to be given close examination in committee. I can assure the minister of the constructive comments and co-operation of members on this side of the House in consideration of this particular measure.

One comment which the minister made seems worth mentioning in my closing remarks. If I heard him correctly, he said something about Indian bands which had got to the situation where they could not make the rapid adjustments required over the last year in terms of the energy resources of this country. Why cannot they adjust rapidly, Madam Speaker? The rest of the world has had to adjust quickly. I suggest it is because of the paternalism of government. I think the government has inherited that paternalism; I do not blame the minister for it. I suggest they should be able to respond quickly, and through the consultative process they can be made to respond quickly to changing circumstances.

● (1630)

Like others who have spoken before me, I regret that this legislation, though in a better form and not in this untidy way, was not brought forward when the regulations were amended earlier this year. Then we would have been able to examine the complete bag of tricks. For example, I find clause 7 a little disturbing because of what I said about clause 5. We are expected to confer upon the government, which in all honesty has not shown the greatest devotion to the cause of letting the Indians help themselves—or for that matter, other people in this country, too—authority to fix by proclamation the coming into effect of a very important clause in this bill.

Therefore, the bill should go quickly to committee, where we undertake to give it honest and constructive criticism. But we want the Indian people to have a voice in this matter, and this may mean amending the Indian Act. If that is the case, let us do it.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, it is much easier to speak to the House when you are in the chair: your presence motivates and encourages one, I can assure you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I am happy to have the opportunity of saying a few words on this bill to permit the drafting of new rules and regulations relating to the oil and gas industry and the native people. For too long the government has caused uncertainty because it has failed to set out in a positive and concrete manner a policy respecting oil and gas and the interests not only of our first Canadians, the Indian people, but indeed all Canadians.

It gives me some pride to speak today about our first Canadians. When I entered the House I was the member for the constituency of Bow River, which at that time comprised part city and part country. In the area around Calgary were situated two reservations, namely, Morley to the west of Calgary, and the Blackfoot reservation to the southeast of Calgary. Both those areas were within the boundary of the Bow River constituency. Today, the Blackfoot reservation is in the constituency of Crowfoot, which is named after one of the famous chiefs of the Blackfoot reservation. Morley is, I believe, in the constituency of Rocky Mountain. This change resulted from redistribution. Palliser still remains pretty well in the former Bow River area, with the exception of the two reservations and the surrounding farming community.

Since I have been in the House of Commons, as well as all my life as a citizen of western Canada, I have had much to do with the early Canadians. I feel there is no more important task today than studying this legislation, which will give the cabinet power to make rules and regulations governing some of the resources on Indian lands which are not only within the jurisdiction of the provinces but, far more extensively, within the jurisdiction of the federal government. This legislation is extremely important to the economic and social welfare of our early Canadians. I do know what kind of language to use in describing their treatment, but they have been treated so shabbily in the past that we as Canadians should never boast about what we have done for our native people. If ever we have discriminated against a class of people, particularly since confederation, it is our early Canadians, and in many ways this discrimination is continuing.

Rules and regulations of this kind, which the government sometimes change overnight and change the name of the game, are important economically to these people, as I say. One has only to visit the two reservations I have mentioned to realize this fact. I hope I am not thought to be egotistical, but I am an honorary chief of both the

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Morley and the Blackfoot reservations. I was made an honorary chief of the Morley reservation just before I entered the House of Commons because I fought a trial on their behalf which was successful for their betterment. After I became a member of parliament I was named Big Beaver, a chief of the Blackfoot reservation. I know that this honour is also shared by another English-speaking Canadian who reached the height of being prime minister of this country, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In both those bands he is an honorary chief. The Hon. Ellen Fairclough, who was minister of Indian affairs in the Diefenbaker government, was not only made a princess of the Blackfoot reservation but was also—you will appreciate this, Madam Speaker—made a chief of the Blackfoot tribe. I was at that very colourful ceremony. So it is with deep interest and feeling that I speak on this matter today.

Pages of rules and regulations are all very well, but the most important thing we should consider today is the creation of a national oil policy for this country so as to encourage development and exploration of petroleum and natural gas reserves to guarantee that Canada will always be self-sufficient in their supply. Unfortunately, under the present administration which was re-elected again in July, the policies we have had have done everything to discourage the development of petroleum and natural gas resources. Since these policies have discouraged exploration and development of these resources in parts of the country under provincial jurisdiction, then they will discourage them on Indian reservations and in the Arctic, on lands under the federal jurisdiction and control of our native people. That is why the first thing to consider is the development of a policy to encourage exploration.

There seems to be a feeling right across the country that it is a great sin to receive a reasonable return from development and exploration. I ask hon. members to remember that the oil industry is not like the competition that exists between little storekeepers. It is a very tough and competitive international industry thoughout the world. Unless tax and other incentives are provided for the industry, the industry will take its capital and drilling equipment and move elsewhere.

● (1640)

When I was at home last Friday I read in the Calgary Herald a headline and an article in relation to this whole situation. Calgary is a flourishing city which has contributed greatly to the economic welfare of this nation. It has done much to provide incentives and motivation in respect of exploration for oil and gas throughout Alberta. As a result of these incentives and encouragements Alberta has become the producer of 86 per cent of crude petroleum and natural gas in western Canada. The headline to which I referred is not surprising, as a similar article appeared in the Financial Post last year. The article reads that drilling rigs are now leaving Alberta in drowes and going to the United States. I suggest that in fact they are going to the United States, to Mexico and to areas in the North Sea because the economic climate is much better for the industry.

Let me emphasize that rules, regulations and legislation will not solve the basic problem in respect of incentives. In an article which appeared in the Financial Post over a year ago, dealing with development in this industry as a result of the gouging of the oil and gas industries by the federal government without consultation with the provinces, we find reference to the implementation of a system of taxation totally inequitable and unfair to the industry. We suggested the same thing during the election campaign. I will not read the whole article, because of its length; but on June 15, 1974, during the election campaign my leader made a speech in which he made it clear that it is not equitable to have the royalties charged by the province or the federal government not treated as an expense subtracted from the taxable income upon which the federal tax is based.

When we analyse the tax structures of this nation, we read the economic reports. They indicate that no nation today takes a bigger slice of the taxation pie, particularly in respect of resource industries. Can you imagine the reaction of the manufacturing industry in Ontario or Quebec to a tax on the textile industry and a super tax charge on the first tax? It is tax charges on tax dollars. I suggest that everyone would scream, just as the people of Alberta are screaming about this tax which is totally inequitable and unfair. The minister knows about this situation, as he was raised in Edmonton. I knew his father. He comes from a very distinguished family. He knows as well as I do that to put a tax on the price and whatever profit is left, plus royalties, represents a federal tax on a tax. This practice is totally unjust and inequitable.

We have heard a great deal about foreign capital. About 90 per cent of the drilling industry in Canada is owned by Canadians, not Americans, Japanese or the British. Yet Canadian equipment, administration and know-how are moving elsewhere. I have never believed the stuff peddled by my hon. friends in the NDP to the effect that no more oil will be found in Canada. I suppose that in 1941 they did not think oil would found in Alberta. Let me suggest that only by developing and exploring do you find these resources. They still exist only if found. We still have the tar sands and we have found other oil fields on the prairies. We are still finding fields in the Arctic. These fields cannot be found if the companies pick up their tools and go elsewhere—and that is what they are doing because of unfair taxation.

The Financial Post warned the Liberal government a year ago about its being more interested in getting votes than in seeing development take place. Let me read one paragraph from this article, as follows:

> Klimchuk's company has just raised $3 million—$4 million in equity money in Canada and now is in the process of adding another $5 million in drilling-fund money raised in the U.S.
> "Under existing conditions we are planning to invest more than 90 per cent of that money . . . in the U.S."

The United States provides depletion allowances and incentives. That administration would never think of placing taxes upon taxes and royalties. The article continues:

> Almost all western oilmen prefer Washington's proposed method of taxing the industry . . . to the current Canadian system.

The same article reads:

> Hudson's Bay Oil & Gas Co., one of western Canada's most active oil and gas exploration firms, has just established a foreign exploration headquarters in Houston. The company's entire international exploration program, including a stepped-up U.S. operation, will be operated out of that centre.

We have heard a lot about the Home Oil Company in the last few years. Let me read this reference in the article:

> Home Oil Co., one of the largest Canadian independents, is presently looking for an exploration headquarters in Houston.
>
> "Recent events have certainly improved the relative attractiveness of U.S. exploration," Home president R. F. Phillips told FP.
> "There is no doubt that Canadian activity is going to increase there very considerably during the next few years."

I suggest that is because we have this present tax structure. The minister should get together with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and examine this whole matter of royalties in order that they may be written off as an expense against taxable income. Surely that is only equitable and just; and this is required if we are to save the day. The headline in the Calgary Herald points out that drilling companies are leaving Alberta and going elsewhere. There are still many areas in Canada which can be termed have-not areas. It is not so long ago that Alberta could not pay the interest on its bonds. Time passes quickly, and as a result of development in the petroleum and natural gas industries, and by increasing agricultural know-how, Alberta has become one of the three or four "have" provinces. This was not done by gouging the industry; it was done by providing incentive and motivation.

An hon. Member: Speak about the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: I am speaking about the bill. Obviously, the hon. member does not know what this is all about. He would like to have a pretty book of regulations. But what is the point of regulations in respect of petroleum and gas if the drilling companies quit their activities? If the hon. member can learn that, it might be helpful. That hon. member has always spoken with the same degree of mentality he has exercised today.

When talking about the subject matter of this bill, we are talking about jobs. If we encourage exploration and development on Indian reservations or in areas under the jurisdiction of our native people, we will be providing jobs. I ask hon. members what this would do for the housing and social problems of these people. They would find themselves with royalties that would swell their band funds.

We must examine the conditions under which our Indians now live. The problem was referred to at the opening of this parliament. Everything else we might do will be child's play if we do not do something for the Indian people of Canada. To begin with, let us give them the right to decide that people with know-how can drill on their lands. In this way they will obtain royalties with which they can get into housing and other areas and increase their standard of living. That is the important point I am trying to make.

The minister is travelling across this country talking with various premiers. Unless he can reach some agreement in respect of rules and regulations, what we are doing here is merely window-dressing. Parliament can legislate and look busy, but if it legislates in respect of something that is superfluous, then it means nothing and we are wasting our time. Let us consider what has gone on. In 1969, the federal government enacted tax legislation to increase the effective tax rates of the petroleum industry. This legislation terminates, in 1976, automatic depletion allowances on production revenue.

In 1970, the federal government suspended portions of its land regulations, thus creating serious uncertainty for industry in these important exploration theatres. In 1973, the federal government imposed a crude oil price freeze and an export tax on crude oil exports. Let us consider that for a few moments. During the election campaign we heard a good deal about price controls. Most of our opponents forgot about that and wanted to talk about wage control. The whole incomes policy of the Conservative Party was criticized. Of course, that is what the election was about. The situation is that it seems to be wrong to establish prices on any commodity, although in western Canada it seems to be the practice of the Liberal government to set prices on wheat, oil and, at one time, on cattle. On April 23, 1974, long before the "funeral" took place, the minister dealt with this matter in the committee. He said that certainly they would have to take into consideration lumber and potash and, I suppose, other resources. They might have taken a look at them, but the only people who have had their prices set are those in the resource industries.

I know what industry means to the industrial might of this nation. It had to come to grips with a very difficult problem. Let us consider lumber. Lumber was priced high because of exports to Japan. There has been a falling off now in lumber prices, but nothing has been done about that, or about potash. It has been done just in respect of the industries on the prairies. This is what is called discrimination.

During the election campaign I moved around a good deal and had an opportunity to talk to people. I never found anyone in any part of Canada who would not agree that what is equitable for one part of this country should be equitable for all parts of the country. Surely, on the question of taxation alone, the government should give ground. The federal government on May 6, 1974, proposed in its budget new tax provisions for the oil industry. These contained the new feature of including in taxable income, royalties, surcharges, mineral taxes, and so on, payable to the provincial governments.

This feature alone would seriously impair the petroleum industry's future investment capability. Not only would it drive Canadian capital out of the country, but it would discourage any other capital to come in, because this is a very highly competitive industry. For every well which has proved successful in Alberta, I am told by top geologists that nine are found to be dry holes. Today, with inflation, the cost of drilling a well has increased five or six times. It is a very expensive operation.

If we can encourage development on Indian lands where Indians can enjoy the benefits, let us do so; but let us have some tax incentives in this country so that development can take place and so we will not kill the industry. It will not be long before we will have no crude petroleum or natural gas because of the policies of this government. If the Indians are to receive anything from the petroleum or natural gas, there must be pipelines. We have had the yo-yo program of the Liberal government for ten years. I have heard this and other Liberal prime ministers say they intended to build the pipeline to Montreal. It is not built. If there is encouragement, we have the potential to build the pipeline in Canada. It should be built so that there will be the necessary transportation facility for these products, to encourage production and so there will be a market in Canada for Canadian production of oil and gas.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The great railway development brought the country together. Surely we have here another vision. The development of the pipeline would guarantee Quebec and the maritimes that they would always have sufficient supply of natural gas and crude petroleum and by-products, such as gasoline for automobiles, at a price which is equitable and similar to the price people pay for these products where they are found and brought out of the ground. We must give the Canadian people a chance. We must give the Indian people, who are the first Canadians, a chance so that their social and economic life and, indeed, their moral spirit is lifted; so that a new day will dawn in Canada for people who have been discriminated against for more than 100 years.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, I would be quite prepared to call it five o'clock and take the floor at eight o'clock, if it is the wish of the House to proceed to private members' hour.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF WORLD COMMISSION ON FOOD AND RESOURCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take the lead in establishing a World Commission on Food and Resources, under the auspices of the United Nations, to compile a comprehensive and regular inventory of the existing world foodstuffs and resources essential for substenance; each nation shall be required to report annually (with quarterly amendments) on the state of its own self-sufficiency and on its ability to transfer key foodstuffs and resources to more needy nations; the Commission shall have the authority to transfer designated food and resources from member nations equal in amount to their expenditures on defence.

He said: Madam Speaker, this opportunity for hon. members during private members' hours is one of the most important rights and privileges extended to all members of parliament with regard to subjects which members feel are important in the conduct of public business. In the years during which I have had an opportunity to speak in parliament on a variety of subjects, I do not think any subject has presented itself as being of such major importance as the one chosen for my motion this afternoon.

At the outset may I say that I do not wish members opposite, or people anywhere, to think the motion I have presented is in itself the be-all and end-all of the problem to which it is addressed. I refer, of course, to the impending world food crisis which increasingly has become a matter of public concern, not only in those countries which are directly experiencing famine but also in countries of overwhelming affluence such as our own. We are increasingly realizing that this is one world. While some may live in affluence, many more may live in the degradation of poverty. It is no longer possible for us to ignore this fact. Eventually it will have an overwhelming impact upon us.

● (1700)

I am delighted that this motion was placed high on the list for debate, because all members will have a chance to discuss it now in the context of the world food conference which is to take place in Rome on November 5. While the motion is not directed solely to that particular conference, it is certainly the essence of the conference itself. This is the first time that the nations of the world, at the ministerial level, have agreed to meet and discuss the dimensions of the growing food crisis in this decade and to try to see what medium and long term solutions can be discovered. In the first instance, the proposal for the conference grew out of a meeting of non-aligned nations a little over a year ago and was encouraged by a speech delivered to the United Nations on September 24, 1973, by Dr. Henry Kissinger, who said:

The growing threat to the world's food supply deserves the urgent attention of this assembly. Since 1969 global consumption of cereals has risen more rapidly than production—

He could have said "since 1972". The growing discrepancy between the ability to produce food on a global scale, crop failures and recurring drought conditions have created an alarming condition. He went on to say:

Food and Resources

Stocks are at the lowest levels in years.

That is even more true in the fall of 1974. To continue:

We now face the prospect that—even with bumper crops—the world may not rebuild its seriously depleted reserves in this decade.

No one country can cope with this problem. The United States therefore proposes:

That a world food conference be organized under United Nations auspices in 1974 to discuss ways to maintain adequate food supplies and to harness the efforts of all nations to meet the hunger and malnutrition resulting from natural disasters.

That nations in a position to do so offer technical assistance in the conservation of food.

What we are faced with, Madam Speaker, is not just the continual question of occasional famines or shortages of food in one place or the other. We are faced with the most basic problem of all, which is not—as some people suggested recently—that there are too many people in the world, although population growth is a factor. It is not that there is any fundamental reason why the world cannot produce more food, although production increases will require unusual, innovative and bold schemes in order to be successful; and we cannot even say that there is an insufficiency of food aid, because aid alone will never be enough and food is wasted daily on a large scale, even in our own country. We can say there is maldistribution of much of the world's food supply at the present time. We must admit this is the case when we learn that the protein consumption of the average North American is five times that of the average citizen of India. We know, because figures have been quoted from time to time, that in North America we feed more to our cattle than the total cereal consumption of the populations of both India and China. We know, too, that we feed more to our pets than is fed to the populations of many countries.

In an article in yesterday's New York Times, headed "32 Nations Close to Starvation," Boyce Rensberger wrote:

In the judgment of United Nations experts, 32 countries in the world are so poor and so short of food that crop failures and the high prices of grain, fertilizer and petroleum threaten them with bankruptcy and their people with starvation.

Madam Speaker, I have not time to list the various countries and the average daily caloric intake which would indicate the low level of sustenance of hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens on this planet. I would urge hon. members who can find the time, however, to read the article. The sources that I could quote to support the accusation of maldistribution of food resources are almost unlimited. Mr. Maurice Strong, a Canadian who is director-general of the United Nations Environmental Organization, spoke to the Ottawa Canadian Club in February of this year and said:

In one decade, 1959-68, the United Nations alone used more resources than all of the world's peoples in all of previous history.

I am concerned not only because the situation is bad, but because it is growing worse. It is growing worse because there are suggestions that the advantage that Canada now has, as a major food producer and exporter, can be turned to some kind of political advantage. Some hon. members may have seen an article in the Globe and Mail on September 23 written by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) regarding President Ford's recent speech to the United Nations. The hon. member wrote:

The president's implied threat to withhold food from the Arab world as a lever in getting a reasonable Arab policy toward Israel and reasonable world oil prices could mean a totally new and powerful status for Canada in international affairs.

Later in the article he wrote:

It seems clear that Canada must agree with the goals defined by President Ford at the United Nations.

An hon. member suggests that agri-power is indeed the temptation that was laid before Canada and was clearly stated by the President of the United States. It is this kind of disturbing opinion that must alert us to the realization that if we are to deal reasonably, intelligently, humanely and with justice with this major problem, it will not be because we take a narrow view of the good fortune that Canada has known to date. I am concerned that we not enter into some kind of food politics game with the lives of men, women and children. It would seem to me that, in the first instance, we must be aware that some of the objectives we have been pursuing as a nation and as individuals will no longer be acceptable. Some of the ideals and hopes we have for the future of life on this planet will have to be tempered by the realities which are becoming increasingly clear to us.

I was extremely pleased and surprised, following the tabling of this motion, to read a report of a speech by Bishop Power of Antigonish to the fourth synod of bishops presently meeting at the Vatican. Speaking of the need for Canadians to take a new look at their own situation and responsibility in the world community, and urging Canadians to respond to that situation, Bishop Power said:

● (1710)

—we asked our fellow Canadians to question the goals of our wasteful economic system, to modify their affluent eating habits, to substitute other foods for meat, to give more generously to neighbours in need, to develop new educational programs leading to changed lifestyles.

Then he said:

But sharing by the private sector is not enough. We are asking our country, through its policy makers, to contribute to a world food bank.

I have not discussed this with Bishop Power. While the world food bank the bishop proposes may be different from a world commission on food and resources which I propose in this motion, its aims are the same. We both realize that we cannot depend on the capricious whims of nations and individuals if we are to resolve the growing food crisis. Interestingly enough, the bishop dealt not only with what is in the first part of my motion, but also with the relationship between defence spending and what we must spend on other areas if society is to survive. He said:

Disarmament should be accompanied by substantial transformation of the economic and political structures which generate these profound injustices. We should insist that the money wasted to keep peoples in chains be used to procure freedom and daily bread for all men.

At one time we heard the slogan, much in vogue, "Choose either guns or butter." I suspect that the peoples of the world must now choose between bread and bombs. If we are not prepared to make that decision, it will be made for us. Norman E. Borlaug, 1970 winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, said recently:

International granaries of food reserves, financed by all nations, should be established for use in case of need... Man can and must prevent the tragedy of famine in the future instead of trying, with pious regret, to salvage the human wreckage of the famine, as he has so often done in the past. Plans for international grain reserves have been put forward eight times since 1946, and each time they have floundered on questions of national sovereignty.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

A plan on this subject is to be put forward at the world food conference. Its effectiveness will depend on what the government of the United States thinks, as the United States is the key to an agreement on world grain reserves. Dr. Marei, secretary-general of the Rome conference in November, has already proposed as an agenda item the creation of a world food authority with supranational powers. Only if we pay attention to the vision of such men can we avoid the prospect of a holocaust in the history of this planet. That is why, at a meeting in which the Canadian Council for International Co-operation participated in Ottawa, following a meeting of mor e than 70 non-governmental agencies concerned with the world food crisis and the world food conference, it was said:

Canada should support the creation of a world food authority, and that the voting power of the world food authority be on the basis of equal voting representation between donor and recipient nations in line with the UN declaration on the establishment of a new economic order.

We must remember this. Frankly, I am disappointed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and senior government officials have said so little about Canada's position at the conference which is to take place in just over two weeks. It is, therefore, important for members on all sides of the House to express themselves forcibly on the aims of the conference which, I submit, is bound up with the substance of the motion I have put forward.

What will be the most effective way to help? What will be the most acceptable instrument? Obviously, the government will not be influenced by members of the House alone; it will be influenced by public opinion. Frankly, I think the government will face difficulty in moving forward in this area owing to lack of informed and public discussion in this country on the topic with which we are concerned.

We can no longer follow our suicidal priorities which put armaments ahead of food. In this connection I wish to quote the words of Robert McNamara, former secretary of defence of the United States, who said:

Surely one of the most foolish follies of man all through history is his almost incurable insistence on spending more energy and wealth in waging war than in preventing it.

Mr. McNamara is now president of the World Bank and a leading figure in seeking solutions to the world food crisis. Members on all sides of the House who are concerned about the problem will realize that we need imaginative solutions. By itself, the problem will not go away but will become incalculably worse. When I was preparing my speech this afternoon I looked at some figures and learned that approximately 14,000 people are starving to death each day—two-thirds of them children. Further research has revealed the figure to be in the order of 40,000 a day. Actually, we do not know how many are starving to death, how many succumb to the most unacceptable disease brought on by lack of the staff of life.

I invite all hon. members to support this motion, and I urge the government in the strongest terms to allow full discussion of this question in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

[Translation]

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) dealt with a most relevant issue in presenting a motion on the problem of food in the world.

The motion contains many points such as a request that the countries report on their level of autonomy. Experience teaches that some countries, mainly developing ones, cannot or do not want to make such reports. The transfer of food and resources is already regulated by international arrangements like those existing now such as the World Food Program. Canada has a tradition of opposing the creation of new international institutions, particularly when such institutions exist and seem to be able to do the work. The FAO is now studying a project on world food security. One important aspect of this document concerns the establishment of an information system on food, the main goals of which are to collect, analyse and disseminate information on the grain overall situation and forecasts. At the present time, Canada is providing the FAO with information concerning our production and stocks. We have indicated our intention to continue to provide this information through the world food information system.

A World Conference on Food will be held this coming November in Rome. A number of suggestions made by the hon. member will be examined on this occasion. Canada is one of the main producers taking part in the World Food Program. The Canadian contribution to this program since 1963 amounts to $131 million. Canada is the biggest supplier taking part in the World Food Program. For many years, Canada has held enormous stocks of grains.

One cannot ignore the impact of this motion on prices and trade. Farmers alone cannot be expected to help poor countries; our society as a whole must participate in this endeavour.

Perhaps it might be more useful to support measures aiming at increasing production within developing countries, thereby reducing their dependency on food aid.

Mr. Speaker, one needs but note the number of times the matter was brought up in this House, the attention it was given by the media, and the preparations launched into by international organizations, governments and private concerns for the coming World Food Conference, to become aware of its importance. The hustle and bustle reflects the increasing concern of the international community in this regard. Many are those who wonder how the rapidly increasing world population will manage to feed itself.

Reflecting on the matter of world food reserves, the hon. member for Egmont draws our attention to one of the main aspects of the current discussion on food problems. Like my colleague, Mr. Speaker, I feel it would be desirable to improve the world food situation information system. I would like to add to this, however: that system is a fundamental element of a much greater problem, that of "world food security" which consists mainly in keeping world food reserves at an adequate level. Improving the information system is closely related to the need for an efficient cereal reserves system, as well as to those in the fields of production, consumption, price setting and international trade in basic agricultural products.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) spoke of this complex network of problems, of the difficulties in finding easy solutions, in his address to the FAO conference almost a year ago. He said, and I quote:

"The world Food Security Proposal made by the Director-General is the result of the short world food supply. It is designed to lead to relative stability in the cumulative production, pricing and stocks of food around the world. These levels are intended to vary with need as estimated by consultation among nations. The proposal suggests food stocks could be much better dispersed in all countries rather than be held by a few major producers. The Director-General also stresses the voluntary nature of participation and the need for better information.

Canada has already gone on record urging every nation, not just those who are traditional surplus food producers, to support and cooperate with FAO in this task. Importers as well as exporters have both a concern and a responsibility. The question of adequate grain inventories is of major concern to Canada. We have, for a number of years, carried at our expense approximately 40 per cent of the total world wheat reserve. We are prepared to move in the direction of a food security scheme, but we have found from past experience that some nations are reluctant to share costs for maintaining reserves, let alone the costs of having too large reserves looked upon as surpluses overhanging international markets and pricing farmers out of needed regular increased production.

A storage program is desirable, indeed it is a necessary feature of trying to maintain a world food supply."

The proposal—that is the proposed world food security action plan—made by FAO Secretary General Boerma, to which my colleague referred, deals with all the aspects of the problem of world food security. In substance, it proposes that the governments of member states pledge cooperation to ensure at all times an adequate supply of basic foods, particularly grain, to avoid serious food shortages in case of bad generalized crops or natural catastrophes, to allow a continued increase in production and reduced variations in both production and prices.

Furthermore, member states recognizing that food security should be ensured in many ways, especially by reinforcing the farming capacity of developing countries, by appropriate national stocking policies, food help programs and other action, including long term trade agreements. They promise to take national and international action to encourage fast growth of food production as required, and to give special help to developing countries, which are very exposed to crop variations and face increasing consumer demand.

● (1730)

On the other hand, as concerns the stocking policy, it is recommended that all governments, in accordance with their institutional and constitutional requirements first, implement a grain stocking policy which takes into account those of other countries and ensures minimal reserves of major grains at the world level, second, review or establish stocking objectives, or take action in this area, to maintain their grain reserves or those of groups of countries, at least at the levels judged necessary, so that an uninterrupted supply will be ensured, including in emergency situations brought about by bad crops or natural disasters, third, take the necessary action for the stocks to be replenished as soon as possible following shortages, when they have fallen below established minimums.

Finally, the suggestion specifies that in the case of serious food shortages, the member states that have larger reserves than they need to meet national needs and emergency supplies will make a commitment to authorize exports at reasonable conditions.

These various approaches to the problem of world food security are striking in that they recognize the complexity of this problem, Mr. Speaker. There are no simple answers to this problem. On this point, I do not agree with the hon. member for Egmont. He suggests that a new organization could resolve at all the problems together by maintaining a satisfactory level of food supplies and by ensuring the transfer of these supplies to the most needy areas.

But how would these transfers be made? What effect would they have on international trade agreements or on present methods of food assistance distribution? How could we assure the Canadian farmer that he will continue to receive an appropriate price for his products? And who would pay for these products?

The Minister of Agriculture knew about these complications when he said, and I quote:

—-farmers must be enticed and encouraged to steadily greater production by the assurance that they make a reasonable living. Canada has the most efficient farmers in the world. Their efficiency has increased far more rapidly than that of our industrial sector. Yet even they need a paying reward and security of income if they are expected to increase production for world-wide use.

And Mr. Whelan, concerning the effect that surpluses might have on world markets, added:

Canada can also support the need for assistance to developing countries to facilitate the desired adjustments. But Canada also supports the need for action and policies to deal with world surplus conditions that ruin the structure and investment, the very basis of a guaranteed growing supply of food around the world. Nowhere in the world can producers be expected to risk either investment or a lifetime's labor to have it cut from under them by short time surpluses. The result is a stagnation of production potential.

The report of the third session of the preparatory committee of the World Food Conference suggested something along the the sames line:

Most delegates have agreed that if trade is to fill its role it must maintain free and ordered movements at stable prices and ensure, at reasonable prices, a market for exporters and a supply for importers.

The committee also remarked:

—that it is essential that the main producing and consuming countries adhere to the suggested plan of action so to fully attain the objectives of world food security.

The committee also acknowledged the need to solve certain practical and technical problems so that the action planned might be efficient and it expressed the hope that those solutions might be elaborated by the appropriate intergovernmental agencies of the FAO.

It was agreed that, given the present shortage, food reserves must be made up gradually so as not to disturb the market. The creation of food reserves will be insured only if a suitable balance between supply and demand has already been achieved. The necessity of providing financial and technical assistance to developing countries to help them create and maintain food reserves was also pointed out.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a last remark before concluding. Suitable trade agreements, distribution of food assistance, a system of reserves, stocks, all that is not enough to ensure world food security. We must also give much greater attention to the agricultural development of the countries that are in the greatest need of food stocks to feed their huge population. Besides, it was mentioned in the Boerma proposal that the essential interest shown in this endeavour by the developing countries, in order to achieve the objectives of a world food security, requires guarantees as to sufficient grain stocks and accordingly an accelerated growth rate of their agricultural production. Such an increase requires on the part of developing countries a continual review of their agricultural program and of the various alternatives available to them, and implies as well the active support of the international community to the development programs of those countries within the national development program of each.

The international organizations concerned, working in financial and technical sectors, the developed countries and other possible donor countries should most urgently take the necessary steps to enable developing countries to get financial, technical and material aid, particularly fertilizers and other elements that are essential to the increase of their agricultural production. The proposal goes on in these terms: The international community must make an important contribution, through low rate food and financial assistance, or through subsidies, in order to maintain grain supplies in developing countries, particularly emergency supplies, at their proper level, to determine what supply facilities are best according to local situations, and to provide advice on storage problems and related policies within national development programs. Developed countries and other possible donors, as well as the international and regional development organizations concerned, should contribute complementary help to the identification and pooling of resources required to meet those objectives.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should consider several solutions. There has been to date considerable studies indeed in preparation for the FAO conference to be held in Rome. Should grain producing countries store sufficient amounts of grain for future needs, or should every country be required to provide for its own needs and store at least enough food for a year's consumption?

Mr. Speaker, it was my honour and pleasure to attend FAO meetings in Rome last October, and I was amazed by the amount of technological help developed countries could contribute. I heard speeches by representatives of some countries on the question of food. They even said the stage of "harnessed" agriculture had not yet been reached. We can therefore imagine how underdeveloped countries, which have not yet reached that stage of "harnessed" agriculture, may grow their own food.

Mr. Speaker, we should put the emphasis on the possibility of helping the developing countries in technical terms to improve their situation in that area and become eventually self-sufficient in respect of food.

Mr. Speaker, after all those thoughts, I find that a lot more aspects must be taken into consideration before we could be prepared to set up a concrete world food program.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend very warmly the initiative of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) in introducing this subject. It is one of profound importance. The crisis is a very real one and Canada's opportunity to make an important contribution lies before us, particularly in connection with the World Conference on Food in Rome which the hon. member mentioned.

I agree with him there is a sort of insanity attached to our choice of priorities. When I was at the conference in the Chateau Laurier the other day we were told by a knowledgeable gentleman, I think it was Mr. Jackson of the FAO, that a substantial program for increasing food supplies in the developing countries could be put under way for roughly $5 billion. Although $5 billion sounds like quite a lot of money, the world today is spending over $200 billion a year on armaments. I suggest that a world that cannot look after its basic food needs but devotes enormous sums to armaments is a world in which priorities have gone very far astray.

In bringing this matter forward I think the hon. member has done us a great service. I do not propose to discuss the details of his motion. I am not sure that the word commission pleases me very much, because it seems to imply more inquiries. I suspect that what is needed is not so much a commission of inquiry; FAO, for one organization, is extremely well informed of the facts. What we will need will be more action.

The other day Dr. Waldheim, Secretary General of the United Nations, in answer to a declaration by a number of scientists that was brought to his attention, said that basic food was the one essential, undebatable core of a life of dignity and decency. He also added that all aspirations for peace, growth, creativity and social justice, of individuals as well as of nations, would have a hollow ring unless we grappled with the problem of meeting basic food needs.

This is not really a new problem. There has been malnutrition in the world for some years. One can throw around figures like 460 million people suffering chronic hunger and malnutrition. But, apart from this, the recent drop in food reserves brings into the realm of likelihood, if not probability, vast loss of life through outright famine in different parts of the world unless adequate steps are taken to prevent it.

I will not go into all the things that should be done; this may be the job of the conference. The hon. member for Egmont mentioned setting up a world food bank, and it seems to me that this is an essential part of the machinery. The hon. member referred to a world food authority. I do not think it matters whether you call it a bank or an authority, but it should be internationally managed and given the means to do the job. I think that is one of the first prerequisites.

Another is to recognize that the greatest contribution to alleviating the food crisis throughout the world is to enable developing countries to expand their food production. In the developed countries like Canada perhaps there are some things that can be done and should be done, and whatever we do should take into account the interests and rights of the farmers who are the producers of food. But it is in the developing countries that there is the greatest opportunity to increase food production through technological changes, changes that we have already made and which could be made available to these other countries. Of course, what is useful under Canadian conditions may not be very useful in India or Bangladesh, and research will have to be adapted to different countries in which it is sought to increase food production.

Research should be vastly expanded. We need a crash program to increase the supply of pesticides and fertilizers. One of the reasons for the present food crisis is that the price of energy has put fertilizers and pesticides beyond the reach of many farmers and producers in developing countries.

Food aid is not enough. It is helpful and may be absolutely necessary, but in itself it is not enough. If food aid is to be viable it must complement our trade policies and enable developing countries independently to achieve economic growth within their own borders.

In an extremely eloquent address to the Canadian Jewish Congress on June 25 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said something that I think is very appropriate to this debate. He said that he hoped that Canada's presence in the world would be judged by its humanism and pursuit of social justice. He said Canada's foreign policy would be meaningless if this were not carried out, as it would not reflect the character of Canadians. He then referred to the Elizabethan poet John Donne, who said that "every man's death diminishes me". The Prime Minister added that this quotation should guide our foreign policy as it guides our domestic policy. Compassion, the Prime Minister stated, must have no geographic focus, nor must our geographic efforts have geographic limitations. With these words I believe all members of the House can agree.

We must put this into practice and use what influence we have, not, as the hon. member for Egmont said, with the desire to gain political advantage for ourselves, but to help out, in a spirit of brotherhood, the cause of humanity.

I think I have indicated as clearly as I can our deep concern about the subject raised by the hon. member. I hope that the government of Canada will take the matter extremely seriously. We are pleased to hear that the minister was thinking of going to Rome as our head delegate. I hope he will take some members of parliament with him, perhaps from different parties, as well as some non-governmental representatives. I say so because I do not think this is a matter just for the experts and bureaucrats; this is a matter in which the generosity and goodwill of the Canadian people should be challenged, and I believe they will be challenged. I know many Canadians who already are deeply concerned and who will be watching what we do at the conference with the greatest of attention, trusting we will live up to the opportunity afforded to us.

I suppose it is optimistic to think that this motion is going to pass. It does not seem to be the usual habit in this House to pass motions between five and six o'clock. But I wish it would pass, because then the government would receive the message from parliament that we give the highest priority to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) has put before the House this afternoon a very important motion, one that concerns all of us, namely, the critical issue of world food supplies. There can be no doubt that the spectre of starvation and hunger on a massive scale now seems closer than it has been for many years or, perhaps, than it has ever been. Not only are we in Canada deeply concerned at the possible plight of millions in many parts of the globe; attention all over the world has become focussed on the world food crisis to an ever increasing degree.

No fewer than three international organizations have held, or will soon be holding meetings to review the urgent world food situation. From October 20 to 26, the intergovernmental committee of the World Food Program is holding its twenty-sixth session. From November 18 to November 29 the FAO Council will convene its 64th session in Rome. A few weeks ago the preparatory committee for the World Food Conference held its third session. And, of course, the most important event of all, the World Food Conference, will be held in Rome from November 5 to November 16. Canadians are involved in all these discussions and, indeed, there will be a high ranking Canadian delegation attending the World Food Conference. The minister indicated in the House a few weeks ago that he was considering attending the conference himself.

The hon. member for Egmont has mentioned some specific measures on this subject. He has suggested that all the countries of the world should report annually on their food resources and food needs, and he has put forward a formula for the transfer of these resources from the "have" to the "have not" countries.

Moreover, he has suggested that this House express itself as being in favour of establishing a new international organization to oversee these tasks, which he would call a "World Commission on Food and Resources". The hon. member has not been the only one to suggest an inventory of world food resources. Indeed, he is in the best of company. The draft International Undertaking on World Food Security endorsed by the FAO Council in July 1974—commonly known as the "Boerma Proposal"—has this to say:

> The effective functioning of the world food security system will depend greatly on the availability of timely and adequate information.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, seeking the indulgence of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) whom I have just interrupted. In view of the fact that I was late coming to this debate because of an aircraft delay I should like to ask whether it is his intention to talk out this motion, or would he be prepared to yield the floor to an hon. member on this side who would like to speak very strongly in support of it?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, you recognized me and I intend to put as many of my remarks on the record as possible. I think the procedure is to move back and forth across the House, and that is exactly what we have done.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Let me return to the quotation as follows:

> The effective functioning of the world food security system will depend greatly on the availability of timely and adequate information. Government members of FAO should furnish to the Director-General on a regular basis all the available information on national stock levels, government stockholding programs and policies, current and prospective export availabilities and import requirements for cereals, and relevant aspects of the supply and demand situation, as well as on assistance provided to the food production programs in developing countries. Other governments should be invited to provide similar information. In order to avoid unfavourable market repercussions in particular, the Director-General of FAO should ensure, where so requested by a government, that the data supplied by that government to the information system are made available on a restricted basis only to the governments adhering to the undertaking.

This report went on to say:

> To keep all governments directly informed of current developments in the international cereals position during periods when world supplies are scarce the Director-General of FAO should prepare, on a quarterly basis or more frequently, concise factual appraisals of the situation and outlook which should be circulated promptly to governments.

It continued:

> In the assembly and analysis of information and statistics, the Director-General of FAO should seek the assistance of the International Wheat Council and other intergovernmental organizations concerned.

At the same time the Japanese proposed that there be a global information system on the world food situation. Had there been such a system, according to this proposal it would have been possible to avoid, or at least to attenuate the grave situation which the world has recently experienced. In view of the uncertain prospects as regards food supplies, there is an urgent need for a more comprehensive and global information system.

> It is noted that one important function of FAO, IWC and other international organizations is the collection and analysis of worldwide information on food and agriculture. These existing information functions should be further improved and strengthened for the reasons set out above. The proposed information system is designed to enhance the usefulness of the information collected by the various existing institutions (FAO, IWC, WHO, etc.) through coordinating their information activities and thus making information available to this system and enabling it to compile such information in a comprehensive and integrated manner.

Acting on this proposal the preparatory committee for the World Food Conference agreed that there was an urgent need for establishing a worldwide food information system to strengthen the implementation of world food security and to promote marked stability in a constantly changing food and agricultural situation. It felt that the main features and objectives of the tow proposals were essentially similar and complementary, and that it was desirable to combine them. It was noted that the nucleus of a food information system already existed in FAO, and that other international organizations, such as the International Wheat Council, also collected useful information on food and agriculture.

There was support for building on these existing information arrangements. The global food information system should aim at identifying countries or regions where acute food shortages were likely to arise, at monitoring the world food supply-demand situation in order to help governments to take prompt measures, and at contributing to the efficient working of the proposed international undertaking on world food security.

The committee felt that the food information system should also assemble, analyse and disseminate comprehensive and timely information on the situation and prospects of main crops and livestocks products, export availabilities and import requirements, supplies of agricultural requisites, particularly fertilizers and weather conditions, including, as far as possible, forecasts. Many delegates stressed that full and active participation in the information system by all countries, particularly those which were major producers, consumers and or traders, was essential for the effective functioning of the system. The committee recognized that technical assistance would be required to build up national food information services in developing countries. Several delegates stressed that some of the information provided by governments might be sensitive and would need to be used with care and discretion so as to avoid speculative activities which would disturb the markets.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

INDIAN OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING LEASES, LICENCES AND ROYALTIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Buchanan that Bill C-15 respecting oil and gas in Indian lands, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, I know the minister wishes the bill to receive second reading and to move on to the next stage so I shall bring my remarks directly to the point.

Before I begin my few observations I wish the minister would remember what the honourable member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) was saying because he was enunciating a very simple economic truth, namely, that we all hope the Indian bands will be fortunate in finding oil or gas underneath their reservation lands, but that possibility would not exist unless there is a viable drilling industry available to do the work. This is all part of the wider oil and gas play. I shall not say more about this because the economic truth of it is self-evident.

The two points about which I wish to speak are covered by phrases which may be strange to the minister but I hope will not remain strange too long. I refer first to front-end loading, and secondly to the technique of sharing with the Indians. Front-end loading is a device that has cost the Canadian people very dearly in connection with their resource industries, particularly oil and gas.

Front-end loading is simply the natural desire of a provincial or federal government to obtain as much in tax revenue as possible out of industry at the very beginning, even though it can be shown quantitatively that if the provincial and/or the federal government were to lay off that industry in the years of its capital pay-out there would be more money for the people on whose land the oil or gas well is situated, and also more money for the provincial and federal governments.

To put it very simply, if one examines the history of the oil and gas pools of western Canada one will find, say, a typical oil pool with X number of barrels in it whose capital cost of development would run between $600 million and $900 million. Of that amount of $600 million to $900 million, an amount of $400 million to $700 million would have been in the form of front-end loading charges imposed on that industry by greedy governments trying to pluck the goose before it was ready to lay the egg.

Another way of putting it is that the resource industries, including oil and gas, are capital intensive, and the larger amount of the dollars required to handle the development of those industries is the capital cost. So, if governments could hold off in respect of the front-end loading charges, and made certain a company received no money out of it either until the capital costs were repaid, there would be more money for all those wishing to participate in the revenue or rent from the resource being developed.

The principle of front-end loading has been traditional on the United States oil and gas scene for many years. In Canada we have copied the United States system. We have front-end loaded our industry. The only winners when companies have to borrow all this capital are the money lenders because the individual company has the longer period of pay-out. It is being milked when it should be devoting all its revenue toward paying back the capital cost.

Front-end loading takes the form of lease fees, permit fees and those wonderful "bonus payments." Every time the government thinks it is doing a wonderful job, it actually is destroying the capability of oil fields to pay an extra dividend to the owners. I shall not say much more than that, except that in the federal oil and gas regulations as applied to federal lands, when first published in 1961, there was a government in Canada which did without this front-end loading and said to the oil gas companies that it would not charge them anything.

Then the government said that in return for not charging them anything at the permit or exploration stage, when the lease stage—which is the ownership stage—was reached, the government wanted two things. The first was Canadian ownership of the developing company. This can be found in the federal regulations dealing with all lands except Indian lands. I ask the minister to consider that as an option which he should have in the regulations he promulgates for the handling of oil, gas and minerals on the reservations. He will find those provisions are very fair.

Secondly the government of 1961 said to the oil and gas companies that when they explored in territories and offshore, since all the front-end loading had been taken off, instead of getting 12 per cent, 13 per cent or 17 per cent royalty the government wanted something in the order of 60 per cent. The government said that, and got it. If you take the heavy load of paying for the big capital input off the shoulders of companies in the early stage then, when the capital input is paid off, they are well able to pay these higher royalties. It can be proven quantitatively that they get more money out of their investment, and the owners of the oil resource, the people of Canada, and in this case the Indians, will get more.

I am not giving the minister a great Sunday school lecture on something we did that is good. I am simply saying our history shows that in the provinces we did something that was bad and we are paying heavily for it today. The federal government in 1961 tried to do something more moderate and good, but we have not had the big finds that would quantitively demonstrate how, if it had followed those regulations through, the people of Canada would have got much more out of them percentagewise than out of the front end loading technique.

I hope the minister will forgive me for having gone over this bit of history, but he is looking at a person who stayed out in the wilderness for many years and watched this debauchery and robbery of our resources. This was not done so much by the companies as by the moneylenders who got control and, over the long period that the loans were being paid back, got the greater bulk of the value of the oil and gas into their own hands instead it going into the hands of the entrepreneurs, and particularly of those people who owned the oil and gas reserves.

This is the crime committed in the last 25 years against the people of Canada, mostly in the lands that belong to the provinces. Now we have a chance in our northern lands, our offshore areas, and on Indian lands that are under federal control within the provinces, to avoid that mistake. I would ask the minister to read the original regulations and he will find the philosophy and principles are sound. I could of course suggest several modifications today that would allow for new developments. To my knowledge there is only one person in the public service of Canada today who understands that philosophy. He helped me draft the regulations, and I think it would be worth the minister's while to search for him. He is now at a high level in a different department.

This second point is probably the most difficult moral problem of all. The lands we gave the Indians were theirs to enjoy all the fruits of those lands, whether rabbits, grouse, oil, gas or minerals. That was a moral commitment by those who took the lands from our first Canadians, in effect, by force. They were guaranteed that as long as the moon shone and rivers flowed, the land was theirs. The oil, gas and minerals mentioned in the legislation do not belong to the people of Canada—they belong to the Indians—period. The minister is the only person who can protect the Indian ownership of wealth inside the reservations.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

The problem will be more difficult in the territories because of the lack of treaties and reservations. I would hope, however, that any government response to the moral obligation that our grandfathers made in giving the land and the reservations to the treaty Indians would realize that the same principle, in some modified measure, has to be applied to the non-treaty Indians. If the minister is to act as trustee he would be wise to hold down the front end loading so that in the end there will be more money to go to the Indians themselves.

These are non-renewable capital resources that will last only another 15 or 30 years, depending on whether they be oil or gas, depending on all the physical conditions that make a reservoir or mining deposit. According to the experience of our predecessors, when you are selling your capital, that capital should not be considered as income but as capital wealth to be invested. The only money that should go to the Indians in trust is income from the capital fund. It will probably be 15 or 20 years before the resource is depleted completely, and the revenue collected in that time should make a rather large fund. The income from that fund in perpetuity would be very important to future generations on the reservations.

There are many precedents for this, Madam Speaker. In the provinces governments sold off land for school purposes. In the prairies, two sections out of 36 were set aside for education. The money was put into trust funds and the educational system—certainly in the thirties—was financed almost entirely by revenue from those capital funds. Government after government in the three prairie provinces followed this practice, and none has betrayed what was done there over 70 years ago. These school land trust funds are still providing money for the educational system.

I think it is fair to say, that over the years all political parties in this House have acknowledged that we are guilty of great crimes against our first citizens. We must begin to correct those crimes committed in the name of expansion and advance. All political parties would, I am sure, support this.

All past ministers in charge of Indian Affairs in this House received support from all parts of the House because they all wanted to do the right thing for the Indians. This is still the case, and I am sure in this debate the minister has sensed a willingness to support this measure. We all know his difficulties which are almost beyond human solution. Although his predecessors tried to the limit of their strength and ability to resolve the problems, they are still there. Hopefully we can come closer to bringing justice to our first citizens, without being sentimental about it, but being realistically and morally proper. I hope these ideas strike the minister as worth while, and that he will take them under consideration.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Madam Speaker, I should like to contribute a few remarks this evening on the bill before the House. I represent a constituency that has a variety of Indian reservations in it, but as yet neither oil nor gas has been discovered there to my knowledge. But one never knows what might happen, with continued searches and continued fuel shortages.

As I read the bill I was reminded of an experience I had when first elected to this House. A very elderly mining engineer who was interested in developing a mining property spoke to me in highest terms of its possibilities. It sounded like something to gladden the heart but there was just one drawback; it was sited within an Indian reservation on Indian land. After listening to his glowing description I wondered why it had not been developed up to that point. I investigated, and came across the agreement that had been signed by the province of British Columbia and the federal government regarding mining development on Indian lands in British Columbia. It was easy then to see why no reservation in British Columbia would be wildly excited about having anyone develop a mining property. At that time Indians seemed to lose effective control of anything below the surface of the land the moment development started.

As I read the bill some questions came to my mind. On page 2, clause 4(b) reads:

The Governor in Council may make regulations

. . . .

(b) respecting the disposition of any interest in Indian lands necessarily incidental to the exploitation of oil and gas in such lands and the terms and conditions thereof;

● (2020)

That sounds heavy handed. I sometimes wonder why those who draft government bills use such language. It seems to me that this bill is lacking in specific reference to the Indian peoples. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has already pointed out that clause 5(2) contains the only reference to band council. I wonder why clause 4 did not provide for some specific role for band councils. Why is it worded in language which suggests the federal government alone can make dispositions which it feels desirable with regard to oil and gas on Indian reservations?

I know that those preparing a bill always say, "Of course, this is the legal way of preparing it, but it will be interpreted differently". We find over and over again that, once a bill becomes law, it is interpreted sometimes in a startlingly legal and narrow way, and not as it was suggested it would be interpreted. I hope that will not happen here.

If I were a member of an Indian band who suspected there might be oil or gas on my reservation, I would be concerned about the wording of this bill. I also wonder about the complexities in distinguishing private ownership and band ownership of land on Indian reservations. This bill does not deal with this sensitive area. It does not sort out who has control and jurisdiction on reservations in this matter.

I hope that during committee study of this bill we will hear from a large variety of people, and from those representing the Indian bands themselves. I hope we will not see a repetition of what happened in the committee studying grain handling problems, when we heard only the minister. It is essential that the parliamentary committee studying this bill hear from a wide variety of interested people.

Nor does the bill spell out the disposition of royalties which, if this bill becomes law, we anticipate will accrue to the Indian peoples.

I am concerned about the timing of the bill. Actually, it involves two sensitive issues, royalties from natural resource production—and this in British Columbia and other provinces has been a sensitive area—and federal interference with regard to Indian lands, even though they have been set aside as reservations under treaty. So, here are two sensitive issues. There is little in the bill to suggest that the government, in preparing it, has been as sensitive, cautious and thoughtful on these two issues as it might have been, and as our treatment of the native peoples of Canada warrants.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I see the minister rising to speak. If he speaks, he will close the debate.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief. I shall comment about points raised by some hon. members opposite.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) referred to the question of the Indian people assuming greater economic control, and gaining the economic advantage which would flow to them from the type of development referred to in the bill. His was an interesting thought.

In this connection may I refer to the recent announcement in the newspapers concerning the very large development of the Enoch band in the west end of Edmonton. They are in favour of the large developments referred to, the precise reason being that the 30 oil wells and three gas wells will probably run dry around 1980. They intend to use these resources in order to create an alternate economic base, as they will gradually lose the benefit of their present resource in the next 10 or 15 years. More activity like this is going on among the Indian people. Such activity ties in with what was said by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) who spoke about the use of funds to develop a significant base for the Indian people.

Other members, the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone), the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) and, lastly, the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston), referred to the broad nature of the bill. They were concerned because it is not precisely worded. I emphasize that the bill was drafted this way so that we shall not lock ourselves into the tight process envisaged under earlier arrangements which did not provide for flexibility in changing or altering royalty arrangements. That, really, is why the bill has been drafted this way. We want to respond to situations quickly, as they arise, rather than find ourselves locked into a relatively inflexible situation.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich did not like the word surrender. I share his feeling and am concerned about the word every time I see it in connection with Indian lands. I, also, would prefer a word alternative to surrender, if we become involved in leasing situations.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) expressed concern which was shared by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain about the deductibility of royalites. We have discussed this with representatives of the oil industry and solicitors for the Indian people of reserves on which there is oil production, and have indicated we are willing to take another look at the situation after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) introduces the budget next month.

Mr. Baldwin: When next month?

Mr. Buchanan: Time will tell. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain made interesting comments concerning the front end load and about how we would be wiser to forgo revenue in the earlier stages and consider it later. I should like to look at that matter and see what can be done.

I could respond to two or three other matters. However, since they will again be discussed at the committee stage I shall conclude my remarks at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

STATUTE LAW (VETERANS AND CIVILIAN WAR ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENTS ACT, 1974

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ENTITLEMENT AND ALLOWANCES

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-4, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is again my privilege to be speaking on a bill which will further improve the quality of life of that particular group of citizens whose service earned them the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act or Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

The bill before you, like Bill C-148 introduced last year, is especially important because it is also breaking new ground in the field of veterans legislation. You will remember that Bill C-148 abolished, for the first time in the history of the War Veterans Allowance Act, the ceiling on personal property. This Bill, C-4, is equally or possibly more important because it will provide, for the first time in the 44 year life of this valuable legislation, for the payment of additional moneys for recipients with dependent children.

Up until now the only benefit that has existed for children, other than orphans, has been the provision whereby a widow or widower with a child would receive the allowance at the married rate. Unfortunately, however, the money paid was the same if the widow or widower had one child or six.

The legislation also failed to face that fact that a married veteran with a child needed more money than a married veteran with no children. Bill C-4 recognizes this fact by providing an additional $50, less the amount of family allowances in pay, for each child. I am especially pleased with this improvement, because it has troubled me for some time that we did not provide more adequately for children under these acts. This situation will be corrected by the passage of this bill.

The bill, I am glad to state, also makes more generous provision for our orphan. In place of the old descending scale of $91.95 for one, $161.27 for two, $217.24 for three or more, with no more dollars being paid for five orphans than for three, we now propose a flat rate of $125 per month, less the amount of family allowance in pay, with a monthly income ceiling of $135.95 for each orphan regardless of the number. These new rates and ceilings for orphans will be escalated annually. We also propose that the allowance to an orphan, or on behalf of a child, be continued to age 25 as long as the child continues his education. The present act requires payments normally to stop at age 21.

In addition to the new benefits for children and the improved payments for orphans, this bill also provides for the WVA/CWA income ceiling to be escalated by 5.3 per cent effective October 1, 1973, and the rates by similar dollar amounts. It provides for the quarterly escalation of ceilings in accordance with the increase in the cost of living, except for orphans whose income ceilings and rates will continue to be escalated annually. This method of escalating on the ceiling instead of on the rate will give the WVA/CWA recipient the advantage of an escalation on a larger base.

The escalation I have just referred to, effective October 1, 1973, will require the adjustment of over 80,000 accounts. and I am confident that all members of this House will agree and understand that if these amendments are passed by parliament there will be a period of time required before these can be reflected in the cheques of our recipients. I assure, you, however, that everything will be done to adjust the accounts with the least possible delay so that our recipients will benefit as soon as possible from any increase parliament approves.

If this bill is passed, the end result will be that effective October, 1 1974, a single recipient will have an average monthly income ceiling of $223.66 and may, depending on other income, receive an allowance of up to $183.66 per month. In the case of a married recipient the average monthly income ceiling will be $382.90 and the allowance payable, depending on other income, will be raised to a maximum, of $312.90 per month. The ceilings will be escalated quarterly in accordance with the cost of living increase and the rates increased by similar amounts.

Effective April 1, 1974, the allowance will continue on behalf of an eligible child or orphan up to age 25 years as long as he continues with his studies. Also effective April 1, 1974, the rates for orphans will be increased to $125 per month, less the amount of family allowance in pay, with an income ceiling of $135.95, the ceiling to be escalated annually in accordance with the cost of living, and the rates to be increased by a like dollar amount.

Effective October 1, 1974, we will provide an additional $50 a month for each child, less family allowance, with the result that a man, wife and one child will have an income ceiling of $432.90, and a possible monthly allowance of $362.90. This ceiling will be increased quarterly in accordance with the cost of living index, and the rate will be increased by a similar dollar amount. In cases of proven need the assistance fund can be used to bring the income level up to the ceiling, $432.90.

The situation will be slightly different in the case of the widow or widower with one child in that the additional $50 will not be paid because they will continue to receive the more beneficial married rate and to have the advantage of the married income ceiling as at present. In this instance, because the additional $50 is not being paid, family allowances will not be taken into consideration. As of October 1, 1974 this group will have an average monthly income ceiling of $382.90 and a monthly rate, depending on other income, of up to $312.90.

In addition to the points I have referred to, I am also pleased that this bill contains several proposals in line with the government's policy to provide equality of status for men and women.

I am proud of the record of this government, and indeed of this House, for the way in which they have treated our veterans and their dependents. I am confident that members of all parties will see Bill C-4 as I do, as another step forward in the field of veterans legislation, a field in which Canada is a proud leader.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, it is significant that as a result of the amendments in this bill, Canada and parliament are taking a first step in equality for males and females with regard to veterans legislation, when Madam Speaker is in the Chair for the first time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: I have studied the bill. I can only say that the amendments are commendable. My party has no quarrel with the contents of the bill except for one or two reservations which I hope to deal with a little later. I must say that we in this party are pleased that most of the amendments seem to be related very closely to the program for veterans affairs that was produced by my party as a policy prior to the July 8 election.

● (2040)

I am glad our party was of some help to the minister and to the Department of Veterans Affairs in producing a bill which will overcome many of the inequities which have existed over the years, subject to the reservations I mentioned earlier. As is customary, the amendments were brought about in consultation with the veterans organizations of Canada. We owe a tribute to the National Council of Veterans Organizations which, over the years, has made representations on behalf of its membership. It is through the Council's efforts that many of these amendments are being put into effect. I feel a tribute is owed as well to the Woods committee which, four or five years ago, carried out a comprehensive study concerning the status of veterans. I am sure the efforts made by that committee, and the advice it gave, were instrumental in bringing about some of the excellent amendments contained in this bill.

As I have said many times in the past, a good deal of the progress in veterans legislation results from the fact that many of the people who serve in the various agencies in the Department of Veterans Affairs are themselves veterans. Not only do they perform their duties with capability but they do so with dedication. They, too, served their country in time of need, side by side with their comrades to whom they now administer.

Since we are dealing tonight with war veterans allowances I should like to mention the War Veterances Allowance Board, particularly the chairman, Mr. Don Thompson, his staff, and the district authorities across the country who have served the veterans so well. Mr. Thompson served most of the post war years as dominion secretary of the Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion. In the past few years he has been chairman of the War Veterans Allowances Board and, although he is not in the gallery tonight—

An hon. Member: He is.

Mr. Marshall: —I feel he deserves a special tribute. If he is here I hope I am not embarrassing him. We owe a tribute to Don Thompson and his staff for helping to bring about many of the amendments we see in Bill C-4.

The Department of Veterans Affairs is a little different from other departments of government in that the majority of the staff are veterans and know the problems of veterans. I am sure they are dedicated to the progress of the legislation which comes before us, and I feel this shows a good hope for Canada. I might say of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs that it, too, is a little different from the other committees of the House of Commons. We try to deal with our business on a non partisan basis.

Unfortunately, perhaps, there is no sex appeal in veterans affairs to attract the attention of the press. It is rarely that controversial matters come up for consideration. Nevertheless, I respectfully request the people in the Press Gallery tonight to make known the contents of this bill to all veterans, so that they may take advantage of these benefits and learn what we are trying to do for them.

I can only add that there may be a change in the non-partisan nature of the Veterans Affairs Committee if the minister does not agree with the representations we have made from this side of the House with regard to the Veterans Land Act. However, there is still a ray of hope. In reply to a question I put to him—if I may refer to our proceedings last week—the minister indicated that a departmental committee is now working on some type of housing program for veterans. I hope this will come about and that we can continue to serve veterans as they deserve.

In any case, through an amendment put down by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the Veterans Land Act measure, extending the expiry date, we shall soon have an opportunity to debate this situation. I hope the government will recognize that we cannot in any circumstances phase out the Veterans Land Act which provides a housing program and accommodation for many veterans who deserve this program because they served Canada in time of need.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We should improve it.

Mr. Marshall: My hon. friend says we should improve it. I must say that the policy paper adopted by my party sets out five or six points which would improve the legislation. I hope the minister will do more than simply tell me in the House that he will consider these proposals. I hope he will take the necessary action. I know he wishes to do so; now he has to convince his colleagues in the cabinet some of whom have lost consideration for our veterans, something it is so easy to do between world wars.

As I have said, the bill is a good one. It will overcome many of the inequities which presently exist and, to a large extent, it will allow veterans to meet the increased cost of living. Moreover, it is one of the first steps toward giving equality of status between males and females, one of the most important portions of the program which our party produced prior to the July election.

The bill embodies at least 12 important amendments. It provides entitlement for widowers who have reached the age of 60, special awards to a surviving spouse with respect to dependent children; for changes in the determination of allowances payable to veterans married to each other; for allowances to a widow who is maintaining a veteran or a person in receipt of civilian war allowance, and revises from 21 to 25 years the age until which a child may receive an allowance while following an approved course of instruction. This is very important because, as we all know, under the present act the dependent child of a veteran could attend university until the age of 21. Naturally, this does not suit the purpose because students continue at university until at least the age of 25. This measure will provide them with the assistance that they need.

Another important point which was in our policy paper is that the bill will provide for quarterly adjustments of the income factor, another step in the right direction. The only legislation that provided for this was the old Age Security Act. As this session progresses I hope this criterion will be used to provide quarterly indexing of disability pensions. I know the minister is considering this, and I hope he will be able to persuade the cabinet to provide quarterly indexing for disabled pensioners who suffer from increase in the cost of living.

The bill also provides for new allowances for dependent children. I mention these improvements generally at this time since we wish to co-operate in getting through the second stage of the bill. However, we will deal with the bill clause by clause at committee stage.

One of the important features of the bill, unless I am mistaken, is that no longer will the value of the home of a recipient and the determination of his amount of income restrict him or her from receiving the war veterans allowance.

However, in spite of the dozen or so amendments that will overcome many of the inequities that exist in the act, I feel that we, as parliamentarians, should not feel too proud of the fact that it has taken so long, some 44 years since the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act were passed, to reach this stage. Having reached this stage, there still remain some inequities that must be eliminated. We should give the veterans of Canada legislation that does not have to be amended every year at the political whim of the government so that we can finally care for our burnt out veterans.

It should forever remain on the consciences of past and present parliamentarians that too many veterans over the years have passed on, having been disappointed and discouraged that Canada failed to live up to its commitment to those who served and to whom we should have shown a little more compassion and consideration. Regardless of which side of the House we sit on, we in this parliament should demand a veterans charter that will provide, to our remaining veterans and their dependents, a reasonable pension that will give them adequate shelter.

One of the things I am sorry not to see in the bill is the elimination of the requirement for pension of 365 days' service in the United Kingdom before November 12, 1918, for first world war veterans. This would be a very simple amendment, one that has been introduced in this House of Commons over the years. I have before me a copy of a bill introduced by a colleague of mine, the former member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, Mr. McIntosh. This bill provided for a pension to veterans who did not serve for 365 days, payable on a pro rata basis. I should like to read the explanatory notes to this bill which was introducted in 1963:

> The purpose of this Bill is to grant eligibility for an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952 to those veterans of World War I who would qualify for an allowance except that they served in the United Kingdom less than 365 days prior to November 12th, 1918. The allowance, however, would be less than a standard allowance as it would be calculated on the fraction of the number of days served in fact (e.g., 200) divided by 365.

Since there are not too many veterans who fall into this category, there is no reason for not introducing such an amendment now. I might mention that the average age of first world war veterans is very close to 80, so how many years have they left? Some served in the United Kingdom for 360, even 361 days, so why cannot we fulfil our obligation to those who have only a few remaining years left to live and who could receive a little extra comfort?

A single recipient of old age security and the GIS today receives $199.10. According to the minister's statement which he distributed on October 2, as of September 30, 1973, a single recipient had a monthly income ceiling of $191.14. The new monthly income ceiling effective October 1, 1974, will be $223.66, reflecting a 17 per cent increase, or some $32.52. If we take into consideration the exemption for the war veteran over 65, all we are doing is providing him with $40 to $50 to give him a little extra comfort and allow him to cope with the increase in the cost of living that is so serious today.

Another inequity that should be overcome concerns those veterans of Canada who remained overseas and thus do not qualify for war veterans allowance owing to the provision that they must reside in Canada for 365 days. The minister is aware of this situation and has met these veterans over in England, as have his predecessors. The legislation of 1960 was amended to permit continuing payment of the allowance outside Canada primarily for the benefit of recipients who were desirous of leaving Canada for reasons of health or family ties. Apparently, 683 recipients have benefitted by this 1960 amendment, and I give credit to whoever was in power at that time.

Again it is surely not too much to ask that an amendment be passed to eliminate the 12 months' residence requirement in the case of the few Canadian veterans who are unable to draw the allowance because of their inability to return to Canada to qualify. If the reason for the amendment in 1960 permitting continuing payment of the allowance outside Canada was primarily for the benefit of recipients desirous of leaving Canada for reasons of health or family ties, then surely it is only fair that the converse should be applied, namely, that those veterans who are unable to return to reside in Canada for 12 months, for reasons of health or family ties, should be allowed the privilege of drawing the allowance without the necessity of having to return to Canada?

Many of these veterans are invalids and they cannot return to Canada. We are an affluent nation, and although I realize we must restrict government spending, there are many areas where we could save a lot of money by cutting out government waste. This would enable us to provide these Canadians with the extra comforts that they deserve, and we would be able to say that Canada has fulfilled its obligations to them for the service that they have given to their country.

We could also improve the act under regulation so as to increase the amount of casual earnings that a war veterans allowance recipient can receive. At present it is $1,000 for a single recipient and $1,500 for a married couple. In many cases the children of second world war veterans have grown up and gone their own way, and the wife is in a position to work and provide a little of the extras for herself and her husband. But she cannot do so because of the restrictions. I am sure this is a matter the minister will consider should be the subject of consultation between himself and his department in order that the amount of casual earnings allowed can be increased. Certainly that is something to be considered for the future.

I should like to make another point regarding the recipients of war veterans allowance who happen to have large families and, perhaps regrettably, qualify for social assistance in addition to the war veterans allowance. Whenever there is an increase in the war veterans allowance, that is, each January, in relation to the cost of living index, the social assistance is decreased. I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is not in the House to hear this. Consultations should take place with the provinces regarding a change which will allow these veterans to receive the increased war veterans allowance without a decrease in social assistance.

As the situation now stands, any increase in war veterans allowance is offset by a reduction in provincial social assistance. The same is true in respect of disability pensions. When a recipient of a war veterans allowance receives a partial increase in his disability pension there is corresponding decrease in his other allowance. With the various changes in disability pensions and war veterans allowances I hope this situation will be corrected.

Speaking on behalf of my colleagues, and particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think I can safely say we all want this bill to go the the committee as soon as possible in order that it can be returned to this House and be passed here. A lot of administration is involved in getting payments out. A great deal of administration is involved in quarterly indexing, as well as in respect of other factors in the bill. I can only say that we commend the minister wholeheartedly for his introduction of this amendment. I hope he will consider the amendments to which I have referred. If he does not, it is my intention to suggest such changes at the committee stage. I am sure that with a little effort we could bring in amendments to make the war veterans allowance bill a complete legislative item to serve the war veteran and burnt out veterans for years, without the necessity of having to come back each year to agree to ad hoc amendments.

I again commend the minister and the government on this bill. I look forward to its speedy passage in committee and its return to this House so that it can be passed for the benefit of those veterans of Canada who have served so well over the years.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps I should say "Madam Speaker" fast before the Chair becomes Mr. Speaker. In any case, as a first word I want to say on behalf of my party that we warmly welcome Bill C-4. Like the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), we want to expedite the passing of this bill so it will be in effect just as soon as possible.

It is quite true that before I conclude my remarks I shall play the role of an opposition member, indicating a few things that are wrong, or pointing out a few shortcomings. But my main feeling about this bill is that it is good. It has more things in it I can praise than if often the case. One has difficulty in finding the jokers that are so frequently in bills the government brings forward.

I want also to join with my friend and colleagues, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, in paying certain tributes. I was aware of the fact that while he was doing so he, as a member from Newfoundland, was telling the minister, who is a representative from Prince Edward Island, what a good war veterans allowance board chairman he has, who happens to come from New Brunswick. I suppose I could fall back on my Nova Scotia background and make this an Atlantic provinces night.

In any event I want to join in the tribute to Mr. Donald Thompson and his staff for the good work they do in administering the War Veterans Allowance Act. As the hon. member says, we pay the same tribute to other officials in the Department of Veterans Affairs, but tonight what we have before us is the War Veterans Allowance Act.

As I said, there are a number of things about the amendments presented tonight that are good. Let me take a few minutes to emphasize them, even though they have already been noted.

This bill is good in that it establishes equality between the sexes so far as veterans under his legislation are concerned. I suppose this equality of sexes is demonstrated by the fact that when I started my remarks it was Madam Speaker but there has been a change and now it is Mr. Speaker in the Chair. There is, of course, still a slight difference. I suppose "vive la différence" will always be the motto, and there will always be some differences between the sexes.

I notice under the provisions of this bill that, although a male veteran can make it possible for his widow to draw the war veterans allowance at age 55, the female veteran can make it possible for her widower to draw it only when he reaches 60. I suppose the difference is that not many women admit to getting past 55, but at any rate that slight difference still seems to exist.

In any case the provisions of the bill as I read it seem to establish equality between male and female veterans, and the bill also makes special provisions where a male and female veteran are married to each other. We welcome these changes. They are indeed in line with other changes being made in a number of our federal statutes.

The second thing about this bill I feel to be particularly good is the one the minister referred to in the opening portion of his remarks, namely, the provision which is made for an extra payment in the case of children. As he pointed out, the only way a child received anything before was in the case of a parent of single status getting the married rate if that parent was maintaining a child or children. Now, under the provisions of this bill, the children of war veterans allowance recipients up to a certain age are to be provided in their own right, with the amounts set out in the legislation.

Before I leave this I must say I am not happy about the provision that subtracts from the amount being paid in respect of a child the amount received as a family allowance. It seems to me this is a case of the old means test concept taking a long time to die out.

I remind the minister that the War Veterans Allowance Board has already found it possible in other areas to exempt certain forms of income. For example, even though the war veterans allowance is tied into the guaranteed income supplement that goes with old age security, the War Veterans Allowance Board by Order in Council exempts the escalation of old age security and the guaranteed income supplement. I believe there have been also arrangements between the War Veterans Allowance Board and my province of Manitoba, where a mincome program is being established, to make it clear that money received under that program will not count as income for purposes of the war veterans allowance.

There are other examples of this. The point I am making, however, is that it has been found possible to exempt certain other forms of income from the means or income test that attaches to the war veterans allowance. I contend that this could be done in respect of the family allowance. I just do not think it stands up for us to embark on this new idea of providing, under the War Veterans Allowance Act, something for the children of war veterans allowance recipients and then to turn right around and take away with one hand what is given with the other. I realize the defence which can be put up in this regard and no doubt we will face that in committee, but it seems we are back to square one on this business, and that it is time to mix in the means test on these payments to which these children are entitled.

I come to the third item in the bill which I regard as good. I shall do my best to avoid any criticism of it because it is something for which I have been asking for a long time. We have it now and I want to say that it is most welcome. I refer to the decision to escalate the ceiling rather than the allowance. That is saying it in shorthand, despite the fact that it is rather complicated.

Up until the present time the way the government has worked has been to increase the maximum allowance payable by the percentage increase in the cost of living, and then raise the ceiling on permissible income only by the same number of dollars that the allowance was raised. That meant that the ceiling on the permissible income applied to the war veterans allowance did not go up by the percentage increase in the cost of living.

I argued all along that the escalation should apply to the ceiling rather than to the allowance. That is now being done in this bill and I think it is one of the most important changes being made. From now on the escalation is on the total income allowed to a war veterans allowance recipient. That ceiling will be escalated by the actual rise in the cost of living, and the allowance will be increased by the number of dollars necessary to keep the allowance the same number of dollars below the ceiling. As I say this is something some of us have been pressing for, for a long time. Now it is here and we welcome it very warmly.

I wish also to express approval of the fact that the escalation under the War Veterans Allowance Act, once this bill comes into effect, will be on a quarterly rather than on an annual basis. Ever since the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement were placed on a quarterly basis that has been a bone of contention with war veterans allowance recipients and others. They could not understand why they were not put on the same basis. This is being done and we welcome it.

I go further and say, if I understand the bill—and I have tried to read it with a view to grasping it—that there will be retroactive payments. The minister's statement tonight about 80,000 accounts having to be adjusted seems to confirm that. It is also confirmed by the fact that the various schedules in the bill indicate the rates of ceiling and rates of allowance for each of the quarters in the current year.

Therefore, it looks as though there will be a case of retroactivity in respect of a war veterans allowance recipient over these past number of months. In other words, we are adopting the idea that the escalation should have applied to the ceiling since last October, and the adjustments will be made on that basis. That is good.

I hope the computers in the department are in good working order and that it will not take too long for these 80,000 accounts to be adjusted. Everyone recognizes that it will take some time, but we hear of computers which, if they are fed the necessary information, can pass out so many hundreds of results per second. I hope these adjustments can be made soon and that all those in receipt of war veterans allowance will obtain the benefit of the new formula without delay.

That is not an inconsiderable list of things to find in a bill which one has to say are good. They are all very good and they are welcome. That leads me to draw attention to some shortcomings and some things which are not here at all. In respect of the point I have been discussing about quarterly escalation I still regret—and we will run into this as time goes on—that the plan of escalation is one that is always behind.

The plan being adopted for war veterans allowance escalation is exactly the same plan as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) brought in with respect to old age security and the quaranteed income supplement. So, I cannot ask one minister to do something without asking the other minister to do the same thing. Since both are present this evening I put this to both of them.

The plan that is in this bill, like the plan applying to OAS and GIS, works this way. At the beginning of a quarter you go back two months. Then you take the three months prior to those two months, and you compare the cost of living in those three months with the three months prior thereto. So when you have an escalation in the allowance or an escalation in old age security and the guaranteed income supplement you are really eight months behind. To tell me this is because it is too complicated to compute is something I cannot swallow.

Then in respect of the orphans, the orphans' benefits will not escalate quarterly but rather annually. Again the minister has been handed the program that is in the legislation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When you get an escalation in January you go back three months, take the 12 months before that and compare the cost of living in that 12 months with the 12 months before that. The time when people need the escalation most is when the cost of living has gone up, and not eight months later as in the quarterly case, or a couple of years later as is almost the case in the instance of annual escalation.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare receives many letters complaining about the escalation of old age pensions being behind. The Minister of Veterans Affairs will soon get the same treatment. He is hoping that all he is going to get will be many letters thanking him for this escalation on a quarterly basis. He will get those, but it will not be long until letters come saying that it is very nice to get the escalation but it is not enough, that it does not match the rise in the cost of living and that it is five or six months out of date.

I therefore urge the minister to get interested in this subject and have a conference with the Minister of National Health and Welfare so that they may soon come up with an idea on escalation that is more up to date than this scheme which is patterned after the one in the Old Age Security Act, with all of its shortcomings.

Speaking of escalation, I want to support the proposal made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe that it ought also now to apply to disability pensions. It seems to me there are going to be all sorts of complications with old age security, the guaranteed income supplement and the war veterans allowance being escalated quarterly, and the war disability pension being escalated annually.

The minister shakes his head, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether he was worrying about those complications or saying, in effect, "No matter what we do those fellows over there want something more". It is this government that boasts about quarterly escalation and that it brought it in for old age pensions and for the guaranteed income supplement, after the Minister of National Health and Welfare said he did not want to do that but would rather bring in substantial increases in the basic amount. Well, the government cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker; if it is proud of having brought in quarterly escalation for a number of programs, the onus is on the government to bring it in for all pension programs.

To return to the War Veterans Allowances Act, I listened with interest when my friend from Newfoundland said he could not read his notes. I thought he was looking down here and reading mine because I have only one point noted that he did not have. He was perfectly right in his plea about the 365 day requirement. I understood this requirement when it was put in the War Veterans Allowance Act over 40 years ago. This applies to veterans of World War I.

Surely we do not need any longer to deny veterans aged 75, 80 or 85 the benefit of the war veterans allowance because their service in England in world war I was only 364, 360 or even only 180 days? It seems to me that at this point we could say to a veteran who saw any service at all overseas in World War I that he can qualify for the war veterans allowance.

I liked the way the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe was putting it, Mr. Speaker. He did not use the words "guaranteed annual income for veterans" but that is what he was advocating. I suggest the time has come when we ought to say to any veteran of World War I that he does not any longer have to go through the rigmarole necessary under the Canadian Pension Commission, or to meet the tests of the war veterans allowance board, but rather that a guaranteed annual income will be his by right.

Someone will immediately suggest that there are veterans of World War II who are just as old. All right, we could establish the age at 75, 70 or 65 and say to every veteran in the country that at that age he is to be guaranteed an annual income. As the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe has proposed, it should be reasonably better than the income provided under our civilian social security legislation. It is a good place to begin this concept of a guaranteed annual income and I strongly urge it upon the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

I said that I had one point that the hon. member for Humber-St-George's-St. Barbe did not see when he looked over here, Mr. Speaker. It relates to the war disability pensions paid under the Pension Act but it has a tie-in with the War Veterans Allowance Act. I have in mind the provision which denies the widow of any veteran a war widow's pension unless her husband was on a disability pension of 48 per cent or more before he died. The Woods commission recommended that this should be scrapped in favour of a pro rata arrangement, and that any widow of a veteran who had had a disability pension should get a pension as of right, whatever the scale might be. I think we should start to apply that to widows, especially widows of veterans of World War I. I welcome the sympathetic hearing that has been given this matter by the minister and various officials in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I just hope that this year we get somewhere with this idea.

As the last speaker said, there will be an opportunity some time soon to discuss the War Veterans Land Act so we need not go into that tonight. The notice under the amendment to the statute of last spring was filed last Thursday, October 17, so that means that within 15 days we get to that debate—that is, Mr. Speaker, unless the minister beats us to it one of these days by announcing a new veterans housing program. I would be quite happy if he were to do so.

What we have before us tonight is the War Veterans Allowance Act and I say again that we welcome the improvements being made. I hope the minister will become part of an effort to get escalation more up to date. I hope he will take another look at the matter of applying a family allowance test to the moneys to be made available to the children of war veterans allowance recipients. I hope he will get rid of that 365 day clause for veterans of World War I and I hope he will take a new look at the position of all widows, especially those whose husbands were on pensions of less than 48 per cent before they died.

I have no quarrel at all with the minister's pride in presenting this legislation. As a package it is one of the best sets of improvements in the War Veterans Allowance Act for a long time. But maybe when we come out of committee with the bill it will be better still. We shall do our best to see that it is, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed fortunate to follow such eminent speakers as the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I always feel that these two gentlemen are good spokesmen for veterans, and it is an honour to follow them.

The minister should certainly be congratulated on this legislation. Both previous speakers mentioned that, and I am in full agreement. This bill updates the existing act and brings it into modern times.

It is a long time since a lot of our veterans fought in the wars. It is 56 years since world war I, over 28 years since world war II, and 22 years since Korea. It is interesting that people in Canada and members of this House still want to be fair and, shall I say, generous to their veterans.

● (2130)

Some of our young people tend to make fun of those who were in the army or fought for their country in the last war. That is too bad, because they confuse the causes of war and the lack of vision of those who allowed war to happen with the people who were compelled to fight for their country, either because of patriotism or because they were called up. Why they fought makes no difference. They went through two wars in some cases, and they fought for freedom. We must not forget that.

Last week, when I could not get a flight at the right hour, I came up by train and began reading the "Gulag Archipelago." I could not finish the book on the train and am still reading it. The big thing is that apparently after the First World War in mother Russia they sent those who had spoken in disparaging terms of the state into exile, after interrogation and torture, for perhaps one or two years, even though those exiled had not the slightest intention to incite revolution. In Canada that would never be allowed to happen.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke about the good news and the bad news. He mentioned quarterly escalation of pensions. I agree with what he said. I do not see why it takes so long to escalate pensions. I really think we should try to make the computer work better. I know it has not worked too well for the UIC this past year, but it is working better. I hope it will turn out the cheques right on the date when the escalation in pensions should occur. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is to be congratulated for beginning this process. It applies to practically all pensions, and I do not see why we should not use it with veterans' pensions. They should be escalated every quarter, in line with the rise in the consumer price index, or whatever basis you use.

In the past, war veterans' legislation made little provision for children of veterans. That was very strange. The government increased family allowances for children up to $20 per child, and even this amount provides just a small amount of help. The point is this: the widow of a veteran with one child gets the same amount as the widow with two children. That is strange. The department and the board— and I congratulate Mr. Thompson—have decided that a flat rate of $50 is to be paid. The family allowance is deducted, so that if you get $20 in family allowance the flat rate under the veterans' legislation will be $30. I think this idea is sound.

My second point is that the bill will extend allowances for children up to age 25. This will allow the sons or daughters of veterans to continue their education without interruption. They will not need to leave school and work. That sort of thing delays graduation. I am glad that this provision has been introduced.

Another point which was covered by other members is that there is a flat rate or floor of $125 per month for the orphans of veterans. Previously, orphans were not well treated under the act. There is provision for up to three orphans of one family. Yet in some families there are five or six orphans. This, I think, should be examined.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said there is to be an increase in the ceiling of allowances paid to veterans and dependants. That ceiling will be escalated. I think this is very good.

Since we agree that we must treat our veterans generously, it is clear that, if we do not do these things provided for in the bill, we shall treat our veterans shabbily. Mr. Speaker, the word to remember is shabby.

As other speakers said, the Veterans Land Act may be phased our next year. May I put in my oar in that respect. I ask the minister to consider helping veterans with housing. If this is in the works, I do not know. I think the veteran without money should be treated differently from the average citizen with little or no money. The advantage should always go to the veteran; he should get any differential.

I wish to make just one more point. The improvement in the escalation provided for in the bill is good. I feel that all veterans' pensions should be escalated, those paid to orphans as well as other pensions. Increasing the ceiling instead of paying the flat rate will be of great advantage. Only this way can we be generous to all veterans. Otherwise we shall treat them poorly.

I repeat, Canada owes a special debt to the men and women who served in times of crisis. I think this is a good bill, and support it fully. I hope the minister will consider the points I have mentioned. I commend him and the department for continued efforts to improve the lot of our veterans and their dependants.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the War Veterans Allowance Act became law in 1930 and was essentially designed as an old age pension for veterans who, because of the rigours of their service in the war theatres of World War I, were considered to have been pre-aged by about 10 years. Since then the act has been broadened to include veterans of the Nort-West Field Force, South African War, World II and Korean conflict, and their widows and orphans.

Bill C-4 contains a number of measures that the Progressive Conservative party has been seeking for some time now. We stated in our policy paper that we would introduce amendments to the War Veterans and Civilians Allowance Acts to ensure automatic increases bases on a three month cost of living index rather than on an annual basis. This would ensure more money for veterans more frequently.

The measure is most welcome, but we request an explanation of the reason quarterly increases were refused to orphans. This seems unjust. One can only hope it was merely an oversight.

The Progressive Conservative party advocates consultation with our provinces with a view to ensuring that increases in War Veterans Allowances do not lead to decreases in provincial social assistance payments. Has the government undertaken such consultations?

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), made mention of World War I veterans residing in the British Isles. I would also like to add my comments. At present there exists a restriction of 365 days' overseas service for veterans of World War I who enlisted prior to November 11, 1918. We suggest that this requirement be removed.

In order to receive an allowance outside Canada, a person must be a recipient at the time of his departure and must have resided in Canada for the 12 months immediately preceding the day he leaves Canada.

There are an estimated 10,000 Canadian veterans in the British Isles who have lived there since World War I or World War II. Many of these should be entitled to War Veterans Allowance, but have been unable to meet Canadian government regulations that demand that those who served in the forces spend at least one year in Canada before they can receive veterans allowance abroad.

There are many reasons why these veterans are not easily able to comply with these regulations. Some veterans are bed-ridden and paralyzed, eking out a precarious existence, and physically unable to come to Canada. Many are simply financially unable to make the long trip, with or without their families. Consequently there are some 600 or 700 Canadian veterans in great financial need in Britain alone.

There is no need for this situation to exist. Canada rightly looks after members of allied forces who are now in Canada; yet Canada ignores many of her own veterans who happen to be living abroad. I hope the minister will take note of my observations and take the necessary measures to bring in corrective legislation.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, as I was preparing notes to take part in this debate the chair was occupied by Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin). I had a few words I wanted to address to her. As she is still in the chamber, I will say this about her. Those people who grace the Speaker's chair bring with them some knowledge of the rules of debate in the House, wisdom, and good humour. When you add to that beauty, grace and charm, this House is doubly honoured.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Who in this chamber is in a better position to make these comments than those who sit to the immediate left of the Speaker's chair?

I join my colleagues in supporting the passage of Bill C-4. It is especially fitting that we should be debating this bill and expediting its passage close to the eve of Remembrance Day, November 11. What better wreath could we place on the cenotaph to remember the dead of two world wars than this bill which gives benefit to the living veterans of those wars?

I congratulate the minister and his departmental officials on this bill. The remarks of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) indicated that we on this side of the House support these changes. We have advocated them, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe has made a real contribution to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. He has made many positive suggestions to the department. He is respected by members of the committee, members on all sides of the House, and veterans from all across this land.

It is worth noting that members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs take a continuing non-partisan view of the problems of veterans. No other committee of this parliament has more good will or a more genuine desire to work for the benefit of those whom it is desirous of serving.

There is general agreement among all members of the House that this bill should be passed almost immediately. I have only two comments I wish to make. The first has to do with the increase in the income ceiling. According to this bill it is to be increased by a formula base which includes the consumer price index and other factors which have been detailed by previous speakers. However, due to the inflation which is rampant in today's economy, even with these increases the poor veteran will only find enough absolute dollars to pay his grocery bill. He will not be helped very much when it comes to the other costs such as shelter, heat, clothing and so on. While these increases are of some value to him, I do not feel they are overly generous.

Legislation introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) will make some changes to the Canada Pension Plan. The ceiling on income of people receiving the Canada Pension Plan will be completely removed for those over age 65. The Department of Veterans Affairs should take note of that precedent and introduce it as a regulation or, if necessary, as an amendment to the act. There is certainly a precedent. It would approach nearer to the guaranteed income spoken of by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I sincerely suggest this to the minister and his officials. I trust they will take due note of it.

Correspondence received by members of parliament concerns a number of problems affecting veterans. One problem that recurs quite often is the matter of over-payment of War Veterans Allowance, often that paid to the widow of a deceased veteran. This is through no fault of hers. She is ignorant because she does not understand the regulations. She takes the cheques which come to her in good faith. The War Veterans Allowance Board suddenly notices she is being overpaid. They ask for repayment, which is their right.

It is agreed the terms are most generous, but in cases brought to my attention even the most generous terms can be a great hardship. Is there not some way in which the department could write off such overpayments? These could be judged on the merits of each case. I believe there are cases where the demands for repayment are amply justified. However, there are other cases which, with a real sense of humanity and generosity on the part of the department, could and should be written off.

● (2150)

In conclusion, I should like to pay a tribute to Mr. Don Thompson of the War Veterans Allowance Board whose kindness and courtesy to myself and, I am sure, to all other hon. members who inquire about particular problems relating to our constituents, is deeply appreciated.

I am told that speeches to be immortal need not be eternal, Mr. Speaker. With this maxim in mind I shall conclude my remarks forthwith.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join those who have spoken before me in welcoming this bill. My remarks will be brief and I am sure we can pass the bill on second reading by ten o'clock. We would in no way delay the passage of this measure. The provisions it contains have been a long time coming and they have been requested, I am sure, by members in all parties in the House.

From my conversations with veterans and representatives of veterans organizations I find that many veterans are finding it increasingly difficult to live on their pensions and allowances. Each year it becomes a little harder for them to cope with the cost of living or, shall I say, the cost of staying alive—perhaps if we used the latter phrase we should find it would not roll off, our tongues as easily as does "the cost of living".

The Veterans Affairs Standing Committee is one of the truly non-partisan committees. I was very pleased to play my part in the work of that committee. Each of its members is anxious to get a better deal for the veteran. We all feel the bill should go farther than it does. We all feel that veterans should not be obliged to beg to anyone. We all feel that they should live their lives with honour and dignity. If there is any group which deserves a special place in our society it is the veterans.

Most veterans' organizations continue to serve their communities year after year. Along with other service clubs they sponsor a variety of projects. Indeed it has been the hallmark of their generation to give to their country and to their community. In many cases they get very little in return.

The bill before us will go a long way toward removing many of the inequities facing veterans in Canada. I should like to see the 365 days' overseas service requirement affecting world war I veterans removed. Surely, the few hundred thousand world war I veterans left in Canada should get all we can give them. I am confident those among the world war I veterans who presently qualify, that is, those who served more than a year overseas, would not deny these benefits to their fellow veterans.

I should also like to see consideration given to the position of veterans who served Canada well during times of war but who did not return to Canada. Surely we can consider their situation. There are only a few thousand left and, if we find ourselves able to consider programs of aid to the less fortunate in other nations, surely we can look after those Canadians who served their country in time of war either as members of the Canadian forces or as civilians on war duty for Canada. Let us first look after our own.

We know that many of them are living in Europe, especially in Britain where they are experiencing economic problems. I believe we should amend this legislation to include persons who, for one reason or another, chose not to return to Canada after their war services.

I do not suppose one could find anywhere in our society a group of people more fiercely proud of their service to their country than the veterans. I am one of them and I am proud to stand with them whenever I can. It is a source of inspiration to me to see how resourceful most veterans are, and how well they cope with the problems of the day. The members of the Veterans Affairs Committee look forward to receiving this bill and will, no doubt, return it to the House with all dispatch so that the benefits contained therein can be put into effect with all possible speed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. I would remind the House that if the minister speaks at this point it will conclude the debate at this stage.

Mr. Marshall: If we happen to go past ten o'clock I wonder whether there would be unanimous consent to give the bill second reading so that it might go to the committee. Could we allow the minister sufficient time to conclude his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, in rising to conclude this debate I simply wish to thank hon. members for their participation. We have listened with interest to the many comments which have been made, and we look forward to the bill being passed on to committee for an in-depth study of the matters which have been brought up.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY—SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF PENSIONS TO PERSONS BETWEEN 60 AND 65 WHO ARE NO LONGER EMPLOYED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday October 17, as recorded in Hansard at page 471, I sought under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion having to do with the proposed legislation for the payment of old age pensions to persons between the ages of 60 and 65 who are spouses of persons over 65. To my surprise there was not unanimous approval—somebody said no. Accordingly, I had no option but to put the same matter to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in the form of a question which is to be found on page 479 of Hansard for the same date. My question read as follows:

> In view of the justifiable complaints of many persons between the ages of 60 and 65 against the unfairness of their not being included in the proposed legislation regarding pensions, and despite there not being unanimous consent to the motion I moved earlier, will the minister give consideration to reviewing the proposed legislation and make pensions available across the board to those who are out of the labour market?

That latter phrase might have been expanded, of course, to read:

> —to persons across the board who are between 60 and 65 and who are out of the labour market?

In all of this, Your Honour, we are dealing with a promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the last election campaign, a promise which was repeated in the Speech from the Throne and indicated in the list of bills to come before this session of parliament. The bill in question is one which will make available to persons between 60 and 65 years of age who are spouses a pension under the Old Age Security Act provided, of course, that the other spouse is over 65 and drawing a pension, and provided that between the two of them they meet a certain means or income test. The Minister of National Health and Welfare in his reply the other day admitted that when this proposal was made it was brought forward as an interim measure.

● (2200)

I well remember that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made the promise during the election campaign he referred to the very types of individuals that I have mentioned—spinsters, widows, bachelors and widowers—as not being covered. I certainly got the impression from what I heard the Prime Minister say that he knew that in due course the payment of pensions at age 60 would have to be made more general, and that it would have to cover all persons in the age bracket of 60 to 65 who are in need.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare now says that the measure is an interim one in the sense that it is a forerunner of a guaranteed annual income for persons of all ages who may be in need. He talked the other day as well about the plan as being one that would solve the problem of two persons trying to live on one pension. That is fine, Mr. Speaker, but what about the one person trying to live on no pension?

It is all very fine to say to a married person, woman or man, who is between the age of 60 and 65, "Because your spouse is getting a pension we are going to give you one too". What about the single person, whether spinster, bachelor, widow or widower, who is in that same bracket, who is also in need, has no pension and is not to qualify under this legislation?

To my mind, no matter how much the minister tries to say that this is an interim measure in the way that he described it the other day, the fact is that in the eyes of the people and the country generally it is a pension payable at age 60; and there is going to be a very great feeling of unfairness when one 63 year old woman gets it because her husband is 66 and on a pension, and another 63 year old woman does not get it because she is a widow or a spinster. I could reverse the situation and speak of a 63 year old man under the same conditions.

I suggest that because of this unfairness that people are going to feel, the minister is starting off on the wrong foot by bringing in these pensions at 60 only in the case of the spouse between the ages of 60 and 65, rather than in the case of all those in that area who need it. I am quite prepared, as I have indicated in all of the speeches I have made on this matter over many years, to accept an employment test, to say that pensions are to be paid only to those persons between 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market. That will cover all the spouses who would meet the conditions of the minister's proposal, but it would be fairer, more general, and would not have the shortcomings that are in the minister's plan.

Adjournment Debate

When I tried the other day to move my motion under Standing Order 43, the Chair had something to say about there not being urgency to the question. There was no opportunity to argue it then and I am not now arguing with Mr. Speaker's ruling. But in my view the urgency of the matter is that once the minister's bill comes in it is pretty hard to get it changed.

Mr. Lalonde: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister says "Hear, hear!" I never thought that this minister would get that arrogant so fast, just because he sits over there with a majority. That was not the way the minister talked during the last parliament. At any rate, that is one of the facts of life in a majorty parliament.

Mr. Lalonde: Even with a minority, and you know that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In a minority parliament all sorts of things get changed, and the minister knows that. I am trying to get at the minister before he brings in the bill because once the bill comes in it is pretty hard to change. I am trying to get him to act with the common sense I believe he has, and to redraft this bill before he brings it in so it will provide pensions for all persons between age 60 and age 65 who are out of the labour market.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have a lot of respect for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and for all the points he mentioned. I pay a lot of attention to all his comments. He is experienced and has been concerned about problems in respect of pensions for a long time.

I am surprised at a lot of the talk that has been going on on this whole subject, and at the reactionary thinking he has adopted. Perhaps I should not be surprised in the light of the support he has just received from some of his colleagues on the Conservative side. When he talks about those out of the labour market I suppose he includes housewives. Does he also refer to the professional millionaire who decides to retire at age 60 because he has made enough money? He is out of the labour market too. The hon. member does not say whether those pensions should be universal or via an income test.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The retired millionaire gets a pension at age 65 and pays a heavy tax on it.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member has a lot of explanations to give. In regard to his suggestion that the proposal put forward will bring unhappiness to the country, let me say I think it will bring unhappiness only if he goes around confusing the issue and trying to mislead the people as to the intention of this particular proposal. I am convinced that the hon. member is not a man who would intentionally mislead the people.

The purpose of this bill, which I repeat is an interim measure, is to make provision for a couple when one is forced to retire at age 65 and they find themselves living on the pension of one. The hon. member asks about the other situation where a single person is living at age 60 without a pension. I can only ask about such an individual who is 58 or 59.

I appeal to the hon. member to understand the general principle of a guaranteed income. I hope we will soon be in a position to come to the aid of people who are in need, whatever their ages. The idea that there will be some great solution to our social security problems in dishing out hundreds of millions or even billions of dollars to people between the ages of 60 and 65 including those who might not need it, is not realistic. That is not the way to come to the aid of needy people in our society.

I urge the hon. member that he really look at this proposal and see the purpose of it in the broader context of a general guaranteed income for all those in need, whatever the age or condition.

SOCIAL SECURITY—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO CERTAIN PENSION PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, sometimes I get a shock here. This is the second time I have been on my feet in one day. I sometimes wonder why I am not recognized during the question period, so thank God there is a late show once in a while.

The subject of my question is closely related to the matter dealt with by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). On October 15 I asked whether any consideration was being given, in consultation with the provinces, to increasing the national minimum of $75 a month in allowances for the blind and disabled. I appreciate the minister's answer as I know he is aware of the problem. He indicated his government was trying to do away with special categories by introducing a guaranteed annual income. I agree to some extent that this is a step in a desirable direction, but there are two categories of people, the blind and the disabled, who deserve immediate attention, perhaps even on an emergency basis, particularly as the increases in the cost of living have a greater effect on them than on the ordinary welfare recipient.

Surely it must be realized that those suffering exceptional incapacity deserve extra help because they suffer from adverse conditions? Surely the blind, the crippled, who under no circumstances can help themselves, in a great number of cases require some form of attendance, assistance, special nutritional foods, and so forth? Surely the bedridden and the permanent cripple who was born with defects cannot manage to exist under the strain of rampant inflation?

I believe these people are deserving of consideration. Surely the mentally retarded, the person suffering from cancer, or the person with a tumor are deserving of exceptional incapacity allowances even perhaps in cases where the husband or spouse is earning an income over the maximum allowable?

The Blind Persons Act an the Disabled Persons Act are under provincial aegis and it is their responsibility. Yet when I approach the provincial government I am told I should take up the matter with the Department of National Health and Welfare.

All of us would like to see a guaranteed annual income. I realize the difficulty the minister has in compiling all the various fixed income programs. It does not look as if we will have a guaranteed annual income in the very near future. If we are to await the result of the pilot project that is taking place in some areas under federal-provincial co-operation, these incapacitated people will continue to suffer. In the meantime what do the blind people do in order to cope with the increases in the cost of living? All I can say to the minister is that while I appreciate he is confronted with various problems, in the meantime an emergency situation exists in Canada in respect of these people who have been born with defects with which they cannot cope.

The bill that has been passed tonight in respect of the allowances for veterans will mean additional income. All I can do is appeal to the minister again to take the initiative. I realize the provinces are at fault. I even blame my own province where we have a government whose policies coincide with those of the official opposition. However, I hope that something can be done to help these people cope with the serious situation facing them.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) on this particular issue. The points he has indicated are quite correct particularly with regard to the province of Newfoundland which has elected to retain the Blind Persons Act. However, between the guaranteed annual income of the near future and the Blind and Disabled Persons Acts of the present there is another option available to the province. But it is up to the provincial government to take advantage of the Canada Assistance Plan. I should like to take a few minutes to clarify the situation.

As the hon. member knows, under the Canada Assistance Plan the granting of assistance is based on the need of an individual or family as determined by the province, rather than on the categorization which in the past limited assistance to those who were blind, disabled, aged or unemployed. This philosophy was formally embodied in the Canada Assistance Plan which was introduced in 1966. Through agreements with the provinces under this act, the federal government shares in the cost of providing financial assistance and welfare services to all persons who are in need for whatever reason.

Because of the limitations of the categorical programs which preceded the Canada Assistance Plan, it was decided that, effective 1981, the federal government would cease to participate in these programs, namely the Blind Persons and Disabled Persons Acts. Most provinces have in fact ceased to accept applications under these programs and have transferred recipients to their more comprehensive assistance program.

However, some blind and disabled persons could not qualify for the greater benefits available under the comprehensive program, primarily because their assets exceeded the allowable limits. Therefore, as of March 31, 1974, Manitoba and New Brunswick were still accepting applications under both the Blind and Disabled Persons Act, while Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland were only accepting them under the Blind Persons Act. At the end of the last fiscal year there were 1,814 recipients of blind persons allowances and 4,369 of disabled persons allowances.

While it is true that allowances have not been increased recently under these programs, the mechanism by which applicants are assessed is less stringent than that under the Canada Assistance Plan. Therefore, recipients are usually allowed more assets, and federal payments such as family allowances and OAS/GIS are not counted as heavily in determining eligibility. I would also like to make clear that in those provinces where applications are still being accepted under the categorical programs, supplementary benefits under their assistance programs are available.

With the completion of the federal-provincial review of Canada's social security programs I am confident that problems such as those created by the categorization of assistance recipients can be resolved, as I indicated to the hon. member in the previous answer.

PUBLIC SERVICE—REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF REGIONAL WAGE DISPARITIES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on October 11 I asked a question of the newly appointed President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) regarding his intention to work toward the phasing out of regional wage inequalities. I pointed out that this was a commitment made during the recent election campaign by some Liberal candidates in the Atlantic area.

I do not raise this matter in a spirit of sarcasm but merely to put on the record that, for example, Mr. Patterson, the candidate who ran against the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), was very emphatic about this. He is reported in the Halifax Herald in June as saying that he was winning support within the ranks of his party for his policy of wage parity for several workers in the area. He said that a motion to this effect was endorsed at a meeting of Atlantic Liberal candidates in Halifax, and he claimed that he had won the support of three cabinet ministers for equity and was putting the question to every cabinet minister who visited the area. Another candidate who ran unsuccessfully against a former deputy speaker of this House expressed similar sentiments in the press.

The cabinet of this administration, Mr. Speaker, has on some occasions expressed sympathy for the concept of working out ways to stop the practice of one department undoing what the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is trying to do.

In response to what I asked concerning his attitude toward the perpetuation of regional wage inequities, on October 15 in committee the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) said:

> My own basic philosophy—and I do not like to evade the question—is that there has to be some consistency in government policy. When we apply minimum wages we apply them across the country. If you are going to reduce regional disparity, you are not going to reduce it by perpetuating—

The minister went on to say that he never believed the cost of living in Halifax, for example, was substantially lower than in central Canada.

I would like to urge the President of the Treasury Board to make a policy commitment to work actively toward phasing out this practice of paying people under his employ less money in one part of the country for the same kind of work their brethren are doing in a different part of the country.

At the present time PSA negotiators are dealing with the Treasury Board on wage issues in the general category of labour and trades in the Atlantic region. In this context, it is necessary to quote from a letter written by the former president of the treasury board on July 16 this year in answer to an inquiry from my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, relating to the statements of Liberal candidates that I referred to earlier.

● (2220)

The then president of the treasury board in his letter of July 16, 1974, which I shall quote in part, said:

> It is not desirable to create a general disparity between Public Service rates in lower-income areas and those paid by private industry and other levels of government. The provincial governments, on their part, are sensitive to federal Public Service rates of pay which are in excess of their rates.

From my knowledge, the trend is not that federal civil servants are paid more than their counterparts in provincial or private sector employment. In many cases it is the direct opposite. I refer to a situation which arose not many months ago involving nurses under federal jurisdiction, who were paid less than their sisters in the private sector and, in some cases, those working for the provinces.

In the Halifax area there is substantial differential in the pay of certain trades. Boilermakers employed federally made approximately $2.63 an hour less than their counterparts in provincial or private employment. Electricians make approximately $2.44 an hour less and labourers $2.12 less, even when one takes into account fringe benefits which have been made available to those employed in the federal public service and not available to those employed in the private or provincial sector.

I suggest that not one premier of Canada actively supports the type of wage policy espoused by Treasure Board at this time. I know that it is impractical to end regional pay differences in one fell swoop. As an interim measure it should be possible to achieve parity with the best paid people in a region. I believe the PSA is adopting a policy of designating areas within so-called depressed regions. For example, in Nova Scotia it would be Halifax, and in Quebec, Montreal and so on.

In those areas the standard of wages could be determined and Treasury Board could make sure that a wage equivalent to that paid in other sectors is paid to those in federal employ, even if one takes into account fringe benefits. The PSA, as an interim measure, wants wage equality in the different regions of the country.

I hope the President of the Treasury Board adopts the philosophical attitude which was shown recently by the Postmaster General in committee. Let him assure us that in future he will end the practice which runs counter, as the Postmaster General among others said, to the aims in the various regions, of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, without doubt there are clearly identifiable regional labour and pay markets in Canada for certain occupations. The hon. member alluded, I think, to the possibility of setting up pilot projects in places like Halifax and Montreal, under which rates of pay could be set.

Rates of pay, pay systems, and administrative rules governing pay in that part of the federal public service for which the Treasury Board is the employer, are items that are subject to negotiation under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. That we must bear in mind. Consequently, changes in pay systems cannot be made unilaterally by the government as employer. Any modifications of present regional rate systems and the extension of regional pay systems to other occupational groups can only flow from agreements between the government as employer and the bargaining agent, or from awards rendered by the arbitration tribunal.

It is the policy of the government as employer to try to bargain regional rates with certified bargaining agents where it is feasible and appropriate to do so; that is, for those groups where public servants are located in two or more regions of Canada, where the pay data for similar occupational groups in the private sector indicate significant regional variations from the Canadian average, and where the area of recruitment and the mobility of employees within the public service are limited.

These circumstances are typically found in groups in the operational category and the administrative support category, but they exist in groups in other categories as well. Paying national rates of pay in such circumstances can only result in some public servants receiving less than their counterparts in their region and others receiving rates in excess of those prevailing in their particular region.

To adopt a simplistic approach, paying one rate for right across Canada, in essence begs the question, begs the reality.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn this House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:27 p.m.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON CHANGES IN REGULATIONS

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, today I wish to announce specific changes in the immigration regulations, which are being made in the interests of prospective immigrants as well as Canadian citizens. They will be applied universally and will be non-discriminatory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: The reunification of families remains a fundamental principle of Canadian immigration policy. The government's objective is not to cut back immigration but to moderate the rate of growth.

Mr. Speaker, we Canadians take pride in the fact that we are a nation of immigrants. Even those of us whose families have been in this country for many generations can trace our roots to other lands, other continents. Our nation was built by immigrants and sustained by immigrants. Throughout Canada's history, our national spirit has been continually enriched by new Canadians from other lands. Immigrants opened up this country and pushed back the frontiers. They helped develop Canada as a modern industrial nation. In no small measure they are responsible for our present economic development, our present quality of life.

● (1410)

Canada has always had a strong attraction for people of other parts of the world, and in the last two years this attraction has been growing at an almost unprecedented rate, now accelerating as other countries begin to close down or reduce immigration. The number of people seeking to immigrate to Canada in the first six months of 1974 increased by almost 48 per cent over the substantial level of 1973. Immigrant landings in the same period are 47 per cent more than in the equivalent period in 1973, and 92 per cent more than the same period in 1972. At the present rate, we will land more than 200,000 immigrants in Canada in 1974, and significantly more in the next few years.

But, Mr. Speaker, immigrants are not statistics; they are people. They are people who need jobs, houses, schools and social services. I am announcing changes in our immigration regulations because immigrants are applying for entry and arriving in increasing numbers at a time when employment levels may well be uncertain, when housing is scarce and expensive and many social services are strained to a critical point. These strains are felt particularly in our three major cities where more than one half of the immigrants who arrive this year will settle.

It is important to emphasize that the government must exercise concern for the well-being of prospective immigrants as well as protect our own citizens. It would be irresponsible for the Canadian government to admit more immigrants than we can adequately provide with fundamentals such as jobs, housing and social services. All hon. members are aware that we are working hard on a green paper on immigration. This is a study of population and immigration which will provide the basis for widespread public debate on these topics. It will discuss some of the options in these fields available to the government. The green paper will be tabled in this House in the near year, but it will be late in 1975, at the earliest, before new immigration legislation could be expected; and it might be mid-1977 before it would have substantial effects on the immigration flow.

In the interim period, Mr. Speaker, the government has a responsibility to maintain stability in the immigration flow for the reasons I have stated, and so that public debate on new legislation may take place in an ordered and reasonable atmosphere. To provide this stability and lessen the rate of increase in immigrant landings in the months immediately ahead, we are therefore making certain interim changes in the regulations under the present act.

I want to emphasize that the government is taking these steps only after the most careful consideration, and it is taking only those steps which are consistent with the three basic principles of our present immigration policy: first, universality and non-discrimination in the application of selection criteria; second, family reunification; and third, the meeting of Canada's labour market needs.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that the following specific changes in the immigration regulations have been approved, effective today, to apply to applications received from this day forward. First, when assessing all independent and nominated applications, the visa officer will in each case, after totalling all the points to which the applicant is entitled under the existing selection system, then determine whether the applicant has satisfactory evidence of bona fide prearranged employment or is going to a designated occupation. In the event that this is not the case, ten points will be deducted from the total achieved.

Second, prospective independent and nominated applicants for immigration to Canada will receive credit under immigration regulations for prearranged employment only when it has been established, normally through a Canada Manpower centre, that no Canadian citizen or permanent resident is available to fill the vacancy. It is more important to note that since at least 50 points are required to gain admission to Canada, independent and nominated immigrants who score 60 points or more would not be affected by these changes. These adjustments take into account the natural concern of permanent residents in Canada about job opportunities. They are also designed to protect immigrants themselves who might otherwise have great difficulty finding jobs, housing or access to social services.

I want to emphasize that the changes I have just outlined do not—I repeat, do not—apply to sponsored immigrants, that is, to close relatives of Canadians or of landed immigrants. These close relatives will continue to come to Canada under the same conditions that have been in force for several years. The new regulations will apply in exactly the same manner to both the other categories, the independent and nominated immigrants, no matter where they were born or at what post they submit their applications. Again I emphasize that the changes will affect applications received from today forward, but not those already on hand. In other words, they are not going to apply retroactively.

[Mr. Andras.]

The new regulations will have no impact on Canada's traditional concern for, and response to, the persecuted and the displaced. We will continue to deal compassionately with refugees, victims of oppression or cases where other humanitarian considerations apply. Also, the new regulations will not prevent employers with a genuine need for labour which is unavailable in Canada from selecting immigrants to meet their needs. Indeed, when conditions warrant, this action will enhance our ability and we will take steps to help speed the entry of workers destined to employers whose requirements are particularly pressing.

Hon. members are well aware of the government's concern about the level of Francophone immigration to Canada. While immigrants from all countries will be affected by the changes, I want to stress our resolve to continue to encourage the flow of Francophone immigrants to Canada within the constraints established by the new regulations.

The changes that I have announced represent the fairest, the most just and, I think, the most equitable measures that we could find to deal with the anticipated increased flow of immigrants to Canada in the months ahead; and they are far less sweeping and more satisfactory than those changes we would be forced to contemplate a year or two from now if we did not act today.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to thank the minister for making his statement available to me well in advance of the sitting of the House today. Having had statements respecting changing the regulations from both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the minister—not only in the House but outside—during the last week or ten days, the minister's statement today came as no surprise. In my opinion, the minister's statement is a reflex action to a much larger problem than that to which the minister is giving credence. The problem is: what type of immigration and population policy will Canadians have in the 1970s and onward as we look at future growth in Canada?

● (1420)

From our point of view this statement is one of absolute confusion. The minister said early in his statement, "The government's objective is not to cut back immigration but to moderate the rate of growth." Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister what that statement means. First, he does not want to cut back immigration but he wants to cut back the rate of immigration.

An hon. Member: No. The rate of growth.

Mr. Epp: All right, the rate of growth. But that and the immigration rate is the same thing. I agree with the minister when he points out the desirability of Canada as a potential area for immigrants, especially in light of the present situation when many countries of the industrialized world are closing their borders to immigrants, specifically New Zealand and Australia. However, the statement again points out that the government still accepts the so-called TAP policy on immigration. That is a policy which ties the volume of immigration supposedly to job openings or to the rising unemployment rate. That means that as unemployment increases, we reduce the rate of immigration; and as unemployment drops, we increase the rate of immigration.

To me, this statement clearly indicates that this government fears the winter of 1974-75 because a rise in the rate of unemployment will mean a cutback on immigration as jobs will not be available. That is what the government is saying in this statement. This is a knee-jerk reaction to something the government desperately fears. It just does not know which way to move.

We must keep in mind that immigrants not only take jobs and are workers; they are also consumers and they stimulate the economy. There must be a fine balance between the number of jobs we want to make available to immigrants and the number of jobs they actually create. Furthermore, the statement clearly points out that the government is still plodding along—and will do so up to 1977, for the matter—hopefully legislating by regulation. I would ask again, where is the green paper? We have reason to believe that it can be presented in the very near future. Surely the expression of Canadians regarding future population growth as indicated in the briefs presented when the green paper was compiled should be related to the demand and the need for future Canadian immigration policy.

The government says it is now going to bring in another regulation while the green paper is in the process of being developed. I suggest this is just another reaction to the problem. Clearly, what we need is a balanced immigration policy. This immigration policy for Canada, to my mind, is geared to the centralist view, that is, the general view of the industrialized areas of Ontario and Quebec. As unemployment increases in those areas, you reduce immigration.

Let me point out—I am sure the minister is aware of this—that there are other regions of this country which desperately need workers, particularly western and northern Canada. We have been able to fill some of these job vacancies only with immigrants who were willing to take them and apparently Canadians did not want the jobs. While restricting regulations are necessary and are dictated by areas of unemployment, there are other areas of Canada which need workers to hammer nails, to lay floors and to work in stores. We need workers in Alberta and in northern Canada. Is the minister now saying that we are to have a complete reduction in immigration? Is he suggesting that although there are jobs available in some areas, we are to have a universal restriction and reduction? I say this is a policy which must take regional factors into consideration very definitely. In respect of the regulations the minister has brought in he has tied them to an extent to job openings.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member because, in fact, the minister's statement was a long statement on a very important subject. I have already accorded the hon. member as much or frankly a bit more time than the minister had. As I say, I hesitate to interrupt him but I feel the hon. member really ought to try now to get near the conclusion of his remarks. There are two other hon. members who wish to be heard on this subject.

Mr. Epp: Thank you for your indulgence, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion I should like to suggest to the minister that the regulations he has brought in today have already been in operation in various immigration offices across the world. He says, not directly. I believe there are very direct practical implications to that. Further, I should like to suggest that the minister should give us more clarification in respect of these regulations. For instance, how long have these regulations which he announced today been in the offices.

My last point is a sensitive matter relating specifically to Francophone immigration. I feel the minister has merely touched this sensitive area, and I should like him to explain in much greater detail whether or not the ten points will be deducted if Francophone immigration is encouraged. Will the ten points be deducted if no jobs are available?

The statement points out that changes in the 1952 and subsequent regulations are necessary. I hope the minister will take to heart that what is needed is a comprehensive program and not simply the amendment of regulations from time to time in respect of a problem which already exists.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, there are some things in the statement of the minister with which we wholeheartedly agree and which we welcome. The first is that family reunification, as a basis for immigration policy, remains the same as before. This is as it should be. We also welcome the fact that the new regulations will not have a negative impact with regard to Canada's concern for refugees, the persecuted and the displaced. However, we believe that instead of the problems of refugees being dealt with on an ad hoc basis as each emergency arises, regulations or legislation should be prepared specifically setting out conditions on which refugees may be admitted to Canada.

We, of course, agree with the minister that immigration must depend upon opportunities for employment, housing and social services in Canada. But it is because of the failure of the government to provide adequate and full employment policies and the failure of the government's economic policies that we are now having to consider the restriction of the flow of immigrants into Canada.

No one will deny that the immigrants coming into Canada have been responsible for the growth of this country, for the variety of cultures that have enriched Canada and which have conferred many benefits on Canada. But we must seek an expanding economy in which the great resources of Canada can be used to accommodate an increased flow of immigrants, and in which restrictive measures can be removed.

● (1430)

We find it rather odd to learn that the government is making such a fanfare about these new immigration regulations. The fact of the matter is that on February 21, 1974, by P.C.318 of 1974, regulations were made which restricted immigration of independent applicants and of nominated relatives to those who had arranged definite employment in Canada with reasonable prospects of continuity in meeting local conditions of work and wages or where there was occupational demand. The new regulations do not seem so very different. The mountains have laboured and have produced a mouse.

Of course, we welcome the minister's assurance that universality and nondiscrimination is a basic principle of our present immigration policy. We trust that under no circumstances will any Canadian government be tempted to depart from this policy. Indeed, we would like to see it applied more realistically by making the immigration facilities available on a more even basis throughout the world.

Lastly, we note that the government is working hard on a green paper on immigration but that we need not expect the immigration legislation until 1975. We wonder if even that is a serious deadline. There have been no substantial amendments to the Immigration Act since it was passed some time in the 1940's. In 1966, the government published a white paper which proposed numerous changes in obsolete sections of the Immigration Act. The minister then was the present Minister of Transport. This was supposed to be the prelude to early legislative action. It is now six years later and it looks as though we shall not get any amendments to the Immigration Act until approximately ten years after this official document setting out policy was produced.

However, perhaps it would be less than generous not to admit that if the present minister, unlike most of his predecessors, stays on the job and lives up to the promises made, we may at last have a new and more up to date Immigration Act, if not in 1975, perhaps in 1977.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the statement of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) and I noted that it contained some good points. Among other things, the reunion of families remains one of the basic principles of the Canadian immigration policy. We agree completely on this point. We understand that there can be special circumstances, and on the basis mostly of humanitarian principles, we want to help people in difficult situations.

The minister also said that immigrants have opened this country and pushed the frontiers back. We also agree about this, since reports on immigration at various periods show that less than 350 years ago, the first European settler, Louis Hébert, arrived at the Quebec City trading post. He was later followed by immigrants of various nationalities. However, we should control closely the arrival in Canada, under favorable circumstances, of selected immigrants. There are standards to be met if we do not want to get undesirables.

Advertising must also be controlled closely and overly attractive propaganda which often prepares the immigrant to more hardships than success must be curtailed if necessary. Seeing publicity pamphlets showing Canada as an overly promising country, foreigners often decide to immigrate to Canada and find themselves unemployed a few months later. This is unfair both to the unemployed Canadians and to the immigrants who cannot find employment. All appropriate efforts should be made in order to establish the necessary contacts between employers and employees, to ensure that our available manpower can find desirable jobs, before thinking of expanding various immigration programs.

I know it is not always easy to find the right solution to the many problems in the field of manpower, but it should be much easier to come to an agreement with our own citizens by allowing our young people to get some experience, even in temporary jobs, despite the fact that employers require, and rightly so, experienced people in the jobs they have to offer.

Accordingly, if we counsel our young people and all those who want to work in Canada, we would accommodate the employers; I feel that we should limit immigration at least until such time as the unemployment situation has stabilized in Canada.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD CONCERNING GROUND BEEF—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. A study conducted by the University of Guelph, the results of which were released by the CBC last Sunday, showed that of 108 samples of ground-beef taken from 28 supermarkets representing the major chains, 46 per cent contained staphylococci bacteria that are dangerous and capable of causing food poisoning. Therefore I should like to move:

That the government give immediate consideration to implementing the recommendations contained in the Food Prices Review Board report on ground-beef released on June 6th, 1974.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion being proposed persuant to Standing Order 43. It requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent that it be debated?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There being no unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

ENERGY

MAINTENANCE OF DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME TO CONSERVE ENERGY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of extremely urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that daylight saving time makes it possible to conserve energy to an appreciable degree, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the government immediately enter into consultations with the provinces for the purpose of enforcing daylight saving time throughout the year.

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

IMMIGRATION

ESTIMATED NUMBER OF IMMIGRANTS BEFORE AND AFTER CHANGES IN REGULATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising out of the statement he made to the House in which he indicated that the purpose of the change in the regulations was not to reduce the amount of immigration but to slow down the rate of growth. I therefore assume that the statement is based upon certain estimates as to what the rate of immigration would be in the future. Can the minister indicate what the estimated number of immigrants to Canada would be in the year 1975 if these regulations had not been changed?

● (1440)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, based on the trends which we have been observing and extended, we estimate that the number of landed immigrants, in the absence of these regulations, in 1975 would be as high as between 250,000 and 260,000.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister estimate the extent to which the number of landed immigrants will be reduced as a result of these changes in the regulations?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, without wanting to sound evasive I can only give the Leader of the Opposition some indication based on the simulation applied to the pattern of applications we had in 1973 and 1974. We would think that the figure would not be more than 200,000, as opposed to the potential 250,000 or 260,000 which we otherwise forecast. I must, however, again indicate that changing the nature of applications from any given country in the nominated or independent categories in adjustment to the new regulations would vary the number somewhat.

FORECAST RATE OF UNEMPLOYMENT ON WHICH CHANGES IN REGULATIONS BASED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): One further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I recognize that the minister can only make an estimate based upon many variables. One factor influencing the minister to make these changes must have been the estimated rate of unemployment in Canada for 1975. I ask the minister to make a forecast himself. On what rate of unemployment as forecast did the minister base his position?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition would be very, very surprised if I fell for that suggestion!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: I take that back. I would not be surprised at anything the Leader of the Opposition did.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Andras: I can only say in all honesty—

Mr. Fairweather: The minister is not being honest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition has asked a question and the minister should be allowed to answer.

Mr. Hees: Forget the honesty; answer the question.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to offend my hon. friend from Prince Edward-Hastings by referring to such a thing as honesty. The fact of the matter is that in this country, with its favourable economic situation compared with that of other countries in the world, we are attracting immigrants and we would be unrealistic not to sense that there are difficulties ahead in the international economic situation, which we all face. The rate of unemployment has increased during the last two or three months. We forecast the possibility of having to attend to this over the winter months, as will every other country in the world, in Europe and elsewhere, is facing these problems.

EFFECT OF SPONSORED IMMIGRANTS ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In his statement the minister indicated that the new regulations do not apply to sponsored immigrants. Can the minister clarify whether, if such sponsored immigrants go to areas of high unemployment, what job instructions, training or information will be given to them, so that they may go to areas where there are some job vacancies and yet not violate the re-unification of families principle.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, sponsored immigrants are very close relatives, fathers, mothers, dependant children, and so on. The hon. member can get a list. It is our experience based on a very thorough analysis that that closeness of relationship means that they do go to the family. They are not like those in other categories whose entry is based more on job availability or attachment to the labour force. That is fundamental if we are to maintain the principle of recognizing that these kinds of immigrants, that is, sponsored relatives, do not, by the same token, cause us difficulty with unemployment.

HONG KONG OFFICE—REQUEST FOR MORE RAPID PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of statements that it takes two or three years for an application to be processed in the Hong Kong office for Chinese immigrants, will steps be taken by the minister and his officials to speed up the processing of applications in that country?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we did, in recognition of the growing number of applications and landings, institute two or three months ago administratively, a system of priorities to try and even out the work flow throughout our 58 offices abroad. I just had occasion to ask for a report on the exact number of days that sort of thing is taking with regard to applications from that part of the country. We are doing our best to even out the flow. Hong Kong at the moment has a heavy backload and I think it has taken about three months to deal with the priority sponsored applications. The next priorities are both independent and nominated immigrants who are job-ready, and so on. But we are limited in our resources. We are limited in our ability to move people around the world quickly, because the situation changes over a period of months.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMPARISON OF SALARIES OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MEMBERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Témiscamingue a supplementary?

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it is not a supplementary but a new question that I want to ask the President of the Privy Council.

Is a study being made on the salaries paid to provincial members, particularly in Quebec, in order to establish a comparison with those paid to federal members? If so, what does the government intend to do in that respect?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I understand that members of parliament in their capacity as private members are studying these comparisons. The government in due course will be looking at the results of their studies.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Everybody is asking for the alignment of income and wages on the rise in the cost of living, even federal public servants earning $45,000 or $50,000 a year. Now, all hon. members agree on this subject, but not all of them have the courage of saying so since the cost of living is increasing as much for hon. members as for others. I would ask the President of the Privy Council if he intends to make a decision or to take action of some kind in order to treat the federal hon. members just like all other Canadian citizens?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to try to persuade the government to bring forward some proposals about members' salaries. I hope we will have non-partisan support on this issue, which I think is very important, and that members of the House will not try to play politics with what I believe is a very important question.

STORMS

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR AID FROM PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. I revert to the question raised yesterday concerning serious storm damage in Prince Edward Island. I see the minister from that province is now back. In that province many power lines are still down and crop damage is most severe. Can the Acting Prime Minister advise what is being done in this critical situation; specifically, what request or requests for assistance have come from the government of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the emergency organization within the federal service has given me a report on the damage that has occurred. I am happy to say that it is their impression that at least the emergency is over. The cost is now being counted. As I indicated yesterday in the House and am happy to confirm again today, the federal government stands by its offer to help if the costs will be more than would ordinarily be paid by the province or the municipalities.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—FEDERAL MEASURES TO ASSIST NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister can indicate if he has communicated with the government of Nova Scotia about the situation in that province and received any report of the estimate of damage that has occurred. I have had a report from my constituency that on the Parrsboro shore the electricity is still out and there is every indication it will be out at least for another week. People are suffering a great deal of hardship as a result of the damage in that area.

● (1450)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the federal militia has been co-operating with the government of Nova Scotia. In Sydney, Glace

Bay and New Waterford, for example, the militia was sworn in to do civilian duties because of the blackout. We have been co-operating in every way we can and helping in the emergency. We have not had any request from the government of Nova Scotia for financial assistance but we probably will.

SPORTS

VOLLEYBALL—ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST OF EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF CANADIAN VOLLEYBALL ASSOCIATION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the executive director of the Canadian Volleyball Association, whose title falls under the minister's department, operates a private importing business called Sports Quip out of his federal office in the Sports Canada building in Vanier, and because his Japanese product will probably be the official volleyball of the 1976 Olympics as well as the Canadian Volleyball Association, thus greatly damaging the over-all Canadian sports goods industry, can the minister assure this House that immediate steps will be taken to overcome this obvious conflict of interest?

Mr. Paproski: Hanky panky!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the Canadian Volleyball Association is a voluntary organization and its employees are not public servants. I am glad that the hon. member has raised this question, however, and I am sure that particular association will look into this matter. I will draw the hon. member's representation to its attention. I only hope it does not compete too much with the hon. member's own business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, a point of order on the reference by the minister that I am involved in the sporting goods business. I should like to assure him and all hon. members that I took all necessary steps to sell all my shares in the sporting goods industry prior to running for federal office in 1972.

Some hon. Members: Hear!

Mr. Jelinek: While I am on my fee, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hastings.

Oral Questions

PUBLIC WORKS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Public Works with regard to a report that has not been tabled in this House. The annual report for the Department of Public Works for last year has been floating around so long it has his predecessor's name on it. Since the report differs from the regular estimates by over one quarter of a billion dollars, would the minister like to have the committee open the discussion for one more meeting since he did not feel it worth while to attend the last meeting?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would check with the table I think he would find that the report has been tabled.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River, who raised a question of privilege yesterday, apparently misunderstood or was ill-advised that the report would not be ready for a week. This information was incorrect and I regret the inconvenience it caused him.

HOUSING

PROMISE OF $500 TO BUYERS OF NEW HOMES—REASON FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. R. E. McKinely (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. How soon can we expect the promise of the $500 grant to first home buyers to come about and will it apply to mobile homes in certain categories? We were assured as late as mid-September that the minister wanted to have this election promise initiated as soon as possible, so why is the legislation not on the order paper?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is something the government is examining regularly. I indicated in my address in the Throne Speech debate that a decision will be made as soon as resources permit. In so far as mobile homes are concerned I am looking into this because I am very interested in the use of mobile homes or manufactured homes to supplement housing stock.

Mr. McKinley: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister said a few days ago that the government had some four years to bring this promise about, is the legislation being delayed by the minister on the instruction of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker, I have had no instructions from the Prime Minister at all. I am just using my own good judgment.

Oral Questions

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED ILLEGAL HUNTING ACTIVITIES BY GAME SUPERINTENDENT OF NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the National Indian Brotherhood of Canada, the Metis Association of the Northwest Territories, the Native Council of Canada, the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada and myself have called for a public investigation into the alleged misuse of public funds and illegal game hunts conducted by the game superintendent and approved by the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories, will the Minister indicate when such an inquiry may be expected to being and if no such inquiry is contemplated, why not?

An hon. Member: Right on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this problem is basically one to be resolved within the territorial council. It is my understanding that as a result of the inquiry which was conducted there have been some changes in personnel. All of the groups to which the hon. member referred have had consultations with the commissioner and I understand it has been agreed to establish an advisory group to advise the commission on matters pertaining to game. I believe this is acceptable to all the groups concerned and each would have a representative on it. In addition, they will be represented on the selection board which is to name a successor to the game superintendent in the Northwest Territories.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Firth: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I acknowledge that this small council is being set up but that does not excuse the government from having a public inquiry into this matter and that is the basis of my question. I should like the minister to indicate to the House if there will be a public investigation and if not, why not?

Mr. Buchanan: No, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to ask for an inquiry. I think, everything being equal, there is a strong push for a greater degree of autonomy in the Northwest Territories and I think they should resolve these internal problems themselves.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. To give such power to an appointed civil servant, namely the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories who does not have to answer to the people of the Northwest Territories or to the minister responsible does not provide anything closely resembling autonomy.

[Mr. Danson.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

ISOLATION PAY FOR NORTHERN OFFICIALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

Since more than 800 federal employees in the North are now receiving up to $360 a month in isolation pay, would the minister tell the House if this bonus will be maintained? If not, why should it be dropped, and how is the phasing out or other termination to be carried out?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there is no question at this time of dropping the isolation pay to employees working in truly remote areas of the North. Although we do review cases from time to time, insofar as certain villages are becoming less remote and others increasingly so, policy remains unchanged.

ENERGY

ALLEGED REDUCED RATE OF EXPLORATION FOR OIL AND GAS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As more than 50 oil and gas drilling rigs have left Canada so far this year for other fields, and as this has resulted in a reduction of 23 per cent in the rate of exploration for oil and gas in this country, would the minister advise the House what plans the government has made to restore the exploration rate for oil and gas to at least last year's rate?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): One of the reasons given by the industry for drilling in the United States is the higher price which can be gained in the United States for new oil. The position taken by this government is that there should be a single price for Canadians maintained well below not only the international price but also well below the price at which oil is obtainable in the United States. This means we do not believe Canadian consumers should foot the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Are we to take it, then, that the government is satisfied about the decrease in the rate of exploration for oil and gas and intends to do nothing whatsoever about it?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We know there is a high rate of exploration planned for this winter, particularly in the frontier areas where there are the best prospects for discovering future supplies of Canadian oil and gas.

Mr. Hees: That is not the way the oil industry tells it.

FINANCE

MAINTENANCE OF PROPOSED TAX ON OIL ROYALTIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it was his budget that caused the trouble. Now that he has just returned from a discussion with the provincial premiers, has he reached the conclusion that for the federal government to tax on its royalties and provincial royalties on top of all the other money made out of petroleum and natural gas is wrongful and lacking in equity, and does he intend to correct this situation in his new budget, or even prior to the budget? I asked this question yesterday in the course of a speech I made, but the hon. gentleman's colleagues did not know the answer.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I do not accept the preamble to the hon. gentleman's question. For a full answer he must await budget night.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SPECULATION IN FOOD PRODUCTS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the consequences to consumers of speculation in food commodities, would the minister say whether he is planning a full-scale investigation of the alarming increase in food speculation?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that the question asked by the hon. member represents the feelings not only of the hon. members but also of the Canadian public. That is why the government has introduced in the Speech from the Throne a series of measures designed to fight inflation in all areas, including foodstuffs.

[English]

SPECULATION IN FOOD PRODUCTS—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF POWERS OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Can the minister tell us whether any specific action is being taken such as the extension of the powers of the Food Prices Review Board to enable it to conduct an investigative inquiry directed particularly to food speculation?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this task can very well be undertaken by the Food Prices Review Board, under its present terms of reference. I am sure the hon. member's question will be printed in Hansard and that the Board Members will take due note of it. On the other hand, I intend to introduce later today the competition bill which will be one way of fighting abuses, and later again, a bill on profiteering.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF MINISTER

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the 29th parliament several items appeared suggesting that the activities and responsibilities of the Minister of State for Science and Technology were to be enhanced. Since these reforms were not implemented and since the latest Speech from the Throne did not renew all of these commitments, are we to understand that the rule of this ministry is being down-graded?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

Mr. Andre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I asked a question related to status of the Minister of State for Science and Technology. The subject appeared to me to be important but apparently the minister did not hear me. I think it is important I should get an answer.

FOREST INDUSTRY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID LAYOFFS IN MILLS AND LOGGING CAMPS

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the hon. gentleman prepared any reply to the message received from the president of the I.W.A. in British Columbia outlining the state of the forest industry in that province, describing the condition of that industry as desperate and asserting that only quick action by the federal government could head off further heavy layoffs in the mills and logging camps?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I thank the hon. gentleman for outlining to me the contents of the letter. I shall see whether there is a reply on my desk for signature.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOVIET UNION—FREE EMIGRATION OF JEWS AS FACTOR IN TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In Canadian negotiations with the Soviet Union, particularly with respect to trade, is Canada putting on the table the question of the free emigration from Russia of people who belong to the Jewish faith?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On the question of the movement of people and the re-unification of families, the hon. member may recall that in my speech in the House last week I referred to the conversation I had with the Soviet foreign minister in which he referred to the improvement which had taken place in the movement of people from the Soviet Union to Canada, especially since the conversations held between the Prime Minister of Canada and Premier Kosygin. He also took a very positive attitude as to what would probably take place in the future. However, there has been no linkage, to my knowledge, between the question of trade and the movement of people.

Mr. Gillies: The government having announced it intends to take a moral stance in connection with the development of its foreign policy, would the minister not agree that this is one of the most important moral questions in the world today?

Mr. MacEachen: To my knowledge, no such announcement has been made, since it would have been unnecessary.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF TAX PRIVILEGES FOR "TIME"—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Is the hon. gentleman currently studying the question of tax privileges for Time Magazine under Section 19 of the Income Tax Act and can the House expect an announcement in this regard in the relatively near future?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): This is one of the subjects which is being discussed.

Mr. Grafftey: Has it been brought to the attention of the minister that if these privileges for Time were ended sufficient advertising dollars would be available to enable a Canadian magazine to go on the market immediately on a weekly basis? Has the hon. gentleman been in touch with the Secretary of State with regard to studying the question of tax privileges for Time magazine?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have been in touch with the Secretary of State.

BEEF CATTLE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO ALL ASPECTS OF INDUSTRY—AID FOR COW-CALF OPERATORS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that cattle prices for the producer have fallen to about half what they were one year ago despite continuing high retailer prices causing confusion in the cattle industry and decisions by many producers to liquidate their herds, will the minister undertake to hold an immediate federal inquiry into all facets of the beef industry? If so, when, and what will be the terms of reference?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am sure the hon. member would not wish to leave the impression that prices are about half what they were a year ago. That is not the case. Prices for top grades in Toronto yesterday were high at 51 cents, which is comparable to what the price was a year ago. I am sure the hon. member means that some grades of cattle are selling for half what they sold for a year ago. We are still considering what kind of inquiry, if any, should be held.

• (1510)

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When will the government make a decision as to whether or not there will be an inquiry? Also, keeping in mind the Prime Minister's words of a few days ago, would the minister say whether or not he is now in a position to give some aid and assistance, at least in the short term, to cow-calf operators?

Mr. Whelan: As I said before, Mr. Speaker, we are still receiving many suggestions, and perhaps the hon. member has some suggestion as to what form this aid should take. Four provinces have given aid; two of these provinces have given similar aid and the other two dissimilar aid. Some cow-calf operators now tell us that this will not aid them at all, so we are trying to develop a program that will aid the cow-calf operators.

Mr. Nystrom: When?

Mr. Whelan: Soon.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF BANKS REDUCING INTEREST RATES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that as an important step to slow down or check inflation in the United States the American government has deemed it necessary to ask American banks to bring down their interest rates for medium and long term loans, can the hon. minister tell us if his department or the Canadian government are thinking of doing the same thing and when will such an announcement be made?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if we look at last year's experience, Canada's monetary policy was not as tight as that of the United States.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell us if he or his department feel that the terrible rise of interest rates on long term loans is an important factor in creating inflation today?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, maybe it is in fact a result of inflation.

IMMIGRATION

NATURE OF MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE FRANCOPHONE IMMIGRANTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who indicated that measures would be adopted to encourage Francophone immigrants. Would the minister be more precise as to the nature of this program? Is it simply a statement with nothing behind it, is it a statement of intention to promote through public relations the immigration to Canada of Francophones, or are special inducements to be granted?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the regulations I announced today and those that have existed in the past will apply to immigrants universally, including people from Francophone countries. However, we are heavily engaged in consultation in a co-operative spirit with the government of the province of Quebec in full recognition that it is desirable for Canada to maintain a larger number of Francophone immigrants to this country. We are seeking accelerated and increased emphasis on opening offices abroad in Francophone countries, on recruitment and that sort of thing.

Let me hasten to say that in the name of universality and non-discrimination the measures I announced today will apply equally around the world.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BASIS ON WHICH FORCES PARTICIPATE IN SEARCHES FOR LOST PERSONS—FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR COST OF SEARCH

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence to whom I gave notice yesterday. My question arises out of the unfortunate circumstance that two of my constituents have become lost while hunting in wilderness areas of northern Ontario. May I ask the minister whether a request to his department in the case of lost hunters, fishermen or hikers from an authority, be it provincial, municipal or possibly from members of the family, is necessary before his department will participate in search operations; and is the requesting authority responsible for the financial burden incurred by the department in carrying out the operation? Perhaps the minister might also indicate whether his department in such cases ever initiates search operations without a request from some other authority.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in the case of missing persons we do require a request from the provincial police of the RCMP. This is distinct from our search and rescue operations in which we can initiate a search ourselves or at the request of transport. In the case of missing persons we do not charge the authority that makes the request; we carry that expense in national defence.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ESCAPE OF TANKER FROM COME-BY-CHANCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—POSSIBILITY OF PROTEST TO BRITISH GOVERNMENT

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. it concerns the escape from custody of a 260,000 ton supertanker several hundred feet long, which escaped out of Come-By-Chance two days ago at three miles an hour, with the RCMP in pursuit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Carter: Would the minister tell the House whether he is making a protest to the British government respecting this incident, since this ship in its action did violate certain Canadian laws?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no such protest or representation has been made, but I will consider the hon. member's question, particularly the latter part of it which alleges a breach of the Canadian law.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Solicitor General rising on a point of order?

Mr. Allmand: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I was asked a question by one hon. member regarding this incident, and on investigation I find that the RCMP were not even advised of this incident until the ship was 30 miles out to sea.

Noting that the last date for applications under the highly successful capital winter works program has now passed, can the Minister of Finance indicate whether this three-year program is to be extended, or whether another similar program is under consideration?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there will be no extension of the dates under the current program. As for the latter part of the question, this is something that the government will want to consider very seriously.

five years due, as one director stated, to too much government money, what steps will the government be taking to recover the $48 million made available to this company in the form of grants and interest free loans in the short period that it was in business?

STORMS

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—LIAISON WITH EMERGENCY PLANNING PERSONNEL ON MEASURES TO ASSIST IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from the disastrous storm which struck the maritimes over the week end, with particular reference to Cape Breton where there has been loss of life, numbers of homeless and millions of dollars worth of damage. My question is to the Minister of Finance in view of his parliamentary secretary's interest; apparently he seemed to be the one who had all the information. Has the national emergency planning establishment which was referred to by his parliamentary secretary been keeping the government informed, as was promised, on an hour to hour basis; what liaison exists at the moment between this planning establishment and the government of Nova Scotia, so that assistance can be rendered as expeditiously as possible; and are any members of the establishment in the area on site to hurry things up a bit, in co-operation, of course, with the province?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. gentleman for the compliment that he paid to my parliamentary secretary, which is well deserved. As for the emergency establishment that has been made available in response to this serious situation, the Acting Prime Minister has already described it. I might say that with regard to the financial repercussions—that is to say, the compensation to be paid—any eventual federal participation will depend on the formula we have established across the country. However, I was in touch with, and talking to, Peter Nicholson, the minister of finance for Nova Scotia, this morning.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR FUNDS FOR LOW RENTAL HOUSING

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for housing. It relates to a release of his last night or this morning and to the fact that the response to the limited dividend rental housing program has been incredible. In view of the fact that the housing situation for low income people is also incredible, would he indicate to the House what action he is taking to provide more funds for low rental housing, in view of the suffering of many low income people who cannot find a roof to put over their heads?

● (1520)

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall using the word "incredible", but I think it is remarkable, particularly in view of the indication by some that this plan was not acceptable, that we are more than using up the allocated budget. Surely this gives us a better indication, and I am sure this will carry into the next building season. I am sure this will also be the case in respect of starts into next year. The $50 million allocation was used up in less than a three month period. This will get started again in the next building season. This all gives us a better indication of how this combined AHOP, and the modification of this program, is giving far more effect to the taxpayers' dollars in respect of the low cost housing which my hon. friend and I wish to see.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the fact that this fund is being used up so quickly, is there any hope of getting additional funds this year to assist in this great effort being made to provide this housing?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I think for this current building season there would not be much use for additional funds as starts could not begin on time. There is certainly great hope for the coming season, when I think we will be able to alleviate the shortfall situation, particularly in respect to rental housing starts.

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON SECURITY OF PIPELINES—POSSIBILITY OF CONSTRUCTING PIPELINE THROUGH NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning negotiations with the United States in respect of pipeline security. Are these negotiations being limited to pipelines traversing Canadian territory, or are the Americans raising the issue of security of supply for pipelines going across U.S. territory of which Canadians have control?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this does not so much involve security of supply as it does the concept set out by the Prime Minister in this House in December 1973, that this should be a mutually reciprocal treaty covering both United States pipelines crossing Canadian territory and Canadian pipelines crossing U.S. territory, as now exist or may exist in the future.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Canadian bargaining position is seriously weakened because we are dependent on pipelines crossing U.S. territory is the government excluding that as part of the terms of reference for bargaining from an American point of view, or is it seriously considering building that all-Canadian pipeline through northern Ontario?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it seems to us at this stage that securing the existing routes is the ultimate objective, and this is what we will be seeking.

IMMIGRATION

HONG KONG OFFICE—REQUEST FOR MORE RAPID PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to the statement on motions today by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that department officials in Hong Kong are sending out letters to nominated relatives to the effect that it will be 12 months before an appointment can be arranged even to see them in our offices, is some consideration being given to expanding our facilities and hiring more immigration officers?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hong Kong office with eight immigration personnel is our second largest next to the London office. In response to a question earlier I indicated that we were trying to establish a special arrangement so that personnel can be transferred from one place to another when necessary. However, there are over-all restraints on the number of people we can have on staff, or on the number of people that we can add to the staff.

CRASH OF HELICOPTER—PREFLIGHT INSPECTIONS AND SAFETY PRECAUTIONS—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Elmer M. Would he also, hopefully, assure us that whatever inquiries he is contemplating will be open so as not to result in the department investigating itself, as was the case in respect of the DOT investigation at Frobisher Bay?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, of course I share hon. members' regret regarding this tragic accident. There is a full investigation taking place, not only of the circumstances surrounding the crash, but also other matters to which the hon. member has referred, including the extent of training and familiarization of our crew. As soon as that report is received I will be in a position to comment more fully upon it.

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CHILEAN REFUGEES ADMITTED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question pertains to the refugee section of the announcement today by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that a delegation representing boards of education, labour and the churches came to Parliament Hill about two weeks ago presenting the minister with a brief asking for the admission of 10,000 Chileans in the refugee category over the next year, will the minister now state whether there will be an increase in Chilean refugee admission to this country?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, I think about a week or two ago, in response to that delegation, I had no opportunity to study their brief in advance of meeting with them, and would like a reasonable time to examine the brief. As the hon. member will know, I just returned from abroad the other day and I have not had time to make a full investigation. When I have I will make whatever announcement is necessary.

EFFECT OF CHANGE IN REGULATIONS ON ADMISSION OF PERSONS FROM COMMUNIST CHINA

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. I am just wondering what effect his statement today will have on the 9,000 Chinese from communist China the Prime Minister has announced will be coming to Canada, as well as the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services is bringing 20,000 South Koreans to work in the Athabasca tar sands?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the very highly applauded action of the Prime Minister in arranging with the Chinese government for the reunification of families pertains strictly to sponsored relatives and, therefore, obviously nothing I have said, or any change to be made in the regulations, will affect that.

GRAIN

EQUALIZATION OF FREIGHT RATES ON GRAIN AND MEAT—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, sometime ago the minister in charge of the Wheat Board assured the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Alberta that a freight rate equalization program would be instituted during 1974 which would have the effect of reducing freight rates on dressed meat shipped from western Canada to central Canada. Will the minister now indicate to the House when such a freight rate program will be instituted?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there was no indication of any specific date during the discussions we had in regard to the equalization of freight rates.

Mr. Mazankowski: You said 1974.

Mr. Stanfield: That's for the pigs.

Mr. Lang: We did, as part of the over-all feed grain policy program, indicate our view that it would be appropriate to bring rates on grain and meat into equitable accordance. Our discussions on feed grains tended to be more hectic in other areas of the program than that particular one. As a result we felt that further discussion should take place on the way in which that equity should be brought about. Those discussions are now going on. It is still the intent of this government to move, in due course, toward bringing these freight rates into line.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, having regard to the fact that the minister committed the government to the institution of this program during the year 1974, will he advise the House if this equalization program will be put into effect before the end of this year?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it, since I have told hon. members straightforwardly the situation, if he would take my word for the fact that no commitment was made in respect of this program for the year 1974.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I call orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: There is no question of getting the consent of the House whenever something like that arises; I would rather give the hon. member who raised the question the opportunity to ask some supplementaries. For the moment, he may be—

STATUS OF WOMEN

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S YEAR—REASON FOR CHANGE IN PROGRAM DIRECTOR

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the telegram referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal deplored recent measures which might deprive the women's program of the Secretary of State of its present leadership on the event of the international women's year. In fact, the women's program has just been greatly expanded. The man-years increased three times and the funds increased six times.

Mr. Stanfield: Man-years?

Mr. Blouin: Yes, although this is the year of the women. This expansion required the creation of a new position at a more senior level for the head of the program. Consequently, a competition had to be held by the Public Service Commission. This competition has just been completed and the regular appeal period is now in effect.

When the appeal procedures are completed, a full-time appointment will be made to take effect immediately. The department intends to retain the competence, knowledge and experience of the officers who have been mainly responsible for the development of the program. It is determined to ensure the successful implementation of its part in the international women's year program and of its ongoing commitments to the women of Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER RECOMMENDATIONS IN FINKELMAN REPORT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to consider and make recommendations upon parts I, II and III of the paper entitled "Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service of Canada", prepared by the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board;

That 14 members of the House of Commons to be designated by the House at a later date be the members on the part of this House of the special joint committee;

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; and to delegate to subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed special joint committee.

He said: On April 17 last year my predecessor, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), made a statement to the House in which he indicated that the government had asked Jacob Finkelman, Q.C., chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, to examine the Public Service Staff Relations Act and make such suggestions for amendments or revisions as might be necessary "to adequately meet the needs of the employer and the employees in the public service and the employee organizations that represent them, and to serve the public interest".

Mr. Finkelman completed his review of the act in March of this year and part I of his report was tabled in the House at that time. Parts II and III were tabled in April and May. It was the intention of the government to constitute a special parliamentary committee before the summer recess, but the election made it impossible to give effect to this intention until now.

The committee will have authority to deal with the recommendations of the Finkelman report as they may affect the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Financial Administration Act and the Public Service Employment Act. It may, of course, consider other recommendations affecting the Public Service Employment Act, whether or not such recommendations were directly related to Mr. Finkelman's recommendations.

With respect to the Public Service Superannuation Act, modifications in this act to deal with various problems are now under study by the government and in due time a bill will be presented to the House. If the joint committee is still sitting when this bill is ready, it may be desirable to extend the committee's mandate to study that bill and report on it before it is finally considered by the House. It is the government's intention to introduce bills to amend the other statutes, in this session, as soon as possible after the committee has presented its report.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to say to the minister that the matter he has just raised in the House concerning this joint committee is most welcome. I was also pleased to hear his statement concerning the Public Service Superannuation Act and the fact that the committee may also have an opportunity to study that legislation. I think such a study, and indeed a study of the whole position of the public service vis-à-vis bargaining, is long overdue. I fully realize that an election intervened, but the minister may recall that from time to time during the twenty-ninth parliament I raised the question of when these matters would be brought forward for consideration.

At the outset I wish to pay tribute to the chairman, Mr. Finkelman, who in his own right is a very distinguished public servant. I would not want any remarks I make with regard to this matter in any way to indicate that I have anything other than the highest regard for his services to Canada and to the public generally. He was given a large mandate by the government of Canada, namely, to examine the Public Service Staff Relations Act and its administration and to make recommendations on how it could be amended or revised in order adequately to meet the needs of employers and employees in the public service and the employee organizations. Then last, but certainly not least in importance, Mr. Finkelman's recommendations were to deal with how the public service could best serve the interests of the public at large.

Many public servants have felt for some time that the system is not operating as it should and that it can, and should, operate much better. Many public servants have spoken to me and other members of parliament about the greatest difficulty which seems to confront them, that is, the fact that either directly or indirectly many of them suffer from the impersonality of the operation. I suppose that is a disease that results from bigness. There is lack of positive connection between the work that people do and the result of that work, in action or policy, and if anything that is an irritant to the disease.

Public servants say in their own way that the impersonal, bureaucratic operation denies them the ultimate human satisfaction from work—the feeling of participation, of fulfilment, and in some cases of a sense of importance and the completeness of their task. I realize that these are matters which cannot be legislated but they can be affected by conditions of work and particularly by the relationship between employers and employees. If this is the case, I believe it will be the task of the committee to look at the public service, not just from the point of view of the government and of the public—though they are important—also from the point of view of the public servant himself, or herself. If this important aspect is not forgotten, then I believe the public interest will in fact be served by the committee's investigation and the matters which will flow from it.

I respectfully suggest it is also important that we do not approach this study with any preconceived notions based on any outdated concept rooted in antiquity but, rather, with an openness of mind, bearing in mind that the whole question of employer-employee relations is a dynamic thing that is changing more rapidly, day by day, than ever before.

There are needs to be fulfilled on each side of the bargaining table, and there is a public interest that may not necessarily be embodied completely in the interests of either side. The importance of the maintenance of a public service with a sense of dedication and purpose is increasing, particularly in view of the continued and growing incidence of intervention of government into the lives of people. The federal public service is in many ways a model for the public services of other jurisdictions inside and outside this country, as are its individual members, and the contribution of the public service itself in many fields of endeavour is important to this country and all its people. There are many in the public service who have resolved to serve for less remuneration than they could have obtained elsewhere, because they believe that their work is important.

It is not possible, nor is it proper, for me at this point to review each of the 231 recommendations of the Finkelman report. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it relieves you considerably to hear me say that. But I think it is essential that the general approach of the parties to be represented on the committee should be laid out before the House before consideration of the report by the committee. I regret very much that the government did not see fit to do that in the statement made by the House leader today.

In general terms, with some notable and unfortunate exceptions, progress to date under the existing collective bargaining procedures has been good. Subject to those exceptions, there have been improvements in the number of agreements being reached and in the period of time that elapses between the beginning of negotiations and the reaching of the agreement. At first there was hesitancy in government generally to expand bargaining rights and whatever expansions there were some six years ago were somewhat limited because, I suppose, of novelty, apprehension, or perhaps a bit of both. I think it is fair to say—with all the wisdom of hindsight, I must admit—that the government could have gone much further than it did a few years ago.

We believe that the experience gained to date by both Treasury Board and the staff associations more than justifies the claim that the time has come to take a hard look at the exclusions contained in the present act, the area of job security, standards of classification, check-off, grievance procedures, transfers, retirement, leave, and a host of other areas. These should be reviewed and serious consideration given to lifting the exclusions. I mean no disrespect to Mr. Finkelman when I suggest that perhaps his approach to these matters is somewhat conservative, with a small "c". Normally I do not mean a small "c" when I use that word. Perhaps it is the way in which a person in his position should approach the matter, but conservative it is and it is the duty of the committee to listen to both sides, and also to Mr. Finkelman, to plumb their points of view and to make recommendations to this House.

If I may comment on the report itself, it seems to presume that there is some immaturity which we, for our part, do not believe exists. We believe there is an understanding respecting the responsibility of Treasury Board, on one hand, and staff associations on the other, that neither will act by their nature outside the public interest, that each will try to do what is right, and that the ability to collectively bargain, negotiate and arbitrate should be set over the widest range of subject matter. If that happens, the attitude of confidence and trust of the employees in the system will be fostered and strengthened, and the collective bargaining procedures will be strengthened as well by an open approach. We believe that this strengthening is important to what I might call industrial peace or peace between employers and employees in the public service.

There is another fundamental area to which I should like to turn at this time; that is, the vexing and difficult problem of persons employed in managerial or confidential capacities and the exclusion of many of these people from the bargaining unit. As Mr. Finkelman himself said at page 29 of volume I of the report, the problem is in drawing the line and it is a very difficult problem indeed. We will have to examine the report in detail, as well as the present law, but it seems to me—and I respectfully submit this to the House—that the committee should approach the question from the point of view that the benefits and burdens of participation in the collective bargaining process should be available to as broad a range of public servants as possible.

Moreover, it should be approached from the point of view that the public servant can, in fact, separate his personal interest from his responsibilities to the employer, rather than from the point of view that he cannot do so. As well, there should be trusted machinery to make the determination when this is necessary. It is from that point of view—what I would call a positive point of view—that I said a careful examination of the definitions proposed on pages 39, 40 and 41 of volume I should be undertaken.

The last point with which I wish to deal is the resolution of public interest disputes and the right to strike. I commend to all members the text on pages 121 to 125 where this right is examined and the difficulty of removing it is set forth in simple and direct terms. It is stated in the report that the best way of resolving an impasse is to prevent it from arising. But this sage saying, coupled with the words of Mr. Finkelman, does not allow a government to wash its hands of responsibility to protect the public interest. The public is the third party at the bargaining table.

A review of 1973 and 1974, even by a most impartial observer, will indicate that the government's attitude toward this public responsibility has been unfortunate, to say the least. It is a period in which there has been a general deterioration in the attitude that should exist between employers and employees. A few days ago we heard in this House the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) indicate how belatedly the government had come to the conclusion that machinery must be established to review the question of the public interest and its protection.

In the private sector, we have advocated the establishment of a public interest disputes commission, pursuant to the recommendations of the Woods report, with responsibility for determining and defining the absolutely essential aspects of services coming under federal jurisdiction, the provision of which should not be grossly interfered with due to a breakdown in collective bargaining. The intent is to provide all possible assistance to facilitate the conclusion of agreements but, if necessary, to assist in alleviating damage that may occur and to report to the minister from time to time and make recommendations as to what steps, if any, should be taken with respect to any particular matter.

I have read Mr. Finkelman's observations regarding the right to strike and the right to lock out, as well as his recommendations as to the timing and the steps that should be taken leading to settlement. It is my hope that by reason of the improvements the committee will make, the vast majority of bargaining will lead to successful settlements and the public interest will be protected in that way. At the same time, it should not be beyond the purview of the committee to review what is an essential service in the public sector or to suggest the establishment of machinery to make that review. It should make recommendations to this House based on its findings, bearing in mind the rights of participants in the collective bargaining process.

I wish to make it clear that my party does not believe that rights which have been granted ought lightly to be taken away. We respectfully point out that if government intervention in the community grows, the withdrawal of essential services will have greater and greater impact. That being so, I think the committee ought to consider what is an essential service. As I said at the outset, we welcome the formation of this committee and look forward to participating in its work.

I began my speech by saying we are concerned about the position of the public servant as an individual and not a mere cog in the bureaucratic machine. The committee, in its considerations, should not forget that important element. While the talk is great and important, if we build up a reservoir of trust so that we can make the public service a good place of work for men and women of Canada, the public interest will be served. I hope the work of the committee will develop that relationship of trust which is so necessary if this work is to be successfully carried out.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the decision to establish a special parliamentary committee to consider the Finkelman report. Like the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), I shall begin by making my first comment one that relates to the last item, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) mentioned in presenting this motion. We welcome warmly the word that consideration is being given to amending the Public Service Superannuation Act. I look forward to the possibility of seeing the subject dealt with by the same special committee. The last time the whole question of collective bargaining in the public service was dealt with by a special committee, that same special committee had before it matters relating to the Public Service Superannuation Act. It is good to be back again at both of these subjects.

There is no gainsaying that public service pension arrangements in Canada are good, and we have won important improvements. But there are serious shortcomings. There are things which definitely need to be improved. If I am not careful, I will be launching out into my full-dress speech on this subject, but that would hardly be appropriate at this time. I simply say that we welcome the fact that this subject as well as the material in the Finkelman report, will in due course be referred to this special committee.

With regard to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, I underline the very fine sentiments which have been expressed by my friend from Grenville-Carleton, who emphasized that it is important for workers of any category, and especially workers who are serving the public, to have a sense of participating in what they are doing. That is what collective bargaining is all about. As my late friend Andy Andras used to say, the purpose of collective bargaining is to turn a hand into a man. This is what the labour movement has been seeking across the years, the recognition that those who toil are not just cogs in a machine, but human beings with rights and aspirations which deserve to be respected.

I was happy to be the member of the committee which considered the Public Service Staff Relations Act in the first place, in other words, the committee which first recommended back to parliament the entire set-up with respect to collective bargaining. I am pleased that we shall have this opportunity to review the whole matter.

As has already been said, despite the shortcomings—especially the interminable delays—the over-all experience with collective bargaining in the public service has been good. No one is suggesting that we drop it. But there are certain improvements which need to be made. I am glad that we have the advice of Mr. Finkelman in his report, which we shall consider in committee. As the previous speaker said, Mr. Finkelman made 231 recommendations, so that if every speaker in this debate were to deal with them seriatim we should never get around to the competition bill which is on the agenda for today.

Let me refer to one or two of Mr. Finkelman's recommendations. I like his general suggestion that the Public Service Staff Relations Act should be made as much like the Canada Labour Code as possible. There are differences between employment in the private sector and employment in the public service. But I think those differences should not be treated in a way which is to the disadvantage of those in the public service. I suggest, as Mr. Finkelman has, that there are practices sanctioned by the Canada Labour Code which might well be imported into the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

With respect to one of the other questions to which the previous speaker referred, that of the exclusion of certain subjects from collective bargaining, I regret that Mr. Finkelman has been a bit conservative—and I am not sure that is spelled with a small "c"—in recommending no significant changes. Although he does recommend a strengthening of the consultation process with regard to these various areas, it is still my view and the view of my colleagues that things such as classification, job security and promotion should be the subject of collective bargaining. When we get the Finkelman report to the committee we will have these issues before us and we can deal with them there.

Likewise, I am a bit disappointed that the Finkelman report does not treat in what I call a democratic fashion the matter of excluded employees. I am now distinguishing employees from subjects. There are already too many excluded subjects. I suggest that, likewise, there are too many excluded employees, even if Mr. Finkelman comes up with suggestions as to ways in which there might be more active consultation regarding their position. He also proposes that there be a better method of defining and designating those who are not to be covered by collective bargaining. So, without spelling it out, I think I have said enough to emphasize that there are these problems to deal with and that they will be before us once this report is in the hands of the special committee.

● (1600)

There are two or three matters that are not the subject of recommendations in the report but which I think are important. I said earlier that the collective bargaining process in the public service has gone well, except for a few shortcomings, one being the time loss that occurs in many negotiations. Whether that is the fault of the legislation or the fault of the government is, of course, a point about which one can argue. I certainly think it would be a tremendous boon to the health of the collective bargaining process if we could take steps to speed it up as far as the public service is concerned.

Another matter which may not lend itself so much to the legislation as to the whole question of public policy is to be found in the fact that the government seems to be able to make very low offers of wage and salary increases to those involved in the collective bargaining process—perhaps only 2 per cent or even 7 per cent per year. When it comes to senior officials such as deputy ministers, however, in the second or third grade, or even the top ones, there is a tremendous boost. Salaries of $45,000, $55,000, or even more, are not the result of collective bargaining but of a process outside it altogether. It raises the whole question of the fairness and morality of percentage wage and salary adjustments when those at the lower level get such low increases, in terms of actual dollars, compared with those at a higher level.

There is another area where high salaries are paid and it has been suggested today that there might be a discussion on increasing them as well. I am not going to raise that matter now, except to say that I take the same view, namely, that our concern in this place should not be for those of us who are not suffering any distress, but it should be for those in the lower brackets. What I am saying with respect to the public service is that even if it is necessary to have some employees outside the collective bargaining process, the government must do a better job of rationalizing what it does for those on higher salaries compared with what it does for those covered by collective bargaining.

I noted the comments made by the previous speaker about the proposals of his party for a public interest disputes commission. I can go along with him and all the other "after dinner" speakers who say that we should try to find a better way than strikes to solve labour disputes. Every labour leader in the country is prepared to endorse that proposition. There should be a better way. What I object to is the suggestion that labour must give up the right to strike before that better way has been found. I commend those who try to find a better way. I have spent some time and thought on it myself. But none of us has yet found it, and I do not think any derogatory remarks should be made about labour, whether in the private sector or in the public service, using the only weapon available to them to try to improve their position.

I like the comment of my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton who suggested that what has been given to the public service as a right should not be lightly taken away. I would amend the statement and take out the word "lightly". It has been given to them and it should not be taken away. This involves the whole question of an economy that functions properly. In this parliament we are "at" the government on this question every day. But I suggest if the economy is not functioning properly, we should not take it out on particular groups of people and, in particular, we should not take it out on the public service.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I never suggested that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend did not suggest that. I was away from commenting on his remarks about strikes and was back to the general proposition that the best way to avoid strikes is to have a properly functioning economy in which all our people receive their share of the wealth which they help to produce. I am back at a lifelong theme of mine, namely, that the production of goods and services of all kinds is not an individual exercise and should not result in great profit for one individual and poverty for another. It is a social process and we all ought to share in it.

I noted that when this debate started the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) was not in his own seat, but when he realized what was being debated I saw him move back to his seat rather fast, so I would not be surprised if he were to take part in it. I do not want to steal any of his thunder. Indeed, I cannot, because he has already thundered about it. I want to say, however, that I think there is a great deal of merit in the suggestion he has been making, to the effect that there ought to be a minister in the cabinet who is responsible for the public service and speaks for its members. That responsibility is too scattered at the moment and public servants do not feel they have anybody in the cabinet who is their friend or who is speaking for them. The only way they get friends in the House of Commons is through the constituencies in which they live. I think the hon. member for Ottawa West has a point, and if he rises today to develop it he will have my support.

This is all I need to say at this point, Mr. Speaker. We in the New Democratic Party welcome the decision to have a committee which will try to improve the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The conditions under which employees work is a matter of concern to us at all times. That is true whether they work in the private sector, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways, or for the federal government. On the basis of the Finkelman report and the debates that will take place, we hope the committee will be able to make recommendations to improve the whole situation.

If I may conclude where I began, Mr. Speaker, I also look forward to the early reference to this committee of the proposal to review the Public Service Superannuation Act. That, I hope, would in some way produce a parallel reference of the superannuation acts that apply to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Canadian armed forces and other groups. I look forward to the early reference of this subject and hope that in this session of parliament we will make real improvements both for the public servants now serving the nation and for the public servants who served it in the past and are now retired.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a lengthy intervention today. I listened with great interest to the speeches of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). May I express my thanks through you, sir, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for his kind remarks about my speech of October 10 in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Those of us who are concerned about the public service have been looking forward to the creation of this type of committee. There is a real job to be done. When I spoke on the matter in the throne speech debate, I expressed concern because of the difficulties of collective bargaining in the public service. We have a serious problem of price movement and inflation. Without question, awards have not kept up with the movement of prices in the general economy. Many of the contracts arrived at by the staff associations have led to a great deal of discontent.

I expressed concern then about the numbers who had taken the strike option, and I expressed the hope that the government would move promptly to establish the committee which is the subject of the motion before us. I think the speeches of the two hon. members who preceded me in this debate are a good omen—because they sit on the other side of the House—in terms of the measure of agreement which will probably exist in the committee. They did not take a partisan approach; they took a moderate and sympathetic attitude to the general problems of the public service. I share the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to the scope of the committee's work. I hope the committee will be able to consider, not only the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the superannuation act but a number of other matters.

I have been concerned not only about the administration of the public service—and I do not intend to repeat the observations I made on that subject—but about lack of mobility in the service, lack of a policy on transfers, lack of opportunity which would allow employees who have been on the job for a long time to meet a new challenge and get a new start. Those of us who follow public service affairs recall that not long ago positions were filled through a process of widely advertised competitions conducted by duly constituted boards which published the results of their decisions. This was the general practice. Then came technological innovation, Datastream—the great big computer.

Those of us who have listened to complaints from public servants affected must be concerned about the operations of this computer system since there are side effects which are less than desirable. Nowadays there is often no competition in the normal sense. A request is made by a departmental head, authority is delegated, a computer search takes place and half an hour later some cards are pulled out, the top names are interviewed and the placement is made. In many ways the procedure is perhaps more efficient than former methods, but employees who are seeking a new challenge, who realize they have gone as far as they can in the jobs they hold, often do not have an opportunity to appear before a selection board. One cannot help feeling there is a group of people who specialize in the writing of computer cards. If all the key words appear on the computer card in the right places, that card is most likely to be pulled out in the event of a search and opportunities will flow.

I am reminded of the specialists who have developed in applying for LIP grants. Let us face it, there are people who have learned to write a strong submission. That is their specialty. The content of their submission may not be as good as its form, but nevertheless it attracts something better than the average hearing. I feel there is a somewhat similar procedure undertaken with respect to computer operation data streams. There are some who manage to have good cards written, the key words are all in the correct places, and they enjoy much better opportunities than others who must employ more pedestrian methods of coping with a mechanized operation.

I do not know to what extent the committee will be able to discuss such matters as this. However, I am certainly of the opinion that the question of transfers and promotions—matters which in any large corporation are generally handled by a personnel department—should be examined by the committee.

I join other hon. members in saying that the general recommendations made by Mr. Finkelman are small "c" conservative. I hope there will be general agreement among the members of the committee to come forward with at least a degree of unanimity so that legislation can proceed very quickly. However, I trust we shall also take the opportunity to consider a number of broader questions. I was interested in the suggestions put forward by the speakers who preceded me, and I certainly have an open mind on what they said.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, POWERS OF INVESTIGATORS, OFFENCES

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[Translation]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to move that Bill C-2 be read the second time. As you know, it is the third time that this bill is brought forward in this House and this is the second debate on second reading. The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs had made a lot of progress in the study of this bill when Parliament was dissolved last May for the general election. I therefore hope that all hon. members will take these facts into account during this debate and will try to speed up consideration of this bill, at least on second reading.

As I have already mentioned, Bill C-2 is the same as Bill C-227 brought forward on November 5, 1973, and Bill C-7, introduced in the House of Commons on February 28, 1974. Since that time, our position on some aspects of the bill has been modified to take into account the reaction of the public to the previous bills.

I plan to suggest amendments to the bill when it is studied in committee. In my opinion, there is nothing mysterious in this, and we do not intend to suggest any mysterious amendment. My predecessor had already told the members of the parliamentary committee about the contents of most of these amendments. They have been circulated amongst the members of this committee and are well known. I will present them again during the study in committee.

● (1620)

Almost all the amendments were the result of extremely useful and constructive briefs or suggestions that were presented to the parliamentary committee by various groups, or came from officials in my department following a more careful study of that bill and of the effects of some aspects of it.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is the result of five years of intensive discussions with representatives from various sectors of the populations, not to mention the years of studies devoted to it by the Economic Council of Canada, in order to analyze the competition policy Canada needs to face the problems of today and the challenges of tomorrow.

It was in 1966 that the government asked the Economic Council of Canada to study the three spheres of action now under the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and to make recommendations. Those three spheres of action are: first, consumer affairs, second, the competition policy and third, the laws concerning intellectual property.

The Council made a report on each of those spheres of action and the three reports have greatly influenced the government's as well as the Canadian public's outlook. The report made by the Economic Council of Canada on the competition policy was presented to the government during the summer of 1969. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs of that time, the present member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Basford), immediately created a committee of experts to guide him in the implementation of the Council's recommendations. He also asked people from all sectors to examine the report and give them their views on it.

In June 1971, when the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs introduced Bill C-256, he insisted upon the fact that the object of the bill was to invite discussion rather than result in an immediate implementation. I will remind you that we are in 1974. I think that the wishes of the minister at that time have indeed been carried out. It is unquestionable that this bill has been the subject of much discussion and that all of its aspects have been carefully examined. I would not want to encroach upon the wishes of the minister when I say that when he thought this bill should be discussed rather than immediately voted on, he surely did not have in mind a date later than this time in 1974.

I think one of the important tasks in the elaboration of this bill for Parliament was accomplished by my predecessor, the present hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), who recommended to the government the various steps to be followed in setting up a competition policy. In doing so, he received the help of the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Trends in Food Prices. That committee which was set up, as hon. members will recall, in January of 1973 clearly understood the urgent need to reform the competition legislation, but it also realized that some aspects of the competition policy such as corporate mergers could not be amended too quickly and that they should rather be examined in terms of their integration into other government industrial measures. The committee recommended to the government that it legislate instead on certain aspects of the competition policy which did not pose the same difficulties, especially in the area of consumer protection.

So Bill C-227 introduced before this House by my predecessor, the hon. member for Windsor West, in November of 1973 reflected the views of the committee in that it did not touch on certain aspects of the competition policy such as corporate mergers, monopolistic situations and specialization agreements.

In his speech on the second reading of Bill C-7 which was identical to this bill, Mr. Speaker, the then minister made a lengthy description of the contents of that bill. I think this House would be better served if I dispensed with repeating all those technical details. However, I think it would be useful for members interested in this bill to read over that speech which can be found in the Hansard of March 13, 1974. It was an excellent speech that I urge everyone to read because it reflects the quality and the competence of the man who made it and to whom I would want to pay a particular tribute for his never-ending dedication and his remarkable relentlessness in working for Canadian consumers and small businessmen.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I would like particularly to bring out the highlights and the reasons for our action, stressing particularly some of the main amendments to the Combines Investigation Act contained in this bill.

First, there is a series of prohibitions concerning specific business practices that are detrimental to the consumer. Those provisions create criminal offenses or being about desirable amendments to existing prohibitions.

In the first place, provisions concerning misleading advertising are revised and made more accurate so that they apply to false statements of every kind made to the public about products or services rather than to advertisements only. Not only the literal meaning of the statements will be taken into account, but also the general impression that they give. Then, false or fraudulent warranties and testimonials are prohibited.

Furthermore, any sale at a price other that the lowest of two or more prices is prohibited in the case of double ticketed products.

Also, pyramid selling is prohibited under certain reservations as well as referral selling according to their definition.

Bait and switch selling is also prohibited.

Selling above advertised price is also prohibited.

Promotional contests are prohibited except when they comply with regulations.

Finally, the price fixing prohibition is reinforced.

A series of amendments will, on application by the director of investigation and research authorize the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission first, to examine cases of refusal to sell and after the supplier has been given every opportunity to be heard, to order him to supply his customers to recommend price changes; second, to examine cases of consignment selling to control the prices of a supplier or establish price differences between competitors and after the supplier has been given every opportunity to be heard, to order him to cease this practice.

Third, to examine cases of exclusivity where some big suppliers demand of their buyers that they sell some particular products only to reduce competition and, after the suppliers has been given reasonable opportunity to be heard, to make the appropriate remedial order.

● (1630)

Fourth, to study cases when tied selling, that is the practice whereby the selling of a product is tied to the selling of another one, is being practised by major suppliers, in order to substantially lessen competition in the market, and after having given suppliers a fair hearing, to make the appropriate remedial order.

Fifth, to study cases when market restrictions, that is the fact that a supplier of a product, as a condition of supplying the product to a customer, requires him to supply the product in a specific market only, is also being practised by major suppliers in order to substantially lessen competition in the market, and once again, after having given suppliers a fair hearing, to make the appropriate remedial order.

Sixth, and last, to study cases when foreign judgments, foreign laws or instructions from foreign directors are detrimental to the Canadian public interest and, after having given them a fair hearing, to make orders prohibiting their application in Canada.

Another aspect of those amendments relates to the prohibitions of the Act dealing with combinations, mergers and monopolies that are now restricted mainly to the production and trade of items and goods. Those prohibitions have a broader scope, and apply now to all services and service industries.

I would also like to deal with the provisions designed to allow and facilitate civil actions for the purpose of recovering losses or damages resulting from an offence to the law, up to the extent of the total sum, plus enquiry and prosecution costs.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is running short and I obviously cannot discuss every aspect of the bill. I shall of course have the occasion to do so in greater detail during the clause by clause examination of the bill in committee.

Mr. Speaker, earlier in my remarks, I stressed the fact that Bill C-2 stems from a most thorough and detailed analysis led by the government and the general public. I should like to revert to that remark, because I believe it is essential and I hope that all members of this House will understand that we have already examined this bill long enough. We have tried to answer criticism whenever we could without going against the fundamental principles of a competition policy. This compromise process is not over and I have no hesitation in saying so. I am convinced that this process will be continued during the discussion in committee with the advice that the members from this and the other side of the House will be giving. I am open to any constructive suggestion that may be brought forth.

However, I will say this, Mr. Speaker. Despite all our efforts I am the first one to say, and I am sure that the other members of this House will agree with me, that it is impossible to satisfy everyone, especially in this field. No one is in favour of the implementation of policies which will hinder his freedom. To be efficient, this bill must restrict the liberty of action of powerful concerns more than the present Combines Investigation Act. It is obvious that this causes certain problems. It causes some annoyance. But I think it is essential, for if we were to satisfy all our critics, I think in the end we would adopt legislation that would be even weaker than the present law.

Much criticism coming from businessmen where we could not reach a compromise concerns the proposal of making some trade practices subject to review by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. It has even been suggested that the present bill gives unlimited discretionary powers to the Commission to control business.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the small number of practices subject to review by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission are carefully defined in this bill. There is no need to make loud protests and to suggest that this legislation will give unlimited power in this case. There is no need to exaggerate the scope and the powers given to the Commission.

The situation is the same for the required conditions for the Commission to be authorized to issue an order dealing with these restrictive practices. Moreover, it is mentioned in the bill that the concerned parties must be given the opportunity to be heard and that is a very good opportunity for them to put forward their views completely. And I repeat that the federal court's Act provides for appeals on interpretation issues. So any party who may feel that the Commission is given too much power could come before it and appeal against the ruling of the Commission.

Mr. Speaker, may I say that we are prepared to make any other arrangement we deem warranted to meet critics. The purpose of some of the amendments which I referred to in the beginning of my speech is to clarify the discretionary powers granted to the Commission. But there is a basic principle which we can depart from. In part, we must go from a criminal law to a civil law to face some trade practices which are currently widespread. Those are desirable and justified in some cases, I must say. Those are not practices which may be considered as bad at first glance. However, in other circumstances, the same practices could be prejudicial to competition. It is simply impossible to eliminate those sort of practices with a criminal law. We cannot meet the critics in that field. This would jeopardize the integrity of this bill and somewhat sabotage Phase II of our competition policy which has yet to be introduced. Mr. Speaker, although I may sometimes appear eager for compromise, this time I have no intention to come to an arrangement.

On the other hand, I am sure that most Canadian businessmen realize that it is in their best interest in the long run to support responsible legislation such as Bill C-2, for this will provide a strong competition policy. After all, is it not our purpose to foster a sound and progressive free enterprise system? No one would benefit if we were to allow a minority group to use restrictive and anti-social practices which would throw discredit over the private system as we know it now.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I will not hide the fact that I consider all Canadian consumers as my own constituents. I feel that consumers and businessmen have an interest in common, that is, a market where prices are set by the interaction of competitive forces and where honesty and fair play prevail. I agree that Bill C-2 contains the fewest possible limitations on private enterprise which are compatible with the need to safeguard consumers interests as well as those of these same businessmen when purchasing goods and services.

I could never bring myself to introduce a bill which could be detrimental to the interests of such important people as our businessmen. If I am firmly convinced that this bill will not prejudice the legitimate interests and expectations of Canadian businessmen, I am not less convinced that this necessary and long awaited bill will prove infinitely important not only to all Canadian consumers, but even more so to the small Canadian businessman.

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, probably no one in this House would quarrel with the principle of Bill C-2. Certainly, my caucus endorses the concept of open competition, with proper safeguards for the consumer and the prevention of abusive business practices. Expressed another way, surely no member of this House would advocate conspiracies to fix prices or would endorse pyramid selling, referral selling, misleading advertising or double-ticketing.

That is not the question here. What is of importance here is: will this bill, in its present form, contribute to better competition in this country? Will this bill, with its amendments to existing legislation, improve that legislation so that improper business activities will no longer exist or will at least lessen in this country? In short, will it be an improvement on present legislation now available to the courts and to the Canadian public? Finally, in considering Bill C-2, in all fairness we must also look at the Trudeau government's record in respect of the consumers in this country, and in particular at that government's record in respect of lessening or containing rising prices.

Unfortunately, the government's handling of consumer protection, and therefore the formation of a new competition policy in Canada, has been most inadequate. Bill C-2, if passed in its present form, may be little more than a hoax on the Canadian public. Rather than lower prices, the effect of its implementation may well be to raise prices in Canada. The government appears to be so unsure of its position that even now we hear the minister state that he intends to amend the bill which is before us when it reaches the committee. Why cannot we have the amendments on the floor of the House at this time? Surely it is an affront to this parliament to suggest that some amendments which were put before a committee a few months ago are those which everybody in this House should assume the minister has in mind when he says the bill will be amended. I would strongly recommend that the minister quit playing games. If he knows exactly what form the new legislation should take, then he should produce the amendments and let the members of this House see the true impact he has in mind for Bill C-2.

Let us quickly trace the record of this government, as the minister has already done, with regard to this type of legislation. In one parliament the government introduced Bill C-256, which received such adverse comment from the business community and many other quarters, consumers included, that it was allowed to die. The government then proposed through a stage one and a stage two approach to attain, presumably, a similar objective. Stage one, which was Bill C-227, appeared in November, 1973, during the first session of the twenty-ninth parliament, and reappeared as Bill C-7 in the last session of the last parliament. Yet today, almost a year after the initially revised bill was introduced, we find Bill C-2 still under amendment by a government which knows not where it is going.

In commenting on the bill, I and my colleagues hope to outline where we feel Bill C-2, if passed, would create economic and legal difficulties. Any law, to be meaningful and to be obeyed, must set out in clear language the nature of the offences it is intended to cover. Bill C-2 fails to do that. The bill would give the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission power to set policy with respect to competition in this country without recourse to parliament. The bill's wording is so vague that the commission could virtually write the laws of the land without even the minister knowing what is happening. The proposed legislation overlaps provincial jurisdiction, does not fit into a comprehensive industrial policy for Canada, and may prevent desirable long-term restructuring of the Canadian economy.

Before elaborating on and raising other points with respect to Bill C-2, let us review how we got into this position. In commenting on this legislation I would remind the House that my party, when in power, laid the cornerstone of Canada's present combines legislation when it passed an act prohibiting conspiracies and combinations in restraint of trade. The legislation defined as unlawful any agreement to limit unduly facilities for transporting, producing, storing or selling any article, or to restrain commerce on it, or to unreasonably enhance its price.

Also forbidden was any agreement to unduly prevent or lessen competition in relation to an article or to the price of insurance upon persons or property. Realizing how impatient the minister gets, and indeed how impatient the governments gets, with any comment from opposition members in this parliament—and today he said he would like us to speed up second reading of this bill—I would refer the minister to the earlier words of his leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The Prime Minister, in his book "Approaches to Politics," at page 79 wrote:

> The point is that in a parliamentary democracy the opposition is the last and most important bulwark against arbitrary tyranny; through it the people reserve the right to criticize from moment to moment the way they are governed—through it they nip legislative and administrative abuses in the bud.

Knowing, as he does, that he has a brutal majority in the House to push this or any legislation through, may I suggest to the minister that he pay particular heed to the comments of opposition members, who may not only save him future embarrassment but, more importantly, may save the people of Canada from the consequences of wrongfully conceived and wrongfully administered legislation. So in this context let us first review the record of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which was created in December, 1967, by the then Registrar General, the present Minister of Finance.

At that time the Registrar General indicated that the net budget for the new department would be $1½ million to $2 million. He spoke glowingly of what the new department could do for the consumers of Canada. I would point out that in the estimates currently before us for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, we find the budget is over $45 million. The number of employees hired by the department has steadily increased and is now over 2,400.

Between 1967 and today, one might well ask, how has the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or the government itself, performed on behalf of Canadian consumers? Have they held down prices, for example? The record is that since 1967 the consumer price index in Canada has gone up 45.2 per cent, almost three times the rate of increase in the previous seven years. Food prices have gone up 61.6 per cent since December, 1967, compared with 19.8 between 1961 and 1968. One, clearly, cannot give much credit to the new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with respect to price controls. But what about the other activities of this department?

Based on the estimates, we know that $17.5 million in this calendar year is being spent on consumer affairs. If we look at the last annual report published by the department—I am referring to the 1972-73 report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973—we find the department had only 13,868 written inquiries from consumers across the country. When one thinks of it, one realizes this is an amazingly small number of complaints compared to the billions of commercial transactions in the nation every year. Think of the cost! It would appear that it costs the taxpayers of Canada $1,250 for each complaint made to the department in written form. Based on the number of personnel in the bureau dealing with consumer affairs, one employee seems to be handling 1½ complaints per month.

● (1650)

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member would not want the figures he quoted to be considered correct if they were not. I would point out to the hon. member that the figures he has given do not take into account the various functions of this division of my department.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I would remind the minister that he is rising to participate in the debate, and that the point he is making is not really a point of order. If the minister were to continue the debate now, he would in fact end it. We do not really have before us a point of order.

Mr. Stanfield: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: The truth hurts.

Mr. Paproski: You can't stand the heat in the kitchen.

An hon. Member: If the shoe fits, wear it.

Mr. Stevens: The same annual report points out that in addition to written inquiries, the department receives 25,000 phone calls a year. One wonders who keeps track of all these calls. In any event, if you throw in all the telephone calls with the written inquiries, you find it costs $450 for every complaint communicated to the department in a fiscal year. Surely it is little less than window dressing for the Canadian consuming public, and a costly affront to the business world, if this type of ineffective, and perhaps misdirected, bureaucracy continues.

I have referred to a report of March 31, 1973, and frankly I wish I could have referred to a more current report, say one of March 31, 1974. However, the combines investigation branch does not have a report available as of March 31, 1974. Yet I find it very odd, in fact startling, that when I went to the minister's office today I noticed that he had there a June 30, 1974, report from western Australia setting forth how their consumer protection bureau and consumer affairs council fared in their second year of operation. Australia is able to prepare a report containing 63 pages as of June 30, 1974, a report which is delivered 12,000 miles to the minister; yet we in this parliament are not entitled even to see a report as of March 31, 1974, when we are considering a bill as important as this one.

Some hon. Members: Disgraceful.

Mr. Stevens: In the name of the consumer, I believe that many government controls are created, such as are contemplated in Bill C-2, without proper consideration and without proper co-ordination with all sectors of the economy. In my opinion, people feel more and more oppressed by the government, yet the government continues to introduce legislation which places further controls on people and creates a greater bureaucracy to control consumers. The controls may be noble in intent, but in my opinion many of them deal with trivia, many are confusing and many are impossible.

The waste of time and energy is enormous. If you added the cost of the effects of government regulation on all industries and many levels of commerce, it would prove to be a major factor in today's higher prices. It is a cost that the producer and businessman cannot possibly absorb in its entirety, so the consumer is paying for it, as he also has to pay in taxes for the bureaucracy itself.

While it is ever popular for some in the government to be proposing new legislation, new regulations and investigations, rarely, if ever, do you hear it proposed that the government's own operations be similarly questioned or even investigated. Clause 18 of the bill before us deals, for example, with misleading advertising, but you will note that misleading advertising on the part of the government is carefully left out. Nowhere is an opportunity given for even six citizens to ask that a piece of advertising put out by the federal government be investigated as to whether it is misleading. Take, for example, some of the Olympic coins advertising. Is it fair for the government of Canada to state that the Olympic coinage is limited by an act of parliament? Is it fair for them to state it in that context, presumably attempting to influence the man who might buy a $10 coin, without making it clear that the act of parliament simply limited the amount to $450 million? Would such advertising be less misleading if it pointed out that the $450 million almost doubles the total currency in the country?

Let us consider the Department of Finance. They regularly solicit the public to buy their bonds. If a private concern is selling its bonds, the securities commission requires them to show trading patterns. In the case of the government, however, do you ever see them disclose the trading pattern of existing bonds? Let us consider, for example, those famous perpetuals of 1936 which now trade for $34 and which some poor souls bought in 1936 for $96. If, today, a person tries to cash in his $34 bonds, in today's dollars he gets back, in 1936 buying power, $9.43. Would it not be fair for the government to indicate that federal government bonds do sell-off on occasion most dramatically? Consider the past Liberal campaign.

An hon. Member: A successful campaign.

Mr. Stevens: I would be very interested if the minister proposed that all the advertising spewed out on television and the other media with respect to that campaign were assessed to see whether or not it was misleading. I would be interested if the television shot of the poor chickens being burned in the United States were reviewed, and in knowing whether the judge considering the question said he thought it was the type of advertising that was proper and not misleading.

I have dealt with general things, so perhaps I should be a little more specific. I shall refer to the annual consumer and corporate affairs report dated March 31, 1973. I think it contains misrepresentations, and I wonder if the minister has taken steps to cut off somebody's head. For example, if you look at page 11 of that report, you find they set out in a table the number of inquiries made to the bureau of consumer affairs. Lo and behold, one sees the total is 113,868. The fact is that they are exactly 100,000 inquiries out, if you add up their own figures as produced in the report.

[Mr. Stevens.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

BANK OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING LOANS MADE TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue) moved that Bill C-201, to amend the Bank of Canada Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, Bill C-201 is probably the most important bill that has been introduced in the House of Commons for a great many years. When financial matters are involved, it is obvious that everyone agrees that the role of finance is of prime importance for the economic, political and social development throughout this country, and in all spheres of economic activity.

I notice in the Chamber this afternoon two ministers who usually criticize the Social Credit, without considering it, of course. The purpose of this bill is to invite the minister to study it and then the government to implement it. Mr. Speaker, this bill states in section 1, and I quote:

"(i) make loans or advances for periods not exceeding sixty years to the Government of Canada or the government of any province based on the real ccredit of Canada or the province at a rate of interest which does not exceed the cost of administration;"

—to replace the existing section in the Bank of Canada Act . . . which states at Paragraph 18 (l) (i) the following:

(i) make loans or advances for periods not exceeding six months to the Government of Canada or the government of any province on the pledge or hypothecation of readily marketable securities issued or guaranteed by Canada or any province;"

Paragraph 18 (1) (j) at present reads as follows, and I quote:

"(j) make loans to the Government of Canada or the government of any province, but such loans outstanding at any one time shall not, in the case of the Government of Canada, exceed one-third of the estimated revenue of such government for its fiscal year, and shall not in the case of any provincial government exceed one-fourth of such government's estimated revenue for its fiscal year; and such loans shall be repaid before the end of the first quarter after the end of the fiscal year of such government;"

Mr. Speaker, under the present Act, a province or Canada could borrow up to one third of its total budget. If the total Canadian budget is $21 billion, the government could borrow directly from the bank of Canada $7 billion, but for no more than six months. Such is the inconsistency of the Bank of Canada Act. Why can the Bank of Canada grant loans for 50 or 60 years to any country in the world and cannot grant it to the government of Canada which legislate over this same Bank of Canada?

Take the province of Quebec, for example. With a budget of $10 billion, it could borrow $2.5 billion a year from the Bank, under the Act, but for no more than six months whereas loans of 50 to 60 years are granted to countries twice smaller than Quebec and with a population two times smaller.

Mr. Speaker, Creditists are often laughed at because they speak about the Bank of Canada. But this is an institution established by the Canadian government, a bank regulated by laws of this Parliament. Every decision of this Parliament concerning the Bank of Canada has to be adhered to. But this government says: As to the Bank of Canada and its monetary policy, we do not have our say because we do not want to. We are free to tell the Bank what it should do to maintain an economically sound Canada, a profitable Canada, and to serve the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, we are presently witnessing the quarrels between provincial and federal governments. What are they quarrelling about? The use of the French language? No. The development of mining resources in Northwestern Canada? No. Western oil? There is some, of course, but they always come to an understanding in the end.

● (1710)

But all Canadian provinces without exception, even the richest ones, are blaming the federal government for not assuming its responsibilities.

Last Thursday evening I was a participant on a Pierre Berton Show originating from Toronto, program scheduled for viewing this week. I was with Mr. Harrandence, a lawyer and former Saskatchewan conservative leader turned separatist in Calgary. He used the same expressions as our own Quebec separatists. His comments did not surprise me. We can hear the same in Quebec.

The Quebec pequistes keep on saying that Ottawa is taking everything away from us to give it to Western Canada. On the other hand, this Canadian from the West was saying exactly the same thing: Ottawa is taking everything away from us to give it to Eastern Canada, to support the province of Quebec. These people do not realize that there are in Quebec for instance huge quantities of natural resources, as compared with Alberta. There is oil in Alberta. But there is electricity in Quebec, and we send some to Ontario from which we do not buy anything. We have some more to sell and we sell some to the United States, and in view of the James Bay development, Quebec will be selling some to the United States because I feel that, clearly, by the time the James Bay project is completed and at the rate things are going, it will definitely belong to the United States.

Again recently, Mr. Bourassa made a trip to New York City to negociate a $150 million loan at a 10 per cent interest rate for a period of 25 years. Why did he go there? Because the Bank of Canada cannot lend money for more than a 6-month period. That is why we have to go to the United States. Mr. Bourassa might not be there 25 years from now, but the man who will replace him will have paid $265 million in interests only, on a loan of $150 million.

Mr. Speaker, this does not make sense. On what do the Americans base their credit to finance the James Bay Project? On the James Bay project. These are the resources which guarantee the loan. They are not American resources. Mr. Bourassa is not coming back from the United States with wheelbarrows filled with banknotes. He is coming back with a promissory note made to the order of the Americans and endorsed by the Quebec people. We shall have to reimburse $415 million to repay the $150 borrowed. If the federal government would allow Mr. Bourassa to borrow money from the Bank of Canada for 50 or 60 years, in the same manner as that bank is allowed to make loans to India or South American countries, based on the same resources as those considered by American lenders, that is the James Bay's resources, those conflicts would settle down and jealousy between the provinces would no longer exist because they would have the right to become self-determined, to decide for themselves. If only the Bank of Canada was put into the provinces' service. But no, the Bank of Canada follows the Americans even in respect of interest rates.

This afternoon, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was answering my colleague from Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) who had asked whether interest rates were not one of the causes of inflation. The Minister of Finance answered: "No, they are rather a consequence". Such an answer from a minister is startling. The first cause of inflation is the interest. When will the James Bay project become worth the $50 or $60 billion spent to complete the installations? When will the $150 million recently borrowed by Mr. Bourassa be worth $415 million? That is the cause of inflation. But the government says it is a consequence.

Municipalities also have troubles with their borrowings. They must even pay 13 or 14 per cent interest rates nowadays. Money does not multiply. I don't know if someone can understand that. Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas stated that too. That is true. If I loan an amount of money to someone and if I am paid a small interest, that is normal because I use something I own.

But banks have an ink-well as well as a pen and they do some figuring. This is exactly what has been done in the United States when Mr. Bourassa was granted a loan of $150 million last week, namely 16 for 1, at a 10 per cent rate of interest.

Mr. Speaker, no democratic country in the world can survive such a system and it is not taken seriously. If my Creditist friends talk about social credit, about monetary reform, they say: Oh, they are going to talk about the Bank of Canada. But is the Bank of Canada our Canadian institution? And when the Bank of Canada decides to raise the interest rates, who is giving it such an order? Parliament? The Bank of Canada must take its orders from the government, and if the interest rate is so high it is because of the government who allows the Bank of Canada to "flounder". This is its responsibility and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) knows it.

While I am talking about that, he is at his seat. He winks at me in order to tell me that I am right. He does not rise to say: I shall put that advice into practice. If the government fears to do such a thing—though we are only 11—let us be given the chance and we will do it quickly. We shall not take orders from the Americans to decide which interest rate will be charged to the Canadians. Are we not able to have a domestic financial system so that our natural wealth be put at the service of Canadians? Who is preventing this?

The international market is operating well. So let us go on in that way. But in Canada who prevents the Bank of Canada from acting in the best interests of the Canadian people? Who is benefitting from the present credit given to the government? The people? No. It benefits the private banks, at the people's expense. Here is how it is done: It is often claimed that the public debt does not mean a thing; that is what I have been hearing for at least 35 years and there is nothing bad in that, since we owe them to us. We are indebted to ourselves!

It is known that many citizens own Canada savings bonds. Mr. Speaker, is it known that nearly all Canada savings bonds are used mostly as collateral for bank loans? So, who holds the levers, who has the power to create money in Canada? The private banks where the government goes regularly begging on bended knee every 89 or 91 days to borrow money for the same period of time. A psychosis then builds up amongst the people. Then, at some point, things come to a stop for lack of liquidity. What is liquidity? Is that ever explained? Never! People are told: The banks have no more money. They can no longer loan money. There is no money! Then, all of a sudden, there is all kinds of it.

But who decides that? The Americans? The Americans must be called up to find out what their rates of interest are. We are a bunch of sheep, and we have a Parliament of sheep, who follows the Americans. If they take one small step forward, so do we. Then we are told about our Canadian sovereignty! Masters at home! Masters at home when the United States own us about 100 times over!

Mr. Speaker, awhile ago I said that Canadians bought Canada savings bonds. I bought some too. We own ourselves. The pay is poor, but still we own ourselves. The Canadian citizens bought them with their savings, with their hard-earned money, and those same savings are used to create debts, are used mostly as collateral for the banks. The banks can cash the bonds as they see fit, as often as they wish.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

A large part of the public debt is payable to the chartered banks. We know that a $1,000 Canada savings bond, for instance, constitutes a reserve for the private banking system, which enables them to multiply by 16 the $1,000 of savings bonds I have. The bank has the right to loan $16,000 on the strength of these savings bonds. I think it is fairly clear. Nobody can dispute this, since it can act this way because of the law.

● (1720)

The major part of the debt is directly payable to chartered banks in the following way: The government floats an issue worth $1 billion or $1 million. The Bank of Canada buys it immediately and deposits this in the account of the government. This immediately creates a reserve for the private banking system which has the right to multiply this by 16, or give $16 million in credit for $1 million in bonds. Then, the government borrows $5 or $6 million in new credits made by the private bank and created by the private banking system. Afterwards, the Bank of Canada will have the responsibility for only $1 million as a guarantee for the new credits of chartered banks.

We admit this. It is stated that the Bank of Canada is the servant of the Canadian banking system. What ever the Bankers Association says, the Bank of Canada jumps to it in short order. I do not recall exactly the name of the Governor of the Bank of Canada who is on all fours before the banking system. Never tell me that the Bank of Canada decides which way the financial or monetary policy of Canada will go because that is wrong. Chartered banks control Canadian finance because they are directly or indirectly, the original source of nearly all the money in our country.

While the ordinary citizen gets his money through his work, the banks create their money by methods that cost almost nothing—the pen and the inkwell and the clerk who uses them. The Bank of Canada says, you must draw numbers, so the government draws numbers. It is only the clerk's salary that has to be paid. Banks produce money with methods that cost almost nothing. They can take advantage of that extraordinary privilege to acquire public funds and become master financiers, and governments at all levels thus offend against justice and reason. Actually, it is highway robbery. We do not want to indenture ourselves and our descendants to the chartered banks. Our governments have their own credit and this credit is much more real than the one offered by chartered banks.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has elapsed. I recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen).

Some hon. Members: Let him go on!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Unanimous consent from the House would be needed for the hon. member to go on.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I shall not abuse my colleagues' generosity. I would like, however, to take the time to explain the contents of Bill 201. We shall then hear the opponents of this bill, aimed at making money available for the benefit of man, woman and child, and see what treatment it gets from the government and opposition members. As I mentioned before, we do not wish to be enslaved any more by banks. The question now is who should have control. This Parliament has not been elected to serve banks. We have been elected, each one of us, to serve our constituents, the people of Canada and the country as a whole. To serve this country of ours, to serve it well, we have to relieve it from the paws of rapacious finance people. Such being the aim, let us take the necessary steps. There is no room here for partisanship. Everything centers upon creating a sound economic system, based on something real, that will open the door not to internal strife among Canadians, not to endless strikes, not to killings, but to training Canadians capable of working together for the benefit and well-being of themselves and Canada itself.

Furthermore, as I said earlier, the government of Canada already has in the Bank of Canada an institution that can adequately finance our economic development, without usury or other undesirable conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I am talking about changes advocated by close to 600,000 Social Crediters in the province of Quebec and others, of which 450,000 live in Quebec alone. Those people have been making those proposals for a long time. We are told: You keep repeating the same things over and over again. On the other hand, our critics never change their tune either. They say: "No money!" We reply: Make money! If there is none, create it and use the Bank of Canada!

If the bank is not put to use, the Social Crediters are not responsible; the government is.

The changes put forward in this bill will eliminate the continuous disputes among the various levels of government in Canada as to who should pay the bill of government programs. The fact that money is the perennial concern of governments indicates indeed through their frequent statements, that they are unable to answer all the needs of the people because of lack of money.

Let us have a look at those famous federal-provincial conferences that are held under different excuses and where the delegates always end up quarrelling about money the way hungry dogs fight for an old bone. By eliminating the artificial scarcity of funds available to governments, we would put an end to those shameful scenes.

Moreover, the activities of local governments will depend less on favors granted by more centralizing governments. In other words, the governments will respond more effectively to the aspirations of the citizens in their own territory, our ridings, our provinces and our country.

Mr. Speaker, to implement Bill C-201 means that Canada whose budget will eventually reach $30 billion, could borrow one third each year from the Bank of Canada that is $10 billion at an interest rate not exceeding the administration costs. The pencil pusher's pay would be the federal government's share. The province of Quebec, with a $10 billion budget, could borrow 2.5 billion each year from the Bank of Canada. This amount would certainly help the province of Quebec or British Columbia; 25 per cent of the provincial budget would certainly help all the provinces and the Bank of Canada would play its role, serving the interests of Canada and not those of the financiers.

The Bank of Canada could be used to fight inflation efficiently because inflation is built in the monetary system itself. We are suffering its consequences. It is not the interests that are suffering its consequences, it is not the Bank of Canada, it is us! So, if we are suffering its consequences and if we have a responsible government—if it is an irresponsible government that is another matter—but if the government is responsible, it must do something, it must introduce measures aimed at making the Bank of Canada serve Canada, the provinces, the municipalities and the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Madam Speaker, I always enjoy the speeches made by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), and the speech he made today was no exception. Bill C-201 is without doubt an interesting bill. All its implications certainly could not be dealt with effectively in the space of one hour. The issue he raises, including the control of the banks, the relation between the chartered banks and the Bank of Canada, the extent of United States influence in our economy, and so on, are of great importance and must be the subject of public concern.

The bill itself is very short. Nevertheless, some portions of it immediately attract attention. I note that the Bank of Canada would be permitted to make loans for a period not exceeding 60 years. This is in contrast to section 18 which provides for a period of not longer than six months. Of course, section 18(1)(j) deals with the range within which loans can be made over periods not to exceed three months beyond the fiscal year. The hon. member's idea is an interesting one, but I am not sure it is realistic, at least at this stage.

When we talk about the Bank of Canada we must consider the relative size of the operations of that Bank as opposed to those of the chartered banks and other financial institutions. One set of figures setting out the relative size of the financial intermediaries shows that the Bank of Canada is about 4.6 per cent of all the financial institutions in Canada, whereas the chartered banks make up about 28.9 per cent. Trust and mortgage loan companies and credit unions account for 12.2 per cent, finance companies 4.9 per cent, investment companies 4.3 per cent, life insurance companies 13.6 per cent—an item to be concerned about—private trusteed pension funds 8.9 per cent, for a total of 77 per cent, with other groups at 22 per cent.

These are similar to United States figures. The Federal Reserve Bank occupies the position of holding 5.1 per cent of the intermediary assets. Their chartered banks have about 31 per cent, as opposed to 28.9 per cent in the Canadian system. The Bank of Canada and also the Federal Reserve Bank do not loom substantially in the whole banking scene in this country or in the United States; they rank fifth or sixth among the groups involved in the banking business.

I think we have to look at our banking system to see how efficient it is and how it responds to the needs of governments and private citizens in this country. I, for one, am not a great apologist for the banking system because I think it has many inadequacies, but I am an apologist for the fact that we have to live for today and deal with things as they are.

An hon. Member: Don't change that.

Mr. McRae: I am the first person to believe in change. There are many things that I would like to see changed and I could suggest one or two, although I may not have too many solutions.

On the credit side—and I use the word credit not in terms of financial credit—I think we can say that there are certain aspects of the banking system that are good. I think operationally banks are efficient. The cost of operating banks is relatively small in terms of the total business done, and this is one of the plusses of the banking system.

There is a fairly good allocation of efficiency. In other words, our banks provide a fairly decent national capital market. The branch system is well spread throughout the country. It is possible to deposit money and to have almost instant payment of those dollars in any other part of the country. Perhaps this is an advantage we have over the American system, where you have a lot of smaller banks and it is not that easy to exchange money. I think those are two positive aspects.

There is something to be said for concern about regional efficiency in our banking system. In other words, does money invested by investors or deposited in the banks in Canada tend to stay in a region or move to other regions of the country? As someone who lives at the doorstep to the west and who is affected a great deal by western Canada, I can share very much the concern of western Canadians about what happens to their deposits. Do they stay in the west, being circulated in the west, or do they tend to gravitate to that great centre of the world known as Toronto? This is the kind of question we must ask ourselves.

Having done a little research on this subject I was rather surprised at the fact that in western Canada—I have not done the same kind of research into the situation in eastern Canada—there seems to be a reasonable circulation of deposits made in that part of the country. For instance, in the province of Manitoba, which has about 4.5 per cent of the population of this country, according to statistics as at December 31, 1972, 4.8 per cent of the loans made by chartered banks were made in that province. In British Columbia we have 14.1 per cent of the population, and 13.4 per cent of loans were made in that province. About 26.5 per cent of the total population of Canada lives in the west, and 30.2 per cent of money loaned in Canada is loaned in that area. At the same time 29 per cent of the branches of Canadian banks are located in western Canada, even though the population is, as I said, about 26 per cent of all Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I address a question to the hon. member?

Mr. McRae: Yes, Madam Speaker.

[Mr. McRae.]

Mr. Rondeau: As he is quoting many statistics, can the hon. member tell us what is the total money supply in his city of Fort William?

[English]

Mr. McRae: Yes.

I am sorry, Madam Speaker, but I do not have that at hand. The next time I am in the House I will do my best to have the information for the hon. member, and I will give it to him privately. I can assure him that at this stage of the game the city of Thunder Bay is progressing very favourably and our banking needs are being reasonably well met.

To get back to regional banking, regardless of the fact that there may be more branches proportionately in western Canada than in other parts of the country and that more loans may be made, I still think it is important that there be far more decentralization of our banks and that we have a banking system that responds to the needs of individual provinces.

One of the major achievements of the economic conference I was pleased to attend a year ago last summer was that the provinces were to be permitted to set up provincial banks and to hold at least 25 per cent of the equity of those banks. This was a commitment made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) at that time because we believed it was advisable to establish these banks. I understand we have had good experience with the Bank of British Columbia. I hope we will establish banks in other areas in the name of this government so that we can move away from the process of centralization. I fully understand how very difficult it is in Thunder Bay, and how cut off we all feel from the city of Toronto and banking interests—

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Does the hon. member wish to ask a question?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Madam Speaker. I rise on a point of order.

In view of the seriousness of the bill introduced by my colleague from Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), the head of the Social Credit party of Canada, with a view to making one or two amendments to the Bank of Canada Act, I realize how serious was the previous speaker, but I am asking the Chair if the latter could not confine his remarks to the bill rather than make a general review of chartered banks.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The Chair invites the hon. member to limit the debate if possible to the bill in question.

Mr. McRae: Madam Speaker, on a similar point of order, I maintain that you cannot deal with this bill, which would have a revolutionary effect on our banking system in this country, unless you deal with the whole banking system. I tried to point out to the hon. member that the Bank of Canada, as an intermediary financing organization, has 4.6 per cent of the total business, whereas the chartered banks have 29 per cent.

● (1740)

I do not think you can isolate the chartered banks from the Bank of Canada, nor does the hon. member for Témiscamingue. He constantly associated the two. I am trying to deal with the whole banking system, and this is a necessary part of any such discussion.

We have some very great concerns about the banking system in our country, and in the four or five minutes left to me I should like to deal with some of them. I am very much concerned with the fact that chartered banks in Canada, under the aegis of the Bank of Canada, seem to be involved in financing foreign takeovers of Canadian companies. At times it would seem easier to get a loan if you happen to represent a foreign company in this country than if you represent a Canadian company, given the same credit rating. This is one of our great concerns.

We have all seen examples of financing not being available to a Canadian company which was forced to sell out to a foreign company or corporation that in turn could immediately go to the same bank and successfully negotiate the financing of a similar project. This is the kind of thing that should be of concern to all Canadians.

We must also be concerned about the activity of foreign banks in Canada, to the extent that we are, in theory, trying to have a Canadian banking system that is all Canadian. What we have in fact is a whole system of near-banks moving into Canada, in one form or another, and in an obtuse sort of way taking over a great deal of the financing operations of the country. As Canadians we should be very concerned about this.

Let me conclude by referring to my last concern, and this is a concern I think which bothers most of us, including the hon. member for Témiscamingue. I have in mind the tremendous amount of capital, something like $100 billion, required to finance energy operations in Canada in the next 10 years. The Bank of Canada and chartered banks in Canada will have to play a much bigger role in this operation than they are playing at the present time. If we are to see projects undertaken similar to the James Bay development project in the future—and in that case we are talking about $12 billion, if we are to see projects undertaken such as an oil pipeline—here we are talking about $10 billion or $12 billion, and if we are to have the development of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, and in that case we would be talking about $6 billion or $8 billion, these things will have a tremendously distorting effect on our whole economy.

For instance, can you imagine the effect of $10 billion or $12 billion in American money invested in the province of Quebec, particularly the distorting effect in terms of what it would do to the Canadian dollar or the pulp and paper industry in this country? That industry is very sensitive to changes in the foreign exchange rate. When the value of the U.S. dollar increases, pulp and paper just do not sell.

These are some of the things about which we must be very disturbed, and it is time the Bank of Canada, the Canadian chartered banks, the financial institutions and insurance companies became very conscious of the role they play, in terms of making sure that when these energy expenditures are absolutely necessary they are made with Canadian dollars, and that when we get into energy services, this is an area—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The Chair has some doubt as to whether the hon. gentleman is going far afield in this debate as the bill in question deals only with a very small portion of the Bank of Canada Act. However, the time allotted to the hon. member has now expired.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): I have not had the opportunity to congratulate you, Madam Speaker, and I should like to do so now. It is nice to see someone of your wisdom and charm presiding over our meetings. Let me say that you grace the chair.

I am sure that the Leader of the Social Credit Party in putting forward Bill C-201 is making a serious attempt to do something for Canada by doing something about inflation. I have no doubt that the honourable member is a man of experience who knows something about money, knows what is good money and what is bad, and is not at all stupid. I understand he knows a good deal about investment.

In regard to this bill I do not think anyone can really estimate the true extent of the real credit of Canada. Let me suggest it is even more difficult to calculate our real credit worth than it is to say how much oil there may be in the ground either in Alberta, the Arctic or the Mackenzie Delta. We know the real estate value of Canada. We know what is in the banks and we can estimate fairly accurately the value of our current crops including our fisheries, agriculture, forestry and mining, but it is by no means an easy thing to calculate the real credit of Canada.

I feel that a philosophy of this political shade was not really tried, whether it be in Alberta or British Columbia, because those areas enjoyed a climate of prosperity, and the socreds ran things in an orthodox manner fiscally. I believe it is the intention of the sponsor of this bill to put forward a completely experimental idea. I am in favour of animal experimentation. I believe in the use of biological animals, to the extent that rabbits, dogs and white mice should be used for experimentation in an attempt to find some physiological way to assist medical science. On the other hand I do not believe that the people of Canada should be the guinea pigs for any experiment such as that embodied in this bill. I suggest it is purely experimental, and I see no reason why this should be foisted upon us by any group.

While I believe that the entire experience and wisdom of mankind are necessary to solve our present world troubles, particularly those associated with the world's inflationary cycle we are now experiencing anyone who would try to separate Canada from other countries in the world would not be doing Canada a kindness, even though he might have a very serious and patriotic concern or motivation.

I believe this bill is designed to fight inflation. If we regard it as such an attempt then we must return to the question: can we separate our Canadian inflation from world inflation? This bill is only for Canada. I think this bill would put us right down the drain if we were to adopt it. Let us see first of all whether we have any connection with the rest of the world so far as our inflation is concerned. It is very important for us to decide whether we agree or disagree upon this.

● (1750)

We know very well that inflation is beyond the complete reversal we would all like to see. I think it has been well demonstrated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), and by everything that has gone on in the last few years, that our fight against inflation really must be carried on in a very measured and methodical manner and not by the adoption of some experimental method of changing our banking system or our way of borrowing money.

In other words, we are completely interdependent, as has been mentioned by the Minister of Finance, with other countries of the world. We cannot separate our economies. We cannot afford to adopt some very different method of taxation, wage and price controls, or of banking which would place us apart from the rest of the world.

We need the other countries and they need us. I think this is the first thing we must admit. We cannot employ ways to fight inflation in Canada that would erode our prosperity. We are still prosperous. I do not think anyone would deny that.

I have had conversations with a member of the delegation which recently returned from Japan, and I had an opportunity to spend three days in Tokyo last January. I realize that Japan is going through a fairly difficult economic situation. However, it has more or less accepted this situation with open arms. The attitude of the people there is that certainly prices are up, but so are wages and profits. They realize this is a world-wide condition. They are not using any new-fangled ideas to fight the situation.

The Japanese are being careful in respect of their governmental expenses, just as we are here. They are attempting to live as closely as possible to their budget but they are not attempting to slow down inflation by increasing unemployment, and are not attempting to slow down the prosperity cycle.

I think it would be rather ridiculous for us in Canada to change our ideas when we have successfully, over the past three years, fought off inflation to the extent that we are doing better than almost any other country in the world. Here and there in respect of certain commodities some countries are doing better, but this relates to two or three commodities at the most. I am talking mainly about the United States of America.

We are in an extremely fortunate position with relation to inflation. This is because of the common sense attitude of the government. I think we would have been in a very sorry state had we brought in wage and price controls. I believe almost everyone on the opposite side of the House would admit that now. They are probably glad that this was not done. There has been a great deal of talk about it as a means of fighting inflation, but I think the common sense attitude of the Minister of Finance is the better approach; that is, to get people to realize that slowing down the economy would simply cause people to suffer and bring on more unemployment.

[Mr. Railton.]

We must increase our productivity not only in respect of farm, forest and mineral products but also in other fields. If we do these things and tighten our belts a little we can weather the storm. I think there are signs of that storm abating now. Although we have now, and will have for some months, increases in prices of certain commodities, I think we can all admit there will be a sort of flattening out onto a plateau instead of a steep rise over the next few months. It would seem to me that the common sense attitude of the world is bearing fruit.

I am glad to see the Minister of Finance selected as chairman of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund. I think that his common sense will be valuable and will enhance Canada's reputation, especially when it is remembered that here is a country with resources of all kinds which we cannot even compute, a country of small population, a country which does not push anyone around, and a country which wants to contribute as well as it can to the underdeveloped countries.

I believe it is very important that we make use of some of the financial opportunities we have. One opportunity I really wish to turn thumbs down on is the experiment in our monetary system that was talked about by the hon. member opposite. It would seem to me to be important to realize that Canada needs investment more than ever.

Canada does not have a great amount of money. Much of our private capital is invested in the United States of America. We should realize there are people clamouring for an opportunity to invest in our country. We might start with the U.K., France, Germany and Japan. Then there are the Arab oil countries which have had such great success in bringing money into their coffers. This money must be re-invested and recycled. I believe Canada is one of the best places for the Arabs to invest their money. Madam Speaker, I see it is six o'clock. I am sorry I have taken so long.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[English]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, POWERS OF INVESTIGATORS, OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an Act to amend an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, before our break at five o'clock I was saying that the government had introduced legislation with the concept of which few in this House would disagree. However, I feel that we in the opposition must assess the legislation to see whether it will in fact perform a useful function in increasing competition in the country. I gave certain background material, and I commented on the fact that while the government is proposing increased regulations with respect to such things as misleading advertising and misrepresentation, it does not seem to include its own activities for review in the same context.

I gave certain examples of federal government forms of advertising that I felt could be challenged and, in fact, may be challenged. Another would be the Canada Savings Bonds advertisements which refer to security, income and flexibility. In the current ads they say that for tax purposes the government of Canada proposes to permit taxpayers to treat cash bonus payments either as interest income or capital gains. They then go on to say that there will be certain exemptions from taxation.

I would point out to the House that they are referring to a possible budgetary measure that may be included in the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) some time between now and the middle of November. But is it fair to include that comment in an advertisement at present, knowing that the government could even be brought down before November 15? Surely members of the government learned a lesson when they were defeated on the last budget on May 9. Yet we find they have no compunction about including, in an ad for general readership in Canada, a suggestion that something is a fact when it is clearly only a possibility.

I should like to make a quick review of some of the steps that have led up to the bill before us today. In his opening remarks the minister referred to the interim report on competition policy put out by the Economic Council of Canada in July, 1969. I would point out to hon. members that it is very clear in chapter I of that report that it is in fact an interim report. It states:

> It is designated an interim document to indicate: (a) that further reports are to be issued, and (b) that these reports are likely to include further discussions of combines, mergers, monopolies and restraint of trade. The Council's next report will discuss patents, copyrights, trademarks and registered industrial designs. A fourth and final report will then be issued containing further observations and recommendations, notably on the subject of consumer affairs, and a general summing-up of the interrelations between the three main elements of Reference and their place in the broader spectrum of the government economic policies.

I feel that we might ask: have in fact further reports been issued by the Economic Council of Canada and, if not, why not? That question was put to Dr. Raynauld, present chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, earlier this month. I asked the following question in the Finance Committee:

> Have you prepared a further report on competition policy, which was prepared back in July, 1969? . . . what is your attitude to Bill C-2, which is the current version of the government's competition legislation, which, as you know, came out of the original study?
> DR. RAYNAULD: This is a good question. The problem is that I will have to decline because I think I am correct in saying that there has been no further report.

He then went on to say:

> On competition itself there have been no further reports . . . Since my appointment as Chairman of the Economic Council there has never been any mention that we would do further work in this particular field and, therefore, I have no view about the present bill which is before the House.

I mention that because surely it is odd that a minister and a government would refer to this report as often as they do, using it as a basis for the legislation that we have before us today, and yet the report on its face was an interim report, and when we ask the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada whether he has continued with further reports, he is almost startled by the question and admits that nobody even asked for further reports after the interim one was in hand.

As I mentioned earlier, the original bill that was introduced with respect to competition contained a stage I and a stage II. Stage II dealt with monopolies and combines. We are told that that legislation will be forthcoming. But it becomes a little confusing because the government tends to change ministers rather rapidly.

● (2010)

The hon. member who until recently was minister of consumer and corporate affairs, told us that stage II of the competition legislation would be in place by the end of this year. According to an interview carried in the Globe and Mail today, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has said that in no way will this be done. He is still talking and intends to talk to more businessmen. That shows the government's quandary in seeking the proper approach to competition in this country. The government itself does not know what to do. That is why this bill is premature; the government has no over-all perspective of what should be done with regard to competition policy.

As I said earlier, stage II of the legislation is in the wings. Presumably this bill, also, is subject to amendment by the minister at the committee stage. The minister ought to table those amendments forthwith. This afternoon he said he was willing to compromise. I have no idea what he means by that. If he wishes, let him make those compromises. Let us see how Bill C-2 will look, as he hopes, in its final form. Then the House can deal with it as it sees fit.

Last time a bill similar to this was given second reading and sent to committee, we found that some of its provisions which were to amend the Combines Investigation Act were subsequently to be amended by the anti-profiteering bill introduced in the last parliament, read the second time and sent to committee.

Mr. Stanfield: When is that coming back?

Mr. Stevens: Yes, when is the anti-profiteering bill coming back? The outspoken Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, according to an exclusive interview in the Financial Post, said that, after all, the anti-profiteering bill was a bit of window dressing. I suggest that more than the anti-profiteering bill is window dressing. The government's entire competition policy is window dressing.

Mr. Stanfield: Include its whole economic policy.

Mr. Stevens: Its economic policy is non-existent.

Let me refer again to the interim report of the Economic Council of Canada. On page 108 the council recommended:

—that before preparing new legislation embodying major changes in competition policy, the federal government should take the initiative in proposing that discussions of competition policy and related policies be arranged between the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and appropriate provincial ministers.

We are entitled to an explanation. Why does the government feel justified in acting on the basis of the interim report but, at the same time, ignoring the strong recommendations in that report calling on the government to consult with the provinces before legislating? Not only has the government failed to consult with the provinces; it has failed to consult effectively with business, industry, unions, farmers, and consumers. It ought to have consulted these groups before bringing forward this legislation.

I now wish to touch on the federal-provincial relations aspect of this bill and the constitutionality of some of its provisions. Proposed Part IV.1 raises difficult constitutional questions. In its report the Economic Council felt sufficiently uncertain about the creation of an administrative type of tribunal that it recommended a constitutional reference to resolve the doubt. If the legislation should be passed, it would be necessary to decide if proposed Part IV.1 is proper under the federal government's existing criminal law powers, under its trade and commerce powers, or under the peace, order and good government provisions of the British North America Act.

Mr. Lang: It is proper under all three.

Mr. Stevens: Proposed Part IV.1 does not appear to be concerned with criminal offences, in the sense that term has been traditionally described in our jurisprudence. There are many cases at the privy council level and at the supreme court level dealing with court interpretations of the federal government's trade and commerce power. These decisions do not provide much of a precedent for what is covered by proposed Part IV.1. Generally, they confirm the federal government's power to regulate the importation and interprovincial movement of commodities and, in turn, the provinces' lack of power to do so.

Proposed Part IV.1 is not confined to interprovincial agreements or marketing practices, and a long line of marketing cases sets the precedent that federal regulation under the trade and commerce power cannot be rationalized on the grounds that the subject matter has an interprovincial character.

That leaves us with the peace, order and good government power. This would be the court's last resort in trying to justify proposed Part IV.1 as being within federal competence. Therefore, as the powers to be given to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission form such an important part of this proposed legislation, it appears that much of the bill rests on a shaky constitutional basis.

Is that the way for the government to lay a foundation for competition policy in Canada? Would it not have been better to have had prior provincial consultation with a view to constitutional change, if necessary, in order to ensure a sound approach to those matters proposed under Part IV.1?

The extension of the Combines Investigation Act, as proposed in Bill C-2, into the service field would aggravate the problem which now exists with respect to the overlapping of federal and provincial regulatory laws. If the federal government wants to avoid embarrassments brought on by passage of this bill, it should make it clear that the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act which cover services will not apply if they conflict with provincial law.

British Columbia recently enacted a Trade Practices Act, and in Ontario there is Bill 55, the Ontario Business Practices Act. These acts cover fields similar to those covered by the provisions of proposed sections 36 and 37 in Bill C-2. It is unfortunate that the federal authorities did not co-ordinate their legislative program in this area with that coming under provincial jurisdiction. We do not need two sets of criminal sanctions to govern essentially the same type of behaviour.

Proposed sections 29.1 and 31.1 contain new enforcement and remedial provisions which have attracted considerable hostility, as the minister is no doubt aware. The first section mentioned would give an interim injuctive power, while the second would entitle an aggrieved party to recover damages arising out of the commission of a Part V offence with regard to a breach of a Restrictive Trade Practices Commission order. In both cases we have evidence of the unsatisfactory result obtained by trying to force a civil remedy into the tight confines of the criminal law.

A further constitutional problem arises with respect to the conferring of original trial criminal jurisdiction on the federal court which, until now, has been presumed to be a prerogative which belongs exclusively to the provinces. The main issue arises because of the conflicting provisions of the BNA Act, which may only be resolved through constitutional change.

This all shows that in bringing forward this bill the minister is taking us into uncharted waters. He mentioned earlier that the previous minister of consumer and corporate affairs had outlined certain features of this legislation at second reading but he did not elaborate on the details.

I do not intend to go into detail on what we said on second reading, but I think it is important that we reiterate some of the points made so effectively by the member who represented the riding of St. Paul's at that time. On March 13, 1974, he said as reported at page 484 of Hansard, that the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission would be creating:

—to all intents and purposes, a new, highly centralized agency which has the potentiality of interposing itself into a major segment of Canadian political and economic life... the bill will permit the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to alter or restructure market distribution systems in Canada in an unprecedented fashion.

We reiterate that point, Mr. Speaker. As reported at the same page he pointed out that decisions are delegated to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission under the bill. He stated that in his view the government would wrongfully be abdicating its own responsibilities to make policy decisions of this magnitude, and he asked that it reconsider vesting decision making of this sort in the commission and consider vesting it in the Governor in Council. We reiterate that request, Mr. Speaker.

At page 485 he pointed out that:

—the commission is left to make its own rules for the regulation of its proceedings and the performance of its duties and functions under the act.

Again we reiterate that. He also stated.

There are various classes of service industries which are exempted for one reason or another.

The largest and most important classes, the ones I have just referred to, that are controlled by provincial legislation at the present time, are unfortunately not exempted. This will cause confusion.

At page 486 he stated:

We think it is high time in Canada that the government applied anti-combines laws to the labour unions.

We would be most interested to hear from the minister precisely why he has persisted in exempting the labour unions from this type of competition legislation. Later he said, as reported on the same page:

—we believe the minister should at least provide an acceptable rationalization as to why the banks should continue to be treated differently, under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. This is a different and softer type of combines regime than exists for other financial institutions such as the trust companies and insurance companies.

I felt we should get this on the record once again, Mr. Speaker. Let me emphasize that the points raised in more detail by the hon. member at that time are reiterated today when considering this bill, as far as we are concerned. I would go further and say that we are concerned that the ambiguities contained in Bill C-2 may discourage aggressive business behaviour and create a climate of uncertainty which makes business planning difficult. It will place an unnecessary and undesirable economic burden on the community. Businessmen are naturally reluctant to make commitments when the laws which regulate their behaviour are not clear. The result is that desirable economic activities will likely be curtailed unless the rather ambiguous sections of the bill are clarified.

During the course of debate a number of specific suggestions will be offered by my colleagues. Let me state very briefly that we believe there should be clarification of such terms as "product", "business" of lending money, "unreasonably low", "widespread", "major supplier", "inadequate", "chances" of winning a prize in a promotional contest, and the distinction drawn between local and national advertisers. I am quoting directly from the bill, Mr. Speaker, and suggesting that these terms should be clearly defined.

There is the word "article" for instance. In its present context the word would cover shopping centres, making it a criminal offence to operate a shopping centre in this country. Is that the understanding and wish of the government? According to clauses 32(1)(c) and (d) and 38(6) it would appear to be an offence even to ask people to rent space in a shopping centre so long as the word "article" is not defined to make it clear that that type of operation is not included.

In another of his interviews with the press the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs stated he believes this legislation will not receive as much opposition as previous legislation because "businessmen are tired out". What a strange statement for a minister of the Crown to make! Someone suggests it is a bit like the Chinese water treatment where the philosophy apparently is that if you constantly wear away at them, somehow the public and the business community will throw up their hands and say, "What will be, will be".

Mr. Beatty: We are getting one drip after another from the government.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister forgot about the loyal opposition in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Speaking about appointments—and with my colleagues I have to congratulate the minister on his appointment—I think we must sometimes question the thinking of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he chooses a new minister.

Mr. Reynolds: He had to get him out of the Post Office.

An hon. Member: He has gone from triumph to triumph.

Mr. Stevens: When someone takes on a new post, Mr. Speaker, I think it is natural to take a fleeting glance at how he did in his old post. I would not mention this if it had not already been brought out in the brochure published by the Canadian Tax Foundation, entitled the National Finances 1973-74, where at page 211 we catch a glimpse of the business capabilities of the minister we have now as the Lord High Potentate of Commerce. In his one short year in the Post Office it went from a surplus of $6 million to a deficit of $75 million.

Mr. Gillies: That takes work.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, perhaps that is an indication of how it is determined who gets what portfolio in this government.

Mr. Reynolds: Wait until he is the minister of finance in the new year.

Mr. Stevens: Having pointed out some of the consequences if this legislation is passed, I should point out that it is particularly the small businessmen who will be hurt by the competition policy proposed by the government. They have been particularly hard hit already by the government's policies.

● (2030)

Although 60 per cent of the work force is employed in small business, we find that between 1962 and 1973 their employers' share of the national income fell from 10.7 per cent to 7.5 per cent. The fact is that this legislation would have extremely harmful effects on the business community, especially the small businessmen.

I mentioned earlier that the bill does not fit in with any overall industrial strategy. In fact, as we know, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) is unique; he takes great credit for having said that the government has no industrial strategy. I mention this because I believe the trade deficit with respect to manufactured articles sold for export is becoming alarming. In 1972 that deficit amounted to 1.5 billion. In 1973 it was $2.2 billion, and in the first half of this year alone it had risen to $2 billion. The only way this country is able to maintain a trade surplus is by selling off a like amount of natural resources.

If the minister is serious in saying this is a bill by which he hopes to catch big business in this country, he should be as good as his word and place a provision in the bill assuring it will not affect small businessmen with assets below a certain amount. Such a provision was included in the Foreign Investment Review Act passed by the last parliament, and I would recommend that a similar course be taken by the minister in any competition legislation he might bring forward.

I mentioned there was an absence of consultation with various sectors of our economy. I would suggest the government consider establishing a national industry and productivity council on a fully functional basis, with a working staff drawn from its own constituent components from government, both federal and provincial, business, industry and labour, and that its purpose be the co-ordination of an effective national industrial policy; that it formulate guidelines for the establishment, location and financing of new industry or the expansion of existing industry; that it provide for the elimination of uncoordinated and counterproductive development in the various regions of Canada; that it work toward the elimination of the atmosphere of confrontation which now exists between government, federal or provincial, management and labour; that it provide for the better equipping of Canadian industry to meet changing economic conditions and for the improvement of the rate of growth in productivity in both the private and the public areas.

This would be a worthwhile step for the government to take, and certainly would be more constructive than bringing in a piece of legislation which might be more harmful than helpful. Judging from the record of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I suggest it might be preferable if the corporate affairs part were switched to the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. This would ensure the services of a full-time minister of consumer affairs who would be able to devote all his energy to protecting the interests of the consumer.

There are others in my party who wish to speak. I have attempted to outline our thinking on this legislation. I am sure members who support the government are more than willing to give us ample opportunity to express further views concerning the legislation. After all, five bills have been passed in the last few days; surely they will not mind a few speeches concerning the bill now before us.

In conclusion, let me say that I think competition is a good thing. We in this House, and certainly the members of the party to which I belong, endorse competition.

Mr. Benjamin: What is that?

Mr. Stevens: However, we should not, in the name of increasing competition, put legislation on the statute books which is inequitable, which will have the effect of impairing competition and which will be poorly administered by such a body as the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the first thing that strikes me about the bill we are considering this evening is its title which reads: "An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an Act to amend an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code." It is also known, euphemistically, as the competition bill.

I should like to examine several questions, one of which asks what competition this bill purports to regulate? Is it competition between competitor and competitor? I suggest that the bill before us serves, in fact, to institutionalize the present situation of competition between buyer and seller, competitor and consumer. Here, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the Hansard reporters, each and every time I use the word "competitor" it should be placed in quotation marks.

Lest hon. members think I displayed a partisan bias in my initial remarks I would ask them to heed the comments made in a speech delivered by an advertising executive to a meeting of the Canadian Grocery Distributors Institute in Toronto in February, 1973. He said, and I quote:

> So what's so bad about industry co-operation? After all, your competitors aren't your enemies but your consumers are.

I suggest this was no accidental remark but rather an accurate indication of the mentality of most "competitors" in this "free enterprise" system. Another note to the Hansard reporters: each and every time I utter the words "free enterprise" in this speech, they too should be enclosed in quotation marks.

I am sure the government is well aware of the fact of which the advertising executive spoke. Having read this bill and all the related material, and having heard so much about the great "free enterprise" system, I am led to observe that it is indeed strange that corporations have to be legislated into making some token display of competition with each other. One would expect that by the very definition of "free enterprise" they would be just dying to compete. But that is not so. These so-called "competitors" have to be forced to compete with each other.

● (2040)

When this bill is not attempting to force "competitors" to compete, it is attempting to regulate the aggressive competition which actually exists; that is, the competition of the companies against the consumer. Unfortunately, the only people left in the dark as to the true situation are the Canadian consumers, who daily frequent the marketplace. This, to me, is one of the most reprehensible aspects of this bill—it only pretends to regulate, it does not actually regulate—and the consequent effect is to lull the Canadian consumer into a false sense of security.

In case this House thinks I am dabbling in rhetoric—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I am glad hon. members are applauding because I should like to deal with some of the specific measures which the government holds up to the public with the claim that they are beneficial. We have, for example, the practice of double ticketing. The bill will make it unlawful for a company to sell at other than the lower price of the double ticket. Yet the bill will not prohibit what the Food Prices Review Board, in its report of November 1973, described as the "accepted business practice of revaluing inventories as prices change".

Clearly, the thrust of this legislation should not merely be one of warning the companies that they have to clean up their up front operations, not, of course, unless the government agrees that it is the consumer who is competing with the companies, in which case maintaining the companies' freedom to overprice inventories under the counter rather than over the counter is most consistent.

Let us look at another provision of the bill which, for the life of me, I cannot believe is actually seriously proposed by the government. That is the amendment which would provide the right of action to individuals who suffer as a result of conspiracy on the part of companies. Well, I would suggest to the government that all individuals suffer as a result of conspiracy on the part of companies, and that what is needed is a provision for class actions, not individual actions.

Let us take the example of our three major sugar importers, Atlantic, Redpath and St. Lawrence, who were convicted of price fixing back in 1963. All three companies were fined and placed under a restraining order to prevent future collusion. Yet these three companies are back in court again.

It is my understanding that the prosecutor has estimated the cost to the Canadian consumer of the price fixing activities of the companies at somewhere in the neighbourhood of $125 million between 1960 and 1973. I would suggest—and I am not commenting on the present trial one way or the other—that if this is so and the companies are again convicted, and some rough determination of the bilking yield is made, then it ought to be possible for consumers as a class to demand that their moneys be returned to them, and the fines levied should equal the amount bilked from the public by the price fixers.

I wonder about the sincerity of the government's intentions when it pretends to expect an individual to go about the business of attempting to figure out the dollars he may have lost to the sugar companies over 13 years and then attempt to sue on an individual basis.

Let us take this issue to its logical conclusion. If the government seriously believed that in cases of conspiracy the individual consumer would pursue his right to take the companies to court, what would they propose to do with the resulting glut of court cases? Can we picture, for instance, every individual household head first figuring out what he is owed, and then all proceeding to court at the same time? It boggles the mind somewhat. Obviously it does not boggle the corporate mind; they do not have to worry.

If I view the lack of competition between companies as alarming, there is something I find even more alarming, and that is the government's failure to deal with vertical integration of huge companies. Let me give yet another illustration of the manner in which "competitors" engage in competition, not with other "competitors" but with the consumer. The outstanding example is the George Weston Limited company which, in its annual report, calls 1973 "a gratifying year". And well it might be gratified with after tax profits standing at $34.6 million, an increase of 86 per cent over 1972.

The consumer might be deceived into thinking that the Weston company is in a deathlock competition with other manufacturers of food goods. But in fact George Weston Limited is in competition mainly with George Weston Limited.

A quick survey of some of its "competitors" reveals nothing more than a long list of its own subsidiaries, which include some of the biggest, best known and most powerful food manufacturing companies in Canada. There are, for example, Weston Bakeries Limited, the largest bakery in Canada; Weston Foods; McCormicks; William Nielson Limited; British Columbia Packers, Canada's largest fish processor; Connor Brothers Fisheries; Somerville Industries Limited; Westfair Foods; Kelly, Douglas and Company; and of course the Loblaw group. Then there is National Grocers, Atlantic Wholesalers, B.C. Packers with subsidiaries of its own, including Nelson Brothers and Rupert's Certi-Fresh Foods. We then have Connor Brothers, with its subsidiaries W. H. Welch Limited and Lewis, Conners and Sons Limited, plus a host of other associated companies.

What does this mean when the consumer walks into a grocery store, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: That the price is right.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, the price is right for George Weston. Let me use salmon as an example. The consumer is confronted by an overwhelming array of brand names, a few of which are the following: Carnation, Universal, Surf, Ferndale, Overwaitea, Rose Marie, Red Rose, Pine Tree, High Seas, Sea Lord, Silverline, Fraser Gold, Swallow, Clipper, Tip Top, Streamline, Sea Trader, Queen Charlotte, A & P, Clover Leaf, Maple Leaf, Paramount, Laguna, Sea-Gift, Robin Red, Loblaws and Thunderbird.

But, Mr. Speaker, the confusion does not end there. There is cohoe and keta, sockeye and whitespring. Then there is red salmon or pink salmon, minced or creamed salmon. Then you have a choice of trying to figure out the per ounce price of, would you believe, cans that contain either 15 ounces or 15½ ounces, three and three quarter ounces or seven and three quarter ounces. Why three quarters of an ounce, Mr. Speaker? But let me not digress into another area that is badly in need of this kind of government legislation.

Little does the consumer know, as he or she struggles to determine the per ounce price of the different brands and can sizes, that it does not really matter what brand is purchased—the money is going into the same pocket, in this instance the George Weston superpocket. What does this piece of legislation do to encourage competition? Can this government show me one element of the competition bill which encourages competition in the salmon industry?

Further, the Economic Council of Canada, in its report on competition policy of July, 1969, concluded that in many areas of activity "monopolistic tendencies have all but eliminated competitive market responses." For a long time the food industry was not as intensely monopolized as it is today. Today we find farmers being driven off the land as agribusiness takes over. Farmers' markets used to flourish, as well as door to door food selling, but they have been rapidly replaced by supermarket selling. At one time there were numbers of local cheese factories across this country; now there is only Kraft.

I realize that the minister has promised a review of this legislation with particular reference to an examination of the more fundamental questions which arise in a study of the structural characteristics of our economy. However, I suspect that Bill C-2 is an indicator of what will come in the second stage of the legislation.

● (2050)

I note from this morning's Globe and Mail that the minister intends to initiate extensive discussion with business, of course, before the introduction of the second stage of the legislation can be expected. The minister said, and I quote:

I don't want to bulldoze the second phase because it comes to the crunch of business philosophy. It is an entirely new approach.

It is not so new, I think, Mr. Speaker, especially when I note the minister's comments in this morning's edition of the Gazette in respect of his views on the anti-profiteering bill. The minister is reported as having said:

I have to make it quite clear that I hope this bill will never be used.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: The best is yet to come. He is reported as having said:

I consider it as an instrument that the government ought to have, and no more. We need it, for example, for the Food Prices Review Board. If Mrs. Plumptre were to make recommendations pointing out clearly instances of abuse, the government does not have any instrument or any leverage to act. I think we need it as a sort of show-case. Can I use the word window-dressing? We should have this bill for that reason. I really do not want to use it, or look forward to using it, because I have no objection to profits.

It is fairly obvious that when the government removed one minister, putting him in the backbenches, and brought forward this minister it was very much like digging a hole to fill a hole. I think this minister communicates more with the people; his kind of people—the corporate people.

I realize that we are talking here about the competition bill and not the anti-profiteering bill but I suggest that the minister's comments bespeak the mentality of the government in any legislation it undertakes which might protect the consumer from the "competitors."

Let me again refer to the minister's comments in the Globe and Mail. I note he feels that the trend of low fines for combines offences in the past is not a problem of law but, according to him, "a problem of our attitude". He goes on to elaborate that Canadians are not yet accustomed to seeing large fines or jail sentences for these kinds of offences. What a masterful piece of double talk that is!

If Canadians are not accustomed to seeing large fines or jail terms handed out for offences causing suffering to the consumer I suggest it is the fault of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

This leads me to another area of doubt about this bill. The basic legislation has been around for a long time, but I note that the Restrictive Trades Practices Commission has not been noted for its in-department vigour. For instance, by law that commission is to have three members, but the number has gradually dwindled to one. I note as well that in 1970-1971 the commission spent only 41 per cent of its budget; in 1971-72 it spent only 61 per cent, and again in 1972-73 only 61 per cent of its budget was spent.

It is amazing that one of the few commissions holding a clear responsibility to protect the consumer and save the consumer dollars, engages in saving taxpayer dollars put aside for that purpose. Well might the minister lament the lack of exemplary fines and jail sentences for offenders. His department and the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission are obviously at fault in showing a lack of example in initiative to the rest of the country.

To sum up, this bill with all its complexities does not propose any measure that a self-respecting corporation could not circumvent. Any corporation in this country worth its salt could circumvent any one of the provisions of this bill.

As far as my party is concerned, there ought to be two principles involved when a sincere government sets about to bring forward competition legislation. Firstly, monopolistic control over production, distribution and marketing of goods and services should never be permitted and, secondly, the government must intervene in the marketplace to provide consumers with goods of quality at reasonable prices. This bill does not even remotely approach these principles.

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill I should like to congratulate the minister on his appointment and for his fine speech this afternoon. The minister once again has demonstrated his competence and his knowledge, and in the very early opportunity he has had he once again has demonstrated his approach and intellect in meeting the complexities of this legislation.

Tonight we heard a lengthy address by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) regarding this bill. He spent very little time dealing with the bill itself, but carried us forward to a variety of topics, including a general discussion about the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The hon. member referred by some striking financial sleight of hand to the number of complaints received by the department, and then went on to divide the number of complaints into the amount of money spent on the entire consumer services of the department, some $17.5 million, telling the House that this was the total cost of all complaints received in any one year since the department was formed. The hon. member obviously drew this figure from the 1974-75 estimates covering a variety of activities, of which approximately $1 million represents expenditures by the branch which looks after consumer education, information and complaints.

I noticed that the hon. member was not content with referring the House to these striking observations, but also told the citizens of Toronto at a meeting of a chapter of the Institute of Chartered Accountants the same story. I assume that when one reflects on that point raised in that part of the hon. member's speech one can judge the merit of the rest of it.

Again the hon. member referred to a number of problems he foresaw during this parliament, including that in respect of "a brutal majority," to use his colourful words. I suggest this is a strong phrase to use to describe what is only a moderate majority, but one which I think the Canadian people are gratified to see on this side of the House.

The hon. member referred to the fact that in this competition bill, again to use his colourful words, "we are sailing through uncharted waters". We have heard the minister's comments and we are aware of the endless references in this House to this whole area of competition policy since 1966 when it was introduced by the economic council in its report, reiterated in various pieces of legislation, and again only in the last session in the legislation which received second reading and went to the committee.

Once again this bill has been introduced. Once again the public is to be given the opportunity, both consumers and business organizations, to bring their points of view before the committee. Surely that could hardly be described as uncharted waters.

There were some points of substance raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, but they were in what might be termed a derivative fashion since he drew a melancholy note in respect of the words of the former hon. member for St. Paul's who is no longer with us. Unfortunately the people of St. Paul's did not choose to return that particular member, but his words will be immortalized in the Hansard of the thirtieth parliament thanks to the contribution of the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

The minister, in his comments on this bill, did not choose to reiterate in complete detail each and every policy that is contained in the bill because this is all familiar to members of the House. It is hoped when the committee deals with it, and deals with it hopefully expeditiously, this long planned competition policy for Canada will be made into law.

I think there are a great many Canadians who have seen defects in the previous legislation, in the draft bill which was introduced. I happen to be one of those who found a considerable number of defects in the original draft legislation which was brought into this House, but the bill we have before us this evening is one which, on almost every count, is bringing Canadians a first-class competition policy.

Instead of bulldozing a policy through the House the previous minister and the minister before that introduced a draft bill, and allowed the most elaborate possible type of consultation. Out of that elaborate consultation was derived a bill which can now come before parliament without fear that it will be a disservice to the Canadian people.

During the previous committee stage certain proposed amendments were introduced. Some were of a minor or technical nature. Some dealt with specific wording such as the hon. member for York Simcoe asked be considered. I hope these amendments will reappear. I hope that perhaps some others might reappear as well. Most of them are of a minor or technical nature dealing with anomalies in particular spheres of industry which were not contemplated at the time the bill was drafted.

I find it curious that the hon. member for York Simcoe does not want amendments introduced, wants all the amendments introduced today, does not want the bill to receive any positive treatment at the committee stage, and does not want any reaction to contributions made by industrial, business or consumer groups.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) made a speech containing some extremely fishy references and long lists of products. However, I did find one clause of the bill on which he reflected where I too share his dissatisfaction, although I do not think for quite the same extreme reason. I do not find the clause in respect of double ticketing a particularly effective one to be introduced into such an important blueprint for the competition policy of this country.

I hasten to say that I do not support the practice that is known as double ticketing by retail food stores. I think those stores have given their undertaking in this regard, and are not practicing this unfair form of behaviour. In any event I do not think this is a particularly appropriate clause to introduce in a bill of this scale. As the hon. member pointed out, it really does not deal with the question of the revaluing of inventories. I think very few members of this House would suggest that at no time should there be no ability on the part of businesses or industry to revalue their inventories.

Apart from that, I do not think this particular clause deals with the revaluing of inventories but rather deals with a particular practice of a grocery company finding additional stickers on a package and then not choosing to award the customer the lowest of the particular prices. My objection first is that I do not think it is broad enough or important enough to place in a bill of this dimension. Second, I think this often is brought about inadvertently by companies handling hundreds of thousands of items. It might be that every day by accident they are committing this particular offence. To that, extent, and that extent only, would I support some of the comments made by the hon. member for Nickel Belt. I wish to say, however, I believe the Canadian people are aware now that parliament intends to introduce a piece of competition policy that will suit this country and be more akin to the type of advanced concepts in other nations. I suggest that time has arrived. I also suggest I do not believe it will require "a brutal majority", the description used by my hon. friend. I think this bill, its concept, and the amendments which may be made in committee and reintroduced in this House will commend themselves, and I trust will soon be made into law for the benefit of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say a few words on Bill C-2 dealing with combines and especially the little gimmicks used by small companies to inflate or fix prices in order to sell their products at higher prices.

In my opinion, this bill does not go far enough. I commend the minister for introducing a bill which will enable Canadians to control this sector of the economy. This bill amends the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and repeals the act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. Everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, that the Bill C-2 does not go far enough and leads nowhere. When one thinks that financiers may decide at any time to go into a combine without the knowledge of the government, in order to control prices and make profits! Let us take for example the price of fabrics. Imported fabrics are paid 45, 60 or 65 per cent more than the purchase price. Five, six, seven or ten national or international companies have agreements with import companies, and what is paid $2.10, Mr. Speaker, sells for $9, $10, $12 or $15 to the consumer. Section 3 of the bill, on page 31A, reads as follows:

(3) No dealer shall refuse to sell or supply an article or commodity to any other person for the reason that such other person

(a) has refused to resell or to offer for resale the article or commodity

(i) at a price specified by the dealer or established by agreement,

Mr. Speaker, because of provisions before sub-paragraph (ii), chances are we will be all wrapt up in details while trusts will profiteer at the expense of the consumers.

(ii) at a price not less than a minimum price specified by the dealer or established by agreement,

(iii) at a markup or discount specified by the dealer or established by agreement,

(iv) at a markup not less than a minimum markup specified by the dealer or established by agreement, or

(v) at a discount not greater than a maximum discount specified by the dealer or established by agreement; . . .

Mr. Speaker, they all finish with the expression "agreement" or "establish by agreement", by a group of importers who are often ignored by the government because they are too dissimilar. And yet, many firms import and offer on their shelves consumer products whose prices have been increased by 500, 600 or even 700 per cent. I feel that this bill is not going far enough and I congratulate the minister for introducing this bill at this time. In my opinion, however, it would have been necessary, before introducing such a bill, to seek the advice of departmental officials in order to go even further.

Mr. Speaker, let me quote sub-paragraph (b):

(b) has resold or offered to resell the article or commodity

(i) at a price less than a price or minimum price specified by the dealer or established by agreement,

(ii) at a markup less than a markup or minimum markup specified by the dealer or established by agreement, or

(iii) at a discount greater than a discount or maximum discount specified by the dealer or established by agreement.

(4) Every person who violates subsection (2) or (3) is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable on conviction . . .

Mr. Speaker, we ought to know who will determine which, the consumer or the buyer, is liable of a criminal offense. For the moment, we are speaking of an act qualified as criminal under the Criminal Code, that is increasing the price of a given item by means of a coalition. Mr. Speaker, the importer or the vendor can, under the terms of this bill, form a coalition or come to an agreement on the sly, to make big profits the department cannot because a bi-, tri- or other partite agreement is made.

To my mind, this bill is not far-reaching enough. That is why we feel the minister in charge of the matter should, as early as tomorrow, make changes in the bill or at least ask his officials to change the question of tri-partite agreements in relation to imports or exports, to fix prices as mentioned in the bill.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

● (2110)

[English]

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker what the bill before us attempts to achieve is basically reform in two areas. The first is that area generally referred to as consumer protection. The various provisions in this area have been discussed in the House today and when the previous bill was debated on second reading in March of this year. Briefly speaking, these provisions cover the subjects of misleading advertising, bait and switch selling, pyramid selling, referral selling, the professional sports provisions, and resale price maintenance to an extent. At the moment, most of these are still within the criminal law framework; they are in the form of prohibitions to violations to which penalties will attach.

These various subjects were discussed at great length at the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices. It was one of the recommendations of that special committee that these aspects of the earlier competition bill be brought forward at the earliest opportunity, and I assume that the re-introduction of this bill is in response to a general feeling in the country that these undesirable trade practices require regulation.

It is generally the position of our party that those provisions, with a few technical exceptions, are desirable and should be expeditiously enacted into law in this way to assist the consumer who, at this time, is confronted by the ravages of a runaway inflation and spiralling cost of living, and therefore is in need of any protective mechanisms which we as a parliament are in a position to supply.

On the other hand, this bill contains another whole area which creates a new civil jurisdiction in the form of a restrictive trade practices commission which will become, for all intents and purposes, a powerful new judicial or quasi-judicial tribunal. While replacing the criminal jurisdiction with civil jurisdiction in this area of the law is probably desirable, I think it will be acknowledged on both sides of the House that there are thereby created potential problems which pertain to the sweeping nature and extent of the powers to be given to the restrictive trade practices commission by the legislation before us. To a certain extent the power given to the commission is discretionary and, to a certain extent, it is power given to a tribunal in this country which may fairly be said to be unprecedented.

Despite disclaimers to the contrary there are problems about the scope and the extent of a so-called right of appeal from this tribunal which may continue to cause considerable concern to a great many people.

There are also problems relating to the procedures to be followed by that tribunal. The bill before us refers to certain practices which will be subject to review by the restrictive trade practices commission, practices which the government has itself acknowledged may in some circumstances be desirable, which may be permitted by the commission and, in other situations and other circumstances, may be considered undesirable and subject to a prohibitive order of that tribunal. The powers of the commission in this respect are civil and discretionary in their application.

The bill before us involves fundamental philosophical considerations of a political, legal, economic and federal-provincial nature. To all intents and purposes it creates a new, highly centralized agency which has the potential of interposing itself into a major segment of Canadian political and economic life. Affecting matters within both federal and provincial jurisdiction, the legislation will permit the restrictive trade practices commission to alter or restructure market distribution systems in Canada in an unprecedented fashion.

This is major legislation and deserves careful scrutiny and a full and informed debate, not only by members of this House but by the many consumer groups, business interests and provincial governments who will be directly affected by its provisions.

By this legislation a restrictive trade practices commission has had effectively delegated to it the power to make decisions which can have a fundamental policy impact on relations between sovereign countries, and which could adversely affect Canada's foreign trade or external relations. By so doing the government will be abdicating its own responsibilities to make policy decisions of this magnitude.

I strongly urge that the government reconsider delegating in this way decision-making power of this magnitude to the commission, and consider vesting it in the governor-in-council, in the same fashion that it does in making decisions to reduce tariffs or in making decisions respecting the so-called "significant benefit" provision under the Foreign Investment Review Act.

The powers of the restrictive trade practices commission in this area should be limited to making recommendations to cabinet, but let us not have any abdication of responsibility on fundamental questions of economic policy. The Canadian public are entitled to know what the government of Canada will do about the implementation of a foreign law that may affect our external trade or foreign relations. This responsibility is appropriately the government's and it ought not to shift this responsibility to a commission such as the restrictive trade practices commission.

The point, Mr. Speaker, is not who is right or wrong in a particular case. The issue is who should be the responsible body for conducting our affairs with other countries with whom our trade and investment connections provide an infinite series of effects and counter-effects vis-à-vis each other. It is truly an astounding proposal that a responsible government would see fit to turn over in this way, even on a limited basis, such power to an appointed, independent body having no general responsibility for the conduct of relations between Canada and other countries.

Let us now turn to a review of some of the powers which it is proposed will be granted to the restrictive trade practices commission. Take first the far-reaching power to review instances of refusals to sell a product and to order a supplier to supply or to recommend tariff changes.

The implementation of this power may have a radical impact on the nature of distribution systems for products in Canada totally inconsistent with the real economic and structural facts of life in this country. The provision puts the onus on the seller to justify his distribution system when he is called before the commission. Why not follow the ordinary principles inherent in our judicial system in this country, and place the onus on the director of investigation and research who brings the initial application to establish at least a prima facie case of inadequate competition?

It is simply not true to say that in all cases or even in most cases a refusal to sell is equivalent to inadequate competition; however, the temptation to draw this conclusion for the commission could lead to serious abuses. This provision raises serious questions and has serious implications for various franchise systems, the practice of private branding, off-shore suppliers and technical servicing requirements.

This criticism applies equally to the exclusive agency and tied sales provisions. Today a manufacturer can sign an agreement with a distributor requiring the distributor to promote and sell only his products. To both parties the common business sense of this is obvious. The seller gets a distributor with a strong interest in promoting his products. The distributor is ensured his efforts will not be expropriated by someone else.

If the commission gets under way, however, by defining a product restrictively it could, in the case of a car dealership, for example, result in a Volkswagen dealer getting an order allowing him to break his contracts of exclusivity and, at the same time, an order against Toyota and General Motors requiring them to supply him with cars. The result would be bad for the three manufacturers because of decreased sales efforts, bad for the consumer because of the dealer's probable inability to service three makes of cars, and no doubt eventually bad for the other dealers, one, or more, or all of whom could very well end up going out of business.

The net result would be less competition, not more, even though there might appear to be a short-term benefit. I would have hoped that the minister would provide a fuller explanation of what he is trying to achieve and how he justifies the means that he has adopted.

I also suggest to the minister that there are procedural problems and questions which must be raised in connection with the powers that are to be granted to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. To leave a commission of this sort free to make its own rules for the regulation of its proceedings and the performance of its duties and functions may well lead to uncertainty and arbitrariness in proceedings before the commission, problems which could easily be overcome through specifying certain minimum procedural protections in the legislation itself.

The act should spell out in relation to persons who might be called before the commission the right to reasonable notice of the hearing, the right to call and examine witnesses and to cross-examine other witnesses, the right to reasonable adjournments of the hearing and, finally and perhaps most important, the right to a written decision with reasons. I suggest further that the minister should consider carefully whether there is a need for a substantive right of appeal to the courts from an order of the restrictive trade practices commission.

I am instinctively suspicious and skeptical when it is explained to me that a right of appeal on the merits is denied Canadians on the grounds that the decision-making tribunal possesses special expertise or sophistication which has been denied to or is lacking in the judiciary of this country. That explanation is sheer nonsense. The members of our judiciary are trained and competent to hear and determine on appeal questions of law and fact determined by any quasi judicial or judicial tribunal in this country, however complex may be the facts and issues involved.

It must simply be made incumbent upon the restrictive trade practices commission to articulate clearly and precisely in written form the factual situation and the law applied to the factual situation by it in arriving at its conclusions affecting the rights of Canadians.

Returning to the consumer protection provisions dealing with such matters as misleading advertising, bait and switch-selling, untrue or misleading warranties and pyramid selling, there are a few matters of principle which I would urge the minister to consider. Why, for example, has the government eliminated the defence of honest mistake under those sections? In moving from the credulous man test to the general impression test, why did the government consider it necessary to propose in new section 36(5) to insert a literal meaning test as well? Why does the government exempt printers and publishers from misleading advertising prosecutions but not broadcasters?

To what extent, if at all, has there been consultation with provincial governments which possess jurisdiction to introduce their own legislation on warranties and testimonials and the other objectionable practices mentioned? What potential for conflict with provincial legislation exists in the absence of consultation, thus causing uncertainty and confusion for those engaged in commercial activity? Or is this simply another example of the propensity of the government to substitute confrontation for consultation in its dealings and relations with the governments of the provinces of Canada.

In considering the far-reaching powers to be granted by this legislation to the restrictive trade practices commission, I reiterate the hope expressed by my former colleague, Ron Atkey, that all members of this House will ask themselves the question whether all the provisions of the legislation before us, affecting as they do in such a sweeping and arbitrary fashion the rights and freedoms of Canadians, are really necessary.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, this piece of proposed legislation has a long history, as detailed by previous speakers. Originally it was introduced as Bill C-256. The minister of the day, who is now Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Basford), ran into heavy opposition from the business community and the bill never got off the ground. Then, after the election in 1972 and a change of ministers, we saw another approach to combines legislation under a new minister. We examined the legislation, then Bill C-227. That became, eventually, Bill C-7, and now we call it Bill C-2. Really, the only thing that has changed is the number on the face of the bill.

• (2130)

First we had the Economic Council of Canada study in 1966, then the clean sweep approach with Bill C-256, and its appropriate reintroduction in 1972. Next we had an election, and a new minister with the slightly different approach of breaking the proposed legislation into two or three pieces as in Bill C-227 and Bill C-7. That meant debate, hearings, committee meetings, and finally we had another election, another new minister, more press releases, more debates, more hearings and so and so forth.

I do not like to say this, Mr. Speaker, but I was not impressed with the minister in his previous portfolio. In view of his dismal performance as postmaster general I thought he would have taken a different approach to this bill, and either have tabled all the amendments he proposed, or have brought in an amended bill with the changes that arose from the previous meetings and briefs on this proposed legislation.

We have before us now for second reading Bill C-2 that is identical to Bills C-227 and C-7. And we have the minister's press statement that he has numerous amendments to present in committee. Why do we not have these before us now, Mr. Speaker? Why do we not have at least a list of the proposed amendments? The minister cannot say why he has not presented them. He certainly has had enough time and, with his vastly increased budget and staff, he should have the people and the resources to prepare an amended bill. His former cabinet colleague, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), left behind a mountain of testimony and comment.

I wonder why the minister has chosen to bring in the same bill. Knowing the difficulties of combines legislation I would have thought he would have previewed for the business community the broad outline of the total objectives of the proposed competition legislation.

We have phase I before us, and the minister discussed a little of phase II with the press but he says it is a long way off—some time in 1975. Then, of course, we have the anti-profiteering bill which, according to what I read in the press, will have a few changes but the same general thrust as before.

All these bills or phases will be amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. I think the business community has a right to know where they are heading and what ground rules they will have to work with in the future. It is time we all knew where we are heading. We found, for instance, that some provisions of Bill C-7 were in conflict with the anti-profiteering provisions presented in Bill C-29. Both bills were amendments to the anti-combines legislation. In fact, Bill C-29 amended Bill C-7 before it had passed second reading.

I notice the minister is quoted as saying he does not intend amendments to the Combines Investigation Act to become the instrument of the government to fight inflation, and he regrets it was ever identified as that. We could go through the record of the twenty-ninth parliament and see that dozens of times hon. members and ministers referred to the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act as part of the government's anti-inflation measures.

In fact the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made several references to this during the twenty-ninth parliament, stating that the proposed changes were part of his anti-inflation program. It is refreshing then for the minister to admit that he does not intend the anti-combines legislation to become the instrument of the government to fight inflation. I commend the minister for being frank.

The bill before us is a bit of a non entity in that it is a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act. The minister has amendments to amend the amendments to the act. Will the amendments change the fundamental nature of the bill? I think we have a right to know, and that is why members on this side of the House have been asking the question. It is not good enough that we sit here and just wait for amendments in committee. We are concerned that the amendments may change the fundamental nature of the bill, and I think the business community should be informed of the full impact of the legislation.

We are concerned too about the imbalances in the bill, and there are several. We note the lack of appeal against the decisions of the restrictive trade practices commission through the provincial courts. We have concern that we will be giving to the commission the authority to regulate Canadian business under civil law, but with powers of criminal law to enforce those regulations with no right to appeal. We will want some pretty clear discussions and definitions when we get to committee stage.

Many concerns have been expressed over the "refusal to sell" provisions in the bill. The impact on existing distribution systems in Canada will be dramatic, to say the least, if the bill is passed without amendment. It is not an offence under the proposed bill to refuse to sell, but it is subject to review by the restrictive trade practices commission. This places a cloud over the heads of those people in the distribution chain. We will want to have very clear guidelines so that the business community may operate openly, without the question or threat of a government board or commission interfering in their commercial affairs, and the frustration of not having the right to appeal a decision of the commission to the courts.

Through this legislation the minister wants to blanket business with additional restrictions, but at the same time wants to exempt certain groups. Banks are generally exempted from the provisions in the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. We ask why, Mr. Speaker? Why should they not be covered in the competition legislation? We do not accept the premise that they can be covered adequately by the Inspector General for Banks, who has neither the staff nor the time for that. We do not feel that through this device we should build another bureaucracy to control the banks when there is already that framework within the combines bill.

We notice that the labour unions are exempt from this provision. I realize it is probably not a political thing to say now, but in Hamilton we have a situation where a union has blackballed an entertainment establishment to the point that the proprietor cannot hire live entertainers. This is not the appropriate place to discuss the matter I know, but should both parties not be covered under the law so that they can resolve or settle the matter? On one side the union has caused economic loss by blackballing or delisting the proprietor, and on the other side the proprietor has obviously grieved the union local and the losers are the entertainers.

● (2140)

The new advertising provisions exempt the federal government itself and its agencies, many of which are in that business. Take, for example, the CNR. For several years the CNR has been transporting Canadians as passengers in baggage cars, yet they advertise on the Toronto to Windsor run "Go CNR and Arrive Happier". I submit that a person cannot sit on the floor of a baggage car and arrive happier, regardless of how short the trip might be. When I pursued this matter with the TH & B, which also transports passengers from Hamilton to Buffalo in baggage cars, I was told the railway companies only guarantee passage; they do not guarantee a seat. I say this is false advertising but as I read the bill before us the CNR, at least, would be exempt from action either under its provisions or under other existing legislation.

There are those in Canada who would question whether the advertising of Canada's savings bonds as "safe and secure" is entirely ethical when one considers the net loss in purchasing power of these bonds.

The same applies to the perpetual bonds which sell for 25 per cent of their face value and pay about 3 per cent interest on which bond holders pay tax. I question very seriously whether the government should advertise such bonds as "safe and secure". In my view, if we are to apply the advertising rule to the commercial world, we should apply it to government agencies as well.

I see, incidentally, the Olympic coins being marketed as belonging to a limited edition. The minister was on the committee which discussed this matter. He probably remembers the meeting—at which we sat until two o'clock in the morning before having a long, informal discussion outside the West Block with the then president of the treasury board, now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury).

When the coinage bill was before parliament, hon. members on the government side did not want a limit placed on the number of coins that could be minted. They wanted the issue to be wide open. But now—and this is somewhat ironic—they market the coins as being from "a limited edition by act of parliament". Yet it was only because of an amendment put forward by the official opposition, and accepted by the minister, that a limit was fixed. Even so, I suggest that $450 million worth of coins is hardly what comes to mind as being a limited edition. I might add, though, that I bought some of these coins and helped to sell them to my friends. So I do my bit for the Olympics.

I do not take issue with the basic principle of the bill. We want companies to operate in a market that is as free and competitive as possible. We want the consumer to enjoy a good selection of products at competitive prices and in price ranges to suit his need. We do not want to see the consumer misled or duped, or see him the victim of pyramid sales, or tied sales, or referral sales, or of any of the questionable practices adopted by persons who operate on the borderline of business ethics and morality. This portion of the bill I support, and I am sure everyone in our party supports the consumer side of the legislation.

But we point out that the bill embodies certain questionable limitations. By seeking to exempt the government's departments, banks, labour unions and marketing boards from its provisions, the bill would eliminate a great many people engaged in commercial activities who are in a position to abuse the consumer and create an imbalance in the commercial endeavours of the business community.

If we pass laws like this, they should apply to everyone. I cannot suggest too strongly that the minister should produce a paper, be it any colour he wishes, white, green or yellow, setting forth in clear language the aims of his department as they pertain to business.

The businessman is already confused, to say the least, by the ever-increasing intrusion of government into business. He must comply with a tax act which he cannot interpret. He is affected by tariff regulations which are constantly changing. He is inundated by demands for reports from various government departments. He is being asked to produce more, to increase supplies, to work harder to improve productivity, to pay more taxes, to try to beat inflation, and to contribute more toward unemployment insurance premiums while he finds it difficult to hire adequate staff. And now he sees a restrictive trade practices commission looming on the horizon, a body which will be independent of the government, a body which will have the power to make its own regulations and from whose rulings there will be no appeal.

If the minister really wants to help the small businessman in Canada, and consumers as well, he might ponder means by which we can prevent United States commercial interests from making agreements with offshore manufacturers to supply not only the American market but the Canadian market as well.

Over the years I have talked to hundreds of young business people who found that the distribution of an important product which is sold in Canada was tied up by a United States business concern. In the final analysis, the consumer usually pays more because there is another profit step to be taken into account.

There is the famous—or should I call it the infamous—case of Mr. Harry Dunnett of Burlington, a small businessman who distributed musical instruments. This man started his business from scratch and did quite well. Unfortunately for him, after a few months one of his major offshore suppliers would not sell him any more of his products. He was at a loss to know why. He had sold all the supplies he could get from that particular producer and had paid for all his orders in advance.

Eventually, he found that a United States company, a large public corporation, had approached his supplier and told him they wanted Mr. Dunnett's supply cut off and their wholly owned Canadian subsidiary appointed as the exclusive Canadian distributor. The American company threatened to reduce its purchases from the offshore firm if it did not stop selling to Mr. Dunnett's Canadian company and conform to their wishes.

Thus we see a small Canadian company forced to the wall by an American company and its Canadian subsidiary, and there is no action which can be taken under any of our laws to protect this Canadian businessman. There is no protection offered either in the Combines Investigation Act or in Bill C-2 which we have before us.

Strange though it may appear, Mr. Dunnett finds he can take some action under the Sherman anti-trust laws in the United States and he is pursuing this course at the present time. I find it ironic, to say the least, that a Canadian businessman should have to resort to a United States law to protect his interests. I realize we cannot pass legislation in Canada which would take effect beyond our borders, but we have other very considerable powers which we could use to protect our businessman from acts such as have been experienced by Mr. Dunnett.

Government members often talk of giving this bill or that bill fast passage, yet at the same time the minister says that he wants to hear all the arguments, positions and ideas that may improve a bill. The fact that this bill has had several runs in this House is beside the point; it is a serious piece of legislation and deserves careful rather than hurried consideration.

We cannot experiment at this stage with the distribution system in this country as if it were an academic exercise. The cost of establishing a distribution system is considerable. The function of distribution, with its backup administration, is extremely sensitive. The establishment of a backup service organization, and the tools and merchandising required to make it part of the distribution system constitute another cost to the whole function of the marketplace.

Before we look into and beyond this matter of refusal to sell and the control and distribution of markets, we have to be sure that we completely understand the function of the after market distribution system in this country. I am sure hon. members know there are many places in Canada that will just not support too competitive a market. Take Newfoundland as an example. In many cases the market will only support one or two business concerns in this field of endeavour. Therefore, before we set in motion something that will offset that, we have to assess whether in the long run we are really servicing that market and doing the consumers there any service or justice at all.

That about concludes my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I am looking forward to seeing the bill go to committee. I know that in committee we will give it long and serious discussion. I hope the minister and the members of the steering committee will not endeavour to restrict debate in any way, or hinder us from bringing before the committee witnesses who wish to appear. There were many who would have liked to appear before the standing committee of the twenty-ninth parliament but were not able to do so. Therefore I hope the minister will be broad enough in his outlook toward the legislation to see that we are able to receive these various people and hear their stories. We must ensure that the legislation we finally frame and pass through the House will not work hardship or inequity, but will in fact serve the business community and consumer, to the benefit of both.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether, with consent, the House would agree to call the ways and means motion appearing on the order paper in the name of my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) with respect to export of oil from Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the minister to go to order No. 2 on the order paper, and then return to Bill C-2 afterwards. This can only be done with unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WAYS AND MEANS

CONCURRENCE IN MOTION CONCERNING EXPORT TAX ON OIL AND OIL PRODUCTS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved:

That a Ways and Means motion laid upon the Table, Wednesday, October 2, 1974, with respect to export of oil from Canada be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, POWERS OF INVESTIGATORS, OFFENCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an Act to amend an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity at this time to speak on this bill. There is no doubt that it is a slippery piece of legislation, being attempted by a slippery minister in a slippery portfolio. In fact, it might be termed "the last stop and out of the cabinet portfolio".

I was interested to hear some of the remarks of our friends to the left, who were waffling as they usually do on a contentious issue. Their spokesman said, as I recall it, that there should not be a combined marketing of goods, that this should not be allowed. There is no doubt in my mind that this would include marketing boards. They cannot have it both ways; they have to make a decision as to which way they want it, and then act accordingly.

Before embarking further upon my remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I have your permission to call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Are hon. members agreeable to calling it ten o'clock, as suggested by the hon. member for Red Deer?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—CANADIAN POSITION ON A SECURE WORLD FOOD SYSTEM

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, a headline in the New York Times reads: "32 Nations Close to Starvation". Here are some of them: Bangladesh, India, Niger, Pakistan, Sudan, Upper Volta. All told, 700 million people live in these 32 countries. The countries are so poor and so short of food that crop failures and the high prices of grain, fertilizer and petroleum threaten them with bankruptcy, and their people with starvation.

The modern world has never faced a disaster of this magnitude. That is why the United Nations is sponsoring a world food conference in Rome. The conference opens two weeks from today. What role will Canada, a breadbasket of the world, play? No one knows.

I asked for a day's debate in parliament to focus attention on this global problem and on Canada's contribution to its solution. The government said no. Yesterday, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) proposed a motion calling on Canada to take the lead in establishing a world commission with the power to transfer food and resources where needed. This is the kind of structural solution the crisis demands. Responding for the government, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Corriveau) thought up all the reasons why this would not work, and then said that "a lot more aspects must be taken into consideration before we could be prepared to set up a concrete world food program."

In the name of God, Mr. Speaker, when will the government get off its fat, Canadian ass and recognize our responsibility to a starving world? How many more television pictures of emaciated children do we have to look at before the government will provide some leadership? How much longer will we enjoy the luxury of worrying about meat prices when millions cannot even get bread?

Two weeks ago representatives from non-governmental organizations from across Canada assembled in Ottawa for the Canadian conference on the world food crisis. I urged the delegates to formulate strong recommendations to the Canadian government that would force Canada to go beyond a mere philanthropic approach at the world food conference, because more dollars for food aid will not be enough. The conference passed a series of visionary and constructive recommendations that deal both with the immediate food emergency and the longer term structural causes of hunger and malnutrition.

I want to hear the government's response to the recommendations of the Canadian conference in a number of critical areas: first, guaranteeing that the developing countries themselves become as self-reliant as possible in food production—this is the only long-term solution to the food crisis; and second, immediate action to increase food production in Canada to meet the present emergency.

I was encouraged by the recent statement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to the effect that Canada could increase food production by 50 per cent in five years as long as farmers have guarantees that they will not be penalized for producing surpluses. I agree with him that Canadian farmers must not be forced to bear the whole burden of making more concessional sales of wheat and other foods to developing countries. But let us not deceive ourselves. A program of increased production aimed at making more food available at less cost to developing countries while subsidizing Canadian farmers will be much more costly than traditional food aid programs that dealt with unplanned agricultural surpluses.

One means of financing such a program would be the special tax on industrial raw material exports suggested by the conference. Another means would be to have the international community take on more responsibility for financing world food aid. This goal could be achieved either through an expanded role for the world food program, or through a new World Food Authority that would be established by the Rome conference. It is only just that developed nations which are net food importers, and particularly the petroleum exporting countries, should pay their fair share to whatever international authority is designated as having chief responsibility for world food aid.

One particularly visionary resolution of the Canadian Conference on the World Food Crisis proposes that a form of international taxation, based on ability to pay as measured by per capita income, be instituted to finance a world food plan. Under such a plan, Canadian taxpayers would pay their fair share, but would not be expected to bear the whole burden of producing agricultural surpluses for concessional sale to developing nations.

Canada has already indicated support for the proposal put forward by the Dr. Boerma of the U.N. Food and Agricultural Organization for international coordination of national grain stockpiles. This is a welcome first step, but it hardly fulfills the need for a truly international food bank.

Since it appears that it will not be politically feasible to establish a large grain reserve under international control at the Rome conference, cannot Canada at least take leadership in calling for a smaller international stockpile of food for emergency purposes?

The World Food Conference secretariat's plan of action recommends that such an emergency stockpile contain 500,000 tons of food which, in my opinion, is surely a minimum. Such a food bank for emergency relief could be stored in the developing world where it is most needed; it could be administered under international control with the participation of the developing countries themselves; and, most important, it could function to remove the temptation for food exporting nations to use their food surpluses for political purposes.

Third, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Conference on the World Food Crisis called for Canada to support the establishment of the new international economic order called for by the sixth special session of the United Nations General Assembly last April and May. At the World Population Conference in Bucharest, which I attended, the Canadian delegation avoided making any commitment to the establishment of the new international economic order, despite the insistence of the developing nations and of many expert observers that the implementation of a new economic order is an essential precondition for effective action toward reducing the rate of population growth. Will Canada take the same position at the World Food Conference where the issue of the world economic order is even more crucial?

The growing imbalance in the distribution of wealth that is generated by the present world economic order is at the heart of the food crisis. In fact, last week Dr. Neal Stoskopf of the University of Guelph pointed out that instead of helping the have-not nations, the affluent nations actually import protein from protein-deficient countries.

The statement on "Sharing Daily Bread" issued by the Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops points out that this scandalous and absurd situation is made possible because the distribution of food is governed by effective demand in the market place and not by human need.

Therefore any real solution of the food crisis must include a redistribution of wealth which determines effective demand, and any long term solution must enable developing countries to achieve greater patterns of self-sufficiency in food. Both of these goals are only possible under a new economic order.

Yet I have seen no evidence that the present government is willing to allow a fundamental restructuring of the world's economic system, a re-ordering of the allocation of food and raw materials, and the reforms of the international trade, monetary and financial institutions called for by the United Nations. Let us listen to Paul Gerin-Lajoie, Director of CIDA, who calls for a new enlightened Canadian attitude towards "a new international order which will help to reduce the present imbalance among nations." If ever there was a moment for Canada to give leadership in providing justice to a suffering humanity, that moment is now.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, after listening to the hon. member one is moved to paraphrase Cecil Rhodes: So much to say in so little time. I was impressed with the sincerity of the hon. member's remarks. Let me repeat, however, the assurance that Canada's position will not be restricted to emergency action, but will encompass and, indeed, put more emphasis on proposed structural changes in the world food system.

I should like to repeat the assurance that Canada's position will not be restricted to emergency action but will encompass, and indeed put great emphasis on proposed structural changes in the world food system. Several possibilities are now being studied. These include: diverting more Canadian aid into agricultural development in developing countries, provided developing countries are willing, where necessary, to reorder their priorities in favour of agricultural development; encouraging developed countries and other new holders of wealth to channel increased amounts of aid into agricultural development in developing countries; and studying other long term options in the appropriate form, for example, liberalization of trade in agricultural goods.

Let me say that the government is studying several ways of enhancing world food security. One device may be an improved world food information system, which some have called an "early warning system" to alert the world to impending crises.

Another may be a voluntary stockholding or reserves system, provided means are found to insulate world trading arrangements from such reserves. Yet another may involve greater consultation among all countries, both food exporting and food importing on food matters.

I compliment the hon. member for raising this issue, particularly in view of the fact that this world conference will be held within the next few weeks, and I think it is time we all had a serious look at the problem.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—POSITION OF CANADA ON PARTICIPATION OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION IN UNITED NATIONS DEBATE ON MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, following the admission of the Palestinian Liberation Organization to the United Nations by an overwhelming vote of 105 for admission, four against admission, and twenty abstentions, I find I need a new reason to believe in the United Nations.

I know the United Nations well. At the beginning of my political career I spent three months there as a delegate. I understand how it works. In view of this and some other decisions on the Middle East problems, I wonder what justification and grounds there are now for reasonable men and men of peace to support that organization.

The Palestinian Liberation Organization has credentials to speak at the United Nations. It is not a government; it is not recognized by all Arab states; it is not even recognized by all the Palestinians. But it has credentials and I wish to read some of them. I have 20 events to recite. I do not know whether or not they were committed by the Palestinian Liberation Organization but it claims credit for them all.

This organization claims credit for these 20 events: hijacking of a civilian airline in 1970, bomb outrages in Jerusalem, bombing incidents in Tel-Aviv, an attack on an Israeli airplane in Athens, an attack on an Israeli airliner in Zurich, and diversion of a United States plane enroute to Israel. I do not wish to take the time of the House to go through the whole list. It is available. These things are documented. They are all things for which this organization claims credit, this organization which now heads for the United Nations with recognized status to speak. Let me refer to one item, number 18 on my list:

Arab terrorists' massacre of Israeli children at Maalot.

I have a newspaper clipping here from the Associated Press and Reuters about that incident. It states:

A Palestinian guerrilla leader said yesterday that the guerrilla attack on the town was "heroic" and warned that similar operations would be launched in the future.

Later the article continues:

We promise the Palestinian people to undertake more such operations as they express a real sacrifice and represent the start of a new stage in the development of commando operations both in size and level.

Look who is coming to dinner; look who is coming to the United Nations. It is a terrorist gang whose objective is not only to establish a homeland for their own people but the total obliteration of the state of Israel. This is their stated objective.

● (2210)

There is nothing inevitable about the survival of state of Israel. That state can go at any time. We should remember that in this House. Canada is one of its friends, one of its best friends. We are committed to its survival. What I should like to say, now that this decision has been taken, not with Canada's approval but by an overwhelming majority of the members of the United Nations without Canada, is that Canada must make every effort to get the Palestinian Liberation Organization to clean up its acts, to denounce acts of terrorism, and to find a new way to put its case forward.

Above all, the PLO must grow to accept the right of the state of Israel to exist, and everything that goes with that right. If it cannot do that, if the PLO maintains its terrorist outlook, Israel may survive anyway. One thing that is obvious is that the survival of Israel does not depend on the United Nations.

But what about the United Nations? Its survival is not inevitable either, and I submit that the kind of decision that the UN took in admitting the PLO raises questions about whether that organization will survive.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the position of the government on this issue remains as outlined by the minister in reply to the hon. member on October 18. I note in his question the hon. member recognized that the decision taken by the UN was not with Canada's approval because at that time Canada abstained from the voting. I think his challenge is probably to the position that has been taken by the majority of UN members in that vote. Since the time of that vote, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) has had the opportunity to discuss this issue fully with the ambassador of Israel and the ambassadors of Arab countries resident in Ottawa, and they have expressed their full understanding of Canada's position.

The hon. member has indicated that surely the PLO should be able to find, rather than the violence which we have seen, a new way to put their case forward. It seems to me that perhaps this is a better way.

HOUSING—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUNDS FOR ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM—AVERAGE EFFECTIVE RATE OF INTEREST ON MORTGAGES—POSSIBLE SHIFT IN POLICY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the question which I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) on October 15 had to do with whether the government proposed to increase the amount of funds made available through programs such as the Assisted Home Ownership Program and other programs, which would go some way at least to meeting the needs of the people in low and middle income brackets for housing which they are at present virtually unable to find at a price which they can afford to pay.

The number of housing starts this year is down substantially from what it was last year when there were 268,000 housing starts. This year there has been a drop of 25 per cent, and it has now been calculated that, unless there is a further deterioration in housing starts, we will build just over 200,000 units a year.

When I asked the question the other day, the minister replied by saying that the government had more than met the proposals made by the Economic Council of Canada some years ago that we build about 200,000 units a year. What the Economic Council said at that time was that we needed a minimum of 200,000 a year. It also argued that housing should not be used as a tool for manipulation, and yet that is precisely what has happened.

This year we are building fewer houses than we did last year, not because the people of Canada need fewer houses but because interest rates have gone well over 11 per cent and most people, including those in the middle income bracket, cannot afford to buy homes.

The minister said the fact that AHOP money has been used up is proof of the success of the program and that the need has been met. Madam Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. From the beginning the money made available under AHOP was far less than the amount needed. The government, through Central Mortgage and Housing, cannot in this minuscule way meet the housing needs of the people of Canada.

Home ownership is not the answer for a substantial proportion of our people. The greatest need is in the area of housing accommodation for rent. This would be true even if sufficient money were made available under AHOP. As I say, we need a substantial increase in the stock of houses for rent, of which we build too few. We need subsidies for families who cannot afford to pay the market price of housing they must rent or own. In the 1940s all the Scandinavian countries realized this fact and adopted housing programs under which they provided houses for people who did not earn enough to buy their own.

In Canada we have done just the reverse. We have built houses, not because the Canadian people needed them, but because building them was necessary to overcome unemployment. Of course, with our present high interest rates, people cannot afford houses. Nevertheless, when unemployment is high, the government pumps money into the housing field. When unemployment is low, we turn the tap off and stop money for housing.

If there is to be a stable vacancy rate and a stable housing program, we shall need a stable housing policy. I suggest that we need a government policy which will meet the housing needs of the people of Canada, and I include both those who buy and rent accommodation. We need houses that will meet the needs of the people of Canada; they should not be built merely to meet the goals of the government, that is, to reduce unemployment which may arise in the winter of 1974-75, the summer of 1975 or the winter of 1975-76. Unemployment is one thing; the housing requirements of the Canadian people are another.

In every city of Canada—Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg—we see the core deteriorating from year to year. We see more and more people forced into poor, dilapidated housing which is a disgrace to a country which has the manpower, lumber, copper and all those things one needs to build decent housing.

We have made a start. We have begun to meet the needs of senior citizens for adequate housing. I call on the minister to develop a program which will meet the housing needs of all people in Canada, regardless of income, and provide us with the sort of housing to which this affluent country is entitled.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Madam Speaker, all Canadians can be proud of the fact that year in year out we have managed to build housing at a rythm that has surpassed that of the establishment of new families and immigration. During this period, we have markedly reduced overcrowding and improved housing for a good number of Canadians across the country.

This is greatly due to the Canadian building industry which magnificently met the programs elaborated by the federal government such as, for example, the Assisted Home-Ownership Program.

During the last six years, one of the main concerns of the federal government was to divide housing in a way that would allow low income families to share improved housing conditions with better off Canadians. The government therefore tried to reserve amounts at its disposal to provide first of all for housing for low or middle income families.

We have supported the provinces by granting loans and contributions for social housing. We have supported non-profit groups who were building housing as well as non-profit co-operative groups through starting-off funds, 100 per cent financing and 10 per cent contribution of investments to help produce housing for low income people. I have already mentioned the remarkable success of the Assisted Home-Ownership Program in which the government invested some $450 million since the beginning of this year.

● (2220)

[English]

It is this unique Canadian approach of partnership between the private sector and the public sector that has enabled us in recent years to attain such a high level of housing production. A target of one million houses over a five-year period was set by the Economic Council of Canada. The government made a commitment to reaching this goal back in 1969. We have surpassed this target, and I think it is to the credit of the housebuilding industry, and all governments concerned, that a total of 1,152,600 units have been produced in the five years.

We hope to continue to improve our programs in 1975. While there has been a drop in starts in recent months due to a variety of reasons including, for example, high mortgage interest rates and increases in the cost of labour and materials, not to mention the cost of land, I am confident that the declining trend can be halted in 1975.

My minister does not propose at this time to set any precise figure for starts in 1975, but I can assure the House that the government has given careful consideration to the housing situation in Canada. We have carefully studied the prospects for next year, and we will take appropriate action to ensure a continuation in the general improvement of housing conditions for all Canadians.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ARRANGEMENTS FOR CONSIDERATION OF SUPPLY

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, after discussions among the parties, a basic agreement has been reached as to the manner in which we should proceed, today, tomorrow and Friday with the business of supply.

As the House is aware, the main estimates have been discussed in the last parliament and in this parliament in standing committees, and there is a special order dealing with the remainder of the business and how to dispose of it by Friday afternoon. When orders of the day are called I understand there is agreement to dispose of the motion for concurrence in main estimates and of the motion for concurrence in supplementary estimates (A) without debate. The motion for first reading of the consequent appropriation bill is, of course, not debatable. I understand there is also agreement to dispose of the motion for second reading of the bill without debate. The House will then go into Committee of the Whole on the bill. I understand that there is agreement that all the clauses of the bill be stood and that the committee proceed directly to schedule A of the bill, which refers to the main estimates.

So that consideration of schedule A, that is, the main estimates, may be undertaken in an orderly fashion, it is my understanding that there is agreement that discussion should be organized in the following manner: First, for about an hour to an hour and one half, discussion would be on the estimates of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) and can, thereby, cover a broad range of matters relating to financial and personnel management of the government. Second, for about two and one half to three hours, discussion would be on the estimates of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). Third, for about two and one half to three hours, discussion would be on the estimates of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson). Fourth, for about two and one half to three hours, discussion would be on the estimates of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson). Fifth, for about two and one half to three hours, discussion would be on the estimates of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan). Sixth, for about two and one half to three hours, discussion would be on the estimates of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury).

I should explain that these departments were selected by the opposition parties as those on which they wished to concentrate their discussion. If there is still time remaining before the time on Friday when all outstanding questions must be put, discussion could cover other aspects of the bill, whether in committee of the whole or on third reading stage.

There is an understanding as well with respect to debate that, in order to give all members an opportunity of discussing these departments, each member should be restricted to one 20 minute speech in the committee on each department, but that this restriction would not apply in cases of direct questioning and answering. Nor would a minister be prevented from rebutting points made during the discussion.

It would be possible to make an order with regard to the plan that I have just outlined, but such an order might impose too much rigidity on the debate and I do not believe it will be necessary. If there is difficulty, the committee could rise, report progress and the House could then deal with the necessary order.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader has generally outlined the results of the discussions that we have had and the agreements at which we have attempted to arrive. For the reasons I assigned earlier when we first had these discussions, namely that the government had put itself into a very serious predicament, the reasons for which I am too polite to go into now, regarding passage of the estimates, our concern for the recipients of government cheques—pensioners, salaried individuals and so on—persuaded us to forgo the rights we would usually have and go along with this arrangement, and we are continuing to do so.

I want to congratulate the government House leader on persuading his reluctant colleagues to appear in the House to answer questions that will be put to them, and I hope they will be a lot more candid in this procedure than they are normally at question period.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to confirm the statement that has been made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) with respect to the arrangement that has been made for debate during the next three days. If it sounded to anyone by the first remarks of the government House leader as if we were passing over a number of stages without debate, then that is only so that when we get to the actual items in the schedule to the bill we can have all the time that three days will make possible.

It is also understood that this is a program to be followed generally rather than with rigidity. It does work out in such a manner that we would be dealing with two departments today, two tomorrow and two on Friday. Of course, if we conclude some of the departments earlier than we thought might be the case, that would leave more time at the end.

This is, of course, a new experience for some members to be dealing with estimates in the House, or in committee of the whole.

Mr. Baldwin: And for some ministers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said, a new experience for some ministers. We hope it will be a fruitful three days, not only for what we do during these three days but as an experiment in dealing with estimates on the floor of the House.

The only other comment I wish to make while I am on my feet is an unusual one in that I should like to correct something that was said by the hon. member for Peace River. I heard him say it just now and he also said it on the radio this morning. I think it should be clear that pensions are not covered in the estimates. Pensions are provided by statute and are payable whether or not estimates pass. Certain salaries and such things are covered in the estimates of government expenses generally. But let us not alarm our pensioners with the thought that there is going to be any delay in their getting the meagre pensions that they now receive.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to confirm, on behalf of my colleagues of the Social Credit party, that we took an active part in working out a new formula for the business of the House, and especially the study of credits and the main budget that they may be studied in an orderly and planned fashion. We feel that this proposal which was agreed to unanimously should not be rigid and change the practice in years past where we diddled around without really getting to the bottom of the problems.

Mr. Speaker, according to this agreement, it is also understood, which I believe the hon. members for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) forgot to mention, that on third reading, any hon. member will be allowed to speak freely on any part of the credits.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to speak to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), in view of the answer given by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that with the cooperation of the opposition members it would be possible to hasten the introduction of a bill lowering old age security eligibility to 60. This agreement for the debate on estimates and the unanimous cooperation the government gets from this side of the House show that there is no need to wait till October 1975 to study the old age security legislation. We realize we could study as rapidly this bill that would be most welcome by 60 year old Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I have the growing impression that those who cooperate most in this House are members sitting on this side.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM (NIP)

Question No. 75—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Since the amendment to the National Housing Act in June, 1973 (a) what provinces have signed an agreement with the government under the terms of the amendment (b) how many projects have been effected or are underway (i) in which province (ii) what is the nature of each such project (iii) what is the value of each such project?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: (a) The Neighbourhood Improvement Program is the only one included in the 1973 amendments of the National Housing Act which requires a formal agreement with the provinces. Under this program, agreements have now been signed with all provinces, except the Province of Nova Scotia. (b) NIP is a flexible program to upgrade neighbourhood environments and it may include selecting neighbourhoods and formulating redevelopment plans; acquiring and clearing land to provide open space or community facilities; acquiring and clearing land for low and medium income housing; constructing or acquiring and improving neighbourhood recreation or social facilities; developing occupancy and building maintenance standards; making loans for commercial improvements; relocating those individuals dispossessed of housing through NIP and of the exposition of the project and improving municipal services and public utilities. The selection of any of these steps is left to the community and the municipality, within budgetary restraints, and federal involvement is confined to ensuring that the criteria for the program are respected. To date, no project has yet been completed; five projects have reached the implementation stage. These are:

Province	Federal Contributions $000
Corner Brook, Newfoundland	639
Sudbury, Ontario	337
Calgary, Alberta	1,031
Edmonton, Alberta	1,031

3. Does the government intend to charge tolls on the St. Lawrence River and, if so, for what reason?

2. During 1973 a record total of 116,405 containers were handled at the Port of Montreal. The number has been increasing each year since 1967.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

ALLEGATION GOVERNMENT WOULD FAVOUR BRITISH OR EUROPEAN TAKEOVERS RATHER THAN UNITED STATES—CONFLICTING STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Minister for Regional Economic Expansion was expressing government policy in London on Monday when he said that the government likely would favour British or European takeover bids as compared to those made by United States firms attempting to invest in Canada? Is that a statement of government policy?

● (1420)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the text of what the minister said in London. I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that the government policy is non-discriminatory. We are desirous of diversifying foreign investment in Canada insofar as it is necessary but there is no classification of investors as to whether one is more acceptable than another.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I assume from what the Acting Prime Minister says that there is no intention to amend the takeover legislation so that it would serve the purpose the minister had in mind. But I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it is the policy of the government to have one minister stating one position and another minister stating another position. Is it now standard practice for this government to adopt the tactics of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and are we to see this extended now to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN COMPENSATION PAYMENTS ON IMPORTED OIL IN VIEW OF EXCESSIVE PROFITS OF COMPANIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Following the revelation that the profits of the Esso Corporation were up 64 per cent in the first nine months of this year, going from $154 million to $252 million over the comparable period last year and assuming that the figures for the other companies when they come out in the next few days will follow the same pattern, is the government considering reducing the amount of the payment made to the oil companies for petroleum brought in on the east coast under the fund set up by the government.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The view of the government in respect of the effective administration of the compensation program is that it should be paid equally to whatever importer, refiner or other company on an equal basis, but that it would be up to fiscal policy to determine what if any rate of income tax any particular company would have to bear. In that regard I would have to defer to my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED LEVYING OF INTEREST ON DEFERRED TAXES OWED BY ESSO CORPORATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, will defer to the Minister of Finance and ask that minister if he would care to comment upon the question I put to his colleague. Given the fact that the deferred taxes of the Esso Corporation belong to the people of Canada and represent an amount in excess of $226 million, will the minister consider levying at least an interest charge on those funds owed to the people of Canada say at the level we now pay for long-term bonds?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have some difficulty in meeting that question coming from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby because I proposed in the last Parliament an amount of $410 million in tax against the oil companies and that budget was defeated by that party.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on a final supplementary.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister well knows there were many other parts to that budget which many people found objectionable. Regardless of what was in that budget last year, does the government or does it not intend to take specific action in terms of tax policy toward the oil companies who are making what any reasonable person would describe as exorbitant profits.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the government's position will be known on the night of the first budget in this Parliament.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON FORMULA FOR SHARING REVENUE FROM RESOURCE TAXATION—FURTHER CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance because I want to give him an opportunity to contradict a press report to the effect that he failed miserably in his recent journey out west. Would the minister indicate whether he expects to reach any agreement with certain western provinces in respect of the general question of resource industries and in particular a sharing formula in respect of petroleum revenues in this country.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I told the House earlier that the purpose of the visits to the various provinces, not only the four western provinces but also discussions I have had with the provincial treasurer of Ontario, the minister of finance of Quebec and, in a few days with the four Atlantic provinces, was not negotiation, because each level of government has to determine, on its own responsibility to its own legislature, or mine to parliament, the budgetary policy of the jurisdiction it represents. So the visits were in the realm of discussion, and I tried to reveal to the provinces the reasons for my budgetary proposals on May 6 to indicate to them that I felt that the federal parliament and the people of Canada were not receiving a fair share of resource revenues as a result of unilateral provincial action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I also indicated to them that the share between the federal and provincial jurisdictions should be governed in such a fashion that the resource industries in the country have a fair return and a sufficient incentive in cash flow for exploration and development.

Mr. Lawrence: I am sure that the minister appreciates the fact that there is some area of doubt across the country in respect of this so-called divided jurisdiction at present. Are we then to assume there are no further negotiations between the minister and this government or any provincial government in relation to sharing resource taxation in this country?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am open to further discussions with any of the provinces at the ministerial level and the Prime Minister of Canada has invited all first ministers to a meeting here to discuss the economic situation, including resource taxation, on October 30.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REASON FOR DELAY IN GRANTING PAROLES AND PARDONS—REQUEST FOR MORE RAPID PROCESSING

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General.

It is a relatively frequent occurrence that members recommend paroles be granted by the board. Since the board's answers come a number of days and sometimes weeks later, could the minister apply some pressure in order that we get faster answers? In a similar way, when a pardon is requested after 5 years' parole or 5 years of clean record, we are informed that the issuance of a decision may take up to 3 years, which accounts for a total of 8 years. Could the minister approach the board so that pardons are granted, not because of requests by members of parliament, but because the individual concerned paid his debt and wants to resume his normal place in society.

[Mr. Lawrence.]

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): As the House knows, the National Parole Board is an independent board and makes a decision on each case after examining all documents and evidence. From time to time members of parliament or others make recommendations or comments, and these are taken into consideration with all other evidence. But I would not want to put undue pressure on the board. On the other hand, I will bring the comments of the hon. member to the chairman of the board and the members.

FINANCE

REFERENCE IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" TO MAINTENANCE OF TAX ON OIL ROYALTIES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to put a question to the Minister in the light of his answers today to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. I put the same question basically yesterday and now, to review it briefly, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he was making any change in reference—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Woolliams: I am putting the question if you will listen, but if you are going to talk, you will make it more difficult and I will take longer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I asked the minister yesterday whether he was going to continue to put a tax on the provincial royalties. Now I put this question to the minister. Did he discuss with Thomas Kennedy of the Globe and Mail or any other newspaperman whether the budget package which was brought down last May would remain intact as far as that is concerned. Yesterday the minister said we would have to wait until budget night to ascertain that but this article would suggest he has already told the press what he is going to do.

● (1430)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the only people of the press I met were Mr. Kennedy and all the other reporters who were present at a joint interview I had after my discussions with Mr. Donald Getty, Minister of Federal and Intergovernmental Affairs in the province of Alberta, and Mr. Gordon Miniely the provincial Treasurer of Finance. It was a joint press conference and at no time did I express myself in those terms.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, this is so important I think I should put this question to the minister very succinctly. Did he make a statement to Mr. Kennedy to the effect that the budget package of May would remain intact, meaning that the tax affecting the oil industry would remain as of May 8? I think we are entitled to an answer because of the job the Minister of Finance is doing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am under the distinct impression that the minister answered that question in the negative just a moment ago. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I appreciate that the Speaker takes into consideration sometimes these people who do not get an opportunity to express themselves. My point of privilege is that Thomas Kennedy said in this article in the Globe and Mail this morning, referring to the minister:

He left Edmonton, visibly tense and exasperated, to put the finishing touches to a new budget, hinting strongly that all the controversial tax provisions contained in last May's version of the federal fiscal package remain intact for a possible reintroduction early in November.

Mr. Speaker, there are two reasons for raising this question. First of all, if that statement was made it was a definite leak to the press by the Minister of Finance. Second, if the statement was not made, then I think the minister should say without equivocation that he never discussed that phase at all with the press. It is either a leak or it is not a leak.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The reason I made the remark I did was that it was my understanding that the question posed to the minister was whether he had made the reported statement. The minister just finished saying, if I understood him correctly, that the news conference was a joint conference at which he did not make such a statement.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not care if it was joint or single.

Mr. Speaker: I do not propose to recognize as supplementary questions at any time a request that a minister simply repeat an answer that he has already given. That is the situation. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

ENERGY

CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON OFFSHORE RIGHTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister tell the House what discussions are in progress with a view to resolving outstanding federal-provincial disputes relating to offshore rights and jurisdictions?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I expect to meet Mr. Crosbie the Newfoundland minister who has recently been given the responsibility for that province's interest in offshore oil and gas, within a week or ten days in Ottawa.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. That of course deals with only one of the provinces and I believe there are varying conversations going on with other provinces.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the federal government and the four other provinces are substantially in accord on the kind of regime that should be applied to the east coast offshore. It was only Newfoundland that had failed to agree to the premise which had been found generally acceptable by the others.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I suggest there is a province called British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. May I remind the hon. gentleman that the Supreme Court of Canada has declared that British Columbia has no offshore jurisdiction?

An hon. Member: You have not talked to Premier Barrett.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ESTABLISHMENT OF WORLD FOOD BANK—PARTICIPATION BY OTHER COUNTRIES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture because of his wide knowledge of the food situation in this country. In view of the need for food to be distributed in various countries of the world now attacked by the scourge of starvation can the minister tell the House if action is being taken to establish a food bank along the lines of one my government endeavoured to establish in 1962 so that food will be made available to areas in need?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, at the FAO conference in Rome last year I think I clearly stated the government's position. There have been discussions about this and I think I would be right in saying an emergency session is going on, trying to make sure that cereal grains and other commodities, especially powdered milk, are distributed in areas of real need. I agree with the right hon. gentleman that a world distribution system for food must be developed somehow but how quickly it will be done depends on what happens at the world meeting on food to be held in Rome between November 5 and 15.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This food bank was to be a NATO venture. Canada made a large contribution and Norway joined but some of the other NATO countries refused to join. Are these other countries in NATO being consulted today and what is the attitude of the United States government to the establishment of a distribution system which, as the minister very properly says, is so absolutely necessary?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think the reason this meeting is being held under the auspices of the United Nations in Rome is that all nations do not belong to the FAO but all the world powers will be participating in it. We feel that the leading nations must participate in this meeting to make it a success.

HOUSING

ALLEGATION CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION REQUIRES REPAYMENT OF GRANTS TO NON-PROFIT GROUPS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs if he could clarify any misunderstanding that apparently exists between CMHC officials and certain Toronto non-profit housing groups with regard to federal grants given them by his predecessor?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is referring to a report that the CMHC is requiring repayment of funds advanced for start-up grants for special co-operative programs. I believe that is the case and I am studying the report. There has been no change in the policy whatsoever. If start-up grants are used for capital purposes such as the purchase of land, certainly it would be a part of the purchase rather than a start-up grant, but there has been absolutely no change in this regard. I am happy for the opportunity to clarify that.

CONSULTATIONS ON PROGRAMS FOR VETERANS HOUSING

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the same minister. I wonder if he would advise if any consultations are going on between his department and the Department of Veterans Affairs with a view to producing a housing program for veterans.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are always consultations going on between the Minister of Veterans Affairs and myself. In specific terms, we are always considering programs that can be of benefit to veterans within CMHC.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF NEW PROGRAM FOR VETERANS HOUSING

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Could the minister advise the House if, in line with the consultations taking place with his colleague the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and housing, a new program for veterans' housing is going to be announced in the near future?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I concur with the remarks of my hon. colleague on that question. Studies are being carried out and if there is going to be an announcement I will be glad to make it in the House.

[Mr. Whelan.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED INTEREST OF UNITED STATES IN CANADIAN EQUIPMENT FOR CONTROLLING OIL SPILLS—REQUEST TO TABLE LIST OF EQUIPMENT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is really for the Minister of the Environment but in her absence perhaps I might address it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Following the question period last Friday the minister appeared on television saying that the equipment we have for controlling oil spills is so good that the United States is interested in using the same kind. Then the minister went on to say that the equipment involves an oil skimmer as well as peat moss. I should like to ask the minister whether this is the equipment she says is so sophisticated that the government of the United States is interested in it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to speak to her about that.

● (1440)

Mr. Friesen: Will the government now table the contingency plans as well as an inventory of the equipment they would use in the event of a major oil spill?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will give consideration to what can be tabled in this respect.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

UNIFORMS FOR WOMEN MEMBERS OF THE FORCE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. May I first commend the Solicitor General and through him the RCMP on their decision to recruit women as full members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of recent reports and photographs indicating that the new uniform for women members will be either long dresses or short skirts—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I hope there will be equality of service for the women members of the force, considering the special responsibilities they may have for such matters as patrol in some quite cold climates, particularly around Parliament Hill, on occasion of pursuit or regular investigation. Such a uniform might be impractical in this day and age. I ask the minister in all seriousness whether this decision was made in consultation with the new members of the force or whether there was a special women's committee struck in order that there might be an appropriate uniform for women in the RCMP.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in bringing women into the RCMP as full-time members, an attempt was made to have their uniforms as close to the men's uniforms as possible. I think the uniforms the hon. member is referring to are the dress uniforms and not the work uniforms. Work uniforms have been approved for the women recruits which include slacks, coats and so on for heavy outdoor work. The uniforms which appeared in the press recently are the dress or the going out uniforms for ceremonial occasions. I can assure the hon. member the work uniforms include slacks and other heavy clothing. I also wish to say that in designing the uniform, we consulted with the women's group in the armed forces as well as consultants, Information Canada and other design groups.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have some clarification from the minister on this, although I must say that the photographs and newspaper story described the short skirt as the regular working uniform. As this information has been conveyed coast to coast and I would not want this to be a disincentive for other young women who may be interesed in enlisting in the RCMP—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's sentiments about this matter may be very important, but I wonder whether it is appropriate to make these comments at this time when there are so many members who want to get on with the question period.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, if I might just ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REASON FOR MORE FUNDS GOING TO LIBERAL THAN TO CONSERVATIVE CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It arises from an answer given today to a question I placed on the order paper. It is to the effect that $37 million in LIP funds went to constituencies represented by Liberals and $22 million to constituencies represented by Conservatives last year. I wish to ask the minister why, when the number of seats in the last House were almost equal, Liberal constituencies received almost $15 million more than those of Conservative constituencies.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it was based on the worthiness of applications by the sponsors in the various areas of Canada, coupled with the degree of unemployment and the formula which I enunciated in this House on several occasions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Will the minister assure the House there were no political considerations involved?

Mr. Andras: Most certainly, Mr. Speaker.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO FURTHER ESCAPES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wanted earlier to put a supplementary to the Solicitor General. I am now asking it as a distinct question.

This morning five bandits escaped from St. Vincent de Paul for the fourth time, the same five, including Richard Blass, who got away—

An hon. Member: All Liberals!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —I do not know if they are all Liberals, but Richard Blass is from the riding of Mercier in Montreal. This is what the hon. member has just told me.

Mr. Speaker, here is my question: Does the minister intend to order an inquiry at St.Vincent de Paul in order to find out exactly how those same five prisoners could escape four times? The necessary steps have not yet been taken to prevent a recurrence of such incidents. Is the minister in a position to tell us what action he intends to take in this regard?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is true that this morning five inmates escaped from the Laval temporary maximum penitentiary which is part of the old St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. Of these five escapees, at least three had made an escape from this or another penitentiary in the past. This escape was carried out after a woman visitor to the penitentiary smuggled in some weapons. The men escaped by forcing their way out with the weapons. This matter is presently under investigation by the Montreal and Quebec police. The Commissioner of Penitentiaries is on the site investigating as well.

BILINGUALISM

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT ENCOURAGE PROVINCES TO DECLARE THEMSELVES UNILINGUAL IN VIEW OF QUEBEC'S BILL 22

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Prime Minister has made it clear that his government intends no action to disallow or refer to the Supreme Court of Canada Quebec's Bill 22, is it the intention of the Prime Minister or the government to bring before this House a resolution encouraging the other provinces of Canada to bring forward language bills stating that they, too, can be officially unilingual?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the government would follow the suggestion of the hon. member.

GARRISON IRRIGATION PROJECT IN UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR CANADIAN EFFORTS TO SECURE MORATORIUM ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last Friday the right hon. member for Prince Albert raised some questions with regard to the Garrison dam project. I wish to ask a further question. In view of statements by Mr. Russell Peterson, chairman of the United States president's council on environmental quality, that a moratorium on all new construction of the Garrison irrigation project in North Dakota be halted and in view of statements by Representative Vanik that the Garrison project is a "monument to folly and bureaucratic inertia", will the Canadian government now renew its attempts in calling for a moratorium in order to stop the pollution of the Souris and Red Rivers in Manitoba?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we certainly welcome the position that was taken by Mr. Peterson, as contained in the question put by the hon. member. We made our position very clear to the United States on the harmful effects this diversion would have and that position will continue to be taken with the American authorities.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question. Are there any negotiations going on at the present time?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there have been negotiations. It is expected that further meetings will be held on this subject later this year in an effort to reach a satisfactory resolution of the problem from our point of view.

PROTEST OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AGAINST COMPULSORY CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Has the minister received a submission from the Saskatchewan Railway Employees Association, whose headquarters are in Biggar, Saskatchewan, requesting his intervention with a view to postponing the implementation by the railway companies of the compulsory check-off of union dues, to be initiated at the end of this month, until a countrywide referendum of railway employees can be held, and if so would the minister advise the House of his intentions in this regard?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I am not aware of having received the submission in question. I will check, and get in touch with the hon. member.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—SUGGESTED ATTENDANCE BY TWO MINISTERS AND TWO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In view of the importance of the subject matter raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert, might I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister? Would he seriously consider following the precedent of 1961 and ask the Prime Minister to name at least two cabinet ministers and at least two federal members of parliament representing both language groups to make the most effective political representation in favour of the case for a world food bank at the food conference being held in Rome next month?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): It is the intention of the government that at least two cabinet ministers should attend the World Food Conference in Rome at which this proposal will be put forward. I am sure they will represent Canada very well, but I will take under consideration the suggestion that they might be supported by other members. This will be a very large delegation and I think it will be thoroughly representative of Canada. It may even include representatives from non-government organizations who will wish to go to support this particular project and others.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Basing my supplementary question on experience in the past, I hope the Acting Prime Minister will make the most fervent representations to the Prime Minister that in no circumstances should there be any recall of any of the ministers during the two weeks.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO RAILWAYS FOR LOSSES CAUSED BY FREIGHT RATE FREEZE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Transport but I notice he is not present. I hope he will be here later this day, because many hon. members are looking for him. I will direct one of my questions to the Minister of Finance. Since the railway rate freeze has now been in force for a little over a year, affecting about 22 per cent of rail freight traffic, can the minister tell us whether or not compensation has been sought by, and paid to, the railroads for alleged losses caused by the freezing of freight rates?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I think that question ought more properly to be directed to the Minister of Transport when he is here later in the day.

Mr. Benjamin: Does the Minister of Finance have no idea, then, of what amounts are being paid out?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I do. I simply think the Minister of Transport is the appropriate minister to answer the question.

VALCARTIER—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT ON ACCIDENTAL DEATH OF CADETS

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Last summer, there was a very unfortunate accident at the Valcartier Canadian Forces Base, which caused the death of two young cadets. The military authorities launched an inquiry on the matter. I should like to know if the minister intends to make public the report he received following the inquiry by the forces authorities?

[English]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): A board of inquiry has completed its investigation into the most regretable accident at Val Cartier last summer. A press release was issued today following the issue of the report of that inquiry. It could really be looked upon as an interim report; the full report cannot be released at least until after the many recommendations made by the board have been studied.

JOB VACANCIES IN ALBERTA—POSSIBLE RELATIONSHIP TO HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR STUDY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower related to a serious revelation by the Department of Labour which indicates there are some 40,000 jobs vacant in the province of Alberta affecting the forest industry and construction—as a matter of fact the department calls for a 20 per cent increase of permits for migrants so that they might take up these jobs. Can the minister tell us what immediate steps his department is prepared to take to ensure that those seeking work find jobs, particularly as this relates to the serious situation in Alberta?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had several consultations with members of the government of Alberta, most recently in Jasper with Dr. Hohal, the minister of manpower and labour there. We found ourselves in complete agreement that the best method of operating would be to search locally for people to fill these jobs. I might say that in the province of Alberta, particularly, there are a large number of native people who I think should be given the opportunity of filling these jobs even if this were to involve intensive training. I believe the native people of Alberta would support this point of view. Should it not be possible to fill the jobs in this way we will place them on the national and regional networks; only after this are we prepared to look abroad for recruitment of immigrants or short-term seasonal workers. Dr. Hohal has expressed his full agreement with this approach. We are working in conjunction with industry there to try to satisfy the demand.

Mr. Alexander: I thank the minister for his answer, but in the light of the continuing concern about the relationship between high job vacancy rates, high unemployment insurance benefits and high unemployment can the minister tell us whether he has undertaken a study in this field, and if so, how soon the results of that study will be revealed?

Mr. Andras: We have undertaken several specific studies in co-operation with specific industries including the Forest Products Association of British Columbia, the logging industry, the mining industry and others. We find that the existence of unemployment insurance benefits at the present level very rarely constitutes the real inhibition in matching workers with jobs. There are problems related to vocational skills, working conditions, wages and so forth; usually, when we have been able to consult with employers we have succeeded in reaching a meeting of minds which involves some of them tidying up their acts, as it were, though there are other policies which need to be addressed to this situation.

Mr. Alexander: The minister now seems to be saying, in a backhanded way, that there is no need to bring amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Andras: That is not what the minister said, and I think the hon. member knows it full well.

INSTRUCTIONS TO OVERSEAS OFFICES CONCERNING JOB VACANCIES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): May I direct a related question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? In the light of the statement made by the hon. gentleman yesterday, has he instructed immigration officers in our offices overseas that there exists a serious shortage of labour in western and northern Canada and have these officers been instructed to inform immigrants of these job vacancies?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): This has been an on-going exercise. We have been making these officers abroad acquainted with the labour market both on the basis of occupational demand information and more recent techniques for designating, in consultation with the provinces, occupations which are in high demand in given regions. This practice will be continued.

SUGGESTED CLOSING OF SUPPLEMENTARY OFFICE IN EDMONTON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): In the light of this report that there are 40,000 job openings in Alberta, will the minister now give consideration to closing the supplementary unemployment insurance office in Edmonton—the second office located in the riding of Edmonton-Strathcona? It is not needed because of the declining volume of applicants and its closing would save taxpayers more than half a million dollars a year?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The hon. member did write to me about this matter. I am looking into it and I appreciate the information he has given me. If the hon. member's impression is validated by our own analysis we shall not fail to seize the opportunity to reduce the service.

HEALTH

BACTERIAL LEVELS AT WHICH GROUND BEEF UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the very intense anxiety of many housewives and others using ground beef, which anxiety has been caused by the report of finding a high level count of bacteria in ground meat which could cause severe illness and morbidity, and since this has been reported previously on other occasions, I should like to ask the minister whether there are any predetermined levels of bacterial counts that are used as a guideline, or any findings of bacterial types that would cause meat to be labelled as unfit for human consumption?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the program that was referred to in this House did not refer to any specific levels of bacterial count or coli. The advice I have received is that at levels of less than 1,000 E. coli per gram the significance of coli bacteria as an indicator of health hazard is questionable. All the indications we have at the present time are that the high total count of bacteria reported in Canadian ground beef does not pose a health hazard per se. It may indicate inadequate storage conditions in regard to time or temperature, and in some cases possibly unsanitary handling. But the important thing is to cook the beef at a moderate heat of 160° F or so; then there is no worry that this should cause any health hazard.

ALLEGED LACK OF INSPECTORS TO ENFORCE PROVISIONS OF FOOD AND DRUG ACT—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENALTIES FOR OFFENDERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the startling relevation made by the minister outside the House yesterday that he did not have enough inspectors adequately to enforce the provisions of the Food and Drug Act at the retail food level, what steps is the government taking to ensure that the regulations of the Food and Drug Act are in fact being enforced at the retail food level so as to ensure protection for Canadians?

[Mr. Andras.]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Once more, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's imagination is carrying him away. What I said was that there was no way we could have inspectors inspecting each and every store across the whole country every single day. You would need an inspector for every store, and in view of the position of the hon. member's party vis-à-vis the growth of the public service I do not expect he would argue we should have an inspector for every store. That is what I said. On the other hand, my departmental officials are doing everything they can to carry out checks on everything having to do with the proper and satisfactory handling of meat in this country.

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the admission that there are not enough inspectors to carry out or enforce the regulations at the retail level, may I ask the minister whether he will now carry out the recommendation of the Food Prices Review Board and give greater publicity and stiffer penalties to people who break the law, as one means of ensuring that Canadians will be protected against the sale of unhygenic beef?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, once more I will not agree with the premise of the hon. member's question. Indeed, we have been working on the implementation of several of the recommendations put forward by the Food Prices Review Board last June, and the best evidence of this is the opening in one week's time in Halifax of another food monitoring laboratory of the health protection branch of my department, which will be specializing in the analysis of meat and food products sold in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Simcoe North rising on a point of order?

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he believes, in view of all that has gone on here, and if all these packages are to be labelled, that they should carry a label saying they must be well cooked?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be very pleased to look into this matter and raise it with my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

EFFECT OF CHANGED REGULATIONS ON NOMINATED RELATIVE APPLICANTS FOR COMMUNIST CHINA

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would the minister clarify whether the new immigration regulations he announced in the House yesterday will adversely affect nominated relative applicants from the People's Republic of China?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate the hon. member's question and the opportunity to clarify.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Andras: Seriously, Mr. Speaker, the movement from the People's Republic of China does include nominated relatives as well as sponsored. All applications in hand prior to yesterday will be treated, as I indicated in my statement, without application of the changes made in the new regulations. The nominated applications from yesterday forward will be treated in the way applicable to all other source countries.

I might add that as of October 22 the number of both sponsored and nominated applications from the People's Republic of China totalled 6,551. None of these applications will be affected by the new regulations, though of course not all the nominated applications will be approved, as would be the case with any other request.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE OF WHEAT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the present difference between the initial price that the farmer gets for a bushel of wheat and the Wheat Board's export price is well over $3, and in view of the fact that most farmers want a higher initial price, is the minister giving any consideration to asking the Wheat Board to increase the initial price to farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of increasing initial prices is under review. It is not ordinarily our policy to make these changes haphazardly or from month to month to reflect any current situation. However, we will look again at the situation this year, as we did last year, and determine whether and when it is appropriate to make a move.

The most important thing in my mind is for farmers to understand that it is the total return that they receive from the Wheat Board that is important and relevant to them, and any higher initial price will still not convey the full value of their grain to them. Then they have to watch the other information that the Wheat Board is providing, namely the price at which the Wheat Board is selling their grain.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

AMENDMENTS TO PROVISIONS RESPECTING SICKNESS BENEFITS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since the Unemployment Insurance Act will be amended shortly, particularly with regard to sickness benefits, can the minister assure the House that those amendments will cover the regulations which entitle to sickness benefits, so that male recipients will no longer be disqualified by officials as were some in my riding this week when they received the following notice:

Dear Sir,

You are not eligible to sickness benefits because your pregnancy period did not occur during your initial period.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's representations. When amendments to the act are introduced, full recognition and consideration will be given to his suggestion.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MICROSYSTEMS INTERNATIONAL—SUGGESTED RECOVERY OF GRANTS IN VIEW OF COLLAPSE OF COMPANY

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, and wearing another hat as Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, might I reply to a question put by the hon. member for South Shore yesterday regarding Microsystems International. I note he has been rising to catch your attention.

I am informed that the company has neither collapsed nor received funds in the amount of $48 million. The actual sums are $30.4 million by way of grant repayable out of profits, and a loan of $6.7 million was approved in 1969, in full recognition that this was a high risk venture. There has been a softening in markets around the world for microelectronic products, and this has adversely affected a number of producers, including this company. We hope that in the long term these markets will recover. In the meantime, Microsystems International Limited has considerable excess capacity, and in order to utilize it economically Northern Electric is offering to absorb existing Microsystems facilities into its own operations. Incidentally, Northern Electric has invested significantly more in this enterprise than has the government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—EFFECT OF TRADE NEGOTIATIONS WITH COMMUNITY ON GATT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in view of the negotiations currently being carried on in Europe relating to trade with France and the EEC, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether those negotiations negate or by-pass the usual process of trade negotiations with or under GATT?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, will these negotiations in any way prejudice future negotiations under GATT?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker.

BRUCELLOSIS—REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION PAYMENTS WITHIN SHORTER PERIOD OF TIME

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question of great importance and seriousness in eastern Ontario to the Minister of Agriculture. This matter has been raised to some extent in the House before, and concerns brucellosis which is ravaging dairying herds through eastern Ontario including 86 herds which have been quarantined in Carleton County alone, 21 in Leeds and more in other counties. Can the minister guarantee this House that compensation payments made for the loss of these cattle will be made to the farmers within a period of no longer than 45 days after the animals have been sent to slaughter rather than the farmers having to attempt to subsist for a period of three, four or five months as a result of the compensation fund having gone bankrupt?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I agree with part of what the hon. member says in respect of some cases that we have checked out following reports by hon. members, but unless there is some very unusual circumstance the farmers should be paid within three or four weeks. I might add that there is an obligation on the person who has had the misfortune of having his herd condemned because our inspectors demand proper cleanup and so on. I agree that this is not always the case. The hon. member referred to the number of herds affected in Carleton County. This is certainly tragic, but I would point out that it represents approximately 6 per cent of the herds in that county. I believe the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham made a request the other day for a report which I can give if he still wants it. I should just like to caution hon. members about suggesting that this infection is moving at great speed across the province of Ontario. That is not the case according to the reports I have from the Director of Animal Husbandry on health of animals in Canada. This is an important industry, and animal health in our nation is still the best in the world.

[Mr. Andras.]

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the minister's speech but he did not in any way come close to answering my question. Can he guarantee the House that these farmers will receive compensation within 45 days of the cattle being slaughtered?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if all procedures are carried out as they are supposed to be the farmers can get their payments in three or four weeks. I cannot guarantee that the farmers will carry out the required cleanup within 45 days, but it would have to be done in much less than that in order that the cheques can be properly made out and sent.

TRANSPORT

RESTORATION OF PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether it is the position of the federal government that restoration of passenger train service in southwestern Ontario is now a dead issue?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is still a subject of study with the government of Ontario.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the minister authorized Diane Waller of his office to write a letter in which she indicated it would be in the public interest that these services not be restored and the federal government had a responsibility to encourage bus service instead for many of these areas?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LAND FORCE REVIEW STUDY—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, last spring in answer to a question posed by the hon. member for York-Sunbury the Minister of National Defence stated that the land force policy review study would be completed in the near future. Will he inform us whether he has read the study, if he concurs with its findings and if he will table it?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the land force policy review study has been completed and is now being considered by me and senior personnel of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider making the study available to selected members of the opposition on a confidential basis?

Mr. Richardson: I will consider that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to a question I have directed to the Minister of Transport on a number of occasions. He promised to answer last week, and since he has not been here earlier this week I wonder whether he might be given the opportunity to answer this question regarding the report on the investigation into the Frobisher Bay accident?

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

CONCURRENCE IN MAIN ESTIMATES FOR YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1975

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, presented to the House, Thursday, October 3, 1974, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1974-75

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, presented to the House, Thursday, October 3, 1974, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chrétien thereupon moved that Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1975, be read the first time and printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Chrétien thereupon moved that Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31 March, 1975, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

● (1520)

The Chairman: It is my understanding that the committee wishes to proceed directly to consideration of Schedule A in the bill and to begin consideration of the portion of the schedule touching on the Treasury Board which will be found at pages 28 and 29. At this point I wonder whether it would not be more procedurally in order to stand the title, the preamble and clauses 1 to 6 of the bill. If hon. members agree, we will stand these clauses and return to them at a later stage. Is it agreed that we stand the title, the preamble and clauses 1 to 6 of the bill and go directly to Schedule A for the consideration of the Treasury Board estimates?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Title stands.

Preamble stands.

Clauses 1 to 6 inclusive stand.

The Chairman: I wish to inform hon. members we will now proceed to the study of the provisions of the schedule dealing with the Treasury Board which may be found at the bottom of page 28 and on page 29 of the bill.

On Schedule A—Treasury Board.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the appropriation bill before us relates to the main estimates and the first supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year.

As most hon. members will recall, I am sure, the main estimates were presented to the last Parliament on February 28 and shortly before the beginning of the current fiscal year Parliament voted interim supply to be used for the public service until the end of June.

In May, Parliament was dissolved and general elections were called. Since interim supply ran out at the beginning of summer, the government has financed itself through a series of special warrants, each covering approximately one month. Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act provides that such warrants can be issued to get the funds needed when Parliament is not sitting. The last of these warrants which was prepared in September should be barely enough to cover expenditures for October.

Almost all the expenditures incurred between the months of June and October were already in the main estimates, so that almost all the warrants were, so to speak, an advance on the estimates. the few new items are provided for in the supplementary estimates. In fact, except for two votes, the whole supplementary estimates include items that were covered by the special warrants, but not the main estimates.

The first of these two items deals with the payment of compensation on imports of oil and oil products (Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, vote 52a, $330 million) which will be handled by the Energy Supplies Allocation Board. It covers the months of November and December. Before then, I hope that Parliament will have adopted further legislation to provide for these payments until the end of the fiscal year.

The second deals with payments provided for in the program for the double price of wheat (Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, credit 41a, $79,300,000), in order to subsidize the price of wheat for Canadian consumers between the month of September 1973 and July 1974. The bill concerning the other six years of this 7-year program has reached the second reading stage in the House.

The appropriation bill we are discussing today would grant the total credits of the main estimates and the supplementary estimates for the rest of the fiscal year.

To give the usual assurances, Mr. Chairman, I must mention that this bill is along the same lines as those of years past and does not contain any new authority to borrow.

[English]

I would like to summarize very briefly what the estimates contain. If we take main estimates of $22 billion, supplementary estimates of $890 million, and for completeness the forecast of payment for old age security and the guaranteed income supplement of $3.4 billion, we have, for total budgetary estimates to date, a figure of almost $26.3 billion.

To avoid any confusion I want to remind hon. members that the figure my colleague, the Minister of Finance, will use when talking about total government outlays at the time of the budget will differ from the figures I have available now. There is always a net lapse or shortfall of a few hundred million between estimates and actual expenditures reflecting such things as delays in filling vacant positions and delays in construction. In addition, the Minister of Finance will provide in his figures for a contingency to cover expenditure requirements that may yet arise.

In any case, to talk in broad terms, an amount of about $15 billion of the $26 billion presented to date in what are called budgetary expenditures is devoted to transfer payments. That is 57 per cent. The largest of these transfer payments are: old age security and the guaranteed income supplement; family allowance payments; unconditional fiscal transfers to the provinces; the conditional or special purpose transfers to the provinces to cover half the costs for hospital care, medical care, and the Canada Assistance Plan; veterans' pensions and allowances; the government's share of the cost of unemployment insurance payments; grants to the less developed countries; and the subsidies recently introduced to ease the impact at the consumer level of price pressure on milk, bread, and petroleum products.

Most of these, accounting for about $10 billion, are measures successive Liberal governments have taken to give Canada systems of social security worthy of a modern, relatively wealthy state.

Other redistribution measures designed to promote equality of treatment for our citizens, such as fiscal transfer payments to the provinces and support for university education, call for expenditures approaching another $3 billion. Almost all the foregoing are transfer payments governed by statute, and some are covered by five-year agreements with the provinces. Most of those who criticize government expenditures are very unhelpful as to what specifically might be done to reduce them. But even if we were to have a government so unenlightened as to wish to tear down these key supports of our national life, years might well elapse before the destruction would be carried out.

In practice then, the great bulk of the expenditures of the federal government must be taken as given. Only at the margin is there room to manoeuvre so as to tune the long term pattern of expenditures which has been put in place over a decade, and more so as to respond to new demands or to try to affect the movement of the economy.

● (1530)

The rest, about $11 billion or 43 per cent, covers the servicing of the public debt, about $3 billion; the subsidization of Crown corporations, about three quarters of a billion dollars; and the remainder, the operating and capital costs of departments.

I might note that an important reason for the growth in the size of the public debt is the money borrowed to meet non budgetary requirements which take the form of investment in Crown corporations—CMHC, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the Farm Credit Corporation, the Export Development Corporation, and so on—Crown corporations being special instruments in the furthering of the social, economic and other policies.

About one third of the operating costs of the government for 1974-75 are taken up in the defence budget, and most of the rest in programs of service to the public, such as the Post Office and transport services, or in the essential functions of government as government, such as tax collection and the RCMP.

It is important to recognize, though it seems easy for some critics to forget, that the federal government provides and must pay for a wide range of basic services for the economy—airports, air traffic control, the mails, food and drug inspection, federal police—the list could go on a long time. These services become more vital and more expensive as society grows, and in all realism they should be looked upon as being only slightly more optional than the redistribution measures established by statute to which I previously referred.

[Translation]

So there, Mr. Chairman, you have in short an idea of the situation before the House at the present time. As the hon. members will realize, more than half the federal budget is provided under acts passed by the House and over which we have practically no control, unless of course the House wishes to introduce new bills. We are now trying to check the level of government expenditures as much as possible. Over the last three months, we have given instructions to all departments to the effect that they must operate within the limits of the estimates tabled in the House today.

A few supplementary expenditures now before the House are the result of measures carried by the government and requested by the House of Commons, such as the one-price oil policy and the one-price wheat policy for Canadian consumers. I hope hon. members will understand that if they want this governmet to be able to control the growth in government expenditures, they cannot at the same time ask us to make further expenditures.

Therefore, I urge hon. members in the next three days to meditate on this aspect of the issue. I will be glad to answer questions from hon. members. The other ministers referred to with respect to the order introduced in the House for the debate on the current estimates and the supplementary estimates will be present to answer questions which I hope will be useful to hon. members and Canadians in general so it will be realized that federal government activities are quite important. The larger part of government expenditures, 57 per cent, are set out in legislation voted by hon. members. It would probably be quite improper, for example, for the President of the Treasury Board to propose cuts in old age security pensions, family allowances or other programs of this type.

That is why we are here today, to explain the estimates and give the necessary information to hon. members.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the minister on his able presentation of the estimates and wish him well in the very difficult task which lies ahead of him. I can only assume that he took it over because he was a refugee from his last job, and anything was a good escape hatch.

In my opinion this bill is wrongly called an appropriation bill. I suggest it could better be named the misappropriation bill because it is nothing but the legalization of the $25 billion rip-off of the Canadian taxpayer by the Trudeau government.

To take money from people with their consent and, after adequate opportunity, to examine the purpose and scrutinize the detail, are one thing, but the ritualistic tribal dance which we call approving estimates is merely a farce, a slapstick comedy. Any suggestion that the existing rules and regulations permit members of parliament to engage in a meaningful check on the gigantic spending program of the government is absolute nonsense.

An hon. Member: Author?

Mr. Baldwin: The traditional right to withhold supply until all grievances have been dealt with and parliament is satisfied with the bona fide of proposed expenditures is gone. It has been swept away by an arrogant executive.

As we pass through the twilight of the bureaucratic dominated welfare state to the darkness that lies beyond, we find it quite impossible as members of parliament to carry out our rights and duties of ensuring that money, extracted as taxes from the people of Canada, is properly spent.

There are many reasons for this but time permits me to deal with just a few in a limited form. First there is the sheer size of the public accounts and of the blue book of estimates, not only the number of votes of money but the gobbledygook language in which they are couched. Even the present Minister of Public Works, for many years the President of the Treasury Board, was moved to say when appearing before a Senate finance committee last year that: "we are now getting to the point where the book is so thick and has so much in it that it almost appals people . . ." and again: "The same problem with the public accounts which, over the years, have grown and grown . . . and now we have reached the stage where it is almost incomprehensible". That is what the minister said. It is one of the few really accurate statements he has made for some time.

An increasing amount of the estimates is made up of statutory items, that is to say, expenditures fixed by previous acts of parliament, and for all practical purposes beyond the reach of subsequent parliaments.

Another reason is the use of schemes such as dollar votes, legislative items, making commitments for a number of years ahead. Last year there was an item of $350 million in supplementary estimates for a public works program. It should have been in statute form and it was challenged in the other place, but it was passed because the minister produced an instant opinion from the Department of Justice which ran quite contrary to a Treasury Board manual which has been in existence for many years. Now that $350 million has disappeared into the cavernous belly of bureaucracy and probably will never be heard of again.

Another reason is the fact that the present Standing Orders and the previous decisions of Mr. Speaker make it almost impossible for the House to reduce the amount of any vote. Because of the limited amount of time and opportunity in special committees of the House for examining estimates and the method in past years of conducting the proceedings—most of these committees have been operating as kangaroo courts—members are inhibited in their tasks.

We have been left with a sort of comic opera atmosphere of contempt and disregard for the hard pressed taxpayer, and this is compounded when we consider the enormous acceleration of government expenditures over the last few years.

● (1540)

It is a fact the policy of expanding the monetary supply to accommodate these huge expenditures has been one of the principal domestic factors in the inflation which continues to ravage the average Canadian.

All of this would be bad enough if there were efficiency in the management of our accounts—the very fact that we are engaging in this exercise in the next few days is proof that this is not the case—and if in the larger context the Canadian government were, in fact, doing those things which ought to be done for the benefit of the people of Canada.

It was all very well when we were in an era of rising productivity, the rate of which did not lag too far behind the national accounts. But now, finally, the financial facts of life have caught up with the government which stands helpless and moribund, with no plan save only that of the modern king Canute, the Postmaster General, who says, "Don't talk about inflation and it will go away".

So here we are with expenses out of control; a government so big, so complex, that it is out of control, and this parliament is losing its right to challenge. The Auditor General's reports over the last few years pointed out over and over again that in fact we had lost the right to check properly and to restrain the government over public expenditures. I suppose we all have to bear some blame. Certainly members of parliament were delinquent in giving up the safeguards they surrendered. We are all responsible. None of us voted against those proposals.

The media have had very little to say about it. I noticed today that when the minister rose to speak about the estimates there was a general exodus of those who should be interested. I wonder if the situation will ever have enough political sex appeal to capture public attention. Certainly something is wrong but the public does not know what.

There is another aspect which goes hand in hand with the question of control of spending. That is the right of the public, parliament and the media to receive adequate information from the government. I questioned the Prime Minister on this a few days ago and he gave me the usual slick, glib reply that the ground rules brought in by the former government House leader, which to some extent he said were imported from Sweden, these are quite ineffective. That is nonsense, Mr. Speaker. They have had no material effect on increasing the flow of information to members.

I had a chance to talk to the Prime Minister of Sweden, and asked him about what he had seen in this House and what is going on in Sweden. Out of politeness toward a distinguished visitor I will not pass on his comments, but he pointed out that in Sweden government information is within the full range of inspection of the media and the public. He said that a few days before he left three newspaper reporters went through his files for information. When will we get that sort of thing in this House, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Reid: When can we go through your files?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I should like the hon. member to see my files with all the complaints about what the government is doing to the people of Canada.

When the Prime Minister talked about Sweden he should know what the situation is there compared with Canada. We are away back in medieval days. Let us be honest, realistic, practical. Time has run out on us, and we are reaching the end of the road as far as being able to mount an effective parliamentary challenge to government spending in this House. We are a parliament which has lost its teeth, and we are being edged into a half baked presidential system without any of the safeguards which should be attached.

I am rather interested in the present desire of the Prime Minister to go to the British practice for some improvements. I would refer him to a book "The Passing of Parliament" by Professor G. W. Keeton. At page 33, the author comments:

> Today, in Great Britain ... Transition would be easy, swift, and it could be accomplished with complete legality. Already so many steps have been taken in this direction ... Today, virtually our only remaining constitutional safeguard is the habit of tolerance and the existence of a powerful political opposition—

No wonder the Prime Minister is anxious to involve himself in the British practice.

What are the things that we need? We need the right to bring certain estimates, at the option of the opposition, into this House for full study in a revived committee of supply, with ample opportunity to question ministers. This is in addition to the continuation of standing committee examination. The estimates must be put in a form which is intelligible. We need to accelerate the examination of public accounts, and must have the right to have some examination in the House of public accounts committee reports. After all, when any animal makes a mess it should have its nose rubbed in it occasionally, and this is what should happen to the government.

The cabinet and bureaucrats must be compelled, under severe sanctions, to provide information requested. We must have the right to reduce the items of estimates, and all of this not just to prop up the prestige or enhance the dignity of the House but simply to do our job so that we can stand at the bridge and say to the government, "Your estimates shall not pass until you have dealt with the grievances and the right to know of the people." Will we get it? I do not know. Certainly the bureaucracy will not voluntarily give up its authority, and the cabinet is made up mainly of recycled bureaucrats.

Today I fear there is not much hope that the House as a whole will go along with my suggestion because the government has a majority. Its supporters are quite satisfied with the scheme of things and most of them look ahead to the day when they, too, may have their chance to move up to the throne and become ministers and experience the great thrill of throwing around hundreds of millions of dollars of other people's money.

This leaves the opposition, or those of the opposition who will dig in and fight, and perhaps some in the media who may also perceive the dangers which threaten. Will that be enough to stimulate public outcry for changes? There is nothing certain about it, but we have to try because it is our duty, because there is not much time left, and because if there is any further increase in executive power the Prime Minister's office and the cabinet will shortly become, in legal form, what it is now in substance, a collective autocracy, with no restraints between elections.

The question I often ask myself, and I am sure others do also, is this: do people really want a continuation of the parliamentary democratic system or are they content with the executive dictatorship we have been building in Canada over the last eight or ten years? On balance I am convinced the great majority of people have a sound instinct, realize what is best for them and prefer the democratic structure which would permit them, through their representatives, to challenge the juggernaut of government.

So it is our duty to seek improvement, to say to the government which probably will not listen, and to the people who may, that this House, this parliament, must be equipped with the means and the tools to carry out its responsibilities. Society to live, to survive, to progress must change, conform and adopt.

The choice we face is either to secure these changes by the proper interrelationship of parliament and government so that from time to time we reach a consensus to bring the greatest good for the greatest number—a result which has to be judged by the needs of the people and not the wishes of the executive—or else we will have to cope with the painful alternative of explosive violence which we see around us. Mr. Chairman, the choice is for us in this parliament today.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, in the inter-party discussions which we had, we arranged for a certain number of departments to be given our attention during these three days. It is correct that the estimates of the Treasury Board were to be first on the list so that we could have a parliamentary discussion on government spending in general, and on the way in which parliament handles the government's estimates.

● (1550)

The hon. member for Peace River has conformed to that arrangement. I wish to make a few comments on what he has said and on the things that have been designated for this discussion. I think it is fair to say we do not intend to stay very long on this subject. Rather, we welcome this opportunity afforded to us in these three days to get at the substance of the estimates of several departments. Accordingly, before long we will be into the estimates of the Department of Transport.

However, the remarks of my good friend from Peace River prompt me to make a few comments I had not planned to make. If I may be so presumptuous, I shall characterize his speech as being divided into two main parts. On the one hand, he levelled an attack at government spending generally. In fact, he called the estimates a $25 billion rip-off of the Canadian people. On the other hand, he criticized the methods by which we allegedly scrutinize the estimates or study the spending program of the government. One of my reasons for separating his speech into those two parts is that I do not want to confuse them. I want to speak about them separately.

With regard to government spending generally, I know that it is a favourite indoor sport to attack governments for expenditures, and to treat governments as though they are highwaymen holding up the Canadian people for the benefit of those who happen to sit on the treasury benches.

Let me say that I am terribly aware, and I have been around here long enough to have that awareness fully developed, of wasteful expenditure on the part of the government. I am frequently annoyed at the high salaries that are paid in certain areas. I am critical, as are all my colleagues, of government priorities in spending. Far too often unimportant things get the money that should be going into things that would make life better for human beings as individuals.

Having said that, let me deny the assertion that taxing and spending of the people's money is somehow a rip-off by highway robbers.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. In order to make the hon. member's task easier and let him devote his time to that area which I think is more subject to attack, may I say I did not intend to create the impression that there was a challenge against all government spending. I was going back to my days in law when theft was defined as taking without colour of right. I was challenging the government for taking money without being subject to the usual precautions, scrutiny and safeguards which we ought to have. I ask the hon. member to take that as my understanding.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to let the hon. member put that gloss on what he said if he wishes to do so. However, the fact is he did say this is not properly called an appropriation of funds but a misappropriation. He applied that to the whole book. He said it was a $25 billion rip-off of the Canadian people. I want to make the proposition that this is an attack on government itself. It is an attack on civilization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friends do not seem to realize that civilization does not consist of a lot of individuals living in a dog eat dog fashion. Civilization consists of an organized society in which we decide, in an organized way, how we are going to distribute the wealth that we produce. If we did not have government, if we were an unorganized conglomeration with each of us going his own way, poverty and suffering in this country would be worse than they are at present. Inequality would be far greater.

By having government, which is an organization of society, we see to it that at least a portion of the wealth we produce—and I mean real wealth, goods and services—is distributed among the people of the community as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If my friends to my right are hurt, they can say so. They can use the rest of these three days to bring out those antediluvian ideas that they want to put forward.

Some hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I submit that the major portion of the money—not just the 57 per cent, but the money spent on highways, defence, postal services, health and all the rest of it—that is collected by governments at all levels, municipal, provincial and federal, then recycled and spent, is a process of society deciding how our wealth is going to be distributed, and trying to do it on the basis of some sort of fairness and equality for all our people.

I insist that my friends to the right cannot stand up and call for massive reductions in government expenditures unless they say where those reductions are to take place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are they going to reduce the money spent on old age pensions? For my part, I want to see a lot more spent on old age pensions, family allowances, housing, health and all those services that will make life better for the Canadian people. I want to see less money spent on a lot of public buildings that are not necessary. I want to see a lot less money spent on high salaries. I do not want any more money wasted on us. I want the money we collect and recycle through the process of government to get through to the people.

I submit that this attack on government spending which we get from my friends to the right all the time is completely out of touch with the basic philosophy and basic fact of civilization. I once read an article, I forget where, which was addressed to Governor Reagan of California. The article said that Governor Reagan must be told that civilization costs money.

If we are going to have a civilized Canada in which people have health services, housing, pensions and an organized community which they can count on having some dependability, it is going to cost money. That is what government is all about, and that is true at the local municipal level, at the provincial level and at the federal level.

People sometimes take the attitude that taxes are some sort of a fine, penalty, highway robbery or, to use the hon. member's word, misappropriation. I submit they are very often collected unfairly. A lot of tax is collected for wasteful expenditures and things that ought not to have priority—

An hon. Member: Like the Senate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, like the Senate. Get that on the record. The basic fact is that we are, in this collective way, paying for services. When we pay taxes we are not paying a fine to the Minister of Finance, the President of the Treasury Board or anyone else over there. We are paying for the cost of services that government provides.

In the context of that, I claim full right to be critical of the way these moneys are spent. I claim full right to be critical of high salaries for top senior civil servants, members of parliament, and of other ways moneys are spent.

Mr. Chrétien: Speak of Barrett in B.C.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am just as critical of any government, even if of my party's persuasion, that does it. I am especially critical of the failure to make substantial increases in the basic old age pensions, to spend more money on housing, or to provide other services that our people so sorely need. I believe in civilization. I believe in Canada being a modern, humane civilization. But I accept the fact that this will cost money, and the big corporations, the ones that are getting 60 per cent or 80 per cent increase in profits every year, aren't going to do it.

● (1600)

The money can be collected and used to provide for a decent civilization only if we do it through the instrument of government. I think we could have a much better government than the one we see opposite, but the fact remains that if we are to have civilization we need a government which is prepared to levy taxes and then to use those taxes on the basis of proper priorities to create a decent, humane society for all our people. So I urge that we not waste time on this nonsense of picking up this book of $25 billion dollars worth of estimates for the year and saying that it is a misappropriation act.

Mr. Baldwin: It is just a rip-off.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is more responsible than that. I know, because he is my friend and I like him. He could make a much better contribution to the debate than that. Don't worry about this talk about a minority parliament as opposed to a majority parliament. Whatever the situation, we have the right to try to make parliament work, and we want to see it work for the best kind of civilization we can have.

An hon. Member: He is trying for a Senate seat.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If that remark has gone on the record, the member who made it knows there is one member here who would absolutely refuse to go to the other place and it is this member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I have more sympathy with the hon. member for Peace River when he is talking about the other subject he dealt with, the question whether or not in parliament we give adequate scrutiny to the estimates. I do not believe we do. However, I still feel it is not much help for one side to damn the other because we haven't got a proper system. I believe we should put our collective minds together and try to work out a better system of handling the estimates, instead of just letting the opposition berate the government because we don't have it.

I have been around here for a while. I happened to come when the House of Commons was still handling estimates the way they were handled in the year one, and even though that was in wartime when we had a huge appropriation bill, it worked. We did every estimate of the federal government on the floor of this chamber in committee of supply, and of all the systems in my experience I think it was the best. The reason it had to go was because of the sheer explosion of expenditure. At the beginning of World War II the budget amounted to about half a billion dollars. In the first years after the war it got up to one or two billion dollars. I remember those terrible budgets which the father of the hon. member for Mississauga brought in—four or five billion dollars. Now it is $25 billion dollars. And with all the different things we spend money on, all the different things parliament is involved in, it was just impossible to continue the system we had down into the forties and fifties.

I was also here in the days when we did estimates on the floor of the House but had a limited number of days for them. That was just about as bad. In fact, it was worse. We got the estimates passed, but all the ministers had to do was just to sit them out. They knew that with the passage of time their estimates would get through. So we agreed, all of us in all parties, to try a new system of referring the estimates to committee. Then we bring them back to the House and normally we don't have this kind of debate—we just vote on them. I don't think it is working as it should.

I don't suggest we go back to the other system because there aren't enough days in which to do it, but I still think there is merit in the idea that at least some departments of the government—and here I am with the hon. member for Peace River, my good friend, 100 per cent—namely, the departments the opposition chooses, every year should be brought on the floor of the House and discussed without time limit.

I would rather have two or three departments in a year without time limit, than have 20 departments with two or three days each. The moment one places a time limit on estimates all the minister in charge of a department has to do is to sit there and listen to the speeches knowing that when the time comes the vote takes place and, with a majority government, his estimates will go through.

Therefore, I argue we should improve upon the present system, let most of the estimates go to committees as they now do, and let the members of those committees make the searching inquiries they talk about. But I think the opposition should have the right to say that we want these departments, A, B and C, or X, Y and Z, back here on the floor. The opposition should pick them, they should come back to the House of Commons, and they should be discussed on the floor of the House of Commons without time limit. Unless something like this is done the so-called studies we make are not studies at all.

In this sense I do not blame the hon. member for Peace River for feeling we are just a rubber stamp approving something which has already been done. The size of that book, of course is frightening. It is at least four times the size of the book of estimates we had when I first came here, and it gives about one-quarter of the information. Surely some improvement can be made in his area in improving the handling of the estimates. I think what should be done is for all of us to put our ideas into the pot to see whether we can come up with some better way. Mr. Chairman, I believe we can.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make rather brief remarks after those made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien).

Since this is the first time we deal with a matter involving him, I would like first of all to congratulate him for his appointment as President of the Treasury Board. With his long cabinet experience and that spirit of his, I think he will be able to make a useful contribution.

Mr. Chairman, I also want to assure him of our full cooperation in the consideration of bills introduced by him but, of course, as long as they are acceptable to us.

When the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) was interviewed on Lise Payette's television program on the CBC, in Montreal, he said that his role was to limit, control and supervise the estimates of each department. He gave the impression that he coordinated the activities of departments and that the Treasury Board accepted to vote credits at the request of the deparment and established priorities.

Indeed, in the statement about the purpose of his department contained in the main estimates, it is said that the minister is responsible for the selection of programs and projects that will achieve the objectives of the government in the most effective manner and in accordance with its priorities.

Mr. Chairman, if I am not mistaken, and I would like to restrict my comments to this point, the minister is responsible not only for accepting a list of priorities established by the Cabinet, but also for applying it and coordinating it with the activities of other departments.

Mr. Chairman, if this is true, I believe that the minister will have much to do to modernize this department. His role will be to ensure that there will be no double funding to meet the same objectives and that there is no conflict between two programs, since, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said in the same spirit, it would be dishonest to blame the government for spending too much while requesting more money for other programs. But this does not mean, Mr. Chairman, that we should waste public funds in some areas because we allow double investments or conflicts between programs.

I would like to clarify this point by giving a specific example: Of course, these problems do not occur at the level of government leadership, but when the laws are applied in practice, Mr. Chairman, many of the criticisms made by our fellow citizens in this area are quite justified. The administration of the laws and the various programs cost a lot of money and do not meet the desired objectives. All public servants in general, except of course those whose working contract was being negotiated at the time, received $500 as a sort of bonus. Even the employees of Crown corporations have received this bonus. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the House of Commons staff did not get it.

Here is what I am driving at. When we get in touch with the responsible people in the manpower mobility program, we are told that House of Commons employees, being members of the civil service are not entitled to the manpower mobility allowance. On the other hand, House of Commons employees who request equal treatment with the civil service are told by Treasury Board or I don't know who that they are not entitled to it because they are not members of the civil service.

Mr. Chairman, this is the kind of inconsistencies which I think important to raise now when we are considering the estimates of the Treasury Board Department. The way I understand the minister's explanations, both outside and inside the House, the role of his department is extremely important. The responsible minister should set up within the Treasury Board a body that would look into such discrepancies that cannot be justified.

You have the choice of two things, Mr. Chairman: either House of Commons employees belong to the public service and, as such, are entitled to all its avantages, or they do not belong to the public service and are therefore entitled to all the benefits available under the various departmental programs, including manpower mobility.

I suggest that we should clarify problems such as this, so that our employees, wherever they are in Canada, or the Canadian people may get what is coming to them without prejudice or contradiction on the part of other departments.

In this connection, I should like to give another example. In the estimates of the department, we shall be asked to votre some amounts of money for the Opportunities for Youth program or the summer student employment program. Mr. Chairman, I feel these programs are important. They should come under the Department of Manpower and Immigration. It was a long time the responsibility of the Secretary of State.

For practical purposes, we may wonder, when we consider some projects, whether they were set up to create jobs to help municipalities or teaching institutions. Mr. Chairman, this is another example among many others of an instance in which the Treasury Board might have an important part to play. If, on the one hand, the minister is endowed with the necessary authority to allocate funds to various programs according to government priorities, I should imagine that, on the other hand, that authority of his to allocate funds should entitle him to review their enforcement. I should think the Treasury Board is a kind of watchdog on the look out for the proper enforcement of laws and the proper management of programs and public funds.

If the minister manages the $27 billion paid by taxpayers and under various tax programs, I think he is responsible to the people for the proper allocation of those funds with the slightest possible amount of clashes between various programs.

I should therefore be glad to hear the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board in this regard, concerning that increasingly important part to be played by the department. I think the Treasury Board has a privileged position not only to coordinate the work of departments and ensure the enforcement of governmental priorities, but also to enforce laws, and above all to avoid useless and sometimes shocking and unfair contradictions as regards their enforcement.

Mr. Chairman, we in this House often vote for the allocation of sizeable amounts to some particular program. But when it comes to the practical use they are put to owing to ever more complex regulations as well as to civil servants who may feel overly secure in their job and also possibly arrogant and a long way from administration, it appears that those laws do not really meet the needs they were supposed to.

Mr. Chairman, I think the Treasury Board has a part to play, and it should have some organization responsible to the President of the Treasury Board for ensuring that the laws that are voted on and passed by the representatives of the people are being applied in conformity with their targets.

Mr. Chairman, to go one step further in that direction, if an hon. member were critical about something, before he would start pouring out his endless lamentations to the House and wasting the time of hon. members, he could immediately get in touch with the department concerned which would check into the matter of his criticism.

Mr. Chairman, I think that would be a guarantee for the public that the funds will be well spent and will serve their purpose. Nobody is happy to pay taxes, yet everyone has to, because that is the way the administration works. It is understood that the government must keep an open mind on all suggestions and positive remarks that might be made. I think one of those suggestions would be that the Treasury Board stop being run has it has always been, i.e. according to that good old British method where nothing moves and we are content with granting the funds asked for, and that, furthermore, it play an innovative role within the administration. Only then will the new President of the Treasury Board really prove equal to his task.

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Peace River, particularly to his criticism of the way in which supply had been handled and his plea to go back to the good old days. In the good old days there was a natural termination to supply in the House of Commons; basically the population was rural in nature and people wanted to leave the House of Commons to get back to the farm to plant their seeds. Therefore, there was a natural desire to get the blazes out of here and do something constructive, so that the estimates usually passed.

Just before I came to the House of Commons in 1965 I had spent two years as an executive assistant watching the House of Commons, particularly the supply procedures. I recall the good old days when we used to go through the annual procedure of voting supply just prior to the running out of the estimates. There was the odd occasion when, by accident, the estimates were not voted and the pension cheques would be held up for a time. Everyone would feel sorry, and the first opportunity they got they very contritely voted supply as quickly as possible.

The reason that we changed the supply procedures was that it was obvious that they were not working to the satisfaction of either the opposition or members of the government. Thus we came with the new system, the implications of which we are working our way through still.

Just what is the situation? We abolished the committee of supply and put the estimates in the hands of some 20 odd standing committees. At a stroke more time was made available for the discussion of supply than had been the case before. At a stroke there was a greater opportunity to question and to put on the griddle the administrators of government programs—that is, the civil servants. We never had that opportunity before.

We have more opportunity, as a consequence of the new system, to participate in constructive criticism of the spending policies of the government. There is more opportunity given to backbenchers to make themselves heard. Much more careful examination is permitted.

Mr.Baldwin: What about the Minister of Energy who won't let civil servants speak without his consent?

Mr. Reid: All I can say to that is that any minister who allows a civil servant to express policy is clearly out of his mind.

Mr. Baldwin: I did not say anything about policy.

Mr. Reid: If a minister has confidence in his civil servants he can certainly let them talk about administration, and this has been the practice for a very long time.

● (1620)

Mr. Baldwin: Look at the record.

Mr. Reid: We have always done that. At any committee I have attended civil servants appeared and provided information at the request of the minister. We still have the doctrine of ministerial responsibility in relation to what goes on in the department. That is the responsibility of the minister, and I see no contradiction at all. Indeed, I would say that the day we cease to have ministerial responsibility and a minister is not accountable for what goes on in his department, that is the day parliamentary democracy goes down the drain. I think the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is quite correct in his approach.

Mr. Baldwin: Do you agree with Macdonald?

Mr. Reid: I say we still have the doctrine of ministerial responsibility, and if I were a minister I would be clearly out of my mind—

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Reid: —if I allowed somebody else to take on the responsibility for which I, in the end, would be taken to task.

An hon. Member: Look what happened to Stanley. They pulled the plug.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: And look what happened to Herb Gray.

Mr. Reid: To go back to a more interesting subject, I think I am fair in interpreting the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River by suggesting that he is prepared to enter into discussions with those of us on this side who are interested in reform not only of the procedures of the committee of supply, but also the procedures of the House as a whole.

The essential difficulty we face is that we have had tremendous misallocation of the use of our time. We changed the situation because there are extraordinarily few members of parliament who now seriously seek to cut estimates. There are few members of parliament who really are serious about chopping items out of the estimates. Just take a look at any of the question periods since we have come back and you will find it very difficult to demonstrate, to any fair-minded person, that the thrust of the questions is for the government to stop spending. The burden of the questions generally is on why are we not spending more. With these changes we are spenders.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reid: As the House of Commons we are spenders. If you will take a look at the estimates over the last two years you will see that that parliament, as a minority, was the greatest spending parliament this country has ever known, and it was a spending parliament in large part because of the minority situation. I cannot recall one instance in respect of any program that there was opposition by the official opposition, and in respect of which it voted against it.

The point is that the philosophy of members of parliament when it comes to dealing with supply has changed. We are no longer out to cut spending, rather we are out to increase supply. That means the approach we take in dealing with estimates is obviously of a different nature. It means that the old system we had was obsolete, and was properly thrown out, Mr. Chairman.

The present system of supply is not satisfactory to the government. The government would like to see substantial changes. The government feels that the opportunities the opposition has had to cross-examine in respect of estimates, both in the committees and in the House, have not been exploited to the full. It is our feeling that the 25 allotted days the opposition has now have not been utilized to the fullest extent, particularly in cross-examining on the estimates. They have been used for other purposes, not in opposition to the rules, but it seems that members of the opposition have had the opportunity within their grasp to focus more clearly on government spending if they had chosen to use the opportunity.

After the estimates are returned to the House on May 31 there are up to 13 opposition days at the disposal of the opposition during the month of June. Do we see the members of the opposition bringing forth departmental estimates for discussion in the House of Commons? I suggest the answer is that we do not. Do we hear the opposition members coming forward and saying they agree to a special order in respect of the Committee of the Whole so they can bring these departmental extimates in here? I suggest we do not. Instead what we see is a never ending number of resolutions about this thing or that thing, all items of interest to the public, I am sure, but none that deal with supply.

Under the rules there are opportunities available to members of the opposition which they are not now using. If they were to think about the problem and come up with propositions I am sure the government would be more than prepared to go half way in accommodating them. They might suggest some kind of system to bring back to the floor of the House the estimates within the existing structure. I do not think I am saying anything new to members of the House of Commons because, obviously, this is the case stated by the present President of the Privy Council and his predecessor.

Let me deal with the matter of guidelines and the information the hon. member for Peace River mentioned and about which he is so concerned. I quite agree it has been 18 months since the guidelines were released to the House of Commons. They were referred to the Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, headed by an hon. member of the opposition and a member from the Senate. There was no consideration given during the last parliament to these guidelines which, as I say, were referred 18 months ago.

The point I am trying to make is that the government is prepared to do everything possible to co-operate with the committee. We are prepared to enter into negotiations with members of the opposition once the report is made. We want to ensure that members of parliament get all the information they require.

An hon. Member: You mean all the information that Keith Davey won't let us have.

Mr. Reid: We are prepared to do everything we can to see that this comes about, but you cannot fault the government for not having referred these guidelines to a committee of the House of Commons which had the power to hold hearings, to call ministers and other witnesses, and produce a report over a period of 18 months. That is why this will be on the order paper again, and that is why it will be referred again to committee.

The government has been prepared to move quicker on parliamentary reform than have members of the opposition in many cases. The last point I want to make relates to the pro forma speech by the hon. member for Peace River in which he commented about remarks of the President of the Treasury Board. If the argument is not made by that hon. member it is made by the hon. member for Yukon, but the argument is always made, and it is always that they have not had sufficient time. They always say they are under the guillotine, and that these estimates are being forced down their throats. They always resent this very much.

Mr. Baldwin: You are right on.

Mr. Reid: Even when we had the good old days of the committee of supply opposition members still made the same speech. Nothing has changed. The point I am trying to make is that the circumstances may have changed but the argument has not. This is the same old gang with the same old thoughts.

What we obviously need is to work out some system so the estimates of government can be thoroughly investigated as quickly as possible. There must also at some time be an agreement to put the motion, however brutal that thought may be. This has always been the great problem, getting members on the other side to agree to put the motion. They have always had the concept that as long as they can spin out debate then nothing will happen. Then, of course, we are forced into the situation where some restraint has to be put on, and that has been the case in the past because of the mockery that has been made of supply procedures.

It seems to me that whatever new system of supply we come up with, we will still have to face up to the fact that at some point there has to be a decision. The government is the biggest spender of money and has the most people dependent upon it. We just cannot have a kind of system where things are left to the whims of a few people sitting in the House of Commons.

Members of parliament have a right to vote on these estimates. They have the right to vote against them, and they have the right to reduce them. If the present procedures are not adequate perhaps we should be looking for procedures to make sure their right is fully enshrined, so that if anybody feels he does not have the right this would set him straight.

I can recall the last time members of the opposition swiftly moved to cut into the estimates of a department. That was when they moved to cut out the expenditure of $19,000 in the estimates of Information Canada. The money had already been spent by that time. That is an indication of the opposition being able to cut out certain estimates. The power is there, but whether it is exercised is a matter for members on the other side to determine.

There is also the power on the part of members of committees to reduce estimates and to have these estimates come back in the form of a report. Members of a committee have the power to bring that report to the attention of the House of Commons. That has never been done, to my knowledge, in the manner prescribed by Standing Order 58 by any opposition member of any standing committee. I may not be completely correct on that because I believe once in a committee they went after the president of the CBC and reduced an item to $1 at the time the hon. member for Cochrane was chairman of the committee.

My own feeling is that the current procedures in dealing with supply, while an improvement over what we had before, can still be improved. I do not think we can look at the question of supply in isolation. I think it must be considered in relation to the over-all procedure of the House of Commons.

There is no secret about the fact that the workload of the House of Commons is increasing because of the amount of government legislation which is before the House. We have, therefore, limited time before us in the House to deal with matters of supply. These are very knotty problems, and it seems to me that if members opposite wish to bring back to the House the committee of supply, in addition to the 25 days now allotted to them under standing orders, then there must be a serious over-all attempt to speed up the legislative process.

We have not yet faced the basic problem that our workload is expanding while the time frame remains the same. We will have to make some very difficult decisions.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to spend very much time speaking about things referred to specifically by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, except to say it has been my good fortune to serve as Leader of the Opposition in more than one legislature.

I notice here, as well as where I served before, that members on the government side who have never served in the opposition tend to have a certain glibness. I might even say they tend to have a certain arrogance. I know only one cure for this; that is for them to have the good fortune to spend a certain amount of time in the opposition.

I first came to this chamber in the fall of 1967. At that time the estimates came before the House, but there was a time limit. Having come from a legislature in which ministers had to answer questions if they hoped to get their estimates passed, and a legislature in which it was possible even for a small opposition to force a minister to give a satisfactory and full answer, and where the government really was responsible to the legislature and through the legislature to the people, it was very trying to come here and find that the ministers did not answer questions, and that there seemed to be absolutely no way to get ministers to answer questions.

I can recall being completely amazed when sitting here to notice that a minister would say he would take note of a question and then, when it suited him, he would get up and answer the question to which he chose to reply. No matter how unsatisfactory his answer may have been there was nothing the opposition could do about it under the rules as they existed. Today of course there is even less capacity for the opposition to make the minister really responsible.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River spoke about the minister rather than the public servants being responsible. Of course that is true. The point I wish to make, however, which there is no need to belabour, is that we no longer have responsible government in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Excuse me. Let me finish. We no longer have it in the sense that a minister must answer to this House. There is no way I know, at least in a majority parliament, for a minister to be made to respond in this House. I wish members of this House and the people of the country to think about this.

I shall not argue this afternoon about the amount of the expenditures, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred. That is not my concern this afternoon. My concern is to emphasize that I was personally struck by the situation here, having come from a legislature in which a minister had to answer questions satisfactorily if he wished to get his estimates through. Dealing with supply is not just a matter of dealing with estimates.

The refusal of parliament to pass supply traditionally has been a weapon available to parliament. In the old days it was used against the King, and then in modern times against a minister. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River must get through his head the fact that it is not merely a matter of reducing estimates, although that might be important. The essence of consideration of supply is that really this is the moment of truth. That is what it used to be, and should be. That is the time when a minister really must answer to this House. In my time here a minister has not had to do this, and on very few occasions has done so. In that very real sense I say that we no longer have responsible government at the federal level in this country.

Mr. Sharp: That is nonsense.

Mr. Stanfield: If the minister had listened to what I said—

Mr. Sharp: I did carefully.

Mr. Stanfield: —he would have to agree with what I said, because there is no way under present circumstances in which a minister can be forced to give information to this House. A minister does not give information unless it suits his purpose.

In a sense I find myself in considerable agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre although I do not know whether I would say he has necessarily put forward the right solution, that of bringing the estimates back to the House, since ministers did not give the information in the House except when it suited their convenience.

This is a very important question. I understand the concern of the government about getting more bills through the House, and so on. Although I understand this concern I would point out that there is a very important other side to the coin, which is that the system is not working. No one need kid himself. When I came here it was very apparent that a minister was not answerable to the House. He was not answerable then, and is not answerable now. There is no point in any one in this House pretending otherwise.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, when I asked if I might speak on the estimates I had no intention of becoming involved in the semantics of the rules. That is not my bag. Most of the remarks I had intended to make in reply to my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River were made more effectively than I could make them by the Leader of the Opposition.

I should like to remind the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that I served as a minister in a majority parliament, and at that time my Prime Minister, no matter what the provocation, insisted that I stay in the House on a particular day for as long as it took to give the minority every chance to protest. He held that the more vigorous the opposition might be, the more tolerant government should be in allowing it to protest. I do not believe the hon. member for Timiskaming is in the House at the present time, but I have taken his attack four times in the same speech, delivered four times on the same day. Perhaps I could remind the parliamentary secretary, who was not there at the time, that in those days the NDP only had eight members.

An hon. Member: Good old days.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): And the official opposition had less than 50. Those eight members in the NDP would get together and plan their two or three days' attack on the estimates, and they did more to stand the government on its head than did the less than 50 Liberals because they understood the pressure that could be put on a minister who had to stay here until they were satisfied. One of the reasons why the government from 1958 to 1962 was one of the best governments in this country was the calibre of the intelligent opposition we got from the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I pay them that tribute to illustrate a point.

I have been back now in the House for two years, and I confess that I am seriously ashamed and shocked that even though I try to be constructive on occasions and not always partisan I have been in committees where we tried to obtain information from ministers and their officials, but where the Liberals, of whom there were only eight, were not contributing anything much in particular yet each took his full ten minutes so as to make sure we did not have time to ask our questions. This is not a violent statement of prejudice. Now that they have the majority I see the difference already. All that the members on the Liberal side do at the meetings which I have attended in the last two weeks is to vote against us.

Naturally we are going to accept the offer of the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. We do have to try, because we are all good Canadians, to find how we can make it work a little better. I do not foresee bringing all the departments here, and keeping them here indefinitely until the opposition is satisfied, but I would suggest, as a non expert, that if we had in the opposition the right to pick two or three departments, and the government ministers did not know which were going to be picked, then all the ministers would be a little more willing to reply. If we had the right to pick the worst offenders, we would be able to straighten things out. It would not be perfect, but it would help.

We want to try to make parliament work better. Certainly the rules were bad in my day, but they are worse today. That is the point.

As an example of the other type of abuse of the estimates let me make use of the right of members of parliament to ask questions on specific details. If I could attract the attention of the President of the Treasury Board for a minute, I have a specific question to ask him. When the estimates are prepared on supplementaries, has the custom changed, namely, that these estimates are a true indication of the estimated cost of the item for the fiscal year named on the cover of the estimates?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: The answer is yes, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The minister says yes. That is where I think I can demonstrate to him that we can serve this parliament and country well. If we turn to page 6 of the supplementary estimates for Energy, Mines and Resources, we note that there are two supplementary estimates. Vote 11a is for $470 million. In committee we questioned the minister and found that this item was up to the end of October, and that we did not have the information we required for the approval of that estimate in the committee.

But in questioning the minister, and from his own opening statement, we find that Vote 52a for $330 million only covers the months of November and December. Therefore my submission to the minister is that this is not a true reflection of the cost, and that parliament and the people should be told what will be paid in the forum of this subsidy for oil in eastern Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes.

This parliament, before it can vote these estimates sincerely and honestly, must know that there is another estimate of approximately $300 million, if not $400 million. I will not quarrel as to whether or not this is the exact figure. The fact is that these estimates do not cover the full fiscal year. Purely on the grounds of a technical error or, as the hon. member for Peace River would say, sloppiness, we are not getting a true estimate.

Naturally one asks why this is so, and the rationalization given to us in committee was that this whole subsidy has no legal basis. Therefore, since they are acting illegally in collecting this money, they did not want this illegality to last too long. They hope, some time in this parliament, to get a bill passed that would legalize the illegal act. I suggest that once you lose your virginity, the time factor is unimportant.

I ask the minister this question: will he consider, in consultation with his officials—because members of the opposition have no right to do this—whether the estimate now before this House, before these three days are over, could be raised to something approaching more closely the real estimate of the cost that the people of Canada will have to put up for this subsidy. I suggest, using the information with which the minister has provided us, that the subsidy to the eastern people is costing us $100 million a month. If we add another $300 million we will have a more accurate estimate. Can the minister tell us whether it is possible to make this change?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I would like to reply to the honourable member in clarification of that item. I referred to this problem in my presentation. Of course in the supplementary estimates I have tried to cover the months of November and December. It is because this process of transferring money for the export of oil to the eastern consumer has been debated in the House a long time ago. The bill was introduced in the House, but was not passed because of the election. Now we are in October. We started the session only a few weeks ago. At the start we had the debate on the Speech from the Throne. To be honest, we do not know when the bill will be passed. We have made a guess, but we cannot take into account all the factors.

Normally, this bill should be passed by the end of the year, but as we wanted to have the authority to spend that money before the end of the year we put that in the supplementary estimates so that, before we make the expenditure, members of the House will have the occasion to debate it and vote on it. If those estimates are passed by the end of this week the House will have authorized the government to pay the subsidy to the eastern consumers until the end of the year. We hope that by that time the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will have received approval through the passage of the legislation in the House.

If the House turns down the legislation, it will mean that at the end of the year there will be no more authority to pay the subsidy. We are not trying to mislead anyone. On the contrary, we are making sure that hon. members are aware of the fact that those payments will be made in November and December.

● (1650)

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I think we have joined issue fairly on this item. My point is that the government has no right in the first instance to assume that parliament will pass this legislation before Christmas. The government knows that all parties have supported the principle of this subsidy. We are not quarrelling about the fact that they are doing this illegally because of the circumstances. We are saying that the proper presentation to the House and to the country of supplementary estimates A, and the calculation of the estimated cost, whether done legally or illegally, is not the point. It should be the amount you expect to spend by the end of the fiscal year, not the calendar year.

I am raising this point for the experts because I do not consider myself an expert. I recall that when I sat in Treasury Board we always hounded the departments to be precise in their estimates. If a minister brought before Treasury Board estimates for eight or nine months, he was sent back. I am really asking the minister if he would not agree that to add $400 million would be more honest estimating and more honest reporting to the House. The media should be able to report to the country that this program is going to cost $1,200 million, not $800 million. This matter is put forward without any desire on my part to make political hay, but just in a desire for honest reporting. If the officials can find a way to do it, let them be a little more honest in reporting their estimates.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I should like to look into that question. I have been very candid and explained why we did this. We could have estimated up to the end of the fiscal year, but we took a calculated risk that the bill would be passed by the end of the year and we did not want to presume too much regarding the content of the bill. It was and I regret to use the term, a conservative estimate and we tried not to prejudge what the House would do. The point made by the hon. member is a good one, and perhaps we should forecast for the total fiscal year. I wanted to be as honest as possible with the House. I did not want to hide anything; I wanted the judgment of the House when members voted on the bill.

The Chairman: Order, please. At this time I should like to seek direction from members of the committee. It was suggested that the time allocated to the consideration of the estimates of the Department of the Treasury Board should be a maximum of an hour and a half. Three or four members are standing, seeking to speak. Much time has been spent in general debate on the question of past and future procedures for the study of supply, so I would invite comments from hon. members on how the Chair should proceed at this time. Should we close this debate, and proceed to another item?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, possibly there are a few comments to be made and questions to be asked. The committee might consider allowing this department's estimates to continue to not later than 5.30. That would leave three hours for consideration of the estimates of the Department of Transport. I know the minister is most anxious to get started.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I would go along with the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River. To a large extent, these proceedings are in the hands of the opposition. It was their suggestion that time be allocated to the departments, and if they would like to have less time for the Department of Transport, and more for Treasury Board, I am sure we will be satisfied.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, since we are operating on the basis of an agreement and not a fixed order, obviously we have to be a bit flexible. My colleagues and I would rather move to Transport now, but we will accept, say, 5.20. That is, if this department is not finished by 5.20, we will move on to Transport.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order, as the previous speakers pointed out, it is not a rigid regulation. It is rather an amicable arrangement. I think I will support the proposition made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with the hope that the President of the Privy Council may accept it. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity, still on that same point of order, to say to the parliamentary secretary that if what he said a few moments ago about the opposition was true, Mr. Chairman, we would have answered no a long time ago.

[English]

The Chairman: We are proceeding under an agreement, and this makes it a little more difficult for the Chair to meet the objective of 5.20 or 5.30. Hon. members, of course, could cut short their speeches or questioning so that as many members as possible could participate.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not know what the agreement is that hon. members are speaking of, but I was not privy to it. I think I have as much right as anyone else in this committee to speak and to be heard. I am getting a little fed up, because I come into the House day after day and find that the party "wheels" and party whips have got together and made some sort of agreement. I represent a good many constituents in the province of New Brunswick, and I desire to be heard and I hope to be heard.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Jones: I do not belong to any of the standing committees and therefore do not have an opportunity to speak in those committees, so I want to be heard in this House and in committee of the whole.

The Chairman: I note that the hon. member, like other hon. members, rose and participated in this debate. Some hon. members have not yet been recognized. It is the prerogative of the Chair to call on hon. members one at a time; two members cannot speak at the same time. We have to proceed in an orderly way in committee of the whole and in the House. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Chairman, I had not planned to speak at this point in the proceedings, but when the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River made his eloquent speech I thought we had, suddenly, a TV camera in the House. The hon. member said the opposition has the right to vote on estimates, to vote against them or to reduce them; but, Mr.Chairman, hon. members on this side of the House do not always have a chance to get answers in committee.

The other night I had the misfortune of attending a committee meeting on supply and services when the minister was sick. I understand he is still sick. However, he was represented at the committee by his deputy minister. The president of two corporations was before the committee—Canadian Arsenals Corporation and Canadian Commercial Corporation. I agree that if we had been given proper information and our questions had been answered, we would have no reason to raise these matters in this chamber. I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River should make the same admission as some members of his party who were at the committee: they were ashamed of the answers we were getting. The president of Canadian Commercial Corporation could not tell us the names of the ten major companies with whom he dealt, and as president of Canadian Arsenals Corporation—it is the same gentleman—he could not answer all the questions we asked. In fact, he could not answer any. I made a motion which even the Liberals supported, that we demand this information.

I think the government should make sure that the civil servants who come to committees are prepared to answer the questions of the opposition. I think if any government member or any minister went through the report of that committee meeting he would not find one question that was unfair. Every question was legitimate. Canadian Arsenals Corporation has been losing money for a year. Although it employs 500 people, it is costing the Canadian taxpayer $3½ million. Therefore, the Canadian people have a right to know what that company does in its operations. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River shakes his head. We could not get answers.

I am standing here now taking up time of this committee, which I did not plan to do. I have to do it because I listened to what the hon. member said, which sort of indicated he is white and we are all black. I do not think that is quite the way it is. If he is looking for co-operation, he should make sure we get the answers we want. He should also make sure that the people who appear before the committee have the answers we want. Members on this side of the House would then co-operate with members on the other side and make sure government business is handled quickly.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, like other members, I did not intend to intervene. This has been a very useful debate on how estimates are handled. I understand that in the British parliament and in other parliaments they have almost given up on the estimates. I believe in many cases the estimates are tabled. That is an abdication of the responsibility of parliament. There is legitimate concern on the part of members of the opposition who have expressed their point of view about their ability to deal with the estimates. The difficulty lies in the fact that as far as estimates are concerned, the committee system is not functioning the way it should. The chairmen of committees should call more frequent meetings to deal with specific situations. The time given to committees has not been adequate to deal with the witnesses brought before them. Hon. members of this House, myself included, have not been adequately prepared when going to committee meetings. We have not been prepared to the extent necessary in order to make the examination that it is our obligation to make.

The reform of the procedures of this House wherein we abolished the committee of supply was, on balance of consideration by hon. members, a good move. The rules provide for better use of our opportunities of examination. However, there is an obligation on all of us who are members of committees to make sure that meetings are more frequent and to make better use of the time allocated for witnesses and civil servants who are called before committees. If there were less waste of time and more efficient and adequate opportunity, we would carry out the kind of examination that I am sure we in conscience feel we should.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct some questions to the President of the Treasury Board. When the President of the Treasury Board appeared before the miscellaneous estimates committee and answered questions, I tried to get some rationale from him as to the formula used by the government to control increasing expenditures at the federal level. At that time he said the goal of the government is that total federal expenditures in relation to the gross national product should be relatively the same. He then said they have been relatively the same, and gave certain figures. For example, government expenditures in 1972 represented 15 per cent of the gross national product. He also referred to certain other years. I pressed the minister on that point and said I understood the figure was more like 20 per cent. I gave him some figures. Then there was general agreement that he would supply a table, which would be appended to the minutes of the committee meeting, setting out his figures.

That table has just appeared. It seems to seriously misrepresent the government's position and I take great exception to the way the table is set out. For example, it shows 1973 total government expenditures, and then in small type, "exclusive of transfers to other governments, at $17,595,000,000". Surely the President of the Treasury Board knows that the estimates being considered at the present time are $24 billion.

There is no explanation whatsoever for that figure. The various percentage figures are shown. However, when they come down to provincial and municipal figures, an entirely different presentation is made. The impression left is that federal government expenditures, before all transfers, are much lower in reality when compared to the provinces that are shown. I would like the President of the Treasury Board to explain why they have to practice such deceit.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I wish to reply to the argument of the hon. member. When I appeared before the committee I tabled the information which I had. I did not want to mislead anyone. I offered not only what I was stating, but the table that I had in front of me. One can, of course, argue what is and what is not a real government expenditure. Sometimes in the total expenditures of the three levels of government there could be double accounting. I wanted to make sure that did not happen. I am not an accountant, but I know what is a double entry. If we take $1 billion from the taxpayers at the federal level and transfer it to the provincial government, it is the same money; it is not new money. One sees the same $1 billion in our expenditures and in the books of the various provinces. It is not a new expenditure that must be taken into account.

I would like the hon. member for York-Simcoe to tell me if I am wrong when I try to explain to the people—and the people have the right to know—that in relation to the gross national product of this country, total federal expenditures has not increased over the last ten years.

Mr. Stevens: Wrong.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member can say it is wrong, but I have given the table to the House. That is his opinion. However, most of the increase in public expenditures at this time has occurred at the provincial level. Many expenditures of the government are often transfer payments to the provinces to help them fulfil their obligations. It is important that the public knows that the federal government transfers money. However, it is not right if the taxpayer believes that twice the amount of money is being spent, when in fact it is just being transferred to the provincial governments. The public is given the wrong impression when that is included as double accounting. I have tried to explain that. Of course, the hon. member is at liberty to disagree with me. Sometimes I am very happy when a member like him disagrees with me. However, we must state the facts.

If you exclude the transfer of payments from the expenditures of the federal government to date, they are no higher than 12 years ago when related to the gross national product. In addition, we must look at the number of new services that we have given to the public. The public should realize that. That is why I have given these figures. I am surprised that the hon. member is not repeating the figures I gave in relation to what was the consideration in 1961-62 when the take of the federal government from the taxpayer, in relation to the gross national product, was higher than it is today, despite the fact that we have introduced new programs. We have tripled family allowances, we have new programs for old age security, health services and other services for which the people of Canada are very appreciative. Despite that, the take of the gross national product is no higher at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, it is in the interests of this committee that we get the facts. I am referring to total government expenditures before all transfers. Does the minister agree it is approximately $24 billion and that that is something in excess of 20 per cent of our gross national product?

● (1710)

Mr. Chrétien: I have the table here. Total federal government expenditure, including transport, is $22.4 billion—18.8 per cent of the gross national product. That compares with $7.1 million and 18.1 per cent in 1961 at a time when there was no medicare, no health services, no family allowances at the level we have now. So I think that for one-seventh of one per cent of the GNP we have done very well in the last ten years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Does the minister not think, then—

The Chairman: Order. The minister and the hon. member are in disagreement, but because of the limitation on our time I think I should call on other members. There are only seven minutes left.

Mr. Stevens: I understood one could speak for a 20 minute period, or ask questions for a 20 minute period.

The Chairman: The order says members would be allowed to speak once for 20 minutes once. This would not exclude the asking of questions. But as hon. members know, the debate has been twofold, it has been on the general question of supply, and we have already taken a good deal of the time which should have been allotted for the consideration of the Minister's estimates. The Chair cannot control what hon. members say, and when I suggested that the time allotted to this particular phase of the debate be extended, it was in order to allow as many members as possible to make comments on the minister's estimates or to ask questions.

If we pursue a line of questioning between the minister and the hon. member because they base their arguments on different figures or have different points of view, the time allotted to this portion of the debate will be used up. That is why I thought it would be fair to call on other hon. members. If there are a few minutes left at the end we may come back to the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Estimates

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to get into this disease of verbosity on inflation which has been rendered here this afternoon. I have three questions I wish to direct to the President of the Treasury Board. On page 29 of Schedule A there is an item which reads: "contingencies, $90 million dollars." Then, in small print, it says:

—and authority to re-use any sums allotted for non-paylist requirements and repaid to this appropriation from other appropriations.

I should like an explanation of what that means.

My second question concerns an item on the same page under "public service bilingualism." I should like to know whether this represents the total cost of bilingualism in the public service and agencies of government and, in particular, whether it includes the amount voted for the Commissioner of Official Languages.

The third question I should like to ask concerns employer contributions to employee pension programs. How much of this is for the Canada Pension Plan and how much for the Quebec Pension Plan? I thought those were the type of questions we should be asking at this time, Mr. Chairman, and I will appreciate specific answers to the specific points I have raised.

Mr. Chrétien: I will give the hon. member some specific answers. First, when we take money from the contingency vote in the fiscal year for one department, as the time comes for supplementary estimates we put that amount into the supplementary estimates so that hon. members may have the chance to comment and vote on the expenditure which has been made. As to the second question, the answer is, no. Not all the costs are included. I think it will take a couple of minutes to get the answer to the hon. member's third question. I will give it to the hon. member later in our discussion.

Mr. McKinley: Could the minister tell us whether last summer a directive was sent by Treasury Board to all government departments to the effect that no federal property should be offered for sale in any circumstances? Does this apply even to buildings which are not being used, and which are not likely to be used by the government in the foreseeable future. I am thinking, for example, of post offices in towns in which new post offices have been constructed.

Mr. Chrétien: The policy is this: when a building is not used by the government it is turned over to the Department of Public Works to determine what kind of use the government might have for it in the future. If the department finds there is nobody within the government who has any use for the building, I believe it is turned over to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for disposal. Until the Department of Public Works has determined the government has no other use for the building, it is not prudent for the government to sell it, since it might well be needed for another operation.

Mr. McKinley: This does not appear to be the performance that is taking place in Exeter. The answer the minister has given me saying the building would be offered to other government departments is not adequate in this case, because an offer has been made to lease to the town a building in which the town is interested. However, the town wishes to purchase the building. Possibly the minister could obtain a further answer for me later.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, I think the hon. member might be able to get an answer later from the Minister of Public Works, who will be presenting his estimates in due course.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I might turn to another part of the minister's testimony before the committee. I asked him to what extent had provision been made in the accounting for the promises which had been made during the Liberal election campaign. The President of the Privy Council replied:

I think we will only implement $10 million in new money for that out of a budget of $22 billion.

Will the minister give us details about this $10 million?

Mr. Chrétien: What I said at the time was that only $10 million had been approved for new programs up to that date. The amount of $10 million had been allocated to certain programs which had been mentioned by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs during the campaign.

● (1720)

The political party of which I am a member has made other promises and the government will implement them in due course. We have stated that we will do this and that, and take four years to live up to our mandate. We have said: "Don't worry about it, we will live up to our obligations".

[Translation]

The Chairman: Order, please. We have reached, and even gone beyond 5.20, and I wonder if the hon. minister is ready to answer the question put by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones)?

Mr. Chrétien: With the House's consent, Mr. Chairman, I would like to give an answer to the third point in the question put by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones), relating to the contribution to the federal government pension plan and to the Quebec provincial pension plan. I must say that we do not have any information on the subject and consequently we cannot say how much money has been contributed to the province of Quebec and how much money has been contributed to the Canada Pension Plan general funds; but what we can say is that the total for the 1974-75 fiscal year is about $32 million. The hon. member can find the details page 28.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. Having reached 5.20 o'clock in the afternoon this should complete consideration of the estimates of the Department of Treasury Board. The committee will now proceed to the consideration of the estimates of the Minister of Transport, to be found at pages 25, 26, 27 and 28 of the bill.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, when the hon. member for Moncton spoke earlier he made reference to the fact that he was not permitted to participate in committee hearings. It is my understanding that the standing orders provide that any member of the House of Commons may participate in any committee hearings, though he may not be formally a member of the committee. He has the right to question and to participate as much as any other member, but he does not, however, have the right to vote. But, as I say, he does have the right to participate in the deliberations of the committee.

[Mr. McKinley.]

The Chairman: I can only answer for the committee of the whole.

Mr. Jones: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary had better get things straight. I am as much a member of parliament as he is, and I should have as much right to be a member of a standing committee as he. I do not sit here as a member of the opposition or as a member of the government, but I am a member of parliament, and I want to make that point clear.

The Chairman: Order, please. I thank the hon. member for his contribution but I do not think that this is the time to make any decision on his grievance. He should raise it in the proper form when the House is sitting and the Speaker is in the chair.

On Schedule A—Transport.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Order. The committee will now proceed to the consideration of the estimates found in Schedule A of the bill on pages 25, 26, 27 and 28.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, I believe that after all the discussions and questions we have now had in the House, I am ready to answer, with the help of the officials of the Department of Transport, the question hon. members wish to ask with regard to the estimates of that department. I therefore need not make a speech: I would doubtless repeat what I will say during the debate on those estimates. I am therefore at the service of the House to answer questions.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I will try to emulate the minister and not make a speech. I should like to make a few remarks for four or five minutes, and save some of my time for later and for my hon. friends. It is with a great deal of respect that I say that in the more than 90 days since July 8 we have seen encompassed therein not a 90 day decision period, as the late Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson once promised, but 90 days of indecision. Nowhere has this been more clearly manifested than in the Department of Transport. Commitments made by the minister and his predecessor dating back to the twenty-eighth parliament have not yet been kept, and promises and undertakings, proclaimed with much fanfare during the recent election campaign this summer, have so far amounted to nothing.

This vast, sprawling Department of Transport—again I say this with respect—runs the minister; the minister does not run the department. I think this is a regrettable situation. We in the official opposition favour certain definite policies designed to improve the Canadian transportation system and which we believe are necessary clearly to establish and assert the authority of the minister. We should like to see the minister take some initiatives to exert his authority, which we believe he has pursuant to legislation that already exists.

I refer the minister to a statement made by the President of the Canadian Transportation Commission at our most recent meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. He said that he agreed that, pursuant to section 50 of the National Transportation Act, the minister could, if he wished, use the CTC as an instrument to direct the railways to change some of the unsatisfactory practices that now exist.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the hon. member referred to the testimony of the President of the CTC. Would he please be kind enough to quote the page, because I did not understand him to say exactly what the hon. member said.

Mr. MacKay: Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, I do not have, nor do I believe exist, the minutes of that meeting. I do not wish to be unfair in this regard, and perhaps I have misquoted what the president said. I checked with my hon. friend from Regina-Lake Centre a few moments ago to see whether my information was correct, and he seemed to agree.

I only wish to point out, Mr. Chairman, that it is my understanding that parliament has provided several ordinary standards of efficiency that a railway ought to meet. For example, the Railway Act requires that a railway company shall, according to its powers, without delay and with due care and diligence, receive, carry and deliver all traffic offered for carriage on the railway. That provision is in section 262(1)(c) of the act. There are other sections, for example section 265(1) and (2), which require that a railway company shall, according to its powers, afford to all persons and companies all reasonable and proper facilities for the receiving, forwarding and delivery of traffic.

These requirements or conditions are mandatory and if the railway does not meet them it is derogatory in its duty. It is pursuant to this type of reasoning that the power of the minister, under Section 48 of the Transportation Act, provides that the commission shall upon the request of the minister inquire into, hear and determine any matter or thing that under the Railway Act it may inquire into, hear and determine.

I would take the minister one step further, again back to Section 50 of the Transportation Act, and say that the government in council having decided on its own motion that the railway is insufficient or unsafe, from some point of view or other, has the power under the act to refer that insufficiency to the commission for action, and the commission must comply immediately with the government's reference. I only bring this forward to express the hope, in a constructive way, that the minister will explore the options available to him under the existing legislation.

Going back to March 14, 1972, the minister's predecessor, the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, made a commitment that he would be bringing in important legislation, among other things designed to reconstitute Air Canada as a separate Crown corporation, divorcing it as it were from the CNR, and introducing a Canadian National Railways Act, and other legislation covering the Railway Act. This was promised in the twenty-eighth parliament and it has not been done as yet. I suggest to the minister that for that reason he can hardly blame us for being a little skeptical. That is why I put this suggestion forward at this time. If he is not going to bring forward some new initiatives he should at least explore the options he has open to him.

I think the minister should, as a major initiative, try to improve labour relations and encourage discussions between labour and management under the auspices of the Department of Labour. I know he will have read the story in today's Globe and Mail under the heading "Rail unions bargaining may produce 1975 formula for settlements". The article goes on to refer to improved labour negotiations in transportation in the upcoming year, and refers also to airlines. I suggest that the minister should work toward this objective. He should seriously explore the objective of having labour contracts for our two major railways expire at different times. This would help to avoid national paralysis at times of labour disputes in this industry.

I believe the minister should work seriously toward establishing Crown agencies, divorced from the CNR system, to operate the ferry services to our island provinces. We would not then get into the same type of problem we have experienced during times of national disruption of our rail service.

I would also suggest to the minister in the context of these estimates that, in the interest of increased transportation, safety, and free dissemination of information, he should insist that in any accident investigation carried out by the CTC, the minister's department or other investigative bodies, the results should be accessible to the public. This has not always been done, but I think the minister agrees it should be done.

I notice that the latest information dated October 21, the federal-provincial ministers' communiqué on western transportation initiatives, relates that the minister also stated this would be followed at a later stage by an information act that would seek to make available the broader range of transportation information that is needed to plan and realize Canada's transportation needs.

I would hope that the minister in this context will try to make certain that the activities of our Crown corporations are more accessible to the public, including the specific duties and responsibilities of officials employed therein. I make these suggestions in all good faith to the minister.

I should now like to ask the minister a few questions through you, Mr. Chairman. My first questions concern the STOL program, and I would refer to the statement the minister made to the standing committee in April of this year. The minister said there was $15.5 million budgeted for the buying of aircraft and for the STOL operation in Montreal and Ottawa. I believe there has been an increase of about $10 million, bringing that to the level of about $25 million. I realize these are only approximate figures.

I am troubled by the allegation, as I think the minister is as well, of Mr. Ian D. Sinclair, Chairman of Canadian Pacific, in which he forecast a higher level of expenditure, claiming that if all the costs of the STOL operation are considered the total cost would be $158 million, not $25 million as government spokesmen have contended. I would like to stop now and ask the minister to tell us briefly by how much Mr. Sinclair's estimate is in error.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): $125 million.

Mr. MacKay: The minister is then saying that there is absolutely no relevance or accuracy in that estimate of $158 million. I thank the minister for that answer. I should now like to ask him some questions about marine transportation. The minister has been quoted as being in favour of a Canadian merchant marine, or the restoration of the same. Can he tell us whether his department is considering seriously the establishment of a Canadian deep sea merchant fleet as requested by many shipping concerns and, in the labour movement, by the Seafarers' International Union?

In the context of that question I should like to ask the minister to comment on the action of the CPR in the commissioning of seven large ships to be constructed in Japan, and registered outside Canada in order to avoid Canadian taxes and the hiring of Canadian seamen. Is the minister aware that these ships are engaged in the transportation of Canadian natural resources, which probably helped pay for their construction in the first place?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, we are at grips with a problem here. The hon. member might perhaps tell me exactly what the situation is. The shipyards have now received orders for the construction of a large number of ships.

Some of them, such as Davie Shipbuilding Limited and Marine Industries Limited of Sorel, and probably several others, have contract for years to come. Even if Canadian Pacific were to decide tomorrow to award a contract, let us say, to Marine Industries Limited, it could not expect to have it completed before three or four years.

The problem for shipyards throughout the world in the last few years has been the large number of contracts.

[English]

Why do we have as many contracts in our shipbuilding yards in Canada? I suggest it is because all the shipyards in the world are operating at full capacity and they cannot fulfil any new orders. Unless the hon. member can prove that CP has done this because it wanted to discriminate against Canadian shipyards, I can only believe it has done so because it could not have the ships built in Canadian shipyards.

Mr. MacKay: That may well be the case, and I thank the minister for his answer. I know of one or two shipyards that are perhaps not capable of building as large a vessel as CP requires, but they would be very glad of some government assistance in upgrading their facilities and their capabilities. The minister will have to look into this aspect as well if he is serious about increasing our capability in the merchant marine field.

I have a related question which I put to the minister at a recent committee meeting. I would like to ask him about the terms of reference and the appointment of Mr. Desjardins, pursuant to Section 14(5) of the Pilotage Act, to enquire into the Laurentian Pilotage Authority. Now that the minister has had an opportunity to consider this, would he indicate why the terms of reference or conditions read as they do, and indicate whether that is the case common to commissions of this type, or for some reason is this unique?

I refer to two conditions. The first is subclause 2 of the terms of reference. It states that Mr. Desjardins shall not be subject to the customary rules of evidence, nor need evidence be taken under oath. The second is that the investigation shall not be conducted by means of public hearings but, on the contrary, through the investigation and examination of those persons whom the said investigator deems possessed of evidence relevant to the subject matter whose evidence should be examined in the public interest.

This may be very innocuous, Mr. Chairman, but the terms of reference in respect of this particular appointment trouble me. I also wonder why a similar investigation of the pilotage authority was commissioned to Mr. A. F. Marler, whose report was received on December 31, 1973, I believe. Can the minister tell me why it was necessary to have two reports dealing with the same subject in such a comparatively short period of time? Could he also tell me whether or not he has decided to issue publicly the Desjardins report?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Well, as you know, the Desjardins report was not made under the Inquiries Act of Canada. Mr. Desjardins was asked by the Minister of Transport to prepare a report on the problem of language on the St. Lawrence River. This is the report we have. One might ask why this inquiry was not carried out in a different manner, or why a royal commission inquiry was not made into this matter. That would be an acceptable question. However, for the time being what we intended was to ask Mr. Desjardins to see what would be the impact of using both languages on the St. Lawrence River so far as pilotage and the duties of masters are concerned. This is the report we have.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for that answer. Perhaps I might return to another part of my question. I may be making too much out of the terms of reference of the investigation. It could be that this is a common thing. However, I still would like to know why Mr. Desjardins was directed to carry out the inquiry and waive the customary rules of evidence, including the requirement to swear in witnesses.

I would point out to the minister that although this is not under the Inquiries Act, as he rightfully pointed out, I believe it comes under the next section in the Pilotage Act, section 14(6), where it is specifically stated that in an inquiry such as that of Mr. Desjardins there are all the powers, pursuant to the Pilotage Act, which one finds in the Inquiries Act. For example, was this requirement exercised in respect of the Marler report, which I presume deals with the same subject matter? Perhaps the minister does not have that information handy.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No. I would like the hon. member to tell us whether he believes there are any shortcomings in respect of the mandate Mr. Desjardins received. For instance, had he received another mandate would it be possible that there would be more light on the subject that was discussed? This is the only question. We do not mind under which act he functioned. Mr. Desjardins studied the problem of security of navigation on the St. Lawrence River. He produced a certain amount of testimony, which is very well specified in his report. I think what the hon. member should ask me is whether I am satisfied with that report, or whether we might have learned more had we used another means of inquiry.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, through you to the minister, may I say I am intrigued by this precisely for the reason I am unable to obtain information. Perhaps the minister will remember that a short time ago, after this parliament opened, he indicated he had the Desjardins report on his desk. Since it was so difficult to obtain I became interested in it because I understood it would be made available.

Before the standing committee the minister indicated that the Desjardins report would be made public, but I believe the minister was in error because he said later the same afternoon that there was not in fact a public release of the Desjardins report. I would like to make some constructive suggestions but I find it difficult to do so since I have not received a copy of the report.

As a lawyer I am bothered by the fact that any person who is to conduct an inquiry should be specifically forbidden to do certain things. For instance, I refer to the section which states that the investigation shall not be subject to the customary rules of evidence, nor need evidence be taken under oath. I do not think that is a very healthy type of prohibition in respect of anyone conducting an inquiry, particularly an inquiry into such an important subject as this. I do not wish to belabour the subject further because I know in due course I will receive answers and that the report will be released.

If I may, I should like to ask the minister whether he will seriously consider splitting off Air Canada from its financial inter-directorate dependency on the CNR? Does the minister have this in mind?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes. However, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we should keep on the first aspect of this question. What is your problem? Is it the fact that you do not have the report?

An hon. Member: This is not his problem. It is your problem. You are the minister.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I merely wish to understand exactly what the hon. member wants. If the only problem is that he wishes to have the report, then I do not think I could refuse circulation of the report. Once he had that report he could ask his questions. Would that be all right? Now perhaps we might switch to the other point. What about Air Canada?

Mr. MacKay: Is it your intention to split Air Canada from its dependency on the CNR?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is a very important question. I am ready to discuss that, either in the committee or in the House. If one were to ask my opinion I would say that, personally, I would like to see Air Canada one day disassociated from the CNR. However, at the present time it is not. Would this be a good thing? I would like to have your opinion on that. My own view is that I would like Air Canada to be separated from the CNR.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Central Nova but the time allotted him has expired. I shall now recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

● (1750)

Mr. Benjamin: There are a number of matters which I, and other members, would like the minister to explain, if he can do so this afternoon or tomorrow. I will repeat what I have said every year for six years. I wish there were a great deal more in the supplementary estimates and the main estimates each year so that the Canadian Pacific Railways, their subsidiary and ancillary operations, could be placed under public ownership to develop a publicly owned and operated air, ground and water transportation system which would in fact meet the needs of this country.

Similarly, we need more estimates to re-nationalize the CNR, especially when I read some of the remarks of the new president about making profits, etc. He sounds as bad as the president of CPR. This is another reason why we do not get the kind of service from our ground and air transportation systems to which the public is entitled.

In fact Canada and the U.S. are about the only two countries left in the world that are still hiding their heads in the sand and relying on the nineteenth century concept of private enterprise profit making transportation systems. Even the Minister of Transport has admitted—I am not saying that I will quote him directly but I think I am paraphrasing him reasonably accurately—that competition between railroads in Canada does not work. I could not agree more. It may work for railroads, but it does not work for Canada and its people.

While there may not be very much of anything in these supplementary estimates to start accomplishing the things I have mentioned, I hope that after what the minister and his predecessor have been through at the hands of our railway systems, our airlines and a few other transportation systems in Canada, he will now persuade his colleagues, and get the government behind a program to place our transportation systems under social ownership so as to meet the social and economic needs of the country.

There are also a few current matters that have presented problems in parts of Canada, and I know the minister has been conscientiously trying to deal with them. I may disagree with the methods he used, but at least I give him credit for trying to do something about them. He has not had too much success as yet. I am referring to such things as rail branch abandonment, freight rate freezes, and cost disclosures from the railroads, to name three of many items that have concerned both him, us, and several provinces for some years. I hope that after I sit down, shortly after eight o'clock, the minister will take a few minutes to try to bring all the members of the House up to date in these areas.

For example, if the minister will recall—and if not I will refresh his memory—I believe there was a public commitment from the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board that no branch lines will be abandoned without the concurrence of the provincial government. However, I have the impression that the minister is now saying that no lines will be abandoned until suitable alternative arrangements have been made. I am sure there are at least three provinces which do not know which of the two is correct.

If the minister is correct, what does he mean by "suitable alternative arrangements"? Can he tell us about his meetings with his counterparts from the three or four western provinces in the past week in this regard? What is the federal position? Can we rely on the commitment we obtained prior to the election date? Will the minister consider extending the rail branch line freeze, at least until we get all the information that is needed from the railroads regarding their costs, and regarding the wishes of the users of the rail service along those branch lines, the farm and business organizations concerned, and the municipal and provincial governments concerned?

I agree that some rationalizing is needed, but not nearly as much as the railroads would like, and not nearly as much as the people who would like to get into the commercial trucking of grain would like. What progress is the minister making in this area? Will the freeze be lifted at the end of the year? How many lines are to be abandoned, and under what conditions? What kind of suitable rates does he envisage? What progress is he making in this whole area.

With regard to the freeze on the freight rates I should like to know from the minister how much money has been expended so far in compensating both railroads for the freight rates in the past 15 months, or for whatever length of time the freeze has been in effect. A figure has been given to me but I do not know whether it is accurate, and I should like the minister to tell us how much compensation has been paid to the two major railroads, whether any of it is in the supplementary estimates, and how much is in the new main estimates. I should like to know on what basis such compensation payments are made. Is it on the basis of a telephone call from Mr. Sinclair saying: "We need so much money to compensate us for the freight rates", or does the minister have accurate information regarding the necessary compensation to bring the railroads up at least to a break even point, if not a profit point, on the freight rates that were frozen?

I hope that a blank cheque has not been provided to the two major railways by way of compensation for the freight rates. Will the minister extend the freeze on freight rates? The freeze only affects rates on about 22 per cent of railway traffic, and there is a large area of other rates with which they have been having a ball.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: It being 6 p.m. I do now leave the chair until eight this evening pursuant to a special order made on Thursday, October 3, 1974.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McIsaac: Madam Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Transport will be along in a few seconds. In the meantime, we could perhaps carry on.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the House rose at six o'clock, the committee was considering the estimates of the Department of Transport. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Chairman, I think the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley is a great fellow, but even he does not measure up as a substitute for the Minister of Transport who we have been waiting to question for a number of days. At the time of the supper adjournment I was speaking about the freight rate freeze. I would ask the minister to spend ten minutes or so answering the questions that I put before six o'clock and those I am going to ask now, and to deal with some statements I intend to make.

● (2010)

I asked him before six o'clock what amount of compensation the government is paying to the railways as a result of the freight rate freeze. I want to know from the minister whether any compensation was paid during the freeze. The railways raised rates on commodities on which the rates were not frozen in excess of any justifiable increase in cost, in order to ensure they did not close during the period of the freight rate freeze. I am interested in knowing what inquiries the minister has made about this, and what he has to say to the management of both railway companies in terms of freight rate increases during the so-called freeze.

I have a table somewhere here on freight rates that were not affected by the freeze but which, in fact, were increased. To add insult to injury in western Canada—but I will have to forget that, Madam Chairman, because I cannot find it. Suffice it to say that for steel products shipped from Hamilton to Calgary, compared with steel products shipped from Hamilton to Vancouver, both railways raised their rates in February and March. They are still doing very nicely.

An hon Member: Here comes the minister.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Excuse me, I was delayed by a Conservative.

Mr. Benjamin: It is too bad the minister did not do like me tonight, watch his waistline and not eat too much.

I hope, Madam Chairman, you will grant me an extra couple of minutes to repeat what I have just said. I was talking about the freight rate freeze. I would like the minister to advise whether he inquired into rate increases by the railways during the freeze on rates. I am thinking particularly of steel products being shipped from Hamilton to Vancouver, Hamilton to Calgary and so forth. There are a number of similar instances such as rapeseed versus rapeseed oil from Nipawin, Saskatchewan, to Vancouver. I understand it is still cheaper to send the rapeseed by rail to Vancouver and boat to Japan, than to end the oil to Saskatoon. I hope I am wrong. Possibly the minister has made inquiries into that. Was this pursued in his discussions with the representatives of the four western provinces?

I now wish to deal with a subject which angered the minister and about which he waxed eloquent in this House some time ago. I refer to cost disclosures. If the railways were not prepared voluntarily to disclose their alleged costs, the minister said he would require them to do that even if it was necessary to involve parliament. We all applauded. The minister was assured that that kink of legislation would be passed in record time. In fact, if it will make him feel better, I will not make a speech.

My understanding, from what limited information I am able to get, is that the four western premiers and the Minister of Transport are still being treated like a prospective customer of the CNR or CPR when it comes to getting information. We would like to know the minister's intentions with respect to when he will be bringing that legislation into this chamber, either as an amendment to the Railway Act, Canadian Pacific Railway Act, or whatever act needs to be amended. The railroads should be required to make full disclosure of the cost estimates they use to arrive at what they call justifiable returns on freight rates. We are anxious to know that.

I now wish to return to the subject of branch lines. In his discussions with representatives of the western provinces over the past several days, did the minister deal with the other side of the coin; the social, economic and human costs versus the savings, convenience and profits for railways and trucking companies with respect to what number of branch lines, if any, are to be abandoned?

Last May and June a branch line 90 miles in length was closed. I cite this as an example of the kinds of costs people face in order to convenience the railroads and grain companies. Because a branch line had not been operating for over three months, a farmer in Imperial, Saskatchewan, was told he would have to deliver his carload of barley to Davidson, 35 miles away. This involved 10 loads and an additional $300 in order to fill his quota and get a special permit from the Canadian Wheat Board. He asked why he could not deliver his grain to Watrous as that was on the CNR main line. He was told he could not do that, and that he had to deliver to Davidson.

The estimates will be coming up to provide for the maintenance and operation of branch lines of both railroads. I hate to say this about my pet publicly owned transportation system, the CNR, but both railroads have deliberately allowed their branch lines to deteriorate to the point where no one would touch them with a 10-foot pole. I hope the minister will not fall into the trap of taking over the roadbeds and trackage because it would cost upwards of $1 billion to put them into a condition to carry traffic.

We would like the minister to report on extending the freeze on branch lines. Will he live up to the commitment made by his colleague, the Minister of Justice, that no branch line will be closed without the consent of the provincial government? If that commitment is to be forgotten, what does he mean by "an appropriate alternate method of service"?

I particularly want to know how much money the minister and his colleagues have agreed to part with by way of compensation during the freight rate freeze. If the minister is unable to give that figure now, I hope he will do so during the question period later this week or next week. Remarks were made earlier today about ministers answering questions in a straightforward manner in order to ensure that the opposition do not keep debate going because they are not getting answers.

May I remind the minister that he, like some operations in his department, cannot continue to try and be both fish and fowl. We need to have a transportation system that is operated as a public utility, publicly owned and controlled. We do not want any of these half measures of transportation systems that are part private and part public, both trying to operate for profit, both trying to provide service which is better, and "never the twain shall meet".

● (2020)

The minister and the government must make up their minds one way or the other. They cannot continue trying to be half pregnant. It is either a publicly owned and operated transportation system, integrated and efficient, with service getting priority over profits, or it is an undertaking in the private sphere looking for all the fast bucks it can get. Even if the minister does not want to adopt all the solutions I am asking for, if he will agree to start off with CP Air Lines, we shall support him.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I was hoping the minister would respond to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. I was also hoping the hon. member would make his remarks a little shorter in order to give the minister a chance to reply. My questions are along the lines of those pursued by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. They have to do with the status of the freeze on branch line abandonment and on freight rates. I, too, would like to know how much money has been expended by the treasury in compensation for the freeze, and the rationale behind any payments made to the railways. I should like to know how much each company is receiving and what we may expect by the time the freeze expires at the end of the year. If the minister would reply to these questions, I might be able to continue.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Madam Chairman, I had the good fortune, last week, of meeting the ministers of transport for the western provinces; we discussed the problem of prices, which were frozen for some categories of goods, and also that of the railway companies which have also been frozen for a certain length of time, that is till the end of 1974.

In both cases, I said that this matter had yet to be decided by the federal cabinet who took the initial decisions. The matter will be taken up very soon, this week or next.

Unfortunately, I cannot tell the hon. member this evening whether prices will continue to be frozen or not.

In any event, I believe we will soon reach a decision, because time is running out. The matter is on our agenda.

[English]

I told the transport ministers of the west that they did not have to take a decision, because the first decision was taken by the federal government and not by the transport ministers of British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. So we intend to take this decision, rightly or wrongly. At this moment I am not in a position to tell the hon. member exactly what we are going to do.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister answer the other question I asked him? How much money has been spent by the federal treasury in compensation for the freeze, and what was the rationale behind these payments? Further, could the minister give us some idea of the amounts paid to the individual railway companies?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It is very difficult for me to say what is the amount—

Mr. Stanfield: Évidemment.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Of course. If I were to put that question to the hon. gentleman, he would not know either. But if I compare that amount to what the right hon. member for Prince Albert had to pay when he decided to freeze the rates in 1959, I assure the hon. gentleman that there is not much difference. That is all I can say at this stage.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister tell the committee what formula will be applied in the payment of the subsidy? How will the amount be established? Will the department simply accede to the request of the railways? Are there ongoing discussions on this question?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is a fair question and a very difficult one. I should not like to give a reply which would not be honest. What the railways are asking is compensation for revenues which were forgone in consequence of the freeze. I must confess I have no criteria now on which to check exactly the amount for which they are asking.

Mr. Mazankowski: A figure of $41 million was kicked around here last session. How was that figure arrived at?

Mr. Stanfield: A crystal-ball.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I know CN and CP claim we owe them about $41 million; $27 million to CN and $13 million to CP.

An hon. Member: For what period?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): For 1973. But if you asked me how they arrived at that amount, my answer would be that I don't know.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am not sure whether you have recognized me again, Madam Chairman. It was my understanding we were allowed 20 minutes. Have my 20 minutes expired?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: No. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vegreville for one more question.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister advise the committee the position of the Ministry of Transport with respect to giving consideration to truckers along the same lines as the consideration given to the railways since, in effect, when rail rates were frozen the freeze automatically applied to truckers' rates as well?

● (2030)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Madam Chairman, the hon. member is not dishonest, but he is putting to me a question that he knows I cannot answer. The truckers did not ask for any compensation. If he asks me how much money they think we owe them because of the freeze on freight rates, I do not think it is a fair debate at this stage.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Vegreville may put a last question.

Mr. Mazankowski: Just one further question, Madam Chairman. Would the minister give the committee some enlightenment on the proposed changes to the National Transportation Act and the Railway Act which were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne? Is it the intention of the minister to proceed only with changes to the Railway Act to provide for compulsory disclosure, or are there other amendments to be considered?

Could the minister also give the committee some indication of the future of the Crowsnest freight rates and say whether in fact his department or the CTC have engaged in any cost studies on the question of the Crowsnest freight rates? It seems to me this is a question that is on the minds of at least the western Canadian members, and I would certainly appreciate the minister's giving the committee some assurance that the Crowsnest freight rates will not be tampered with.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The hon. member is not going to get an answer to that from me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: So that is your attitude to western Canada.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): What do you want me to say?

Mr. Woolliams: You know this is important to the economy of western Canada. You were out in Calgary and promised us so much.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I never promised anything.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is a legitimate question that requires a legitimate answer.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Do you want to be serious?

Mr. Mazankowski: I am being serious.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You are not being serious. Let me tell the committee two things, if they will allow me to do so. First, we have indicated that we are ready to amend the Railway Act, provided the House leaders of all parties agree, so we can get all the information from the railways on establishment of the freight rates. We promised to do that, and we are ready. If all House leaders tell me tomorrow they are ready to agree to this amendment, then we are ready.

Mr. Mazankowski: Is that all you are going to do?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Some may refuse for political reasons, but we are ready to amend the Railway Act so the railways can give us all the information on rates.

Mr. Mazankowski: Then why not introduce the bill?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Tell us first if you will agree to it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Transport has been making reference to certain proposals that have been put to the House leaders of the parties. Three of us are here now; the other one is somewhere else. I should like to know from my hon. friend from Peace River, and from the President of the Privy Council, when this matter was discussed among the House leaders. If we are having a discussion right now, then I would give my consent right away.

Mr. Benjamin: All stages, no debate.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am sure there is no problem about this and that all House leaders will agree to an amendment of the Railway Act so we can get the information we want about the rates. Is the hon. member for Peace River opposing this?

Mr. Baldwin: Madam Chairman, my understanding of the agreement that we reached was that the government House leader would produce ministers and we would get, to use the usual expression, frank, fruitful and useful answers to questions that would be put. If this is not the case, if we are not able to get answers now, I think we might review the disposition of the committee proceedings and even consider postponing consideration of these estimates, if that is necessary, so that the minister can get all the answers.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Madam Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) on a point of order.

Mr. Allard: Madam Chairman, following what the minister said a while ago on the consent of the parties and House leaders, I should like to point out that the leader of our party is away and that I am taking his place.

[English]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member for Calgary North rising on a point of order?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Madam Chairman. My point of order can be very simply put. As I understood the suggestion of the House leader of the Liberal Party, each member would be given 20 minutes. Some members wish to make speeches; others wish to ask questions. With the greatest respect, this procedure is new to many members here. Others are used to it. I looked at the clock when the hon. member for Vegreville rose, and although he put many questions he may now want to make further comments to the minister. With the greatest respect, I ask that you give him at least his full 20 minutes according to the rules governing the House when it is considering supply. The problem may be that you are looking at this committee of the whole as if it were a standing committee. I do not think the hon. member for Vegreville had his 20 minutes. He asked questions which the minister did not answer. I ask you to give him his full 20 minutes.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Chairman, I am simply rising on a point of order to point out to the minister that I would appreciate getting just a few answers.

Mr. Stanfield: Even one.

Mr. Mazankowski: For example, in my final submission I posed three specific questions. The minister tried to answer one question but avoided the other two. My other questions are these. First, I ask the minister to tell this committee and the country the position of the government respecting the Crowsnest freight rates, and to assure us that these rates will not be tampered with. Second, would the minister enlighten the committee on the amendments we can expect to the National Transportation Act?

May I also ask the minister, since this matter is referred to in the Speech from the Throne, what specific steps his department intends to take to facilitate the movement of grain this winter in order to avoid the chaotic conditions that we experienced during the peak grain moving season last winter. These are very simple questions, and if this committee is to serve any purpose members on this side of the House are entitled to straightforward answers.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair was under the impression that hon. members could speak for 20 minutes, not ask questions for 20 minutes. A number of members wish to participate, and if the hon. member intends asking questions for 20 minutes, other members will not be able to participate.

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect, Madam Chairman, I suggest the hon. member for Vegreville could talk, not only for 20 minutes but for 20 hours about the failure of our transportation system. If he wishes to put questions to the minister instead of making a speech, it is because he is seeking the information we have not been able to obtain. Your Honour should not deny him this privilege under the arrangements made by the House leaders or under the rules governing committee of supply.

● (2040)

Mr. Stanfield: Madam Chairman, I think we are working according to an agreement, and it is really a matter of understanding what was agreed upon. My understanding is that an hon. member may use 20 minutes either making a speech or asking questions. I would refer you to the government House leader and to the other House leaders simply for your guidance. I do so with great respect. Perhaps they could indicate to you clearly what the understanding was, so as to remove any misunderstanding and to prevent your getting into an unfortunate position because of a misunderstanding.

Mr. Benjamin: Right on.

Mr.Sharp: Madam Chairman, the arrangement made was to the effect that no member shall speak more than once on the estimates of any one department, but that does not mean a member cannot ask questions or that the minister cannot present a rebuttal. The arrangement does not suggest that members may ask questions for 20 minutes. In fact, that would be a very difficult rule to apply. Would the time include the time of reply by the minister to questions?

An hon. Member: Oh, yes.

Mr.Sharp: If that is the interpretation, I have no objection, because then the hon. member would not have the opportunity of making a speech.

An hon. Member: That's not so.

Mr. Mazankowski: On the point of order, Madam Chairman, I say very emphatically that I posed three or four questions to the Minister of Transport. I believed that was the purpose behind this type of arrangement. I understood we would get answers from the minister. I do not necessarily want to make a speech, but I should like him to give us some answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I raised three or four specific questions. I am sure the minister and his officials have a record of them. Now I would ask the minister to reply.

Mr. Benjamin: On the same point of order, Madam Chairman, I felt I was abiding by the agreement in taking up 20 minutes both in making a speech and asking questions. I hope the minister will rise and take whatever time is required to reply. He has not done so yet. Thank goodness the hon. member for Vegreville asked almost the same questions as I did, because the minister did not reply to mine. If the minister requires 40 minutes, we will give it to him.

With reference to another matter—this perhaps is more a question of privilege—when I asked the minister a specific question about the amount of money the government has spent in compensation respecting freight rates, there was no answer. When the hon. member for Vegreville asked virtually the same question, the minister came up with the figure of $57 million. I would ask the minister, now, whether it would be more like $137 million? Will he reply to that question?

Mr. Beatty: Madam Chairman, I intend to participate a little later, but before I do I should like to have the ground rules straight. It is my understanding that each member may speak for 20 minutes and it is up to him to decide whether he will ask questions, make remarks or put forward a combination of both. Is that the understanding of the government House leader?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, I think that is quite reasonable. The purpose was to make sure that no member used up too much time to the exclusion of others. But it is up to the minister to decide which questions he is going to answer; that is his privilege.

Mr. Baldwin: Let's have the minister answer.

An hon. Member: We are not conducting a question period; we are passing funds.

Mr. Mazankowski: I would simply like to repeat the questions I put to the minister. If he refuses to answer, the record will so indicate. Perhaps that will illustrate the mess his whole department is in, and why. I do not think he takes his job seriously. I think we have had too much evasiveness and flippancy. If the minister is not prepared to accept his responsibility, there is no point wasting our time putting questions to him.

An hon. Member: Bring back Herb Gray.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: By comparison, even he would be sweetness and light.

Mr. Reynolds: Madam Chairman, I see it is twelve minutes to nine. I will be finished by eight minutes after nine. I should like to start by referring to the Canada Shipping Act. I read the following from the Canada Gazette, part II, volume 107, No. 18:

Registration

SOR/73-537 12 September, 1973

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Search Initiator Buoy Regulations

P.C. 1973-2700 11 September, 1973

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport, pursuant to paragraph 400(1)(c) of the Canada Shipping Act, is pleased hereby to make the annexed Regulations Respecting Search Initiator Buoys on Ships, effective 1st July, 1974.

I ask the minister what he knows about these regulations, imposed by himself, and why is it that July 1, 1974, has passed and the regulations are still not in effect?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Madam Chairman, I think first I should answer the question put by the hon. member for Vegreville. The first question concerned the Crowsnest pass rates. Nobody indicated—certainly I did not—that we were going to modify that part. If ever we intend to do that, hon. members will have a formal proposal before them. Up till now, no one in my department, and certainly not in my office, indicated that we should modify the Crowsnest pass rates.

Having regard to the amendments to the National Transportation Act, of course, we intend to bring about some modification. I have discussed this matter with the ministers of transport from the west and I think we are close to agreement. That does not mean the problem will be solved in that way. These amendments will have to be brought before this House and discussed here. There are problems, as hon. members know, and we are ready to discuss them here.

The third question had reference to boxcars. As hon. members know, we have instituted a monitoring system to find out exactly where the cars are, whether we have enough cars and how they are being moved. We had a conference last May in order to discover how many cars we actually had, if the number was sufficient and if the railways had plans to build enough cars to meet the need. we know very well that if the decision is to build more cars, it will be impossible to have them in service by December, January or February, and it would be childish to think otherwise. I think it will be perhaps a couple of years before we finally have all the cars we need.

● (2050)

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate the minister's reply, and I appreciate the fact that he reviewed what the Ministry of Transport has instituted as of last May. The throne speech indicates that steps will be taken to facilitate grain handling this winter. What steps are referred to there?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): As you know, through the Canadian Wheat Board we decided to have a certain number of hopper cars built. They will not be ready next winter; there is no doubt about that. If the hon. member can think of a way to have those cars delivered next winter perhaps he would tell me and I will apply it. There is no way to do it. We have given orders and have voted the money so that we will have the hopper cars we need to move the grain.

An hon. Member: So you do not intend to do anything this winter?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We have done everything we could.

An hon. Member: What else will you do for this winter?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): What do you think I should do?

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Woolliams: Madam Chairman, I hope the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta will not be charged in respect of his time with the fact that the minister is two members behind in his answers. The hon. member is allowed 20 minutes, and I hope that what has been going on will not be charged against the time of my hon. friend.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Madam Chairman, I am willing to give them all the time they need, even until 3 o'clock tomorrow morning. But one thing for sure, I will not allow them to play a game of politics for the sake of playing a game. That is for sure.

[English]

Mr. Reynolds: Madam Chairman, I do not wish to play politics. However, I asked a question of the minister a few moments ago and still would like to have an answer. I asked about the search initiators. I read a statement from the Canada Gazette. I would like an answer. What does the minister know about the regulation which was supposed to be in effect for July 1 this year, and which still is not in effect? The minister has answered three other questions and I still have not had an answer to that question. I wish the minister would give me an answer. If he cannot tell me then he should say so and I will tell him all about it.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): There are certain technical problems which we did not overcome. We are trying to solve them and will consider the situation.

Mr. Reynolds: I find it very hard to believe that the government has come across some technicalities it does not know how to solve. There are sufficient people in the gallery to solve the total problems of Canada. In Canada there are 1,460 tugs that are five tons or more. In the province of British Columbia there are 824. There are 430 in Canada of 15 tons or more and 170 of these are in British Columbia. I know the minister is aware that since 1958 there have been 41 wooden tugs sunk in Canada involving the loss of six lives. Since 1958 38 steel tugs have gone down involving the loss of 34 lives.

A total of 40 lives have been lost in the tugboat industry in Canada. This is one of the reasons the guild and the tugboat association have been pressing so hard to get this regulation in order to save the lives of others. I cannot understand the minister saying there is a technicality involved in this. Lucas Marine in British Columbia built a buoy which met all the qualifications of the regulation. They went into production on the basis of the fact that the government passed a regulation which was to be effective in July this year.

Because the government, through one of its people in the department, stated this is delayed for six months this company is sitting in British Columbia with buoys it cannot sell. It has nowhere to sell them because the major companies do not want to become involved in this expenditure in these circumstances. The president of the guild has demanded that the government put this regulation into effect for the safety of the tugboat operators and to save lives. While the government will not allow this regulation to come into effect we are risking lives.

In British Columbia this year a tug went down with a loss of three lives. I do not blame the minister for this. It is not his fault that the tug went down. However, if this tugboat had had the search initiator buoy on board it might have been found sooner, and certainly those lives could have been saved. I cannot understand why the minister does not know more about this serious problem.

I know representatives of the guild are planning to come to Ottawa sometime next week to plead with the minister to bring this regulation into effect immediately, and I hope he will say he will do that. Perhaps tonight he will stand up and tell this House and the country that, for the great benefit of the men and women working on tugboats, he will ensure that the regulation which the government passed will come into force immediately, especially in view of the fact that its taking effect is overdue since July 1. This is a very serious problem. but I have one other issue that I must mention before my time is up and I know that there are other members who have important questions.

Estimates

● (2100)

A major problem in British Columbia is the new air route allocations between Air Canada and CP Air. I know that the minister is certainly familiar with this issue because he not only has had representations from me but also from members of his own party. Has he considered the representations that have been made to him, and is he considering any changes whatsoever in the air route allocations that he made this past summer?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The answer is no, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Reynolds: I am very disappointed to hear that the answer is in the negative because I know that not only members on this side of the House but many members on the minister's side of the House will be extremely disappointed with that answer because it affects western Canada drastically and in particular it affects my riding where 1,400 jobs will be lost. I do not think that the minister has looked at the issue as closely as he should have, or listened to the people in his party, particularly those from our province of British Columbia who were elected to his party and who have told him what are the problems out there.

There is one other issue that I would like to touch upon with regard to the airport area. I am wondering whether the minister could advise me if he is planning to take over the one remaining area, in the Sea Island area in Richmond, which is where the Vancouver international airport is located. The area is called Burkeville. Can the minister tell me whether there are plans to take over the Burkeville area, and could he advise whether he has put any pressure on his cabinet colleagues to try to settle the problem of the people who are still living in the area that is to be expropriated and who have not been able to receive any final confirmation from the government? Can the minister explain anything on this matter?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think the hon. member is as well aware as I am of what is going on there, of the inquiry that has been instituted and the study that is being carried out. I hope that as soon as we have the results, we can make a decision. It is a very important decision. Under his pressure, and the pressure of other groups, we delayed any decision that we were going to make, so I think he should be fair enough to await the results of all those inquiries before we make a decision.

The Chairman: Order, please. I have not been in the Chair for the first hour of this sitting but I should like to obtain some direction from the committee at this time.

On looking at the suggestions that were made by the President of the Privy Council I read on the second page that it is the agreement with respect to the debate that each member will be restricted to one twenty minute speech in committee on each department, but that this restriction would not apply in the case of direct questioning or answering, nor would a minister be prevented from rebutting points made during discussion.

The point I want to bring to the attention of the committee is whether I am to interpret this suggestion, or any other chairman of the committee is to interpret it as allowing a member who does not take up the twenty minutes allotted to him for a speech to compensate for that time by a twenty minute questioning period. I should like some kind of direction from the committee because I should not like to limit hon. members, but there are so many who wish to ask questions that by the time we reach 10.30 p.m. we might have to extend the hours to satisfy everybody.

Mr. Stanfield: I think that we tried to clarify this a few minutes ago. I suggested to your predecessor in the chair that we were trying to follow an agreement rather than putting the Chairman on the spot where he would have to make a rather difficult ruling with regard to time. I think I am interpreting the President of the Privy Council correctly when I say that he agreed with the suggestion that the spirit of the rule was that the member speaking and asking questions could take up the full twenty minutes allowed him, provided the minister's time was not counted in replying. In other words, what difference does it make to the committee whether a member takes twenty minutes speaking or twenty minutes asking questions? I see the President of the Privy Council nodding his head. I think this was the understanding that he affirmed a few minutes ago.

The Chairman: The reason why I raise the point is that I see so many members wishing to rise. If the Chair is asked to add the time allocated to the minister for replies it would easily add up to twenty minutes each time, and I see members from other parties wishing to ask questions. This afternoon we had a difficulty with the hon. member for Moncton whose impression had been that he was forgotten in the House.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order. I am sorry to have to say this but I have the impression that what is happening now is similar to the performance of Committee of the whole in 1968, and I, as a member of the House, do not remember any specific rule changes being made dealing with committee in supply. That being the case, any member of the House of Commons rising to question a minister naturally expects answers. If his allotted time is twenty minutes, then he has that time to ask the questions he has in mind. Of course we hope that we can get some answers from the minister.

You can understand our frustation in dealing with this point of order with a government which abondoned committee of the Whole House in supply as far back as 1968 because of members of the opposition persisting in wishing questions to be answered precisely, and ministers failing to do so. This proved only one thing, namely, that the government is totally incompetent. That is one of the reasons that the Committee of the Whole House in supply was scrapped.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Order, please. I do not wish to disagree with the hon. member for Edmonton East but I must say that in those years there was no time limitation.

Mr. Skoreyko: There certainly was.

The Chairman: It was the House that decided that the debate on this and other departments would take up so much time. So the Chairman is only trying to be fair to all hon. members and to make sure that we do not have to extend our time as we did this afternoon.

Mr. Skoreyko: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Chairman. If the government is really serious in having this House examine the estimates that are before the House now, then they will allot the appropriate amount of time to discuss them.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member is putting the Chair in a very difficult situation. He is mixing the Chair with the government. I am only asking for advice from members of the Committee. I will recognize the hon. member who had the floor as there does not seem to be a solution to this problem at this time, and I will not continue further on this point.

Mr. Woolliams: On this point of order, Mr. Chairman. before you came to the Chair the President of the Privy Council agreed that it did not matter whether members on this side took twenty minutes asking questions or twenty minutes making speeches.

Some hon. Members: Or both.

Mr. Woolliams: Or both. Having had that agreement from the President of the Privy Council, let us continue asking for information from the minister.

● (2110)

An hon. Member: Don't waste the time of the committee.

The Chairman: Order, please. It is for the Chair to make a decision, or at least seek the consent and understanding of the whole committee, not just of one member in committee.

An hon. Member: May we have your ruling?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, with the greatest respect, we are not asking—

Mr. Stanfield: With great respect—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Oh, we have a good one tonight.

Mr. Stanfield: We have a good one tonight all right. I have been trying to make it clear to the Chairman that we clarified this question about 15 minutes ago. There is no disagreement between any of the House leaders on what is involved.

I am trying to control myself but it is pretty difficult in these circumstances. There are a lot of smart alecks in the House tonight. I have been in legislatures for about 25 years and I have never seen a farce such as this—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: The hon. member for Peace River on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: We have got so far along now and we have an hour and a quarter left. Can we have an agreement in this House now that we shall make no more speeches and simply ask questions?

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Baldwin: All right.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the same point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, at the risk of not being able to do what I rise to do, I must try anyway.

An hon. Member: It has never inhibited you before.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to deal with this procedural point in the simplest possible terms. Surely it was understood that each member who gets the floor has it only once for a department, and has it for not more than 20 minutes. If he uses all the 20 minutes to make a speech, that is it. If he asks questions, gets answers and asks more questions, he is still limited to a total of 20 minutes.

The only problem I see in this is if the minister, in answering the questions, abuses the honourable member's position by taking too much time, then I would say it is up to the Chair whether to give that member a bit more time. Surely it is not too complicated. It seems to me that there are other factors that have caused trouble tonight, but surely this matter is not complicated. Each member who is given the floor on one of the departments is allowed not more than 20 minutes. He can use it all for a speech, partly a speech and questions, or all for questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: If hon. members agree with this interpretation of the suggestion that was made today as to the procedure of this committee, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that parliament lives again. I am just going to condense all my remarks. I know I must have ten minutes left after all the interruptions but I will not take more than one minute.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Chairman, hon. members opposite cannot even give us that time; they have to take it up by pounding their desks.

I want to ask the minister two simple questions—simple questions being asked of a simple government. First, when are these studies going to be completed on the Vancouver International Airport that have been going on since before I was elected in 1972? The minister should be able to give an answer.

Second, why has the government postponed implementing those regulations? People could be killed because those buoys are not on the boats and tugs. Will the minister guarantee to this House that these regulations, which the government passed and were to be put into effect on July 1, and that tugboat men and women want now, will go into effect immediately?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, the regulations are in effect. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Reynolds: It is a lie.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): They are in effect.

Mr. Reynolds: It is a lie.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Okay, what about the other one?

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege I want to read a copy of a wire sent to Captain G. Morris, head of the Guild of Tugboat Owners.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The newspaper?

Mr. Reynolds: Why don't you keep your mouth shut? I guarantee not too many members from British Columbia will stand up on this issue, but the tugboat owners will come down here wanting to see the problem solved.

Mr. Chairman, here is the telegram:

After serious consideration of all facts involved and view expressed the ministry is taken under review the extent of the application of the search initiator buoy regulations to tugs of more than five and not more than fifteen gross and this will be the subject of a circular letter to be forwarded within the next few days. It is considered that the dictate of safety require that existing regulations continue to be written to tugs of more than fifteen tons gross.

It is signed by R. Illing—I do not know who that is—MOT, Ottawa. I think that telegram proves that the minister is mistaken in what he just said. Those regulations are not in force. I am asking the minister why they are not in force and when they are going to be in force?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Bail him out.

The Chairman: Is the hon. minister rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Mackasey: Just participating in the debate, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lee: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, and with all due respect to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, as a member from British Columbia I have worked very closely all this time with members of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild on the west coast and made representations to the Department of Transport. They are well aware of the problem that we brought to their attention. As a matter of fact I just spoke to Captain Arnie Davis who is the Secretary-Treasury, and he indicated to me that the regulations are in force on the west coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: No more headlines. It is a knockout.

[Mr. Reynolds.]

The Chairman: I should warn the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta about the disadvantage of raising arguments as a question of privilege. The hon. member might differ with the minister on all this and the answer which he got—I do not know any of the facts—proves that there is mainly a difference of opinion or interpretation. The hon. member who has the floor should use the floor to make his views known.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Chairman, I did not interrupt these proceedings on a question of privilege. It was the hon. member for Vancouver East.

An hon. Member: No, you did.

Mr. Reynolds: I am sorry, but hon. members on the other side must realize I was using my 20 minutes and I was interrupted. I would say to the hon. member for Vancouver East that if he has been involved with this problem very seriously he must have had discussions with Captain Griff Morris, the Vice-President of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild. I had a meeting with him last Saturday. He pointed out this problem to me and said these regulations are not in force, and are not being enforced. I do not know where the hon. member got his information. All I can say is that he is mistaken.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, since spirits are beginning to run high, I would like to move from the Pacific to the Gulf of St. Lawrence where the water is somewhat colder.

Last year, I think, I asked the Minister of Transport about continued icebreaking service in the Gulf of St. Lawrence to provide safety for ships sailing the gulf and the area of Rimouski, and moving upstream from Quebec City to Montreal. At that time, the minister informed me that the question was under consideration and that a permanent icebreaker would be put in service, probably in 1974.

Is the minister in a position to inform the House whether a permanent icebreaker will indeed be put in service in the Gulf of St. Lawrence this winter, specially in the Rimouski, Les Escoumins and Saguenay areas, to provide increased safety for ships navigating those areas during winter months?

Mr. Lawrence: Does the minister intend to reply?

Mr. Allard: Does the minister want to answer my question? Did he understand it?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I did not fully understand the question, Mr. Chairman, because I was reading a document. I apologize, I thought he was talking about the Vancouver matter.

If the hon. member would like to repeat his question, I would be delighted to answer him if I can.

Mr. Allard: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but the question seems to me to be easy to understand. Last year, I asked that a permanent icebreaker be put in service in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Rimouski, Les Escoumins and Saguenay areas, and the minister replied that the matter was under consideration and that eventually, in 1974-75, a permanent icebreaker would actually be put in service in those areas. Now there, is the minister in a position to tell the House whether there will eventually be an icebreaker next winter to offer relative safety for ships?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): There are icebreakers in service in the Gulf of St. Lawrence as far as Quebec City and even Montreal throughout winter. Now, are there enought of them? Our problem comes from the fact that we are short of icebreakers. As a matter of fact, a number of them which are being built will help maintain navigation on the St. Lawrence River. However, I could not assure the hon. member that we will never be without icebreakers between Rimouski, Gaspé and Matane.

Mr. Allard: A supplementary question, Mr. Chairman.

Can the minister advise the House whether there are any icebreakers being built at the present time?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Chairman, there are two of them. There is also a project for the construction of a super icebreaker which should enter service within the next few years.

[English]

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, for a while I did not know whether I would be able to speak tonight. I am certainly pleased to see such a large gallery. I did not think they would all turn out to hear someone from Churchill speak.

We have gone from the east coast to the west. We are now going into central Manitoba. I do not know whether many people realize there is an inland port called Churchill. The last ship of the season left Churchill at high tide approximately two hours ago. That was the twentieth ship to have visited Churchill this year.

Within the next few days the minister will probably issue a statement that some 22 million bushels of grain were hauled out of Churchill, an amount that is almost unsurpassed. Let me assure you, Mr. Chairman, that Churchill is capable of handling between 10 and 14 million bushels a month from July 15 to October 15. The reason the authorities do not handle that amount of grain is that they simply do not have the funds to keep the port in operating condition.

We see that approximately $12.5 million will be spent over the next four years to upgrade the port of Churchill. I can assure hon. members that this will only look after the maintenance of that port. What is the department doing to upgrade the facilities in Churchill so that at least 40 million bushels can be stored or shipped through that port? It is a very vital line of transportation in central Canada and the central United States. Can the minister give some answer to that?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Chairman, I can give the hon. member an answer. The hon. member says we are only doing what is necessary to maintain the port of Churchill, keeping it open and operating efficiently. I regret to say that is not true. The government of Manitoba knows we are spending more than $12 million to improve the port of Churchill. At this moment the government of Manitoba is asking us to re-direct investment in order to increase even more the efficiency of the port. We agree, and we are doing that. Therefore, what the hon. member has said is not quite true.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, as an election promise the government said it would revamp the total grain handling system. I do not know if the minister knows where Churchill is, but it is one of the most important grain handling facilities in central Canada. The minister met with western ministers in Saskatoon. I have here a statement entitled "Progress towards the improvement of the port of Churchill and the development of the port of Prince Rupert".

I wish to refer to the blue book detailing the estimates. I see that for the port of Churchill, approximately $2 million is being spent. That is strictly maintenance money. How is the port of Churchill going to be developed, or is it just going to sit as it has for many years?

Very important also is the fact that the rail facilities into Churchill are such that there have been many train wrecks on the line. This holds up ships coming into the port. I understand the transport committee has promised $20 million for rebuilding the railway from Gillam to Churchill. Can the minister state where this is in the estimates and from where it will come?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, it is under normal CNR expenditures. What we said we would do for Churchill, we will do.

Mr. Woolliams: When?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We are doing it right now. When were you last in Churchill?

Mr. Woolliams: I might tell the minister I have been there many, many times when he has not been there.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I had discussions with a responsible minister from Manitoba, Mr. Evans. He agreed entirely with the procedures we are following. He is keenly interested in the development of the port of Churchill, and thinks we are making the right moves. He would, of course, like the process to be accelerated. We agreed entirely, and I must confess the provincial authorities seemed to be as interested as is the hon. member in the development of the port of Churchill. But they do not believe we can get rid of the ice 12 months a year. They know there are limitations, and we are trying to work within those limitations.

● (2130)

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I am not really interested in trying to keep Churchill open for 12 months a year either. All I am saying is that the facilities which are there now ought to be utilized to their full capacity. What I know is happening is this: they are trying to develop the shipping of other commodities through Churchill and trying to stay away from grain. Yet the port of Churchill is ideal for the shipment of grain. The storage facilities are ideal. There is very little dampness up there; once it turns cold in the fall it stays cold right through the winter.

I sometimes sit and listen to people talk about the difficulties being experienced with the handling of grain on the east coast and the west coast. I can assure hon. members that in Churchill there is no need to worry about space in which to store grain. It is a big country up there. Also, grain need not all be moved up there in a great rush in the summer time. Grain could move there all through the winter, and then it could be stockpiled. If this were done we would not run into the trouble we experienced this summer when ships were lying in harbour waiting to load, and there were insufficient stocks on hand in Churchill though cars were backed up for 100 miles on the Hudson Bay Railway. If these stocks had been moved up during the winter, supplies could have been built up and there would have been no difficulty whatsoever.

When the minister and his officials are talking about revamping the grain transport and handling system, let them not leave the port of Churchill out, because the port of Churchill is an important part of the economy of the north. The federal government has invested a lot of money in Churchill to revitalize the community. What is needed in an economic base to support the facilities which are presently there, and we should never forget that the presence of grain handling facilities in the north constitutes an ideal situation.

Regarding the railway I would suggest that one way of alleviating some of the tie-ups in the area would be to construct a passing rail between Gillam and Churchill. At present when trains are up to 155 cars long, it is impossible for the train to leave Churchill if there is a train going through Gillam. I hope some of the $20 million earmarked for the expansion of this railway will be spent in this way.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I propose to ask questions on certain specific matters in the course of my remarks, and I hope the minister will have an opportunity to answer them without getting involved in too much speech making. I am satisfied that now the hon. gentleman has had the opportunity of spending a couple of days in Saskatoon, with all those clear skies and fresh air, his thinking will be at its most acute and that, flanked as he is by two assistants from Saskatchewan, he will be able to answer my questions without hesitation.

We in western Canada are concerned about the reference in the Speech from the Throne to measures to speed up the movement of grain. However, the minister did not tell us about any concrete steps which are being taken or which are anticipated on the part of the government in respect to the more efficient movement of grain this winter. He did say that the construction of hopper cars was contemplated or, perhaps, that it was under way, but added that it would be around two years before they were delivered.

I directed a question on this subject to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board asking him what specific measures the government had in mind, but the hon. gentleman did not elaborate in the course of his reply. Thus I ask the Minister of Transport if he would give us an example, possibly just one example, of a step in the area of transportation which is currently being taken to facilitate the movement of grain this winter?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The only way in which I can answer that kind of question is by saying we shall do our utmost to ensure the movement of grain this winter. I am no more in control of the future than is the hon. member, or even his leader. Many things can happen, but we shall work very hard to satisfy the farmers in the west. That is all I can say. Anything else would be either a lie or hypothetical.

[Mr. Smith (Churchill).]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: To carry on with my 20 minute question period, may I bring to the attention of the minister the fact that according to authoritative evidence the snowplows used by the Canadian National are at least 30 years old and require replacement. Again I ask the minister whether there is even remote consideration being given to making any funds available for the purpose of providing equipment, in particular for replacing the snowplows to deal with the inevitable snowfalls which will be experienced in the course of deliveries to the west coast this winter? Has a request been made to the railways to consider upgrading this equipment?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I presume the hon. member reads the newspapers in the same way that I do, and I know that the CNR has ordered over $1 billion worth of rolling stock and equipment.

Mr. Woolliams: Any snowplows in that equipment?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I hope there are. If they don't do it I think we shall have to do it through this corporation we announced in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: During the past three years when our markets have been exceptionally good—something for which we are all grateful—there has been delay for one reason or another in the delivery of grain because of the poor quality of the tracks and the inability of some of them to carry the rolling stock needed. Is the minister in a position to become involved, either by making representations to the railways or otherwise, in the solution of these difficulties? Can a statement be made with respect to the replacement of rails to bring them at least up to an acceptable standard?

• (2140)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I can tell the hon. member that I have been making representations to the railways for a few months now.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: May I turn to matters of policy within the department as they relate to air transport, particularly in western Canada. I should like to make particular reference to the province of Saskatchewan, part of which I have the honour to represent. I should like to ask the minister about a press release following his meeting with the western transportation ministers in Saskatoon, who requested the minister to allow greater involvement and input by the provinces in regard to a bilateral air transportation agreement.

Would the minister consider instituting an international air service from the province of Saskatchewan? It seems to me that the province of Saskatchewan would welcome a bilateral air agreement so it could have air connection with the state of North Dakota, and with the city of Minot in particular.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I did discuss the question of negotiations with foreign countries regarding an air agreement with the ministers from Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia and Alberta. Our position was that it is difficult to integrate the provinces into the process of negotiation, but that we do try to take care of their interests. All of us in this House represent Canada, and the government does try to take care of the interests of each province. If we are not doing that, then perhaps we are going in the wrong direction.

With respect to the last agreement reached with the United States I am aware that Saskatchewan was not entirely satisfied, and we did make some modifications. On the other hand, Alberta was satisfied. There were some urgent needs there which had to be met.

I think the best way to deal with the matter is to have a meeting of ministers before negotiations commence, but once the negotiations are started I think the matter must be left to the federal government. I do not see how there can be any provincial involvement at that stage.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I thank the minister for that answer and I should just like to make one or two other brief inquiries concerning my province. May I ask the minister whether or not the government has given consideration to the great need in the province of Saskatchewan for development of air facilities, particularly in the northern part of the province? Once again we are embarking upon a very significant and substantial degree of uranium exploration and mining in the northern part of the province, and this calls for adequate air transportation to service the people of that region. There is a great need for navigational aids and air transport facilities to man this new industry in northern Saskatchewan.

The fact of the matter is that at the present time it is expedient to use the service from the city of Edmonton and Fort McMurray in Alberta. However, I think it is logical to request the minister to improve air transport facilities in the province of Saskatchewan. Will he give the committee an undertaking at this time that adequate consideration will be given to this rather modest request?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The hon. member is aware of what we are doing at the present time. I was in Saskatoon yesterday or the day before, I do not remember which, and some very substantial improvements are being made at Lac La Ronge. We are concerned about improving air transport facilities in Saskatchewan. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is satisfied with what we are doing in that province.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of whether I am satisfied but of whether the people of Saskatchewan are satisfied. I ask the minister to consider improving facilities north of Lac La Ronge with a view to servicing commercially this particular area of the province.

I will conclude my remarks after two more questions to the minister respecting items relating to the province of Saskatchewan. Would the government give consideration to establishing an international airport within the province, something we do not presently have? All that is required is the provision of around-the-clock customs facilities, not a substantial undertaking. Since several airports are being renovated it seems to me now is an appropriate time to establish an international airport with around-the-clock customs facilities.

In conjunction with that would the minister consider making representations to Air Canada or to the CNR, as the case may be, to provide air freight service to Saskatoon? It seem to me that this kind of service should be provided to a province that is located in the heart of western Canada.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am sure the hon. gentleman understands that international airports can only be established by agreement between two countries, such as the United States and Canada. Air lines must be prepared to fly to those airports. In my home town, Quebec city, which is the capital of Quebec, no international airlines want to serve the airport there. Even if an agreement were reached with the United States or with Europe that Quebec City should be on an international route, no air line would be interested in flying DC-8's or 747's to Quebec city. So there would be no point in extending the runway to enable 747's to land at Quebec city. The hon. member sees that I have a problem very similar to his.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, the city of Quebec is a great city, but in Saskatoon there are people who want to fly direct to the United States. This is why we would like the minister to establish an international airport in the province. Once he gets over the first hurdle of reaching an agreement, the second hurdle will be cleared very easily.

• (2150)

Mr. Beatty: I have a few questions for the minister which I think he can answer quite briefly, and perhaps I will have one or two comments to make after he is finished. The first question is essentially the same one I asked today during the question period, to which I did not get an answer. It relates to a letter sent out on October 9, 1974, by Diane Waller, the minister's research assistant. It states in part:

> Last year, the CTC's research branch carried out a thorough study of transportation services in the area and came to the conclusion that rail passenger services were not supportable by the population and that the preferred method of travel would be an improved rationalized bus service, a possible link to the existing main line passenger trains between London and Toronto.

The letter continues that "one primary candidate area" for replacement of the railway passenger service with bus services would be southwestern Ontario and it states that such action would be "in the national interest" and "should be encouraged and financially supported by the federal government".

My question is: did the minister authorize that letter to be sent?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think the hon. gentleman told me he did not get an answer this afternoon. I think I gave him an answer.

Mr. Beatty: What was the answer?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am supposed to meet with Mr. Rose.

Mr. Beatty: Oh, for heavens sake! You have to be kidding. That was not the question I asked the minister. I asked him whether he authorized that letter to be sent by Mrs. Waller. Was it sent out under his authority?

Mr. De Bané: Would you be kind enough to table the document?

Mr. Beatty: I would be delighted to table the letter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Do you think he is making it up?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. There is no requirement for the hon. member to table the document.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, I have received a request and I would be glad to accede to it if I have unanimous consent to table the letter.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: I would remind hon. members that to do so would be entirely out of order. If we were to allow hon. members to table documents every day we would have a tremendous problem just picking them up. In any event this is not in order.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might have an answer to my question. Did the minister authorize that letter to be sent? Surely the minister does not have to ask his deputy minister whether he authorized the letter.

An hon. Member: Let's hear the answer.

An hon. Member: Sit down and let him answer.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I just want to support the request for an answer. This is the point I was making this afternoon. It is obvious from the way the government behaves that its ministers are not responsible. They do not respond to questions asked in the House. The government House leader said here tonight that we could ask questions and it is for the minister to decide which he will answer. I want to know whether we are to get answers, or whether this is a joke.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Those fellows in the back can make as much noise as they like, but we want to know whether the minister is going to answer.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): On that point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would not mind this coming from anybody else but the Leader of the Opposition, because he surely knows from his vast experience what it is to run a department with about 100,000 persons involved. To ask me on the floor of the House whether I sent a letter and what was the reply is not fair.

Mr. Stanfield: If the minister wants to say that he would like to check this out, I am sure the hon. member will accept that.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): O.K.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: There are a lot of smart alecks behind the minister. We want to know the answer, and we are very serious about this.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You are right. If the Leader of the Opposition asks me to check if I did send the letter I will check that, or find out if I sent it or somebody else sent it under my name, or under someone else's name. I am ready to do the research and give an answer to the House.

Mr. Woolliams: When are you going to do it?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if perhaps the page could take a copy of the letter across to the minister in order that he might see if he sent it? After I asked the question this afternoon did the minister not bother to consult with his staff to get an answer?

An hon. Member: What were you doing between six and eight?

An hon. Member: Will you answer that?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is not what you asked me to do this afternoon.

Mr. Beatty: I asked for an answer, and if the minister was serious enough I am sure he would have checked.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Would you allow me, Sir, to give you an answer tomorrow or the day after?

Mr. Beatty: Certainly, if you assure me I will get the answer.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Then let us not continue to take up the time of the House.

Mr. Beatty: Why did the minister not answer in that way before, rather than evading it?

An hon. Member: Why don't you learn a little sense?

Mr. Beatty: My next question relates to the third part of the study by the Canadian Transport Commission in respect of southwestern Ontario passenger service. Has the minister released report number three?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Do you have it now?

Mr. McKinley: You have had it since February.

Mr. Beatty: Is it the intention of the minister to answer, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: The minister has the opportunity to answer and it is up to him to decide whether he will reply.

Mr. Stanfield: This is the whole point. The minister has been asked a perfectly simple question, whether he has released the report. If he does not know the answer and would undertake to get the information I am sure that is perfectly satisfactory. Surely if the minister is not going to answer perfectly straightforward questions, that is another matter. We want to know whether this is a serious procedure or a farce.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think the Leader of the Official Opposition is right. I should look up the information and give him an answer.

An hon. Member: Why don't you do so?

Mr. Beatty: Has the minister yet sent the report to the affected members of parliament, the provincial members and the municipal councils?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I don't know.

Mr. Beatty: Will the minister answer the question, or does he need more time to check it?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, certainly before 10.30.

Mr. Stanfield: He said "yes".

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, several times the minister and his officials have made reference to a tri-level conference which was to be held in Ontario to discuss the problems of passenger transportation, including the first report of the CTC suggesting that "The three reports are to provide a basis for discussions at a tri-level governmental conference to be held early in 1974, at which, it is hoped, a definition of policy with regard to public transportation in midwestern Ontario-Bruce will be achieved. "When is that meeting scheduled for, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Excuse me, sir. I am at fault as I did not listen to the question. Will you repeat it?

Mr. Beatty: The question I asked was when is the tri-level conference, at which this report is supposed to be discussed, scheduled?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The tri-level conference is not organized by the Department of Transport but by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. If you want to ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs when the tri-level conference is to be organized I am sure he will provide you with that information.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, perhaps if I pose my questions to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs he would give me better answers than those I get from the Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Beatty: Apparently the minister who is responsible for transportation policy does not have the foggiest idea as to when these discussions are to take place. I would ask the minister whether he has read report number three?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, I regret it but this is strictly a narrow; political attitude.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh, oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: You are being railroaded, Jean.

● (2200)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): With that kind of a smile you will never win an election. The problem is that in the field of transportation the federal government is involved, the provincial government is involved, and the municipalities are involved. So if it is desired to have what we call a tri-partite meeting this must be organized by the Department of Urban Affairs.

Mr. Beatty: That is not what I asked. Have you read the report?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, I have not. Have you?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, is the minister telling us that he has had this report since it was prepared in February, 1974, and delivered to him, and since that time he has not yet read the report?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I did receive the report.

Mr. Beatty: Did you read it?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is none of your business.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, the minister is making a mockery of the proceedings of this House. He already indicated he has not read the report. He has had it since February, 1974, and has sat on it since then.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, it would be childish in this House to mention all the reports I read and those I do not read. If you have some time to spare, come to my office at eight o'clock in the morning and I will give you material to read for hours and hours.

Mr. Beatty: What the minister is saying now is that he does not know whether he has read the report, or perhaps he does not care. That certainly is typical of his attitude. I am wondering whether he has discussed the report with his own officials, and whether he is satisfied with the methodology used in the survey?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The report is being discussed with officials of the Ontario government at all levels. It is to be discussed by Mr. Rose and myself.

Mr. Beatty: That is not the question. I asked the minister whether he is satisfied with the methodology of the report. Does he feel it was fairly and competently prepared, and that the conclusions it draws are justified?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I know the hon. gentleman knows all these answers. I do not have all the answers, I regret to say.

Mr. Beatty: Does the minister have any of them?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Rose does not have all those answers either.

Mr. Beatty: I would hope he would have some answers which would be better than what the minister has been giving us so far. This survey, which was taken of more than 1,200 families in the area, was released to the minister in February, 1974, and he has yet to release the report to the public.

The study was supposed to have been used as a basis for tri-level discussions. The minister has yet to make the report available to the federal members of parliament from the area, or to the provincial members of parliament from the area, or to the municipal councils in the area. He has not yet read the report.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Maybe the hon. gentleman would tell us whose report it is.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, it was prepared by the Canadian Transport Commission. If the minister cannot get his hands on it I could lend him my copy.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Do you think I control the Canadian Transport Commission?

Mr. Beatty: The report at page nine states:

> In a letter sent April 3, 1973, to the Hon. E. J. Benson, President of the Canadian Transport Commission, the minister referred to expressions of concern by the public and members of parliament that public transport services in the region were inadequate or in some cases non-existent, and requested that the commission, in cooperation with provincial authorities, undertake a review of the situation.

Is it not established procedure that when a minister personally requests that a report be made the report is made available to him?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): May I shed some light here. I am told by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs that on Friday he will meet with Mr. Rhodes Irving on this report and start the study in order to find a solution. Perhaps some day the Minister of Transport will be invited, but for the time being I am out of the picture.

Mr. Beatty: The minister has been out of the picture for the whole of the two years that I have been here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: It is worth knowing about this report. It was prepared at the request of the minister for him. The minister has either refused or been incapable of answering any of the questions I have asked him. I want to make some general comments briefly with respect to this report. The report is a fallacious document. It was designed in such a way that it discriminates against railway passenger service in the area and is in favour of bus passenger service. It is a piece of flim flam.

The report was incompetently prepared. It asks such questions of respondents as whether they would rate comparatively the convenience of arrival and departure times of business and trains. Considering that there have not been any trains in the area for four years, it is hardly relevant for them to be asked for a judgment on departure and arrival times. It also asks for comparative judgments with respect to keeping door to door travel time to a minimum.

It is interesting to note that the report itself shows that fully half of the people in the region who were consulted live within five miles of a bus service, but that three quarters of them are 25 miles or more from train service.

How are they to respond to such a question, and how are they to respond to a question about keeping costs to a minimum for travel from door to door if it requires a person to take a cab for a 50 mile ride when a bus is available within five miles?

It has been the experience of people in southwestern Ontario that the government has systematically ignored their needs. The government has had this report, which was obviously designed to damage the case for the restoration of railway facilities. It sat on it throughout the election, although the minister had it delivered to him. During that time Liberal candidates were permitted to say that they were in favour of train service restoration, when in fact the government's recommendation here was obviously that buses should be preferred to trains. I ask the minister whether or not he is prepared to release the report? Will he table the report this week?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Is there a by-election in your riding next week? Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows very well that I am not at all bound by this report which was prepared by the CTC.

Mr. Beatty: I ask the minister whether he will table the report in the House this week.

Some hon. Members: You have it already.

Mr. Beatty: Yes or no? Other affected members of parliament from the area, including the hon. member for Bruce who is in the minister's own caucus, do not have copies of the report. Will he table it this week?

Apparently the minister is not willing to answer that question either. When the report is available I want to make an offer to members on the government side that, if the minister will not give them a copy of it, I would be willing to lend them mine. I hope that at the time they consider the report they will recognize the fact that the survey was incompetently carried out, and that it was structured in such a way as to destroy the case for the restoration of the railway service. I think it is incumbent upon anybody who goes to a tri-level conference, or to any other discussion dealing with the matter of the restoration of the railway passenger service in southwestern Ontario, to ensure it is fully understood that conclusions reached in Part III of the study are not valuable for any discussions and should be completely disregarded.

● (2210)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, I have only one word to add. I am very worried about the passenger train service in Canada, and particularly in southwestern Ontario.

Mr. Beatty: So am I.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Maybe you do not believe it—and I do not mind that—but I do mind and I hope in a few years we are going to improve all this. We started with the Richmond Hill-Toronto—

Mr. Beatty: That is not in our area.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Oh, that is past, but there are some future—

Mr. Beatty: That is not in our area. That is Toronto.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Oh, yes; Toronto is not in Canada.

Mr. Beatty: It is not in southwestern Ontario.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This part you are interested in, I am interested in too and I hope we are going to find a good passenger service. I believe deeply in this, and I hope that together we are going to do something that will be worth while for the people.

An hon. Member: You are getting emotional.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, I am not getting emotional and whatever CN and CP tell you, I will try to give this service to the people. If I do not succeed maybe somebody else will be found in Canada to do it.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, last March when he met representatives of the Canadian Railway Labour Association the minister is quoted as saying to them:

> It the transportation situation continues in the mess it is now, I don't want to stay in this job. Someone else can manage this department.

Then he said:

> I can't manage transportation in Canada. If you ask who is managing transportation policy, I say to you I don't know.

I am sorry to say it, Mr. Chairman, but on the basis of what we see tonight I think there is still nobody managing transportation policy.

That was last March, Mr. Chairman. A few months later we got into an election. The Prime Minister went across the country and talked about what the government would do to improve urban transportation if re-elected. He said that a government which he led would spend some $300 million for urban transportation in the next five years, that it would pay out $100 million for transit vehicles, and $50 million for commuter vehicles. Mr. Chairman, that is a small percentage of what we are likely to require.

The Prime Minister promised that the federal government would pay 25 per cent of the cost of urban transit vehicles—buses, street cars, subway cars. Toronto alone estimates it will need 200 new subway cars and 200 new street cars in the next five years. Montreal expects to need 400 new subway cars in the next five years, and will be spending something over $400 million on the electrified subway system to link Dorval and the Mirabelle airport. Other cities also need buses and subway trains. A rough estimate is that in the next five years they will be spending over $900 million for urban transit, which is twice as much as the Prime Minister promised during the election.

I should like to ask the minister whether his department is reviewing the needs of the cities in the field of urban transit, whether it will increase the $100 million which the Prime Minister promised and, if not, when the cities can begin to see some of that $100 million which he promised during the election?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt we intend to review that.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr.Chairman, at one point during this sad evening the minister asked us not to be political or partisan. I am simply asking when the people in the cities of Canada, who elected a large number of Liberal members, will begin to see some of this $100 million which the Prime Minister promised during the election campaign?

The Prime Minister also promised $50 million over the next 10 years for commuter vehicles, mainly trains. Commuter vehicles in Canada are essentially used to bring people into Toronto and Montreal. I know the minister is very interested in Montreal. Can the minister tell us when the cities can expect some assistance with the purchase of buses and subway cars? When will the people of Toronto, Montreal, and their suburbs see some of the money for commuter cars which the Prime Minister talked about during the election?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, there are a certain number of things I cannot stand. One is this narrow way of tackling problems by saying, "You are interested in Montreal". My constituency is in Quebec, not Montreal. I am interested in Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Halifax and all the rest of Canada. That is why I am in this House. No one can find anything that I have done since I have been here—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I presume the applause will extend to the next part of my statement. I have not done anything for political purposes. I am in politics and like all members I believe in this country. As a minister, I believe I should serve all the country, not just part.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time this evening I have found anything to agree with which the minister has said. He says that he is not a minister who represents only the city of Quebec. I am not a member who represents only the city of Winnipeg.

I do not think there is anything wrong with asking the minister when we can expect some action on a promise which his leader, the Prime Minister, made during the election, namely, that the federal government is prepared to spend $100 million for buses and subway cars and $50 million for commuter trains. Because I am not from Toronto or Montreal I do not think it is improper for me to ask the minister if the Prime Minister was serious when he made those promises? If he was serious, when will we begin to see the implementation of those promises? I have not received an answer to those two questions.

A few minutes ago the minister said there is one thing he is interested in, and that is improving passenger service. Even if the CNR and CPR are not interested, by God he will see that they improve passenger services or there will have to be another minister.

Let me go to another promise which was made. The Prime Minister promised that the government would set up an inter-city passenger rail service. A new Crown agency, the Canadian passenger transportation corporation, would be established to take over all inter-city passenger rail service.

● (2220)

Three steps would be needed to implement such a policy. Legislation would be required to set up a corporation. We would need to introduce high speed inter-city trains, and introduce new concepts of rail travel leading to the elimination of level crossings and so on. This would take between seven and ten years to achieve. I am wondering when we are to see the beginning of this Canadian passenger transport corporation.

I used to find it most convenient to take one of the many trains between Ottawa and Montreal. Nowadays there are not many trains on this service. Meanwhile, the government is investing hundreds of millions in developing the STOL aircraft. Will the minister continue putting more millions into STOL, which will only meet the needs of a few highflying executives, or will he go back and give us some really good rail service between Ottawa and Montreal?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, I would be tempted to be mean and I believe I shall not resist the temptation. It is rather strange that that hon. member, who is well known in Canada, whom I met before going into politics, who even came to see me at the time when I was general secretary of the Confederation of National Trade Unions fighting for the rights of man, then seemed to be very objective.

Today, of the two figures quoted for the STOL experiment, that is mine of $25 million and that of Mr. Sinclair, chairman of the CP, he chooses the latter's, naturally. Of course, I recognize the great socialist spirit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow): In any event, I say simply—it may be mean but not quite as much as the hon. member has been—that on March 7 last, I made a speech in the House on the transportation system, and then a general election was called much sooner than I had foreseen.

Mr. Chairman, during the election campaign, we said exactly the same things that we had said in our speech. In the Speech from the Throne, we find again exactly the same promises. We are about to come up with the programs we announced then. Let anyone find a government, whether NDP, Liberal or Progressive Conservative, which was as quick as this one has been and I shall raise my hat to him. If he cannot find one, I will just say that this is the meanness of a man who is unworthy of the great ideas he is fighting for.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Even on one of his bad days—and this is one of his bad days—when the minister gets angry he is a good stump speaker. I have been around this place and other legislative bodies long enough to know that any government, particularly a Liberal government, takes a long time before it implements new programs.

If the minister believes it is going to take some time to set up the Canadian passenger transport corporation I would not argue with him. But the Prime Minister, when he made that promise, gave some specific figures—$100 million for transit vehicles, $50 million for commuter vehicles, $50 million for research and development, $25 million for rail relocation and $75 million resulting from the removal of the 12 per cent sales tax. This represents a package of $300 million over five years. I want to know whether the Prime Minister meant that this $300 million would be spent three years from now, in other words, just before the next election.

A sum of $300 million over five years means $60 million a year. I am not saying that we have to spend $60 million each year, but will any of this money be spent in the next year? That is a very simple question I should like to have answered. I am trying to be as objective as I can, and to get some idea what the Prime Minister meant when he made these promises to the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, the less time we waste in the House because of the hon. member, the quicker we shall come to the projects mentioned in the Speech from the Throne.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Someone says I should raise a question of privilege, but I do not need to do so. If the minister really believes that asking questions in the House, or outside the House, about when the people of Canada can expect to get a program promised them by the Prime Minister is wasting the time of the House, then I might as well sit down now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There was not much point sitting on a Wednesday evening.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, my question is extremely brief and there may be time for one or two more before we break at 10.30. Unlike some of the questions asking for information asked a few minutes ago, the minister has had lots of time to consider my question. I have asked him this in correspondence over a number of months. I asked him last week in the House, and he promised me that he would have the answer. Now a week later I once again ask him whether we are going to get the report on the fatal accident at Frobisher Bay involving an aircraft and, if so, when?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that the report is on my desk. I informed some members of the House that I had the report; it has not been translated yet, and that is all. If the House would give unanimous consent to accepting the report without its being translated, then I am ready to table it, but I doubt whether that is a good procedure. I have the report, and I have told important people in the House that I have it.

Mr. Ellis: If I may continue, would the minister, who promised me the report would be tabled last week, tell me when the report in both languages will be tabled?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): If the hon. gentleman can tell me how long it takes to translate the report, I will give him the exact hour when it will be tabled.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, the minister has been good enough to send me over a note saying that he had a copy of the report. I do not think it would be any abuse of confidentiality to tell the committee that the minister would either let me see it, or he would table it with consent. I sent him back a note saying that in the circumstances it would be advisable for him to table the report without waiting for the translation.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think the Leader of the Opposition is entirely right. He told me that as leader of his party he did not oppose the tabling of the report in the circumstances outlined. Unfortunately, I have not had the same response from the other leaders.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, before we see the clock at 10.30, the minister suggested earlier in the evening that he was prepared to introduce a bill in the House very soon requiring disclosure from CPR and CNR of all relevant information in terms of determining real cost. Can we get from the minister tonight some clear indication of precisely when he expects to do this?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am in the hands of the House leader on this. As soon as he tells me that he has the agreement of all parties—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has it now.

● (2230)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think it would be a good thing to have it as fast as we can.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 10.30 o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to special order made Thursday, October 3, 1974.

At 10.32 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRILIVEGE

MR. REYNOLDS—REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT AND MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER EAST

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta on a question of privilege.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given notice, and I have also given notice to the members that it affects. Yesterday during the committee of the whole proceedings on the transportation estimates I was questioning the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) regarding the use of search initiator buoys with respect to which the government passed a regulation to the effect that they should come into operation on July 1 last year. When I asked the minister why they had not come into operation, in his first answer to me he said, as reported at page 677 of Hansard:

> There are certain technical problems which we did not overcome. We are trying to solve them and will consider the situation.

I then continued questioning the minister on that and other matters. When I finished my statement I said to the minister that this was an extremely important matter in the province of British Columbia. There are a lot of tugs operating in Canada and people are dying every year because they are being sunk. I wanted to know if he could really give me an answer as to why these regulations had not been put into effect. Although he said previously there had been technical problems, the minister then said to my amazement "the regulations are in effect. There is no doubt about that." The fact of the matter is that the regulations are not in effect, and I will read a telegram in a moment or two from an individual who is involved and has made a statement on this.

● (1110)

The question I want to raise now relates to a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee), and I should like to quote from this statement made yesterday:

> A question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. With all due respect to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, as a member from British Columbia I worked very closely all this time with members of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild on the west coast and made representations to the Department of Transport. They are well aware of the problem that we brought to their attention. As a matter of fact, I just spoke to Captain Arnie Davis who is the Secretary-Treasurer and he indicated to me that the regulations are in force on the west coast.

That statement totally refuted what I had been saying to the minister, that these regulations were not in force and were not being enforced. So, I called Captain Arnie Davis and asked him whether he had made this statement to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee). He was puzzled and sent me a telegram which I should like to read, as I think it refutes what the minister and the hon. member for Vancouver East have said to the effect that the regulations are in force. The telegram reads:

> Research initiator buoy regulations. This is to confirm that to the best of my knowledge the named regulations have not and are not in force on the west coast of Canada as of October 22 1974. A.W. Davis Secretary Treasurer western branch Canadian Merchant Service Guild.

That is the same gentleman referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver East in his statement last night. I bring this forward this morning because it is an extremely important matter. While I realize you may say this is argument, these members have made statements in this House that are untrue, and I think we should have some answers from the other side.

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I did speak with Captain Davis this morning about the conversation we had last night. There may be some room for error but I am quite sure I specifically asked him whether the regulations were in force. There may be some indication that we were talking about two separate things, and he may have answered in the affirmative to something else I had asked. When the hon. member asked about that specific aspect I spoke to Mr. Bonn of the Marine Safety Inspection Department this morning and he said the regulations are in effect.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Ordinarily I think this matter would be strictly a matter for debate. However, since the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) did raise it yesterday on a question of privilege, and as the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) gave me notice this morning, I thought perhaps there might at least be an opportunity given to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta to present his comments on the question of privilege. As the House will know, there was no motion following the hon. member's question and, therefore, no action is called for by the Chair.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NEED FOR POLICIES TO STIMULATE PRODUCTIVITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, as the figures released this week by Statistics Canada show that the index of real product, which is the real growth in the economy, has decreased since the end of the second quarter, the period for which Statistics Canada reported zero growth in the economy, can the Minister of Finance indicate when we may expect an announcement of new policy to produce that increase in production the minister has stated many times in this House must be attained if we are going to wrestle inflation to the ground?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if new policies were to be announced they would be announced budget night.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, when the minister brings forward his budget in two or three weeks can we expect an announcement in respect of policies that are going to be more effective than the hot air of the last three budgets which has produced nothing but stagflation?

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF T. EATON COMPANY BY J. C. PENNEY COMPANY OF UNITED STATES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Could the minister confirm or deny the recently published report regarding a possible takeover of the T. Eaton Company by the J. C. Penney Company of the United States?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I cannot.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, could the minister then assure this House that in the event these allegations prove to be true that he will do everything in his power to keep the company truly Canadian?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to the takeover of a Canadian company by foreign interests. Rules have already been established and I must remind the hon. member that the matter falls within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I shall certainly draw his attention to the matter the hon. member brought up.

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ENSURE ADEQUATE INSPECTION OF MEAT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that yesterday in the House the minister said that it would require having a health inspector in every store in the country every day to obtain adequate inspection of meat, and since presumably he could not mean this seriously and was not suggesting that it be taken seriously, I should like to ask the minister in view of what the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board had to say yesterday on the same subject whether he is reconsidering his position and taking steps to ensure that meat sold at the retail level across the country from time to time will receive adequate inspection.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my statement of yesterday still stands. I might go even further and say that to ensure completely safe meat we would have to almost have an inspector in every house, because there is no guarantee concerning what happens between the time this meat is sold in the store and the time it is consumed. The inspection which is being carried on at the present time is being carried on with all due diligence. As I said yesterday steps have been taken, since the report of the Food Prices Review Board of last June, to improve the situation even further and we will keep on improving it.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Once again the minister has proceeded in an entirely erroneous way. The question I ask does not pertain to what happens to the meat after it leaves the store until it is cooked, but rather what happens to it while it is in the store. In view of the fact that the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board has said that the level of excrement, which the minister considers to be acceptable in meat, is potentially—and I say this in all seriousness—fatal, I should like to ask the minister if he would have his officials reinvestigate this matter and square it with the information provided by the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the comments of the hon. member indicate that he himself does not take the matter very seriously. I refer him to my statement to the House, yesterday, which still stands. Indeed, I explained the events that have taken place: improvements have been made since the tabling of the commission's report in June 1973, and more will be made. I refer in particular to changes to the regulations which have now been under way for several weeks and which, I hope, will become official in the near future.

[English]

● (1120)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that ten days ago the minister said that it is appropriate for Canadians to drink milk, provided it is in powder form, and now it is being said that they can eat excrement, provided it is well cooked, I ask the minister if it is his view that an agricultural producing country like Canada cannot guarantee food at reasonable prices and in safe condition.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is getting carried away by his own imagination. Let him consult my statement to the House yesterday. If he will kindly listen to the answer, he can then perhaps draw a conclusion. I would ask him to kindly check my statements on the matter. If he does so, he will find that there is no relation between them and what he has just said.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the consumers' constant concern for the quality of ground beef and the position adopted by the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, could the minister reassure the House and Canadian consumers as to the quality of ground beef in Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, may I refer once again the Leader of the Opposition to the replies I made yesterday in the House, when I clearly indicated that millions of bacteriae are breathed in and consumed daily by every citizen, and that it is impossible to find a completely sterile environment in which to live. As to the quality of minced meat, for the information of the Leader of the Opposition, there has not been, over the past year, a single case of food poisoning through minced beef consumption reported by a Canadian hospital or health institution. Not a single case reported to date.

REQUEST FOR AID OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE IN ENSURING ADEQUATE INSPECTION OF MEAT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary.

The minister talks a lot, but he simply adds to the worry of the Canadian people.

[English]

I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the continuation of this sloppy inspection system and the resulting effect of this on the farmers who are delivering a clean product to the market, is the minister prepared to take on the Minister of National Health and Welfare to get him to provide adequate inspection as well as to take on the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to do something for the farmers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the different departments of the government are known for their co-operation. As I said the other day, we work very closely together to make sure that the public of Canada is protected better than any society in the world.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN INSPECTION CAPABILITY OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the regulations which the minister has statutory authority to enforce through the Food and Drug Act which state that no one shall sell any food unfit for human consumption, and in view of the findings of the Food Prices Review Board through their investigators that in some stores meat was sold which was unfit for human consumption, may I ask the minister what he proposes to do to carry out his statutory responsibilities to increase his inspection capability to ensure that meat unfit for human consumption is not being sold in Canada at retail level?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in any case where there is precise proof that meat unfit for human consumption has been sold, proceedings will be instituted under the regulations. It will involve not only cases reported by my department's inspectors but also any one which might be spotted by any organization or any person.
