Here I would like to pay tribute to Dr. E. F. Sheffield, Research Director of this foundation. Canadians owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to him for the very fine task of research he has performed, first, as the head of the Educational Statistics Branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and more recently as Director of Research for the Canadian Universities Foundation. In fact, it is on the basis of the research which Dr. Sheffield has done that we have gained a new appreciation of the monumental task ahead of us today.

As I have said, this information service reports on admission requirements, listing of awards available for graduate study and the list of academic vacancies. We will hear much more of that in the next few years.

At the present time we have 9,700 members of teaching faculties in Canadian universities, and by 1970 we will require 23,000.

The fourth arm of this organization is the International Programs Division, which provides the administrative services for a variety of services having to do with student and faculty exchanges, and liaison with government and academic bodies, particularly with respect to higher education in developing countries.

The fifth division is the Awards Division, which is responsible for advising government, business and industry with regard to academic award programs and for administering specific awards programs as requested.

It may be of interest to note how this organization is financed. The National Conference of Canadian Universities and Colleges and the Canadian Universities Foundation are supported by fees paid by member institutions of the National Conference of Canadian Universities and Colleges. The membership fee has been calculated as a percentage of the federal grant payments made to member institutions, and last year amounted to $393,000. In the case of the Province of Quebec, where in 1960-61 the federal grants ceased to be paid to the universities, the membership fee has been calculated on the basis of what the federal grant payments would have been.

On behalf of the universities and colleges, the foundation makes representations to the Government of Canada with respect to those services performed by institutions of higher education in the national interest. In addition, it distributes the annual grants made available by the Government to universities and colleges in those provinces which have no special alternative agreement with the federal Government.

The International Programs Division is responsible, on behalf of the Government of Canada, for administration of the academic aspects of the Commonwealth Scholarships Program. It also provides the administrative services for Canadian University Service Overseas, and a variety of other services having to do with student and faculty exchanges, scholarships and fellowships for study abroad, and liaison with governmental and academic bodies, particularly with respect to higher education in newly developing countries.

In connection with the Awards Division, I would like to emphasize that the question of awards, scholarships and fellowships is becoming of increasing importance as time goes on. An increasing number of private agencies, individuals, business firms and others are making donations of scholarships and fellowships, and this machinery provides an objective and competent authority through which the recommendations with respect to the awards can be made.

I should like to deal now with the bill itself, rather briefly, as there is nothing complicated about it. Clauses 1 and 2 read:

> 1. The members of the Conference named in the Schedule to this Act, together with such other corporations, organizations or bodies as may become members of the corporation as hereinafter provided, are incorporated under the name of Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, and, in French, Association des Universités et des Collèges du Canada, hereinafter called "the Association".
> 2. The objects of the Association shall be to foster and promote the interests of higher education in Canada.

Clause 3 provides:

> 3. (1) Subject to the by-laws which may be enacted from time to time pursuant to section 7, the membership of the Association shall be composed of the universities and colleges named in the Schedule to this Act, and such other corporations, organizations or bodies as are from time to time admitted to membership pursuant to this Act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Has consent in writing been given by the people named in the schedule, to becoming incorporated under this bill? Have the universities named in the schedule given authority or consent to be incorporated in accordance with this bill?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I understand that has been done. Clause 3, subclause (2) says:

> Any member of the Association may withdraw therefrom and relinquish its rights therein: Provided that no member may withdraw therefrom unless the member has given notice in writing to the Association of its intention to do so at least six months prior to the end of a fiscal year of the Association, in which event the withdrawal shall take effect at the end of such fiscal year.

Clause 4 deals with the management by the board of directors elected or appointed in accordance with the by-laws of the association and the setting up of the executive.

Clause 5 deals with interim management. It says:

> Until by-laws have been enacted for the management of the affairs of the Association pursuant to this Act, the affairs of the Association shall be managed in accordance with the articles of the constitution of the Conference in effect on the day on which this Act comes into force, in so far as the articles are not contrary to law or to the provisions of this Act.

Clause 6 deals with the first general meeting. Clause 7 deals with the by-laws. Clause 8 is the usual one with respect to corporate powers, regarding purchase, rent, lease, and so on. Clause 9 deals with the authority to make investments, and is in the usual prescribed form. Clause 10 prescribes that the official languages of the association shall be English and French.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask if it is the intention to exclude all other languages but English and French? What about Ukrainian, Polish, Italian and the many other languages in Canada? Is it to be understood that any university which uses a language other than English or French shall not be allowed to join this organization? Why slap them in the face?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I would not think so. I would not take that interpretation from this bill. My interpretation—and this can be clarified when it goes to committee—is that the clause simply recognizes that the two official languages in Canada, English and French, shall be the official languages as far as the proceedings of the new association are concerned. If there is any doubt about this, it can be clarified when the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It better be!

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Certainly a large number of universities today are giving lectures in Ukrainian, in Russian, in Italian, some in Greek, some in Latin. There is no intention of any kind to interfere in any way with that. I think this pertains simply to the fact that we have two official languages in Canada and these shall be the languages when the association discharges its business in its meetings.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask, would that not be a decision for the organization for those who are members of the executive, for instance, or those who are members meeting in convocation? Would it not be more proper for them, at the time they do their business, to decide for themselves whether they use the French language, the English language, the Ukrainian language or some other language, than for us to dictate in advance how they shall address one another?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I can only assume, Senator Roebuck, that this bill has been discussed and approved by the 46 universities and colleges listed in the schedule and that, had they desired to make provision in clause 10 for carrying on the business of the association in any languages other than the two mentioned, they would have done so. I also expect—and this can be clarified when the bill goes to committee—that under the by-laws which can be adapted from time to time, provision could be made for the use of other languages if and when it becomes desirable to do so in the case of the proceedings of the association. This has nothing to do with the utilization of those languages in the universities concerned. However, the point is well taken, and certainly there should not be any ambiguity in the matter.

Clause 11 provides that the head office of the association shall be in the City of Ottawa, or such other place within Canada as may be decided upon from time to time by the association, and that there must be the usual notice in writing of any change in its location.

Clause 12 provides:

> The Association is vested with all the property, rights and interests, and assumes all the obligations of the Foundation and the Conference.

Clause 13 provides:

> In regard to any real property which, by reason of its situation or otherwise, is subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, a licence in mortmain shall not be necessary for the exercise of powers granted by this Act, but otherwise the exercise of the said powers shall, in any province in Canada, be subject to the laws of such province.

Clause 14, dealing with territorial powers, provides?

> The Association may exercise throughout Canada the rights and powers conferred upon it by this Act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does the honourable gentleman mind my asking questions as we go along?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: No.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is there a law of Canada with regard to the matter of mortmain as applied to real property, situated or otherwise, subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada? Perhaps I have phrased my question clumsily. Section 13 of the bill provides as follows:

> In regard to any real property which, by reason of its situation or otherwise, is subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, a licence in mortmain shall not be necessary . . .

Is there a general law of Canada requiring a licence for mortmain in connection with the property so described, and, if so, why should we set it aside in the incorporation of a society such as this?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Senator Roebuck, it is quite obvious that I am not a lawyer. However, the association has engaged eminent counsel. They have gone over this document, and I presume they are satisfied that it meets the legal requirements. This is a question you can put forward when the bill goes to committee, and I hope you will do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I certainly will.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: The final clause of the bill, clause 15, provides:

> This Act shall come into force on a day to be proclaimed by the Governor in Council.

Honourable senators, in the event that this bill meets your approval and receives second reading, I propose to refer it to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: May I ask Senator Cameron a question in connection with this bill he has so well explained? I am concerned about the omissions in the schedule to the bill of names of certain universities. I am wondering why such universities in Ontario as York, Brock, Trent, in Peterborough, Laurentian, at Sudbury, or Lakehead, at Fort William, are not included in the schedule. Are these universities not members of the conference, have they not applied for membership, or are there some conditions of membership which do not apply to them?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: This list in the schedule which was submitted in writing by the officers of the respective universities and colleges, was approved in late 1963. At that time—and this is only my assumption—these new colleges had not completed the requirements to be listed in the schedule, and no doubt they will do so at a very early date. I too noticed that omission, and that was the only conclusion I could come to. That is also a question that can be answered when the officers and counsel appear before the committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I make it clear that I am not in any way opposed to this act, and I trust that no one assumed I was because of the somewhat critical questions that I asked.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Senator Roebuck, I appreciate the questions you have asked, because with your legal training and experience you might very well have spotted something which less experienced counsel might have overlooked.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, my contribution to the debate will be brief.

On the general principle of Bill S-36, I think we can all be pretty well in general agreement that it is worthy of the closest consideration. Some aspects of the bill appear to me to require a little further elucidation. For instance, section 2 says:

> The objects of the Association shall be to foster and promote the interests of higher education in Canada.

That is a very general statement. Would it not be desirable, if possible, to define that a little more closely? The objects of the association might be to carry on pressure against the governments for more money to erect additional buildings, and that sort of thing; or, it might be that this association will concern itself largely with better academic standings, higher qualities of teaching staff, and so on. These are matters upon which I think we should obtain information when the bill goes to committee.

I am going to suggest that as this is a most important bill, it might be better to send it to the Banking and Commerce Committee. That is only a suggestion.

I am curious to know how the association is going to be financed. Is it to be financed by a levy on the constituent bodies, most of whom receive their support either by public assistance or from provincial governments? I think it is important to know how the association will be financed, because section 8 of the bill—corporate powers—rather suggests that in the minds of the promoters there are pretty high ambitions as to what this association may ultimately do. It is being given practically all the powers that an insurance company or an organization of a similar nature might have or might request.

I am not criticizing; I am only suggesting that when the bill goes before the committee there should be ample information given in respect of these matters.

I would hesitate to support the measure if its purpose is simply to bring together all these universities and colleges to exert pressure on public opinion and governments for more financial support. If the association is concerned with raising academic standards, that is a different matter altogether. I think we should have more complete information on these points than we have at the present time.

I can quite appreciate that an association of this kind, comprising as it will all the universities, colleges and other institutions of learning, could render valuable service in the matter of public and higher education in Canada.

The final point I shall mention is that I think the provision concerning which a corporation, organization or body shall cease to be a member is somewhat stringent. It requires the sanction of at least a two-thirds vote at a general meeting of the association. If a college finds its assessment too high, or for some other reason wishes to withdraw from the association, apparently it can get permission to do so only if two-thirds of its associates are in agreement. That is a matter also upon which we might usefully obtain some information in committee.

I express only my own view when I say that from the very nature of the bill I think it might be more appropriate to refer it to the Banking and Commerce Committee rather than the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have one further suggestion. My friend has said that when we come to committee those who sponsored the bill and eminent counsel will be present. May I suggest that counsel be prepared to discuss the grave question of our right to enter into the field of education at all? The very purpose of this measure is that of fostering and promoting the interests of higher education, and the British North America Act reserves the question of education to the provincial legislatures.

Before we pass this bill I should like a very full explanation given as to how it comes within our jurisdiction rather than within that of the provinces. If it is within our jurisdiction, it is probably a useful measure; if it is within provincial jurisdiction, we should not touch it with a 10-foot pole. If we accept it, we must be well prepared with the reasons why, because I can envisage some very strong objections coming from some of the provinces that are, perhaps, ultra sensitive to matters of this kind.

So I suggest to the sponsor of the bill, who has given us a fine explanation, that when we consider it in committee he and his associates should be prepared to deal fully with this question of constitutional rights.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Cameron speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I think I can answer one or two of the questions raised by Senator Crerar and Senator Roebuck. I should have done this in my earlier remarks, but was negligent.

On the question of how the organization is financed, no part of the federal grant to the university constitutes the N.C.C.U. membership fee. The membership fee is calculated as a percentage of the federal grant paid to member institutions, and it is five-eighths of one per cent on the present fee basis. You are aware of the amount granted to universities by the federal Government each year, and the formula for arriving at the financial requirements of this association, the Association of Universities and Colleges, is five-eighths of one per cent.

There are other sources of funds. The association receives some revenue from charges for administering some of the scholarship programs; in other words, it is charging a fee for services rendered. It receives some revenue from the sale of publications. For instance, this publication, Report No. 5, sells at $1.50 a copy. It receives grants from foundations. A grant of $100,000 has been made by the Carnegie Corporation. The Ford Foundation has just provided $100,000 for a study on the financing of higher education. It may make a charge for administering federal grants paid to nonmember institutes. It is a small charge, one-eighth of one per cent. These are the sources of funds at the present time.

Senator Crerar raised the question of what are its purposes. I suspect that the association may have been allowing itself a fair amount of latitude by not being too specific about its objects or purposes. I repeat them:

> The objects of the Association shall be to foster and promote the interests of higher education in Canada.

I suggest that if they were to spell out in detail at this time the things they would be doing they would be bound to overlook some that might arise later on. That may be one of the reasons for this rather general statement of the association's objects.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Might I ask the honourable senator a question on that? What are the objects of the Canadian Universities Foundation, the company incorporated by letters patent? Are they spelled out at length, or are they in the same general terms as those contained in this bill?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: My recollection is they are in rather general terms too, but with more emphasis on financial administration.

Senator Crerar raised the question, is the purpose to raise academic standards? There is no question but that it is one of its purposes. The question arises as to how you get adequately qualified faculties. I might also deal with inter-university co-operation. Many universities today are agreeing not to duplicate faculties. In other words, one will say, "You have a faculty in this field, and we will stay out of it." For example, in the western universities they have avoided duplicating faculties of social science. They are avoiding duplicating any of the library schools as a means of economy.

Senator Crerar raised the question of the difficulty of getting out of the association. I suggest this question might be answered more effectively in committee than now.

Senator Roebuck raised the question as to whether we have any right to be discussing this matter here. I suggest if we have no such right, we are a little late raising the question, because in the last five years the federal Government has voted $249 million for higher education in Canada. I suspect we are going to vote a lot more, but I should not anticipate what might happen.

Finally, as to the committee to which this bill should be referred, I have no objection to its going to the Banking and Commerce Committee. However, I shall be glad to abide by the advice of honourable senators. I thought it might be logical for it to be referred to the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee, but if it is the wish of the honourable senators that it be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee I shall be quite happy with that disposition.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cameron, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the house, I would remind honourable senators of the meeting of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Consumer Credit, and a very important meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, both commencing at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPENDIX

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS, 1964—FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

The meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers ended today. Pakistan, Ghana and Tanganyika and Zanzibar were represented by their presidents. Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Ceylon, Malaysia, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda, Kenya and Malawi were represented by their prime ministers. India was represented by the minister of finance; Cyprus by the minister of foreign affairs; and Jamaica by the deputy prime minister and minister of finance.

This was the first meeting at which Uganda and Kenya were represented as independent members; and the other Commonwealth heads of government were glad to greet their prime ministers. They expressed their satisfaction at the establishment of Malaysia which they had welcomed at their last meeting in 1962 and they greeted Tunku Abdul Rahman as Prime Minister of Malaysia. They also welcomed the attainment of independence by Malawi on 6th July, 1964 and agreed that Malawi should be admitted to membership of the Commonwealth. They invited the Prime Minister of Malawi, Dr. Banda, to join their meeting, and Dr. Banda took his seat on 9th July. They noted that Northern Rhodesia would become independent on 24th October, 1964 as the Republic of Zambia; and they looked forward to welcoming Zambia as a member of the Commonwealth on the completion of the necessary constitutional processes.

In the course of their discussion, the presidents and prime ministers reviewed the major issues of the day.

They agreed that one of the most important of these is race relations. It was agreed that the Commonwealth has a particular role to play in the search for solutions to the interracial problems which are threatening the orderly development of mankind in general and of many particular areas in the world today. As a community of many different races, the Commonwealth is itself an almost unique experiment in international co-operation among peoples of several races and continents. Within their own borders many of its members have faced and are facing issues raised by the co-existence of differing cultures within a democratic society. The prime ministers affirmed their belief that, for all Commonwealth governments, it should be an objective of policy to build in each country a structure of society which offers equal opportunity and non-discrimination for all its people, irrespective of race, colour or creed. The Commonwealth should be able to exercise constructive leadership in the application of democratic principles in a manner which will enable the people of each country of different racial and cultural groups to exist and develop as free and equal citizens.

The prime ministers recalled the critical international situation which had developed shortly after their last meeting in the autumn of 1962 and the grave threat to peace which it had implied. They believed that the fact that it was successfully resolved may have been in some sense a turning point in the relations between the major powers and may have marked the beginning of a new period in international affairs in which the world may hope for a gradual relaxation of tension. This will not be a short or simple process; but the prime ministers noted with satisfaction the further steps which had already been taken to reduce the causes of friction, particularly the conclusion of the tests ban treaty and the subsequent agreements between the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet union not to place nuclear weapons in outer space. They also welcomed the reductions in the output of fissile material for military purposes which these governments have made.

Against this background, the prime ministers expressed their hope that these steps would lead progressively to general and complete disarmament. They reaffirmed their support for the work of the Geneva disarmament conference and their determination to seek to extend the scope of disarmament in accordance with the principles expressed in their statement of 17th March, 1961, particularly by endeavouring to promote an agreement to prohibit the further dissemination of nuclear weapons and of knowledge relating to their manufacture and use. They will maintain their efforts to reduce the areas of international disagreement by all the means within their power, while maintaining both the strength and the resolution to resist aggression from without or subversion from within. In this connection they assured the Prime Minister of Malaysia of their sympathy and support in his efforts to preserve the sovereign independence and integrity of his country and to promote a peaceful and honourable settlement of current differences between Malaysia and neighbouring countries.

They discussed the great significance of China for south and southeast Asia. They also discussed the question of relations with China and of her membership in the United Nations. They expressed anxiety about the continuing tension in southeast Asia and affirmed their support for all measures which might promote a just and peaceful settlement and help to re-establish stability in the area.

The prime ministers noted with satisfaction the friendly public statements by the President of Pakistan and the Prime Minister of India and expressed their hopes that the problems between their countries will be solved in the same friendly spirit.

While recognising that it was not a function of the Commonwealth to act as an arbiter in disputes between member nations, the prime ministers agreed that Commonwealth countries could play a role of conciliation and, where possible, consider using their good offices to help toward the settlement of disputes between member nations provided the parties concerned accepted such mediation.

The prime ministers renewed their support for the United Nations in its efforts to resolve disputes in various parts of the world. They reaffirmed their adherence to the principles of the charter and emphasized the importance of reinforcing the strength and capacity of the United Nations to respond to the demands which it must meet if the charter is to be fulfilled.

The prime ministers expressed concern about the situation with regard to Cyprus. They reaffirmed their full support for the United Nations Security Council resolutions of 4th March, 13th March and 20th June 1964. The prime ministers asserted that the Cyprus problem should be solved within the framework of the United Nations and in accordance with the principles of democracy and justice.

They appealed to all countries concerned to refrain from any action which might undermine the task of the United Nations peace-keeping force, to which a number of Commonwealth countries are contributing, or might prejudice the endeavours of the United Nations to find a lasting solution in conformity with the charter of the Unitted Nations.

The prime ministers undertook to consider practical measures to strengthen the peace-keeping machinery of the United Nations and to reduce the degree of improvisation required in an emergency. They agreed that consultation and co-operation among interested governments in this matter could be of great value in contributing to the improvement of the peace-keeping effectiveness of the United Nations.

The prime ministers expressed their concern at the possible effect on United Nations operations in all fields of a prolongation of the United Nations financial crisis. They expressed a common desire to work toward a long term equitable solution of the problem of financing large-scale United Nations peace-keeping operations and agreed that any such solution should be based on the principles of collective financial responsibility and relative capacity to pay.

Britain made the following statement to the meeting about the progress of British colonial dependencies toward independence.

Already more than 20 countries with a total population of some 700 millions had achieved sovereign independence under British guidance. This process was continuing all the time. Northern Rhodesia would be independent in October and the Gambia very soon after. Basutoland had been promised that she could have independence in about 18 months' time; Bechuanaland would be free to follow when she wished; and Swaziland's new constitution had now set her on the same course. In addition it had been agreed that the Federation of South Arabia should become independent within the next three and a half years. British Guiana would become independent as soon as she was able to assure internal peace. Southern Rhodesia would attain full sovereignty as soon as her governmental institutions were sufficiently representative.

There were a number of other colonies which already enjoyed a wide measure of self-government. These included the Bahamas, Barbados, British Honduras and Mauritius. In addition there were some 20 other colonies and protectorates with a combined population of about five million. Of these over three million were in Hong Kong where the circumstances were exceptional. Of the remainder only two territories had a population of more than 100,000. Several had less than 10,000. The smallest, Pitcairn, in the Pacific had only 90 inhabitants. It was clear that no uniform pattern would fit all these very different territories. Some might feel strong enough to proceed to independence on their own. Some might join with others to form larger and more viable units. Some might wish to couple independence with a treaty of friendship such as western Samoa concluded with New Zealand. Some would for the present prefer to remain as they were.

The prime ministers of the other Commonwealth countries welcomed the progress of British territories to independent membership of the Commonwealth. They recognized that the authority and responsibility for leading her remaining colonies to independence must continue to rest with Britain.

At the same time, prime ministers of other Commonwealth countries expressed their views to the Prime Minister of Britain on the question of the progress of Southern Rhodesia toward independence within the Commonwealth. They welcomed the decision already announced by the British Government that, as in the case of other territories, the existence of sufficiently representative institutions would be a condition of the grant of independence to Southern Rhodesia. They also noted with approval the statement already made by the British Government that they would not recognize any unilateral declaration of independence; and the other prime ministers made it clear that they would be unable to recognize any such declaration. The view was also expressed that an independence conference should be convened which the leaders of all parties in Southern Rhodesia should be free to attend. The object would be to seek agreement on the steps by which Southern Rhodesia might proceed to independence within the Commonwealth at the earliest practicable time on the basis of majority rule. With a view to diminishing tensions and preparing the way for such a conference, an appeal was made for the release of all the detained African leaders. The prime ministers called upon all leaders and their supporters to exercise moderation and to abstain from violence; and they affirmed their belief that the best interest of all sections of the population lay in developing confidence and co-operation, on the basis of tolerance, mutual understanding and justice. In this connection they recognized the necessity for giving confidence to the minority community in Southern Rhodesia that their interests would be protected.

The Prime Minister of Britain said that he would give careful consideration to all the views expressed by other Commonwealth prime ministers. At the same time he emphasized that the Government of Southern Rhodesia was constitutionally responsible for the internal affairs of that territory and that the question of the granting of independence was a matter for decision by the British Parliament.

The meeting expressed concern at the political rivalries in British Guiana which had led to disorder and interracial strife and had prejudiced the attainment of independence. While several different views were expressed on the methods to be employed, a number of prime ministers expressed the hope that the political leaders of British Guiana would seek urgently a basis for collaboration in the interest of their fellow countrymen of all races in order to restore mutual confidence among the races and to strengthen a spirit of national purpose and unity. Only in these circumstances could British Guiana hope to sustain true independence.

The question of the progress of the smaller dependent territories in the Caribbean to independence was raised. It was emphasized that the problem for the territories was mainly one of viability; and the hope was expressed that every practicable effort would be made to help them to strengthen their economies and so enable them to sustain the obligations of independence whether in a federation or in some other form of association.

The prime ministers reaffirmed their condemnation of the policy of apartheid practised by the Government of the Republic of South Africa. Some Commonwealth prime ministers felt very strongly that the only effective means of dealing with the problem of apartheid was the application of economic sanctions and an arms embargo. It was recognized, however, that there was a difference of opinion among Commonwealth countries as to the effectiveness of economic sanctions and as to the extent to which they regarded it as right or practicable to seek to secure the abandonment of apartheid by coercive action, of whatever kind. But the prime ministers were unanimous in calling upon South Africa to bring to an end the practice of apartheid, which had been repeatedly condemned by the United Nations and was deplored by public opinion throughout the world.

The prime ministers expressed their regret that Portugal had not so far given recognition to the principle of self-determination for her territories in Africa.

The prime ministers agreed that the issues of Commonwealth and international relations which confront them in the political field, however complex and contentious, must be seen in perspective in relation to the many factors which bring together the peoples of the Commonwealth and enable them to make a unique contribution to the promotion of peaceful development. The Commonwealth now consists of 18 independent member countries, widely distributed over the globe and accounting for nearly a quarter of the population of the world. It is, indeed, a cross-section of the world itself; and its citizens have an unparalleled opportunity to prove that, by mutual co-operation, men and women of many different races and national cultures can live in peace and work together for the common good.

The prime ministers reviewed the world economic situation as it affects their countries and reaffirmed the resolve of their governments to promote the economic development of their countries. To this end they emphasized the need of developing countries for improved and more remunerative outlets for their trade and for increased financial aid on easier terms and on a continuing basis. They took note of the problems presented to developing countries by the conditions and terms often attached by donor governments to their aid of the desirability of the encouragement of private investment in developing countries and also of the upward trend in the level of financial aid extended by the more developed countries in the Commonwealth and of the easier terms on which it is offered.

There was agreement on the importance for all Commonwealth countries of following up the work of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in particular with regard to expanding international trade in primary products through freer access to markets and, in appropriate cases, through commodity agreements and stabilized prices at equitable levels; working out arrangements for increasing access by preferences or otherwise to markets in developed countries for manufactured goods from developing countries; and elaborating proposals for supplementary finance to assist countries whose development might be threatened by adverse movements in their export earnings. The prime ministers affirmed their intention of working for a solution of these and other problems of the developing countries through the new institutions resulting from the conference as well as through existing international bodies such as the GATT.

The prime ministers reaffirmed the resolve of the member countries of the Commonwealth to promote the economic and social progress of developing countries. They wished to maintain their support of the work of the United Nations, its specialized agencies, the Colombo Plan and other similar arrangements in this field. At the same time they wish to establish how best the members of the Commonwealth could make a further distinctive contribution of their own to the development of its member countries. They conceived that the purpose of any new initiative in this respect should be not merely to increase the economic strength and material wellbeing of the recipients, vital though these considerations are, but also to strengthen the links between the countries of the Commonwealth by encouraging their peoples to work more closely together in a variety of practical ways. For this purpose they selected for further examination several fields of action in which they believed the practice of Commonwealth co-operation might be extended; and they agreed that these schemes should not be in substitution for existing arrangements but supplementary to them.

Commonwealth Development Projects

In particular they considered a proposal that development projects might be launched in individual Commonwealth countries, which would be implemented by various members acting in close collaboration and contributing whatever resources—in men, money, materials and technical expertise—they could most appropriately provide. Such projects, which would be additional to the support which Commonwealth countries already provide to the United Nations special fund and expanded program of technical assistance could be directed to a number of different purposes—the improvement of agricultural production and the development of natural resources through extension services, training and research; the enlargement of professional and technical training; the development of new industries; and so forth. But they would all be inspired by the common purpose of promoting the development of the Commonwealth by a co-ordinated program of joint or bilateral projects. The British Government said that they would be prepared to make a substantial contribution to projects of this kind within their expanding program of development aid. The other member governments expressed support for the objective of the proposal and agreed that further consideration should be given to the basis on which such a program might be established.

Administrative Training

Development projects of this kind would need to be planned, carefully and thoroughly, at all stages in their execution; and the prime ministers therefore considered that it might be valuable to supplement the existing arrangements for promoting the study of the techniques of administration and development planning throughout the Commonwealth. They considered that there might be advantage in making arrangements, which could include the formation of a new institute, to provide facilities for specialized training and research for senior administrators concerned with administrative and development problems in relation to the needs of new countries. They agreed that further consideration should be given to the most appropriate form for arrangements for additional training, including the strengthening of existing institutions.

Education

The prime ministers took note of the scope which exists for co-operation between the government and peoples of the Commonwealth in social, as well as economic, development. They noted with satisfaction that the third Commonwealth Education Conference will be held in Ottawa in August; and they expressed warm wishes for its success, together with appreciation of the British Government's offer to increase to an average of £5 million a year, over the five years starting in 1965-66, the capital assistance which they already provide for higher education in developing commonwealth countries, both independent and dependent.

Medical Conference

They decided in principle that an initiative similar to that which was launched in the field of education by the first of the Commonwealth education conferences several years ago should now be taken in the field of medicine and that for this purpose consideration should be given to the convening of a Commonwealth medical conference during the course of 1965. Such a conference would enable the members of the Commonwealth to discuss mutual assistance in medical education including links between institutions; the provision of ancillary staffs; the development and planning of health services; and the supply of medical equipment and facilities for research.

Commonwealth Parliamentary Association

The links between the countries of the Commonwealth are strengthened not only by co-operation between their governments in initiatives of this kind but even more by frequent personal contacts between individuals who share common professional interests.

The prime ministers recorded their support for the valuable work which the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association performs in bringing together members of the parliaments of all Commonwealth countries. The British Government stated that they would be prepared, if other Commonwealth governments would do the same, to increase their contribution to the association.

Commonwealth Foundation

The prime ministers considered that further steps should be taken to promote contacts in other fields and that it might be desirable to establish a Commonwealth foundation to administer a fund for increasing interchanges between Commonwealth organizations in professional fields. This foundation could be administered by an independent board; and, while it could be financed by contributions from Commonwealth governments, it would also welcome support from all quarters, whether public or private.

Satellite Communications

The prime ministers also took note of the current international discussions on the establishment of a global system of satellite communications. They endorsed the desirability of establishing such a system and considered how Commonwealth countries could best co-operate with each other and with other countries in its development. They discussed the provision of technical assistance to the developing countries in this field, particularly as regards the establishment of ground stations and interconnections in Commonwealth countries. They agreed that further consideration should be given to the feasibility of such a plan and the basis on which it might best be implemented.

The prime ministers directed that the Commonwealth Liaison Committee with the assistance of special representatives should now give more detailed consideration to all aspects of these new initiatives in the hope that they could be launched and carried forward at an early date. They noted that thereafter further opportunities to review many of these projects would be afforded by the third Commonwealth Education Conference in Ottawa in August and by the Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council meeting in Kuala Lumpur in September.

Commonwealth Secretariat

Finally, they were anxious that some permanent expression should be given to the desire, which had been evident through their deliberations, for closer and more informed understandings between their governments on the many issues which engage their attention and for some continuing machinery for this purpose. They therefore instructed officials to consider the best basis for establishing a Commonwealth secretariat, which would be available inter alia to disseminate factual information to all member countries on matters of common concern; to assist existing agencies, both official and unofficial, in the promotion of Commonwealth links in all fields; and to help to co-ordinate, in co-operation with the host country, the preparations for future meetings of Commonwealth heads of government and, where appropriate, for meetings of other Commonwealth ministers. This secretariat, being recruited from member countries and financed by their contributions, would be at the service of all Commonwealth governments and would be a visible symbol of the spirit of co-operation which animates the Commonwealth.

CONSUMER CREDIT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Basford has been substituted for that of Mr. Deachman on the list of members appointed to serve on the Joint Committee on Consumer Credit.

HARBOURS AND PILOTAGE ACTS

BILL TO REPEAL—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-40, to repeal certain acts of the Province of Newfoundland respecting harbours and pilotage:

> Your committee recommend that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of their proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: With leave, I move that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-40, to repeal certain acts of the Province of Newfoundland respecting harbours and pilotage, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Eric Cook moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

OTTAWA TERMINAL RAILWAY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-33, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendments:

1. Page 2, line 22. Strike out "or" and substitute therefor "and".

2. Page 3, line 33. After "hire" insert "in and about the City of Ottawa".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I think it is advisable that I explain these amendments now so that the bill may receive third reading tomorrow.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: The first amendment is a very simple one of language. The second amendment is to paragraph (g) of section 10 of the bill which relates to the power of the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company to carry on a transportation business using trucks, buses, and so forth. This amendment limits the right of the company to carry on these operations to the City of Ottawa and the district surrounding it.

It was represented to the committee by the trucking industry that there might be a possibility that very wide powers to carry on a trucking business throughout Canada were being given to the company by this section. The proponents of the bill have no objection to this amendment and, in any event, the limitation is what was intended.

With leave of the Senate, I move the adoption of this report.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

MEOTA PIPE LINES LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. John A. Robertson moved the second reading of Bill S-39, to incorporate Meota Pipe Lines Ltd.

He said: Honourable senators, I will be quite brief in my remarks concerning Bill S-39. I am sure that when it is before the committee, to which I shall move it be referred after it receives second reading, all questions that honourable senators have will be answered.

The applicants for incorporation of this company are all Canadian citizens, all having experience in the oil and gas industry and all being engaged now full time in Canada in this industry. The company would be completely Canadian financed, and Canadian owned and controlled. The primary purpose of this company is to serve the southwestern part of the Province of Manitoba with natural gas, a service which those in that area do not presently have.

Present plans call for a four-inch high-pressure line from the Saskatchewan gas fields in the vicinity of Gainsborough to the Town of Melita, Manitoba. More exhaustive research studies as to market demands will be made, and it is possible that the company will eventually build a bigger pipe line than that presently projected. Availability of supplies and market demand may also require the company to use not only natural gas but propane air mixtures, etc.

The company has asked for fairly general powers in its incorporation as the consumer market is quite close to the United States border, and a request for service south of the line would scarcely be considered a remote possibility at some future date.

While these plans are based on preliminary market and feasibility studies and are backed by people who are now actively engaged in natural gas distribution operations in Canada, more detailed and expensive studies will be necessary before application for licensing can be made or actual work commenced, and incorporation is required before embarking on these rather expensive and exhaustive studies.

I do not think there is anything further I need say on this particular bill. If honourable senators agree, I shall move later that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robertson (Kenora-Rainy River), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE ACT

BILL REFERRED TO SUPREME COURT

The Senate resumed from Thursday, July 16, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Pouliot:

That in the opinion of this House, the Government should immediately refer to the Supreme Court of Canada, for the opinion of that Court, the question of the constitutional validity of Bill S-16, intituled: "An Act to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act."

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, before I close the debate, Senator Fergusson wishes to say something on this motion.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I am very grateful to Senator Pouliot for giving me the opportunity to speak on this motion, even though he was about to close the debate. I had not realized yesterday that the debate was drawing to a close and I have a few things I wish to say.

I was out of Canada, at the United Nations, in 1962 when on October 31 replies were given by the Government to a number of questions which Senator Pouliot had asked. I was also away on November 9 of that year when, in the course of the honourable senator's speech during the Throne Speech debate, he explained his reasons for asking those questions.

Based on the arguments outlined in his speech of November 9, 1962, Senator Pouliot prepared and introduced into the Senate on July 16, 1963, Bill S-32, an act to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act.

On October 9, 1963, that bill received second reading and was referred to the Senate's Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. Hearings of that committee on the bill took place in the late fall and early winter of 1963. I regret that I was again out of Canada attending a U.N. seminar in Bogota at the time of the hearings. Had I been here, I certainly would have attended, although I am not a member of the committee. However, I have read all the speeches on this bill that were delivered in this house, and I have read all the proceedings of the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee.

It may be of interest to recall to honourable senators that the subject of the seminar I attended in Bogota, Colombia, during last December, was the "Status of Women in Family Law," which is very closely associated with the subject of Senator Pouliot's bill.

As I probably will not have another opportunity to do so, I hope that honourable senators will bear with me while I recall to them the report I made in the Senate on March 24 last regarding my visit to Bogota and my resultant quest for a bell for a little church there. I would like to tell you that the bell has been procured and sent to Bogota. It was received with great ceremony by the church authorities. In the acceptance speech, reference was made to the warm friendship for Canada that such a gift engendered; and it was also said that whenever this bell rang out, it would always say to all the inhabitants of the Barrio St. Ines, "Canada, Canada, Canada." I thought that was very touching, and I hope it will be of interest to honourable senators.

I would also like to tell you that after I spoke on this subject in the Senate, one senator came to me and told me that if I was not successful in finding a bell his foundry would provide one. Another senator came to me and placed in my hands a substantial donation towards the cost of a bell. As I had been successful in previous negotiations, I did not need to accept the offer of the honourable senator to provide a bell, but I certainly thank him for his interest. I also thank the senator who made a cash donation, which has been most useful in taking care of transportation costs.

To return to Bill S-32 of 1963, this bill was not reported by the committee in the 1963 session; and on April 29, 1964, Senator Pouliot introduced into this session of the Senate a similar bill, S-16, an Act to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act, on which there has been some considerable debate in this house.

A motion was made by the honourable Senator Pouliot that Bill S-16 be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for the opinion of that court on the question of its constitutional validity. The necessity for such an opinion seems to me to be quite evident, as I am sure it would be evident to anyone who has read the Hansard reports of the speeches in this house and of the hearings before the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee.

The immediate question before this house under Order No. 3 of this date is whether Bill S-16 should or should not be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling on its constitutional validity. We are not debating at this time whether or not we wish to pass Bill S-16 and send it to the House of Commons, but whether or not, under the provisions of the British North America Act, the federal Parliament has jurisdiction to pass such a bill.

Honourable senators, I certainly am no authority on constitutional law, but I have read all the speeches in connection with this bill; I have read all the cases that were quoted both in the Senate and in the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee, and, I might say, I have also read some other cases. I have very great respect for the honourable Senator Pouliot's knowledge of this branch of the law. I know, too, that he has done extensive research on this subject. His opinion and that of the former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, the late Thibaudeau Rinfret, carry considerable weight with me and I think we should ask for a Supreme Court ruling on this matter.

Honourable senators, I feel that the present, with its uncertainty about the future unity of Canada, may be a bad time to raise this question. I would be the last person in Canada to want to increase any existing misunderstandings. On the other hand, if, as is often suggested, there is a possibility of a thorough study of the British North America Act being made with a view to making changes to meet the problems of the present day—which in many instances are vastly different from the problems of a hundred years ago when that act was being considered and drafted—maybe it is a good time to bring to light sections of that act which are not perfectly clear and to which many persons learned in the law give different interpretations. In any case, I have a great interest in the observance of the rights of all individuals, and a particular interest in working toward that day when the rights of women in all parts of the world, whether they be married or single, are equal to those of men.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Consequently, I can do no other than support the motion of Senator Pouliot to refer Bill S-16 to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling as to its constitutionality.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Before the honourable senator speaks, I would like to remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Pouliot speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable Senator Fergusson profusely for her excellent speech in which she has explained very well the matter which is before the Senate today. She spoke to the point and her speech was most informative. I thank my good deskmate (Hon. Mr. Stambaugh) for seconding the second reading of the bill, and I also thank the honourable Senator Inman, who was ready to do so if my honourable deskmate had been unavoidably absent.

Now I have a pleasant duty. It is to congratulate all my honourable colleagues who have opposed the bill with so much eloquence and learning, and I hope that you will not be disappointed if I speak with more clarity than learning.

The matter is rather simple. For many years I have been a member of Parliament, and the ladies of my constituency have been good to me. I have nothing more to ask of them, but I remember with gratitude the support they have given me, and I thought that the time would come when the married women should enjoy equal rights with spinsters and widows.

There have been two bills on the matter. The first was Bill S-32 of last session, and Bill S-16 which is now before us. We are speaking on the motion to have this bill referred by the Government to the Supreme Court of Canada for elucidation, to inform us what is the exact and exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, on the one hand, and of the provincial legislatures, on the other hand, with respect to legislation concerning marriage. I leave "divorce" aside—we are not talking of divorce; we are speaking only of marriage.

I must point out to you, honourable colleagues, that the Civil Code dates back to the year 1866; it came into force on August 1, 1866, 11 months before Confederation. This fact is very important, because at the time the Fathers of Confederation and all those members of the Legislative Assembly knew very well what were the dispositions of the Civil Code. There is a chapter concerning marriage and another one concerning separation. They comprise Articles 115 to 217, or 103 articles of the Civil Code. Of all those articles concerning marriage, only eight are in the second chapter entitled, "Formalities relating to the solemnization of marriage." This is very important.

You should not forget that the Civil Code was in force before the B.N.A. Act, and the Fathers of Confederation knew very well about it. By the way, the report of the commissioners on the Civil Code was tabled two years before, and even three years before with regard to the part that concerns marriage. Therefore, in the B.N.A. Act the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, on the one hand, and the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, on the other hand, were easy to understand.

In the Constitution there is no possible error; the words "exclusive" and "exclusively" are repeated indefinitely. The idea of the Fathers of Confederation was to tell the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures, in turn, "Mind your own business." I believe that was a good policy, so that there should be no encroachment by one upon the powers of the other.

Now all the articles dealing with marriage must have been included in the word "marriage" in section 91 of the B.N.A. Act, concerning the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, and the word "exclusively" relating to the solemnization of marriage, which shall belong only to the provinces. I am sure you all follow me in the point I am making. Therefore we see that 94 articles which were part of the chapter on marriage and separation were put under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada by the B.N.A. Act, and only eight articles concerning the solemnization of marriage were put under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

However, this question has been submitted to the courts and I should like to quote a judgment with which you are all familiar. In 1896 the case of Conger vs. Kennedy was submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada. I read from the first paragraph of the official resumé or summary of the Supreme Court judgment as reported in Supreme Court Reports, volume 26, page 397.

> The provisions of ordinance No. 16 of 1889, respecting the personal property of married women, are intra vires of the legislature of the Northwest Territories of Canada, as being legislation within the definition of property and civil rights, a subject upon which the Lieutenant-Governor in Council was authorized to legislate by the order of the Governor General in Council passed under the provisions of "The North-west Territories Act".

This was federal legislation.

It is to be noted that legislation was passed by the Parliament of Canada to empower the authorities of the Northwest Territories, which were not organized as a province, to deal with current cases; in fact, I wonder why the Government of Canada at that time did not ask Parliament to make a special request to the Imperial Parliament to provide for this case, but they considered it would be easier to do it this way. It was done by federal legislation, which has been mentioned time and time again by Chief Justice Strong in his judgment. Therefore, if anyone contends that this judgment favours the jurisdiction of the provinces with regard to marriage, outside the ceremony of solemnization, they should take the trouble to read the full text of the judgment and they will realize that the authority of the Parliament of Canada with regard to those matters has been respected by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Now there was a second judgment in which the Supreme Court dealt extensively with the same matter. This was in 1912, sixteen years after the Conger vs. Kennedy judgment, and it was fresh in the memories of the judges. This may be found in volume 46 of the Supreme Court Reports, from page 132 to page 456. This means that 324 pages of this book are devoted to reproducing the text of the judgment and the factums of the parties. It is one of the longest judgments reported in the Supreme Court. It was brought to the Privy Council for final judgment, and the decision of the Privy Council may be found in Appeal Cases of 1912, page 880. The judgment of the Privy Council was rendered by Lord Haldane, who was one of the great jurists of his time and who was also a great diplomat and a man of considerable experience in law. It reads as follows:

> Under ss. 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, 1867, the exclusive power conferred on the provincial Legislature to make laws relating to the solemnization of marriage in the province operates by way of exception to the exclusive jurisdiction as to its validity conferred upon the Dominion, and enables the provincial Legislature to enact conditions as to solemnization, and in particular as to the right to perform the ceremony, which may affect the validity of the contract.

To repeat the same thing in plain language, the whole jurisdiction concerning marriage is an exception to the provision of section 92 giving the provinces exclusive jurisdiction over civil rights. While it is an exception, it is an exception in the terms of the Constitution, and therefore according to the Privy Council the exclusive jurisdiction over marriage has been vested in the Parliament of Canada with one exception, and one exception only, which is found in section 92, and that is to the effect that the solemnization of marriage belongs exclusively to the provinces. For this obvious reason, although some of my honourable colleagues did not see the importance of it, I find it tremendously important because it deals with the officer who performs the ceremony of marriage. This was done by the Fathers of Confederation so that when the marriage ceremony was performed by a minister of the Roman Catholic Church it would be at the same time a religious ceremony and a civil ceremony.

That is the reason why those powers have been conferred exclusively upon the provinces. It gives the ministers of every denomination the power to celebrate marriage and, as well, any other qualified officer. From the point of view of religious convictions it has satisfied the clergy, and at the same time the marriage performed by one in authority has the same spiritual and civil effects. I hope I have made myself clear.

You realize, honourable colleagues ,the importance of that judment of the Privy Council confirming the elaborate judgment of the Supreme Court. Well, what happened to it? It has been ignored completely. Nobody has paid any attention to that judgment. I had the occasion to complain about that in the Senate when I was dealing with those matters. What I cannot understand is why these big books that have been published by lawyers, and sell at very high prices, overlook that reference of the Government of Canada to the Supreme Court and the Privy Council.

I have two books here. It is useless to mention the names of the authors. The index of one of them mentions the Privy Council judgment without saying what it was. Therefore, the author knew what it was. He knew the importance of the judgment, but he did not dare print it in his book because he knew very well that one-half of his book would have been good only for the waste-paper basket.

The other one is published by a professor of the University of Toronto. It is entitled, The Civil Law System of the Province of Quebec; Notes, Cases and Materials. This author does not even mention this case. I have photographs of the index which show that deficiency.

On the occasion of a new edition of the first book I mentioned, McGill University awarded an honorary degree to its author. The second book has been praised in La Revue du Barreau Canadien by the Dean of the University of Montreal Law Faculty, Mr. Maximilien Caron. It was in the issue of October last year, at page 486. He gave much praise to the author, but did not mention the judgment of the Privy Council.

I understand that great distinction is made between civil law and common law, but for me in common law one does not overlook judgments rendered by the highest tribunal in authority. Afterwards I read in the papers these words:

> Maximilien Caron, dean of the University of Montreal Law Faculty, has been elected president of the newly-formed Association of Quebec Law Teachers. Composed of more than 40 professors from McGill, Laval, the U. of M., Sherbrooke and Ottawa, the group will attempt to assure the progress of law instruction.

They should start with themselves.

I have some additional copies of these photostats, and if some of my honourable colleagues wish to see them then they are at their disposal.

All the difficulty with regard to civil law in the Province of Quebec is due to the fact that professors of constitutional law have not shown the close relationship that exists between constitutional law—the Constitution, the British North America Act—and the civil law as we know it. They have not shown where the authority comes from. It is the most important thing. The law does not grow like a mushroom. It comes from authority. It comes from the Constitution. This is a very unfortunate matter, but it is never too late to do well. It is hoped that the professors who form that association will realize that charity begins at home.

The questions I asked in the Senate have been well answered, thanks to honourable Senator Aseltine, in the first place, and to honourable Senator Choquette and honourable Senator Ross Macdonald. They have been answered truthfully and with exactitude.

They were long questions referring to the jurisprudence that I have mentioned and which cannot be forgotten or overlooked. They referred also to precedence in the legislation—precedents that are laws on marriage, duly passed by the Parliament of Canada exercising its own jurisdiction. Those statutes are mentioned in the questions that were answered by honourable Senator Choquette on October 31, 1962. The point was this: If the provinces according to the judgment of the Supreme Court, and according to the action of the Parliament of Canada which took upon itself to amend the law concerning marriage, have no jurisdiction, the thing for them to do is to apply to the Parliament of Canada to have the changes that they find desirable made in the legislation, or to ask for a transfer of the exclusive jurisdiction of Ottawa to the provincial legislatures.

My first question was: Did any one ask the Government—and I mean the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister—for an amendment to the marriage law to suit the convenience of those concerned? The answer was: No. My second question was: Did any one ask the Parliament of Canada for a transfer, authorized by the Parliament of Westminster in an amendment to the Constitution, of the jurisdiction concerning marriage from the Parliament of Canada to the provincial legislatures? The answer was: No. Nobody had asked for it.

This is why I have been so much interested in submitting the matter to the Supreme Court in order to know once and for all what is the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada on the one hand, and of the provincial legislatures on the other hand, with respect to marriage. I am not a drum beater. I do not want to make any political propaganda out of this. All I want to do is to protect my fellow citizens in order that they are not foiled by fake legislation.

Since then I have introduced successively two bills concerning the matter. After those questions were put, I was very insistent, because no government wanted to say that no request had been made in that respect. All the attorneys general of Canada were duly informed, but the only one who showed a certain reaction was my friend the Honourable Fred Cass of Ontario. All the others put their heads in the sand and did not answer. The silence was perpetual.

Honourable senators, you will remember on many days in the spring of 1962 I came time and time again to insist upon the Government giving an answer. I got it, and I thank very warmly those three of my colleagues whom I have mentioned. I must say that everybody has been good to me, as you are now in listening to the exposé of this important matter.

Besides the jurisprudence which I have quoted, I have the authority of a man who was a member of the Supreme Court for 30 years and Chief Justice of Canada for 10 years, the late Right Honourable Chief Justice Thibaudeau Rinfret. He sent a very explicit memorandum to the Premier and Attorney General of the Province of Quebec in which he said that, according to his opinion, many articles brought by amendments to the Civil Code by the Quebec Legislature were invalid, were ultra vires. I pay a tribute to the memory of this great jurist in insisting upon submitting the whole matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not intend to read to you the memorandum which was sent by Chief Justice Rinfret to the Premier of Quebec. It is on the record in the Senate Hansard and in the reports of the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee.

Here I must thank honourable Senator Bouffard, who was chairman of that committee, and all the members of the committee who took the trouble to attend the sittings of the committee to make a quorum.

Bill S-32 was simple. The purpose of the bill was to give married women of Canada the same rights as unmarried women concerning the sale or alienation of immovable property. That proposition appeared to make so much sense that the National Federation of Liberal Women approved it unanimously at a congress which took place in Ottawa.

The motion today is to submit Bill S-16 to the Supreme Court of Canada. In order not to be accused of submitting doubtful legislation to you, the bill reproduces the text of the Northwest Territories Act which was in force in the statute book of the country from 1875, eight years after Confederation, until 1952, when it was taken off the statute book.

What is before you? It is not the bill. The bill has not been adopted. Even if you adopt this motion today, the bill will not be adopted. The bill would not have the force of law. It will be submitted with the motion to the Supreme Court of Canada, if the Government is willing to submit it to that tribunal for a decision, to decide who has authority in the matter of marriage. If the answer of the Supreme Court is unfavourable, the matter will end there. If the reply is favourable, you will have an opportunity to amend the bill and even take the time—perhaps a year or two or three years—to write a bill which will cover the whole ground and which would be constitutional and which could not be attacked by anyone in law. That is the point. An explanation has been given with the bill and it is quite lengthy—it covers a page and a half—but the whole material is here with all the precedents that I have mentioned to you.

I wish also to thank my honourable colleague Senator Gouin for his kind reference to me, and I must tell him that when I was a young lawyer of 26 I wrote my first book, which was a municipal code, in both languages, and that his illustrious father, Sir Jean Lomer Gouin, was kind enough to accept the dedication, by special permission. It was a long time ago. It was my first experience in that domain, and I am still very thankful to Senator Gouin's father for his kindness to me and to his young compatriots in general.

Honourable senators, you may ask me what the bar thinks of this in the Province of Quebec. I am ready to answer you. If I had some trouble with one of the batonniers, who was a former president of the Liberal Federation of the Province of Quebec, I have the greatest respect for Mr. John O'Brien, his successor, and for Mr. Leon Lalande, who is the present Batonnier of the Bar of the Province of Quebec. They had all the information concerning the validity of the legislation pertaining to marriage. Mr. O'Brien wrote to me on October 10, 1963, as follows:

> I thank you for your two letters of yesterday's date.
> In order that the subject matter of your Bill should receive the attention it requires, I am referring it and the other material you have sent to me to the Legislation Committee of the General Council of the Bar, of which Mr. Roger Thibaudeau, Q.C., of Quebec City, is the Chairman.
> In the event that you should have any other material or information which you feel should be considered by the Committee, I would be obliged to you if you would communicate it directly to Mr. Thibaudeau.
> Yours very truly,
> John O'Brien.

I shall not speak of the meeting of the bar which took place at the Skyline Hotel in Montreal on February 15 and 16, 1963, and which I attended. That would be perhaps for the bill, if the bill comes again, but I do not think that you would have the time to listen to all those facts today.

Besides the Bar of the Province of Quebec there is another association called the Rural Bar Association, which includes all the lawyers from outside the cities of Montreal and Quebec. In October 1963 they met at Chicoutimi. Mr. Louis Dugal, of Rivière du Loup, President of the Rural Bar Association, wrote me the following letter, which I will translate, because I think it will be easier for you.

> My dear Senator,
> I have well received at Chicoutimi, at the convention of the Rural Bar Association, your letters of October 9 and documents which you sent me, and I thank you.
> As soon as I received them, I immediately submitted the whole file to our committee of civil rights, which was sitting under the presidency of (Mr. so-and-so), asking him to make a study and to send you the conclusions of the committee, which he would do without doubt.
> You may believe me, dear Senator, that we regretted that you could not come—etcetera. That is signed "Louis Dugal."

The report never came, because the gentleman who was the chairman of the civil law committee was elevated to the bench, and the matter ended there. I will refrain from telling you more facts about the congress in Chicoutimi.

I received no report from the Rural Bar Association, but I received one from the secretary-treasurer of the Bar of the Province of Quebec. I do not want to read it, but perhaps I may be given leave to table it, and then it will be printed in Hansard. It is a letter signed by Mr. Robert Leveque, secretary-treasurer of the Quebec Bar Association, dated January 27. My answer of February 5 was a little spicy, but if you will allow me to put it on record for your information, you will have it translated in the Hansard of tomorrow.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien): Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you. To show you my appreciation, Mr. Speaker, I will send you a copy of this letter, and I will send a copy to the two leaders, who read the French language.

The Bar of the Province of Quebec
Office of the Secretary-Treasurer
170 Dorchester Blvd. West
Montreal 18

January 27, 1964.

Hon. Jean François Pouliot, Q.C.,
Member of the Senate,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa.

Dear Colleague:

At its meeting of January 25, 1964, the General council examined the report of Committee on the supervision of legislation, an item of which dealt with Bill S-32.

A resolution passed by the Rural Bar Association at its convention held on October 12, 1963, in Chicoutimi, bitterly criticized the federal Parliament for "legislating on matters coming under the civil code... property and civil rights in general". The Association asked Parliament to withdraw Bill S-32.

In accordance with a provision of the Bar regulations, the resolution was submitted to the General council. Both the Committee on legislation and the General council unanimously felt that it would not be appropriate to intervene at this stage of parliamentary procedure because the legislation in question is not a federal parliament bill but a private bill sponsored by a member of the Senate. In the circumstances, it is impossible to ask the federal Parliament to withdraw the bill. However, the General council reserves the right to reconsider the matter if the legislation goes through all the necessary stages and is sent to the House of Commons.

Please accept, dear colleague, my best regards.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) Robert Lévêque,
Secretary Treasurer.

The Senate
Ottawa, Canada

February 5, 1964.

Mr. Robert Lévêque, Q.C.,
Secretary Treasurer,
Bar of the Province of Quebec,
170 Dorchester Blvd. East,
Montreal 18, Que.

My dear Colleague,

In your letter of January 27, you informed me that the Rural Bar Association of the province of Quebec, at its convention held in Chicoutimi last October, had passed a resolution

> "to take the federal parliament strongly to task for legislating on the provisions of the civil code... and on property and civil rights in general."

You added that this Association had asked parliament to withdraw Bill No. S-32, the purpose of which was to grant to all married women the same rights as single women to sell and alienate immovable property.

This bill was introduced in the Senate last session, under the terms and in accordance with section 91, page 26, of the constitution of Canada (British North America Act, 1867), the complete text of which, as you are undoubtedly aware, was published under the title "Constitutional Documents of the province of Quebec", at the beginning of the first volume of the Revised Statutes of the Province of Quebec, 1941 (see R.S.P.Q., 1941, I, pp. XXVII and XXVIII).

The same text was reproduced in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952 (vol. VI, pages 6571 and 6572 of the French version) and in many other books.

This section provides that the Canadian parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over marriage and divorce (sections 115 to 217 of the civil code), except, however, the eight sections concerning "procedures regarding the celebration of marriage" (sections 128 to 135 of the civil code). As a matter of fact, under section 92 of the British North America Act, p. 12, provincial legislatures also have an exclusive but very limited jurisdiction in that respect, since it is limited to the celebration of marriage.

If ignorance of the law is no excuse, our colleagues of the Rural Bar Association, which held its last convention in Chicoutimi, could perhaps invoke extenuating circumstances. We will first mention the unforgivable flaws in teaching constitutional law and civil law in universities, then the environment influence, the seat of the convention held in the Saguenay region, part of the country of Maria Chapdelaine, where "nothing should die or change", and, finally, the presence, at the convention of the attorney general himself, surrounded by his petrified and dazed substitutes who rushed from every rural district to practice autosuggestion and try to convince themselves that we are still under the two

Canada systems and that the Canadian Confederation, which is 96 years old, has never existed.

Would not all that lead us to believe that high school students and those from the School of Higher Studies are better informed in constitutional and civil law than the members of the Rural Bar Association of the province of Quebec?

Is it not surprising that the faintheartedness or the aberration of such a large group of our colleagues has not immediately given rise within the Bar's General council to the reaction that the ordinary man of the province of Quebec had the right to expect.

What is much more serious is that since the coming into force of confederation, almost a hundred years ago, the Quebec legislature erred by disregarding completely the exclusive legislative jurisdiction conferred by the constitution to the federal Parliament on the one hand and to the provincial legislatures on the other.

Consequently, as stated by a former chief justice of Canada, all the amendments, except one, to the civil code with regard to marriage and divorce adopted by the Quebec legislature contrary to the very definite provisions of the British North America Act, would be completely null and void and everything done under the terms of those unconstitutional and illegal amendments would be null and void. Such legal anarchy is without precedent in world history. Such chaos does not exist anywhere else in the world.

Our most distinguished colleagues fear that the people of Quebec will be aroused and will lose all respect for the Bar and the courts if the authorities concerned do not step in immediately to remedy an illegal situation which has been going on for too long and to correct past mistakes as much as possible.

Indifference would be inexcusable under the circumstances. Is it not the duty of the General council composed of the Batonnier general, the Attorney General ex officio, the Batonniers and delegates of all districts and yourself, Mr. Secretary Treasurer, to be true to its most noble traditions and to make the necessary representations to none other than the Attorney General of the province so that as soon as possible, he may intervene with the Parliament at Westminster through the federal government, to have such an abnormal and deplorable situation remedied?

Every man has the undeniable right to live in peace under the law and it is to be hoped that the General council of the Bar of the province of Quebec will be equal to the task, no matter how difficult and painful it may seem at first sight, because everyone concerned will find his reward in the satisfaction of having done his duty.

As for the second part of your letter, I note that the General council feels that, at this stage of parliamentary procedure, it would be inappropriate to speak out against Bill S-32 but that it reserves the right to reconsider the matter.

In answer to the assertions of the General council which you summed up in this phrase: "This is not a federal parliament bill but a private bill introduced by a member of the Senate", may I point out to you:

1. that an amending bill to a general legislation like the federal Act on Marriage and Divorce, is unquestionably a public bill;

2. that, except for anything implying an expense of public monies, the senators and members of the House of Commons have the same right as the ministers to submit a public bill (See rules of the Senate, page 24, article 61);*

3. that, once passed by both houses and having received royal assent, the private bills, like all public bills, are bills of the federal parliament.

In view of your having kindly advised me that the General council had reserved the right to reconsider the matter, I take the liberty of sending you, herewith, four marked copies of the Senate rules, one of which is for you.

I am asking you to have the three other copies forwarded to the Batonnier general, another one to the Attorney General and the last one to the Bar library in Montreal, for the use of all our fellow lawyers.

Believe me, etc.

Jean-François Pouliot

* Subject to the important exception of financial measures, almost any public bill may be introduced in either house. (Parliament, Its History, Constitution and Practice 1295-1929, by Sir Courtenay Ilbert, G.C.B., K.C.S.I., late Clerk of the House of Commons.)

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: When the term of office of Batonnier John O'Brien ended, he made a few remarks in which he appealed to university faculties to teach students respect for the law. This article covers a column and a half, and there is the answer of the 40 professors of civil law.

I wonder if I could have leave to table that article, to be included in my speech? You will then be able to read it in Hansard tomorrow, and you will have it sooner than the correspondence with the Bar, because it is in English. This is a clipping from The Gazette of Montreal, and also the answer of the professors, which is from Le Devoir, dated May 11, 1964. Then you will have both sides.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Agreed.

(The two newspaper items follow)

'Teach students respect for law'—Bar

Quebec's university faculties were urged over the weekend to make clear to their students that proper respect for the law and the use of its "natural processes" are the only effective means of accomplishing reforms.

The speaker was Batonnier John L. O'Brien, QC giving a report on his stewardship as head of the Montreal Bar, at the annual meeting which unanimously elected Leon Lalande, QC, as his successor.

Referring to observations he had made in the course of visits to the universities in the last year, Batonnier O'Brien said that a "general feeling of unease" he detected "led to the belief that, in many cases, a feeling of disrespect for the law, if not stemming directly from the teaching staff, certainly has not been combatted by some of them."

Reform Not Always End Result

"Disrespect of the law does not necessarily lead to reform, but almost necessarily to revolution," he said. "As we have seen in many parts of the world, the result of revolution is more frequently chaos or dictatorship than reform."

He qualified his remarks by acknowledging that "it is the privilege of the young to be radical," and he doubted that "any one of us would ask that the young people of this or any other day should be conservative in their views."

But he held it to be the duty "of those in responsibility in our great teaching institutions to make clear to those in their charge that reforms in the law must be accomplished through the natural processes of the law.

"It is my firm belief," he said, "that those responsible for the teaching of our younger generations must both realize and assert their responsibilities."

Views of Students are Given

Batonnier O'Brien had told the large and enthusiastic meeting that in his associations with students in the various law faculties in recent months he had been struck with "an apparently widespread view that both the provisions of the Bar Act and the application of the Bar rules are unfair."

Being curious as to the reasons for this situation, he had investigated the background and he had become "convinced that in many instances the attitude of the students stemmed from comments of some of their teachers."

"If the law teacher did not like the course he was called upon to give under the provisions of the Bar Act," the Batonnier said, "he did not hesitate to express his views in this respect to the students, perhaps unaware of the effects of his remarks on them."

The following were elected to office in voting which took place after the meeting: Emile Poissant, QC, first councillor; Guy Gilbert, secretary; and Peter Laing, QC, Paul Casgrain, QC, Henri Suprenant QC, and L. P. Guay, QC, councillors.

T. P. Slattery, QC, was unanimously elected treasurer and Melvin Rothman was named Junior Bar representative on the council. Maurice Fauteux, QC, remains as Syndic, and councillors whose terms did not expire this year are Samuel Godinsky QC, Austin W. Johnson, QC, and Francois Mercier, QC.

The New Court House committee, headed by Batonnier Jean Martineau, QC, and A. J. Campbell, QC, reported that work will begin next month on the excavation and foundations of the long-awaited edifice.

"If all goes according to plan," said the report, "the building will be in full occupancy by the spring of 1967. A part of the structure will be completed by the autumn of 1966 and will be ready for occupancy at that time."

A report on the Bar's Legal Aid services indicated that the volume of assistance given to needy applicants has been growing out of proportion to facilities available.

The committee, headed by Batonnier Bernard Bourdon, QC, reported that 3,169 new cases were opened by the bureau in the last year and the demand is steadily increasing.

"At present," the report pointed out, "our two colleagues (Jean T. Loranger, QC, and Paul Fontaine, QC) are obliged to put applicants off for a month, with the exception of those who are in immediate need, such as those whose salaries or furniture has been seized.

"The appointment book is full until the end of May, with 20 interviews a day, not counting those people who come into the office from day to day on urgent matters."

A grant of $12,000 for the work of the bureau was obtained during the year by Batonnier O'Brien from the Attorney-General. An equal amount is obtained annually from the city which sends social welfare clients to the bureau.

"This work is also achieved with the devotion of volunteer lawyers," the report recalled, "who accept cases sent to them and whose names are inscribed on the honour-roll that the Batonnier's list comprises. There are 503 of them."

Batonnier O'Brien, in his report, paid special tribute to the Legal Aid committee and pointed out that the budget for the coming year is $60,000. He said he had requested a $35,000 grant from the Attorney-General, who had promised that "a complete study of the question would be made in the near future."

Following the remarks of Batonnier O'Brien,

THE LAW PROFESSORS STATE: WE FIGHT AGAINST DISRESPECT FOR THE LAW

A few days ago, the Batonnier of the Montreal Bar, John K. O'Brien, claimed that in various law faculties, professors promote "disrespect" for the law. The Teachers' Association has issued the following release in reply to the charge.

The Quebec Law Teachers' Association has read in the press the remarks made by Batonnier John L. O'Brien, Q.C., at the annual convention of the Montreal Bar held in that city last Friday, May 1.

The Quebec Law Teachers' Association is surprised to hear that certain remarks reported by the press have led people to think that some professors do not oppose "disrespect" for the law among their students, thus becoming indirect accomplices of those who show "disrespect" for the law.

The Quebec Law Teachers' Association wishes to point out firmly and very clearly that it has never been brought to its attention nor can it believe that any of its members use their position in law schools to encourage, directly or indirectly, by their actions or their silence, their students to flout the law.

The Quebec Law Teachers' Association regrets that certain remarks reported by the press have left in the public mind some doubt—no matter how slight—about the intellectual honesty and the moral integrity of its members.

Finally, the Quebec Law Teachers' Association wishes to point out that its members feel absolutely free to make constructive criticism concerning any piece of legislation, including the act concerning the Bar of the province of Quebec and its regulations, because there could be no true progress of legal science without a constantly renewed critical appreciation of its constituting elements.

(Text):

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Now I have some very nice things to tell you; but I will not tell them to you because I do not want to abuse your kindness. You are all kind and helpful, to me today, and I will try to be as short and concise as possible.

It was with infinite regret that I found after the committee sitting was over—because the memorandum was tabled in committee but not read—that the Deputy Minister of Justice had dared to say that Bill S-32 of last year was a private bill because it was sponsored by one who was not a member of the Government. I found it to be really dangerous that an outstanding civil servant—I mean one occupying such a high position—distorts the law in such a manner. However, you know about it. I will not insist about it. I have said enough, and I know very well that very few of you will approve of that.

Honourable senators, how can the transfer be made of the jurisdiction concerning marriage from the Parliament of Canada to the provinces? In the same manner that we have proceeded with regard to the Canada Pension Plan. It was to vote an address to Her Majesty asking for an amendment to the B.N.A. Act to remove the federal jurisdiction concerning marriage and to give it to all the provinces of Canada.

To conclude by something which is really comforting, in cases of doubt, there is one gentleman that you may call on and ask for his opinion. It is no less than the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the Senate, Mr. E. R. Hopkins. He is a learned man and he knows his business. He is an officer of the Senate and is here to inform the Senate about the best way to deal with the legislation we have here. He is paid for that, it is his task and he does it well.

What is the conclusion of his evidence before the committee? You have it in the report of the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee of December 12, 1963, on Bill S-32, and the same would apply to Bill S-16 of this session. Mr. Hopkins said:

> My conclusion therefore is that, since the present bill does not deal in any way with the validity of a marriage contract, there exists a real doubt as to its constitutionality—a doubt which could be finally resolved only by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I will conclude with another reference that you will appreciate, because it does not come from me. Chief Justice McRuer did not wait until next year to get his superannuation. He resigned as a judge to take full charge of two important commissions under the authority of the present Attorney General of the Province of Ontario. Here is the news item as it was published in the Ottawa Journal of July 9, 1964:

McRuer Heads New Probe

> Toronto (CP)—Attorney-General Arthur Wishart announced today that former Ontario chief justice James Chalmer McRuer will head Ontario's law reform commission.
> Dean Allan Leal of the Osgoode Hall law school and another legal expert, as yet unnamed, will serve with Mr. McRuer, Mr. Wishart said.
> "Among other things, I expect it (the commission) to study laws on divorce, desertion, bail and abortion. It's a tremendously important commission," he said in a statement.
> He said the commission would not be confined to laws under provincial jurisdiction. "I think it is our duty to recommend reform we think necessary in federal law as well," he said.
> The attorney-general added that laws regarding hate literature could fall under this category.
> Mr. McRuer, who retired as Chief Justice July 1, will chair the law reform commission while conducting the government's royal commission on civil liberties.

Now, you know very well that Chief Justice McRuer at the opening of the courts last year said that in law legal research was of the utmost importance, that it had been neglected and that we would have to reintroduce it to have sound legislation. That is all I want. I want sound legislation, under the direction and ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada.

I thank you very warmly.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Pouliot, seconded by the honourable Senator Stambaugh:

> That in the opinion of this House, the Government should immediately refer to the Supreme Court of Canada, for the opinion of that Court, the question of the constitutional validity of Bill S-16, intituled: "An Act to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act".

Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Carried.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would not say that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The motion is lost.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I suggest you put the motion to the Senate again, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Do you wish to call for a recorded vote?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I think we should have a vote.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Please call in the members.

STATUTES OF QUEBEC

PUBLICATION IN OFFICIAL GAZETTE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, following the conversation I had this morning with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, I take this opportunity of handing to the honourable Leader of the Government this supplement of the Official Gazette of the Province of Quebec in which all of the public bills, except supply bills, are published shortly after the conclusion of the session of the Legislature. In Parliament we have to wait a longer time for the bound edition of the statutes, which contains all the legislation passed during the session.

I hope that as soon as possible after the long adjournment the example of the Province of Quebec in this matter will be followed by the federal Government. I will be very grateful to the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate if he will get in touch personally with the Prime Minister about this, and show him this supplement which, as I have said, contains all the public legislation adopted during the session of the Legislature.

PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

GUEST IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I am sure all honourable senators would wish me to draw to their attention that there is present in the Speaker's Gallery today the Premier of the Province of British Columbia. We are all very glad to see the Premier here. I hope that many other prominent Canadians will follow his example in showing an interest in the proceedings of the Senate.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, if I might also add a word, I would say how pleased I am to see the Premier of British Columbia in our gallery. I had the honour of knowing the Premier when he was a student in New Brunswick, years ago. He attended the school and I was the teacher.

HARBOURS AND PILOTAGE ACTS

BILL TO REPEAL—THIRD READING

Hon. Eric Cook moved the third reading of Bill S-40, to repeal certain acts of the Province of Newfoundland respecting harbours and pilotage.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

OTTAWA TERMINAL RAILWAY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. A. K. Huggessen, for Hon. Mr. Lambert, moved the third reading of Bill S-33, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DISSOLUTION AND ANNULMENT OF MARRIAGES ACT

ORDER FOR SECOND READING STANDS

On the Order.

Second reading of Bill S-29, intituled: "An Act to repeal the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act".—(Honourable Senator Pouliot).

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have very comforting news for you. Yesterday I met a member of the opposition groups in the other house, and he told me, rather seriously, that according to him the session would end by the first days of September, in time for the hunting season. Therefore, I ask my honourable colleagues that this bill stand until August 18.

Order stands.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER FOR SECOND READING STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill S-16, intituled: "An Act to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act". — (Honourable Senator Pouliot).

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, at the outset I must inform you that I do not intend to proceed with the second reading of Bill S-16.

Before withdrawing the bill, I hope you will permit me to convey a message to you. I have received a few telephone calls from persons who did not congratulate me, but who told me that they wanted to congratulate the Senate for the good work that was done yesterday, in spite of the fact that the press was rather indifferent, and sometimes hostile, towards the motion passed yesterday to refer this bill to the Supreme Court of Canada.

We had no assistance from the Quebec Bar, and no assistance from the Chamber of Notaries; yet in spite of all that, the Senate has defended the rights of the people, and I convey their congratulations to all of you.

In the second place, I desire to thank the officials of the Library most warmly—Mr. Spicer, the chief librarian, Mr. Sylvestre, his right-hand man, and all the personnel, for the assistance they have given to me in my legal research. I cannot praise them too highly. Whenever you go to the Library, and to one of the two floors underground, you will see the wealth of information that is there, and you will use it with great profit.

The third point is that I keep in my sleeve for future occasions some very fine articles. One of them would be worth a lot of money. It was published in the supplement of La Presse, when it was being published. It concerned Mr. Louis Philippe Pigeon, not the member for Joliette, but a lawyer who had been the oracle of the late Mr. Godbout when he was Premier of Quebec, as well as for some of his successors. I will not read the article. I told you that I would keep it in my sleeve for a future occasion. However, I have a good story to tell you—and it is history. At one time Sir Wilfred Laurier had a houseman by the name of Pigeon, and he asked Mr. De Celles to take him to the library. One day Sir Wilfrid went there and saw the librarian, Mr. De Celles, and asked him, "How is it with my Pigeon?" Mr. De Celles replied, "Well, Sir Wilfrid, your pigeon is all right, but he is not an eagle."

I have another article about The Friends of the New Spirit; there is also a caricature which is rather awful, but it is a good likeness, and I keep it in my sleeve, too. It is about one of the learned jurists of the Province of Quebec, who was called "the crumbling one"—le croulant.

By the way, yesterday I spoke of "the society of mutual admiration." I have an example in my hand: it is a book as thick as a dictionary. It is a tribute to a professor of constitutional law, and is dedicated to him in the fashion of the epitaphs we find in the Roman cemeteries from the time of Cicero. Many professors of law of the University of Montreal have written theses or articles as a tribute to that gentleman who never taught his students the close relationship that exists between constitutional and civil law. This is a big book and is quite weighty; I did not buy it, it belongs to the Library. Now that I have shown it to you, I will return it to the Library.

Honourable senators I have in my hand a very serious article written by Jean-Marie Tremblay. It is entitled, "The Law: a Scratch or a Major Wound"? It is a column and a half long; I will not read it, but I wonder if you would like to have it on Hansard, the same as was done in the case of some publications yesterday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

(The article follows)

(Translation):

Law: a Scratch or a Major Wound?

By Jean-Marie Tremblay

There have long been two kinds of faculties at Laval university: those known as "serene" faculties and those known as "uneasy" faculties. In other words, there are some where "everything is going fine" and some others "where everything is going badly."

Now, according to certain sources, the faculty of law deserves to be included among the "uneasy" ones or at least the "sick" ones. In any event, there is a good deal of talk about this faculty nowadays. So much so that there are strong rumours going around about major changes coming up there, perhaps before the next academic year. Naturally, it is not easy to elicit any comments from the professors who make up its teaching staff. But, on the whole, one can reach the conclusion that everything is not running smoothly at the faculty of law of Laval university.

As for the heads of the university, they have shown a remarkable discretion in this uproar. This did not prevent a Laval spokesman, breaking the silence, to confide substantially to this writer, that things were not going too well in the law faculty. He suggested that some changes, even involving the dean, might be made within a few months. It was impossible to learn anything more nor to obtain more details from that person, who nevertheless confirmed an actual uneasiness.

Then, some professors reluctantly admitted, while wishing to remain anonymous, that without new developments in the near future which would be more than desirable, the faculty of law threatens to become the most backward of all Laval faculties. But, in fact, what is the basis of the criticism? And is such criticism fully justified? That is the big question!

The whole thing started when it was disclosed that 15 out of 24 Laval candidates at the last Bar examinations (that is 62.5 per cent) had failed miserably. The average failure rate is 45 per cent at the most in the province. The results were hardly any better with regard to notaries. But it was overlooked that in previous years law students from Laval university had always done very well; the previous year no fewer than 88 per cent of the candidates had passed successfully. Results had been more or less the same for the other three or four years.

It is rather strange that the professors questioned seemed divided about the real need for a change in the Law faculty whose dean is Mr. Guy Hudon, Q.C., who came back from a trip to Europe at the beginning of the week. Some professors' silence is dictated by numerous considerations quite foreign to the teaching of law. But, in general, most people agree that the faculty is following a questionable policy. It is said that its teaching bears the hallmark of an outdated traditionalism, which is the primary reason for this year's failures.

"Things are not running smoothly, but that does not necessarily mean that everybody is right", hurriedly added a responsible member of the Laval University staff. That shows that Dean Guy Hudon has reliable defenders among both the teachers and the authorities. It also means that a struggle seems to be in the making and that it might erupt during the next academic year.

Strangely enough, the professors who were interviewed did not agree on the advisability of a change in the law faculty. On the other hand, however, it seems difficult for them, under the circumstances, to be as impartial as the fourth-year student who told us: "One of the main difficulties is certainly the fact that too few members of the faculty are full-time teachers. The faculty of law has only six full-time teachers, four of whom are over sixty. It follows that practically all the lectures are given by practising lawyers who must look after their own offices."

This means also that these part-time professors do not have time to prepare their courses because of urgent business. It cannot be denied that between a lecture which gives them about $10.00 and the case of an important client which may bring them hundreds of dollars, it is easy to make a choice—at the expense of the students who go to the faculty to be told at 5.20 or 5.30 that the lawyer will not give his lecture—

"It would be rather difficult," he added "to ask students to take an interest in their legal studies, when they are deprived of one lecture out of four. Moreover, law students write exams only twice a year—at the end of January—when they also have oral tests, and at the end of the year, in May. Can you imagine? Students beginning their studies in September and being four months without a test. The result is always cramming at the last moment since they have studied numerous subjects in four months —besides, the February exams are practically not taken into account for the academic results—about 35 per cent of the marks—with the result that a year of study is at stake at the year-end exams—and that following a headache, for instance, it can be a failure, despite the work done during the year, which is then practically useless—."

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: The last thing I want to do is to refer you to page 317 of Hansard of April 28 last, to the facts mentioned there with regard to the memorandum which was signed by the Deputy Minister of Justice and addressed to one of his subordinates who was to attend the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee. He made a statement that was contrary to the law, and forbade him to appear before the committee. I ask you, honourable colleagues, if you think he is fit to appear before the Supreme Court of Canada to argue the motion concerning the jurisdiction over marriage when he did not know that the members of Parliament, the members of both houses, have the unquestionable right to introduce public as well as private legislation. I leave it to you; I bring it to the attention of the Leader of the Government; and I will not insist further.

I thank you personally and on behalf of the married women not only of the Province of Quebec but of Canada at large. I congratulate you for what you have done, and I am sure it will produce a good result. When we are united there is nothing the Senate cannot accomplish. We had an example of that yesterday. I hope it will produce good results. Thank you very much.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable senator withdrawing his bill?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I ask leave of the Senate to withdraw that bill because it will accompany the motion to the Supreme Court, if it ever goes there.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable senator leave to withdraw Bill S-16?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No. Honourable senators, I do not think we should let the honourable senator take this risk, since the Senate yesterday moved that the Government should refer this bill to the Supreme Court. I will give my leave only when the Government has made up its mind.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Then I adjourn the debate, and I shall produce the treasures I have up my sleeve in due course. I am ready to withdraw my bill. If you object, I will let it stand until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think it should stand until the Government has made up its mind.

Some Hon. Senators: Stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, we have come to the end of today's Order Paper. As all honourable senators know, we had expected to have received from the other place by now the bill with respect to student loans and, possibly, the bill respecting federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: The optimists thought that.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There are some of us who are optimists. I think we can include you in that number because of your presence here this week.

While no one can say at this stage what might happen, I think we should remember the difficulties we had at Easter when we adjourned from day to day with no legislation before us. I would suggest that in the event, however unlikely, that one of these measures will reach us before six o'clock, it might be the part of wisdom to adjourn until six o'clock, and to assess the situation then.

There is a further possibility I should like honourable senators to consider. If the bill should not be available this afternoon, since the other place does not sit this evening it might be desirable to adjourn, not until tomorrow but until Friday at three o'clock.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Monday.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Everybody has a different idea. I know honourable senators have made plans that I occasionally interfere with, and on this point I am sorry. Nevertheless, I think we must keep one foot on the ladder.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Let us wait until six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I hope that by six o'clock we may have a bill before us, and if so the decision will be made at that time as to whether we should begin to discuss it then and continue tomorrow. If the bill is not available at six o'clock, I should like honourable senators to have some ideas as to whether the adjournment should be until tomorrow or Friday.

I would draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that on Friday the other place will deal with estimates only, so that after tomorrow night we may expect no further legislation this week.

May I also draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce is scheduled to meet immediately after the Senate rises this afternoon; and it will meet again tomorrow to deal with a different matter than the one now before it. The Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee will also meet tomorrow morning, at eleven o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: May I ask when the reports of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce are likely to be dealt with, assuming the committee reports are available this afternoon or this evening?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I cannot give any assurance as to what will happen in the event of those reports being available. However, the practice of the Senate is to deal with reports promptly upon being presented.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, the remarks of the honourable Leader of the Government indicate the difficulty there is in arranging the business of this chamber. We appreciate the difficulties which he has encountered, and we realize that it is not easy to arrange business when there is no business to arrange. On the other hand, when there is business available, it is easy to make appropriate arrangements.

I have no wish to criticize the honourable Leader of the Government but I do feel that there is ground for criticism so far as the business arrangements in the other house are concerned. The bill which is being held up at the present time—or perhaps I should say which is being debated at the present time—could have been dealt with weeks ago. We have been in session since February 18, and surely the Government knows what legislation should have priority.

We have had before us Bill C-108, which had to do with payment of youth allowances to young men and women who continue to attend school up to the age of eighteen. That was considered a priority bill, because at the present time students have summer holidays, and arrangements have to be made before school opens again in the fall. Now there is another bill which depends also on the date for the reopening of college.

I repeat, honourable senators, while there is no criticism to be offered against the Leader of the Government in this chamber who, I am sure, presses these matters in cabinet, nevertheless there is criticism to be offered, and I do not hesitate to offer it, where the arrangement of business in the other place is concerned. First things should come first.

We all know that one of the main duties of Parliament is to vote supply to Her Majesty. Consideration of estimates should be one of the first items of business. We have now an interim supply bill coming up, as we had last month. This situation goes on from month to month, and is a matter which makes for further delay. I point these things out to indicate that there is no blame to be attached to this chamber for the irregularity of our sittings, if I may use that phrase, and the irregularity of our transaction of business. But I do say there is criticism to be offered, and that it should be offered, where the arrangement of business in the other place is so unsatisfactory.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, it is rarely I disagree with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks), but he made one observation to which I must take exception. He said surely the Government conducting the business in the other place should know about priorities and the arrangement of priorities. Honourable senators, if I can believe what I read in the press the fact is that there was a priority list of business laid down to the house by the Prime Minister on May 15. Then, there was a completely different priority list laid down on June 3, and the last priority list was laid down on June 30. Let us not sit here and say that the Government knows nothing about priorities.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I do not wish to engage in a debate about this matter. But I would say, and I think with reason, that many of the measures in the original list mentioned by honourable Senator McCutcheon, and which was placed upon the Order Paper of the other place by the Prime Minister, have been adopted by Parliament. However, I think the minimum has now been settled upon, and we can expect here soon the bill respecting student loans, the bill respecting federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, and an interim supply bill. I think these are the legislative measures that we can expect to receive. At least, the plan of the other place is to deal with these items before coming to the flag debate. I hope that we shall get them fairly soon.

Further, I should like to point out that a Government may decide priorities, but it is not always the Government who decides whether or not these priorities shall be adhered to. There is another side to the House of Commons, as there is to this house, and I think that fact should be kept in mind in this house.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 6 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, the bill to provide student loans that we had been expecting by 6 o'clock—perhaps with not too much assurance—is almost certainly not to be available today. This bill carries with it the same degree of urgency as the bill to provide for youth allowances, because of the approaching opening of colleges and schools.

I am informed that the last amendment that is known has been moved and is about to be voted upon, but the other place will not pass the bill tonight even if it sits a little overtime. On the best information I have the bill should pass the other place tomorrow, and because of the urgency attending it I would suggest to honourable senators that we adjourn until 3 o'clock on Friday afternoon. I do not suggest that we adjourn until 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon because it is very doubtful that the legislation would be here in time to be considered. The House of Commons has a long day tomorrow, from two in the afternoon until 10 or 10.30 o'clock at night, and I do not like to suggest that the Senate sit tomorrow on the off chance that it would receive that bill within the hour.

I realize this is a source of inconvenience to the Senate, but the best judgment I can exercise in the situation is that the Senate should adjourn tonight until 3 o'clock Friday afternoon. I would hope that the measure would then be before us, and it could be studied on Friday afternoon, and Friday evening if it is so desired.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien (Bedford): What about next week?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The bill will not pass third reading tomorrow. I should point out that if we do not get it until Friday, we must have time in which to debate it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is a risk of our not receiving the bill by Friday, but if it passes second reading and the committee stage tomorrow, then I think it would receive third reading early on Friday and be sent to us.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Can the honourable Leader of the Government say when he anticipates having royal assent?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No. I had not planned that far ahead. There is the possibility that we will shortly receive the bill with respect to fiscal arrangements. I am told that it may not require much more time in the other place. It has already been debated to some extent. It may be that we can debate both these measures on Friday, though we may not conclude them. That will depend a great deal on the disposition of the Senate. Again, I am frank to say, we may have nothing on our Order Paper for Friday.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Honourable senators, speaking only for myself—the honourable Leader of the Opposition will speak for this side of the house—I say that we should adjourn until Monday, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon or 8 o'clock in the evening. No time will be lost in dealing with legislation if we do that. I do not think we should go through this procedure of appearing and disappearing. The Leader of the Government says he has no thought as to when royal assent might be given. It is obvious from his answer that royal assent is not going to be given on Friday night, and I suspect it is not going to be given on Monday night. Therefore, I suggest we adjourn until Monday.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not wish to quarrel with the honourable gentleman. My view is that if the Senate were so disposed, and the bills were passed by Monday night, I would see no obstacle to having royal assent on Monday night.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: The honourable senator knows, of course, that there is another important bill coming, that is, the bill called interim supply.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am not suggesting that we have to delay royal assent until the interim supply bill has been completed.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: We all recognize, I am sure, the difficulties of the honourable Leader of the Government in deciding these matters; it is not an easy problem. From past experience, I am quite certain that when we have royal assent it will be for the three bills, and it will probably come on Wednesday or Thursday. In that event—and I will concur in anything that the honourable Leader of the Government decides on—my humble opinion is that it might be well to do as Senator McCutcheon has suggested, adjourn until Monday night at 8 o'clock. Then we could clean up these three bills which we have the prospect of getting from the House of Commons next week, and have royal assent later in the week. That would seem to be a likely course of events.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Perhaps Senator Grosart would express an opinion.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: My name has been mentioned, as, if I may use the term, obiter dicta. It is true that I did call the attention of the Senate to some criticism that had been made on the delay of nine days in the consideration of the youth allowances bill. It has been assumed by some that this was not a wise comment to make.

I would like to clarify it at this point and entirely support what has been said by the leader on this side and by Senator McCutcheon, that I think it would be quite proper in these circumstances for the Senate to adjourn until Monday. In my earlier comments about adjournments, I did mention the time of two or three days. I think there can be no objection at any time to a delay of two or three days in the Senate considering legislation that has been passed in the other place. In fact, it has been drawn to my attention that this would perhaps add to the broad concept of "sober second thought". My objection on the earlier occasion was to a delay of nine days on what was regarded for various reasons as urgent legislation. That legislation was introduced on July 2 in the other place and passed very expeditiously by agreement between all parties on July 7. I do not think that applies to this particular situation, and I therefore completely support the suggestions that have been made on this side that it would be proper for the Senate to adjourn until Monday.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee reminds me that there is an important meeting of that committee called for tomorrow morning. Would honourable senators prefer to adjourn until tomorrow afternoon? I do not think there is any prospect of this bill reaching us tomorrow, but there may be reports coming out of committee. Or, would the suggestion that we adjourn until Monday at three o'clock carry with the majority of senators?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I think that if there is going to be any criticism at all, it will be that we neglected committee work that has been laid on. The bill under consideration has been hanging fire for a couple of months now.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not "hanging fire"—we have been hearing evidence.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I think it is time we got that important bill out of the way, and at that time we can assess the situation and adjourn until Monday. We will all be here tomorrow, and if we adjourn until Friday we will be waiting around. In any event, a committee meeting has been called for tomorrow. Let us proceed with it, and then we can adjourn until Monday.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: What bill will be before the committee tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The bill respecting the Companies Act is to be considered. We heard all the outside witnesses, and we arranged with Mr. Lesage, who is in charge of the Companies Branch section, to come in to answer the evidence which has been given in relation to changes as against what is in the amending bill. We detained him last week; then he left the city and we could not hear him. He was obliged to appear in some kind of court proceedings in Montreal, in which he is involved, and he asked to be excused until this week.

It is important that we have a good attendance with respect to this bill, and I suggest that if we adjourn until tomorrow afternoon we would have a better attendance.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: You are referring to attendance at the committee?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. We will not finish the bill tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: You will not finish the bill tomorrow. The members of the committee who are interested in the bill will attend tomorrow morning and discuss it; then the chairman will set up the small subcommittee which has been discussed, and it will deal with the very extensive redrafting that has to be done. However, there is no reason for the house to sit tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Honourable senators, all of us have personal plans, but the great difficulty for most of us is making reservations for travel. I presume other senators have some difficulty in this respect, but I seem to be in trouble all the time.

I concur in what Senator Croll said, that if the committee sits this evening and again tomorrow morning, we could then adjourn until Monday. Personally, that would suit me.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, perhaps this is not the easiest forum in which to get a consensus in a situation like this. I think it might meet the wishes of both sides if the adjournment were until Monday at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We shall probably sit on Monday night. I would hope for the co-operation of all honourable senators in dealing with the business that we will have before us, and I am sure we will have it.

I would ask that as many members as possible of the Banking and Commerce Committee attend the meeting called for tomorrow morning. This is an important bill, and I think we are doing what the Senate should and must do in respect of this very important committee work, if we perform in that way. However, some senators will be unable to attend, through no fault of their own, and I am sure we all feel that we should not sit unnecessarily and charge them with another absence. The absence you save may be your own some day.

I would also point out that the Banking and Commerce Committee is to meet this evening at 8 o'clock, and I would ask the members of that committee to attend in as large numbers as possible.

I therefore move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition—

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I have just one further thought to express. Some of us who have been here pretty steadily find it difficult to be here for Monday afternoon. As there may not be any business until Monday, surely 8 o'clock in the evening would meet the requirements of everyone. It does not help the Senate if it meets at 3 p.m. and adjourns until 8 p.m. without doing any business. I think if you called us together on Monday at 8 p.m. we could do the business.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I appreciate this. The amount of business that has to be done is considerable. I think it might serve the convenience of many honourable senators who find themselves in the same position as Senator Croll if we undertook to sit on Monday at 3 p.m. and at 8 p.m. We can arrange the business in that way because I am sure we will have a quorum. This is a "do-it-yourself" operation, but in the circumstances I believe we are doing what the Senate should do.

I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition, so as to make it unanimous, that we adjourn until Monday next at 3 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, July 27, at 3 p.m.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-110, to facilitate the making of loans to students.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

She said: Honourable senators, I was greatly pleased when I was asked to introduce in the Senate Bill C-110, an act to facilitate the making of loans to students. There are few things that interest me more than schemes which will provide money to enable students to acquire post high school education. I believe sincerely in the Declaration of Human Rights which, in Article 26, says:

> Technical and professional education shall be made generally available.

Through this bill the Government is making arrangements to provide students with the money to enable them to take technical and professional training.

My original interest in these matters, and in this bill, no doubt was enhanced through some years of experience immediately prior to the time I was appointed to the Senate when I served, without remuneration of course, as the Educational Secretary of the New Brunswick Provincial Chapter of the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire. This automatically made me chairman of the committee of the provincial chapter which accepts applications from students in New Brunswick who apply for scholarships and bursaries given annually throughout Canada by the I.O.D.E. This committee interviews the applicants and recommends to the National Committee the names of those whom they consider best qualified for the awards. The National Committee decides on the recipients, usually on the recommendations of the Provincial Committee.

Many persons who are now prominent in and contribute very much to the life of Canada were able to continue their own higher education only because of the generous scholarships and bursaries they received from the I.O.D.E. in the past.

An exhaustive list of these award winners who have reached prominence in Canadian life would, I am sure, surprise honourable senators. I will not attempt to give a list of those persons, but I would like to mention a few who are well known to you. One is the Honourable J. W. Pickersgill, Minister of Transport in the present government; another is Dr. Albert W. Trueman, a former President of the University of Manitoba, later President of the University of New Brunswick, a former commissioner of the National Film Board, and now highly regarded and very well known both at home and abroad as Director of the Canada Council. Another, who originally came from Prince Edward Island and who now lives in New Brunswick, a citizen of whom New Brunswick is very proud, is Dr. W. Stewart MacNutt, Professor of History at the University of New Brunswick.

He is a noted historian and writer. In the last ten years, after considerable research, he has published several excellent books and has brought to mind much of New Brunswick's history that otherwise would probably have been forgotten.

I know, of course, that there are many other organizations that supply similar opportunities to Canadian students. Notably in my own province, there are the generous Beaverbrook scholarships, which have enabled many New Brunswickers to take post-graduate courses in Great Britain. These have enriched especially the legal and teaching professions of our province, as well as other parts of Canada, for the Maritimes continue, as they have done in the past, to export brains and trained personnel to other provinces and to the United States.

Other well known Maritimers would not have reached the eminence they have, had they not received Rhodes Scholarships. I think of Mr. Justice Ivan C. Rand, one of the most distinguished jurists ever to sit on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada, who, after his retirement, organized and became Dean of the Law School of the University of Western Ontario.

Dr. Henry Hicks is another who received one of these awards. A former Premier of Nova Scotia, he is now President of Dalhousie University. Others are Mr. A. E. Ritchie, recently appointed Deputy Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, and Dr. Ernest Weeks, the capable Executive Director of the Atlantic Development Board, which is doing so much to improve the economic position of the Atlantic provinces.

Many of the outstanding people in Canada today were able to make their valuable contributions only because they were fortunate enough to receive awards of scholarships or bursaries which provided them with the money to pursue their educations. It is my belief, honourable senators, that in the past there have been many others in Canada with equal or perhaps even greater capabilities who were unable to secure the necessary financial support and could not develop their capabilities, and Canada is the poorer because of that.

Honourable senators, I found great satisfaction in working on the I.O.D.E. scholarship and bursary committee, but often that satisfaction was nullified by the sadness I felt on behalf of many highly qualified applicants whose applications had to be rejected because the income from the large endowment funds voluntarily raised by the I.O.D.E. across Canada was limited and could not be extended, no matter how deserving the additional applicants might be. I often grieved over these and particularly over the many brilliant and eager applicants who had graduated from high school and were anxious to continue their education but knew of no source where they could secure sufficient money by loan or other means to finance themselves. I feared that unless given financial help they would never develop their full potentialities, and that without formal education due to lack of funds they might well join the unfortunate ones concerning whom Sir Thomas Gray wrote:

> But Knowledge to their eyes her ample page
> Rich with the spoils of time did ne'er unroll;
> Chill penury repress'd their noble rage,
> And froze the genial current of the soul.

The bill before us, if passed—and I hope it will be passed without delay—will mean that in Canada students such as these will have an opportunity to continue their studies and later add to the professionally and technically trained people so greatly needed in Canada.

It is true that there are student loans available in most provinces, but in most cases they are not large enough to enable a student, without a great deal of financial assistance, to continue post high school studies. In any case, all the scholarships and bursaries, good as they are, and all the provincial student loans available can only assist a very small proportion of the rapidly increasing number of present-day high school graduates in Canada who must have assistance if they are to continue their education and who, if given the opportunity to take university, technical or teacher's college training, would fill a great need in Canada for citizens with such training.

We all know of the bulge in the present student-age population due to the greatly increased birth rate in the latter part of World War II and immediately thereafter. The children born at that time are largely the students who are increasing greatly the demand for post high school education at this time. The next ten to fifteen years will produce very special problems for young Canadians who are seeking post high school education, and they will provide, too, problems for the families of such young Canadians.

There will also be problems for the institutions which will be called on to provide that education, and for the governments which will have to arrange to finance it.

Although I have no children or grandchildren entering this stage of their lives and do not have personal knowledge of the family problems involved, I have some personal knowledge of how these problems affect the universities, because for over 20 years I have been a member of the Senate or governing body of Mount Allison, one of the universities in New Brunswick. Although our universities in the Maritimes are small in comparison to those in the larger and more densely populated provinces, they are having to meet and deal with the very same problems as larger universities. In fact, it would seem to be accepted that our problems are even greater, for at a conference of university presidents from all over Canada held quite recently it was recommended unanimously that there should be a special increase in the university grants given by the federal Government to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Starting at once, more children per family will be attending institutions of higher learning, making it practically impossible for families of moderate circumstances to finance the higher education of all their children. The increase in the number of university students in relation to the total population is already making it very difficult, and in many cases impossible, for university students to find summer employment to help finance their own education. Many students with such difficulties came to me earlier this year, and I know that such cases are very prevalent.

On the other hand, due to the increase in industrialization and the increasing use of automation, we will require a rapid increase in and a higher proportion of persons of all ages in our population to have more than high school training if they are to find employment that will provide them with a reasonable living, or, in fact, with any living at all.

The Government of Canada is well aware of this situation and is deeply concerned about these problems. Because of this concern for the students and for their families, the Government is undertaking to underwrite, as it were, part of the financial requirements of students in the form of tuition fees, residential fees and similar student requirements, to enable them to attend a university or other post high school institution. The Government is also concerned that Canada shall have as high a proportion of educated citizens as is practicable, both in terms of future economic competitiveness at home and abroad, and in terms of employment in an era when it is recognized that the undereducated are the underemployed.

The Canadian Student Loans Act is not designed to be exclusive. It is not intended to meet all the requirements to make higher education possible for all who should receive it. It is not intended to preclude the operation of other plans or to push them out of the field. There is room for many agencies in the field of student financing. However, in this as in other fields, the federal Government can provide a broad and substantial measure of support.

In bringing in this legislation, it is the hope of the Government that this bill will break the back of the growing problem of student financing in the bulge period ahead. But in terms of coverage, a federal plan must have clearly defined limits beyond which it cannot go. Other plans, provincial plans, university plans, the plans of various organizations, and of private individuals may be more diverse in meeting special needs of special individuals and special groups which the more massive general plan of the Government cannot readily accommodate.

As we look ahead it is clear that the moneys involved will be indeed substantial. The Govvernment realize that under the type of system set out in this bill the outstanding loans at the end of five years could well be in the order of $200 million, and at the end of ten years they will probably be in the order of half a billion, rising perhaps to $1 billion in a decade. To meet needs of this magnitude, and to cater to the requirements of thousands of young borrowers, the Government in this bill is proposing a system of guaranteed loans from the chartered banks, credit unions, caisses populaires, and other co-operative unions designated by the minister as a bank under the act. Through their widespread system of branches, particularly in the case of banks, these organizations can make loans, do the necessary book work, consolidate a series of loans into a single total, receive payments and make collections.

The federal Government, as I am sure honourable senators know, has enlisted in other fields the co-operation of the banks and credit unions and caisses populaires with excellent results. The guaranteed loan approach has a very great advantage from the point of view of federal finance, and thus from the point of view of the Canadian taxpayer.

Under the Farm Improvement Loans scheme, for example, the only cost to the federal treasury, apart from the cost of small administrative units, has been in the claims for losses, and these have run as low as one-tenth of one per cent of the total amount. In the student loans plan there will be, of course, the cost of carrying student loans through the initial interest-free period, because the students are not required to pay any interest while they are taking their education and until six months have passed after they have completed their studies.

Under this bill a student may borrow from a bank, credit union, caisse populaire, or other co-operative credit union, an amount which does not exceed $1,000 in any one year, provided that the amount borrowed when added to the previous guaranteed student loans made to the same student does not exceed $5,000. As I said before, the student is not required to pay interest on the loan while he is a full-time student. He becomes liable to pay interest only at the end of the seventh month after he ceases to be a full-time student. During the period that the borrower is a full-time student, and for six months after he ceases to be such a student, the Government pays the interest on the loan.

Before a student can secure such a guaranteed loan from a bank, credit union, caisse populaire or other co-operative credit society, he must qualify in relation to scholastic achievements and need. Because most provinces have machinery in operation to select students eligible for their own student loans, it is considered reasonable that the provinces might use the same machinery to select those eligible under the federal student loan legislation. To simplify this procedure and to keep the federal Government in the field of banking and of guaranteeing loans, and away from interfering in the provincial field of education, this bill provides that the designation of the appropriate authority to make decisions on the eligibility of students for these loans has been assigned to the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

One thousand dollars is the maximum amount which a student can borrow in any one year, and over a period of years no student will be able to borrow more than $5,000. The actual amount of a loan which will be made to a student will depend on the financial need of that student. Consultations with educational authorities in all the provinces have led to the belief that the average borrowing by a student will be probably $500 a year. Some will need much more, and some less, but students will not borrow more than they have to because eventually they will have to pay it back.

A guaranteed student loan made by a bank, credit union, caisse populaire or other credit union society which, after application, has been designated as a bank for the purposes of this act, to a borrower not of full age can be recovered in the courts from the borrower as though the borrower had been of full age.

I forgot to mention that although in the provinces the person designated to choose the appropriate authority to make decisions on the eligibility of student loans is the Lieutenant Governor in Council, in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories it is the Commissioner of each Territory after he has had consultation with his Council. There is provision in this bill that if there is no Council in existence at the time, then the Commissioner can make this appointment without consultation with anyone. This puzzled me a little at first until I learned that election writs have been issued in one of the territories, and there will probably be no Council in existence until after this act comes into force. This is the reason for the provision in the act. Thus, there will be no discrimination against students in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon who might wish to make use of the provisions of this bill during this coming fall, if it passes this house.

In the case of the death of a student who has negotiated a guaranteed student loan, there is no responsibility on the estate or the family of the deceased, and the Government will pay to the bank that has granted the loan the amount calculated to be due.

Honourable senators, this bill is based in a very large measure on the rights of the federal Government in the general area of banking that is assigned to it under the British North America Act. The object of the bill is to provide high school graduates with enough money so that they may continue their education.

I think I have covered reasonably well the provisions of this bill. If there are questions that honourable senators wish to ask, I shall try to answer them to the best of my ability. I would remind honourable senators, however, that throughout Canada high school graduates and their parents are waiting, and hoping that this bill will pass without delay, so that the many who are in need of assistance will be able to secure funds during the coming academic year to finance their continued training in universities, teachers' colleges and technical institutes.

I appeal to all honourable senators to end the anxiety of these thousands of Canadian students and parents.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the honourable sponsor of this bill give a further explanation on the question of the constitutionality of this measure? I think I heard her say that she thought the bill was within federal competence because it is in the realm of banking. I would like her to go a little further with respect to that, because to my mind "banking" refers only to banking institutions.

Secondly, I would like very much to have the honourable senator comment on section 15 of the bill, and say whether this is really within the competence of the federal Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator mind if those questions were dealt with at a later time this afternoon?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Certainly not.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the need for legislation to provide financial assistance to students desirous of securing a university education, or vocational, technical or teachers' college education meets with the approval, I am sure, of the leaders in education, the general Canadian public and especially the students. The advances in technology and science and in other fields of human endeavour are becoming ever greater, and this requires that an increasing number of young men and women must acquire the highest education that Canada can offer. Providing our young people with the best education that will meet the needs of modern society is perhaps the greatest challenge that confronts our governments today.

It is obvious that our young men and women are taking advantage of advanced education. The number of students enrolled in Canadian universities has been increasing rapidly. Bearing in mind the fact that approximately 35,000 were registered prior to the last war and after the veterans' registration had levelled off after the war, the student full-time enrolment in our universities increased from 92,000 in 1958-59 to approximately 158,000 this past year, an average of over 12,000 annually. The Conference of Canadian Universities projected the student registration in 1970 to be 312,000, which means that there will be at least double the number of university students in the next six years.

The Canadian universities and other higher educational facilities are consequently facing a terrific strain over the next few years. Our higher educational institutions are already taxed to the utmost, making this a problem of national concern that can be dealt with adequately only by a federal-provincial conference. Such a conference should be called as soon as possible, as has been urged by the Leader of the Opposition and others in the other house.

A university education today can no longer be regarded as a luxury. It is a necessity, not only for the young man or woman who wants to fit into the modern technological society, but it is also a necessity for our country which needs the knowledge and skills of these young people to continue building up the economic, political, social and other aspects of our life. Surely the development of human resources should not be secondary to the development of our economic resources.

Every young man and woman who has the intellectual qualifications to pursue university education or any course of higher learning should not be denied the opportunity for lack of financial means. To keep our nation strong, progressive and dynamic, our youth should be encouraged to acquire the highest education possible. This legislation, providing student loans on an interest-free basis during the years of study, is a step, and only a beginning, in the right direction.

Let us remember, however, that still too large a proportion of our young people is not availing itself of higher education. From the census figures of 1961 issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, we learn that there were then over 1,000,000 youths between the ages of 18 and 21. Educational authorities estimate that over 20 per cent possess the intellectual capacity necessary to complete a university education; yet, only 11 per cent, or about 114,000, attended institutions of higher learning at that time. The Canadian Union of University Students confirmed the fact that only one-half of the Canadian young men and women who could qualify intellectually to pursue higher learning have been enrolling in universities.

It can reasonably be assumed, therefore, that a large percentage of those who could have gone on to university were prevented from doing so because they lacked financial resources. It is certain that most of those in this category came from homes of low-income jobs or professions, whose parents were unable to provide the necessary funds for fees, texts, transportation and accommodation.

Student loans will not solve this problem, but they will help many to achieve a higher education. They cannot be a substitute for scholarships, which the present Government has promised and so far has not implemented. More scholarships should be made available to high-calibre students as soon as possible. The loans will, however, aid the average student to get ahead; these should be made available in the easiest way, as this will benefit both the student and the country. The money spent to help students in this way will be more productive than the money spent to maintain the unemployed, although this is necessary; furthermore, it will help to circumvent unemployment in the future.

While considering university education, it should also be remembered that there are two facets which are not always recognized by the public—these are undergraduate and postgraduate studies. The following passages from an article in the Globe and Mail of February 12 last explain a serious problem within our universities. This was based on a brief of the Ontario Council of University Faculty Associations. The article says:

> It is from this latter (postgraduate) group that professors and other university teachers are ordinarily obtained, and also top scientists and research staff used in industry. University education is generally considered impossible without these highly qualified people . . .
> The ratio of graduate to undergraduate students in Canadian universities is ridiculously lower than in universities of similar national importance in the United States. For instance, Harvard has about 60 per cent of its students in graduate work. The University of Chicago has about 68 per cent; Columbia, about 60 per cent; Yale and Princeton, 50 per cent; University of Michigan, 35 per cent; University of California, about 30 per cent.
> By comparison, (the latest figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics are for 1961-62), the University of British Columbia has a ratio of about 6.8 per cent graduate students; Alberta, 6.3 per cent; Saskatchewan, 4.4 per cent; Queens, 9.1 per cent; McGill, 12.3 per cent; Western Ontario, 13 per cent; and the University of Toronto, about 9.3 per cent.

This points out the proposition that postgraduate studies must be greatly increased in Canada. Since these loans will be available to postgraduate students as well, this legislation will help more students to attain higher degrees to help staff universities, research institutions and industry to meet the growing demands in these fields. The Canadian universities estimate that last year's teaching staff of 9,700 will have to increase to 23,000 in 1970; these teachers must be secured.

With the indulgence of the honourable senators, I would like to make a personal reference. My parents, who never had the opportunity to gain a higher education, could not afford to send me or any of the four children to university. With their help and that of some money which I had to earn the hard way, stooking and pitching sheaves at harvest time, sometimes up to 16 hours a day—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It was a healthy way.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: —I was able to complete normal school and enter the teaching profession. Although I began taking classes leading towards the B.A. degree at summer school and through university correspondence courses prior to the Second World War, it was not until I had completed service in the Canadian army that I was able to proceed with a university education as a full-time student.

As was the case with thousands of Canadian veterans, the generous allowances of the Department of Veterans' Affairs paying for the fees, books and living expenses made it possible for me to attain a doctoral degree at an American university and a professorial position at the University of Manitoba. Naturally, I am most grateful to the government of the day for this assistance. I am even more grateful for the extension of this program. Every veteran was entitled to the number of years of educational assistance as he had served in the armed services; but at first, if he obtained marks in the upper 10 per cent of his classes, I believe, and later in the upper 25 per cent, the allowances were automatically continued until he completed the highest degree which he desired, even in institutions outside of Canada. This applied in my case, and I leave to public opinion to say whether this was justified. Certainly, I am happy and grateful.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): So are we—and I say it with sincerity.

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Thank you very much. I would like to point out that what looked at that time as generous assistance by a country which wanted in some way to repay the veterans for their war service was really not adequate. The payment of tuition, books and $112 a month, less 13 per cent foreign exchange while attending university in the United States did not cover the expenses of my family with two children. I had to obtain an interest-free loan of $500 from the University of Saskatchewan, provided by the Saskatchewan government, and a teaching assistantship of $1,200 at the University of Minnesota.

This was my situation 15 years ago. I am stating this personal experience to show that a $1,000 annual loan under the present scheme for a married student—and their numbers are steadily increasing—to pursue his studies at an M.A. or Ph.D. level, and particularly in the United States, is inadequate. It is estimated that such a student today requires from $2,000 to $3,000 annually. Since Canada is now desperately in need of persons possessing the highest degrees, particularly for our higher educational institutions, provision should be made for students to secure larger interest-free loans. These would be an investment in our future.

In connection with higher education, scholarships and student loans, a problem of very grave concern to Canada is what has been referred to as the "brain drain to the United States." I was faced with the problem when I completed my Ph.D. course. There were higher and more tempting offers from American universities, but for patriotic reasons I returned to Canada, to a university position at a much lower salary. Since that time salaries in Canada have increased considerably and are not now very much below those in the country south of the border.

I do not regret my decision to return to Canada. Many other Canadians, however, who studied in the United States did not return and are a permanent loss to Canada. Still other Canadians who have obtained expensive education in this country have moved south, enticed by higher salaries and better conditions. The number of highly trained persons, mainly engineers, but including scientists, university teachers, physicians and surgeons, who have gone to the United States, has been steadily increasing in recent years, as is evident from the following figures:

Year Number
1960-61—1,270

These are the professional people whom Canada needs for the staffs of our universities, research institutions and industry, and everything possible must be done to prevent their emigration to other countries. Also, everything possible should be done to encourage Canadian students studying in the United States to return to Canada. This loss of brainpower and high skills is assuming alarming proportions, to which serious consideration should be given at the next federal-provincial conference.

To a degree, the student loan plan will assist students to proceed to higher education, but measures will have to be found to keep them in Canada and to encourage those who study in other countries to return to their own country. Worthy of serious consideration is the scheme adopted by the Northwest Territories. It was reported in the debates of the other house on July 15, as appears at page 5523:

> Would not some sort of incentive—this, after all, is a federal creation in so far as the Northwest Territories are concerned; certainly the great proportion of > the money to support the scheme comes from the federal treasury—if provided in a bill such as this, help to prevent that drain of brainpower? The loan of $1,500 per year for any student in the Northwest Territories wishing to attend university becomes an outright grant if the student, after graduating, returns to the territories anl lives there for at least four years. A similiar plan has existed for many years in the armed forces.

The adoption of the principle of the Northwest Territories' scheme in the Canadian student loan plan would be of tremendous benefit to Canada in preserving our brainpower and highly trained experts. I have read that it takes about $50,000 of public money to produce a Ph.D. If these graduates leave Canada for higher-rewarding positions in other countries, we are not only suffering the irreplaceable loss of their knowledge and skills but also millions of dollars annually of public investment funds in education.

A clause in the legislation making the total loan of approximately $5,000 an outright grant, equivalent to a scholarship, if the student after graduation returns to Canada for a period of five years, would, I am convinced, substantially reduce the "brain drain." A graduate will no doubt appreciate such a grant coming at a critical time in his life, and he will always be conscious that Canada is really desirous of his service and contribution to the welfare of the Canadian people. The country's final investment in a graduate's education can only bring manifold benefits for all concerned.

Education is the greatest asset to the individual and the country. To keep and to enhance Canada's place in the world in this era of rapid technological and scientific advancement, we will have to invest a greater proportion of the federal budget in education. This will ensure progress and maintain the happiness and welfare of the Canadian nation.

The former Government had substantially contributed to the needs of education. Per capita grants to universities were doubled; low interest loans were provided for the construction of student residences; tuition fees were made income tax deductible for students; and other forms of financial assistance were given to promote education. It is only right that the present Government should make its contribution to this important aspect of Canadian life. In this respect, our citizens are expecting quick action.

Although having shortcomings, which undoubtedly will have to be rectified in the future, this legislation establishes the beginnings of a more comprehensive future plan. It is at least a partial answer to many a student's prayer. Coming as it does so near the commencement of the new academic year, to be of benefit to the greatest number of students this bill should receive speedy approval in the Senate.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, at this time, I would like to reply to the questions put by the honourable Senator Flynn.

I presume that Senator Flynn, by referring to the constitutional issue, was thinking of the statements that have been made by some people that Bill C-110 enters into the field of education, which is assigned by the British North America Act to the provinces. My own opinion—and I am quite sure it is shared by the law officers of the Government—is that the supplying of money to buy education is merely a contract, and that it does not enter into the field of education.

There are no restrictions on what kind of education can be bought, other than that it must be post high school education, or education which leads to the teaching profession, or vocational instruction at a technical institute. I cannot see how providing students with sufficient money to pay for whatever type of education the student desires to take, at whatever institution the student chooses, interferes with the rights over education of any province. For that reason, I am of the opinion that there is no constitutional problem here.

I would refer honourable Senator Flynn to the scheme of university grants, which follows very much the same principle, which has been carried on for some time. I do not think the provisions of the British North America Act, which state that education is a matter for the provinces, are being violated just because we supply money to help people buy the means of education.

The other question that Senator Flynn asked was about section 15, which reads:

> A guaranteed student loan made by a bank to a borrower not of full age, and interest thereon other than interest payable under section 6, is recoverable by a bank from the borrower as though the borrower had been of full age at the time the loan was made.

The law officers of the Crown have given it as their opinion that section 15 of the act is legal; it is deemed to be ancillary to the federal power to legislate in respect to banks and banking. This has to do with banks, or with organizations which can apply to the minister and by him be considered a bank under the Canada Student Loans Act.

I can only give that as my opinion, and say that it is also the opinion of the law officers of the Crown. I have no further answer than that.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I would like to ask this question on that point.

The law in Ontario and other provinces regarding a contract with a minor is, I think, to the effect that the contract is not binding until the borrower who is under age reaches the age of 21, and then he has to acknowledge it, or he may repudiate it. Now we are told that the officers and the lawyers of the Crown have given an opinion, and in this I am wondering if they can circumvent the law. Could the sponsor tell us if that is in effect what the federal authority is doing?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I am sorry, I did not hear the senator's last few words.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are the officers of the law in formulating or drafting this section 15 circumventing the law of the land with regard to contracts with minors, unless it is considered to be for a necessity of life? I would like to know how is it binding on a minor?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the honourable gentleman would allow me to intervene at this point for the purpose of replying to that question, because it certainly is a problem that has engaged the attention of the lawyers not only here but in the other place.

I should perhaps first refer to what the honourable gentleman has said, that in the case of a contract with a person under the age of 21, unless it is acknowledged after the minor reaches 21, then under provincial law everywhere, I think the contract is voidable. In the second place, though, the law has to make adjustments for circumstances. One of the circumstances overriding the voidability is the fact that if the contract was for necessaries of life, then it is enforceable. In the case of young people under 21 who apply for student loans today, it might become an interesting question as to whether or not they are applying for something pretty close to a necessary for their livelihood.

I do not say that the basis for justifying section 15 of this bill rests upon that proposal. Senator Fergusson has referred to the fact that in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown section 15 is deemed to be ancillary to the federal power to legislate in respect of banks or banking. This may be. I think it is a matter of opinion, and short of a decision of the court no one can say definitively whether the section is within the ambit of the powers of the federal Government or not.

I would like to refer the house to section 95 of the Bank Act. This provision has been on the statute books of this country since before the turn of the century; it has been amended a number of times, always for the purpose of liberalizing the right of the minor, of the person under 21, to make contracts with banks in respect of matters dealt with under section 95. It deals with deposits which may be received from persons unable to contract. I will read subsection 1(a) only, because I think the balance has no particular bearing on the matter raised by Senator Choquette.

Section 95(1)(a) reads as follows:

> (1) The bank may, subject to the provisions of this section, without the authority, aid, assistance or intervention of any other person or official being required,
> (a) receive deposits from any person whomsoever, whatever his age, status or condition in life, and whether such person is qualified by law to enter into ordinary contracts or not—

As honourable senators realize, this is a much wider provision than section 15 of this bill, because it refers to:

> —any person whomsoever, whatever his age, status or condition in life, and whether such person is qualified by law to enter into ordinary contracts or not—

Section 15 of the bill deals with minors. Section 95 of the Bank Act extends even to people who are incapable, to people who are mentally deficient, who require committees, tutors or curators. It is thought to be ancillary to the right of the federal Government to legislate in respect of banks or banking. I am informed that this is the reasoning process that led to the drafting of section 15 as it applies.

From a practical point of view there is another aspect of the matter that should be borne in mind. I am informed that the experience of provinces which have student loan schemes is very good in respect of repayment. I am also informed that persons of the type who apply for these loans—whether or not they drop out of college before they finish —feel a personal obligation, and one which they generally honour, to repay the amount of money that was lent to them for the purpose of assisting them in obtaining their education. I think that the experience of the provinces in this respect would probably apply equally well to loans under this bill. Generally speaking, the type of person to whom these loans are to be made available is the type of young Canadian who could be expected to respond when the loan falls due, and respond just as generously as is the Government at this time to the needs of these students.

Perhaps that is all I need to say. Maybe I have been a little lengthy, but I think this is generally the philosophy behind the draftsmanship of section 15 in respect of the point raised by Senator Choquette.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to say.

I should like to congratulate the honourable lady senator (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) for the way in which she has presented the bill. Of course everyone is sympathetic towards assisting the deserving, but there is an aspect of this matter which I am sure will prove disappointing, as has proved the case in most instances where we have attempted to help individuals. Everyone with experience in life can recall instances when, with all the best intentions, he has endeavoured to help persons but has made enemies instead of friends.

These young students are going to lose one of the most valuable experiences in life. The honourable senator from Fort Garry said that the difficulties he encountered in obtaining education proved the most valuable lesson of his life. I am sure it is true of all honourable senators, those who had to struggle for whatever education they have are the ones who made the greatest use of their education and probably became the best citizens. The easier it is to obtain a loan, the less effort the student has to put into completing his education.

I am reminded of my daughter who was teaching in that part of Alberta which is not open prairie but where there is a great deal of bush and willows. There, if you do not pick all the willow roots out, the growth will become thicker than ever. I was talking to her about the students at her school. This was at a time when I had difficulty in finding anyone to work at picking roots, and it was said that people could not get work. I was going to the pool room asking for this help, and the men there would sit down so quickly they would almost break the benches. They didn't want to do it.

As I say, I was asking my daughter about her students, and she laughed and said, "There is a big, strong kid, that you would like to have working for you. He just sits there dreaming; he can't get down to studying." She said that she asked him what was on his mind, and he replied that he didn't want to go to school, that he would much rather pick willow roots. I said to my daughter, "You needn't worry about that fellow. He will turn out the best of all your students." The last I heard of him, he was proving me right. So we are going to arrive at that sad state of affairs; we are not going to have enough employment for all these people, and they will be disappointed and discouraged.

I just wanted to point out the difficulty that will arise as a result of this bill, a measure which in other respects we believe to be good. In some cases it will do more harm than good.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, this bill has been discussed so fully and at such length that my contribution will be extremely brief. I congratulate Senator Fergusson on her splendid presentation of the bill. I think it is a measure which will prove of great value if administered in a very limited way. However, if it is simply another way of getting into debt and having that debt fall due just at the time when the graduate needs to start up in his own office or assume other obligations, it is going to do some harm.

The debt in this country is really appalling. The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) showed me some statistics issued by the Bureau of Statistics just recently. The direct and indirect debt, less sinking fund, of the federal Government is $30½ billion. The debt of the provinces is $9 billion, and of the municipalities about $5½ billion. That means there are debts of about $45½ billion set dead against those different governments. It represents a debt of about $2,400 for each individual in this country. In addition, the people in this country privately owe a debt of about $19 billion to stores, banks, insurance companies, trust companies, and particularly to finance companies. You will understand therefore why I would not wish to make it too easy for people to get further into debt unless it was absolutely necessary.

There was a time not very long ago, as has already been mentioned, when a student got through university practically on his own. He would have to save the money to start with, and during recesses he would work. In this way he could always earn enough to keep going. Of course nowadays the tuition fees are higher, and while wages are also higher they still may not be quite adequate.

Another point to remember is that parents frequently make a great sacrifice to put their children through university. Mothers and fathers deny themselves greatly to save and stint for the noble purpose of putting a son or daughter through university. This of course is very desirable; like the quality of mercy, it is twice blessed and in itself blesses all concerned.

Sometimes there is a little extravagance involved in connected with university education. There was a time when young people, like Abraham Lincoln, had to walk long distances to school. Then came the bicycle. But nowadays, as you go past an institution of learning you will not see dinner-pails outside, you will see very few bicycles, but you are likely to see quite a few shiny, high-powered motorcars. In my opinion, people who are living at that scale should never be considered for the type of loan provided for in this bill.

As has already been said, education is a necessity at the present time if a person is to make a real contribution to the public welfare. Many of those who have not had the opportunity of learning a trade or taking up a profession are found in the ranks of the unemployed. However, for those who have education there are opportunities in abundance at the present time. In this connection I refer to the Hall Report, just published, which says that in nine years we will need 7,100 more medical doctors in this country, 42,000 more trained nurses, and 2,130 trained dentists. Even at the present time in many places doctors are hard to get. Five new medical schools will be needed to provide the required number.

This bill is of course welcome in so far as it will help boys and girls who could not otherwise get the help they need.

As a matter of interest, I would mention that in Great Britain a test was made recently to see whether children from the lower-income groups were as intelligent as children from the middle and higher-income groups. It was found as a result of the tests that they were in fact just as intelligent. In my view one of the benefits of this measure is that it will probably help some of those poorer children, if administered in the way I have indicated, to receive higher education.

We need more educated people today; we need more thoughtful people to combat the prevalence of race riots, violence and hatred. To meet the uncontrolled action of extremists, there is a need for people who are educated and thoughtful and have calm judgment, people who are guided by the principles laid down in the Ten Commandments and in the Sermon on the Mount.

Honourable Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, first of all I would like to congratulate Senator Fergusson for the way in which she introduced this bill. Senator Fergusson was always very much interested in educational and related matters, such as human rights. She is well aware that the emancipation of man chiefly depends on the degree of education he may acquire in a given society.

Senator Fergusson knows very well indeed that my congratulations are sincere, because we have been friends for a long time, more particularly since we discharged similar responsibilities at the prices and trade board during the war.

Nobody, I believe, will quarrel with the government's intention to help university students. We all agree that we should give students the means of acquiring a higher education, and to those who have the necessary ability and talent an opportunity of obtaining a university degree.

Yet, we should recognize that there has been considerable improvement at the provincial level in the past few years. The increase in the student population, which was stressed by Senator Yuzyk earlier today, amply confirms it. I firmly believe that any student with at least some imagination, and whose family conditions are not absolutely unfavourable, may today get all financial aid required to pursue his studies, either thanks to the scholarship system or by obtaining a loan from one organization or another. Of course, I am speaking of the province of Quebec which I know better, but I suspect that the situation is not much different elsewhere.

As the honourable senator who spoke before me pointed out, students are studying nowadays under more favourable conditions than in our time. He said that there were very few bicycles at the doors of our universities—I would say that in Quebec City, where I gave courses for a few years, the university had to reserve a parking space for the professors' cars because the students would have taken all the space with their own cars.

Nevertheless, I admit that there are certain needs. In my opinion, everything that can be done to allow more students to attain higher education should be encouraged. Consequently, what urges me to take part in the debate is not so much the purpose of the bill or the intention of the legislators, as the problem raised in the other place concerning its constitutionality.

In the other place, the discussion on this matter was so hot that it even gave rise to a feeling of frustration among certain people. It seems there was a refusal continually to discuss this problem of the federal government jurisdiction over some fields in which it has been intruding in the last few years. Honourable senators, I hope that this frustration does not exist here in the Senate, because we all feel, do we not, that it is the traditional duty of this house to watch very closely the respect of our constitution or, if you prefer—since all do not agree that the British North America Act is our constitution —to watch closely the application of the provisions of this act which divide the powers between the provincial governments and legislatures, on the one hand, and the federal government and Parliament on the other.

This question of constitutionality has been raised very frequently in the last few years, and I would say that the atmosphere which prevails at this time in the relations between Ottawa and the Quebec legislature in particular, must prompt us to think and be greatly concerned over this question of constitutionality, the question of respecting the responsibilities of the provinces. It is in that spirit that I would like to make a few remarks on the bill now under study.

First there is the problem of its constitutionality as a whole, in principle, and the problem of its constitutionality in some details. I shall mention first the question of details which has to do with clause 15 and which, of course, does not prevent in itself the approval of the bill if, on the other hand, we come to the conclusion that in principle it is not against the provisions of the British North America Act.

I am obligated to Senator Connolly, the Senate leader, for the explanations he gave us. They satisfy me only in part. He indicated that when the federal Parliament has the power to legislate in a special matter—banks and bankruptcy, for instance—it has the right, for the purpose of legislating in those fields, to establish some terms which, taken separately, would be civil law provisions affecting real estate and civic rights. That is the theory of the ancillary right: the Bankruptcy Act carries some conditions which affect the civil law in Quebec and common law in the other provinces.

Yet, I do not think that theory of the ancillary right can be put forward to justify clause 15 which said:

> A guaranteed student loan made by a bank to a borrower not of full age, and interest thereon other than interest payable under section 6, is recoverable by a bank from the borrower as though the borrower had been of full age at the time the loan was made.

Are those provisions absolutely necessary to the purposes of the legislation? I do not think so. I do not think that wording is essential. It is not necessary to have that provision which makes a person of age out of a minor in order to set up the loans scheme. Under the civil law and the common law, a minor student could contract for a loan which would be valid with the assent of his tutor, in certain cases, and, in some other way, by following the conditions applicable to the civil law and the common law. I fail to see the necessity of that provision which puts the minor borrower in a situation altogether different than if he borrowed exclusively on his own initiative for the same purpose. Of course, once again, it is a small point, but it may reveal a state of mind which makes people who draft legislation here in Ottawa say: If such and such a provision violates the provinces' jurisdiction, the courts will decide. Well, the courts do not always get the opportunity to decide and that state of mind is bad and must be destroyed as much as possible. That is all I want to say about clause 15. And now about the general principle.

Is Parliament authorized to guarantee and promote loans to university students? I cannot admit, of course, that the federal Parliament gets its jurisdiction from section 91, paragraph 15, of the British North America Act, which gives it control over the banks—incorporating banks and issuing of bank notes. With all due respect, I cannot see at all what the banks have to do here that is essential, except possibly to act as agents in granting the loans.

On the other hand, I do not feel this legislation is directly concerned with education. I would say it is no more related to education than the provisions of the Income Tax Act which allow a student or his father to deduct tuition fees from their taxable income. In other words, the federal Parliament is seeking to pass this bill to help students in their studies the same way it did in the case of other legislation. Even if I do not think it is ultra vires—that is why I cannot oppose it—and even if I am not against the principle involved here, I should like to point out that this is a field where, historically, the provinces had exclusive jurisdiction until Ottawa decided to pay grants to universities, a step which was clearly unconstitutional in my mind. Until then, the provinces had been the only ones to take initiatives, especially as far as scholarships and direct aid to students were concerned.

From a technical point of view, this field of jurisdiction may be obscure; the federal Parliament and the provinces may be equally competent but, historically and in fact, this field once came under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Therefore, before deciding to introduce this type of legislation, it appears to me that, in the troubled times we live now, as far as relations between Ottawa and Quebec are concerned, it was imperative for the government to take all the necessary precautions so as to avoid a conflict. I submit that the government did not take all those precautions. No doubt it is urgent to assist the students—but it was even more urgent to save Canadian unity and I accuse the government in that respect of lack of insight and of a sense of responsibility. It knew beforehand that in Quebec they would say no—rightly or wrongly, and I will come back to that point. The government should have tried to find a solution—not only a solution I would say based on circumstances, such as that offered to us by the provisions allowing the provinces to opt out of those loan schemes—but a more substantial and more actual solution. If I am not mistaken, the option formula contained in this legislation, which enables any province to opt out from the scheme, is similar to the formula adopted by the previous government with regard to university grants in 1960. The purpose then was to correct a situation which had existed for several years. In spite of the Quebec government's opposition, the St. Laurent government had set up a system of university grants, and Quebec universities did not participate and did not take advantage of those grants. In order to remedy the situation, the previous government established an option formula which enabled the Quebec government to increase by 1 per cent the corporate income tax, so as to make up the amount payable in grants to its universities. Now, the present government laid down this option formula, this opting out, as it is called, as a principle.

This formula is exceptional on close inspection, because it is not exactly under that form that it was included in the Liberal party's program. That platform stated that in every case, the federal government would establish a joint program and that when the scheme would finally be established, the provinces which would want to withdraw would receive a fiscal compensation. In practice, each time an objection was raised in Quebec, when a project or plan was introduced an option formula was offered as, for example, last year in the field of loans to municipalities.

This option offered last year in the field of loans to municipalities is still offered this year in the program of loans to students. Now I feel that this possibility of option offered for all practical purposes to the province of Quebec alone encourages the isolation of that province at a time when it is already encouraged by other circumstances and this at the expense of Canadian unity. I feel that this optional system is a bad thing.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: What would you suggest instead?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If a piece of legislation is constitutional, and if the federal Government is satisfied that the act falls within the limits of Parliament's jurisdiction, the legislation should be adopted or rejected. However, I may say that before adopting such a position, the government and Parliament should act in such a way that this question should be satisfactorily settled. It is not enough to do what is being done in the Quebec legislature at the present time, that is, to threaten to resort to the courts and not to do it, or to threaten secession. This is not the solution or a solution. One of these days, people will have to submit such problems of the division of powers to a court, the decision of which should be accepted. If we agree on the Supreme Court, let the legislation be submitted to the Supreme Court. I object to the constitution being amended by a majority of the provinces.

Suppose this act was ultra vires with regard to the powers of this Parliament. Would the fact that nine provinces out of ten agree with the central government make it constitutional? Of course not. However, that is what is happening in the way the government is acting. And also in the way the Quebec legislature is reacting at this time.

I say it again, to know where we stand it will be necessary one of these days to submit those questions to a referee, either the Supreme Court or another body if the latter's decision is not satisfactory. The constitution is not above changing. There are hazy areas, as I said a little earlier; how is it possible also to circumscribe powers in the field of credit? That is a joint jurisdiction. The provinces are already in the field of scholarships, students' loans and now the federal government is getting into it. Who knows but that those matters come under its jurisdiction? From an administrative point of view, should not only one government look after those things? Honourable senators, those are the points I wanted and thought I ought to make. As I said, the situation, considering the constitutional arguments involved, is not too good. The solution whereby a province can opt out is not too good either and, in the long run, can have serious consequences.

I suggest that federal-provincial conferences should be held for other purposes than calling together government representatives who are merely interested in balancing their present budget. Real solutions to problems facing us in the field of constitutional conflicts should be sought. Moreover, I sincerely think that it is time that we had an extraordinary conference to examine, not only the question of jurisdiction, which is only the reflection of a more serious problem, but also our whole constitution which, once again, may not be a constitution since it is an act which was imposed upon us by the Imperial Parliament, an act which we have not yet succeeded to amend ourselves. It is high time for us to adopt a formula to settle here our own conflicts and settle them adequately.

I will not oppose this bill, but I do hope we realize the gravity of the situation.

(Text):

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, the first observation I wish to make this afternoon is that Senator Yuzyk and myself were apparently born too soon. Senator Yuzyk has spoken of his early steps down the pathway of an education. Well, 70 years ago last month I wrote an examination in Manitoba to qualify as a school teacher. Although I had been absent from school several years, working on the farm—not eight hours a day but as a matter of fact about 12 hours a day, and it never hurt me—I passed the examination.

The next problem I had was to earn some money, because one of the regulations in the educational department was that while you might pass an examination and qualify to become a school teacher, you could not commence to teach until you had had a normal school training. In those distant years the normal school training was 10 weeks for the junior grade in teaching. I estimated it would cost me approximately $200 to attend the session of the normal school and get my diploma to teach.

So I had to go to work. I worked steadily from the middle of July, when I received the return from the examinations, until Christmas time. Since the only kind of work available then was farm work, I earned the most of my $200 that was necessary by working in the harvest fields for a dollar a day, and probably worked an average of 12 hours a day. How convenient for me, had I been able at that time to go to some government which would give me several hundreds of dollars, without interest, and if I failed to repay it in the end, everything would be all right.

Honourable senators, I say in all seriousness that the discipline I had in that pathway to an education and to teaching was one of the most valuable experiences I have had in my life. I am old-fashioned enough to believe that when you get some money handed to you on a platter you don't realize the value of it in the same degree that you do if you have to earn it. Consequently, I am bound to say that I can work up no enthusiasm for this bill.

I do not intend to criticize this bill on the ground that Senator Flynn criticized it a short time ago, other than to say that our provincial and federal responsibilities have become altogether too much mixed up, and that much of the difficulty we have in this country today, so far as provincial and federal differences are concerned, is due to this fact more than anything else. As far as I am concerned, I would like to see a redefinition of these responsibilities. I would like to see the provinces assigned their responsibilities and the revenues necessary to support them, and the federal Government put in the same position. Then each would have to manage its own affairs, and if any conflict arose between them, let the courts settle it. That was the method followed in the first 50 or 60 years following Confederation—and it worked. We did not have all this talk we have today that is really confusing and disturbing a great many people in this country.

I come now to an examination of this bill. I only received a copy of the bill a few hours ago. I was familiar with the general tenor of it, but I wished to get the bill with the amendments that had been made in the Commons. The first criticism I have to offer of the bill is that we do not know what liability the federal Government is assuming. I had hoped that the sponsor of the bill, Senator Fergusson—who, by the way, did a very good job of introducing it—would have been able to give us some information as to how much money would be involved in this operation. Quite obviously that depends on the number of students who take advantage of it, but some estimate could surely have been made.

In this modern day and age, if you offer a loan, interest free, not to be repaid for six or seven months after the student has graduated, I am rather inclined to think that many will want to take advantage of it. That is the spirit of the time.

What will be the total amount involved? Are we going to have from 20,000 to 50,000 students a year who will take advantage of these loans? The loans will be available up to five years. What is going to happen to the student who starts in at university, borrows a thousand dollars, then fails in his Christmas examinations and decides that the university is not for him? Will he have to repay the thousand dollars, and when will he have to repay it? I think these are practical matters associated with the bill upon which we should have some information.

There is another feature with which I wholly disagree in this proposed legislation. The federal Government makes available the money for loans, but who will determine who shall get the loans? The federal Government says, "We will advance an unlimited amount of money—" we are not told how much it is "—and we will advance it free." But then the provinces will, under the provisions of this act, create by order in council an authority who shall lay down the ground rules governing who shall be the recipients of these loans. Has the province any interest then in seeing that the loans are made with as great a degree of safety as possible? Not at all! If they lay down the ground rules under which a student has to qualify to get a loan, no one has a five cent piece of responsibility if the student fails to repay. I think that is a definite weakness in this plan.

It has often been a matter of comment that many students drop out of university if they fail in their Christmas examinations or in their final yearly examinations, and they are probably out for good. In the meantime, however, they may have received $1,000 by way of a loan. Some may continue and drop out in the second or third year—that has happened. If my memory serves me aright, the number of students who drop out has always been a matter of concern to the universities. Therefore, it seems to me that this is not the right way to go about it. I am not opposed to giving some assistance on reasonable grounds, but I think this is the wrong way to do it.

During the last election there was a good deal of talk about scholarships for university students, and if I remember correctly, the figure of 10,000 scholarships at $1,000 each was mentioned. I would infinitely prefer that scheme to the present one, and I will tell you why. First, we limit the amount of money that has to be provided to $10 million a year. We know what the commitment is. Secondly, we establish 10,000 scholarships, and a student has to reach a certain degree of excellence before he can get a scholarship. That is an incentive to the student to strive for excellence in his academic work and to try to make the most of his opportunity. What is the moral and spiritual effect of that upon the student compared to the one who gets $1,000 handed to him, interest free, which he may build up to $5,000 before his university term is finished? I think there is a definite difference there in the effect on the quality of the student's thinking.

We should provide the incentives, and let students aspire to reach them rather than provide assistance on a basis that gives no incentive whatever.

Another suggestion I would make, is that the duty of the parent as far as possible to supply the means for a university education is ahead of any duty of the state, which rightly pays for the student's primary education. I suggest that we might provide for allowances by way of income tax deductions for parents who are sending their children to universities. and I would make such an allowance pretty liberal. The parents are always interested, if they are good parents, in seeing the student succeed, and in this way we would establish a closer relationship between the student and the parent in this important phase of the student's career.

These are just a few observations off the cuff on this legislation. As I said a moment ago, I cannot work up any strong enthusiasm for it, but I do think, if the bill is going to committee—and perhaps it would be a good idea to have it go to a committee—that we should endeavour to find out what the total financial obligation will be. Is it going to be in the order of $40 million, $50 million, $100 million, $200 million? We do not know. I submit that is not a very sensible way for a legislative body to proceed in handling the taxpayers' money.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I will not delay the Senate long with my remarks. I believe the general outline of the bill has been excellently covered by Senator Fergusson, and I think she has dealt with most of the questions raised in the long debate in the other place.

I have been most interested in the comments made by honourable senators. I find myself in general agreement, first of all, with Senator Flynn when he reaches the conclusion, out of his experience and deep knowledge of the law and of Quebec, that this principle of opting out is a very dangerous one in terms of the survival of Canadian unity, because, as he has pointed out, it seems, as far as we can see into the immediate future, that it will always be the same province that will opt out. In the long run, in these matters where there is general agreement that national action is desirable to achieve some level of equality of opportunity across the nation, the opting out principle, I suggest, is going to work against equality of opportunity and it will, before very long, prove to be a highly divisive expedient.

I agree also with one of the points made by Senator Crerar, that it is a dangerous principle to allow a unilateral provincial decision in the spending of money that the provinces will not have to raise. As far as I know, this is the first time this principle has been introduced into legislation of this sort. It seems to me a development of the cost-sharing principle which, in itself, in specific applications has made a great deal of sense, because where there was a provincial decision as to spending in that type of legislation there was always a matching provincial responsibility to provide at least some part of the funds being spent. As I read this legislation, there is no such matching responsibility here.

I said a moment ago I see very divisive features in this type of legislation. In that respect this provincial spending authority and administrative authority, without matching responsibility, is also, I think, very dangerous. It has long been one of the objectives of all those interested in education to provide across this nation equality of opportunity in education; and I am wondering if this bill, instead of providing equality, will bring about very great inequalities of opportunity because, as I read the bill, the decision as to who, within certain limits, may qualify—18 to 25 and so on—is a provincial one and may vary greatly from province to province.

For example, consider a student who has just finished Grade XII in one province. That student has the option of going to university in certain provinces, or of continuing in high school into Grade XIII. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill can answer this question, because I do not think it was raised in the other place:

What are the rights of that student? The student has graduated from grade XII and is now entitled to go to certain universities, but not to others. If that student elects to take Grade XIII in high school, is he or she disqualified, because the bill speaks only of post secondary school education? I think this is a very important point because it may impose on many students a choice of university that is not the best for them, certainly not the one they would prefer. We all know there are universities which require Grade XIII and a certain standing in a certain number of subjects in that grade before they will admit a student. Is such a student denied the assistance in one province that he would be able to get in another by going to a university with lower educational requirements? This is an important question and, as I say, as far as I know it has not previously been raised.

One other point—and, honourable senators, may I say I raise this on behalf of and at the request of one of the very intelligent young men who surround His Honour at the moment. He is one of those who has certainly provided well the means of advancing his own education over the years. He asks: If the individual province is to decide what educational institution qualifies under this bill, will there be a difference in each province? Will one province assist this young man's further education and another refuse? This young man would like to go to an institution where he will get training in public speaking, radio and television announcing. Will he in this province be permitted to do that and obtain a loan under this measure, or will he not? Will a student in another province have that right which may or may not be denied this young man?

Here again, I see this danger of allowing very important decisions to be made at the provincial level in respect of the spending of federal money. It is quite possible you will have a race for some of this money on the part of some provinces—and I am not suggesting any particular province—and you might find other provinces will follow Senator Gershaw's suggestion, that it has to be a highly limited operation.

All we know, as I read the bill, is that each province will make up its own mind and will decide what scholastic qualifications a student requires. Each province will decide on its own what constitutes "need", and each province will decide what institutions qualify, not necessarily of higher learning, but post-secondary school institutions. If there is a definition of that, I do not know what it is. If it is wide enough to take in any institution which gives instruction past the high school level, that is one thing, and it will take in a very strange variety of institutions.

My criticism of the bill would be that in giving this discretion to the provinces, it is setting up no national standard, and yet national money is being expended. I say no more than that, honourable senators, because I believe it is urgent that this bill be passed. Perhaps some of the remarks that have been made here will be taken into consideration before the administrative rules are laid down under which these vast sums of money will be expended. I think the principle of the bill goes so far that perhaps that is not now possible. As I understand it there will be no uniform standard for, or no uniform control of the spending of this money.

I do not share Senator Crerar's concern that the federal fiscal liability in the matter has not been spelled out. It is my understanding that there has been very full disclosure of the possible costs to the federal Government. It is also my view that one of the very best qualities of our present Minister of Finance is that over and over again in introducing fiscal measures he goes to great lengths to assess and to state the estimated expenditure likely to be incurred in the implementation of such legislation. Senator

Fergusson gave me quite a clear indication of the possible liability of the federal Government. If I remember correctly, she said it might be in the region of a billion dollars in a decade. That is sufficient to indicate to me that the federal Government is aware that the costs of this may be very great in terms of credit, and it is easy to estimate from the remarks made by the Minister of Finance and others what the cost of administration, losses and interest will be.

I would hope, honourable senators, that this bill will have speedy passage because the time is now extremely short if its provisions are to be of advantage to the many thousands of young men and women who would not be able to enter university or other institutions of higher learning this fall were it not for the terms of this bill. I hope that the bill will not be held up unnecessarily.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I am sure we all agree that no young man or woman in Canada should be deprived of a university education for the lack of the necessary finances. Nevertheless, I am inclined to agree with Senator Crerar that this bill should go to a committee—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: —where we can be given some information which I, at any rate, would welcome.

In a matter of this kind one can only speak of the conditions existing in that part of Canada from which one comes. I am afraid I cannot become as enthusiastic as my good friend and colleague from Fredericton about the dire need for this legislation in my own province of New Brunswick. I may be all wrong, and I may not know what I am talking about—there may be a need in other sections of Canada, of which I have no knowledge—but in the Province of New Brunswick we have been well blessed, and perhaps more blessed than the other provinces, by the bestowal over a great many years of the wonderful Beaverbrook scholarships.

I had the great distinction and honour of serving for several years on the commission which dispenses these scholarships and I learned something of the conditions throughout the province in this respect. In the cases where we were obliged to decline applications we discovered that nearly all the applicants so declined were enabled to go to college by means of scholarships from other sources. One such source, as mentioned by Senator Fergusson, is the I.O.D.E. So far as the University of New Brunswick is concerned—and I include Mount Allison and other universities in New Brunswick, and I think I can include Nova Scotia as well—there are numerous scholarships available. These scholarships have been available to students who could not obtain assistance from other sources.

Furthermore, in New Brunswick—and I gather the same applies in other provinces, because only this afternoon Senator Flynn mentioned the Province of Quebec—they have a campaign for loans to students. On Friday last, in Fredericton, I happened to discuss this matter with the deputy minister who told me that in fact they have provision for such provincial loans to students.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: How much do they allow annually?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I don't know. However, that is one source.

Furthermore, on Tuesday last I happened to be talking to the president of one of our great chartered banks, and I was surprised when he said that they have student loan policies in their banks, and have had them for a number of years. I do not know what the conditions are for obtaining such a loan, but he said that the facilities have not been used and, in fact, right across the country only $300,000 or $400,000 had been sought for this purpose. Perhaps there are conditions in connection with this policy which are not acceptable to the students.

The great question in my mind is as to how great the demand is for this bill, and how many students in our country today are deprived of going to university because they cannot find the means to do so. I am sure there is much information not available to us today that could be given to us in committee.

There is another matter which troubles me somewhat, and in speaking on this I speak only for the universities with which I am familiar. I refer to the fact that the universities are overcrowded, and the necessity to increase facilities. If this bill succeeds in doing what we are told it will do, namely, to enable people to go to university who cannot at the present time afford to go there, then we will have to increase the number of universities. Every university in the land today has a campaign on for millions of dollars for capital funds to enlarge its present premises and to expand in order to take care of the students at present attending.

Another problem which comes to my mind —and this has been mentioned by the presidents of many universities—is the problem of obtaining teaching staff. Teachers are not available in Canada. Apparently they have all gone to the United States. If we can find in Canada today a group to take advantage of this legislation and go to university, then we have to enlarge our universities and find more teachers to take care of them.

These are just a few observations that came to mind as I was listening to the debate this afternoon. As I have said, I hope this bill will go to committee where we can get more information than we received today.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, the time is getting late and consequently I shall be rather brief in my remarks on this bill. It seems to me that we have had quite a love feast in the Senate this afternoon because everybody appears to support this bill. It is difficult to judge whether Senator Burchill, who spoke just before me, supports the bill or not, but at least he supports the idea of sending it to committee.

Well, to make a long story short, I believe that this bill is bad and irresponsible; it is simply a vote-catching gimmick and in my view does not deserve to go to a committee of the Senate. I say this because I believe this bill will be a bad thing for Canada. In the first place, it will be a bad thing in regard to the general position vis-a-vis the federal Government and provincial government's constitutionally. Secondly, I believe it is, and will be, a bad thing for the young people of this country. I make the prediction that this bill and the result of it will cause untold trouble. In so far as its being of future benefit to this country is concerned, I do not think it is worth the paper it is written on.

Somebody said that I am against it. Yes, I am against it. I am not going to recount the statements made by the honourable Senator Crerar. I will content myself with saying that I agree with everything he said, particularly in regard to the details and the principle of the bill.

Let me take first the example of the young people of this country. As all honourable senators know, the universities of Canada are full. They have as many students as they can manage to teach. We are building more and more universities, and we are acquiring more and more students. I agree with all of that, because that is a good thing. That is as it ought to be. But the method adopted by this bill is not the best way to assist in the education of university students.

To begin with, I repeat what has been stated so often, namely, that education is primarily a provincial responsibility. I quite understand why the federal Government would like to assist with education in such ways as providing money to help the provinces build universities, and to help educational institutions to build not only buildings but also dormitories through the C.M.H.C. I have supported projects like that because it is my opinion that legislation to these ends is beneficial to the interests of education and the interests of young people.

However, let me come down to cases. Senator Crerar referred to the fact that he taught school and did other work to further his education. That can be said of anyone here who has gone through university, whether they graduated 30 or 50 years ago. We all did the same thing. Our families tried to help us to the extent they were able, but what is of greatest importance, and what was of importance in respect to the character building of the people of this country, is that we all went out and earned money to at least help in putting ourselves through college.

I went through two universities, the University of Saskatchewan and the University of Manitoba. I did not teach school in the summer as many of my fellow students did. I worked in the harvest fields, in sawmills, and at any job where I could earn a few dollars to help put myself through college. I do not say that about myself alone because this was the method adopted by other university students whose education could not be subsidized completely by their parents and relatives. That is one of the great things that has helped to make our country what it is today. Our university graduates acquired a sense of responsibility by virtue of the fact that they themselves had to earn much of or the whole of the money required to put themselves through college.

Let me go a little further. I wonder what would have happened to me personally—and I am reasonably conscientious about my debts—if when I finished law school in not so very good times many years ago I had been faced with a debt of $5,000. A debt of $5,000 at a rate of interest of 6 per cent would have cost me $300 a year. Not only that, but I would have had to pay back the principal amount. Quite frankly, I wonder how long it would have taken me, or even whether I could have paid it back at all within a reasonable time.

That is the position in which hundreds and thousands of university students are going to find themselves after they have accepted this largesse of the federal Government. It is from the point of view of the students, honourable senators, the persons who will become obligated in this way, that I oppose this type of legislation. I repeat that I am completely and utterly against it because I think it is unsound.

My second point is this: Why should the federal Government take every opportunity possible to mix up these constitutional relationships between the federal authority and the provincial authorities in the field of education? That is causing, as Senator Crerar said, more trouble than he would ever have expected. It is causing trouble day by day, and it is going to cause much more. It is part of the reason why some provinces are opting out of these schemes. That is resulting not only from steps that the federal Government takes in the field of education, but from steps it is taking in regard to so many other affairs that are essentially within the constitutional authority of the provinces.

Personally, I am very concerned about this trend in Canada in general, but in a bill like this it is accentuated to an extent that I think is wholly unnecessary, and it will result in needlessly continuing the present constitutional conflicts in this country.

I make these few remarks to indicate that there are some people at least in the Senate who believe this legislation to be bad, and who believe most sincerely that it is not in the best interests of the country to pass this bill.

A moment ago I said that there are many ways in which the federal Government, and indeed the provincial governments, can assist in education. If the financial assistance proposed in this act is necessary, then it should be given by the provinces. The provinces are not paupers by any means. The provinces have the means to do this if they wish to do it, and if they believe it to be necessary or in the public interest. But I doubt very much whether any single provincial legislature, certainly in western Canada, would feel that it is necessary in the interests of education to pass legislation authorizing loans of this kind.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: What makes you think the provinces have those means, Senator Thorvaldson?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: They have the means.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: What makes you think they have?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I think the provinces have done a great deal in assisting students.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I am referring to financial means; I am not referring to the power. What makes you think the provinces have the financial means of doing this?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I say the provinces have great financial means.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Why have they not used them?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I think they have greater financial means than they indicate when they come to Ottawa, cap in hand, pleading for more and more financial help. I am not speaking of one government, but in the last 20 or 30 years nearly every government has seemingly been willing to pour out the largesse of the federal taxpayer to the provinces for anything they can think of asking for. Indeed, I believe that much more will be said about that particular subject matter in a day or two when, as I expect, another bill that is presently before the other place comes to us. However, that is a problem in itself. At the moment I am just referring to this matter of additional federal Government activity in the field of education.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I shall not speak in the same spirit that my predecessor did. I agree with this bill, and I ask that it be passed quickly.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The caisses populaires too, I bet you!

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Yes, sir.

In the last ten years we have instituted a loan called the "prêts d'honneur," and I can say that we have practically never lost a cent on a "prêt d'honneur."

(Translation):

A few minutes ago, the senator from Winnipeg mentioned the percentage of students in Canadian and American universities, as well as the results obtained both here and in other countries. When I heard Senator Thorvaldson say he was against the bill, I wondered what will happen here? We are told that education comes under provincial jurisdiction. However, in French the term "education" does not have the same meaning as in English. In French, we say "instruction, enseignement". "Education" is something else. Some people are well educated, but quite ill-bred, according to the French meaning, and some people are well-bred, but find it impossible to get an education. Therefore, the word "education" does not have the same meaning in both languages.

This morning, riding on the train, I read an article written in the same spirit Senator Thorvaldson spoke about. It cited section 93 of the British North America Act but not the exact words that appear in the official version. How then can we expect the public to be well informed?

On the other hand, there are newspapermen who claim the right to think as they please, contrary to common sense, and who want to spread their views throughout the country, refusing to those who pay their salaries the right to say anything.

Education will become more and more necessary from now on because of automation and uneducated people will have to be content with a low standard of living. But when one says that this matter comes under the provinces' jurisdiction and wonders why the federal Government is meddling, one suggests that the federal Government is giving the provinces the right to levy taxes.

It would be easy for the highly industrialized and wealthy provinces to get money for those scholarships, but would the less well off provinces be able to offer the same advantages to their young people?

If the less industrialized provinces buy industrial products from the wealthier provinces and enable them through those purchases to become more prosperous economically, is it not fair, sensible and just that the latter should make up for it by paying a little for the others? In that way, with taxes coming from the country at large, it is possible to help the less favoured provinces which are not as well off but which contributed nevertheless to our prosperity. It is neither more nor less than a restitution or compensation that is given them. Is it not logical and fair?

It is said that this bill interferes with the education of children.

We have had the Family Allowances Act for almost 20 years. That act stipulates that school-age children must attend school to be entitled to the allowances. Does getting those allowances from the federal Government mean that the latter is interfering in any way with education? Does the federal Government force the children who benefit from those family allowances to go to such and such a school? To learn history or geography from such and such a textbook? To use such and such a dictionary? Yet when that Family Allowances Act was enacted many people protested that the federal Government was interfering in a provincial field of jurisdiction. Try to withdraw those allowances today under the pretext that the act violates section 93 of the British North America Act.

The provinces claim that education comes under their jurisdiction. When I asked a question to Senator Flynn a moment ago, I did not mean to embarrass him; I just wanted to have his opinion. According to our honourable colleague, the fact that any province who wishes to do so may distribute the money on its own means that there is freedom of choice. According to him, the contracting out formula is only temporary and the senator claims that we should seek a more concrete and permanent solution. If there is one who agrees with him on that point, it is surely I. Yet, when one hears the discussions which are going on elsewhere, it is obvious that we still have a long way to go in that connection and that a permanent solution will not be found overnight. In the meantime, we have to rely on the contracting out formula. I agree that this is a make-shift solution.

Senator Flynn was saying that the option system was introduced a few years ago. And when Mr. St. Laurent was Prime Minister he realized the precarious situation of the universities and tried to find a solution to their problems. I will always remember the words of the premier of a certain province who said the universities have enough money. And this same premier admonished the universities not to accept future grants from the federal Government, otherwise provincial grants would be withdrawn. It was not even an option.

Hon. Senator Flynn: However, it was not a question of separatism.

Hon. Senator Vaillancourt: It was even worse.

It is difficult to build up a country as huge as ours, considering that the needs vary greatly from one province to the other, and reach perfect agreement. Do you want another striking example? No later than last week, I read in the papers that Laval University in Quebec City will borrow over $6 million from the C.M.H.C. in order to build student residences. Is this an intrusion in the education of students who will benefit from such a residence? As far as I know, no complaints were made concerning this loan; I am not aware of any editorial objecing to this assistance to students, and yet, this money loaned by a federal corporation will be used to build a student residence on the Laval university campus. This does not mean, however, that the students will have to buy such and such a book, or take such and such a course, etc. They are given the opportunity to attend university in order to complete their studies and to acquire knowledge, so as to earn a better living and to better serve their country.

So, in reply to those who say that the federal Government encroaches upon the field of education, I say that such is not the way I interpret the matter. But if the government said: You will study in such or such a university, you will follow such or such a course, or buy such or such dictionary—this would be interference in the field of education; but if it is only a question of furnishing the means, I say: Go ahead.

Our universities—Laval, Montreal, McGill, Toronto, Queen's, etc.—receive grants from the Ford Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation, the Russell Sage Foundation and others. What amazes me is that those grants of $50,000 or $100,000 are earmarked for the study of some specific problems, of some matters well established in advance. It is a kind of control over the education of our young people. Those grants come from a foreign country, from the United States and we are happy to accept that money; no one is criticizing. But now, the government of our country, to whom we pay taxes, is telling our young people: We are going to help you through scholarships and assist you in obtaining loans. You will study what you like and you will follow the classes you like. Many of our people take exception to that and they argue as though the Government of Canada were not our government; as though the money were not our money, as though the federal Government were hostile to us. I do not understand how people could see things that way.

As far as I am concerned, contrary to Senator Thorvaldson, I shall vote in favour of the bill and that, as soon as possible, because time is pressing, the month of September is around the corner.

The pessimists sometimes say: What will come out of all this? They discourage our young people. On the contrary, we should try through all possible means to educate a better class of people so that tomorrow our young people will be more highly educated and better than they are today.

(Text):

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, first of all, as Leader of the Government, I wish to pay Senator Fergusson a tribute for the comprehensive and effective way in which she presented this bill to the house. I wish also to thank all honourable senators who took part in the debate.

I feel this bill deserves the kind of attention it has had here today. I hope that it will go to a committee for further consideration before being passed. That is the practice of the Senate and we should not depart from it in this instance. I hope that we may finish our consideration of the second reading today so that it can get to committee tomorrow. Because of the circumstances and the lateness of the session, it seems to me that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce may be that to which Senator Fergusson should consider referring this bill.

While comment could be made on all of the various speeches, I was particularly impressed by that of Senator Flynn. His was a thoughtful, trenchant and important discourse, and we are all grateful to him for it.

We all have the highest respect and honour for the Constitution of this country, which is the British North America Act. However, I think also that people must be aware of the real facts of life, and constitutional lawyers as well as legislators must be included in that group, because along with respect for the Constitution, I feel there must be an acute awareness of national problems.

Senator Crerar has referred to the fact that we have had conflicts of jurisdiction since the beginning of Confederation that have been referred to the courts and have been resolved. This is very true. It seems to me that many of those legislative references, and the litigation that has been embarked upon in respect of the Constitution, have not always been of a character such as this bill, which is deemed to be and is intended to be helpful to a segment of the community.

Many times the conflicts in the courts as between federal and provincial jurisdiction have been conflicts in which the federal authority was attempting to assert a jurisdiction which it did not have and which the province desired to have in the interests of its fiscal or economic responsibilities.

This is not that kind of thing. In the field of education, we in the Senate through our committee on manpower and employment did a great deal a few years ago to indicate to the Canadian people the importance of the training of our young people, if as a country we were to survive. The reason, of course, is the competitive character of the economy in which we live and the kind of economies with which we have to compete in the world at large.

One of the things that came out of that committee, which I think was crystal clear to every member of the Senate, was the overriding importance of giving our young people all the training that we could give them, including general university training. We pointed up the importance not only of providing good technicians and scientists, but as well the importance of developing citizens of good sound judgment.

Through the years since Confederation, the problem in the field of education has confronted the constitutionalists, on the one hand, and the educationalists, on the other.

Perhaps I might with profit mention a few of the areas in which the federal authorities, recognizing the need for national standards, and the fact that education is a problem of national importance, have tried to help, without intruding into the field of provincial jurisdiction laid down in the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Do you mean that the British North America Act is of no importance in educational matters?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No. The honourable senator will not throw me off the path with that question, because obviously I do not mean that, and he knows it.

What I am saying is this, that in the area of trying to assist the universities, the federal Government now spends some $38 million a year on the capital grants formula. Originally it was on the basis of 50 cents per capita and now is at the rate of $2 per capita, because the need grew and continues to grow. The National Research Council spends some $23 million a year on scholarships for scientists, both undergraduate and graduate. The Atomic Energy Control Board spends over $1 million a year on research in universities. The Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act spends three-quarters of a million dollars assisting children of deceased service men in their education. The Canada Council last year spent $15,750,000 in providing capital grants to universities, and over $1 million in scholarships at universities.

Under the Technical and Vocational Training Act, which the Government supported by the gentleman opposite initiated a few years ago, $142 million is being spent. I think the Manpower and Employment Committee of the Senate had a good deal to do with pointing up the importance of that field.

Central Mortgage and Housing is spending some $27 million in loans to universities in respect of student residences. The federal Government is largely, or entirely, responsible for the education of Indians, for education in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon.

The federal Government maintains three service colleges for the training of young people for the armed services of this country. The children of service personnel, both at home and abroad, are assisted in getting their education. Honourable senators who have been to visit the brigade in Soëst, and the air force in Germany and in France, know the extent of the work done there, all out of national defence spending each year.

Senator Yuzyk, whose speech we all enjoyed this afternoon, indicated the value that came from the payments made under the veterans charter for the education of ex-servicemen.

Why do I talk about these things? It is because I think they prove that all parties and all governments recognize education not only as a local problem but also as a national problem.

Senator Flynn has suggested that perhaps these loans that are to be made should be made with the tutors or the guardians of young people who are to receive the loans.

Senator Crerar, I believe, has suggested that the parents should have something to say about guaranteeing or approving the loan. I think the idea in this legislation is that the responsibility for these loans should rest upon the shoulders of the young men and women who take them.

Senator Flynn raises the question as to whether or not it is legally possible for the federal Government to guarantee these loans to the students. Well, section 7 of the bill provides for a guarantee of the federal Government, not to the student, but to the bank. This is a minor point which we can look at again in committee.

I think the experience has been that the amount of student lending that the provinces felt they should embark upon has not been adequate to meet the requirements of the students. The amounts of individual loans are not large enough in themselves and the overall amount is not adequate for the needs.

A great deal of criticism has been levelled against the Government for invading a provincial field. I have already dealt with the one aspect of the answer to that proposal, namely, that this is not a provincial problem, this is a national problem. But I would point out that at the federal-provincial meeting in Quebec in April, and at subsequent meetings between federal and provincial ministers—and all of the provinces were involved—the proposals contained in this bill were discussed and approved. There is no provincial objection to the proposals that are here laid down.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I suggest there was one—by Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think not. I think the Government of Quebec, because of section 12, is quite happy to run its own plan.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But it was on that occasion that the Premier of Quebec threatened to bring the measure before the courts.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That was before the conference, I think. Again, this is something we can discuss in committee.

Senator Crerar wanted to know what the ultimate liability is under this measure. At the present time the fund provided is $40 million. I point out that of course this is not a grant that is made to each student; it is a loan the student gets from the bank at a low rate which the bank is prepared to charge in the interests, I think, of good business and, ultimately, good banking. It is estimated it will cost the federal Government this year something like $2 million for the interest that will accumulate on these loans made by the bank. It is expected that in five years approximately $200 million will be out on loan. The cost to the federal Government for the interest at that time will be proportionately higher. I think what is being done here is an investment in better educational standards and better educated Canadian citizens.

Senator Crerar has asked about failing students and drop-outs. Section 5 provides that when a student is no longer a full-time student he does not qualify for the loan, and within seven months after the time he has ceased to be a full-time student the interest begins to run and the loan begins to be repayable in accordance with the regulations that will have to be made.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: What I had in mind was, the student may have received a loan and then drops out. Then what happens to the loan? Is he still responsible for it?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Oh indeed he is.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If he refuses to pay it, what then?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Then he is liable to whatever action can be taken against him.

Senator Crerar also asked a question as to who determines who shall get the loans. The provincial authorities, the universities especially, have had a pretty broad experience over the years in dealing with applications for student loans of this kind. I believe a great many members of the Senate know this to be a fact and know a good deal more about it than I do.

The proposal is that these provincial facilities for weeding out the applicants for the loans and determining worthy cases and rejecting the unworthy cases can safely be left in the hands of these people who have had the experience through the years. This is new legislation; it is breaking new ground; but I do suggest that the experience in the provinces, in the universities, will be one that can be put to very good use as this develops.

I say to Senator Crerar—because we are talking about loans—that when the bill comes along to provide for 10,000 scholarships a year, at a cost of $10 million a year, I am going to suggest to him that he agree to sponsor that measure.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I inquire if we are to have a bill also for 10,000 scholarships a year?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Not before the end of this week, I would think.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If we are, I hope somebody will tell us where we will get the money to do all this.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That will be the duty of the sponsor of the bill at that time.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Then I shall not be the sponsor.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Let me say this, that the offer will be an open-end offer, since you spoke so eloquently on the proposal for scholarships this afternoon.

Senator Crerar has also mentioned the question of the duty of the parent as opposed to the duty of the state, and the fact that the parents' duty in respect of education takes precedence over the responsibility and right of the state. Of course, with this proposition we all agree; but he would reinforce the parents' responsibility and right by giving more liberal tax allowances. As far as that proposal goes, it is a good and valid one, except that it is felt that a good many of the students who would qualify for loans under this measure are probably from homes where a tax allowance does not mean too much.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They do not pay any tax now.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Probably the amount of money that is available makes their tax return a pretty negligible factor.

When it comes to trying to supply some help for the families of the poor who have children with the capacity to take advantage of a good education, I think a measure of this kind is a great step forward to realizing a very noble objective.

Senator Grosart talked about the problem of opting out, to which he objects very strenuously. When we come to consider the bill on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements there will be opportunities to deal with that question more fully than we should on this measure.

I think the pertinent questions Senator Burchill put should be discussed in the committee. I am suggesting that, in any event, because I am now encroaching on the dinner hour.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: There is very little left for the committee to discuss now; my good friend has done such a fine job.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, I am only an amateur.

I am concerned about what Senator Thorvaldson said. He said this bill is bad and irresponsible and that therefore it should pass. I do not think I have ever heard a nonsequitur in the Senate that upset me quite as much as this. Our duty is to look at the legislation that is put before us by the Government—

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Surely, I was not as bad as that.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): —and I do not think we pass legislation because we think it is so bad it is irredeemable. I am sure the honourable senator does not take that position seriously. I, for one, would not want a pattern of performance of the Senate based on that proposition. I am sure he would not either. I hope too that Senator Thorvaldson, for whom I have a very high regard, does not feel that the Government of which I happen to be a member takes every opportunity to mix up federal and provincial responsibilities in the field of education.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I understood that to be the import of his remark. If that is not so, then I am mistaken. However, I revert to what I said at the opening of my remarks. In a real world and with the kind of problems we face in this country today in respect of education, it seems to me we cannot allow ourselves to be poured into a straitjacket of 1867 without doing everything we can to try to make that constitution work in a way that is going to be effective in 1964. I think this measure might be a realistic approach to that ultimate end.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I call it 6 o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is 6 o'clock. Is it agreed that the sitting be resumed at 7.30 p.m.?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think 7.30 would perhaps be a little too early. Our usual time for meeting in the evening is 8 o'clock. I know the rules of the Senate provide for resumption at 7.30, but would it meet with the approval of the Senate if we adjourned now, to reassemble at the call of the bell at 8 o'clock this evening?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Fergusson speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I listened with deep attention to the debate that took place this afternoon on education and instruction. At the outset I must say that in my view no one of us has a higher sense of duty than the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) and it will not be offensive to my colleagues if I say that. I wish to congratulate the honourable Senator Fergusson for the excellent exposé that she made of the bill. She mentioned the objections that were raised in the other house with respect to this matter, and answered them.

When we are here together we legislate not only for our contemporaries but mostly for the coming generation, and if there is a bill that may affect to a certain degree the coming generation it is a bill providing for loans to students. I know very well, and you know too, that if it were not for the personal regard that I have for the Leader of the Government in this chamber, and for the Prime Minister in particular, I might use figurative language in dealing with such matters, but I will do my best to speak as serenely as I can tonight.

We heard this afternoon honourable Senator Crerar mentioning what had happened when he passed his examinations 70 years ago. I congratulate him. When I was admitted to the Bar my great joy was in not having to pass any other examination. But, should we not revert to 2,000 years ago, to the time of Quintus Horatius Flaccus, the great poet, to Virgil, to Cicero and all those others, if we do not go further back to Athens and Greece? At that time they had no automobiles, no radios, no television, they lived very simply but they had the time to think. The philosophers and their schools did excellent work. The classics should not be forgotten, because they were ideal teachers and professors; they were followed by a large number of disciples, and even today we quote them as masterly minds. They took time to live, they took time to think, and they were not embarrassed by the struggle for life. They were an example to mankind. At first the pagan philosophers and their students believed in divinities, they believed in mythology, they believed in the Supreme Being. Afterwards came Christianity. In the Old Testament the Jews believed in Jehovah. The Christians believe in our Lord. The trouble today is the agnosticism of many students. They seem to be indifferent to all beliefs. There is a school of thought in Montreal called the Mouvement Laïque Français, which insists on the recognition of atheism and agnosticism.

It is unfortunate. Some years ago we would never have believed that the time would come when the students would need to be told to have a strong religious belief in the Supreme Being, that it would lead to the respect of all laws. As you know, honourable senators, the basis of law was the ten commandments of God. If there have been more laws—and you know how many laws there are—it is precisely because of the weakness of man. The more wicked man is the more laws we have.

Now, coming to the subject matter of loans to students, I wonder whether this bill is good or not and I give the benefit of the doubt to the Government. I find that as the universities cannot admit all the students who want to follow courses, I wonder why we should encourage more students to get into universities which will be unable to receive them unless they are enlarged. I still believe that each government should expend only the money that it gets from taxation and that the provinces should pay for education from the moneys that they get from taxation.

What I regret about the moneys advanced by the Parliament of Canada to the provinces is that we parliamentarians, members of both houses of Parliament, cannot know what use is made by the provinces of that money. If the Parliament of Canada gives subsidies amounting to millions of dollars to the provinces for education and asks the provinces to render an account, that account will be refused.

The provinces refuse to inform the Government of the use that is being made of the federal money being granted to them for educational purposes. I find that it makes no sense. At least we should know what is done with the money.

In this case, loans are being made for the purpose of helping students. To help them in what manner? At the present time is education in Canada at the standard it is expected to be? Honourable colleagues, I have read in the press that students did not know who was Sir John Macdonald, the Prime Minister at the time of Confederation. They were not taught. A lot was lacking in the teaching of history. The same applies to many great names in history.

Is it possible to have a reform of education? I should use the word "instruction," as Senator Vaillancourt has aptly said, because instruction is the basis of education. Education is the complement of instruction. Instruction is the furnishing of the mind with useful information and useful data; and education is the formation of the heart. There is a place where instruction and education are given jointly, and that is in the homes where the good mothers teach their children the rudiments of both knowledge and prayer. There they teach and educate their children. Should it not be done in the university?

I recall a student of political economy of the University of Toronto, who was attending a lecture of a friend of mine. I asked this student, "How many are in your class?" She said, "The course is given in Convocation Hall, and 1,500 of us listen to the professor." How could any professor lecture successfully to 1,500 students?

It seems that education should start by the knowledge of fundamentals. I wonder if the time will ever come when the Parliament of Canada will have the authority to render an immense service to Canada by the reform of education on a sound basis?

At the present time, all that seems to be needed by the provinces for education is money, and it is money that is the basis of discussions.

There are some very important other matters that I will not speak of tonight, but which should be looked into and remedied, but nobody pays any attention to that. The only sign shown by the provinces to try to get more money from Ottawa is the big sign of the dollar. We live in strange times.

I will not oppose the bill, because if I do I will be accused of being against youth, and of being unwilling to promote the education of the young ones; but I wanted to make those remarks to show the importance of the matter, and in the hope that at the next conference between representatives of the provinces and the Government of Canada, they will insist on the teaching of fundamentals and of religious principles to youth. It is the best manner in which to ensure that the younger generation will do well in life.

One should be very careful about the teachers and professors who are the apostles of atheism and of separatism. There are many like that. This is not only at university level. Last week I mentioned the remarks of a former bâtonnier of the Province of Quebec, an outstanding lawyer who complained about professors who were giving a wrong kind of teaching to their students. All those matters are so vast it is impossible to deal with them in a few moments, but we should consider them honestly and in the hope of improving the condition of teaching and the learning of the youth of this country; and it would be the best service that could be rendered to them.

I repeat what I said in the first place, that I have the highest regard for all of you, and if at times some of you use vehement or violent language it must be due to enthusiasm, and the good nature of everyone should not be forgotten because of some exaggeration of language. I have been most moderate tonight in order to try to make you think of the importance of the problems that we have to deal with here, especially with regard to instruction and education.

Hon. James Gladstone: Honourable senators, as this is something very close to my heart I felt I should speak on the subject. When I made my first speech in this chamber I spoke of the importance of education. Since that time we have gone through quite a number of changes. At the time I spoke we, the Indians, did not have the right to vote, and there were many things we were not entitled to then that we are now. If I have understood the speeches made today on student loans, I hope that my people will be included in whatever legislation is being passed.

I have not the statistics before me, but I am proud to tell you of the way in which the Indians have accepted the introduction of education, not only on their own reserves but in outside communities. Many parents who five or six years ago did not want their children to go away from their reserves to be educated, now tell me, "We want to send them to schools outside, to get them acquainted with life outside our reserves." Anyone who would like to dispute that statement need only visit our reserves and find out to their own satisfaction. Integration cannot be forced on anybody, but I do think that whenever Indians are welcomed outside the reserves and accepted into the communities that surround them, they will readily respond. I feel that the federal Government and the governments of the provinces should get together on this and produce a positive program which would have the effect of making the Indians feel they are wanted.

At this point I want to take issue with my honourable colleague from Toronto-Spadina, Senator Croll, who, in the course of a speech which he made in Sudbury a couple of years ago, said that he would recommend that all Indian reserves be abolished, and that the Indians should be paid 20 times the value of their reserves. I answered him, I think it was in the Windsor Star, and if I remember correctly what appeared in the paper was that he was foolish to say such a thing. In fact the actual words I used were that I thought he was crazy to say that, but the reporter put it down that I said he was foolish. In my view this sum of 20 times the value of the reserves should be paid to the Indians as of now to enable them to catch up with the things that were omitted in the development of Canada. The reserves should have been developed when the settlers came in, and along the same lines.

When I was a youngster of about 10 years old we had very good Indian people. When the terms of treaties were issued it was provided that there should be one cow or one calf to a family of one, and two or three to a family of three or four. This was promised in the treaties and the Indians responded by trading in their cayuses for cattle. They thought this was a good idea. I know from experience that the number of cattle owned by Indians in that fashion when I reached the age of 18 and left school was around 6,000 head. The Indians had reached that stage through their initiative and trading their ponies or cayuses, as they called them, for cattle. This situation remained until they started us farming, but not knowing how to farm, not having the proper know-how, it was a failure and our cattle were taken to pay our debts, and so we came down to nothing. But I am proud of the fact that since 1945 the Government of Canada have finally acknowledged that they could not extinguish the Indian race, and so they began to think in terms of developing them and helping them to fit into the present way of living. I am also proud to say that the Indians are responding in a wonderful way.

However, there are two things I would like to mention that should be corrected. The first is that while the federal Government has given the right to Indians to buy liquor, this is under the administration of the provinces. I think it should be done away with. It is an individual matter. The problem in this regard will never be cured in any other way. My reserve lies 20 miles from the border—and I trust I am not out of order in mentioning this because I feel it does come under the heading of education—and 17 people have been killed in that 20 miles because of the prohibition on liquor. If there had been the same law as you have, that a bottle could not be opened between the place at which it was bought and the residence of the buyer, then all those deaths could have been prevented. Do not tell me that we cannot take care of our drunken Indians when they come home—we know how to tie them up and lock them up. I think this is a restriction that ought to be removed.

I am happy to tell you, honourable senators, that in British Columbia where the Indians are given full rights I have seen them in lounges acting as respectably as any other person. There is no discrimination. I might add also that while travelling through British Columbia I found they had very nice homes. If they cannot stay in town to drink a bottle of beer, then they take it with them to drink at home. The old people who stay at home tell me that this is better, because when they sober up in the morning they know there is some fencing to be repaired. They have some fine irrigation ditches in that territory to be kept in repair. Many of them go to town at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and come home with another load on, but a lot of them are beginning to think they should take care of things at home. Psychologically that has had a very good effect. I found this same problem in Saskatchewan when they were given the same rights. The chiefs came to me at Moose Jaw and said: "We did not ask for this privilege. We do not want to stop it, but this is a problem we have to face at some time in the future anyway. All we want is better policing." That is all they asked for in Saskatchewan. I do not know how they are getting along, and I do not know what the neighbours think of the Indians in Saskatchewan. However, when I went to Saskatchewan I found conditions much better than they were five years ago.

I had been in Ottawa many times from 1940 to 1953, and in 1958 I was appointed to the Senate; these are the things that I thought should be changed in the Indian Act. There was a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Indian Affairs in 1959, and I asked some of my colleagues here, some of whom were Members of Parliament in those days, if they would help. The only one who responded was Senator Horner.

There were two others, one of whom was an invalid and who would have liked to join the committee but was incapable. He has since passed over to the other side. However, there was one member of the Senate—I do not believe he is here tonight—from British Columbia, who said: "I will not be made a fool of again." We made our recommendations in 1946, 1947 and 1948 and not one of them was acted upon.

Honourable senators, all I am doing is bringing this to your attention. I do not know whether I am speaking out of turn, but I think that this chamber, composed of the champions of those who need help, should set up a committee to administer the Indian Act and to recommend amendments to it from time to time. Some sections of the Indian Act need amendment as time goes on, and I cannot think of a better place in which that work can be undertaken than this chamber.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I think the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) in his speech this afternoon gave excellent replies to most of the questions raised by those who have spoken in this debate. I find he has expressed more articulately than I could have done my own reactions to the statements made by those who criticized the bill. I agree with all he said.

Honourable Senator Crerar mentioned one or two things that I omitted to speak about. In particular he asked the length of time that borrowers will have in which to pay off the debt. The period is ten years. I regret very much that I neglected to mention it while I was explaining the bill.

Honourable senators, if the bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I have been consulting with the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce (Hon. Mr. Hayden) who has told me that the committee will meet tomorrow morning at 9.30. Notices have been sent out, but I thought I should mention that fact at this time.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-6, to incorporate the Bank of Western Canada, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

Report adopted.

MOTION FOR REFERENCE BACK TO COMMITTEE NEGATIVED

The Hon. The Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Leonard, seconded by the honourable Senator Paterson, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by honourable Senator Thorvaldson, in amendment, that the bill be not placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for the consideration of further evidence in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator McCutcheon, seconded by the honourable Senator Thorvaldson, in amendment, that the bill be not placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for the consideration of further evidence in relation thereto. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: No.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I think I should make it clear that I am not opposed to the incorporation of new banks. I propose to vote in favour of the third reading of the bill to incorporate the Laurentide Bank of Canada, and it may be that I can be convinced that I should vote in favour of the third reading of the bill to incorporate the Bank of Western Canada. But my concern and, I think I can safely say, the concern of a number of honourable senators is that we are passing legislation which will permit two or three people to control a bank.

I have before me the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce dated Wednesday, May 6, 1964, and I will read from page 63 which contains some questions I put to Mr. Stevens and his answers thereto:

> Senator McCUTCHEON: Then I think the answer to my question follows from that, that you and Mr. Mollard and Mr. Bell are in a position to sell the control of British International Finance (Canada) Limited to any person you choose.
> Mr. STEVENS: Yes.
> Senator McCUTCHEON: Your answer is "yes"?
> Mr. STEVENS: Yes.
> Senator McCUTCHEON: In selling that control you would thereby transfer effective control of Wellington, effective control of York, and possibly effective control of C.F.I.
> Mr. STEVENS: I think if you use the word "effective" it is generally true, yes.

Honourable senators, I am not without some experience in business, and "an effective control" is usually effective. Then I asked:

> In doing that, you would dispose of the effective control of 433,000 shares of the new bank.

I should interject that that is 43.3 per cent of the authorized capital of the new bank. Mr. Stevens answered:

> Yes, if you follow your line of reasoning:

My next question was:

> Yes, we are following it; and the answer is Yes or No.
> Mr. STEVENS: Yes.
> Senator McCUTCHEON: Would you consider that 43.3 per cent of the shares of a bank held by one group would constitute effective control of the bank?
> Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

I will not pursue that phase of the matter any more than to say that was the position when we decided to discontinue any further consideration of this bill in committee, and we decided, having considered it clause by clause, that we would not consider the preamble but that we would have it on the agenda for each meeting of our committee—leave it to the sponsor to move approval of the preamble when he saw fit to do so.

Now, honourable senators, I think I can say without any question of contradiction that it was this examination, and other honourable senators engaged in it, that resulted in the Laurentide Bank coming in a few weeks later and completely changing the method in which they were going to set up their share capital.

In the light of that, on Wednesday last the sponsor of the bill moved that the preamble be considered. I will not read at great length from the evidence of the report of the proceedings. What the sponsor of the bill said was:

> Since the evidence of Mr. Stevens and Mr. Coyne was given, they have advised me—

And I am coming back to this.

> —that Stevens Securities Limited has sold 10 per cent of the outstanding common stock of Canadian Finance and Investments.

What honourable senators must remember is that this is a pyramid, which stands on its apex, not on its base. I will refer to what the apex of the pyramid is. There are three companies involved that grow out of this very small company—one is York Trust, one is Wellington Trust, and one is Canadian Finance and Investments. So what the sponsor of the bill said last Wednesday night was that Stevens Securities Limited, which is the family company of Mr. Stevens, who is one of the promotors of the bill and will be one of the provisional directors if the bill is passed, has sold 10 per cent of the outstanding common stock, common shares, of Canadian Finance and Investments. I will come back to what that means in a moment.

He says:

> They sold it to Empire Life Insurance Company, and Stevens Securities Limited and British International Finance (Canada) Limited, which were at the base of this—

I interjected:

> This pyramid standing on its point.

Senator Leonard went on to say:

> Well, they believe they no longer have control of that particular company.

Senator Leonard made quite a long and persuasive statement, and other honourable senators spoke, and then Senator Leonard made another statement which, when I come to deal with the capitalization of Canadian Finance, puzzles me a little. He says:

> As a result of the sale of 10 per cent of the shares of that company—

Referring to Canadian International Finance.

> to the Empire Life, they—and I presume he refers to the Empire Life.

> —propose to take over a further treasury issue of deferred shares that would be at least 10 per cent of the shares of the bank.

There is some confusion there. As I shall point out presently, there are no deferred shares authorized for Canadian Finance, unless they have been authorized since the last time the witnesses appeared before us, and if they have been, we should have the witnesses.

I made this statement:

> I was going to suggest earlier that we do not consider any of these bills tonight, because as you yourself, Mr. Chairman, said honourable senators would want to read the evidence that we had today, they would want to read the transcript and, as I say, I understood the sense of the committee some weeks ago was that until we had all the evidence on hearing the applications we would consider none of them. Now I take it that there has been a change in the situation . . .

The chairman assured me there had not been a change, and I accept the chairman's word implicitly. I then went on to say:

> All I say is that I am not satisfied that the sale of 10 per cent of the shares by a company with—I have not got my notes or my papers with me—

I have got my papers tonight.

> —the sale of 10 per cent of the shares of a company which is obviously not a top company or, as I described this group, not the bottom company, to the Empire Life, represents a substantial change in the control, which I object to.
> I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the basis on which this application has been made to us is now being substantially changed, as Senator Leonard suggests, then we should call the witnesses back and let us find out where the control really lies, who really controls this company, because the company which it is alleged 10 per cent of whose shares will be sold to Empire Life, is not the top controlling company in this group. As far as saying that the Treasury Board will have an opportunity of looking over this, the Treasury Board is not concerned with the things that we are concerned with in this committee. The Treasury Board is only concerned with "how much money have you got paid in and how much money have you paid to the Minister of Finance." There is no suggestion that there be any Government legislation to delineate Canadian control of any bank. There is some suggestion that the Minister of Finance said there may be legislation to delineate what foreigners may own. And I say that if there has been any substantial change in the proposals of the petitioners for this bill, then they should come before us, we should hear the evidence and they should tell us what they are.

Now, honourable senators, this is my position. Obviously, there has been an important change in the financial arrangements, because I accept the word of the sponsor of the bill implicitly. My position is that I want to have the sponsors come and tell me what those changes are, that they be subject to the type of cross-examination to which we obviously cannot subject the sponsor of the bill.

I could go one step further, and I think when I am through honourable senators will understand why I might go one step further. I can say I would like to have the President of the Empire Life here, and I would like to know who controls the Empire Life.

The sponsor of the bill has his own suspicions and I have mine, and if we are merely substituting one additional individual, then it does not change my basic objections to incorporating a bank which formerly we thought was going to be controlled by three persons, but now is going to be controlled by four. As far as I am concerned, that does not change my basic objections at all. That is not the extent of dilution in which I am interested. Let us see what is really happening. I do not want to waste time reading the evidence, but all this can be documented.

As the proposition was put before us, the York Trust Company was going to purchase 33,000 shares of the new company; Canadian Finance and Investment, if that is its name, was going to purchase 150,000; Wellington Trust was going to purchase 250,000; and, as I have read, Mr. Stevens in his evidence admitted that he regards himself as having effective control over those three companies, he and his two associates—and that represents 43.3 per cent of the authorized capital of the new bank.

Now, there is another change which has been suggested in the holding—no change suggested in the holdings of the shares in the bank but in these three companies. These three companies are still going to hold—because these are representations made to the public in prospectuses that have been issued, and trust certificates have been sold on the basis of them—43.3 per cent of the shares of the new bank, if it is incorporated.

There is also no suggestion by the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Leonard) that there will be any change in the control of The Wellington Financial Corporation, Limited; it will continue to be controlled by British International Finance (Canada) Limited, and those two companies will have 283,000 shares of the bank, which is 28.3 per cent.

What is this great change that has happened to change control? My honourable friend said, and I admire the way he said it, "They consider they will no longer have control of Canadian Finance and Investments Limited." They may consider that, and what I and other honourable senators consider, can be completely different things. However, what he said was that there had been sold 10 per cent of the equity of Canadian Finance and Investments Limited by Stevens Securities Limited—Mr. Stevens' personal family holding company, which he admits he does not control, and no father ever controls his own family holding company, although Mr. Stevens agreed he would have great influence in the company. They have sold 10 per cent of the outstanding common shares of Canadian Finance and Investments Limited to the Empire Life.

I think we should look at the prospectus of Canadian Finance and Investments Limited, of earlier this year, clause 29. This of course is signed by Mr. Stevens and his associates. This is what it says:

> There are no persons who by reason of any agreement in writing are in a position to or are entitled to elect or cause to be elected the majority of the directors of the company. British International Finance (Canada) Limited, Stevens Securities Limited and James E. Coyne, by reason of beneficial ownership of securities of the company could by voting together elect or cause to be elected the majority of the directors of the company.

The evidence will show—and I am not going to go through the evidence, but I make this statement—that when Mr. Stevens was questioned he agreed that in the final analysis, once the financing was done which this prospectus is related to, British International Finance (Canada) Limited and Stevens Securities Limited could elect a majority of the directors, that they did not need anyone to assist them.

If the capital has been changed, all I am asking is that the witnesses come before the committee and tell us. The capitalization of Canadian Finance and Investments Limited—I will not worry about preferred shares, because they do not vote except under special circumstances and when dividends have been in arrears for a period. I will just deal with the issued voting capital, 400,000 shares of Class A without nominal or par value, which carry 400,000 votes, or one vote apiece, and 50,000 common shares, without any par value, carrying 20 votes each, one million votes. So the total votes, if everybody is present at a shareholders meeting, is 1,400,000 votes.

Here we have two parties, one British International Finance (Canada) Limited, the other Stevens Securities Limited, who on the sixth day of May agree that once this financing is done, which has been done, they control this company which in turn will own 18 per cent of the shares of this bank. If they control it, they must have had something in the order of 700,000 votes; and of course somebody paid $3 million for the Class A shares and they carry one vote apiece. For the common shares somebody paid $123,000, and they carry 20 votes apiece or one million votes, out of 1,400,000.

My arithmetic may be a little faulty, but I assume that what Mr. Stevens meant was that he and his associates controlled something in the neighbourhood of 700,000 votes.

When the sponsor of the bill tells me that Stevens Securities Limited, not British International Finance (Canada) Limited, but Mr. Stevens' personal holding company, sold 10 per cent of the shares, I do not know what 10 per cent he has sold; but if he sold 10 per cent of the Class A shares, he sold 40,000 votes. If he sold 10 per cent of the common shares, he has sold 100,000 votes. I say that in neither case were Mr. Stevens and his associates justified in communicating to the sponsor of the bill the statement which the latter made, that they feel they have no longer control of this company.

I do not want to labour the matter, but I would like to refresh the recollections of honourable senators who have read the evidence, with the fact that the bottom company, as I call it, which stands on the apex and has the pyramid going up around it, is a company having, according to its latest prospectus, a capital of 268,000-odd Class A shares with a stated value of $1,822,000-odd, and of 64,236 common shares for a paid in capital of $194,564.

It is through that latter holding of $194,564 that Mr. Stevens and his associates control these other companies.

May I say that I am not being critical of them; indeed, I might even be envious of them. I am simply saying that I regard it as improper in the circumstances that we should put this bill on the Order Paper for third reading tomorrow, that the appropriate thing to do is to ask the sponsors to come back; they have obviously had some second thoughts in the light of the examination in the Banking and Commerce Committee, and we should ask them back here on Wednesday morning and let them talk to us a little further. Have they really diluted control, or have they brought a fourth gentleman in? What is the situation? When we know the facts, we will vote.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, as seconder of this motion, I just want very briefly to make my position clear in regard to this bill. I will include the Laurentide bill also in regard to my actions concerning them.

I have continuously, since the two bills came into this house, supported them in principle. I have never suggested that there should not be more banks in the country. Indeed, I think it would be a good thing to have additional banks in Canada. On the other hand, I think it is the duty of Parliament, and particularly of the Senate to see that the capital structure of a bank is proper, is appropriate, and that it gives a reasonable percentage of power to those people who buy shares in a bank. In other words, I believe it is reasonable to say that we should not incorporate a bank where a few dollars, or one or two hundred thousand dollars, at the bottom of a pyramid can effectively control such an institution.

I may add that I happened to be chatting to Mr. Stevens after the first or second meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee on this bill, and we were talking about the question of capitalization. I said to him, "I take it for granted you will have these questions of capitalization and effective control remedied. As far as I am concerned, that is the only objection I have to your bill, and I am sure you will find a method of doing so."

I am aware of the arithmetic we have received tonight from our colleague Senator McCutcheon; I have followed the pages of the Hansard reports of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce meetings, and I believe that his arithmetic is correct.

I want to say this: I find there are 2,060 holders of shares in this bank in my own province of Manitoba. Consequently, apart from other factors, I feel I have a responsibility to see that the voting power of these residents of Manitoba is not unduly diluted by the manner in which others have very much greater voting power for really less money. As I understand it, the fact is that the people at the bottom of the pyramid—namely, the people who control British International Finance (Canada) Limited, the people who own the common shares of that company which carry 10 votes each—for an investment of some $194,000-odd, have a 43.4 per cent voting interest in this bank. I think we all recognize that a 43.4 per cent voting interest in a corporation of that kind represents control of that corporation.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In what the honourable senator is saying, is there the suggestion that the prospectus which was issued on the offerings to the public of trust certificates—which, if a charter were granted, would be converted into shares—did not disclose the various interests, and that some information was concealed?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: No, I do not suggest for a moment there was anything concealed, but I read from page 62 of the verbatim report of the Banking and Commerce Committee for May 6, 1964. It is only the end of Senator McCutcheon's question which is relevant, so I will not read it all. He asked, in part:

> There is no difference in the shareholdings as between those two dates. It shows that there are 268,013 Class A shares issued and 64,236 common shares, the value attributed to the common shares being $194,564. What is the difference between those two classes of shares?

Mr. Stevens replied:

> Solely voting, and the Class A are participating. They get an initial 20 cents per share dividend, and then when the common get an equal dividend they are equally participating. I say "solely voting" in the sense that the common have ten votes per share and the Class A one vote per share.

I suggest to honourable senators this is one of the main factors which gives this undue power in this proposed bank to just a few people. Consequently, I support Senator McCutcheon in the request that these gentlemen be called back as witnesses so that we can find out if they have made an appropriate change in this capitalization with which the Senate can be satisfied. All that is involved is simply for them to let us know definitely whether these changes have been made which I am sure most of the senators who are members of the Banking and Commerce Committee desired to have made in this case.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, as chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee that heard the evidence and made the report, I am not proposing to take sides in anything that I say here; but there are a few things that the honourable senator who preceded me said that bother me a bit.

He spoke about his interest in the 2,000-odd shareholders from his province, and he was concerned as to whether there was any dilution of their interest.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Just their voting interest.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, their voting interest.

Well, a prospectus was issued in connection with every offering of shares in relation to this bank. Those materials were filed before us and were discussed. I think I can assume, and my friends would agree with me, that that material disclosed the voting interests.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: It certainly did.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. And if it did not the prospectus would not be a proper prospectus on which to offer the shares to the public. Therefore, we must assume there was before this committee, as there was before the people who purchased these shares or bought trustee certificates, the information as to the disposition of voting.

Certainly, on the basis of any evidence we have had, even including the statement made by the sponsor afterwards, it could not be said of anything that was done that there was a dilution of the voting interest of a bloc of shareholders from Manitoba because, if what was done was as related by the sponsor on the last occasion before we voted, the effect of that would be to spread over a larger number of people a quantity of voting shares that were more concentrated before that.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Do you not think you are engaging in dialectics on this matter?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No, I do not think I am engaging in dialectics on this matter as much as my friend was doing a little window dressing when he used the word "dilution". As chairman of this committee, I am saying that the evidence was before us and showed the position of the voting strength, and we were told at the last meeting there was some change in that which reduced the concentration. We had the evidence—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: All we want to know is what the change was.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If the Senate wants that evidence then, of course, it will refer this matter back to committee. That is the privilege of the Senate. I am not arguing at this time against any course of action the Senate might take in relation to this bill and the further duty of the committee. What I am saying now is that in regard to the consideration this committee gave to this bill which was before it, every factor is in evidence and it is there for every person to read and appreciate, and—

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I read it. Indeed, I read from the evidence here.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: At least when I interrupted my friend I asked a question and I asked his permission to ask that question, which is more than he is doing now. Two of us cannot talk at the same time.

What I am saying is that all the materials were there. If you want confirmation of the statement which the sponsor made, it is the privilege of the Senate to ask for it. I am concerned that every factor be exposed to the Senate, and it is for the Senate to make the decision. In the light of that, if the Senate feels the measure should go back to committee, that is the responsibility of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Might I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, I would be happy to hear one.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Has there been any substantial change in the capitalization as revealed on May 6, about which the committee in general was very unhappy? Has there been any substantial change related to the committee in regard to the facts appearing in the Hansard that I hold in my hand for that date? If so, can you tell the Senate what those changes are?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not follow my friend's question. Was there any substantial change?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Has there been any substantial change in regard to the facts related before your committee on May 6, and has there been any substantial change in the capitalization as indicated then?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I know of no evidence other than that given before the committee, and in that evidence I know of nothing which points to any substantial change as a result of which the number of issued shares was substantially increased, or increased at all.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, this bill received first reading last February, and I moved second reading in March. So it has now been under consideration by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce of the Senate for approximately five months.

When we were debating second reading I agreed with Senator McCutcheon for a delay pending the receipt of the report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance, the Porter Commission. In due course that report was issued, and there was nothing therein that would in any way derogate from the application for the charter of the Bank of Western Canada. On the contrary, the whole tenor of the Porter Commission report was in favour of more competition in the banking field.

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce then proceeded to consider the application for a charter for the Bank of Western Canada, and to hear the evidence. Once again, at the suggestion of some senators a delay occurred pending the hearing of evidence in the consideration of two other applications for bank charters then before the Senate, the Laurentide Bank and the Bank of British Columbia. All sections of the bill concerning this bank were passed, and the preamble was left for still further consideration.

I point these matters out because I think all honourable senators have had ample time to consider whether or not this application for a charter for the Bank of Western Canada should proceed out of this chamber. Now Senator McCutcheon raises this evening, as he did at the hearing before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, the question of concentration of control in the hands of a comparatively small group representing the sponsors of this bank. As he has said himself, he is not inexperienced in business. He was very modest when he said that. I cannot refrain from quoting the remark of one of my colleagues in the Senate after that hearing in which Senator McCutcheon questioned the witnesses before the committee on stock ownership in the proposed Bank of Western Canada. My colleague said it sounded like Satan rebuking sin.

It was quite obvious from the evidence brought out that there was, if not effective control in this comparatively small group. The explanation they gave was certainly satisfactory to me, and I thought it would satisfy the majority senators.

When they decided last year—because the first advertisement in the Canada Gazette was published last December—on this venture of incorporating a new bank in Canada, there had not been a Canadian-owned bank incorporated in 52 years, and consequently it was a venture that required considerable courage, initiative and energy, as well as money. It had been said by the late Mr. James Muir, President of the Royal Bank of Canada, that anybody who dared to start a bank in Canada would require at least $10 million.

This particular group have been very successful in their enterprises in the financial field. With these companies that have been mentioned here, Wellington Financial Corporation, York Trust and Savings Corporation, and others, it was natural that the sponsors should turn to those companies for the purpose of initiating the incorporation of the bank. It was also very much in their minds that they wanted the broadest possible public ownership, particularly in western Canada, because they had decided this was to be primarily a bank of western Canada with its head office in Winnipeg. If they were to succeed in getting this very substantial sum of money, as to which I am sure many people had doubts that it could be raised, then they themselves would have to stand behind this incorporation with their own money and their own resources. They went ahead.

While there have been various percentages mentioned, and various discussions as to what is control and what is not control, may I put a few facts before the Senate. Senator McCutcheon is aware of them, but I think Senator Thorvaldson is probably not fully aware of them. All of the shares subscribed for, the 43.3 per cent listed here, by Wellington Financial Corporation, by British International, and by Canadian Finance and Investments, are all being paid for in cash.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Do you suggest I am not aware of the fact that all the shares are paid for in cash?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I must say you left the inference that something like $197,000 was not dealt with, whereas all the money being put up by Wellington Financial Corporation is being put up in cash for the purchase of the shares. When they talk about what is control and what is not control of the company—

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: On a question of privilege, my honourable friend suggested I left the inference in regard to those shares. I want to remind him that what I said on the point was material I read from the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, namely, Senator McCutcheon's question and Mr. Stevens' answer. All I said on that point was read from that report.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: My honourable friend said that the rights of our friends in western Canada were completely diluted. That was completely wrong. Everybody who subscribes to these shares, whether a trust company or Mr. Jones of Saskatoon, pays exactly the same.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Taking the bottom of the pyramid which consists of the common shares, you have a much smaller investment, and while people like holders of the common shares of British International Finance (Canada) Limited have a very small investment, they have greater control than individuals who hold other shares.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: They pay exactly the same amount for the shares of the bank.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I accept Senator Thorvaldson's point that he was not trying to suggest there was any dilution so far as the purchases by these institutions or the bank itself are concerned. Mr. Stevens told the truth and gave his evidence very frankly. He gave the name of all shareholders, and mentioned the particular instance where there was extra voting power with Canadian Finance and Investments Limited, which was subscribing for 15 per cent of the shares in the Bank of Western Canada.

As Mr. Stevens and Mr. Coyne explained, it was their desire to make sure this bank was properly organized, and started, and that it was going to be run on as sound lines as they themselves could make it. When they became aware of the fact that there was some disposition in the minds of some senators that this question of undue concentration or control was a factor, they felt that they should, consistent with the organization of the bank and consistent with the planning of its operation, make some move towards a lessening of that concentration. That was the extent of the information I gave the committee last week. I informed the committee of what they had done, and what they planned to do in that respect; that is to say, the trend towards a lessening of their share ownership and share control that was in their minds.

The only actual step that had been taken at that time was the sale of 10 per cent of the common shares, which includes the voting power in so far as Canadian Finance and Investment Company is concerned, to Empire Life.

As I said before, one cannot always say exactly what is effective control of a company. Somebody might own 49 per cent of a company and still not have effective control because the 51 per cent was against the 49 per cent. Similarly, you may find in some situations that 10 per cent is an effective control depending upon how widespread the ownership of the remaining 90 per cent is, and the inability to organize that 90 per cent in any way as against the 10 per cent.

Here we have had a large issue of shares to the general public, primarily in western Canada. We have shareholders such as Great West Life Insurance Company and other life insurance companies, and well-known investment companies. The issue was placed through a group of investment dealers. I would suggest that in those circumstances it would be difficult to say that any particular share ownership in any group of less than 50 per cent could not be conclusively regarded as being control in this particular situation.

However, in moving towards a lessening of their own interests they have sold 10 per cent of Canadian Finance and Investment Company—that is, the common shares—to Empire Life. As far as Stevens himself and his particular group are concerned—that is, Stevens Securities and British International Finance (Canada) Limited—all I can say is what I said last week, that they do not feel that they now control British International Finance (Canada) Limited.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Excuse me. I am sorry, but I think the honourable senator made a slip of the tongue. He is not saying they do not feel they have control of British International Finance?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I meant Canadian Finance.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: You said "British International Finance."

Hon. Mr. Leonard: If I said that then I was wrong. It is Canadian Finance and Investments Company which, in turn, will be subscribing for 15 per cent of the shares of the Bank of Western Canada.

Again, they have indicated their intention—and they will put this in any form that might be required—to make a further issue of treasury shares. Perhaps I should say to Senator McCutcheon that I think the Hansard report is not exactly correct in respect to what was said. There will be an issue of treasury shares, or a secondary issue of shares, their intention being to reduce their own share ownership by a further 10 per cent. Then, ultimately, as and when the bank is in operation, they plan to make a further dilution of their own share interest.

As far as I am concerned, and I think as far as the Senate is concerned, it should be borne in mind that the Bank Act does not prescribe any percentage of ownership that any individual or any group of individuals may hold as a maximum in a chartered bank. Actually, at the present time the Mercantile Bank of Canada is, according to general repute, owned entirely by the National and City Bank, which is a nonresident institution. No one of us, I imagine, knows exactly what is the extent of ownership in any of the other chartered banks. I would think if one went back over the history of our chartered banks it would be found that at various times, and probably at incorporation, there was of necessity a concentration of ownership pending the organization of the bank in order that it could get started.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And a sale of their shares.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Yes. Now, if there is to be any control on the extent to which any one individual, or any group of individuals, should hold shares in a chartered bank then that is something that should apply to all banks. It should not be just a case of the application of the views of any one senator, or group of senators, to this proposed incorporation. It should be in the Bank Act. As far as the sponsors of this bill are concerned, they are prepared to accept any such amendment that will be applicable to all banks.

This application for a charter, if it passes the Senate, will go to the House of Commons. The debate on it there will take some time. If, as and when it passes the House of Commons, the Treasury Board has one year in which to issue a certificate. Therefore, it may well be October or November of 1965 before the bank can commence operations.

All bank charters, including this one if it is granted, expire on July 1, 1965. The revision of the Bank Act will apply to this application just as much as it will to all the other charters. I suggest that any question of the matter of the extent of ownership in any one person, or in any group of persons, is not a matter—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I ask a question? Is this not the objection that we are asked to incorporate a Bank of Western Canada with control in the City of Toronto? That is the part that bothers me, and it has bothered the rest of us. I, for one, do not like it.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I can well understand Senator Aseltine's dislike of it. Unfortunately, it happens that at the present time the head offices of the major banks are in either Toronto or Montreal.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: You are overlooking Halifax.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: There is one head office in Halifax, but the senior executives of that bank are located in Toronto. Someone had to start this, Senator Aseltine, and it happens to be started by this particular group. The head office of this bank will be in Winnipeg. They have given me, and through me the Senate, the assurance that the majority of directors will be residents of Western Canada.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That will not improve the quality of the bank.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I would think it would improve the quality of the bank. I am in accord with that view. Furthermore, the majority of the directors will not be the nominees, directly or indirectly, of the group who represent this share ownership to which objection has been raised. In those circumstances, the bank will be a bank managed by a board of directors of whom the majority will be residents of Western Canada, and who will not be nominees of this particular group.

Honourable senators, in the circumstances it seems to me that the applicants are entitled to have this bill read the third time. As I said before, it is 52 years since any group of Canadians had sufficient confidence in their own country, and the initiative and the courage, to start a Canadian-owned bank. I would suggest, honourable senators, that the amendment be defeated, and the bill stand for third reading tomorrow.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the sponsor of this bill. What is bothering me is this. What cogency or relevance has all this discussion to the incorporation of this bank?

I have been concerned intimately in the incorporation of many companies. Provisional directors are appointed, but nobody asks who is going to control the company after it is incorporated. We all realize that it may be controlled by one group today and by another group tomorrow.

There was no concealment here. There was no undertaking that no further shares would be sold, so that those who control this bank at the moment, or who think they do, will continue to control it for all time. Nobody has suggested anything of that kind, that I know of. I see no relevance in this discussion to the incorporation of the bank.

We know that they intended to sell shares, and that those who bought them knew the capital structure of the company in which they were investing their money. If they did not, then it was their fault because it was very wide open. Everybody could have found all this out before they invested their money.

If we take the time to refer this back to the committee to find out something that is of no interest to us, what will we do? If we find that some shares have been sold, which we expected might have been sold, which changes to some extent the control of the company, well, what then? It has not been suggested that these new purchasers of the shares are disreputable people. I suppose that if they were escaped bank robbers or something of that kind we might hold our hand; but so far as we know the presumption is that they are as respectable people as the original ones. So if we call these people together and question them at considerable length, what of it? Where do we go from there? Are we then in any better position to say that this bank should be incorporated than we are now? We gave this matter thorough consideration, we voted on it in the Banking and Commerce committee with a very large attendance, and decided by an overwhelming majority to report the bill; and for my part I am ready to vote for it now and confirm the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if Senator McCutcheon speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I have had occasion before in this chamber to say how difficult it was to follow Senator Leonard—and the situation has not changed any tonight. Really the issue is not whether we should incorporate the first bank that has been incorporated in 52 years. We have a great choice of banks to incorporate this year and we will probably get one or two of them through. Therefore, I do not think we should worry too much about that.

I am not going to follow Senator Leonard through an argument which I think was 99 per cent irrelevant.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The whole thing is irrelevant.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I beg your pardon.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The whole argument is irrelevant.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Not mine, but Senator Leonard's.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: We did not expect you to say that it was irrelevant.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: No.

It is true there is nothing in the Bank Act which says how banks should be controlled by Canadians. There is nothing in the Bank Act which says how they should be controlled by anybody at the moment. I read the statements that I made as reported in the unrevised Hansard report in the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce last Wednesday night in that regard. This is not a matter in which the Treasury Board, without legislation, can consider, but I come back to the fundamental question. If the incorporation of banks were to be a routine thing, by which if you produced your $10 million—and actually under the Bank Act you have to produce a lot less than that—and if you walked in the door and signed the appropriate papers in the office of the Secretary of State and got the seal on the charter and paid in your money, then of course that would be quite different. But the mere fact that the applicants for a bank must come to Parliament means that Parliament is entitled to pass some judgment.

Now, if I might sum this matter up, as I see it, very quickly, it is this. Having heard the sponsors of this bank, there were a sufficient number of the members of the committee who were concerned about authorizing a charter for a bank which would be controlled by a very small group of people. Incidentally I am not very much impressed by that sale to the Empire Life because I have just now got the evidence of March 18, and at page 35 I see that the Empire Life is one of the large independent purchasers of bank stock. But putting that aside, there was evidence in the corridors and in the questions that were asked, that there were certain senators who were concerned about such an incorporation. I think the best evidence of that is the fact that the sponsors of the Laurentide Bank completely changed the formation of their capital structure from what had been projected, before they came to the committee. It was completely changed.

Now, all I am saying to the Senate tonight is, and this is all that is involved in my resolution, that the sponsor of the bill made certain statements. It is true we only have a preliminary Hansard report—I accept his statement that the report may not be completely accurate, and so on—but he stated, and he did not state it for any other reason than to persuade us to report the bill without amendment, that the sponsors of the bill felt they no longer had any control over one of four companies that are interested in this bill, because they had entered into a certain transaction. All I requested last Wednesday night and all I am requesting now, is that the sponsors of the bill come and tell us the story. Just as I refused to be cross-examined by Senator Farris, so I would not presume to cross-examine Senator Leonard. He is not a witness in this affair. Let us have the sponsors come, let us have them tell the story, and if the Senate then decides to pass the bill, the bill will be passed. But I say that we are accepting a very dangerous precedent, on an important point like this, where we have had witnesses who have appeared before us for two days, who present briefs at great length, if then on the ipse dixit of the sponsor—and I may say that the sponsor and I are old friends, and he knows that anything I say is not a reflection on him—if on the ipse dixit of the sponsor, we admit a material change in the evidence and put something through. The difference between now and 9.30 on Wednesday morning is not going to make or break the Bank of Western Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator McCutcheon, seconded by honourable Senator Thorvaldson, in amendment, that the bill be not placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for the consideration of further evidence in relation thereto. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion as amended?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour of the motion as amended, please say "content".

Some Hon. Senators: Content.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against the motion as amended, will please say "non-content".

Some Hon. Senators: Non-content.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the non-contents have it.

Senators Aseltine, McCutcheon, Thorvaldson, rose.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators.

Amendment of Hon. Mr. McCutcheon negatived on the following division:

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa

28 July 1964

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Emmett M. Hall, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 28th July, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

STAFF OF THE SENATE

PROTECTIVE SERVICE—SUMMER UNIFORMS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I call attention to a matter which I think is of some importance? All of us have been struggling against the heat and feel it rather severely, although most of us are dressed in very light clothes. However, I notice that the members of our Protective Service are dressed in warm, woollen clothes in this extreme heat.

It may not be possible to correct this situation quickly, but it should be noted by those who have authority in this matter, so that before another summer the members of the Protective Service may be dressed appropriately for the atmosphere in which we live.

I remember that some years ago the Toronto police were dressed in similar heavy clothes, and I had something to do in a small way with bringing what I considered to be common sense into the situation. I think the police of Toronto look very much better today in their summer clothing than they did in wool, such as is used by the bobby in London, and which was the standard which we all tried to meet at that time. The atmosphere of London is very different from that of Toronto, and still more different from that of Ottawa.

I trust that whoever has authority in this matter—and, Mr. Speaker, perhaps you have some influence—will study the problem and see that these men are dressed appropriately before another summer comes.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I think everybody agrees with what has been said by Senator Roebuck. I remember a year ago, when I was Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, it was moved that a change should be made, and somehow or other a kind of inertia overtook me, with the result that these men never had their situation remedied. However, Senator Smith (Kamloops), the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, has been actively considering this question. I think, as a matter of fact, in these days the idea of wearing heavy woollen uniforms, even in winter, for people working indoors is rather old-fashioned and antiquated, and that perhaps a new, lighter uniform could be devised that would serve for both summer and winter wear. I hope some action will be taken quickly.

Hon. Sydney J. Smith: Honourable senators, this was brought to my attention, but unfortunately by the time I got to work on it with certain members of the Internal Economy Committee we found it was impossible to do anything to correct the situation for this summer. I can, however, assure honourable senators that we are already acting with a view to having the situation corrected next year.

Hon. Vincent Dupuis: On this question of being too heavily clothed, I am reminded of when I was in the other place some years ago. One of the members moved that we should not be bound to keep our coats on in the summer while we sat in the chamber, and Mr. Speaker said to him that in London the members wore their coats and we had to follow the British custom. Then the member said, "Mr. Speaker, I move that you put your wig on like in London," and the whole matter was dropped.

Hon. James Gladstone: When coming down from my office to the chamber today I saw two ladies, and I said to them, "I envy you young ladies, you are so coolly dressed. I wish to goodness something could be done about the situation for us poor men."

PRIVATE BILLS

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA—THIRD READING

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the third reading of Bill S-6, to incorporate Bank of Western Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by honourable Senator Leonard, seconded by honourable Senator Paterson, that this bill be now read a third time.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, it will probably not surprise honourable senators if I say that I want once again to protest against this bill being given third reading at this time when, in my opinion, the Senate lacks information which is readily available if it chooses to ask for it, and which I think is very pertinent and might well influence honourable senators in their decision as to the ultimate disposition of this bill. In the circumstances I shall vote against third reading.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I intend to vote against it.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I was unavoidably absent from this house last evening, but had I been here I would have voted for the amendment moved by Senator McCutcheon.

I find it hard to understand why, when the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce of this house, which is a great committee, undertakes to investigate these applications for bank charters, it should not want to make its investigation as complete as possible. I do not think it is making its investigation as complete as possible unless it calls before it the president of the Empire

Life Insurance Company, and have him tell why in such a short time he made this very large and, to some, seemingly curious investment in this particular bank.

I have great respect for the integrity of the Empire Life Insurance Company. I had the privilege of knowing Mr. Percy Fell, its former president, for some years, and I have the privilege of knowing Mr. Jackman and, indeed, the privilege of knowing one of its former distinguished directors, Senator Norman Lambert. I recall, too, that this is the Canadian life insurance company that was founded by Sir John Macdonald and which only a few years ago was prevented from passing into foreign hands by the Canadianism of some of the people connected with it.

I must say that as a member of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce I would feel much happier in giving my support to third reading of this bill if I knew the committee was going to meet next Wednesday to discuss the matter further. After all, as Senator McCutcheon said last evening, what difference can it make to the life of this particular bank if we wait three or four days before giving our final decision?

I would like to know what is the connection between the British International Finance (Canada) Limited and the Empire Life Insurance Company. Surely these are almost elementary questions that the committee should have wanted answered before giving its final approval to this bill.

I think if you went across this country today and asked the average Canadian whether he thought the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce should have asked these questions and tried to get the answers to them, that Canadian would say, "Why, certainly. How can you avoid asking such questions?" This, I repeat, is something I find hard to understand.

I find it hard also to understand why my distinguished friend, Senator Leonard, last night did not immediately accept the amendment moved by Senator McCutcheon. Does any senator in this house believe that this was an unreasonable request? Is it unreasonable that we postpone for two or three days our final decision on this bill so that we can ask a question that should have been asked the other day in the first place? Surely, there would be no difficulty about it, and everybody would feel happier about it if we had this information before us. We do not have it before us.

I am going to support the third reading of this bill, but I would feel much happier, and I am sure every other honourable senator would feel much happier, if we had given this bill a little more investigation in the first place.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am sorry, but I do not think the honourable Senator Leonard can speak now because he has already spoken, having moved third reading.

It is moved by the honourable Senator Leonard, seconded by the honourable Senator Paterson, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: On division.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

LAURENTIDE BANK OF CANADA—THIRD READING

Hon. David A. Croll, for Hon. Mr. Cameron, moved the third reading of Bill S-13, to incorporate Laurentide Bank of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

CONGREGATION OF THE MARIST SISTERS—THIRD READING

Hon. Edgar Fournier moved the third reading of Bill S-38, to incorporate Congregation of the Marist Sisters.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to motions:

Hon. John J. Connolly moved that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Friday next, July 31, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill that we are expecting first and foremost is the bill on interim supply, which is being debated in the other place. Supply runs out on July 31, and I think it is proper and really incumbent upon the Senate to be here to deal with it at least on the last day of the period for which supply has been voted. I have no assurance whatever that the bill will be available to us on Friday, but if it is, I think all honourable senators would feel they should be here to deal with it. If we get it, I hope we can deal with it that day and pass it. If we do not get it, then it will be for the Senate to decide to what date we should adjourn thereafter.

I am hopeful—I always am optimistic about progress in the other place—and for that reason I have made this motion.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I am sure that we cannot take any objection to what the honourable Leader of the Government has said or to what he has proposed that we do. The reason is not only that we have an interim supply bill now before the Commons, which we hope to have here on Friday, but that we have no other business to do. I think that is the chief reason why it is proposed that we adjourn until Friday.

I agree with the leader, that the position is very uncertain. The business of this house, especially this session, has been most uncertain, not through any fault of our leader here or through any fault of the Senate but because it has been impossible to get business from the other place for us to transact. The business of this house has been well conducted, in my opinion, as far as the Senate is concerned. We make no objection to the adjournment until Friday.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would remind honourable senators that if the bill should become available sooner His Honour the Speaker has authority to recall the Senate. This we should keep in mind. The honourable the Speaker and myself consult about these matters and we try as much as we can to meet the convenience of all honourable senators. I know we are not completely successful in this effort, but we do try to accommodate honourable senators.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I move that the Senate do adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5.35 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Honourable senators, before the Senate adjourns, may I say that I have had a conversation with the Government Whip, from whom I understood that there would be no meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee this week. Since there are some of us who might not want to come to this house day by day if there is no business for the Senate to transact, could we, in those circumstances, be given reasonable notice of when the Banking and Commerce Committee is to be convened?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: I agree.

The Senate adjourned until Friday, July 31, at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

CONSUMER CREDIT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Otto has been substituted for that of Mr. Pennell on the list of members appointed to serve on the Joint Committee on Consumer Credit.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II of Wednesday, July 22, 1964, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Order in Council P.C. 1964-836, dated June 4, 1964, authorizing under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act, long-term financing by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation for the purchase from Canadian Vickers Limited, Montreal, Quebec, of engineering services and capital equipment by the President of India for use in the National Aeronautical Laboratory at Belur, Bangalore, India, pursuant to section 21B of the said act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English text).

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable leader if the amounts involved in the order in council are given?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, the amounts are not given on the list.

The list continues:

Order in Council P.C. 1964-984, dated July 2, 1964, authorizing under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act, long-term financing by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation for the purchase of capital equipment from Automatic Electric (Canada) Limited, Brockville, Ontario, by the Philippine Long Distance Telephone Company, Manila, Philippines, pursuant to section 21B of the said act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English text).

Order in Council P.C. 1964-1094, dated July 16, 1964, authorizing under section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act, contracts of insurance by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation for shipment of 350,000 metric tons of wheat to the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic prior to October 28, 1964, pursuant to section 21B of the said act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English text).

Order in Council P.C. 1964-1095, dated July 16, 1964, authorizing under section 21 of the Export Credits Insurance Act, contracts of insurance by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, for shipment of 200,000 metric tons of wheat to the Polish People's Republic prior to November 4, 1964, pursuant to section 21B of the said act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English text).

Consolidated Index and Table of Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, for the period January 1, 1955 to June 30, 1964. (English and French texts).

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Might I suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government that it would be more informative if we knew the amounts involved. After all, the amount is the main feature of these orders in council.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I quite agree. Of course, the purpose of my reference to the list of documents is to draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that the orders in council are being tabled. They are now on the table and the amounts are available to be seen. I refer briefly to the documents in order to alert honourable senators, so that if you are interested in any of them you can obtain the details.

I do not think my friend the Leader of the Opposition would suggest that I refer to the documents in detail in these tablings.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: No. I was not suggesting that, but it is a small matter to include the amount.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In dollars, you mean?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes, in dollars. Then, when they are referred to by you in tabling, as they were today, the amount in dollars would be known.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I suggest that to get these items expressed in terms of dollars and cents involves a simple matter of procurement from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is also a very simple matter to have it expressed here.

PRIVATE BILL

MEOTA PIPE LINES LTD.—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-39, to incorporate Meota Pipe Lines Ltd., and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John A. Robertson: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be given third reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 506 to 532, inclusive.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall these reports be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In view of the present situation as to the business of Parliament and the very indefinite prospects, I move, with leave, that these reports be considered now. In this connection I consider it appropriate at this time to give some statistics with regard to the operation of the Divorce Committee.

First let me give some statistics which apply to this present session as of today.

Petitions presented	531
Petitions withdrawn	22
Petitions recommended	509

This means that we have dealt with all the petitions presented to us this session; we have kept right up with the new business as it arrived.

I now give some more general figures. On June 27, 1963, which was the last day for the filing of petitions during the previous session, there were 1,111 petitions presented to the Senate. Of these, 503 received royal assent, leaving a balance of 608 to be considered during this session. Since then a further 543 petitions have been filed, making a total of 1,151 to be considered this session. Of that number the committee has, as of this afternoon, reported to the Senate 531 cases, which leaves a balance of 620 to be dealt with later.

Of the remaining 620 cases, 270 are now ready for trial, which leaves a total of 350 cases, both old and new, to be considered. Of these some will never be heard because they were filed some time ago and the enthusiasm of the applicants has cooled in the meantime. Upon our return in the fall we will probably give notice to these applicants that they must proceed with their petitions or we will dismiss them for want of prosecution; so, there will not be that many cases for processing by the committee and the Commissioner. As honourable senators know, these figures change almost daily as new petitions are filed, and as petitions previously filed and which comply with our rules are processed and presented to this house.

I should like to express my thanks to the members of the committee for the generous attention they have paid to the work and the assistance they have rendered me. It is no small task to consider the reports of the Commissioner and decide how we should proceed. We have rejected something of the order of 10 cases. For the most part, we discuss doubtful cases with the Commissioner, and frequently he adjourns cases so that further evidence may be adduced. This occurs when the parties do not comply with the rules but are nevertheless entitled to the relief they ask. Petitions are almost never dismissed on purely technical grounds.

Honourable senators, with that explanation, and in view of the situation as it exists, I ask that these reports be considered now.

Motion agreed to and reports adopted, on division.

DISSOLUTION AND ANNULMENT OF MARRIAGES

APPOINTMENT OF HON. CHARLES A. CAMERON AS AN OFFICER OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by honourable Senator Brooks, with leave of the Senate, that the honourable Charles Alexander Cameron be appointed an officer of the Senate.

I think a word of explanation is required in this case. We have just heard a most interesting report from the Chairman of the Divorce Committee. At this time in the session I know that all honourable senators are deeply impressed, as I am, with the conduct of the work of that committee under the chairmanship of the distinguished member from Toronto Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck).

There is a widely-held feeling of satisfaction arising out of the very efficient work done by Mr. Justice Walsh, the present Divorce Commissioner. Mr. Justice Walsh, however, has found that there are some applications before the Senate in regard to the hearing of which he must disqualify himself because he had an earlier interest as counsel or in some other capacity. In order to arrange for the efficient discharge of the work of the Divorce Committee, particularly in respect of these cases in which Mr. Justice Walsh feels that he is not properly qualified to sit for the reasons I have just given, it is proposed in this motion that Mr. Justice Charles A. Cameron be appointed an officer of the Senate for the purpose of dealing with such matters on behalf of the Senate.

I suppose it is unnecessary for me to say that Mr. Justice Cameron, who retired recently from the Exchequer Court of Canada, is one of the eminent jurists of this country.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We are very fortunate indeed that he has indicated a willingness to devote whatever time is necessary to this work. He will not be called upon to do any extraordinary amount of work. He will be paid a per diem allowance in accordance with the normal regulations applicable to comparable situations. The amount will be worked out by the Department of Justice, and will be processed through the Internal Economy Committee of this house.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, the honourable Leader of the Government explained to me this morning the necessity for asking for the appointment set out in this motion. The report of the honourable chairman of the Divorce Committee is, I am sure, completely satisfactory to all members of the Senate. It would appear from his report that the work of the committee and of the Commissioner is being carried out both satisfactorily and expeditiously. Frankly, I would take from his report that the system under which we are working at present tends to be easier and more expeditious than the previous system. However, the honourable chairman of the committee may give us his opinion on that at some future time.

I know Mr. Justice Cameron very well, as I am sure many honourable senators do. I have known him for many years. He and I entered the House of Commons in the same year. I followed his career as a judge of the Exchequer Court over many years and I know it has been highly satisfactory to the public. I know of no one better qualified than he to take on work of this kind. I am pleased to second the motion.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I add a word of satisfaction. I agree with what the honourable Leader has said regarding Mr. Justice Cameron. I, too, have known him for many years. I appeared before him on several occasions in private litigation when he was a judge of the Exchequer Court. He has always been looked upon by me and by others as one of the very able members of that court. I regret his retirement on account of age, because he was and still is fully competent.

It is perfectly obvious that we must have an understudy to our commissioner, not only for the hearing of cases in which he may have had an interest when he accepted the appointment, but also because we schedule cases as far as two weeks ahead, and, as no person is made of iron, the time may come when he will not be able to hear all the cases which have been scheduled. Therefore, it is only a matter of reasonable precaution that we should have somebody else able to step in and take his place on such occasions.

I am very pleased to have an additional officer added to our staff, and particularly pleased that Mr. Justice Cameron is to be appointed. We could not have found a better qualified person. He has had experience in divorce work. His ability as a presiding officer and his broad experience in human affairs makes his an ideal appointment.

Motion agreed to.

DESIGNATION AS OFFICER OF SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to the authority conferred upon me by section 3 of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act, chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1963, I hereby designate the honourable Charles Alexander Cameron, an Officer of the Senate, to hear evidence on petitions for the dissolution or annulment of marriages and to report thereon.

PRIVATE BILL

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA—CORRECTION OF DIVISION LIST

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, with your permission I would like to state that on July 27 last, when the vote was taken on the motion that Bill S-6, to incorporate the Bank of Western Canada, be not placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for the consideration of further evidence in relation thereto, I abstained from voting on account of the fact that I am a director of a chartered bank. However, His Honour did not see me when I rose to declare my position. I now rise to state that fact in order to set the record straight.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I move, with leave, that these resolutions be taken into consideration now.

Resolutions adopted, on division.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Now may I say thanks to my colleagues in the Senate. We adjourn with the extensive work of this committee well in hand. Very few have any grounds for complaint. Everyone who pressed for a hearing has been heard. Cases which came in recently have been dealt with. There are a number of cases ready for hearing, and they will be scheduled just as soon as the Commissioner returns from his summer vacation.

The honourable Senator Brooks expressed the view that the appointment of the Commissioner had lightened the labours of the Senate Committee, and he suggested that I comment on that point. His observation is quite correct. Instead of spending long hours, as we have in the past, listening to the evidence, an official, a professional jurist, and an excellent and eminent one, a justice of the Exchequer Court, does that in our place. However, please do not think he has taken all the burden off our shoulders. It is a long way from that.

Resolutions which are presented in this house have been thoroughly examined and passed on by the committee. Action is taken on the responsibility of the committee, with the concurrence of the Commissioner.

I have already stated that I am grateful to the members of the committee for the kindness, industry and willingness with which they have assisted me in examining, and passing upon the reports to the committee. The system has worked harmoniously, pleasantly and effectively, and I express my thanks.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, we have reached the end of the Order Paper; there is no further business before the Senate. We came here today, hopeful that the interim supply bill would be available to us. This bill would provide supply for the months of August and September 1964. Supply has been voted to this day, July 31.

I think it important to point out to Parliament and to the country that the Senate is sitting today and is ready to deal with whatever business should come before it. I would point out also that it is no fault of the Senate that the supply bill is not before us today. The resolution to introduce this bill was presented in the other place on July 27. I should further point out that the last supply bill with which we dealt received royal assent on June 30.

What should be done by the Senate in these circumstances is, I think, obvious—we must adjourn. I would suggest, however, that since the other place will consider private members bills at 5 o'clock, in the rather remote event that the supply bill might be available by 5 o'clock, the Senate should now adjourn until approximately that hour, to return at the call of the bell.

I think we shall next be dealing with interim supply. It is then expected that we shall be dealing with a measure in respect of fiscal arrangements between the federal and provincial authorities; and, ultimately, I hope we shall have the resolution in respect of a distinctive Canadian flag.

Since we are not able to proceed with the consideration of this legislation, and it is inappropriate that we should deal with the resolution in respect of the flag in advance of the completion of its consideration by the other place, we must now adjourn. However, I am sure that all honourable senators and, I hope, the members of the public, realize that when the Senate adjourns on such occasions as this the date set for our reassembly is an arbitrary date; it means only that the Senate must meet by that date, at the latest. Under our rules Mr. Speaker may recall the Senate to return at an earlier date than that to which it has adjourned.

I am therefore going to suggest later that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until this day two weeks hence, Friday, August 14, subject to recall immediately upon the passage in the other place of the bill in respect of interim supply.

Having said that, it might be appropriate for me to refer once more to the performance of the Senate this session. Up to today the Senate has completed its consideration of over 530 divorce applications. In addition, it has passed some 54 measures—36 public and 18 private bills. We have in committee one public bill, the Companies Act, two private bills, and one private member's public bill, that in respect of habeas corpus. I believe this is a performance worthy of the Senate of Canada, and one in which we can all take great satisfaction.

Of the measures which have been initiated and passed in the Senate, fourteen are now on the Order Paper in the other place, nine of these are public bills or measures, and five private.

I repeat that the Senate is here today, the day upon which supply runs out, and is ready and willing to act. However, we must adjourn because we have no business before us. But, like MacArthur, we will return, under the orders of Mr. Speaker as soon as the supply bill is ready for our consideration.

Honourable senators, I propose that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately five o'clock this afternoon.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I do not intend to comment to any extent on the necessity for the adjournment. I might point out that we are not setting a precedent, and I do not think the honourable Leader of the Government is suggesting that it is. We have a blanket resolution which provides for adjournments of this kind; and every session there are adjournments of the Senate for the reason he has just stated, that there is no business before it. We find ourselves in that position today; there are no bills ready for our consideration.

I could comment at some length on this subject but, as I say, I have no intention of doing so at the present time. In following this procedure the public know, as do honourable senators, that we are simply following a procedure that has been adopted every session. This situation has arisen because the Commons has not placed further business before us. Anyone who has read back numbers of Hansard will realize that in former days Government and Opposition leaders recognized the fact that the work of the Senate is very much dependent on the House of Commons; this is natural, because most of our business comes from the other place.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5 p.m. the sitting was resumed. Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I am informed that in the other place the committee has risen and reported progess. They are now considering private members' bills.

I advert to my remarks earlier today and repeat that in the circumstances of having no legislation for consideration, the Senate can do no more at this time than adjourn.

Before moving the adjournment, if it is not presumptuous of me to do so, I wish to thank all honourable senators who have been kind enough to come here for the sitting today. I know many came at considerable inconvenience, and while they need no tribute from me as to their high sense of duty, I do pay tribute to them.

I now move, seconded by Senator Lambert, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Friday, August 14, at three o'clock in the afternoon, subject to recall.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Friday, August 14, at 3 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 8, 1964

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-116, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1965.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, when we last met I informed the house that as soon as the bill for interim supply had been passed in the other place, the Senate, as has been its practice, would assemble immediately to deal with it. As honourable senators know, this bill was not available until very late yesterday afternoon. Immediately upon its receipt I consulted with His Honour the Speaker, and as a result the Senate was summoned to meet here this afternoon at three o'clock.

I apologize for the shortness of the notice given to honourable senators. I am not, of course, implying that this was due to any fault of mine or that I could have or should have given any longer notice. All honourable senators know the circumstances prevailing. However, I do thank all of you who have responded to the telegram sent by the Clerk on behalf of Mr. Speaker. This is a matter of importance, and the Senate is aware of the fact that the bill should be dealt with as soon as possible.

The bill before us is Bill C-116, to grant to Her Majesty interim supply for three months ending October 31, 1964.

Supply has been granted by Parliament up to July 31 of this year, and this bill will cover the three months of August, September and October.

First, I want to say, as I always do on such occasions, that in no instance is the total amount of any item being released by this bill. Secondly, I say that the bill is in the form that is usual for interim supply bills. There are no surprises in the draftsmanship of the sections or the schedule. Thirdly, I give the assurance that the passing of this bill by the Senate will not prejudice the right of any honourable senator to criticize or discuss any of the items contained in it, or, indeed, in any of the main or supplementary estimates that are before the house.

I should like to add that since Easter, as all honourable senators are aware, the Standing Committee on Finance has had referred to it the main and supplementary estimates. Any of the items in either the main or the supplementary estimates are available for discussion before that committee. There is a vast difference between the position we were in at Easter and the position we are in now. The Standing Committee on Finance will be meeting just as soon as the Senate is again on a regular schedule of sittings. That is some assurance to all honourable senators that if all of the information required on the various items affected by this bill is not given, or the bill is not adequately explained by me today, there will be opportunity for further study of any of those questionable items when the Finance Committee meets.

I should add that I propose to deal with the items in the schedule—perhaps not fully but I hope in sufficient detail to satisfy honourable senators as to their meaning. In this way I can alert honourable senators as to the items in which they might have an interest. I do this purposely so that if one desires to pursue a further investigation into any one of them, that can be done in the Finance Committee.

I have been following the practice on the last few interim supply bills we have had here to lay before each honourable senator a memorandum showing the position with respect to supply which has been voted already by Parliament and what can be reasonably expected to come in the foreseeable future.

Honourable senators who have the memorandum which I have had distributed today will see that the total Government spending proposed in the main estimates and in supplementary estimates, both of which have been tabled for this fiscal year, amounts to $7,217,102,244, exclusive of payments from the old age security fund, which is another matter.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: It is still money.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Of that total, the statutory amount of spending is $2,860,819,997. The total amount to be voted for the main and for the Supplementary Estimates A—and these are the only ones Parliament has before it—is $4,356,282,247.

Already we have had four supply bills, and this is the fifth. The total amount which will have been voted by Parliament, after this bill has been passed, will be $2,712,028,509.54. Assuming that this bill is passed, Parliament will still have to vote $1,644,253,737.46, the last figure shown in the right-hand column in the memorandum.

Perhaps it would be as well to advert to the table and to the bills passed already.

Appropriation Act No. 1 generally granted two-twelfths of the amount of the main estimates, plus certain additional percentages of other items, for a total of $684,120,260.18.

Appropriation Act No. 5, which was the second one we had, granted one-twelfth generally, plus additional proportions of certain items, to a total of $338,136,717.59.

The third supply bill, Appropriation Act No. 6, which again was for one month's supply, granted one-twelfth of the main estimates, four-twelfths of the supplementaries, plus certain proportions of certain estimates, for a total of $469,308,421.26.

The next Appropriation Act, No. 7, was a special act which granted payments to make up the full amount of two items of the estimates, firstly, 56a in the Department of National Defence. If honourable senators will remember, that was a $1 item which was to cover payments to be made to people compulsorily retired from the armed services. It also covered item L17a, which was a loan item that dealt with the financial requirements in respect of the Columbia River.

The present bill proposes to grant three-twelfths generally of the main estimates and of the supplementary estimates, plus certain additional percentages which I will deal with in a moment. In other words, this bill, as it is drawn, proposes to grant to the Government, generally speaking, three months' supply.

Now I come to the bill. I should like to say in the first place that the total amount to be granted by this bill is $1,037,030,109.84. That amount appears in the marginal note to section 2 of the bill.

If I may briefly describe the other provisions of section 2, I think it might be helpful to honourable senators before I come to consideration of the schedules.

Section 2(a) proposes to grant three-twelfths of all items in the main estimates, with the exception of one item, and that item is External Affairs Vote No. 20. The reason for the reduction to two-twelfths of that item is that heretofore nine-twelfths of that item has already been granted. If we granted three-twelfths on this occasion then the item will have been completely granted. That is not the intention of this bill.

Section 2(b) proposes to grant an additional three-twelfths of certain items under the Department of Transport estimates.

Section 2(c) grants an additional two-twelfths of certain items in the Department of Agriculture, and, in respect of legislation, the House of Commons requirements.

Section 2(d) grants an additional one-twelfth of certain items in seven departments, plus an additional one-twelfth of a loan item. These are all in respect of the main estimates.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Where is the loan item?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The loan item is item L10. Does the honourable senator want an explanation now, or shall I deal with it when I come to it?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I am sorry—when you come to it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Section 2(e) grants three-twelfths of all the items in the supplementary estimates, except three other items. They are National Defence Vote 56a, and loan item L17a, both of which were dealt with in Appropriation Act No. 7 and have been completely granted under the provisions of that act. The other is item L37a which was dealt with in an earlier bill in respect of payments for stockpiling of uranium. These three items are exceptions from the proposal to grant three-twelfths of all items in the supplementary estimates. In addition to that, it is proposed to grant two-twelfths of an item of the Department of Justice, and of a loan-investment item, both of which are in the supplementary estimates.

That is the general explanation of section 2. I think the details will emerge more clearly when I come to discuss the particulars contained in the schedules.

Section 3 of the bill is the usual provision to the effect that the amount authorized may be paid or applied only for the purposes and subject to the terms and conditions specified in any individual item.

Section 4 provides that when the estimates purport to confer an authority to enter into a commitment, that commitment must be entered into only in accordance with the terms of the item and after a certificate from the Comptroller of the Treasury that these limitations have been observed.

Section 5 provides that there shall be an accounting for the spending under these items in accordance with section 64 of the Financial Administration Act.

Honourable senators, I come now to the schedules, and I hope I shall not weary you with too much detail. However, I think I should be expected to give at least some general explanation in respect of these schedules.

I have said the main purpose of this bill generally is to grant three months' supply, to grant three-twelfths of the main estimates and three-twelfths of the Supplementary Estimates A; and section 2(a) of the bill does that. The further subsections of section 2 grant the additional proportions of certain items in the estimates.

Schedule A, which is on page 3 of the bill, proposes to grant three-twelfths of certain items in the estimates of the Department of Transport, in a total amount of $7,044,425. The two items under consideration are Nos. 15 and 25. Item 15 involves payments to the Canadian National Railways to meet certain deficits in connection with the Newfoundland Ferry and Terminals operation, for the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals operation, and for the Yarmouth-Bar Harbour Ferry operation. Item 25 deals with amounts required to be paid under the Maritime Freight Rates Act in respect of certain compensation payable to the railways under that act and for certain supplemental pension allowances under the provisions of the Railway Employees' Provident Fund, and certain payments to be made to the former employees of the Newfoundland Steamship and Telecommunication Services which are now under the control of the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Could the honourable Leader tell us if any of these ferries are paying and, if not, what the deficit is in the case of each individual ferry?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, I am sorry I have not that information at the moment but I shall obtain it for the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: There is a request for another Bar Harbour ferry. I was wondering if the present one is paying.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In view of the provisions of this item, I would think deficits are being incurred now.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: There are deficits for all of them?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, I think so. The reason the extra proportion is required at this time, I am informed, is that the payments made in respect of these two items are made on a calendar-year basis rather than on the basis of the fiscal year of the Government. In one sense payments are perhaps three months behind now. I think that is not literally true, but the payments must be completed by the end of the calendar year. That is the explanation I have for Schedule A.

Schedule B, on page 4 of the bill, proposes to grant an additional two-twelfths of certain items in the Department of Agriculture and in respect of the House of Commons, in a total amount of $4,235,450.

The item in the Department of Agriculture covers payments to be made in respect of irrigation and water storage projects in the western provinces. I am informed the specific reason is that there has been a step-up in the work being done on the South Saskatchewan dam project. It is expected that the compacting of the main fill and the completion of the main river channel can be looked to before freeze-up. For that reason additional amounts would be required for the payment of the contractors involved.

So far as the additional proportion required for the House of Commons is concerned, I think it is obvious that the expenditures for the protection, cleaning, messenger and other incidental running expenses of that body run higher when the house is in session. As honourable senators know, that house has been in session fairly continuously since early last winter.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Maybe we should not pass that item!

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That might help, but I do not think we would make ourselves too popular if we took that course. We might have a similar item for the Senate at some future time, and perhaps we could husband our resources.

I come now to Schedule C, on page 5, which proposes to grant one-twelfth of the total of certain items in seven different departments, for a total of $6,442,850.

First, in the Department of Agriculture there are certain grants payable about this time of year for cheese factories, for agricultural fairs, and, I understand, warrants in connection with the payment of high-grade hog and sheep carcasses. For that reason the extra proportion is required at this time.

Under the Department of Fisheries, for the Fisheries Research Board of Canada, additional amounts of money are required at this time because of the research work being done by the board on both coasts and indeed in inland waters. Honourable senators will notice that there is special mention in the item of the cost of work on lamprey control and research, about which Senator Paterson spoke to us a few years ago in such an interesting way.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is proving very successful too, I believe.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I understand it is a highly successful program. Senator Paterson spoke to the Senate about it when the program was being initiated. Obviously a lot of this work is best done in the summer months, and for that reason extra money is required at this time.

The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys requires extra money for field and air surveys, mapping and aeronautical charting, for marine surveys and research, for geological research, for geographical surveys and research, and as well for continued work in the Arctic on the polar continental shelf project. Obviously these are projects in which field parties are at work in the summer months. The largest part of the expenditures in connection with these items is incurred at this time, and by October 31 a good many of these accounts will require to be paid.

In the National Film Board the additional proportion is required because certain payments for contracts in which they are involved are coming due, and for that reason extra money is thought to be required before October 31.

In the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources the usual kind of summer work is being done with respect to wildlife conservation in the parks and the National Battlefields Commission. Again, the extra money is required before the weather turns cold. Likewise, the water resources section of that department requires extra money in connection with water gauging installations now being undertaken.

In the Privy Council some money is required now in connection with the work of the Centennial Commission on projects of national rather than local significance, and a commitment has been made which requires money before October 31.

In the Department of Transport there are certain administrative accounts which require payment earlier in the year than normally can be expected because of the late passage of the estimates, and this additional proportion is required.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Would the Leader of the Government allow a question? I am a little puzzled by this item. I understand his explanation up to date, but what items under the heading "Departmental Administration" are required to be paid outside of the regular cycle of the fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am informed that there are certain items in connection with the payment for work done by consultants in the Department of Transport who have been engaged upon projects recommended by the Glassco Commission. I understand too there are some equipment rental payments to fall due before the end of October. There are some travel items that have been or will be incurred which require a little extra money under this particular item. I think this is the first time any additional requirement has been sought on item No. 1 of the Department of Transport. I notice that the honourable senator is looking at the main estimates or the supplementary estimates. Perhaps there is more information there than I have given. It may also be explained a little more clearly.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I am concerned with the large amount of $3,773,000, compared with the total estimate of $14,000,000.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Well, it is one-twelfth of the total which is being sought here.

I come now to the last item in schedule C, which is loans, investments and advances. This contains an item of $2,000,000 to be loaned to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in connection with the consolidation of its facilities in the City of Montreal.

In Schedule D, on page 8, it is proposed to grant two-twelfths of the item, amounting to a total of $229,656.67. So far as the Department of Justice is concerned, this item deals with certain pensions, which it is proposed to pay or to increase—and at any rate all pensions will now be upon the same basis—for widows of certain penitentiary officers who were killed on duty. I understand that some of these pensions were granted by Parliament many years ago. Others were granted quite recently. It was felt that the earlier pensions were inadequate. It is now proposed to put them all on the same basis and to pay a reasonable amount in each case.

The last item in Schedule D covers the loan to the Government of India to finance purchases of aircraft and aircraft parts in Canada by that country. We discussed this matter in connection with an earlier bill, and the amount now proposed to be granted would leave one-twelfth of this item ungranted.

Honourable senators, I think that is all I can say at the moment about this bill.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, as the honourable Leader of the Government has told us, the supply bill has been somewhat delayed in arriving in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Not unduly delayed.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Not unnecessarily delayed. However, the Leader of the Government has given a very full explanation of the bill. It is the usual explanation, as the honourable leader well knows.

He has also given us the usual guarantees that there is no prejudice so far as obtaining further information is concerned. It is my experience that all interim supply bills are the same in this regard; there is no prejudice so far as the intention to give further information is concerned, but as each bill comes along the time becomes more limited, and one has no real opportunity to get the information.

As the honourable leader has pointed out, supply and estimates are matters of very great importance to Parliament and to the public. Somebody has said that interim supply has not been unduly delayed, and with that I agree completely. As I said, this matter is of very great importance, and there has been no opportunity in the House of Commons to study the estimates during this session which has been running since February. Many questions were asked, and indeed many questions needed to be asked, when interim supply under this bill was being sought in the other place. I understand only one department has been passed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Two departments.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I stand corrected. There have been others considered for a short time.

From my own experience in the House of Commons I know that constituents of members in that place are very anxious to know just what amounts of money are being set aside for their particular constituency. Farmers want to know what subsidies are forthcoming; fishermen and labourers are also interested in this matter and that is one of the reasons why so much information has been sought.

The honourable Leader of the Government has also pointed out that we in the Senate are rather fortunate in having reactivated our Finance Committee. I agree with that. However, I am not one of those who believe that our Finance Committee can take the estimates for different departments and study them. There must be more study of a general nature than is done by committees and individuals in the other place. I hope that before too long the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate will be able to make at least a progress report and to point out to us just what is being done. I know that all members are entitled to attend the committee meetings, but all members do not have the time to do so. Furthermore, there are many other committees which honourable senators wish to attend. I understand at the present time the Finance Committee is studying the Glassco Report. I also understand they have held four meetings. This hardly seems sufficient for the very important work they have to do and which I know they are anxious to do.

The bill before us, as has been said by the honourable leader, is in the usual form, and is to grant supply for the months of August, September and October. There is not much that can be said on the bill itself. It is very much the same as former bills. It authorizes the expenditure of approximately $1,037,000,000. This sum represents about three-twelfths of the main estimates for the current fiscal year.

The whole question of Government spending is, as we have often heard in this chamber, one of great concern. One has only to glance at the estimates to appreciate this fact. We are living, as has been pointed out on numerous occasions in recent years, beyond our means, and yet we continue to give consideration to and to take on projects the cost of which, as we all know, is exorbitant.

The Minister of Finance in his last budget address to the House of Commons indicated that it will be necessary to work out a list of priorities. This seemed to be an excellent idea so far as the public and the press was concerned. He also stated on that occasion that we could not expect to do everything at once. This also was very sound reasoning. The unfortunate part is, however, that it is not being followed even by the minister himself. Just a short time ago we passed a bill extending family allowances to boys and girls remaining at school up to the age of 18 years. This was passed practically unanimously by the other place. However, it is a measure which will add millions to an already overburdened treasury.

Also, just a short time ago we received the report of the Royal Commission on Health Services. This massive and important document will have to be studied very carefully, and I am sure it will be so studied by the members of the different provincial governments and the members of this Parliament.

The implementation of the main recommendations of the commission will substantially increase the already heavy Government expenditures on health care. According to the report, it is anticipated that by 1971, assuming the recommendations are implemented, we will be spending over $4 billion on health services and medical care alone. At the present time we are spending just a little over $7 billion on all services.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare announced a short time ago at the close of the dominion-provincial health ministers' conference that the Government will have a medical care insurance program ready by 1965. Next year we will await progress in this direction with great interest and trepidation.

There is also the Canada Pension Plan to provide retirement for Canadians with survivors' benefits for widows and orphans, the cost of which almost defies the imagination.

The question that arises in everybody's mind, of course, is where we are going to find the money for all this. The Minister of Finance says Canadians today cannot afford everything at once. However, this is precisely what it seems we are trying to do, and without giving everything the necessary careful consideration. I should like to quote from remarks which the Premier of Manitoba, Mr. Roblin, made in discussing this subject a short time ago. He expressed great concern over the size of these spending plans, and called for a closed conference between the federal Government and the governments of the provinces to establish a list of priorities and to work out a timetable. This suggestion is very sound, and I am sure it will be discussed when the provincial premiers and the federal representatives get together. Mr. Roblin said:

> I feel there is a sense of urgency about my request. If the Government's pension plan and health services proposals are considered as unrelated matters, the cost will be enormous and the country will be in for a bad time.

He went on to say:

> Canadians generally want better pensions.

There is no question about that.

> We believe that Canadians also want better education for the young. How can we best phase these competing demands into the tax-paying capacity of our people?

I am sure that is where he had in mind the idea that certain priorities should and must be worked out.

The Montreal Gazette, in its issue of July 15, commenting on Premier Roblin's proposals, said:

> Premier Roblin's call for a federal-provincial conference to consider the country's economic priorities in relation to its tax-paying capacities is only a plea for the best use of our resources. It is hard to see that there is any alternative. The idea that we can all do everything at once and no matter how much, defies reason and abandons responsibility.

Honourable senators, I think the Premier of Manitoba is to be commended for the responsibility he has shown to the country as a whole. His ideas are sound. Such a conference, I think, is not only necessary, but urgent as well. In this era of so-called co-operative federalism, we have the provinces demanding a greater share of corporate and personal income taxes while at the same time the Government continues to push ahead with new programs that can only add to the burden of the taxpayer.

It seems to me that our efforts during these days of prosperity should be directed towards balancing the budget, cutting down on unnecessary Government spending and generally trying to hold the line on Government spending. That is why I was delighted to see our Finance Committee undertaking a study of the recommendations of the report of the Glassco Commission, and to note the progress that has been made in their application. I should like to see this committee meet more often. I should like to see it have the opportunity of making a closer study of the financial situation and of making the practical and helpful recommendations which the present membership is well equipped to make.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, we are engaged again in this ritualistic process of passing an appropriation bill which will provide Her Majesty with money to carry on the work of the Government for, this time, three months, plus the necessary extras. With that I do not disagree.

I assume that the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) is going to request us to waive the rules, and this afternoon I do not disagree with that. But the reason we were prepared to waive the rules on the last occasion was that we had re-established the Finance Committee which was going to look into the estimates and into Government expenditures, not in the way in which it is done in another place but by taking two or three departments this year and two or three departments next year, and making themselves acquainted with them and producing the kind of reports which might be helpful to both the Government of the day and the department concerned. This is what was done by the Finance Committee some years ago.

The fact is, as the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) has pointed out, that the Standing Committee on Finance has met four times. We are in the hands of the chairman. I am sorry to say this in his absence, but I think the chairman of the Finance Committee has lost interest in the committee. I think he has been more interested in certain other matters—

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Banking.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: —with respect to which we do not need to go into detail this afternoon. On a subsequent occasion—perhaps at the end of October—if we have made no more progress than we have today, then I will stand with my honourable friend Senator O'Leary (Carleton) and will see to it that the next appropriation bill does not pass except in accordance with the strict terms of the rules.

The honourable Leader of the Opposition has referred to this question of expenditures, the question of priorities, and to Mr. Roblin's suggestion to the Prime Minister that there be a dominion-provincial conference to discuss priorities—because they must be discussed. I am saying here only what I have said on other platforms in recent months. We are told we are going to have a pension scheme. We do not really know what it is going to be. I understand we are waiting for a French translation of the White Paper, and as a result it will not be tabled until next week, although we have been promised it week by week. We still do not know what it contains. All we do know is that the scheme will drain off $700 million or $800 million a year from the private sector into the public sector. That is a lot of money.

Then we have the medicare plan. I have very great respect for my former colleagues, the members of the Royal Commission on Health Services, but I shudder a little when I read their report to the effect that we can afford to divert, again from the private sector to the public sector—and this is the important thing—$2.4 billion in the federal field alone as of 1971. It is implicit, of course, that the same amount would have to be diverted in the provincial field.

There are also the requirements of education. I am not to be bound by these figures because I did not do any special research on this matter before coming here this afternoon, but, as I recall, the Canadian Universities Foundation suggests that the capital requirements of Canadian universities over the next five, six or seven years amount to something of the order of $700 million or $800 million. I know, honourable senators, that every advocate has a tendency to exaggerate—that is what advocates are for—so the amount of money required may not be that great—perhaps it is only $500 million or $600 million. However, I want to underline what Mr. Roblin said. We can be sure everyone wants more pensions, everyone wants to avoid paying the doctors—although personally I think that paying the doctors is the lowest priority we have in this country—and everyone wants their children to have a better education. All I say is, once you look at these figures you realize we had better stop running into this thing in an unconsidered and an untidy way, and we had better sit down with the provinces and discuss priorities and where the money is to come from.

In that connection, the acting Prime Minister was quoted in the Globe and Mail—I do not read the publications of the other place—when he was asked whether the Government intended to give consideration to Mr. Roblin's request for a dominion-provincial conference on priorities. Here I will take the risk of paraphrasing his reply, although I have the quotation. He was quoted as saying in effect, "If Mr. Roblin is suggesting that a conference on priorities will result in a postponement of the Canada Pension Plan, then I say that that is not Government policy."

Honourable senators, this is the kind of arrogance which has led us into great difficulty in the past: All we have to do is take a narrow view, say we made a promise here and a promise there; we do not relate them, we do not add them up, we go through with one and so we have to go through with the other. No matter what the Minister of Trade and Commerce does or what the Minister of Finance does, we will be in great difficulty in this country, because we will become completely noncompetitive not only in the foreign field but in the domestic field also.

I could go on, but I am not going to make my main speech on this subject this afternoon. I just want to touch on those matters which the honourable Leader of the Government touched on. I apologize for interrupting him, although there was a matter he said he would deal with when he came to it, but in my opinion he has not dealt with it, so I propose to take a moment or two to deal with it. What I am interested in is item L10 in schedule C. It is headed, "Loans, Investments and Advances: Canadian Broadcasting Corporation: Loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the purposes of capital expenditures subject to terms and conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council, $14,250,000."

I had occasion to mention that earlier in this session. I just touched on it then, but I wish to deal with it a little more fully now. This is a subterfuge to conceal, to reduce budgetary deficits. Here is a crown corporation. It is not as though we are lending money to Polymer or Eldorado. It is a crown corporation which requires $80 million to $85 million a year to balance its budget. It requires it from the people of Canada—and the Minister of Finance introduces an item to lend it $14,250,000 for capital expenditures.

That was the policy of the St. Laurent Government. When the Diefenbaker Government came into power, after about a year that Government wrote off all these advances, took them as budgetary items, and from there on all the capital expenditures of the C.B.C. were taken as budgetary items. They were spent. Everyone knew there was going to be no return on them other than the cultural return, which I have always found difficult to put on a balance sheet.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is like good will.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Yes, it is like good will, and the honourable leader and I know what good will means on a balance sheet.

Now, in this day, when we are balancing the budget or when we are budgeting for a lower deficit, we suddenly see a return to a type of accounting which I say without hesitation is completely inexcusable. I could use much stronger words, but His Honour the Speaker might call me to account if I should. What concerns me is that this is just the opening wedge. I am not concerned about $14,250,000 in the current deficit. I have been reading in the press and in the accounts of the House of Commons committees—I will not be bound by the figures I am mentioning, but they are right within 10 per cent—that the plans of the C.B.C. initially were to spend $83 million for their new complex. This is capital expenditure. This will be a loan, an investment, $83 million in Toronto and Montreal for a new complex. Then it went up to $102 million and the latest figure, as I recall, is $135 million. Let us say it is only $115 million—it is becoming a substantial figure. Are we to expect that next year there will be an item in Loans and Advances, a non-budgetary item, of $50 million, say, to cover what will be spent next year and in the following year—$60 million or $70 million more? This is a fraud on the Canadian people. I make that statement with no apology at all and with no intention of withdrawing it.

I would like to know who endorses the note of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that Honourable Mr. Gordon has taken for this $14 million.

As far as granting supply for three months is concerned I am glad we are doing so this afternoon. It may be that as far as this chamber is concerned we should grant supply for longer periods than we have in the past. The honourable Leader of the Government has given the usual undertaking that the granting of supply this afternoon will not prevent us from debating or discussing any particular item. Although this is not the responsibility of the Leader of the Government, we must all recognize that such an undertaking is really rather meaningless, since we never receive the estimates here in a form in which we can debate them item by item.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Except in committee.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That is why I deplore the failure of the Finance Committee to sit regularly. After a certain incident early in April, we had a sudden flurry of activity in the committee, and then it disappeared. I am sure I have colleagues here who agree with me that unless that activity is resumed we may have other flurries in this chamber on similar occasions.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, when I entered the chamber this afternoon I certainly had no thought of taking part in this debate. However, the remarks of the last speaker (Hon. Mr. McCutcheon) caused me to think a second time and to rise in reply on behalf of one who is not here today, as to why the Finance Committee is not meeting more often. I think it was rather an unkind remark by the last speaker about his colleague from Toronto-Rosedale (Hon. Mr. Leonard), that the latter is perhaps more interested in other matters.

I have sat as a member of previous finance committees, under the chairmanship of Senator Crerar, and also under the late Senator Hawkins, both of whom were highly praised for the efficient manner in which they performed their duties as chairman. I think the same can be said of the present Chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator Leonard. He has held four committee meetings. Perhaps he had intended to hold others—I have no reason to suppose that he did not. However, on account of the adjournment of the Senate, it was almost impossible for him to do so.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Will the honourable senator allow me to interject this, that Senator Leonard is an old and personal friend of mine, for whom I have great admiration and affection. I think he can chair a committee as well as any member of this chamber. My complaint is that he did not call enough meetings.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What the honourable senator has just said adds still further to my astonishment regarding his first remark, that Senator Leonard must be interested in other matters, and giving that as a reason for not holding further meetings.

I do not think I need to labour this question further. I want to put on record that I think we are most fortunate in having a man such as Senator Leonard as Chairman of the Finance Committee, and I am sure that when he makes his report it will be worth while.

I had hoped that Senator McCutcheon, who has had wide experience in dealing with millions, would tell us how he would have charged up this $14 million, other than as a capital expenditure. Perhaps he will do that now.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: If the honourable senator is asking me a question, there are two ways of keeping books, and the Government of Canada keeps its books on the basis that expenditures are expenditures and are charged off. That is why I would think that a new post office in the honourable senator's riding would, by ordinary business accounting, be regarded as a capital expenditure; but historically, traditionally, it has been written off as a budgetary expenditure. That is true of bridges and of many things that the honourable senator and I would regard as capital expenditures. In other words, by and large, the federal Government—I should not say this Government, but the Government of Canada—has not distinguished between capital expenditures and current expenditures. It has operated on a cash basis and said, "We have taken in so much money and we have spent so much money."

I would not quarrel with the honourable senator if he were advocating that we set up a different accounting system such as some provinces have, where they charge current expenditures to one account and capital expenditures to another account. If we set up a capital expenditure account, then of course we will charge rent and depreciation. We will charge rent to the people who occupy the buildings, which of course we do not do now; and we will put depreciation in the current account for the current year.

What I object to, this being the practice of the Government, is that it does not set this up as a current expenditure; it sets it up as a loan, an advance.

If the honourable senator is prepared to lend $14¼ million to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with any expectation that he will get it back, then his business judgment is not what I know it to be. We are not talking about a set of books, where you set up your current expenditures and your current revenues on one side, and your capital expenditures on the other. This is a loan. Now, who endorses the note?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I am pleased to hear the honourable senator's further words. We all recognize him as an authority in regard to finance and as one who is dealing in large amounts. Needless to say, I would not attempt to put my experience against his. However, I have always felt that when a capital investment is made—particularly in this case, where I understand the greater proportion of this $14 million will be used for construction purposes—and you have an asset against that $14 million; and while I might not be in a position to advance that $14 million, if the risk were good enough and I had the money, perhaps I would consider it.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: If the risk were good enough.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I would consider the loan, I said.

I am very pleased to have the honourable senator enlarge on his remarks in regard to this particular transaction. Perhaps in future years we shall set up a different system as a result of the work of the Finance Committee under the chairmanship of Senator Leonard.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I remind the house that if the honourable Senator Connolly speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I thank honourable senators for the part they have played in discussing this bill today. I am bound to say that I personally feel, and I am sure all honourable senators feel, that whether there is a political sting in some of the remarks made, the comments which fall from honourable senators in respect of bills of supply are well worth having. I must also say that I profit from the views expressed, and by the feeling, very often, with which they are expressed.

The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) asked about the ferry services deficits on the east coast. I am informed that for the calendar year 1964 the forecast deficits are as follows: for Newfoundland Ferry and Terminals, $8,791,000; for the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals Service, $4,074,000; for the Yarmouth-Bar Harbour Service, $267,300.

With regard to Senator McCutcheon's remarks about the Chairman of the Finance Committe (Hon. Mr. Leonard), I do not want to labour this point. I do not think that Senator Leonard, as chairman of that committee, either lost interest in the committee or had his attention diverted by any other matter—certainly not any other matter that should not have engaged his attention. I think Senator Leonard, and I am sure my honourable friend will agree, is one of our most valuable members.

The Finance Committee has sat four times since it was established shortly after Easter. I think it is better practice for the Senate not to set up its Finance Committee until some of the estimates have been passed in the other house, where there is prior responsibility for work on the estimates. In the second place, I would point out that the Senate Finance Committee has had four meetings this session, late though it was set up. It is several sessions since the Finance Committee has met at all. In this respect we are ahead now, the last committee having sat under the chairmanship of Senator Emerson several years ago. I know in the last two years there were certain circumstances beyond the control of the Senate which made it impossible for the committee to meet. But the point is the committee has been set up again, has met and will meet. I hope Senator McCutcheon will use his good offices to see to it that it does meet just as regularly as he would like it to meet—and I am sure he will.

With most of what Senator McCutcheon said about priorities in Government spending on all levels, I think we are all bound to agree. This makes good sense. There should and must be a clearing house, in view of the amount of public spending in this country. Public spending is undertaken by governments as a result of the pressure of people who want it. It is the business of all of us in public life to bring home to people who ask for so much public spending just what the consequences can be for the public institutions which do the spending.

With respect to the kind of comment that has been made here by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) and Senator McCutcheon, and which so often falls from the lips of senators on this side of the chamber—because those on the Government side are in fact just as critical as are the Opposition of the amount of public spending we are exposed to—I say such comment, made frequently enough, can have an effect on public thinking. That is what we are here for. This is what we should try to do. Perhaps I am encouraging opposition. I do not have to. Opposition is here. This is our way of life. This is the parliamentary system.

I do not propose to engage in a discussion with the expert when it comes to corporate organization, corporate finance and all of the accounting and bookkeeping aspects that enter into these fields. I would point out that item No. 1 in the main estimates, respecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, deals with a grant in respect of the net operating deficit incurred by the C.B.C.

There is a good deal in what Senator Isnor has said about the payment of a grant to cover an operating deficit and the loan of a sum of money to create a capital asset. Senator McCutcheon says that the practice of doing it this way is unsound from the point of view of accounting practice. In any event, he says it is a misleading way of making budgetary proposals. I would point out, however, that the item is in the estimates. It is there for all to see. Whether it is a loan to be written off ultimately, or whether some day some of these properties might be sold and the capital investment or part of it is recovered, I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Or there might be an appreciation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes—whether there is appreciation or depreciation. Perhaps we should have more accounting experts in the Senate than we have. The point I think about is that whether it is a loan or a grant, it is in the estimates and, therefore, we can at least consider it. Whether it is poorly done or not is a matter of opinion.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): With leave, I move third reading now.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, when last Easter a bill largely similar to this one came to this house I refused to give it may assent. I am prepared to admit that this is not exactly the sort of bill that came to us at Easter, and yet it has this similarity, that it has been brought here today at the eleventh hour and this house is asked to give it first, second and third readings at one sitting.

Honourable senators, why has this bill come to us in this way at this time? I suggest, sirs, that it has come to us in this way at this time for two reasons. The first reason is because there are certain people in high places in this country who do not seem to understand that freedom of speech in a free Parliament involves more than the right to speak; it involves as well a duty to answer. In truth, that is the very heart of a free Parliament, that men on the benches of power shall be compelled to answer, and the failure to realize that in another place during the past week or ten days was responsible, in the main, for our getting this bill in this way at this time. The heart of our system, I repeat, is accountability, and without recognition and honour for that you in fact have no Parliament at all.

I think I am in a position to say to this house that had that principle been understood and honoured in another place last week this bill, which we are now asked to pass holus-bolus in one sitting, would have been before us at least two or three days ago, thus permitting us to give it whatever consideration it deserves and at least permitting us to avoid the seeming position which will be accepted by very many outside this house, of the Senate being merely a doormat for the House of Commons.

Secondly, this bill has come to us in this way at this time because certain people in the other place do not seem to realize or understand that this house is an integral part of Parliament. They seem not to realize that this house has its own rights, its own responsibilities, its own duties, and its own dignities, and that under our system and under our Constitution such dignities, rights and responsibilities cannot be and must not be treated with disdain and contempt.

Honourable senators, during the two years I have had the honour of sitting in this house I have heard talk from the most responsible and most experienced senators about possible reform and possible improvement of the Senate. May I submit to you, honourable senators, that the first step, the first and most vital step in reforming this chamber, in making it more useful, and in gaining for it the respect and support of the people of this country, which I think it needs, is for this house to compel the other place to respect its position under the Constitution, and to realize that it is an integral part of Parliament, and that it cannot be used as a mere gramophone for the House of Commons.

I am going to give my consent to third reading of this bill tonight, but I do so under protest. I concur fully in what Senator McCutcheon said a while ago, that if the circumstances of this bill should be repeated, then, Finance Committee or no Finance Committee, it will not have my consent and I am sure it will not have his.

We complain when we read articles and editorials in the press scoffing at this house and treating it with disdain, but I say to honourable senators in all sincerity that one of the reasons for that public attitude is because this house has permitted itself again and again throughout the years, and is again permitting itself today, to be treated with contempt by the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Senator O'Leary has made quite a point about what he describes as the failure of people in high places in the other place to answer. I think we should have a little perspective in our approach to this question. This is an interim supply bill, not the final supply bill. Ministers in the other place are accountable to that place and must answer questions. I would suggest that they are not expected, and indeed it is not parliamentary practice to require them, to answer for all items in their estimates in a wide ranging debate on interim supply. Many, if not most, of the estimates for the departments are still to be debated in that house. I think there is no really valid foundation for a charge of arrogance in this respect. I think many of the pertinent questions asked in the other place have in fact been answered.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): In the last two days.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That may be, but whether they were answered in the last two days or in the last ten days, the plain fact of the matter is that on interim supply, which is supply for three months, I do not think it is necessary to discuss in detail all of the estimates of all departments in a wide-ranging debate. Parliament can expect to deal in detail with the estimates in the usual way later.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Surely the fact is that there was unreasonable delay, that the information was not being made available to the public, and the request was made in order that the public might find out what was really in the estimates. It has now covered a period of three, four or five months.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think we cannot resolve this difference of opinion completely here. But when the honourable senators opposite put it in this way, I think I should, on behalf of this side and on behalf of the Government, put the other position.

The other point I must make is with reference to the use of the Senate as a doormat in connection with interim supply. I consider it was my duty to request His Honour the Speaker to recall the Senate today. Supply ran out on July 31. This day is August 7. I have been informed that unless supply is available quickly there will be considerable delay in the usual arrangements in respect of salaries for public servants outside of Ottawa. This will amount to roughly $14½ million. Approximately 100,000 people will be affected if supply should be delayed beyond the end of this week and into the beginning of next week. I consider this to be a good reason why the Senate should come here today to consider interim supply.

In addition, I am informed that there are suppliers' accounts to be paid amounting to approximately $1 million. Furthermore, there are National Health and Welfare payments to provinces amounting to over $2 million in respect of hospital construction grants, and other items of this nature which are urgent. Therefore, I think that the Senate in coming here today is doing the duty all honourable senators would want to do. I do not consider it necessary to apologize for the fact that we treat this as urgent business. I do thank honourable senators opposite for their consideration of the situation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

NOTICE TO SENATORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called may I ask His Honour the Speaker if it is possible in future to notify those delivering telegrams to senators who live in the city that there is no need to wake them up in the middle of the night. I would appreciate it very much if that can be prevented from happening again.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I thank the senior citizen of the Senate for drawing this matter to our attention, although I think I was the one worst done by. I think I live closer to the Senate chamber than any other senator, and I am sure I was the last one to receive a telegram. I went to bed at half-past ten last night, and the conveyors of the message almost pulled my door down in their efforts to deliver it to me at a quarter to midnight. However, honourable senators, these things happen.

I now move that the Senate do adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5.40 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

PRIVATE BILL

MOUNTAIN PACIFIC PIPELINE LTD.—FIRST READING

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Leonard moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly: As honourable senators are aware, when we adjourned on Friday last it was felt that by this time tonight the bill respecting federal-provincial fiscal arrangements would be available for the consideration of this house. At that time I consulted with the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) about the length of the adjournment, and, all things considered, I think the guess we made was a fairly good one. However, the explosive situation in Cyprus over the weekend caused a lengthy debate yesterday in the other place. That, more than anything else, is responsible for the fact that the bill we are expecting has not as yet received complete consideration by the House of Commons.

I am informed that there is some prospect that the House of Commons will complete its consideration of the bill later this evening. It is my suggestion, therefore, that the Senate take recess, to reassemble at the call of the bell at 9.30, or shortly thereafter.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I have deep feeling for the position in which the Leader of the Government finds himself in these circumstances. I hear these things only in the corridors, but the bill would have been through if it had not been for a most explosive speech made this afternoon in the other place by one of the followers of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

As far as I am concerned, I object strongly to the Senate being put in the position where we are going to sit around here and wait until the call of the bell at 9.30. I propose to speak on this bill. I will not speak tonight, and I think that we should now adjourn.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Who is running the Senate?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I do not know. I am just expressing my view.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, The honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate explained the situation to me before we came into the house. As he has already told us, the probable reason why the bill is not before us now is the situation in Cyprus and the debate which had to take place in the other house yesterday, a debate which I am sure we all felt was necessary.

This is an important bill and will receive, I am sure, careful consideration here. That was my opinion when the honourable Leader of the Government spoke to me, and it still is; and I personally see no objection at all to our meeting again at 9.30 this evening if it is possible and probable that this bill will be here.

If we receive the bill then, I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government if it is the intention to have the explanation tonight and the debate continued tomorrow from this side of the house or by any other members who may care to speak.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, in reply to the honourable Leader of the Opposition, I wish to assure all honourable senators that there is no suggestion whatever that this bill be debated to a vote or to a decision on second reading this evening.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: No.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): If at 9.30 or thereabouts the bill is available, Senator Hayden has kindly consented to give the explanation, if honourable senators would like to have that done this evening. I am in the hands of the Senate, and if it is desired to continue this debate tonight for a while, certainly that would meet with my concurrence. I would have no objection whatever to the debate being adjourned until tomorrow and further discussion taking place at that time. I want to make that abundantly clear.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 9.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed, Hon. David A. Croll, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am informed that the House of Commons has not completed its consideration of the bill on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. I am also informed that there is a general agreement between the two principal parties, and that this bill can be expected to pass tonight. Whether that can be done depends, of course, on the co-operation of other parties.

In the circumstances, I would move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, August 12, 1964

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL REVISION BILL, 1964

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-111, to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and to provide adjustments of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, the title of this bill may in some aspects be said to be a little ominous, and on reading the bill you may find a little difficulty in mastering the language of it. I shall try to reduce it to what I would call a basic simplicity.

First, the subject of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements has been growing in importance since the end of the war. There have been many factors which have contributed to that and which it is unnecessary for me to do more than mention at this time. They include the substantial increase in population, and the demands for services of the sort that are required to be provided under our Constitution by the provincial authorities. Those demands have been piling up and increasing, particularly in the field of education, as the school population has been expanding very rapidly.

Then, there are services that at one time in the past might have had a local or provincial aspect but which, with the developments in Canada, have assumed a broader scope and have taken on some of the national aspects that are so recognized. The Government of Canada over the years since the war has tried by various means to see to it that the provinces secured additional revenues so that they might be able to carry on effectively their obligations and responsibilities under the Constitution in relation to those things in which they have their own sovereignty or exclusive jurisdiction; and also to take a larger share or, in some cases, a share of some of the responsibilities that heretofore the provinces had been looking after, but which have become larger and more and more national in character, and therefore justify the intervention of the federal authority and the provision of financial assistance.

This subject of fiscal arrangements with the provinces is one that I think will be with us for a long, long time. If you follow the course of these arrangements over the years since World War II, you will see that during the war, and immediately following, they took the course of tax rental agreements. Then the situation changed, and they took the course of provision by statute for the arrangements and the formulae, etc., under which the federal authority would either contribute to the cost of the particular services or to provincial revenues, or abate federal taxes so that the province might in an increasing amount levy taxes for its own revenues without increasing the overall burden of tax upon the taxpayer.

I should add that in 1956 we passed a statute dealing with tax-sharing arrangements, and in 1961 a further statute was passed. The statute of 1961 carries on for five years, and for our purposes it should be looked at as the basic statute. Bill C-111 in some aspects amends that basic statute.

You may find a reference to the original act of 1956, but that is an isolated reference and is for a particular purpose, as I will explain later. However, we start off with the basic statute of 1961; and now we have the bill today. I propose to explain as briefly as I can the manner in which the bill now before us changes the provisions of the act of 1961.

I should say that the three important changes to be brought about by the provisions in the bill are these: First, there is a change in the basis of equalization to take effect for the fiscal year 1964-65; secondly, there is provision for an increase in the share of estate tax for the provinces; and thirdly, there is an abatement provided by which federal individual income tax is decreased by an additional two percentage points in the taxation year 1965 as against the present provision in our law, and by four percentage points by the year 1966. To that extent the abatement would be above the present level of abatement.

Let me deal first with this question of abatement. This additional abatement has already been provided—you will recall it was Bill C-91, passed by this house and given royal assent in June of this year—by an amendment to section 33 of the Income Tax Act. The former rates of abatement for 1965 and 1966, under the Income Tax Act as it stood before the amendments in June of this year, were 19 per cent abatement in individual income tax for the year 1965, and 20 per cent for 1966. Under the amendments to the Income Tax Act we increased the 1965 abatement rate by 2 per cent to 21 per cent, and the 1966 rate from 20 to 24 per cent. This represents a deduction which an individual resident in a province on the last day of the taxation year may make from tax otherwise payable by him on the basis that his income was earned in the province in which he was residing on that date.

You might ask, why is this abatement provision repeated in this bill, because we have already enacted it into law under the provisions of the Income Tax Act? The reason is, if you will recall, in the income tax amendments which were before us there was a provision in the original draft and, I think, as it was first introduced in the Commons, dealing with the additional abatement which was being provided for the Province of Quebec in lieu of the payments under the Youth Allowances Act for the years 1965 and 1966. Because of the complications and because of suggestions of doubtful constitutionality at that time those provisions were eliminated from the income tax bill, and when the bill came to us they were not in it.

Under section 7 of the bill before us, headed "Income tax Act", you will see that the abatement provisions contained in the income tax amendments of this year are repeated. However, there is the additional provision which provides in paragraph (iv) a 21 per cent basic rate,

> ...or in the case of an individual who resided on the last day of the 1965 taxation year in a province that was in that taxation year a province providing schooling allowances within the meaning—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Surely not schooling allowances?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

> ...within the meaning of the Youth Allowances Act, 24 per cent of the basic tax, in respect of the 1965 taxation year...

So there is the provision for 21 per cent of the basic tax, and in the case of an individual residing in a province that was providing these schooling allowances at that time, the basic rate is 24 per cent for 1965. Then the same language is repeated in paragraph (v), with the basic rate for the year 1966, in those circumstances, of 27 per cent.

The only thing I want to add is that in the bill the principle applicable to this extra allowance of abatement for a province which has its own youth allowances plan in operation for children in the age group 16 and 17 is that a 3 per cent abatement of individual tax otherwise payable is allowed to the individuals residing in that province—

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Three percentage points.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, three percentage points—increasing in 1965 the rate of abatement from 21 to 24 per cent, and in 1966 from 24 to 27 per cent. The method to be applied in the administration of this is that the 3 per cent will be allowed to each individual filing, that is, an extra 3 per cent in each case. If the amount of abatement that is so provided is in excess of what is expended in the particular province that has its own youth allowances plan, then there is provision for rebate. If the plan as operating in that province exceeds in cost this extra 3 per cent, then the federal authority will provide up to the maximum of the plan, that is, $10 per month for every child in that age group attending school. If that $10 per month per child in that age group exceeds the 3 per cent, there will be an additional contribution up to the amount that $10 multiplied by the school population in that age group in that particular province will produce. That is applying strictly the principle to be applied in every other province. That is the basis on which the federal authority pays $10 per month per child in that school age group of 16 and 17.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: But they must be attending school?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. Now I should like to deal with the increase in the share of estate tax. This bill proposes an increase of 25 per cent in the rate of abatement. You know that for some years now the rate of abatement by the federal authority in relation to estate tax leviable upon estates has been 50 per cent. That will be increased under this bill by another 25 per cent, to a total of 75 per cent abatement. But as an abatement it is not uniform in that it differs in its application in different provinces. There are three provinces which have succession duty acts. When the 50 per cent abatement came into force the provinces of Ontario and Quebec did not increase their rates so as to take the extra 50 per cent. So that what the federal authority does when a return is filed for estate tax purposes is to calculate the full estate tax at 100 per cent of the tax and then there is a 50 per cent reduction as a credit.

British Columbia has increased its own rates by the amount of the 75 per cent abatement, so that the 25 per cent increase in the abatement of estate tax requires no "pay-out" by the federal authority. In other words, only 25 per cent of the tax is collected on estates in British Columbia by the federal authority, and that province collects its own 75 per cent. In Ontario and Quebec, so far as this extra 25 per cent is concerned, these provinces have asked that the matter be let stand for the time being, and that the federal authority retain for the provinces the extra 25 per cent. Both of these provinces have tax commissions studying the question, and until these commissions have reported and consideration has been given to what kind of legislation the provinces wish to introduce, they want the matter to stand as it is. In the meantime the 25 per cent represents an actual cost to the federal authority which it pays to Ontario and Quebec, but the 50 per cent is an abatement which involves the payment of no money.

The other provinces which do not have succession duty acts have the federal authority collect the 100 per cent of the estate tax in relation to estates in those provinces. It then remits 75 per cent—it was originally 50 per cent—to the province.

I have been trying to make a distinction which will become important later. The difference between abatement of tax and the payment of money as a cost or as a contribution to the provinces is important, because the proposition I want to put to you is that where the federal authority abates there is no money paid to the province. It simply abates an amount of the tax otherwise payable by the individual, and then it is open to the province to impose a tax up to or in excess of the amount of that abatement. In two of the provinces of Canada at the present time you have rates of individual income tax greater than the federal rate of abatement.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Succession duties?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am talking about income tax now. In two of the provinces of Canada—Manitoba and Saskatchewan—you have a rate of abatement for individual income tax, on a percentage basis, in excess of the abatement that is provided under the Income Tax Act.

My purpose in pointing this out at this time is to draw attention to the fact that you cannot look upon the abatement of tax as involving the federal authority in having to find or raise money to pay to the provinces the amount of the abatement. Therefore, it becomes necessary for the provincial authority to impose tax if it wishes to get such income tax revenue from individuals. This is going along the line I have counselled and advocated many times in this chamber, that the spending authority should be the taxing authority.

There is one additional proposition that I wish to make, and I know of no better time for doing it than now. It is that I think this matter of abatement should be done away with, and the federal rates of tax should be reduced accordingly so that you would have a realistic federal rate. It would then be up to the provinces to impose, in the case of individual income tax or, as a matter of fact, in the case of corporate income tax, its rate to meet its needs. The taxing authorities in the provinces would not then have the federal authority running interference so as to disguise the full impact of the taxation its residents are paying and the identity of its authors.

When you file a federal income tax return your tax is calculated at the higher rate, and on the form there is provision for, say in 1965, a 21 per cent abatement; so you get a lower figure of tax payable. Then you go down to the next line and you see that you have to add back at least that amount for provincial income tax. What I say is that the proper, realistic and most effective way, so that the taxpaying public in the provinces know exactly what they are being assessed and who is assessing them, is to have the federal rate a realistic effective rate representing the amount of money that the federal authority levies and keeps, and the provincial authorities should do their own taxing. I think that would have a very salutary effect, and would be somewhat of a check rein on every expenditure, or on expenditures beyond what the particular province can really afford at the time.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: When the federal Government gives an abatement on a tax it relinquishes the right to collect that amount in favour of the province. Am I correct in that?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The rate of abatement is provided for in the taxing statute. Suppose you have an income of $1,000, and under the statute the rate is 14 per cent. The rate of abatement is a calculation which reduces the amount you owe the federal Government by 21 per cent and, therefore, if you stop there all you would have to pay the federal Government would be its rate of tax on your taxable income, with the percentage of abatement reflected, and you would pay the net amount resulting from that calculation.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: In fact, you pay it to the federal collector.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In fact, that is such common knowledge I thought I would not take up the time to tell you about it. However, as my honourable friend has interjected, I will say that of course the federal agency is the collecting agency for the provinces, but that is a matter of convenience for the provinces, and I think the economics might be very sound too.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I am not quarrelling with it, but I think what has confused the general public is that they make out their cheques to the Receiver General of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am not sure that that in itself confuses the public inasmuch as they pay their taxes calculated on the going federal rate, and then the arithmetic is done further down. If that is a source of confusion, then you have to weigh the two evils. You have to weigh the possible confusion that results, with the significant saving in administrative costs. The saving in administrative costs by having one collection agency is very substantial.

May I then tell you about the change in equalization? Let me illustrate it in this way: In 1956 when the tax-sharing arrangements act came into force a formula was worked out for equalization. The per capita income from standard taxes in a province was equalized to the average of the per capita income from standard taxes of the two top earning provinces in Canada. In 1961 when the revisions in the act took place, we were coming into another five-year period—these arrangements seem to run for five years—and several changes were made in the formula for this equalization. One change was that instead of having the per capita income from standard taxes of a province equal to such per capita from the two top earning provinces, the per capita income from standard taxes of a province was to equal the national average of income from standard taxes of all provinces instead of the average of the two top earning provinces.

There were actually three changes made in 1961. The second was that for the first time there was brought into this calculation what is called the natural resources revenue. In the 1961 formula it was provided that, when attempting to arrive at the difference between the per capita standard tax income of a province in relation to the national average, you must add to these standard taxes of the province the amount of one-half of the average of the natural resources revenue of that province over the three preceding fiscal years. You then got your per capita on that basis by dividing by the population. Then, to get your national average you took the income from standard taxes of all provinces in Canada and you added to that an amount equal to one-half of the three preceding fiscal years of the natural resources income of all Canada, and divided by the population.

One thing I have to add there is that instead of taking the total natural resources revenue of the province and the total natural resources revenue of all Canada, you take one-half the total, but you add it to both sides of the calculation—to the figure of income from standard taxes for the province and to such figure for all Canada. The problem then in determining the equalization payment was that it had to be such an amount as would cover the difference between the per capita on a national average basis and the per capita of the particular province. That amount of excess was the equalization payment which was made to the different provinces.

Now, there are three provinces in Canada which have not benefited from equalization. They are British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. There has been some question raised as to why the gross figure of natural resources revenue is used in the calculation, because there are costs. In answer to that I point out that the figure you use is one-half the natural resources revenue, and by taking only one-half it was felt that there is compensation for all these other factors of offsets.

That was the picture in 1961. Under this bill there is a change in that aspect. The change is, that in attempting to arrive at the per capita of the standard taxes income in a province you take that amount—that is, the whole amount of income from standard taxes for a province—and subtract from such income one-half of the natural resources revenue of that province on an average basis calculated over the three previous fiscal years. That is the only place where natural resources income comes into the formula under this bill.

In other words, in 1961 the natural resources income of all the provinces—as an average—calculated over the three fiscal years preceding the fiscal year you are dealing with came into the calculation on both sides. It was a plus. But, under this bill it comes in on one side only as a deduction from what would otherwise be the income from the standard taxes attributable to that province.

Maybe I should say what standard taxes are. Standard taxes are defined as including individual income tax, corporation income tax and estate tax. When I am talking about standard taxes I mean those three items of tax, and the abatement that goes to the province on those.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: What is a natural resources tax?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is not a natural resources tax; it is natural resources revenue, and it is so described. That is the revenue which a province has from the operation or sale, or whatever it does with its natural resources. I have not examined it myself to check it, but I am told that the provinces, in their balance sheets or statements, describe whatever they receive from their dealing, in whatever fashion it may be, with the natural resources of the province; they describe it as natural resources revenue. We are talking about the revenue; we are not talking about a natural resources tax.

I should point out now that the effect in this bill of changing the basis of equalization and comparing the per capita revenue of a province from standard taxes with the per capita income from standard taxes of the two top provinces, instead of with the national average, is to increase the equalization payments on a per capita basis to those provinces very substantially. For instance, in 1964-65 at the present rates of standard taxes, the estimated national average is $42.61 per capita. That is the figure which is used under the 1961 arrangement and is still being used until this bill becomes law; and what the province gets is the difference between that and its own per capita in its own province. But by the change in this bill, where you go to the average of the two top provinces instead of the national average—the two top provinces being Ontario and British Columbia—the estimate there for 1964-65, at the present rates of standard taxes, should yield $54.92 per capita. On that basis, by changing this method of calculation and reverting to the 1956 method, we are providing, for those provinces which earn equalization and become entitled to it, an additional amount which represents the difference between $42.61 and $54.92 per capita, and the dollars are calculated by multiplying the population by this amount of difference.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Would my friend put a dollar figure on that?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, I think I could. The changes in the equalization—and this is exactly what I have been talking about—for 1964-65 will produce and will require the pay-out of, or will cost the federal treasury, $55,300,000.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That is for the current fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is for the current fiscal year 1964-65. While I am at it, I might as well give the other item. The additional 25 per cent abatement on estate tax will cost $32,170,000, less $3,920,000, which would be $28 million-odd. Therefore, the pay-out by the federal authority in the current year 1964-65, by reason of this change in the equalization formula and by reason of the 25 per cent increase in the abatement on estate tax, will be of the order of $84 million to $85 million.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Would my honourable friend give me the third figure, which I think completes the picture?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Which is that?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: What is the abatement on income tax, disregarding for the moment the special abatement for youth allowances which under the bill are supposed to be equalized?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If my friend had noted, I was talking about the year 1964-65.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I know, but I am thinking of those hidden things which are ahead of us.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I can give my friend the same figures for 1965-66, which would reflect this additional abatement. That is where this full abatement goes on, and that is why I did not give it for this year—it had no application.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: It has some application in the future.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is for my friend to talk about. When he develops his argument, I will see what it means. In 1965-66 the same two changes that I discussed in relation to 1964-65—that is, the changes by reason of the change in the equalization and by reason of the additional 25 per cent abatement of estate tax—will require a pay-out by the federal authority, or an additional cost, of about $102 million.

Now, the rate of abatement—the increase in that for 1965—will lessen the amount of income tax collected by the federal authority to the extent of about $64,500,000. You will notice my distinction between what is a pay-out or a cost, and what is a lessening of the income to be received by the federal authority.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: At the bottom of the page, though, it all works out the same way.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My friend can develop that. I do not know which page he is looking at, or which page he is talking about.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Could you give me the figures for 1966-67?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. The changes in the first two brackets—that is, on equalization and on the 25 per cent estates tax—will result in a pay-out or cost of about $121 million. The abatement—that is, the additional four points for 1966-67—will result in a lower income tax collection by the federal authority in that year of approximately $139 million.

It might be advisable if this table to which I am referring were either appended to Hansard or attached to the remarks which I have made on it. If there is leave from the Senate, I would ask that this be done.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Is this the same table which was placed on the record in the other house by the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes; but the interpretations are edited by me, applying whatever little intelligence I have to it and drawing attention to those distinctions.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Would you change the heading, "Estimated cost to Federal Government" and so on?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Part of the interpretation which I have made here shows the estimated cost to fall into two divisions—I have been calling it estimated cost or pay-out, and then I have been talking about the abatement element, which is a lessening of the receipts on the Government side, which they do not pay out. While "estimated cost to Federal Government" may, in a large general sense, be a reasonable heading, it is not the heading I would have put on it if I were drafting it originally.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: In this case I would take the view of the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have never asked you to take my view on anything yet, and I am not going to start now. I believe my view is an accurate view, a sound view. You have a distinction in cost between what you have to pay out, because you have to find the money for it, and what may not come in, because you do not collect it.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): What does it mean to the average taxpayer? Does he pay more or less?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Who is the average taxpayer?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not want to take any substance from my friend's remarks, because no doubt he intends to speak on these matters when I have finished and I wish to leave them for him. It may be that he will define for Senator O'Leary what is an average taxpayer.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Do I pay more or less?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is a question only the senator can answer, or his auditor. I am talking generally as to what will happen. To the extent that the federal authority has to pay out additional money by reason of the change in the equalization formula and by reason of the additional 25 per cent deduction for estate tax, the Government of Canada will have to find that money. It usually finds it by borrowing, and it usually levies taxes for that purpose. If the rates of tax are increased, then one can more specifically say that this is the reason. If the Government gets along with the present rates and continues with deficits, that simply means postponing the payment of this. Therefore, in answer to the honourable senator's question as to whether he will pay more or less, I cannot answer, because I do not know what the policy is going to be, whether the Government intends to levy taxes specifically to take care of this pay-out. I do not know whether the senator will still be in the same or a lower income tax bracket. I hope it will be a higher one by that time, so that the Government will get more money from him.

My friend preferred the view of the Minister of Finance, and therefore I want to make an additional statement which I would not otherwise have made.

The total pay-out in 1964-65, by reason of the increases provided in this bill, and by reason of the carry-through from previous years of the same 50 per cent deduction and estate tax, is represented by three items. As to equalization in this period of 1964-65, the total pay-out will be $213,237,000. The total pay-out on estate tax at the 25 per cent rate will be $28,250,000. The total pay-out, a continuing one in relation to the 50 per cent which carried over for a considerable period of years, will be $10,901,000. This makes a grand total of $252,388,000 in total pay-out in relation to these items for 1964-65.

If Bill C-111 did not become law, the total amount of pay-out would be, for equalization $157,928,000, and for estate tax at 50 per cent, $10,901,000, or a total of $168,829,000. The difference is about $84 million, which proves the answer I gave to my friend a short time ago from another source of information. So it is a sort of double check.

I have spent some time on estate tax and equalization. I do not know whether I have succeeded in confusing the situation or not. I have talked about the abatement. Before I leave abatement to deal briefly with several other points, I want to stress very clearly the difference between rates of abatement and equalization payments.

Rates of abatement simply make available to the province the opportunity to occupy an area of income taxation with relation to individuals for any rate it likes without increasing the overall tax of the individual, unless the provincial rate exceeds the rate of abatement. The provinces are not bound to impose a provincial tax at the rate of abatement allowed federally. They can impose less or more, but the fixed rate of allowance is what is specified in the Income Tax Act and in this bill. Therefore, there is no limitation on the province in the rate of income tax that it may apply. However, there is a limitation on the allowance that the individual taxpayer will get in the year on his individual income tax otherwise payable.

The only comment I wish to make on these changes which lead to the provision of more money is that I think there is an increasing interdependence between provincial operations and federal operations, and that the condition of the people, the state of the finances in a province, and the development of the provinces, are factors that may adversely or beneficially affect the national image of Canada and its prosperity; therefore, in an increasing way, the Canadian authority is going to have either to make available to the provinces opportunities in taxation fields or make payments. I favour the method which would require the provinces, within the limits of their capacity to tax, to impose their own taxes. However, I also say that we have provinces in Canada, even if they impose taxation, that could not hope to realize from the taxation sources that are available in the province an amount that would put them on the same basis that the equalization payments would do; therefore, for those provinces there will have to be some sort of supplementary contributions to establish what I believe should be a proper level of income for them.

Canada is a Confederation, and surely to have a Confederation does not mean that the rich provinces are to become richer and the poor ones become poorer. In the long run, that would affect the national image. It is of no use to fool ourselves about that. At some stage or other, the federal authority or other provinces will have to combine to help those that are not so well off. Otherwise, it would mean migration to the provinces with more wealth or means. We cannot dodge the question. Eventually the situation must be faced, that while Confederation subsists there must be found some method by which the various units representing the provinces in Canada are treated on at least a per capita basis of equality in the availability of income to provide the services needed, because failure to do so and to enable them to meet their requirements under the Constitution would provoke worse problems than finding money.

Do not take that to mean, honourable senators, that I am subscribing to the method which so far has been followed from 1956 to 1961, with variations now proposed, with the object of finding more money, as being the solution of these problems or that now we have finally found the answer. Frankly, I do not agree that what we have now is the best answer. In fact, I do not know at the moment what the best answer is. I have suggested one change, but we are going to have to keep on experimenting, working with various methods, to see where the answer lies. If the duty of a province is simply to levy such taxes as it needs to provide services which it must furnish to its people under the Constitution, and to pay such taxes as the federal authority imposes in the national interest, and its duty stops there, and it has no duty to make contributions greater than an interest in maintaining a reasonable equality in the conditions under which the people in the various provinces live, then I am sorry that I cannot subscribe to that philosophy, because I believe too much in the entity called Canada. I recognize the diversities that exist, but I would rather have them than uniformity in the various provinces and their people. I welcome the individuality of the provinces, and would rather have that than isolation and uniformity.

If we are going to have and to maintain this kind of philosophy of Canada—and notwithstanding all the criticism, we have done pretty well over the years—there will have to be something more than for the wealthier provinces to say, "We are going to pay our own way provincially and federally, and the other provinces can look after themselves." The provinces are too much interdependent for any province to take that kind of stand. The national image of Canada is more important and far greater than the sum total of the ten provinces, and that is something essential we must preserve.

Having said that, that does not mean that when the provinces say they need more money, we must simply find some way of getting it and giving it to them. There must be a regulator somewhere. Where to find it, I do not know. However, I have a suggestion to offer. I think within limits, the regulator must be a strong federal authority, and that regulator would exercise some discernment in relation to the proposed provincial expenditures to be put forward as a basis for getting more money or having more income available to the provinces.

There must be a regulator, and it would seem that a strong, central federal authority must be that regulator; because somewhere we must find a method of limitation, so that if provincial governments propose greater expenditures, it should not mean that the federal authority must accept that and provide the money.

There must be some correlation. Where that is at the moment I do not know, other than to say that somewhere within the federal authority correlation should exist so that you know that demands upon the provinces which they say are beyond their capacity to meet concern services that are essential and that are needed in order to give the standard of living to the people in those provinces that they should have in Canada, so that there may not be vast distinctions among the different provinces.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: You are recommending the same policy for every province, from a strong central government?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. Well, let me say this: I am saying that a strong central government must examine the demands which are made by the provinces. In a bracket I am saying to you that I am not discussing now the question of contracting out. That is not in this bill. I expect that in due course we might have a bill of that kind to deal with. So, in what I am talking about I am dealing exactly with what the tax-sharing agreements are intended to provide. They are intended to recognize provincial needs, to make available within the limits of the federal capacity to do so, income to meet those needs. But I say there should be some exercise of authority on the analysis and determination of the needs. Do those needs go beyond what it is fair and reasonable that a central government should provide, having regard to the needs and demands of all the provinces? If my friend is asking me, do I say you should—

Hon. Mr. Brooks: You are advancing a general principle.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: —you should operate like a sausage machine and keep turning out payments and say, "This much is for you, on the basis of population; and this much is for you," I am not advocating such a sausage-machine technique.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Do you say you are supporting co-operative federalism?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: When I was thinking about this bill and what I would say I felt that some time or other the phrase "co-operative federalism" would be thrown at me. Well, here it is.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What is the prepared answer?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The prepared answer is: "What is co-operative federalism?"

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not think it is any part of my function today in explaining this bill to give you any definition of "co-operative federalism." To the extent I have suggested that you are not going to accomplish the success you want in maintaining, developing and increasing the relationship of Canada as an entity, and the national image of Confederation as we picture it with the preservation of the individuality and diversity of the provinces, unless you have co-operation among all the parts—if "co-operative federalism" means that, then there it is, and there is my opinion on it. If it has some other significant political or subtle meaning to which I have not been exposed so far, then I reserve the right, when I hear what the extensions of that phrase are, to express an opinion on it.

There are several other things in this bill with which I think I can deal very briefly. For instance, there are sections 5 and 6—and I have already dealt with section 7. In section 5 you will notice reference is made to the Crown Corporations (Provincial Taxes and Fees) Act. We passed the bill here some time ago setting up that act for the purpose of exposing the crown corporations to certain provincial taxes—gasoline tax and such things as that. The reason for including this in section 5 of the bill is that there had been discussions and agreements in principle on doing this very thing more than two years ago, but it had not been done. The provinces were asking and pressing that when this finally became law it should be made retroactive; but it could not be made rectroactive. So an agreement was reached under which some lump sum payments would be made in relation to the two previous years before this bill passed into law, in lieu of revenues that would have been available to the provinces if this kind of legislation had been passed when the agreement had been reached that it would be enacted. Therefore, it became necessary to include this provision in section 5.

Section 6 deals with youth allowances. I have already dealt with that and explained that the reason you have these provisions is because they are needed to supplement the provisions we have by way of rate of abatement in the Income Tax Act.

The other section of the bill I should direct your attention to is section 2. That section deals with three provinces. You will note it refers to the 1956 act, the Federal-Provincial Tax Sharing Arrangements Act. That act is still in existence, and the reason it is still in existence is that they have not as yet adjusted and settled the payments to which the provinces are entitled by reason of succession duties and succession duty income on estates in the various provinces. They have now agreed in principle that the different years will be settled on whatever the state of the account is four years after the date on which the person becomes an estate. Accordingly, for estates taxes and the deduction of 50 per cent thereof, and also to determine averages that are required, you will find that while the 1956 statute applies for five years, it will be 1967 before the accounts in relation to the estates provisions in the 1956 act will be fully closed out.

There is one question resolved. That is that the three provinces—Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Manitoba—are being given what is called a one-year option. The use of this one-year option for the determination of succession duty rental applicable in these provinces of Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Manitoba is in respect of the years 1957-58 to 1961-62.

The provision which is now incorporated in section 2 implements an undertaking by two previous administrations, but never formalized by statute, it being argued that a province that did not rent received 50 per cent abatement of the estate tax on the one-year basis, therefore those provinces that rented should have such an option. The ordinary basis of calculation of abatement for such provinces as did rent was 50 per cent of a three-year average. This one-year option was extended to British Columbia by a letter from the then Minister of Finance of February 14, 1957, to Saskatchewan by a letter from the Minister of Finance of May 17, 1957 and to Manitoba by a letter from the Minister of Finance dated October 30, 1957. This legislation will mean a faster basis of finalizing the accounts for those years. No other province expressed any interest in the one-year option.

The benefit of the one-year option is this. The standard succession duty applicable to a province under this legislation for a given year was equal to 50 per cent of the three-year average, including the year of calculation and the two preceding years. Depending on various factors, one approach in a particular year might produce more revenue to the province than the other method with the three-year average—I suppose, depending on the number of persons that became estates and depending on the size of the estates. So these three provinces, at their request and by agreement now finalized in this section of the bill, are given this option, if they wish to exercise it when they study the figures for the particular years.

The other item is in section 3 of the bill, entitled, "Newfoundland Grant." This proposed legislation adopts the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Newfoundland Finances, appointed under term 29 of the Terms of Union. At the present time there is a payment of $8 million per annum recommended by the Royal Commission on Newfoundland Finances, authorized to be paid under section 3(3) of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act until March 31, 1967. What this section proposes is that the terminal date be removed.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Was that the additional grants section under which Newfoundland was paid $8 million?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There were additional grants at the time and there is this specific one under Term 29. The amount has not been changed or added to in any way, but the terminal date is being removed.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Does that mean that the payment goes on indefinitely?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Until a Government puts in a new terminal date.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Until such legislation is enacted. A Government that does this can do something else. I should say that a Parliament that does this can do something else. But I would think that before Parliament would make any changes there might be further study, and there might be many factors that you can summarize as well as I can.

Hon. Mr. Baird: This is the amendment Newfoundland has been looking for, for a long time.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. This is tantamount to an assurance of $8 million for an indefinite period.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: It could be increased or decreased under Term 29.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Once the terminal date is removed, any Parliament in future could make different provisions.

Hon. Mr. Baird: But surely it is not intended for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I did not gather from my friend's question that he was suggesting there was an ulterior motive in removing the terminal date. I gathered it was being done because Newfoundland was pressing for it, and because it was felt that the greater assurance with no terminal date was better than the limited assurance given by a terminal date.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Whom were you quoting when you said that somebody had an ulterior motive?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: What I was saying was that you did not have an ulterior motive. I took your question at its face value.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I did not have an ulterior motive. Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Was there ever a terminal date? Did not the agreement provide that it should be reconsidered in 1967?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is a terminal date for the payments. The authority to make payments is only to March 31, 1967.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The authority may only extend to that date, but the agreement says it should be reconsidered at that time.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not know that there is any difference between my friend and myself. What I am saying is that there is authority to pay $8 million a year which will terminate on March 31, 1967. Now that terminal date is removed by this legislation. That is all I am saying. I am not saying what the effect is or what the effect of other provisions may be, but I assume the parties could come together and reach agreement.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: The royal commission stated there should be $8 million per year paid until March 1967, and thereafter—I think they really meant "hereafter"—they were going to continue paying $8 million.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: "Hereafter" has many connotations, and some of those connotations, I would say, are most indefinite. I would favour the idea of striking out the terminal date if we want to have some assurance of continuity. But then of course somebody would have to take action to establish a different basis if there is to be a different basis. In the meantime it goes on without the limitation of time.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask my friend if he would care to envisage the possibility of its continuation from 1967 on, or what modification might occur upwards or downwards?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In the presence of excellent representatives from the Province of Newfoundland who would have a much closer knowledge of conditions in that province than I have, because theirs is a close-range view while mine is a long-range view, and accepting the recommendations of the royal commission on the $8 million, and knowing how uncertain some things are that must find their authority in Parliament, and how sometimes you should not count on them until they happen, I would not venture any guess at all—not even a guess as to what might happen in 1967.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: You laid a good foundation for that speech.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I think I have covered in more detail than I had intended the pertinent provisions of the bill. I have tried to deal with the subject of the bill, that is the fiscal arrangements, very briefly, but because I did not take much time in dealing with the subject matter I hope you will accept my statement, my feelings, my views and philosophy in this matter, that I doubt if there is any subject in the make-up of Canadian Confederation and the relationship of the provinces to the federal authority, which could be higher on the list than this one, because everything in Canada and even the very future of Canada itself depends on the success of combined provincial and federal operations.

In my view one essential for that is that there must be a strong central authority which will recognize the limitations on its purse, and the necessity of serving national purposes which are over and above and beyond the scope of the provinces. It takes money to do that. I include this additional factor that we should not, in making the payments, permit such a continual drain upon federal income and finances and on taxation to produce that income that the deficits, in this era of deficits in which we are operating, will be increased by reason of the contribution we find it necessary to make. Sooner or later the era of deficits must be terminated and we must enter an era where we are able to finance much more substantially than we are doing now the requirements of Canada. We must be able to do it out of the revenues we collect without imposing any heavier burden on the people, and I would hope perhaps we would be able to do it with a lighter burden. That depends upon so many factors that I would not wish to be taken as being dogmatic. We cannot go on as we have been. We have been piling up deficits, a substantial part of them being made up of our pay-outs to the provinces and an abatement of our sources of income so that the provinces may supplement theirs.

At some stage the federal authority has to stop being a happy hunting ground for revenues, and there must be some reasonable relationship between needs, available revenues, and the capacity of the federal authority, having regard to the national demands upon its treasury.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I recall that at one time somebody used the expression "fiscal jungle" to describe the situation that prevailed before the last war in the domain of taxation in Canada. I wonder what expression we should use to describe the present situation.

I think the sponsor of the bill is the only one who could conduct us through the inextricable labyrinth that constitutes the field of fiscal relations between the federal authority and the provinces today. Also, I think he deserves a word of commendation for the excellent job he has done. However, if he has shone some rays of light through this jungle, there are still many corners that are completely obscure.

I can understand that in an hour or so no professor could give a complete lecture on this subject, and I am quite sure that no pupil could learn everything in the same time. The only point that is abundantly clear is that this is a very complex subject. I remember when I was studying the Bankruptcy Act during my law course my professor said, "The more often you read some sections of this act the less you are apt to understand their meaning." This, I think, is applicable to the sections of the bill before us, and probably to the sections of many of our other taxing laws. Because it is so complex I trust I may be allowed, in the hope of making my remarks a little clearer on the record, to continue them in French.

(Translation):

The field of fiscal relations between Ottawa and the provinces rests on the British North America Act which, under section 91, gives the federal Government, the federal Parliament, the right to collect money through any method or system of taxation, and the provincial legislatures, the right to direct taxation within the limits of the province in order to raise revenues for provincial purposes.

Those provisions with which we have been experimenting for nearly 100 years have gone through four periods. The first, which was free of conflict and lasted until the First World War, shows that the federal Government abstained from levying direct taxes; it was satisfied with getting its revenue from indirect taxes, and during that same period, the provinces balanced their budgets almost exclusively with revenue from their natural resources. Indeed, it was only at the end of the 19th century, that is around 1898 or so, that the provinces started levying one of the major taxes which Senator Hayden called standard taxes, namely estate taxes. But until the war, that was the only major tax levied by the provinces. Income tax was still unknown.

I will set the other period in 1914, instead of 1917, when the federal Government levied a personal income tax while apologizing for doing so. It must be remembered that at that time if it was not an interpretation of sections 91 (3) and 92 (2) which I mentioned a little earlier; it was at least a kind of tacit agreement that the federal Government would not enter the field of direct taxation. In any case, that personal income tax, which was called wartime tax, became a permanent tax. Of course it is today one of the main sources of revenue for the federal Government as well as the provinces.

The third period is that which we knew during the last war. The tremendous effort the country had to make at that time justified the step taken by the central government in taking over the whole field of direct taxation, of the main taxes; the personal income tax, the corporate income tax and the succession duties. At that time, the federal Government, because of the war, wanted the provinces to withdraw definitely from this field of the three major taxes and it is then that the tax rental agreements took place. Those agreements were continued after the war, and that is why I am right in suggesting that after 1945 the Government wanted to force the provinces to fully withdraw from the field of the three major taxes.

It so happened, and it was the beginning of the fourth period which is still with us today, that the Province of Quebec, in particular, followed by Ontario and subsequently by other provinces, opposed that firm policy of the federal Government to get the provinces to withdraw from these three major fields in return for compensatory payments. We have witnessed during this fourth period a partial retreat of the federal government and the establishment of a coexistence system between federal and provincial taxations in the field of personal income tax, corporate income tax and estate duties. However, at the same time while the federal Government was granting subsidies to provinces and was taking away from the provincial governments the responsibility of assessing and collecting taxes, it happened, as Senator Hayden mentioned a while ago, that each time the provinces needed additional income they appealed to Ottawa.

I have already mentioned on a previous occasion that the 1961 act was nevertheless a landmark by handing over their responsibilities to legislatures in fiscal matters with regard to the three main taxes, because that act put an end to rental agreements. It allowed the abatement of the federal tax in favour of the provincial tax. But it also enabled the provinces to set the rate of the provincial tax.

Therefore, we are in the midst of that period. Yet, for reasons that are not always very consistent, the provinces still tried to make both ends meet by means of adjustments or grants obtained from the central government. As I said earlier, these last few years federal-provincial conferences have been typical in that threats and ultimatums were made along these lines: "If you do not settle our fiscal problems, if you compel us to levy an additional tax and to increase the rate of the existing tax, well, the war is on." That was the attitude taken in particular by the Quebec government. That province precisely tried to get out of solving its own budgetary problems.

At any rate, that is what led to the confusion we have at this time. Under the present system, a series of minor adjustments have to be made to the fiscal legislation to solve a number of individual cases. That is what created this fiscal jungle and this intricate labyrinth I mentioned a while ago. If a solution is to be found eventually, certain terms will first have to be redefined. In the public mind and even here and at the other place, there is an extraordinary confusion concerning the meaning of certain words and expressions used currently in the field of taxation. On a previous occasion, I spoke of the obscure meaning of the words "double taxation."

I feel it is inevitable that the federal Government and the provinces should both derive some revenue from personal and corporation income taxes. I believe that both should have a share in those sources of revenue, which are the major sources, those that reflect most clearly the general prosperity. Of course, one may use the expression "double taxation" to indicate that two governments are taxing the same thing. But those words ought not to be used to indicate that, in a certain province, such a tax is higher than in another. That already exists in the Province of Quebec where, in some cases, the provincial personal income tax exceeds the abatement allowed on the federal tax. That is why that province already had "double taxation." It is the case in other fields, such as, for example, the estate taxes. The inequity of some taxes is obvious between certain provinces in Canada. Some of them even refuse to impose some taxes, while others levy them. For instance, the rate of taxes on retail sales varies between Quebec and Ontario, and other places, and in some provinces this tax is totally nonexistent.

These words "double taxation" must be qualified and determined more precisely, and should not, in my opinion, be used only as veiled threats when negotiations are being carried out between the central government and the provinces.

Another expression which suggests much vagueness is the one concerning the sharing of taxation fields. It seems clear to me that the B.N.A. Act gave the central Parliament a right to levy direct taxation and also indirect taxation, and to the provinces only a right to levy direct taxation for the purposes of balancing their budgets. It was suggested that the provinces had a priority in the field of direct taxation. I do not think so. The personal income tax and the corporation tax, in particular, were unknown at the time of Confederation and those major taxation fields cannot, as I said, belong exclusively to one level of government. The presence of both governments in this field must be accepted. But that does not mean that it is not advisable to take into consideration that problem of the sharing of taxation sources, and to allocate definitely and exclusively to the provinces certain very definite sources of income and to the federal Government other incomes also very definite. That sharing formula contained in the B.N.A. Act dates from a time when our present taxation could hardly be foreseen. An extraordinary development has taken place since then. But the sharing of sources must not be confused with the sharing of the proceeds of all sources. Now this also happens frequently in the discussions that are taking place here or in the other place or in provincial legislatures. The tax dollar is not something static; indeed any tax can have its ups and downs. We seem to think that the major problem consists in dividing this tax dollar by giving a percentage to the central government and another percentage to the provincial governments. This is, I think, another cause of confusion which should be dispelled.

Another point on which I feel some light should be thrown has to do with the responsibility for determining the rate of a given tax. At the present time, for all practical purposes, the personal and corporation income tax rates seem to be set only by the federal Parliament. The provinces, though free to decide upon a rate of their own choosing, seem to take for granted that such a rate can only be determined by the federal Government.

Now, I submit that Senator Hayden's suggestion in that connection would be a fine first step towards clarifying the situation. When those agreements expire in 1966, the rate of the federal tax should be adjusted to its true level. Then, each government could solve its problems by itself and determine on its own the rate of its taxes. Under the present arrangement, if the federal Government had to increase its personal income tax rates, it would have to do so for the benefit of the provinces even if the latter did not need to raise theirs. It is the same thing in the case of a tax cut. The reductions the federal Government has been able to grant in its tax rates were for the benefit of the provinces. In other words, the federal Government has never been able to take credit for tax reductions. Therefore, I agree completely with Senator Hayden. I intended to express such views and that is why I was so happy when I heard him do so a few minutes ago.

Now, there remains another area about which I want to say a word and that is equalization. I have already indicated that I do not see how, in the immediate future, it would be possible to abolish this system tending to equalize the income to enable provinces with lesser means to provide minimum services to their people. I believe in the interdependence of provinces. The richest provinces should help those who are less prosperous; this is essential to the survival of Canada. I should like, however, that this question of equalization would not include only the matter of services. It happens too often that the federal Government competes with the provinces. I shall simply mention the student loans legislation passed ten days ago, which is a typical case where the federal Government competes with the provinces in a field where they had already taken the lead. Instead of taking such an initiative, the federal Government should have convened the provinces and considered with them an equalization formula or an adjustment of the existing formula, so that the provinces might provide approximately the same service in this field to their own people. That method should have been followed earlier instead of setting up an assistance scheme for students which once again comes into conflict with one that exists in nine provinces out of ten, because it has been established, I think, that Newfoundland is the only province which has no students' loan plan.

That is why I say that the intricacies of fiscal relations between the central government and the provincial governments are linked to the problem of the apportionment of responsibilities between the two levels of government; therefore, it becomes more and more necessary to define and redefine the division of powers and responsibilities. If we are unable to decide what comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces, on the one hand, and of the federal Government, on the other, fiscal relations between the federal Government and the provinces will never improve and we will remain lost in the jungle which Senator Hayden described earlier.

Senator Hayden told us that he believes in a strong central government. I am not sure that this is the right answer. After the war, we had, under the tax agreements system a strong government which was able to take action alone. The provinces could not face their obligations in their own field, and that is why the central government gave grants to the universities, for instance, thus entering a field which was under exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

I, therefore, think that clear definitions of the responsibilities of governments must be looked for. In any case, the federal Government should recognize that its first responsibility is to mind its own business. Of course, it must come to the aid of provinces when they have responsibilities without having the income to meet them. That is the principle of equalization, but let the federal Government refrain from entering directly into fields which do not concern it.

As far as the letter of the British North America Act is concerned, if certain provincial responsibilities are to be transferred to the federal Government, negotiations should be undertaken previous to such a transfer. But amendments to the Constitution should not be made indirectly as, I think, has been done in recent years.

In any event, honourable senators, such are the few remarks that I felt I had to make as regards this bill. I recognize that the subject is a vast and complex one, that it would perhaps have called for a better prepared speech on my part, but I hope, nevertheless, that I have succeeded in expressing my main ideas on this matter.

(Text):

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I expected some further contributions to the debate today. In the event that this measure might be passed this afternoon, I wish to make a few remarks now.

I congratulate Senator Hayden on his wonderful presentation. I liked his speech today much better than on previous occasions, for I detected at least a softness of heart towards the have-not provinces which require additional revenues.

I also wish to congratulate Senator Flynn. I think he brought out some excellent points from the standpoint of the provinces which need additional revenue, and which evidently have the natural resources from which to realize those revenues.

My brief remarks will be from the standpoint of the have-not provinces, just to remind honourable senators and to emphasize some of the reasons why it is necessary to have these equalization grants.

We realize, of course, that the equalization grants or payments represent an attempt to equalize the level and quality of provincial government services throughout the nation. It is a recognition of the principle that all Canadians, regardless of geography, should have access to similar levels of educational, social, health and other services. To achieve this objective, the income of the people who reside in the various provinces must be taken into consideration.

The average income per capita of the people of the Atlantic provinces is less than two-thirds of that of the nation, and in recent years has been growing at about one-half of the national rate. Consequently, if a provincial government is to maintain these services on the national level, the incidence of taxation in any field must be heavier than in a province where the average per capita income is at, or above, the national level.

In addition to that, an equitable distribution of national revenue is justified. The fact is that many of our national commercial enterprises—our large corporations, such as banks—pay income tax in the province where the head office happens to be, which in the majority of cases is in the large centres of Toronto and Montreal, while their income is earned from every province of Canada.

I would remind honourable senators that the people of the Atlantic provinces provide a most important market for the goods produced in industrial Quebec and Ontario. Much of the family budget is spent on goods which come from those provinces, and while we do not share in their industrial prosperity and the employment opportunities which these industries offer, we make a very sizable contribution to the cost of keeping these industries profitable, through tariff protection.

May I mention just one class of many items of which the Atlantic provinces are large purchasers, namely, automobiles, tractors and motors. Only recently I happened to admire a beautiful car of standard make, parked along with some others at one of the golf clubs in our province. I discovered that the car was American built, and learned from the owner, who happened to come along, that he had purchased it in Boston. Another car of the same make was standing nearby. A comparison of the prices paid for the two cars, one American and the other Canadian, revealed the fact that the American car had cost $3,400, while the Canadian purchaser informed me that his car cost him $4,700.

There may be some reasons for such a wide difference in price; but the fact is that on the 46,000 automobiles which are purchased each year by citizens of the Atlantic provinces, the duty and tax amounts to a large sum of money on that one item alone. Of course I could mention many other similar items.

This is just one reason why we of the Maritime provinces, Senator O'Leary, are magnificent examples of "co-operative federalism," for we do co-operate, and we have learned the cost of being good Canadians. In other words, we are paying a good price for the privilege of being Canadian citizens. We do not object to that at all, but we want to remind you that it is a costly business. We have also discovered since Confederation that water will not run up hill.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Even in New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: What about the Reversing Falls?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Since Confederation trade with industrial Canada has been a one-way street. Everything comes from the industrial provinces down to the Maritime provinces; very little goes the other way.

I think these things should be emphasized when we are discussing the value and importance of equalization payments. I agree with the previous speakers who said that perhaps this legislation is among the most important that has come before Parliament. I think it has a far-reaching effect on the future history of this country, and the Senate might very well employ its best brains in working out a solution of the "fiscal jungle," as it was described this afternoon, to establish some formula to make a firm foundation for a united Canada in the future.

One hears much these days about separatism —I hope we will hear less about it in the future—not only in the east but also in the west. The chairman of the National Centennial Commission, speaking last year before a meeting in Montreal, with reference to the question of separatism in Quebec asked, "What about our problem in British Columbia?" Dr. N. A. M. MacKenzie, the retired President of the University of British Columbia said, "What about our problem of separatism in British Columbia?" There the trade goes both north and south.

I think this is a very important subject for legislation, and that the Senate would do well in the future to give it very serious consideration; I believe we could make a great contribution towards the solution of this problem.

As each new generation of Canadians appears, the ties which bound their forefathers to the rocks from which they sprang are not as strong, and new Canadians who have come from other European races have still further diluted those ancient ties. The great wars held us together, but since the last war there have been signs that we are drifting apart, and dangerous signs of building up a Maritime or Atlantic provinces culture, a Quebec culture, an Ontario culture, a prairie culture and a west coast or British Columbia culture. Honourable senators, we are today badly in need of a Canadian culture, and I think this bill represents one very important way in which we can acquire what I consider is a necessary atmosphere of Canadianism first, and provincialism second.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McCutcheon, debate adjourned.

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-111, to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and to provide adjustments of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, first I would like to join those who have spoken in this debate in congratulating honourable Senator Hayden for the painstaking and lucid way in which he has gone through what is not an uncomplicated matter. Without wishing to draw any invidious distinctions between my honourable friends opposite, when Senator Hayden or Senator Leonard deal with a financial bill, particularly with one as complicated as this, they remind me of the wise professor who is attempting, and successfully so, to explain and simplify a complicated problem to his class.

Senator Hayden did this to perfection. With what he has said as to the purpose of this bill and with his factual statements, there is little if anything with which I would take issue; nor can I take issue with much of the philosophical statements with which he larded his remarks. He believes in a strong Canada. So do I. He believes Canada is greater than the sum of its parts. So do I. If it were not, then Confederation has failed—and Confederation has not failed, and it will not fail. He believes in the principle of equalization payments. So do I. One may quarrel about the formula, but I think we are all in agreement on the principle.

However, my honourable friend did recognize some dangers which were inherent in what we are doing in this bill. He said, as reported at page 957 of the Debates of the Senate:

> Having said that—

He was referring to the principle and the philosophy lying behind equalization payments.

> —that does not mean that when the provinces say they need more money, we must simply find some way of getting it and giving it to them. There must be a regulator somewhere.

I hope I shall not be accused of going out of context; I do not intend to read the whole passage.

> There must be a regulator, and it would seem that a strong, central federal authority must be that regulator; because somewhere we must find a method of limitation, so that if provincial governments propose greater expenditures, it should not mean that the federal authority must accept that and provide the money.

In answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Hayden said, as reported at page 958:

> ...a strong central government must examine the demands which are made by the provinces.

Whether that would be acceptable to some of the provinces remains to be seen, but it does indicate to me that Senator Hayden—and I am sure there are many other honourable senators who would agree—considers that under certain circumstances our "needs," to use that much misused word, may sometimes outrun our resources, and that a time comes when it is necessary to equate our needs to our resources and possibly determine priorities. I shall have something more to say about that later, and I shall have more to say about it on other occasions in this chamber.

I want to turn for a moment or two to the specific provisions of the bill. First, let me deal with the abatement of succession duties or estate taxes. I spoke about this when the bill to amend the Estate Tax Act was before this house, and briefly I am going to recapitulate what I said at that time.

It seems to me that the time has now come—and this would be the first step in what Senator Hayden advocates, namely, that the provinces collect their own revenues, accept their own responsibilities and face their own taxpayers, and not have the federal Government running interference for them, I think he said—it seems to me the time has now come, and long since possibly, when the federal Government should step out of the field of succession duties and estate taxes. I refer again to the statement of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, when he spoke sympathetically of certain representations that had been made to him for relieving amendments to the Estate Tax Act, and he said that he did not feel it proper to act on those recommendations because he would be depriving the provinces of more revenue than he was the federal Government. Having reached that ridiculous position for a Minister of Finance I suggest, honourable senators, that, in accordance with the views Senator Hayden expressed at some length yesterday afternoon, the federal Government now withdraw from this field.

Then we come to the change in the basis of equalization. I am not going to attempt to discuss the details of that this morning. Any equalization formula will be open to criticism by some persons or some provinces. I have already said I am in accord with the principle of equalization. Otherwise, I agree with Senator Hayden that Confederation ceases to mean very much. Possibly when the bill is in committee we can obtain some more information as to the reason behind the changes in the formula, and what the effect will be on the various provinces.

Dealing with the income tax changes, Senator Hayden drew a distinction between payment and abatement.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I called it a pay-out.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Pay-out and abatement. He said as reported on page 952 of Hansard:

> The difference between abatement of tax and the payment of money as a cost or as a contribution to the provinces is important, because the proposition I want to put to you is that where the federal authority abates there is no money paid to the province. It simply abates an amount of the tax otherwise payable by the individual, and then it is open to the province to impose a tax up to or in excess of the amount of that abatement.

Now I suggest that while the distinction is a perfectly valid one, it is a distinction without a difference when we are viewing this matter from the point of view of the federal Government. The table which Senator Hayden placed on record and which is incorporated in yesterday's debates is the same, with the elimination of a few words which would be inappropriate if included in our debates, as that tabled by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons. It is headed "Estimated Cost to Federal Government of Proposed Change in Equalization Formula and Increased Tax Abatements for the Three Fiscal Years 1964-65 to 1966-67". Senator Hayden said he would have put a different title on the table, but I suggest this is in fact what the bill is going to cost the federal Government. That is the reason I asked the questions and made the interjections I did yesterday; we see there are some hidden factors in here which I think should be very clearly brought out into the open.

The cost for 1964-65—and I shall refer to that in more detail later—is only $87 million, and that is the cost which is incurred as a result of the federal-provincial conference in November 1963. It is only in 1965-66, the next fiscal year, that we find the first of the additional costs which the federal Government incurred at the meeting in April 1964, to which I shall later refer at greater length. By that time the total cost of the provisions of this bill to the federal Government has reached $171 million; and in 1966-67, the last fiscal year to which this arrangement applies, the total comes to $264,973,000.

It is all very well to say an abatement is just an abatement and the federal Government does not pay out any money, but the fact is that the federal Government collects less money; and following the agreement reached in Quebec City in April of this year the Minister of Finance said—and he did not sound very happy in the quotation I read—that he was losing this amount of federal revenue, an additional amount as a result of the Quebec conference, which was estimated at $64 million for the fiscal year 1965-66 and $139 million for the fiscal year 1966-67. These are the figures of the Minister of Finance.

He said that there were only three ways by which this can be compensated. One would be to increase taxes, at the very time when our friends to the south are having lower taxes. The second would be to cut expenditures. One need merely read the estimates for the current fiscal year to realize that that is somewhat unlikely, particularly—and I shall come to this again—as so many of the items in the estimates are completely beyond the hand of the Minister of Finance to control. He has recently referred to the position he is in in that regard. The third, of course, is to increase deficits.

Those are the three alternatives that the Minister of Finance said he had when faced with the adjustments made in Quebec in April of this year. Certainly, the first and the last are rather unpalatable, and the second is unlikely of realization. So whether Senator O'Leary (Carleton) will pay more or less, as he asked yesterday afternoon, I cannot say, any more than Senator Hayden can say, until we see what Government policy will be. I am also, as Senator Hayden said he was, in favour of moving towards a balanced budget.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I do not think I would be as strong in my statements as he was. We had some discussion the other night about the kind of budgetary accounts that the federal Government keeps, and how on the basis of those accounts it charges most capital to current expenses, and so on. There would be very few solvent businesses in this country if they adopted that practice. The most successful businesses in this country that I know of find their capital expenditures going up each year, and in many cases their debt going up each year, and yet the shareholders remain perfectly happy.

I am looking at Senator Crerar when I say that this is not a plea for indiscriminate spending, but I did look at the public accounts to see what Canada's record is. At pages 238 and 239 of Volume I of the Public Accounts for 1963 I found that in the fiscal years from July 1, 1867 to March 31, 1963 there were only 24 years in which the Canadian Government had a surplus.

But, I must return to this bill and to this question of abatement. Now, "abatement" means something. It has some meaning, if when the federal Government steps out of certain areas of the tax field, as it is stepping out of certain areas in the income tax field, then it receives some quid pro quo. There is a quid pro quo in this bill in those references in section 7 to the additional abatement granted an individual who resided on the last day of the taxation year in a province that was, in that taxation year, a province providing schooling allowances within the meaning of the Youth Allowances Act.

There is a provision for complete equalization. If the abatement is greater than the payment out, then the province makes it up, and, on the other hand, if the province pays out more than the abatement then the federal Government makes it up. So there is a complete equalization there, but the abatements that we saw last fall and this spring, and those we have seen previous to those times, by and large have not been abatements for which there was any quid pro quo at all.

The extent of federal contributions to provincial revenues either by way of statutory subsidies, tax abatements, tax rentals, equalization and conditional grants is set out at page 113 of The Report of the Federal-Provincial Conference of 1963, a copy of which I think all honourable senators have. That gives the figures from 1956-57, when the total was only $689 million, up to and including 1963-64. The figures for 1962-63 and 1963-64 are merely estimates. The total for 1963-64 is estimated at $1.946 billion. The total over the eight-year period is over $10.5 billion, a figure which is far in excess of the accumulated deficits during that period, and a figure which bears some significant relationship to the total debt of the federal Government. Perhaps we did get a quid pro quo, and perhaps I should go back and correct myself. Perhaps we did get a quid pro quo; perhaps we did get an abatement for that extra 2 per cent in 1965-66 and the extra 4 per cent in 1966-67. I think I should go back in history for a moment.

A federal-provincial conference was held in November 1963. There were certain agreements then, which were reflected in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance in March 1964. There was another federal-provincial conference from March 31 to April 2, 1964, and all that one can judge from the communiqué is that little was accomplished at it. Then there was a running down to Quebec City by representatives of the federal Government, unaccompanied, as far as I know, and without any prior consultation with representatives of the other provinces. Then we were told that "Confederation had been saved" because of these further abatements, which we are putting into effect now. The quid pro quo—and I suggest a very unsatisfactory quid pro quo—was that the province of Quebec would modify its pension plan so that the federal Government, having made some further modifications to its pension plan, could say that we will have, in effect, a uniform pension plan across Canada.

Let me make it clear that I have no objection to the Honourable Mr. Lesage, or the Quebec Government, using their bargaining power to the utmost under those circumstances. That is the proper thing for them to do in the interests of the people of the Province of Quebec.

I had no objection, when the Province of Quebec announced that it was not going to participate in the original Canada Pension Plan or even in the second and third versions of it, that it was going to have its own funded plan—because it was made very clear that it wanted to build up a very substantial fund of money which would be available for the economic development of the province. If the people of Quebec desire a funded pension plan, as I say, I had no objection when they announced it, and I have no objection today. Having regard to their own particular economic position and their aspirations at the present time, if the people of the Province of Quebec are prepared to remove the sanction of the market place from their government, that is for their decision, since that really is what building up these huge funds in the hands of the provinces means.

What I object to is the federal Government being deprived in the year 1966-67 of $139 million of revenue in order to foist a funded pension plan on all the other provinces of Canada, some of which have indicated that they are perfectly satisfied to deal with the matter within their own borders and in their own way. That of course is a subject to which we shall return, but I say that that is the quid pro quo for reducing our federal revenues by this very substantial extent and I say conservatively that it is a most unsatisfactory quid pro quo.

At page 950 of Senate Hansard, Senator Hayden, referring to the development of the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements since the end of the war, said:

> The Government of Canada over the years since the war has tried by various means to see to it that the provinces secured additional revenues so that they might be able to carry on effectively their obligations and responsibilities under the Constitution in relation to those things in which they have their own sovereignty or exclusive jurisdiction; and also to take a larger share—> or, in some cases a share, of some of the responsibilities that heretofore the provinces had been looking after, but which have become larger and more and more national in character, and therefore justify the intervention of the federal authority and the provision of financial assistance.

There are two schools of thought in this country as to whether the federal authority is justified in intervening in fields that are the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, at least without prior consultation and agreement. I suggest that it is time for us to realize that these methods, which have been adopted by three governments of Canada since the war, are methods which cannot continue.

Senator Hayden, I may interject, said that we were not concerned with opting out in this bill, that there might be a bill before us one of these days dealing with that. I did not understand that at all. It is implicit in clause 7 that there is provision for opting out, and by that clause we compensate any province which opts out from the Youth Allowances Act, under the terms and provisions of that act, which has already received royal assent. That raises the whole question of intervention in matters which are strictly within the field of the provinces and raises the whole question of the ability of the Minister of Finance to prepare a realistic budget; and it shows the extent to which these things have been taken out of his hands. The Youth Allowances Act is not a good example of that: it is merely an example of the better kind of opting out, because there is an equalizing regulator, in that the federal Government is going to pay X dollars in any event and the opting out provision is such that it completely balances.

I am referring again to the table, appendix B of the federal-provincial conference in 1963, and I look at one of the joint programs under the heading, "Conditional Grants." The amount to be paid out in 1963-64, the preliminary estimate for one item, was $383,900,000. That is the federal Government's share of the hospital insurance scheme. It is a substantial item in the budget and an item over which the Minister of Finance has lost a great deal of control.

The report of the Hall Commission, recommendation 200(1)(d), is that the provision of outpatient services under the hospital insurance scheme be a condition of any further payment in respect to inpatient benefits. In other words, what is recommended is that the Hospital Services Diagnostic and Insurance Act be amended to force the provinces to add to the minimum services in respect to which they are to share the cost, if they are to receive any contributions from the federal Government, the cost of outpatient services.

Whatever we may think of that recommendation, we shall have plenty of opportunity to discuss it in the future. The reason I mention it now is that it is in the hands of any province today, or tomorrow morning, to do exactly what the Hall Commission is recommending and to add scores of millions of dollars to the federal budget without the Minister of Finance having anything to say to it. That is true also of many of these other programs.

I know the Minister of Finance may quarrel with what I am going to say next, but I suggest that a case can be made out. The federal authority used to be the dominant factor in both the field of fiscal policy and the field of monetary policy. The road along which we are going is such that the federal authority will have less and less influence in the field of fiscal policy. I have no figures, but I suggest that when grants and abatements are running at over $2 billion a year, out of a budget of some $7 billion, it is a fair indication of the extent to which, in fiscal policy, the authority of the minister has been eroded.

When you add to that the fact that the provincial-municipal debt, direct and indirect, is not far off the total federal debt, and that provincial-municipal revenues are running approximately equal to federal revenues—provincial-municipal deficits are running respectably near or probably a little higher than federal revenues—you see the extent to which we are losing control.

Now, it may be that that is necessary and inevitable; but I think it should be at least realized. I think that the time has come to reassess this whole problem. To quote Bruce Hutchison's remark from his article in one of yesterday's newspapers: I do not think we should continue indefinitely this system of "raiding daddy's pocket." Those were his words.

The time has come, in my opinion, for a review of the Constitution. Not a federal-provincial conference at which you sit down for three or four days, and go away with as many plums in your pocket as you can, but rather a conference representative of men of all parties in all provinces—a conference which might last for weeks or months, as similar conferences have done. It would be a conference that would adjourn from time to time, and reassemble in an earnest effort to achieve a realignment of duties, responsibilities and authorities, in the light of conditions in 1964.

The Province of Quebec has legitimate aspirations. So have other provinces. They are entitled to the opportunity to realize them in the light of their varying cultural background.

Here I would like to interject that I object to this term "Canadian culture," just as I would object to the term "United Kingdom culture." There is no United Kingdom culture. There are many cultures; there are many cultures in Canada, and will continue to be.

In spite of greater sums of money from the federal treasury, no matter how happily they will be accepted by the provincial premiers, and notwithstanding, as I understand it, that there was no full consultation at all with the other premiers when the deal was made in Quebec City by one of the federal ministers and a high-placed official of the party, none of the premiers has come out and said, "No, we don't want that abatement. We don't want the opportunity to collect this extra money." They have always accepted it. However, that is just a palliative for the real problem that faces us. There must be more fundamental action taken, if we are to build up the kind of Canada that I want, and which I think all honourable senators are in agreement they want; and I suggest that involves a fundamental consideration and appropriate revision of our whole constitutional position.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, my first word this morning is to join in the compliment paid to Senator Hayden for the lucidity with which he explained a highly complex and involved matter.

I feel bound to say that I rather agree with Senator Flynn's remarks made in English yesterday, that he had found it difficult to wade through this jungle of words—

Hon. Mr. Hayden: My jungle of words?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Oh, no. I have not quite finished.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: There was a pass through your jungle; you could see the way.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If Senator Hayden had not interrupted me, I was going to go on to say, "this jungle of words as reflected in the language of the bill now before us." Senator Hayden has already been paid a compliment.

The second thing I want to say is that I wholly agree with the devotion expressed to a strong Canada, both by Senator Hayden and Senator McCutcheon. However, candor compels me to say that I doubt very much if the discussion over the matters reflected in this bill is going to contribute much to a greater and more united Canada.

I do not propose to discuss in detail the terms of this bill. I have searched diligently, and I can scarcely find any principle upon which it is based. I hope therefore to present to you this morning some aspects of this problem that are not dealt with in the present bill at all.

I have very grave doubt in my mind that we can ever find a solution to the relationships between the provinces and the federal authority by means of this kind.

It is interesting to look back 100 years and think about what brought Confederation in this country. It was mainly the product of tensions and frictions that had developed between the old province of Canada, composed of Lower and Upper Canada, or, as we call them now, Quebec and Ontario.

The significant thing was that at that time there were found men of great capacity, ability and vision, who recognized that the conflict of those days was a fatal course to follow; and so we find opponents as strong as Macdonald and Brown, who were bitterly opposed to each other, who came to the conclusion that they must sit down around a table to see if they could not solve their difficult problems. There were men from the Province of Quebec with the vision and courage to say, "We join you in this—it must be done." As a result of that, we obtained what we call our Constitution, and the course was set for a united Canada.

That Constitution was based on definite principles. The outstanding principle was that only matters of very general concern, like trade and commerce, banking, defence, to mention only a few, were to be the responsibility of the federal Government, and that all matters of local concern, like the administration of justice, the administration of education and schools, roads, and things of that nature, were to be of provincial concern.

On the matter of how these different authorities would secure their revenue, the provinces were limited to direct taxation. The federal authority had the power of both direct and indirect taxation.

We got along very well under that Constitution from 1867 until the end of World War I. True, difficulties arose between some of the provinces and the federal Government, but those difficulties were resolved in the courts and everyone accepted that. Outbreaks or difficulties of any serious nature rarely developed during that period.

I think the main reason we are involved in these difficulties with the provinces today is that we have raised our sights very high in the matter of expenditures, and at the outbreak of World War II the provinces surrendered for the period of the war their right to revenue from income taxes. They left that to the federal authorities for the prosecution of the war. It was always recognized that the income tax was a direct tax and, consequently, some argued that the provinces should have priority in access to that tax. But, at any rate, I think the trouble really started after the end of the last war.

In my view—and I have some knowledge of the matter—a trend of thinking developed following the last war that it was important, if Canada was to become a great nation, that there be more centralization in Ottawa. Consequently, the federal Government maintained its authority to collect these standard taxes which Senator Hayden explained yesterday. Coupled with that they recognized that new social concepts had arisen that had to receive consideration—things like pensions, family allowances, and now hospital insurance in a pretty broad field.

Let us bear in mind clearly that those functions which were the responsibility of the provinces under the Constitution were, one by one, taken over by Ottawa. The first was unemployment insurance, and the provinces agreed to an amendment to the Constitution placing that in the federal jurisdiction. The next was family allowances, and then followed pensions and hospital insurance. I wish to emphasize that practically all the responsibilities of the provinces in this field of the broad spectrum of social welfare were taken over by Ottawa. There is no doubt in my mind there was a good deal of thinking in Ottawa at that time that this would provide the argument why Ottawa should have the collection of and full access to these standard taxes. There was another argument, and it was a rather powerful one. It would be foolish if Ottawa had a system of income and corporation income tax and if each province had its own system, and the citizens had to file one or two or maybe three returns. An effort was made to consolidate that. Ottawa agreed to give in the beginning, I think it was, 10 per cent of the income it derived from these taxes back to the provinces on an equal basis; but since then the provinces have been pressing Ottawa for more and more money, and we find the culmination of that pressure today in the bill before us. The effect of this bill is—if I understand it aright, and I think I do—that about 25 per cent of the revenues derived from these standard taxes—corporation, estate and personal income taxes—will be divided among the provinces under its provisions. How long will it be before the provinces are back again saying, "We must have more money"? In my judgment, this bill does not settle anything.

This method of dealing with this matter is open to another very grave criticism, and that is the principle, well known and accepted generally, that the authority that spends the money should have the responsibility for raising it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: That does not apply to the abatements, but only to the direct allowances to the provinces?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes. In effect, what we are doing here is making the federal Government bear the criticism, for instance, if income taxes are levied at an excessive rate on the individual citizen; but if the federal Government, in turn, pays those taxes over to the provincial authority to spend on schools, on roads or in any other way it likes under the arrangement, the provincial authority has no responsibility for taxing the people of its own province and, consequently, that tends, I think, to extravagance and, maybe, to wastefulness. If you have a "sugar daddy", as Senator McCutcheon said towards the close of his remarks, where you can go and get funds, that is very fine; but I think the principle is absolutely sound that the authority that spends the money should have the responsibility for taxing its own people to get it.

The conclusion of all this in my mind, is that a new arrangement must be worked out. The principle on which that arrangement should be based is this: Let the provinces and Ottawa arrive at a clear understanding of their respective responsibilities, and then discuss how the total revenues of the country can be divided to enable each authority to carry out its responsibility.

I obtained some figures from the Bureau of Statistics the other day which gave me concern. The question I asked was: What is the total public debt, federally, provincially and municipally in Canada? The report I received indicated that the total federal obligations—not the bonded debt, that is only part of it—are about $25 billion. That is explained by the fact that the federal Government has responsibilities, for instance, for pensions to its servants, and for its annuities it has been selling for years—and I think probably every annuity has been sold at a loss. It has other responsibilities. For instance, it has the obligation of the crown corporations, some of which are very doubtful in their foundations. However, putting these all together the total federal obligations are about $25 billion. The total of the provinces is over $9 billion, and the total of all municipalities in Canada is over $6 billion. If we lump these individual figures together we find the total public debt in Canada today, federal, provincial and municipal—is around $40 billion.

It does not make much difference to me whether I am taxed by the federal, provincial or municipal authority. The thing that concerns me is the total burden of taxes I have to pay, and an examination of those figures indicates the seriousness of that situation. I am not here to assess blame for how this has arisen—that is water over the dam and is gone. However, I do suggest that there is no matter of greater concern for Ottawa and the provinces to consider than to get together and discuss this question and see if they can reach agreement on their respective responsibilities. There is no doubt in my mind that there is a tremendous amount of overlapping in provincial and federal administration. Take agriculture as one instance. The federal Government is concerned today in a large way with all aspects of agriculture, and you can go to pretty nearly every province in Canada and find they are duplicating that service. Surely something could be done about that.

The point I wish to make is that in the interests of Canada—let me repeat—Ottawa and the provinces should get together and, if possible, arrive at an arrangement whereby federal responsibilities are definitely fixed, whereby provincial responsibilities are definitely fixed, and then some agreement as to how the total revenues could be divided to enable each authority to carry out its responsibility. I am bound to say that as far as I am concerned, if necessary, in the end, I would be prepared to fight an election in this country on that issue.

Then we might get away from this carnival of making promises to the electorate in order to get votes. That was not done by the Fathers of Confederation. They dropped all those considerations and thought only of how they could lay the foundations for this nation. Are we, after 100 years, to throw that ideal into the discard? Surely it is possible to find men in Canada, men of vision and ability and with sufficient confidence in each other that they can sit down today and solve these problems that are almost as great, but not quite as great, as those faced by the Fathers of Confederation. That is the proposal I want to submit to this house.

There is one other thing that concerns me very much, and that is the erosion of the value of our money. If history teaches us one lesson it is this, that the supreme responsibility of government is to try to maintain a stable value for its currency. What has happened? During wartime a measure of inflation is inevitable, but it is nevertheless interesting to note that what $67 would buy in 1939 costs $100 in 1949, and what $100 would buy in 1949 would now cost $136. I think this is a matter of very great importance. It is a matter which does not hit the members of this house very much because we received an increase in indemnity which matched the increase in the cost of living. The salaries of civil servants have been increased, and we have had the repeated threats of strikes unless labour received more money, which was granted, and which also matches the increase in the cost of living and compensates for the erosion of the value of the dollar.

But what about the hundreds of thousands of people in Canada, the best citizens of this country, who are living on fixed incomes? These people saved during their working years and invested their savings and thought they had sufficient to maintain themselves. But what has happened? Let me give you a direct illustration. A citizen bought a 4 per cent $1,000 bond in 1949. That gave him an income of $40 a year. There has been a decline of more than one-third in the value of his $40 in the short space of 15 years and today his purchasing power from the income from that bond is only about $26, whereas he expected it would be $40. That is an indication of what happens when creeping inflation, or any other kind of inflation, overtakes us.

I have often marvelled at the wisdom shown by the Fathers of Confederation. They had to deal with practical difficulties that had existed for almost 20 years in the administration of the old province of Canada. They knew where the pitfalls were and they laid down a constitution which we have largely departed from. I for one do not believe for a moment that this country can be successfully governed or can be held together by concentrating more and more power in Ottawa. I think the division laid down by the Fathers of Confederation was a wise division. We had better let the administration of justice, education and roads revert to the provinces, and let each play in its own back yard.

Above all, let us try to get this thing settled because, honourable senators, if it is not settled within the next 10 or 15 years, or less, I fear for what may happen to the unity of this nation because this, I think, is at the bottom of disunity more than anything else.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to say anything on this particular bill, but since 11 o'clock we have been flying so high in the thin air of high finance I thought if I said a few words it might bring us back down to the more mundane things of earth.

I congratulate Senator Crerar and also the other honourable senators who have spoken so well. I am quite sure they have given enlightenment on this serious problem of high finance, and the facts just given to us by Senator Crerar must cause us all to pause and to consider just where we are heading.

I wish to refer briefly to clause 3 of the bill. Yesterday, apparently I had the audacity to ask certain questions relative to that clause and somebody in the house implied that I had some ulterior motive.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I want to correct that implication. I have no ulterior motive at all. But as I said a moment ago, I want to bring us back to the mundane things of this world, and particularly to the provisions of clause 3. It says:

> In addition to all other payments, grants, subsidies and allowances payable to the Province of Newfoundland, the Minister of Finance may, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay an annual grant of eight million dollars to that Province in the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and in each subsequent fiscal year.

The wording is that "the Minister of Finance may"—not shall—"pay an annual grant . . ."

Now, we have seen some ministers of finance who were rather whimsical at times, and the payment of this $8 million to the province from which I come depends upon the whim of the Minister of Finance for the fiscal year concerned. What I want to bring to the attention of the Senate is that it is not in keeping with the promise made by the honourable the Prime Minister in 1963, sometime prior to April 8, which I believe was the date of the election. That promise is contained in a beautiful advertisement—and I have kept a copy of the newspaper of April 8, 1963 for reference. All the promises made are outlined here by the Liberal party. Excuse my mentioning the party, but everything today is done on a partisan basis, so I do not find myself able to depart from it completely.

The reference is to term 29—some of you may and some of you may not remember what that term means. It is one of the Terms of Union which brought us into Confederation in 1949. I shall not read the term in full, although I have copied it out. The term stated that in view of the difficulties of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, and so on, the Government would set up a royal commission to determine how much financial aid would be necessary for Newfoundland so that it might carry on public services in the province without having to resort to taxation more burdensome, having regard to the capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the Maritime provinces.

That commission was set up, and, as honourable senators know, it recommended the payment of $8 million a year. Then in 1959 the Prime Minister of Canada made a statement which aroused everybody in Newfoundland—some one way, some the other—and particularly did it arouse our premier. He went to the country on it, and got everybody into a terrific state. During that election campaign, and during the federal election campaign of last year, the promise was made that Term 29 would be restored. That is to say, there would be no question whatever about it; we would get the $8 million a year indefinitely.

This is the promise that was made at that time:

> Mr. Pearson will restore Term 29 to Canada's constitution, pass legislation—

And this is the legislation.

> —providing that the $8,000,000 a year to Newfoundland shall never be changed except by the free, willing and mutual consent of both Governments, the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland. Thus will Newfoundland's solemn rights be restored . . .

I just want to bring to the attention of honourable senators that if section 3 of this bill is meant to carry out the promise that was made at that time—and there is no question that it was preached all over Newfoundland by our premier and all the other Liberal men and women who were advocating the election of a Liberal Government federally—and if this is the section in this bill that is to take care of that payment of $8 million a year, then I say something has gone wrong. Something has gone very wrong. Either the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister of Canada has had a terrific change of heart. They were going to restore it, and we were going to get the $8 million in perpetuity.

A short time ago in the House of Commons the Minister of Finance was asked, "What about this? How far will it go? How long will the payments of $8 million a year be made?" And Mr. Gordon replied, "Indefinitely." What does "indefinitely" mean? It means exactly what this bill says, namely:

> In addition to all other payments, grants, subsidies and allowances payable to the Province of Newfoundland, the Minister of Finance may, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay an annual grant of eight million dollars to that Province in the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and in each subsequent fiscal year.

I emphasize the word "may".

So all the fuss and fury that was raised in Newfoundland during the 1959 election campaign and the federal election campaign last year has been brought to naught. In fact, the Diefenbaker Government, in spite of what was said in 1959, did pay that amount of $8 million while in office, and it more or less promised—this is only more or less—that it would be renewed from year to year unless changed by the two governments. That is all that is here.

I want to point out, now that I have brought you down from the high plane on which we have been flying ever since 11 o'clock, that even prime ministers do not always live up to their promises, and neither do ministers of finance. As I said before, they have their whims. If you do not agree with them, they can say, "No, you are not going to get it this year." That is politics. If the wrong premier gets elected in Newfoundland—or, shall I say, the right one—and the wrong fellow becomes minister of finance at the federal level, then we are going to have trouble getting our $8 million.

If it were in order—and I know it is not, this being a sort of money bill—I should like to change the word "may" in section 3 to "shall". I cannot move that in amendment, but I want to bring it to the attention of the opposite side of this house that the Government is not living up to the promise that was made by the Prime Minister.

I am not bringing politics into this matter at all. Certainly not. I would not think of it —not in this sanctum sanctorum. I would not think of raising politics here, but I want honourable senators to understand that not all prime ministers live up to all their promises. If you do not believe me, then I will mention another promise:

> Join O.A.S. Mr. Pearson will carry Canada into the Organization of American States for mutual trade and defense.

That has not happened yet.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Do not criticize him for doing right, though.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I am criticizing the opposite side for not carrying out its promises. I agree with what the honourable senator has just said. They may be right or wrong. I am not as well versed in high finance as is the honourable Senator McCutcheon, nor am I so well versed in international affairs that I would dare say whether it is right or wrong to join the O.A.S. I do not want to get into the O.A.S. argument. I just want to point out that when I asked the question yesterday —and I only intended to ask the question— the answer that honourable Senator Hayden very kindly gave me was a suggestion that I had an ulterior motive. If to raise that point shows an ulterior motive then, all right, I did have an ulterior motive.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, like the honourable senator who has just spoken, I am neither a constitutional lawyer, a financial expert nor an ex-cabinet minister, and certainly some of the qualifications that come from such backgrounds would appear, on the surface at least, to be necessary for anyone attempting to put forward an opinion on this bill. However, I have been interested in the general subject for a good many years, and I must say that as a layman I do not find myself lost in admiration of the end result of the many years of expertise that have gone into the discussion of the subject matter of this bill.

I would like merely to suggest to this chamber, and perhaps to others who may be dealing with this problem in the future, the questions that, to me, seem naturally to occur to a layman looking at this problem, the first of which would be: Is it necessary that this problem be as complex as it has been made to be?

The bill deals with one area of federal-provincial fiscal relations. Outside that area there are other conditional grants, unconditional grants and other payments. In my estimation I think it is true to say that the essential problem of dividing revenue in accordance with the constitutional powers and responsibilties of the federal Government and the provinces has been fragmented into something like 25 or 30 separate areas of action between the two levels of government concerned.

To take a quick look at that fragmentation we have, first of all, these three areas sometimes known as standard taxes and which are the subject of this bill, namely, personal income tax, corporation tax and succession duties. We also have as unconditional grants: statutory subsidies, certain tax abatements, tax rentals, stabilization payments, 50 per cent share of income tax on power utilities, the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants, transitional grants to Newfoundland and an additional grant to Newfoundland. Under the conditional grants there are items of agriculture, health, hospital insurance, welfare, fitness and amateur sport, vocational training, highways and transportation, resource development, civil defence, municipal winter works, and other grants.

Additionally, we have payments for the benefit of provincial institutions which include two categories—university grants and grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property.

Further—and this, it seems to me, is another unnecessary complexity—this bill deals with three of those 25 or so subjects, and when we examine the bill we find it fragments those three into another seven. It deals with, (1) certain increases in the federal share of the estate tax, (2) the 2 per cent per year abatement of the personal income tax, (3) the one-year option in respect of equalization granted to Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia, (4) the extension of Term 29 referred to by Senator Hollett, (5) the Crown corporations legislation, (6) the 3 per cent abatement of personal income tax in respect to youth allowances, and (7) the equalization payments.

It has been suggested by a number of speakers that the time has come for the federal Government and the provinces to sit down and work out some less complex and more sensible arrangement for the disposition of these revenues in relation to constitutional responsibilities. I would suggest that the time is long overdue, because instead of moving towards that goal of simplicity we are moving in the other direction. At the present time we have an example of a type of new complexity that is being added in the new grant made on a completely new principle, and announced quite recently in the other place, for the building of a highway in the Province of Quebec.

I make it clear that it is merely incidental that this is a reference to the Province of Quebec. The Minister of Transport made this extraordinary statement in justifying fragmentation of this problem. This was his justification for moving into a provincial field, certainly without consultation with all the provinces. He said:

> Of course we realize that road building comes under the provinces, but we are told that there is such a backlog of Quebec's road building and rebuilding program that the Gaspé highway will not be completed before several years, unless special financial assistance is provided in that connection.

That seems to me to indicate a completely new principle in the fragmentation of this problem. Certainly one would wonder if the present situation is that, on any occasion when it can be proved to the federal Government that a necessary highway in some province will not be built for several years unless the federal Government gives financial assistance, that will be a justification for a further extension of federal assistance. I mention this not in criticism of this particular grant but to exemplify the increasing density of what has been called the jungle of federal-provincial fiscal relations, the hodge-podge which is being continually added to. A layman would ask the question: "Is it necessary that elected governments, after 95 years of dealing with this problem, with the assistance of all the experts, come up with nothing better than this hodge-podge with which we are faced and to which we are today adding substantially if we pass this bill?"

The next question which a layman would ask is: "How can it be that after these 95 years we are now coming up with another temporary expedient?" That is all this is. The Minister of Finance has said so. He has said he hopes that this will hold the line for the balance of this five-year period, that is, until 1967.

Some supporters of the Government in the other place have said, "This is far enough; the federal Government shall go no further." Another supporter said that the federal Government has already gone too far. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill, in closing the debate, would answer this question: Is it the hope of the federal Government that the proposals contained in this bill will, barring unforeseen contingencies, prove a satisfactory solution of this problem for at least the next three years, or is this a start on a further fragmentation?

The next question that a layman may ask is: Why does it seem that in certain quarters this is now being put forward as a new principle in federal-provincial relations? It has even been given a name, "co-operative federalism," and the suggestion is that this is a new policy, recently introduced by the present administration. Whatever co-operative federalism may mean—some have said that in their judgment it is neither federal nor co-operative, but I do not hold that view—whatever it may mean, certainly the principle of further increases in the amounts that the federal Government will in one way or another make available to the provinces, so that they can meet their constitutional responsibilities, did not begin within the last few years. As a matter of fact, it has been going on from the beginning. The original equalization formula had scarcely been set down when it was altered, and this process has gone on over the years.

There have been long arguments amongst those who considered this problem as to whether there should be more centralization or more decentralization. This matter was raised yesterday and again today in the debate here. I myself am not quite clear as to whether some speakers are urging more centralization of fiscal power or more decentralization. Everyone seems to speak both ways—and perhaps it is a problem which can be answered in that way. We had a trend over the years towards centralism. The word "centralism" was used as part of an attack on the Liberal administration when it was in office for something like 22 years. My recollection is that at that time the federal share of the total tax dollar reached about 80 cents. What it is now I have not been able to find out, but I imagine it is considerably less. Perhaps centralization went too far in those years.

Today the trend seems to be to decentralize, and there is evidence that perhaps we are already going too far in that direction. The layman's question that I want to put is: Why is it that, after 95 or 96 years, the Minister of Finance still says this is a purely temporary thing? He says there has been set up a committee called the Tax Structural Committee. I am not sure whether it has been set up or is to be set up, but he says that committee will look at this thing and try to work out a more satisfactory solution.

The fact that at this late date, a few years from the centennial of Confederation, we still accept of necessity another temporary expedient, does not enhance the work the experts have done in this field.

Another question which would occur to a layman almost immediately is: What about the consent of the provinces? Somebody has spoken of this whole recent trend as "infringement by consent," meaning thereby that the strict letter of the Constitution is being infringed particularly in respect to provincial jurisdiction but that there has been a degree of consent on the part of the provinces.

The main argument in favour of the arrangements now before us seems to be this: We have agreed on this; it is not the best thing; it will be improved on; but at least the provinces and the federal Government have agreed. Yet when one examines the comments which have been made, the fact of the matter is that there is no consent of the provinces to many of the provisions of this bill.

Honourable Senator McCutcheon mentioned this fact. I would go further than he did. The evidence before us is that in the matter of the arrangements regarding the inclusion of gross natural resources, some of the provinces are diametrically opposed. The only conclusion one can reach is that there was a meeting of the provinces and the federal Government; the federal Government put certain suggestions forward, certain principles, and these were accepted. The experts of the federal Government wrote this bill; the Minister of Finance has made quite clear that he did not write it, that it was written for him. They wrote this bill, but subsequent to the drafting of the bill the evidence is that it has not had the consent of the provinces. Indeed in some of the comments, in some of the discussion that has taken place, it is obvious that some of the bitterest criticism of the new equalization formula is being made on behalf of those governments which regard it as grossly unfair to their own interests. There is much evidence not only in respect to the gross natural resources provision but in respect to the equalization tax itself. It has been pointed out, for example, that Prince Edward Island, one of the provinces which might be regarded as in most need of equalization, will get less per capita under the equalization clauses of this bill than it has been receiving previously.

On another matter of consent, may I say that as a layman I am always amazed that no one ever seems to pay any attention to the fact that the jurisdictional rights that are involved—even here in this area of shared jurisdiction—are essential rights and are completely ignored. These are rights granted to the legislatures of the provinces, and I for one cannot understand how any government or groups of government can come back and say, "We are changing some of the essentials of the Constitution because we have an agreement with the executive of some provinces." Even if they have an agreement with the executive in the provinces, I ask you, would the Parliament of Canada tolerate for one moment a situation where the executive would compromise the rights given to the federal Parliament under the British North America Act, without requiring consultation with and the endorsation of Parliament? Yet do we ever hear of a provincial executive going back to its legislature and saying, "We have compromised some of the rights that were given to the legislature, and we want you to ratify what we have done"? I emphasize that point, honourable senators.

Someone may say that this would be too clumsy, that you cannot have all of these rights taken before every legislature. Of course that argument has been used to justify practically every abuse of executive power since the beginning of time.

Honourable senators, a great part of the trouble that has arisen in this field may well be due to the fact that the legislatures have not been consulted. I am quite sure that this bill as it stands would not be approved without substantial amendments, if it were put before the legislatures of Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and others.

Perhaps someone will say that this is just a phrase coined a long time ago—a legal fiction originating in the days of the original British North America Act, that these powers are assigned "exclusively to the legislatures." I suggest that it is not a legal fiction, because its history is part of the history of the struggle of the legislatures of the provinces and of the Parliament of Canada to control the executive, and that struggle is not over yet.

I suggest that when consideration is being given to the method by which something less temporary than this present arrangement is to be worked out, consideration also be given at that time to consultation with the legislatures, and that some method be arrived at by which, even if there is some delay, it will be laid down that there shall be consent of the legislatures—the owners of these powers—before any deal is made in connection with them.

Finally, I wish to make a suggestion, for what it is worth. Many are thinking now in terms of some spectacular things that can be done as we approach the celebration of the anniversary of Confederation. I suggest that when the appropriate discussions have taken place, and when this Tax Structure Committee—which I understand is to have representatives of the federal Government and the provinces—has come forward with perhaps a more permanent solution of this problem than we now have, there be called as part of the Confederation celebration, a joint meeting of the federal Parliament and all provincial legislatures to discuss this matter in a formal way to give the sanction of the provincial legislatures to the next expedient that we work out for the period which begins with the 100th year of Confederation. I can see some objections to that, but I am sure that some hall large enough to accommodate all who would attend could be found and that, if the preliminary work was done, ratification by the legislatures of our next expedient could be obtained within a reasonable length of time, and that we could then, in a way that everybody would understand, make it quite clear that this original division of powers, with modifications, if necessary, can still be worked out.

I took from Senator Crerar's remarks that he felt it might work without much change. I am of the view that it is not quite that simple, because problems which were purely local or provincial 95 years ago certainly have the colour of national problems now.

However, such a constituent assembly discussing these and other problems of the Constitution would make it clear that we really believe that the answer to the future of a great and greater Canada is an understanding and adherence to real co-operative federalism, in the best sense of the phrase.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Leonard): Honourable senators, it has been moved by the honourable Senator Pouliot, seconded by the honourable Senator Grant, that this debate be now adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, this motion is a surprise to me. I understood that it was the desire of all honourable senators, if possible, to deal with this bill to its conclusion today. I know that Senator Hayden has some appointments later.

I do not want to impose this view in any way, particularly upon Senator Pouliot. I wondered whether he might give an indication of when he proposes to speak. Do you propose to adjourn the debate until tomorrow, Senator?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I propose to adjourn the debate until 2 o'clock or 3 o'clock this afternoon; however, I can proceed now, if it is the pleasure of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Go ahead.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I had left for my hometown, but I came back to Ottawa because I considered that this debate is the most important that we have had for a long time.

I have listened with careful attention to the speeches that were made by my distinguished colleagues, and I still hope that there will be some understanding between the Parliament of Canada, or the Government of Canada, and the legislatures of the provinces in order that on both sides they will mind their own business in dealing with taxation and expenditures.

This is not new. Fifteen years ago I had the privilege of addressing a social club at Charlottetown, which I did not call the cradle of Confederation, because it was not true; but I called it a shrine. I saw the so-called Confederation table there, around which the Fathers of Confederation sat for a few minutes, and then rose and shook hands and decided to meet again the same month in the City of Quebec. That was all that was done in Charlottetown.

I have visited and admired the Island. It is one of the loveliest parts of Canada, but I find that the publicity that has been given to Charlottetown as the cradle of Confederation is most unbelievable. Nothing happened there, except the shaking of hands; yet one of the premiers suggested that each province and the Government of Canada subscribe $500,000 to erect a monument, to cost $5,500,000, to commemorate Confederation in the smallest of all the provincial capitals of Canada. It was built and jointly paid for. It was an advertising feat that had no parallel, even in the United States where they know how to boost everything.

That being said, I had the satisfaction of telling the club what I thought about the relations between the provinces and the federal Government. What the Fathers of Confederation had in mind was that everyone should mind his own business, that on one hand the Parliament of Canada should have exclusive powers and on the other hand the provincial legislatures were also to have differently exclusive powers.

We are under a delusion when we speak of Confederation as we do now, because it is not from the time of the B.N.A. Act that a united Canada existed. It was from the time that Lafontaine and Baldwin met together, joined together and succeeded in having a responsible government for this country. Then we had a united Canada, and other provinces joined us successively later on. But taking the B.N.A. Act as it is, and considering Confederation as it has been described by all those who have spoken about it, we have an act of the Imperial Parliament which defines the rights of the Parliament of Canada and the rights of the provinces, and on both sides they are exclusive, which means that Ottawa cannot infringe upon the rights of the provinces, and the provinces in turn cannot infringe upon the rights and the powers of Ottawa on matters which are respectively exclusive. It is just as clear as crystal water.

But what happens? At the present time there are complaints from the provinces that Ottawa is invading their jurisdiction, and they come to Ottawa not like the burghers of Calais, not with a rope around the neck and with a humble manner, but they come here with a big stick and make threats to the Canadian Government that if they do not get more money they will take steps to prove their discontent in a practical manner. I do not honestly think the Canadian Government should be impressed by the threats, the ultimatums that come from the west coast, from the Province of Quebec or anywhere else. I have great respect for my leader, the Prime Minister of Canada, and for the Leader of the Government in this chamber, but I submit that there should be no appeasement with regard to the provinces. All the dealings with the provinces should be in a business-like manner, and this cannot be as long as the provinces get from the federal treasury vast amounts for expenditures over which Ottawa has no control.

What I found very hard to digest was the warning of some provincial authorities with regard to the funds coming from Ottawa for purposes of education, that Ottawa had not the right to ask for an accounting. Who would think of that? They ask for more money, and what use is made of the money voted by Ottawa for education?

At first, honourable colleagues, the government in the Province of Quebec years ago decided to pay a subsidy of $10,000 to each classical college, and there was only one which refused that grant. It was the Seminary of Quebec, which had been founded by the priests at the time of Monsieur de Laval three hundred years ago. They said, "We cannot accept any imposition on our system of education." Now what has happened? More money was given to the colleges and universities, and then they started to spend more and more. Then, when the Government of Canada decided to pay grants to the universities, their expenditure had no limit.

It is very easy to see what is happening. We can go around and see the vast amounts of money which are being spent by the universities—for what? Was it for the education of youth? What is the kind of education they get? Is it worth the money that is spent so lavishly? Very often the answer shall be in the negative. In one of the vital matters, the history of Canada, the teaching is very poor, and similarly in other matters I will not enumerate now because I do not want to keep the house too long.

What do you think of them coming here for further grants without rendering accounts for the grants already made? As Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, it is unsound to collect taxes and give them away to another legislative body for expenditure. But the provinces are very happy. The amount of taxation they impose is less, and then they come to Ottawa and insist on receiving more subsidies for their own ends. Ottawa is not consulted on the expenditures; the provinces decide for themselves, but they always come to Ottawa to ask for more money. What do they do in return? They complain about Ottawa, that Ottawa is a big bad wolf which threatens the autonomy of the provinces—which is untrue. And what do they say? They complain about poverty; they say they are underprivileged. That may be true of some sections of the country, which I will not name, but they are very few.

I know very well that Canada is a rich country, a country with great possibilities but, as our Lord said, we should have compassion for the poor, the poor shall always be with us. That is true, but they are exceptions; it does not mean that Canada at large is not a prosperous country. I remember years ago, in 1908, when Sir Lomer Gouin succeeded in having the vast territories of Ungava in the Northwest Territories annexed to the Province of Quebec he said, "I want my province to be the largest, the most beautiful and the most prosperous." This is the language that he used, and it is the language of a real statesman.

Honourable senators, how is it possible to come to an understanding with regard to federal-provincial taxation? In the first place, there should be a meeting, with very few technicians but with men of good will, with exact figures, to inform the Government of Canada of the various sources of revenue of each province. They should put it on the table, to inform the federal authorities from where they are getting the money to meet their needs. Ottawa should do likewise. Then the provinces should come with their plan for expenditures, so that the whole thing could be settled once and for all.

How about the progressively increasing expenditures out of the federal exchequer? We have only to look at the tabulation that has been tabled in the House of Commons and in this chamber to see that the money that will be given by Ottawa to the provinces will be always more considerable. Each year the payment by Ottawa will be higher, and what happens? With that system Ottawa has the odium for collecting the surplus in taxes given away to the provinces. Ottawa is taxing the people, and then there are complaints that the taxes imposed by the Parliament of Canada on the people of this country are too high. But the provinces get all the benefit of that taxation.

I sincerely believe it is in the interests of Canada and of the provinces themselves that, as Senator Crerar said so well, each province should expend only the money it receives from its own taxation. If in special cases they are unable to make ends meet, there should be a definite and final understanding for a period of at least five years for a breathing spell. At the present time there is a great uncertainty; nothing is ever finished. The more money they get the more they ask for, and there is no end to it. What is the result?

Let us consider education. What is the money given by Ottawa being used for in certain provinces? It is used to preach separatism. Who is responsible for the separatist propaganda? Who is responsible for the talks we hear so much about and all the violent deeds which have occurred? If it is not some university professors, it is some provincial ministers who arouse the people. It is to be noted too that those who have been arrested for the crimes committed in Montreal were university students; and not only that, but I have been told from a very good source that there are teachers, male and female, who teach separatism to children in schools not too far from this house. It has happened in schools in Hull. You may ask people who have children attending schools in Hull what the situation is there. You will get the information.

Every one of you is against separatism, but who takes the means to stop it? One of the means to stop it is to control education and see that the money given away by Ottawa to the provinces is not used to encourage separatism in the schools and universities of this country. This is what I wanted to tell you and this is why I came back. If you want to stop an evil you must stop it at the root. In this case the root is the money that is so much craved for and sought after.

What about the rights of the provinces? What about their right to legislate? They pay no attention to that as long as they have money. They pay no attention to the formal text of the Constitution which obliges them to follow certain patterns in their dealings with legislation. My conclusion is obvious: it is that the Government of Canada should be extremely careful when dealing with the provinces and should tell them to wait before giving them more than they have now. There should be a sensible agreement between Ottawa and the provinces so that each one gets money from its own field of taxation and spends no more than that.

Was Ottawa consulted for all the foolish expenditure made by some provinces? I shall not name them, but you know them. The sky was the limit. It makes no sense at all. In my view Ottawa has been too lenient. What would you think if somebody incurs a bill and calls upon you to pay it when you have not authorized it? At the present time the provinces have a blank cheque to spend so much money and to use it to their own liking. It makes no sense at all.

How could we come to a satisfactory agreement? In the first place if it is true that the Province of Quebec is different from the others, then the Province of Quebec should tell the whole country what her needs are and what her understanding of Confederation is. She should say in black and white what she considers her dealings with the Government of Canada should be.

During the last general election campaign, on March 17 last year, at Blue River in Temiscouata County, I said in the first place that a constituent assembly would be of no purpose because the more people we had to decide matters as important as the real issues between the federal Government and the provinces, the greater would be the difficulty and it would be of no use at all. It would be a tower of Babel and would be utterly useless. It would remind us of the sans culottes of the French revolution. There should be a meeting of an equal number of government and opposition members of the Quebec Legislature who would meet in camera to discuss the needs of the province, to hear witnesses, if necessary, and to make a draft of the Constitution to submit to the provincial house for debate, and afterwards to the legislative council, and then we would have something to discuss. We would know all the ambitions, all the needs and all the expectations of the Province of Quebec and what it considers essential to stay in Confederation. At the present time there is no definite basis for discussion. There are only threats and ultimatums to Ottawa, and I do not see why the Government of this country should capitulate to them. But, honourable colleagues, that being done, a draft of the Constitution made by a committee, a non-partisan committee, and, as I have said, a committee that would sit in camera so as to avoid being impressed by the newspapers, and then approved by the provincial house and by the legislative council, could be submitted to the federal Government in Ottawa and to the other provinces as a basis for discussion. Where do we go if we have no such basis for discussion?

Everybody speaks against the B.N.A. Act; nobody pays any attention to it. And this present bill apparently is doubtful legislation. How can we go on like that? There is a feeling of fear in this country. We wonder how long it will continue. But the time is coming when the system of progressive grants must stop. There must be some final agreement if there are enough men of good will in this country to meet together and to make up to date the work done a number of years ago by the Fathers of Confederation. But to consider the situation as it is now, one may ask: "Well, how can we live peaceably together, prosper, and be happy together?" It will be done inasmuch as the legislative power here in Ottawa, and in each of the provinces, minds its own business and remains within its own sphere of action.

I could say much more, but I appreciate the fact that everybody has discussed this matter with sincerity and in the hope that there will be a day that should not be too far in the future when the dealings between Ottawa and the provinces will be different from what they are now, I do not speak about the equalization payments. I am not against certain help to those parts of the country that are in need, but I must tell you in concluding that Mr. St. Laurent, the former prime minister, was abused because he had said the Province of Quebec was no different from any other.

I sincerely believe that the farmers from the east are the same as the farmers from the west, that the professional men from the east are the same as the professional men from the west, and that the tradesmen of the east are the same as those from the west. The only difference is that some are more fortunate and better off than others, but their purpose is the same. Their purpose and ours shall be a united Canada, and there is no reason for any preferential treatment to any part of it.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Hayden speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, my reply will be very brief. I want, first of all, to thank Senator Flynn for the remarks he made yesterday afternoon. I thought his presentation of what I would call the philosophy of taxation, federal and provincial, and of the inter-relationship in that respect, was a job very well done. A great deal of it, of course, lies in the long range, but it is very useful to have thinking of this kind published so that the public generally might get some real understanding of what should be the philosophy of taxation in these areas.

Then, I want to put at rest the worries and concern of Senator Hollett over the use of the word "may" in relation to the continuance of this Newfoundland grant, and his worry that the Minister of Finance may become temperamental and stop payment. His worry should be more extensive if "may" means what he thinks it means, because the word "may" is also used in connection with equalization payments, in connection with stabilization payments, and in connection with conditional and unconditional grants.

The best information and advice that the Minister of Finance could get as to the language that should be used in drafting—and I am sure the same advice was given in 1961 because the word "may" in this connotation occurs in the enactment of the previous Government at that time, and as I recall it no concern was ever expressed over it at that time—

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Except some political concern.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, that is always with us, is it not?

The Department of Justice advised that the word "may" as used in this association, as in many other statutes, imposes a duty on the minister to make payment. In other words, it is the strange situation that at times "may" means "shall," but you do not say "shall" because there are other complications if you do.

Apart from that, I want to say several things in connection with the speech made by Senator McCutcheon. I enjoyed it very much. I thought it was one of the best of the great speeches I have heard him make in this chamber. If he were here I might congratulate him on his acknowledging and accepting so many of the tenets of political economy in this field of provincial and federal relationships that I had put forward. I express the hope, since he has gone far along that road, that sooner or later we might find him accepting them to the full extent of 100 per cent.

I must disagree with him in one further thing. I cannot deprive the honourable senator of his dreams, but I think he was dreaming when he was attempting to find a quid pro quo in relation to the increase in the rate of abatement in 1965 and 1966. That may come from reading too many detective stories, or it may be that dreaming produces a nicer result than looking at reality. But, while he was doing this I wonder why he did not apply the same method of reasoning and come up with a quid pro quo for the increase of three points in the rate of abatement in 1958, when the Government of that time increased the rate of abatement in relation to individual income tax from 10 per cent to 13 per cent, and then scaled up the rates in succeeding years until 1962 at the rate of one point extra per year.

I would not dare to suggest there was any ulterior motive other than the needs of the provinces and the recognition of the federal Government of that day of its responsibility in this area. That is why the rate of abatement was increased. But, not being a dreamer, possibly I am missing something. If I were a dreamer then perhaps I could find, like my honourable friend Senator McCutcheon, a quid pro quo.

I say that there is no quid pro quo in relation to these increases, and there was no bargain made in return for the provincial attitude to the Canada Pension Plan. I am ready to recognize the integrity of the Minister of Finance, and to assume that in this conection, whether the increases should have been made or not, having regard to the financial position of the federal treasury, they were made honestly and in recognition of the increasing needs of the provincial authorities.

Having said that I just want to add this one thing further. My friend Senator McCutcheon also felt, because the increase in the rate of abatement in 1965 and 1966 will require the federal authority in 1965 to pay out an additional $64 million and in 1966 to pay out an additional $139 million, that such payments are excessive. But this infection, if I may call it that, of dealing with large sums of money and making these substantial contributions to the provinces is something that has infected political parties and governments for some time. I suggest that those who have not read it should read the speech made by the Leader of the official Opposition in the other place, and the particular part of it that I suggest should be read is found at page 5250 of Hansard of the other place. It will there be seen that there seems to be a virtue in increasing provincial payments substantially.

I found, for instance, that unconditional grants which in 1956-57 were of the order of $552 million were increased so that by 1962-63 they amounted to $991 million. The conditional grants, which included agriculture, health, hospital insurance, welfare, sickness and amateur sport, in 1957-58 were of the order of about $145 million and in 1962-63 they were of the order of $842 million. I am not criticizing those amounts as such. All I am saying is, let us be relative in all things, and let us not lose our sense of proportion.

If these substantial increases between 1958 and 1963 were necessary—and I assume in the circumstances that they were—and the provinces made a useful application of the funds, then for a further increase of $64 million in 1965 and $139 million in 1966, why one could swallow a very substantial increase of hundreds of millions of dollars and then strain at what is in relation to those payments a relatively small amount, I find it difficult to accept. I am calling attention to it because I do not think that is the measure for resolving the relationships that we are dealing with between the provincial authority and the federal authority.

If we had all the money in the world federally, I take it we could and would be more generous; but, within limits, the first place where our federal generosity should apply should be in relation to the poor taxpayer. Anything that is exacted beyond the needs of the federal Government and the needs of those provincial governments, which require the assistance of the federal Government, should be abated to the poor taxpayer, although I do not hold any hope that that will happen for a long time.

Honourable senators, there were other things which, if we had time, I might deal with; but I think that if you read the whole debate you will see the pro and con of it.

In closing, I would like to leave this thought in connection with this bill and with the basic legislation of 1961. It is that I hope those charged with implementing the legislation, those actually dealing with the administration and those who will be studying the results, between now and the time these present arrangements run out in 1967, whether they be provincial or federal authorities, will study the problem with wisdom and without emotion. I hope they will study it with judgment, without prejudice and without arrogance, and that this wisdom and this judgment in that connotation, between now and the time when these agreements or this legislation will have to be reconsidered, will be such that having reached conclusions on this basis, we may be ready in 1967 for a solid approach to a reassessment of methods and possibly a basis that may rest on some stability and will permit a formula for dealing with the needs of the provinces without having to resort to a program of expediency. I regard the methods which we have, other than the principle of equalization, as being methods of expediency.

It may be that we will not find any other method in the interval, but I hope that a real effort will be made and that some way will be found, whether in the reallocation of certain powers and authority as between federal and provincial authority, whether in a reassessment of responsibility, or whether to a larger extent the provinces are to be left to tax in their own way and raise the moneys they need, and that the federal authority will tax for its own needs and for those items which in the interests of federation, should be the burden of the Canadian central authority.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa
13th August 1964

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Wilfred Judson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 13th August, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary
to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now take recess and reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5.35 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Wilfred Judson, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the royal assent to the following bill:

An Act to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and to provide adjustments of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion for adjournment:

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Lambert, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, September 15 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I would just like to ask the Leader of the Government whether there is any significance in the choice of September 15. I know that we can stand adjourned for some time, interim supply having been granted, but I was wondering about the flag debate in the other place. Of course we shall be back as soon as that debate finishes, if the resolution carries, and we shall debate it here at that time. Is that the intention, Mr. Leader?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. As honourable senators are aware, the Senate Order Paper has nothing on it at the moment. We have now completed all the business before us which requires our attention at this time. As honourable senators are also aware, under the rules we must adjourn to a specified date and be called back if business is available to us sooner than the date to which we have adjourned. This has happened a number of times this session. There is a debate now proceeding in the other place concerning the flag resolution. I would propose, when the debate is concluded in the other place, to speak to His Honour the Speaker with a view to having the Senate assemble at the earliest possible moment to consider that measure at that time.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I do not know whether this sounds like a sensible question or not, but in the possible event of the other place recessing before September 15—that is, if they have a recess—what position would we be in as to being summoned back on September 15 if the other house was recessed?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Supposing there is a compromise and they say, "We will let the resolution go until the fall?"

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the crystal ball of the Leader of the Opposition is as good as mine.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is a pretty dull one.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Mine is rather dull too. I would say, if no business comes to us specifically from the other place before September 15, then we would assemble in any event on that date.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: To do what?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There may be business at that time, but in any event we are now proposing an adjournment to September 15.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Honourable senators, as I understand the situation we can always adjourn until a fixed date, and having adjourned until that fixed date we are bound to be recalled on that date. I know of no authority that can say "Well, we were to be called back on this date but we will now postpone it." I would much prefer, and I would suggest, while recognizing the prerogative of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to decide the matter, that we should adjourn until September 30, subject to recall.

I have no idea what is going to happen in the other place. But I judge by reading the press that there will be a debate for some time; I also judge that when that debate is over there may be a recess and it seems to me that we should not be recalled here in the middle of that recess. I merely suggest to the Leader of the Senate that we adjourn to an appropriate date near the end of September, subject to recall. What has happened in the past is that we have adjourned to a definite date, and upon being recalled on that date have found no business to be done. For that reason I think we should extend the nominal period of recess, subject to recall, and immediately we are recalled we will all return.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I have made a recommendation. I suppose if one were to carry the argument of Senator McCutcheon to its logical conclusion we could adjourn to a much later date. I have discussed this matter with a number of persons on both sides of the house, and I think the consensus is that the date that has been chosen is a reasonable one. I want to emphasize, as Senator McCutcheon has emphasized, that under our rules we are subject to recall earlier than the date suggested, if there is need for our presence here.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, if we adjourn to September 15 and on that date there is no business to be done, we would merely be coming back as a matter of pure form. Would it not be possible to arrange that a quorum only be called? I would suggest that a common-sense arrangement be made, because in my view there is no sense in bringing senators from a distance, even from Toronto, when a number of senators are resident in or close to Ottawa, merely to adjourn again. For such an adjournment a quorum would be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. Denis: Honourable senators, I suggest that if we adjourn now for a recess we are going to be called back to discuss the flag. When we are called back to discuss that matter, then it will be time to adjourn again. There is no danger that the House of Commons will be in recess by September 15 because we will be called back by the Speaker of the Senate to discuss the last item passed by the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: I realize the problem facing the Leader of the Government in this house. If we are to be called back before September 15, could we at least have a couple of days' notice, particularly those of us who live at a distance? It is not always easy to get reservations.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): On the last occasion on which the Senate was summoned during a recess, the notice was very short. But honourable senators understood the reason for that. It was the urgency of dealing with interim supply. I am sure we are all very pleased at the response to that request, especially having regard to the short notice. But that was an unusual situation. I think the notice will be a great deal longer on this occasion.

As to Senator Roebuck's suggestion, I will say that many times I have felt I would like to be able to relieve senators from far distant places of the worry of trying to get here when perhaps they know it is going to be a very short sitting. However, the rule requires that all senators be notified, and I think we can do no less. I know that when senators who live in distant parts of the country find it difficult to attend, they inquire what the prospects for a quorum are, and it has usually worked out reasonably well.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The telegram could be worded in such a way that they could read between the lines.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 15, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, September 15, 1964

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-119, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-119, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, is a short bill and requires very little explanation. However, I think it would be appropriate at this time to explain it in relation to the background and history of the legislation known as the Farm Improvement Loans Act. This measure was first passed by Parliament in 1945 and was given a life term of three years subject to renewal. It has been renewed at three-year intervals since that time and the present three-year term will expire on June 30, 1965.

The main purposes of the Farm Improvement Loans Act are set out in the 19th annual report made under the act and are as follows:

1. The purchase of agricultural implements.
2. The construction, repair or alteration of farm buildings.
3. The purchase of livestock.
4. The general works for the improvement or development of a farm, including clearing and breaking of land, irrigation systems, farm electric systems, fencing and drainage works.

At the present time the maximum individual loan under the act is $7,500. The terms of loans vary. For implements such as machinery the term is four years, but for the other purposes for which these loans are designed the maximum term of an individual loan is ten years. The rate of interest charged by the banks on these loans is 5 per cent, and all loans require the giving of security.

As honourable senators are aware, persons who are entitled to apply for these loans do so through the branch banks in their communities, and generally the loans made by the banks under this act are guaranteed by the Minister of Finance against loss up to 10 per cent of the amount advanced by a bank.

Honourable senators will be interested, I think, in having a brief sketch of the history of the lending operations conducted under the act. In 1945, the year in which the legislation was originally passed, 4,311 loans were made, totalling some $3.5 million. In 1963, the last year for which final figures are available, the annual amount loaned increased from that original amount of $3.5 million to over $135 million, and the number of loans contracted in that year was 77,373. This increase in number of loans from 4,311 in 1945 to 77,373 in 1963 indicates the extent to which use has been made of this legislation through the years.

The losses too should be mentioned. They are relatively small. According to the annual report, the total amount paid to the banks under the guarantee provided by the Minister of Finance has been less than one-tenth of one per cent of all loans made to date.

Lending operations conducted under the aegis of this legislation fall under four headings, and it might be appropriate at this time to refer to them with reference to the lending that was conducted in the year 1963. In respect of loans for the purchase of farm implements, some $99 million was put out by the banks in more than 56,000 loans. Perhaps honourable senators would like to know something about the type of equipment which was purchased with this money.

I am informed that loans for tractors were the largest of this group and totalled over $38 million for the purchase of over 17,000 tractors in 1963. Furthermore, over $24 million was advanced to help finance the purchase of 8,879 combines. Loans totalling over $13 million were made during that year for the purchase of over 9,000 trucks for use on farms. Loans totalling almost $4,700,000 were made during the year for the purchase of over 4,100 hay balers. Loans were also made for the purchase of other implements, including milk coolers and station wagons, amounting to over $17 million in the year.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Could you give a breakdown by provinces?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. Is the honourable leader interested both in the number of loans and the amount per province?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I am interested in the proportion in which the farmers in the different parts of Canada are taking advantage of the loans.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I shall read the figures now and they will appear in Hansard. These are loans made in 1963 for the purchase of agricultural implements:

Province	Number of Loans	Total Amount
British Columbia	1,258	$ 2,209,439
Alberta	15,246	26,835,245
Saskatchewan	18,913	34,991,183
Manitoba	7,397	12,784,073
Ontario	9,369	16,016,360
Quebec	2,223	3,934,604
New Brunswick	392	617,718
Nova Scotia	445	687,855
Prince Edward Island	764	1,063,354
Newfoundland	21	38,679

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The loans become fewer as one goes east.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The largest number of loans and the largest amount lent was in the Province of Saskatchewan. The other provinces follow in this order: Alberta, Ontario, Manitoba, Quebec, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland.

That is the history of the lending operations in 1963 in respect of implement loans. There were 8,130 building loans, totalling more than $18 million. Some 1,456 new farmhouses were covered in this operation.

There were loans for the construction of utility buildings and for the repair and alteration of existing buildings. Those for repair and alteration covered 2,833 units, and totalled over $4 million.

There were 8,835 loans for the purchase of livestock, amounting to over $13 million. There were 4,380 loans for other improvements, totalling more than $4 million. These other items covered such undertakings as the clearing and breaking of land, irrigation work, fencing and drainage, fixed equipment and farm electric systems, sewage disposal systems, wells and water supply systems.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Would the honourable Leader give once more the total amount for the year?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. The total number of loans for the year 1963 was 77,373 and the total amount loaned in that year was $135,954,564.

It is obvious to honourable senators that the technological advances characteristic of the development of the agricultural industry in this country have featured largely in the work which has been done under the provisions of this legislation. The increased mechanization of farms and the requirements for more complex and more expensive farm machinery have been the main areas in which this legislation has been invoked. Between 70 and 75 per cent of all the lending of this past year has been for the purpose of facilitating the buying of equipment.

I should add that the Porter Commission considered the provisions and the history and operation of the legislation before us and recommended that an increase should be made in the amount of individual loans. They found that the credit facilities available under this act to individual farmers should have a revision upwards, and it is precisely this step that is now proposed in this legislation.

I should add, too, to make the story complete, that the Porter Commission recommended that the maximum for an individual loan be $10,000. The bill goes farther than that, and proposes that the maximum should be $15,000.

Now, honourable senators, with that as general background to the legislation before us, may I outline briefly the amendments that are proposed to the existing legislation by this bill. First, the bill proposes that the maximum individual loan amount should be increased from $7,500 to $15,000; in other words, it should be double. It is also proposed that the aggregate amount available for lending under this legislation for the period ending June 30, 1965, should be increased from $400 million to $500 million.

The bill also proposes that the lending period be extended from June 30, 1965 to June 30, 1968. It is also proposed that in the new three-year period the maximum aggregate amount available for lending under this legislation shall be increased from $500 million to $700 million.

Honourable senators, this, I think, is a complete explanation of the bill before us. It was my intention that if the bill received second reading tonight—and when I say tonight I hope no honourable senator will think I am suggesting any pressure—and if it is the desire of any honourable senator that it should go to committee, I will certainly be happy to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. It is a bill from the Department of Finance.

If honourable senators have any questions in mind that I might be able to answer tonight, I will certainly attempt to do so.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Would the honourable leader be good enough to tell us whether the rate is still 5 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am sorry, I thought I had mentioned that. It is still 5 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Walker: What rate is the Government paying now to borrow for this fund? It is more than 5 per cent, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I cannot answer that question categorically. I will get the information for the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I would like to know if the loans are being made at a loss to the Government.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Kamloops): These loans are guaranteed to the bank, are they not? The Government does not advance the money?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That is correct. There is no fund set up by the Government, out of which these loans are made. The aggregate amount is that to which banks can lend under this legislation. It is the banks that lend the money. The rate they can charge under this legislation is 5 per cent; and 10 per cent of the money that they put out, pursuant to the terms of this legislation, is guaranteed against loss by the Government.

Hon. Mr. Willis: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question? As I read section 1(d) of the bill, if a borrower holds $5,000 from the bank, that amount is deducted from the $15,000 he might now borrow. In other words, he cannot borrow more than $10,000 under this act if he owes the bank $5,000.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am not too sure about that, because the terms under which he may borrow $5,000 from the bank on some other account and under some other arrangement may be completely different from the terms under which he borrows under this legislation. However, I think the banker himself would probably assess the general credit position of the borrower. The honourable senator may very well be right. I would hope that question would be asked in committee, for I too would like a better answer.

Hon. Mr. Willis: I read section 1(d) to the effect that if a banker knows that the borrower owes money to his bank, he cannot borrow an additional amount increasing his total obligation to more than $15,000.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): As to obligations under this legislation, that is true.

Hon. Mr. Willis: As a farmer myself, I want the answer.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not think the honourable senator would have much trouble borrowing without this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Molson: May I ask the honourable leader if he does not think that a farmer who already had a loan from the bank and was in the normal sense of the term loanworthy under this legislation, could apply for this loan and pay off his previous borrowing and in that way qualify for the maximum, provided he met the conditions under this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would certainly think so.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): May I ask the honourable leader who directs the administration of this act? I understand that most of these loans have been made to farmers in Saskatchewan, Ontario and Alberta. These are farmers of a relatively wealthy class. What effort is made under this act to help the small farmer? What about the man who has 100 or 200 acres, who may need a loan for seeding, or to erect a new barn or other buildings?

It seems to me that the farmers who can borrow money for combines and tractors, and items of that sort, are relatively prosperous farmers. But it so happens that at the present time in the Province of Quebec a number of farmers are depressed, and I know some of these areas in which they live. Could those farmers go to the bank and get a loan under this act, or would they be told by some hard-eyed banker that they did not have adequate security? I fear that this loaning legislation is mainly for the benefit of people who are relatively prosperous and who, if they did not get a loan, would not suffer.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, coming as I do from the largest farming province, I would like to say a few words on this legislation. For the benefit of the honourable senator who is worried, may I say that this has been a rich harvest for the bankers. That is one of the reasons Parliament has been flooded with applications by people wanting to get into the banking business where they can make guaranteed loans.

I noticed that the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) was quite anxious to have information on the proportion in which the farmers in the various provinces were taking advantage of these loans. Conditions in his province look pretty good, and probably the farmers there don't need much money.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: They do not borrow money.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The Province of Saskatchewan has a larger agricultural area and grows more grain than any other province, and loans are needed for expansion. One of the reasons for borrowing is the constant changing of equipment, the need for more efficient equipment. It is quite natural that a farmer, if he sees the opportunity of making a few thousand dollars, will change to different equipment.

Let us take, for example, seeders for seeding wheat. At one time we had the shoe drill, which made a small crease in the soil and dropped in the seed in a similar manner but not quite as compressed as with a double disk drill. Then the double disk drill became very popular, although it was expensive. But it did not last long and was succeeded by the single disk, which distributed the grain in a wider area. It became popular and was widely used.

Not long ago I was chatting with a farmer who did his seeding by means of a horse-drawn drill. He told me that with the double disk, for the first few months after seeding, a crop looked very good, but that in dry weather the seeds became compressed in very sharp little grooves in the soil, and much of the grain would dry out, whereas the single disk drill would produce a better crop, although in the beginning stages it did not look as good.

Now farmers have gone back to the hoe drill they used 70 years ago—a series of pipes with holes, now motivated by power. The farmers feel that they now have the answer, because by this means the drill makes a nice, moist groove in which to scatter the seed.

Conditions are constantly changing on the farm, and farmers have to keep up with changing conditions. The same applies with regard to the plough. We used to think that the farmer simply had to use an ordinary plough to turn the land over. Now they use diskers. I know of a piece of land that has not been ploughed for 15 years, where the ploughs are gathering rust—and they cost a lot of money. Farmers now use the heavy diskers.

The same thing could be said of many pieces of equipment in the farming industry. We see the old threshing machine going out and giving way to the combine. It has always seemed to me that the farmer wishing to expand can do so whether he gets the benefit of a loan or not. It depends upon the ability of the farmer himself and whether he likes to have men around him and run a big business or whether he likes to run a small business. There is also the danger that if he loses money that he has borrowed he will be very uncomfortable instead of being happy. The farmer who wants to get ahead will find some way to get more land and more machinery.

However, this is the modern way of doing things; it means more profitable business for the banks, and I do not wish to oppose the bill. Furthermore, having heard the excellent explanation given by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), I do not consider there is any necessity to send it to committee.

Hon. J. Wesley Stambaugh: Honourable senators, I think perhaps I can answer one of the questions raised by Senator O'Leary (Carleton). The district I come from consists generally of small farms, the average being less than half a section. These loans have been a godsend to the farmers of that area in helping them to buy stock and equipment, and in helping them to modernize their houses and put in electrical machinery. Within the last few years electricity has reached that area and the farmer can now buy a refrigerator for his house or equipment such as a milker for his barn. Furthermore, we have just ordinary country banks making loans to the small farmers in my district, and in my view such loans have been of great benefit to the small farmers.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, at the outset I wish to congratulate the sponsor of the bill on the very fine explanation he gave. Although it is a simple bill, he has given a concise history of the act since it was introduced in 1945. The act has been renewed every three years and a further amount added to the total available for borrowing by the farmers.

I have one criticism of the total amount available to be borrowed. I notice that in 1960 the loans totalled over $101 million. In 1962 they reached $118 million and in 1963, $135 million. To me this indicates that $100 million is not sufficient, because it appears that at the current rate of growth the amount required in 1964 will be something like $150 million.

As the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) has said, there are so many changes going on in farming, and so many improvements in machinery, that the people in the west, where the big farming is carried on, are constantly changing their machinery to keep up with the times. That is the reason for the tremendous increase in the number and size of loans in those areas. I think the Government would be well advised to increase the amount not to $700 million but possibly to $850 million or $900 million.

We are getting into big money in this matter, but we must remember that farming is a tremendous industry and it needs all the encouragement we can give it. These loans have been a tremendous boon to the farmers.

The other point I want to criticize is that of the total loans for the purchase of farm machinery. I have drawn up some figures, taking the years 1958, 1960, 1962 and 1963. For those years I have set out the loans for new implements by provinces, and they are as follows:

Province	Loans for New Implements 1958	1960	1962	1963
	$	$	$	$
British Columbia	1,525,000	1,600,000	2,148,000	2,200,000
Alberta	17,538,000	19,388,000	26,190,000	26,800,000
Saskatchewan	17,583,000	24,936,000	26,670,000	34,900,000
Manitoba	7,175,000	9,101,000	11,935,000	12,700,000
Ontario	11,281,000	11,613,000	14,159,000	16,000,000
Quebec	13,925,000	10,495,000	3,770,000	3,900,000
New Brunswick	736,000	802,000	606,000	900,000
Nova Scotia	826,000	682,000	769,000	600,000
Prince Edward Island	1,142,000	1,269,000	934,000	1,000,000
Newfoundland	52,000	51,000	28,000	38,000

When you look at those figures it would appear that there is quite a decisive line to be drawn between Ontario and Quebec. From Ontario west apparently the farmers are able and willing, for some reason or other, to buy new machinery and are doing so, but from Quebec east the conditions are not getting better. To my mind this is the area where these loans should be functioning rather than in the west because, as Senator Horner said, the farmers who have the money there and who have credit do not need them. I remember the case of one farmer who, because he was living in the city, was not regarded as a bona fide farmer. He went to the bank to borrow under this scheme and was told: "No, we cannot lend you money under this legislation, but we will make you a personal loan." At that time he wanted $5,000 for machinery, and he got that amount without any question although, of course, he had to pay the regular rate of interest of 6 per cent.

There may be a nigger in the woodpile in the down payment that these borrowers have to make. When the amount that a farmer is entitled to get is boosted from $7,500 to $15,000 he would have to make a down payment equivalent to at least 25 per cent of the amount borrowed. In some cases 33 per cent of the amount has to be put up in the form of either security or cash, and the borrower has to hand over the agreement for purchase of the new machinery to the bank that makes the loan. It may be that people in Quebec and the east cannot raise enough money. If the total amount of the loan is raised to $15,000 then one-third is $5,000. How many of the small farmers in the east are going to be able to raise $5,000 to get themselves going? It is my opinion that something has to be done by way of working out arrangements whereby these farmers would be enabled to borrow money and thus get on their feet.

I know that the bank managers check the credit rating of each applicant for a loan. They make sure that he is a good risk. Even under this act a farmer cannot get a loan unless he is a good risk. Any Tom, Dick or Harry cannot walk into a bank and get money under this legislation. An applicant must be a member of the community in good standing, and a man who honours his debts and has sufficient money and quantity of land in order to be able to carry on and pay back the money borrowed.

Those are the two criticisms I have, but apart from them I am absolutely in favour of this measure. I know that the cost of machinery has gone up, and loans up to $15,000 are necessary. The price of a combine has gone up to $8,000, $10,000 and $12,000, and the farmer in the west has to have such machines. The price of tractors is up to $7,500 and more. A maximum of $15,000 is not out of line at all so far as present-day purchasing is concerned.

I have nothing further to say except that I am in favour of this bill; I hope it receives second reading and, if necessary, goes to committee.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I am taking part in this debate because of the remarks made by my friend, Senator O'Leary (Carleton), with respect to those prosperous western farmers. It is true that many of them are quite prosperous, but I would point out that there are some interesting figures which demonstrate that that prosperity is not excessive.

I am looking at the bulletin issued by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture for September 1964. On page 7 are shown the results of a number of representative farm surveys in Canada. The number of farms is given, and also the size of the farms in acres, the capital investment and the net farm income. I will pick out just a few of these at random, and I think they will throw a little light on this particular piece of legislation and the position with respect to the farming industry, particularly in the west.

In the brown soil zone of Saskatchewan the average size of 20 medium-size grain farms is 688 acres. The capital investment is $31,600—I would say that that is a low figure—and the net income is $2,750. Of 20 large-size farms the average size is 1,054 acres, the capital investment $52,400, and the net income $4,680.

The average size of 20 medium-size grain-cattle farms is 270 acres—that is a small farm—the capitalization is $43,250, and the net income $2,280.

Then we go to dairy farms in British Columbia. Of 92 farms in the Fraser Valley the average size is 84 acres, the capital investment is $52,980 and the net income $4,675. The smallest farms have the highest capitalization.

The average size of 84 beef farms in Ontario is 228 acres, the capitalization is $33,940, and the net income is $3,020.

I must say that I am very much in favour of this bill. I think it is long overdue. The Leader of the Government rightly commented that the main reason for extending additional credit is a recognition of the increase in the technical side of farming, but there are, of course, other reasons. Farm people are moving off the farms in large numbers; the only way they can stay today is by mechanizing because they cannot afford to pay the present-day wage rates. Taking farm wage rates in 1935-1939 to equal 100, by 1961 they had risen to 588.5, and by 1964 they have increased to 688.6. That is the picture so far as wages on the western farms are concerned, and the same holds true for the whole of Canada. However, it seems that you cannot hold the quality of help you need on the farm at any wages. The only way a farmer can stay in business is to mechanize.

Taking the consumer price index as 100 in 1949—and this embraces all items consumed by farmers as well as other people—by 1961 it was 129.2, and it went up to 136.2 in July of 1964.

The price index is given of numbers of commodities used by farmers, and taking all items in 1935-1939 to equal 100, then in 1961 it was 259.0 and in 1964 it is 282.4. Here again is a reason why, on the one hand, farmers need more credit in order to be able to stay on the farm and, on the other, why they need cheap credit to handle the cost of operations for which they receive this rather modest return.

This legislation is based on another sound principle in that it uses existing financial machinery, the chartered banks, instead of providing that the Government set up special means of distributing the money. I think it is timely and important legislation, and it provides the only means by which efficient farmers are going to be able to survive. This legislation will give them the kind of credit they need and in the necessary amounts to meet today's technological changes.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I wish to say just a few words because of the comparison that has been made of the different farming sections of Canada. The fundamental reason why there is not as much borrowing in Quebec, New Brunswick and parts of Nova Scotia as there is in the western provinces is the great difference in farming in the east and in the west. In western Canada there are the large wheat farms which need huge combines and heavy machinery costing such tremendous amounts of money, while in my own section of my province the farmers are, in the main, dairy farmers who do not need such expensive machinery. We have mixed farming as well which does not require heavy machinery.

I would like to point out also that on many of the farms in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia much pulpwood is grown on the back lots. This is a large source of income for those farmers, and it does not require heavy machinery. If a farmer has a saw and a truck he has the means of making a good income out of this product.

Prince Edward Island was mentioned along with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but the Island produces, in the main, one crop, namely, potatoes, the production of which requires more machinery than does a mixed farm.

I am not saying that we do not require more loans in New Brunswick. I am quite sure that some of the farmers there could do very well with more and larger loans, but the farms are not large. In the Maritime provinces we have not arrived at the point of combining smaller farms into very large farms, as is happening in other parts of Canada and the United States. However, that is coming. Farmers are moving off their farms, and the day is approaching when no matter where they farm they are going to need large acreages with more machinery. I thought I should mention these facts in order to explain possibly why there is such a difference in farming operations in the Maritime provinces as compared with other parts of Canada.

It is very pleasing to all of us to learn that on these loans there is practically no loss—it is only one-tenth of 1 per cent. It is no news to me, as when I was connected with the Department of Veterans Affairs I had a lot to do with the Veterans' Land Act, in which case, as in this, there has never been any loss—except a small fraction of 1 per cent. It is amazing, when one thinks of the millions of dollars borrowed, that the loss is only a fraction of 1 per cent.

A few years ago, when the Farm Credit Act was passed and men were needed to look after the inspection and appraisal of farms, we were very proud that men from the Department of Veterans Affairs were chosen. The Department of Veterans Affairs, in the administration of the Veterans' Land Act, had built up a group of trained appraisers who were very efficient. I wish to give credit to Brigadier Thomas Rutherford, who was responsible for looking after these matters under the Veterans' Land Act and who was loaned from that department to the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance when the Farm Credit Act was put on a par, more or less, with the Veterans' Land Act. I should say that one reason why the percentage for loans was 5 per cent was that the veterans were given that rate on account of being veterans, and when the Farm Credit Act became operative the 5 per cent rate was allowed to farmers borrowing under the Farm Improvement Act and the Farm Credit Act.

Honourable senators, this is a good act. The Farm Improvement Loans Act, like the Farm Credit Act, became operative under the 5 per cent provision. It has been of great assistance to the farmers in Canada.

Hon. David J. Walker: I wish to congratulate the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate on the manner in which he outlined this bill.

Looking at the original act, chapter 110 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, it is pleasant to note that the Government of Canada is not putting up a cent, unlike the case of housing. As the honourable Leader said in reply to a question, all of the money is put up by the bank at 5 per cent, which is most unusual. I am sure the banks would like to have 6 per cent or more. The fact that all this money has been loaned at 5 per cent by the bank and is costing the Government of Canada less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of the total of the loans, is a remarkable feat.

It is quite obvious, for the reasons given by the farmer senators here and by those from farming constituencies, that there can be no question about the need to increase the loans to meet the needs of large-scale farming production. The increase is recommended also by the Porter Commission Report. In view of the excellent manner in which the Farm Improvement Loans Act has worked out and the fact that the farmers are getting loans at 5 per cent, at a cost to the bank, and at no cost to Canada other than the minute amount of the loss, as a layman I cannot but feel that we should be very pleased indeed to take part in supporting this bill.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I do not intend to say a few words on this bill because of my farming experience—which I must admit is limited—but there are some comments which I feel might be made.

In the first place, this is one of those bills with which we have had to deal in Parliament over the years, designed to improve or continue some reasonable standard of living for that proportion of our population who live on farms. That proportion has been dropping steadily for many years, and it is a matter of regret that this must be so. It is bound to occur in a change from an agricultural to an industrial economy. We all know that the real backbone of this country has always been provided by those who live on the land, who have held the land dear to themselves and their families. That this is a measure designed to help them is a point in its favour.

Many measures have come up here dealing with farm problems, problems connected with the storage of grain, the moving of feed grains, rehabilitation, and now farm improvements. All these measures are thoroughly justified and are good, although in spite of them that proportion of the population must decline.

The comments already made about the results of these loans have scarcely been adequate to point out the really astonishing results which have been achieved over the years in which those loans have been in force. We have been given the figures for some years. I have seen the cumulative figures since the program began. I have not got them here, but they are much more impressive than the figures for any one year. If the results to date show a loss of one-tenth of 1 per cent, I do not think there is any area of the economy which can show any performance as favourable. It is astounding, and that in itself is justification for increasing the provisions in the legislation.

Regarding the comment made by my honourable friend Senator O'Leary (Carleton) about the small farmer, he has been partly answered already. As a matter of fact, if he takes the figures for 1963, he will see that there were 77,000-odd loans, and that the total amount was $135 million, making the average loan less than $2,000.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): $1,757.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Therefore, this is scarcely catering only to that section of the farm population which has large income and large capital.

There is one other point which I think should be made in regard to Quebec. I am not very well informed on this agricultural subject—any better than some of the others —but I know that in Quebec we have a provincial farm loan system which has been taking an increasing proportion of the loans required by the farmers. They carry a very low rate of interest, something like 3 per cent. It seems to me that the probable reason for the decline in the figures in the Province of Quebec will be found in the fact that that province has substituted its services for those of the federal Government.

Honourable senators, in this chamber in 1960, when discussing Government expenditures I suggested that if the Government was paying the shot, it would not seem unreasonable to suggest that the purchases made with the money so provided should be of goods made in Canada. This money is not being provided by the Government but by the banks. However, $99 million for farm equipment is an impressive figure. If that machinery were made in Canada it would provide a large number of jobs. Unemployment is a problem we have with us daily. It is not a problem that the western farmers or farmers in general should be asked to solve. It is not their problem. I would not for a moment suggest that any restriction be imposed on the farmer in order to solve that problem. However, one of our great national problems is that of providing employment and it seems to me that, in much of the legislation we have here, provided it does not work to the disadvantage of the person for whom the legislation is designed, some provision should be made to favour the purchase of goods made in Canada. I know that this is done in other countries. If such a provision were made also in regard to other fields of activity, not just in regard to this legislation, it would make a considerable difference in the employment opportunities in Canada.

I do not suggest that anything be done in this bill at the moment, but I suggest that in future legislation of this type, where the Government is providing facilities for the individual, we should try to ensure that at least some other individual in Canada will be provided with a job as a result of the legislation. That is really the main point I wanted to make with regard to this bill. I feel that this is one of the number of bills where, if some thought were given to this problem, considerable advantage could be given to employment opportunities in Canada without in any way detracting from the advantage of the individual in the legislation, and I would like to think that the Government would give some consideration to that in some of the measures we have to deal with.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I must, of course, thank all honourable senators who have taken part in this discussion tonight. I should add that on such short notice it is all the more remarkable that we should have had such an interesting and far-ranging discussion.

May I first refer to the remarks of honourable Senator Horner, who is the senior senator and who always, I am happy to say, takes a very active interest in the measures that come before us respecting the agricultural community of this country. We welcome his contributions and are always very glad indeed to have him express this interest. We are happy that his health continues to be as good as it is.

We have heard, of course, from expert western farmers like Senator Stambaugh and Senator Pearson, and from gentlemen farmers like Senator Willis from the east, and Senator Molson from a little bit farther east, and Senator Cameron, who lives in a province that is a great agricultural area of this country, indeed of the world. We have heard too from the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Brooks, who also comes from an agricultural province. I do not know which of our provinces are not agricultural in a very large measure.

I do not know just how to categorize Senator Walker. I know that he has an interest in the country; I do not know that he is precisely a farmer, but certainly he has an interest in farm problems and has shown this on several occasions in this chamber.

Now may I speak to the point raised by Senator O'Leary (Carleton). It might help if I said that the average loans made under this act since it was initiated in 1945 ranged from a low of $738 in 1946 to a high of $1,757 in 1963. For example, in 1950 the average loan was $1,075; in 1955 it was $1,137; in 1960 it was $1,497. That may answer in part the question that Senator O'Leary raised.

I think, too, the experience to which Senator Stambaugh referred, and the explanations given by Senator Brooks will help a good deal to satisfy the concern that all honourable senators would feel, that perhaps the farmers who need this kind of help most do not get it. I think, perhaps, on analysis of cases it will be found that they do.

Senator O'Leary spoke particularly about the small farmer in the Province of Quebec. Senator Molson has already informed the house that in the year 1961 there was passed by the Province of Quebec the Quebec Farm Improvement Act. Senator Pearson's question about the great drop in the figures shortly after that period for the Province of Quebec may be in part answered by this fact. I am informed that these loans are made for farm improvement purposes, up to a maximum of $4,000 in the case of individual loans, but, for the purposes of what is described as farm organization, the loan cannot exceed $3,000.

Having this information on the record may go at least part way to answer the questions raised by Senator Pearson in respect of the Province of Quebec about the drop, and perhaps answer the question of Senator O'Leary, at least in part, about the availability of loans for the small operator.

I should say too that under the federal program loans are intended to be intermediate term credit facilities, and are designed to provide facilities for the making of capital improvements on a farm in the way indicated in the areas we have been discussing here tonight.

I do not think that this type of loan is designed to cure the problems of the submarginal farm. This is not the purpose of the legislation. Those who are familiar with the ARDA program—and certainly those who served on the Special Senate Committee on Land Use are—will know that the ARDA program is designed to help in that particular area.

Now, I do apologize to the house. Senator Molson has brought very forcibly to my attention the fact that I did not give the total amount of loans that have been made under this legislation. Throughout the history of the act from 1945 to 1963, 1,083,468 loans have been made, and the total amount loaned was $1,375,973,302. So, when we talk about the losses being at the rate of one-tenth of 1 per cent on such a tremendous amount of money over such a long period of time, I think it is at least evidence of a credit worthiness of the agricultural community of this country. It is a great tribute to the capacity and the determination of farmers to pay their debts.

I do not want to introduce new material, but Senator Molson has referred to the regrettable decline in the farm population in this country. This is indeed a regrettable trend. I suppose, as he has pointed out, in the industrialization of a country some of this decline is inevitable, but the plain fact is that food production in the world today cannot keep up with demand, and there are millions of people in the world tonight who will go to bed hungry, with no means to get the wherewithal to satisfy that hunger.

And, in the midst of plenty in this country, I think it behooves all of us to give some thought to that problem. It seems to me that if the law of supply and demand does work in the world at large, it is difficult to see why, since we have such a great capacity in this country for production of quality foods, there should be so much need in the world at large for foods. Surely the means that are available now in the way of transportation, communication and capital facilities can bring these two closer together to the benefit, not only of the starving and undernourished but, as well, to the advantage of the food producers themselves.

I think we have kept up in our agricultural areas in Canada with the march of progress; what honourable senators who have come from farming communities in this country have said here tonight is evidence of that. Senator Horner referred to the fact that new machinery is constantly coming onto the market, and farmers are requiring it. Both Senator Pearson and Senator Stambaugh referred to it.

I think the figures we have before us tonight indicate that farmers in this country are aware of the need to keep up with modern developments and modern requirements.

Honourable senators, again I thank all those who have participated in this debate. In all the circumstances, I think I would be on better ground if I suggested we send the bill to committee tomorrow morning. I know some honourable senators do not feel it necessary, but there may be other questions to be asked.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Honourable senators, may I announce that after consulting with the chairman of the committee, it is proposed that that committee meet tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa

16 September 1964

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor-General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 16th September, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Your obedient servant,

A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary
to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

ACTS OF PARLIAMENT

EARLIER PUBLICATION AFTER SESSION

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators will recall that on March 10, in the course of his explanation of Bill S-2 respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada, honourable Senator Pouliot brought to our attention that public bills in the Province of Quebec are printed in the Official Gazette of Quebec within a few days of the conclusion of the session of the Quebec Legislature; and he suggested that some similar action should be taken in respect of statutes of the federal Parliament, by having them published in the Canada Gazette shortly after the adjournment of this session of Parliament.

I have informed the honourable senator, and I now inform the Senate, that arrangements have been made whereby acts of Parliament are published now in separate chapter form approximately five weeks after they receive the royal assent. These publications, as they become available, are listed on the daily check list of Government publications which all honourable senators receive.

As a result of the remarks made by the honourable Senator Pouliot, and in order better to serve the requirements of the judiciary, all judges will receive a list of the statutes as they receive royal assent and any judge may get copies from the Queen's Printer upon application.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate for having been so diligent in order to accomplish this reform, which will be helpful to all those who are interested in the law.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the notice of motion for adjournment:

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, we now reach the point where we indulge in guessing. I am sorry that at the moment Senator McCutcheon is not in the chamber, because yesterday, by a development of circumstances more than anything else, I joined the category of honest prophets and I am afraid that, in the result, he became a second guesser. However, as I say, that was simply because circumstances conspired, and I think very fortunately, to have a piece of legislation before us for consideration when we assembled last night under our previous arrangements.

The present program in the other house is very full. Today they will deal with a bill or a proposed bill in respect of the agricultural industry, and there is a second such bill on the Order Paper for consideration. The arrangement is that on Thursdays and Fridays—for this week at least, and indeed perhaps for several weeks—the estimates of the departments will be studied. As honourable senators know, this is a very important and time-consuming part of the work which must be done in the House of Commons.

I understand further that a supply motion will be taken next Monday. As honourable senators know, a supply motion involves a two-day debate. I am informed that there may be another supply motion taken in the other place a week from Monday. It would appear, therefore, that the days available for the discussion of new legislation between now and the end of the month are somewhat limited. I think no one can give assurance that there will be further legislation for the Senate to consider before the end of the present month.

In these circumstances, and in view of the fact that Her Majesty is expected to be in Ottawa on Monday, October 12, it seems to me that it would be provident for the Senate to adjourn today until Tuesday, October 13, at 8 o'clock in the evening. This adjournment will, of course, be subject to the application of the rule for the recall of the Senate in the event that business is available for us to transact. I assure all honourable senators that when that time comes, if it does come before the date set for our return, I will consult with His Honour the Speaker, and we will do our very best to meet the convenience of senators, consistent with the requirements of the work to be done.

Honourable senators, I therefore move, with leave of the Senate, that when this house adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 13, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I wish to commend the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly) on his good judgment in recommending this adjournment, based on the information he has received and has given to us.

I cannot help saying that it is indeed a frustrating experience, as well for the honourable leader as for all honourable senators, to come to Ottawa for such short periods and find there is no work on hand for our attention. That does not mean there is no work to be done—in fact there is a great deal of work to be done.

In the Commons Hansard of September 14 last, at page 7943, the Prime Minister outlined the work which he considered very important and would require the attention of Parliament. First, he mentioned the farm legislation. In that connection, we were pleased that one bill was ready for us yesterday, to which I would say we were able to give attention in a highly satisfactory manner.

Secondly, the Prime Minister mentioned redistribution legislation. That is certainly a most important matter as far as Parliament and the country is concerned. It is now at least three years overdue, and should certainly receive the attention of Parliament as soon as possible.

Again, the Prime Minister mentioned that legislation would be introduced based on the report of the Royal Commission on Transportation, which I understand to be the MacPherson Report. This is most important legislation, and is one of the major subjects that Parliament and the Government has to deal with.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That bill has received first reading.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: That is interesting to know; it is fortunate that the measure has gone that far.

People in all parts of the country are greatly interested in the MacPherson Report. I do not think there is general agreement on the report, but there are certain parts of it which should be implemented, and some other parts which probably will not. However, the report should receive a most careful study.

The Prime Minister also mentioned the Canada Pension Plan. Of course that plan has been receiving the attention of Parliament, provincial governments and people all over Canada for some time. We do hope that something realistic will be brought before Parliament before the end of this year.

I note that the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 7943:

> A careful review of every single clause of this legislation is essential, and careful consultation with the provinces in respect of all these clauses is going on—

That statement shows just how important is this legislation.

The Prime Minister mentioned other legislation, and, as the Leader of the Government has just advised us, explained that there would be supply motions. We know it is necessary to have supply motions in the House of Commons so that the estimates may be dealt with by Parliament before the year has ended.

All this work has been piling up and is ahead of Parliament but, unfortunately, as our leader has told us, we must go home for three weeks and wait for it to be dealt with by the House of Commons. I rather hesitate to say this, but in my experience in Parliament over a great many years I think this has been one of the most frustrating sessions I have ever experienced, and I do hope we will get down to business very soon.

We know why most of this business has been held up, and I am not going to interject any debate on a flag or anything of that nature at the present time. But we do know that the legislative business has been held up because there was injected into Parliament at this session a resolution for the adoption of a flag. After many weeks of debate, a suggestion, which had been made a long time ago, to set up a committee to study the question, has now been adopted by Parliament. I personally did not see the necessity for this question being brought up at the present session and frankly I do not see the necessity now. However a committee has been appointed, and in that connection I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government a question.

I remember that in 1946 a joint committee of Parliament was set up to deal with the question of a flag. It was made up of members of the House of Commons and of the Senate. I wish to ask the honourable Leader of the Government why we do not have such a committee at this time? I remember the splendid work done by that committee, and I remember the long sessions held and the valuable contributions made by members of the Senate on it. Because of that, I think the Senate should be represented on the committee which is now being set up to deal with the matter.

Members of the Senate can make a great contribution to a committee of this kind. The members of this chamber have not been subjected, in this instance, to long debates; they have not been subjected to bitter criticism from the press, radio and television. Therefore, the members of the Senate could bring a fresh point of view to a committee of this kind. I think it was an oversight, and a very serious one, on the part of the Government not to have invited members of the Senate to sit on a committee of this kind. I make no further comment on this point. Perhaps some other honourable senators would like to comment on it.

I would ask the honourable Leader of the Government if any request was made to have members of the Senate included on this committee, or whether any representations were made, and if so, what reception was given to such representations by the Government.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I think the answer to the question posed by honourable Senator Brooks can be a very straightforward one, and I hope that I am not oversimplifying it.

The resolution to deal with the question of a distinctive national flag for Canada was originally introduced in the House of Commons. It seemed to me to be the better part of wisdom, because of the character of the debate that was likely to occur and indeed did occur, to wait until the House of Commons finished consideration of this matter. In my view the Senate should not discuss this very important piece of business before it has been concluded in the Commons. I think the Senate will be in a better position to consider the issue when the Commons has completed its deliberation. At the moment it is purely a Commons resolution and we have no resolution on the matter on our Order Paper. Therefore I think it is primarily a matter for them to set up their own committee to deal with it.

If at the time the matter is to be considered here it is considered desirable from the point of view of the Senate that there should be a committee to study the question, I think the Senate will decide to do so at that time. In my view it would meet with the agreement of most honourable senators if we proceeded in that way.

What was done on the flag question in 1945 and 1946 may have been done in a different context, but the procedure the House of Commons have adopted is the procedure they themselves decided upon in the existing circumstances and on their own responsibility. Frankly, I do not like to consider the pros and cons of what they do in that house. I consider that to be their business just as I consider the conduct of our affairs here to be our business.

I am not criticizing the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) when I say this, but I think I owe it to the house to make known to honourable senators the considerations that entered into my thinking.

There is another point to be considered. I understand the decision to set up a committee was one that was reached after agreement by consultation with the leaders of all parties, and we were not part of that issue at that time. We do not know whether or not they would have wanted to enlarge the committee to include members of the Senate. We do not even know if they considered it.

I have discussed this matter on a number of occasions with many senators, and this seemed to be the wise course to take.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I take it then there was no representation to the Government to have members of the Senate included in the committee?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I did not make any.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I rise to support what has been said by the Leader on this side of the house with respect to the desirability of Senate representation on the flag committee. At the outset, honourable senators, I must confess that following a statement made to the nation by the Prime Minister on Sunday evening during a national television broadcast—

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Am I not permitted to speak, sir?

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion before the Senate is for adjournment.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I am speaking in connection with a matter that is of interest to all honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I say that I do not think this is the time to discuss this matter. I allowed the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) to make his point, but if the matter were thrown open for debate one could not tell where it would end. I do not feel that according to the rules such a debate should take place at this time. Therefore, I would suggest that the honourable senator may ask questions or discuss the motion to adjourn, but he may not discuss the question of a new flag, since that question is not now before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I did not intend to discuss the question of a flag.

With great respect for your ruling, sir, may I now speak on a question of privilege because this is a matter, I think, which affects the privileges of this house?

In his statement on Sunday night the Prime Minister seemed to have assumed that the house would have to accept a certain type of flag for Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Let me read what he said—

> We are going to have a new flag by Christmas. It is going to be a distinctive national flag and it will be based on this historic and proud emblem of Canada, the maple leaf.

My point, honourable senators, if I may make it, is this. As to the usefulness of this parliamentary committee—and we are a branch of Parliament, we are interested in the parliamentary committee, and this is a resolution before Parliament—in view of that statement, which I consider to be shocking and irresponsible, the committee has been torpedoed before it has been launched. An act of sabotage has been committed against it.

May I say, to be honest with myself, that I regret as much as any person in Canada the fact that after an agreement had been reached among the parties in the other house—

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: What is the honourable gentleman talking about? Is he talking about an agreement in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I am leading up to my point.

I think the Prime Minister was in contempt of Parliament when he gave a pledge to the nation that he would bring in a certain type of flag. What right had he to assume that this branch of Parliament would accept any particular flag which comes to it from the other place? Surely, this is a proper question of privilege!

I have raised my voice in this house very humbly before about the contempt and the disdain for this house shown by people in power in the other place. I submit, honourable senators, that that statement—the statement that a flag would be provided for the Canadian nation by Christmas, and that it would be a special type of flag—was in contempt of this branch of Parliament.

I said before that I regret—and I cannot see how on earth this is out of order—that certain people rushed into print last week to say that certain parties in the House of Commons had won a victory or suffered a defeat. There was no defeat and no victory in the House of Commons last week. There was victory only for common sense. There was victory for the good and wholesome Canadian spirit of compromise. But, honourable senators, that does not excuse the statement made by the Prime Minister the other night.

Walter Bagehot in The English Constitution said that the Prime Minister must be the one to set the tone of public life. I ask you, honourable senators, what sort of tone of public life was being set by the Prime Minister last Sunday night?

The Prime Minister this morning—and here, again, is where you come to the tone of our Canadian public life—is quoted as saying:

> I felt it was desirable for me to express my own view that we should have such a flag.

Honourable senators, he was not expressing his own view on Sunday night.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Why not?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): He was issuing an ultimatum to his own people on the parliamentary committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Surely the honourable senator does not mean that.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): What else can this mean? What was the controversy in the House of Commons about? It was about whether the flag should have on it the Union Jack or a maple leaf. So, finally and sensibly, after a lot of rancorous debate, the matter was referred to a parliamentary committee charged with the duty of seeking some fair compromise. Well, if that is so, how can the Prime Minister tell the nation on Sunday night that the flag that comes from the committee will be a flag "based on this historic and proud emblem of Canada, the maple leaf?"

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Does the honourable gentleman suggest that the Prime Minister by those words is saying to Parliament: you will act thus and so? Surely, he is making a prognostication—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): He is putting his members on that committee into a ministerial straitjacket, and they will have to abide—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I protest, Mr. Speaker. It is outrageous that there should be this kind of talk here.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think I have allowed the honourable senator enough time to make his point of privilege. There is nothing referring to the flag now before the house. In the near future—I do not know exactly when—we in the Senate will have an opportunity to discuss the flag question. Having regard to that fact I would ask the honourable senator not to continue his remarks in this vein.

As I have already said, his point of privilege has been made quite clear. Some honourable senators may not agree with him, but he has made his point and, having done so, I will ask him to refrain from further discussion of the question of the flag.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Thank you, Your Honour. I am sure you wish to be fair. I am sorry that technically I am out of order, but I make my point, I think, when I say that in my opinion the Prime Minister's statement was reckless and irresponsible.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It was no more reckless and irresponsible than the statements made by the honourable senator.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I wish to protest to some extent. This is a body that should be interested in everything that Canadians are interested in.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The honourable Senator O'Leary was not debating the flag. He was bringing to the attention of this house the method by which this committee was appointed, and the statements made by the Prime Minister which the senator thought should not have been made.

I believe that Senator O'Leary had a perfect right to say what he has said. If we have not freedom of speech here, then what are we here for? I thought, after reading the statement of the Prime Minister, that he intended to abolish the Senate before Christmas, or that this was some special kind of measure that did not need to pass this chamber at all. I thought we were going to be set aside.

The remarks of the honourable senator were desperately needed today; it is high time we showed a little bit of gumption. If this resolution is going to be passed by Christmas, then are we going to be here at that time? It might not be passed for several Christmases.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators know that as Speaker of this honourable house, I have always tried to be fair and impartial. I believe that often I have been a little too lenient, but when no point of order is raised I assume that there is unanimous consent of the Senate for an honourable senator to extend his remarks.

I do not want to deprive any honourable member of the Senate of the opportunity of discussing the question of the flag but, as I have said and as everybody knows, the time will come when every honourable senator will have the opportunity to speak on this subject.

There is a motion to adjourn before the house, and having allowed the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) to make his point I cannot, under the rules, allow a full discussion of the question of the flag.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, in all deference to the ruling of His Honour the Speaker, which I accept, I think that the best way to show the olive branch is to sponsor in this house in due course a motion concerning the flag, and I am ready to do it. I have already spoken about the flag in this house, and I am ready to put such a motion. However, I will do it upon one condition, and it is that my honourable friend, Senator O'Leary (Carleton), tells us what he means by a national, distinctive flag. When he tells us that I will move the motion.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is moved by honourable Senator Connolly, seconded by honourable Senator Hugessen, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 13, 1964, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MONUMENTS ON PARLIAMENT HILL

SUGGESTED UNVEILING

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, this is not a question, but a suggestion I have to make to the Government with regard to something that will surprise you all.

There are on this hill several monuments, and four of them have not yet been unveiled. Although they have been exposed to the four winds for decades, and have resisted snow, wind, hail and all the other elements, they have not been unveiled. Among them is one which was ordered from the sculptor, Walter S. Allward, in 1908 and completed in May, 1914. It has never been unveiled. I am referring, of course, to the monument to Lafontaine and Baldwin. It is here. It is a beautiful monument, but it has never been unveiled.

My suggestion is that the Government should take advantage of the visit of Her Majesty to Ottawa on Monday, October 12, and ask her to graciously unveil the monument to the two fathers of responsible government in this country. If there had been no Lafontaine and no Baldwin there would have been no Macdonald, no Laurier, no Cartier and no McGee.

This is a matter of great importance, and it is feasible because it was the father of the present Queen who unveiled the Cenotaph on Confederation Square, and it was the then Prince of Wales who unveiled the statue of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in front of the East Block.

Cartier's monument was unveiled in 1884 and that of Sir John Macdonald in 1895. There are other monuments which have not been unveiled. I wonder if you would like to know which they are.

There is the monument to Alexander Mackenzie; there is the monument to George Brown; and there is also the monument to Thomas D'Arcy McGee—these have never been unveiled. We should not ask the Queen to go all around the building to unveil all these monuments. If she unveils the monument to Lafontaine and Baldwin, it will be enough. I am sure she would graciously accept. With regard to the other monuments, may I suggest that in due course the monument to the memory of Alexander Mackenzie should be unveiled by his biographer, Professor Dale Thomson of Montreal, a professor at the University of Montreal. I suggest also that the monument to George Brown should be unveiled by that well-known journalist and member of Parliament for York-Humber, Mr. Ralph Cowan. Then I have Thomas D'Arcy McGee. Who could unveil it better than our friend Senator Grattan O'Leary?

I make those suggestions in the friendliest manner and I hope they will be considered in due course.

DISSOLUTION AND ANNULMENT OF MARRIAGES ACT

BILL TO REPEAL—WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill S-29, intituled: "An Act to repeal the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act".—(Honourable Senator Pouliot).

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I am in the valley of humiliation. I have to ask your leave to withdraw this bill. It is not because I do not believe in it. I believe that a time will come sooner or later when we will have real judges of the Exchequer Court to deal with divorces. That time will come eventually. When, I do not know. In order to have this done, the bill should be amended. Not only that, but chapter 98 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1952, sections 17 and 18, concerning the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, should be also amended in order to give full force to the suggestion which is made in this bill.

This bill asks for the repeal of the legislation concerning the present divorce system which we have here. I find it absurd. I shall not repeat what I have said many times, that it is bad legislation which will be referred to the bar. There is a new bâtonnier of the Barreau de la Province de Québec in Montreal. There is also a new president of the Canadian Bar Association. Both are eminent lawyers. I will submit the question to them. If the Canadian Bar Association and the Bar of the Province of Quebec do not move, I will leave it at that; but if I have their support I will come again and ask yours, too, honourable colleagues, in order to change that system and bring matters of divorce under the jurisdiction of real judges of the Exchequer Court, not judges who put on their mortarboard just to cash their cheques.

Honourable senators, I ask you now, if you have no objection, to give leave for the withdrawal of this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the honourable Senator Pouliot leave to withdraw his bill?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I suggest that the Senate do take recess now to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5.40 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

An Act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

An Act respecting The Guarantee Company of North America.

An Act to incorporate Congregation of the Marist Sisters.

An Act to incorporate Meota Pipe Lines Ltd.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 13, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

FARM MACHINERY SYNDICATES CREDIT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-121, to provide for the extension of credit to farm machinery syndicates.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, since the Senate has not assembled for about a month I wish, first of all, to express my personal pleasure at seeing so many of my colleagues again in Ottawa.

I think I should not go further without saying how delighted everyone was with the reception which was held yesterday for Her Majesty, who once more honoured our capital with her persence, and how delighted I personally was to see so many honourable senators in Ottawa for the occasion of the royal visit. I am sure all of us felt that it was indeed a genuine day of thanksgiving in Canada and for that reason it was another great Canadian occasion.

I can also express some gratification at the fact that the Senate was, about a month ago, directed to reassemble here on the evening of Tuesday, October 13, at 8 o'clock, and further that we have a bill to consider. Once more we have landed on our feet; and, as Mr. Speaker will indicate a little later, we have another bill to be introduced here tonight.

Therefore, the Senate will have some work to do this week in the chamber. In addition, there will be a good deal of work to be done by various of the standing committees of the Senate.

Honourable senators, with those preliminary and completely out of order remarks, I now come to the subject matter of our business this evening, the consideration of Bill C-121, intituled an Act to provide for the extension of credit to farm machinery syndicates.

I need not tell honourable senators that this is the third measure this session dealing with the provision of credit for the agricultural community of Canada. In June the Senate considered and passed a bill to amend the Farm Credit Act. That bill dealt primarily with the work of the Farm Credit Corporation, and in particular with long-term credit for farmers, credit that is given on the security of real estate and of equipment. There is no need to thresh old straw over that bill, because it was debated fully at that time.

In September, when we last met, the Senate dealt with an act respecting the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which also was a measure designed to provide credit for the agricultural community. The machinery for that legislation works through the banks. It is designed to provide intermediate term credit to enable farmers to purchase machinery and livestock and to make improvements to buildings. Honourable senators will remember that the rate of interest provided for in that legislation, which the banks of the country have done so much to implement, is five per cent.

All of these measures, and the measure that we have before us this evening, are designed to assist the agricultural community in the production of foodstuffs. This has been a traditional and a very important element of the Canadian economy since Canada first existed. However, the age of automation has reached the farms, and is upon the farmers just as much as it is upon the industrial community of this country.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I interrupt the honourable leader to ask if copies of this bill could be distributed? Some of my colleagues are anxious to have a copy before them.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I understood that copies had been distributed to honourable senators. Certainly, the bill has been available now for some days.

I was saying that the development of farm machinery and equipment has revolutionized the farming industry of this country; and the development and improvement of farm equipment has involved a saving of labour for the farmer, an increased efficiency in the way in which the farm is operated, and it can mean a lowering of the cost of the farmer's product. It can thus ensure competitiveness of his prices and I think, properly used, this kind of machinery and equipment to which I am referring means better living conditions on the farm and higher standards of living for farmers. In other words mechanization is now pretty well the way of life with the farmer, as it is with most other people in our society. Mechanization spells progress, but also it can and does spell greater expense. This is true not only on the larger farm units in western Canada, but also the smaller ones in central and maritime Canada.

If I may be permitted to make a personal reference, I remember a few years ago going up to Kent County in Ontario as a lawyer on behalf of one of the canning companies. I went a little later than this in the fall, and I noticed farmers constantly coming into the plant that day consulting with the agricultural specialists, arranging for contracts that would be carried out the following year for the disposal of their farm produce to the canning company. They were discussing all manner of things, not only the contract for the crop, whatever it might have been—peas, corn, tomatoes and other products that are grown there—but they dealt also with problems such as soil testing and fertilizing. I was amazed at the organization and efficiency with which this operation was conducted. Certainly, as the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) knows, I am not exactly a farm boy and do not know very much about these things; so my eyes and ears were opened widely.

One of the things I learned on that occasion—and this was some years ago—was that the canning company had an arrangement with some of the farmers that the crop would be taken off at the time, even at the precise hour the canning company wanted it. They told me of cases in which a farmer would go to bed at night with his pea crop on his land and wake up the next morning to find the crop had gone, the canning company having come overnight to gather it because the precise moment for the taking of the crop had arrived.

Perhaps this is progress; it is efficient. But this high-powered type of farm operation was not used in the part of Canada where I lived, especially in the summer season, and was new to me.

It might be of interest to honourable senators if I said I am informed that the value of machinery on farms in Canada in 1961 approximated $2½ billion book value. This is a major capital investment. I am informed that the magnitude of this investment may not be required by the farmers of Canada; that a good deal of its capacity is wasted. It is hoped that this bill will make more machinery more readily available and provide a more complete use for the machinery that is available to the farmer.

The Senate might also be interested to know that last year farmers were believed to have borrowed somewhere between $225 million and $400 million at commercial rates, which vary anywhere from 7 to 10, to 15, and perhaps to 20 per cent, depending on the institution that is lending. This is over and above the money loaned to farmers through the facilities provided by the Farm Credit Corporation, the Farm Improvement Loan legislation and other federal and provincial legislation on the statute books.

It is proposed by means of this legislation to cut into that amount of borrowing by providing another agency, but the incursion into the field of commercial lending to farmers at the moment will be relatively small, being an amount of some $25 million. I shall say more on this a little later.

Dealing with the bill itself, section 2 defines a farm machinery syndicate which, in simple language, is a partnership of three or more farmers to buy and to operate on an agreed basis a piece of farm machinery or equipment.

By section 3 of the bill credit for the joint purchase of this equipment will be supplied by the Farm Credit Corporation and that corporation will administer this act.

By section 7 of the bill it is provided that $25 million will be placed in a segment of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and the Farm Credit Corporation will be empowered to draw down from this fund such amounts as are required for the program.

There are other incidental provisions of the bill which deal with such matters as advances by the Farm Credit Corporation, the accounting the corporation must make for the money it draws down—sections 8 and 10; the reporting by the corporation to the minister and to Parliament—section 13; and section 11 sets up the status of the corporation for the purposes of this legislation.

Honourable senators will be interested in sections 3, 4 and 5 which deal primarily with the loans. The program is designed to be self-supporting. The security for the loans will be in the first instance a promissory note which will be taken from each member of the syndicate or partnership and upon which there will be joint and several liability. Other suitable security may also be taken by the corporation by such devices as a chattel mortgage on the machinery bought or, in the Province of Quebec, under a recent amendment to the law there, there is provision for a pledge or nantissement, which I believe is the technical term. I know when I studied law in the Province of Quebec 30 years ago anything resembling a chattel mortgage was beyond the reach of commercial firms, but a change has been made in this respect. I might add that both a chattel mortgage in the common law provinces and the pledge or nantissement in Quebec are registrable instruments.

The maximum amount of the loan is 80 per cent of the cost to the syndicate of the machinery to be purchased, and in dollars the maximum amount is $15,000 per syndicate member, with a ceiling of $100,000. The individual's share may vary depending upon the agreement reached by the members of the syndicate.

The maxium term of loans under this legislation is seven years. Interest is payable at least annually. The rate of interest to be charged may be described generally as an economical rate. It will include the cost to the corporation of the money lent, the cost of administering the loan, the cost of establishing a reserve the amount of which will be developed from experience of losses, plus a one per cent service charge. The service charge will be deducted immediately. In other words, the administrative costs of this program will be recovered at once, and there will be no interest payable thereon because the amount is deducted at the outset. If the loan is prepaid sooner than expected the costs of incurring it and of the investigation will have been met.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Is there a maximum on the rate to be charged?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is no maximum set in the legislation. I think that later on I shall be able to say something more about the precise rate. It may be five per cent, but it will not be as high as commercial rates. If the honourable senator will allow me I shall get that information and convey it to the house later.

The question may be asked: What is meant by farm machinery and farm equipment? It is proposed to leave the matter of definition to the regulations because, generally speaking, I think the intention is to make the definition sufficiently broad to enable the legislation to be as workable as possible. However, certainly it will include earth-moving equipment, land-clearing equipment and land-breaking equipment. It will include machinery for tilling, for harvesting, and this will include specialized equipment for specialized crops. It will include feed-mixing and grinding equipment, drying equipment and equipment for cleaning farm products.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Where is that to be found in the bill?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I am saying this will be dealt with by the regulations, and it is proposed to deal with it in a very broad way. The Government's policy is to give the terms "farm equipment" and "farm machinery" the broad connotation or meaning I have just indicated. In other words, almost any kind of farm machinery which can be used co-operatively would qualify for treatment under this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would well-sinking equipment be included?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It might be, although well-sinking is usually done by specialists who are engaged by farmers to do that work. However, these terms might include well-drilling equipment. In saying that I am referring to water well-drilling equipment. I do not think oil well-drilling equipment would come under this legislation.

Honourable senators, extensive use will be made of this legislation by the small farm operators in central Canada who have 25, 75 or perhaps 100 acres under cultivation and who could share a combine which might cost $5,000. Between them the partners could make the down payment of $1,000 and finance the balance as provided in this legislation.

I should say too that there is a very good precedent for this legislation in the British experience. Between 1955 and 1963 a similar scheme was adopted which resulted in the establishment of some 341 such syndicates. Farm holdings in Britain are generally smaller than those found in many parts of this country.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Have any other countries that can be compared with Canada adopted this system? Britain is not a good comparison.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I cannot answer that. I have been briefed on the British experience, and I do not know about other countries. By 1964, I am told, there were almost 600 of these syndicates or partnerships established in Britain. The Canadian officials concerned with the administration of the legislation have had a good many conferences with British officials on the program. At this point I should say that the British program is not government sponsored. It was initiated as a result of the activities of the Farmers' Union which administers it, and Barclay's Bank makes the loan.

A question has been raised about the possibility of conflict within the syndicate as to the use that is to be made of the equipment that is jointly owned. It is proposed that agreements will be made covering joint use, including the operation, maintenance, storage and even the hiring-out of the equipment, although section 2(1)(c) provides that the equipment is to be used primarily by the farmers who form the syndicate or partnership.

This is a new course of credit. It is designed to avoid a tie-up of other credit facilities available to the farmer. I would point out that in this country it is experimental legislation. It is new, and with experience it is hoped it will develop, as the administrators expect it will, in a manner very satisfactory to the farmers.

Honourable senators might ask why the facilities in this legislation should not be provided through the banks as are loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. In my opinion the answer to an objection of this kind lies, first of all, in the fact that it is proposed that the Farm Credit Corporation will supervise these loans, and that corporation can help the farmers who want to form the syndicates in regard to the agreements. Its officers are dispersed throughout Canada, and they can investigate the credit-worthiness of the farmers who make application more effectively than can the banks.

This is all I have to say about the general nature of the legislation. It is my understanding that it is proposed to adjourn the debate tonight, and I hope that a good many honourable senators will take part in the discussion tomorrow. I would suggest, if the Senate so desires, that the bill be referred to a committee before which the officials can be brought and to which explanations can be given. I commend the legislation to the favourable consideration of the Senate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pearson, debate adjourned.

FARM MACHINERY SYNDICATES CREDIT BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill C-121, to provide for the extension of credit to farm machinery syndicates.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, last evening we were treated to a fine display of knowledge by a brilliant lawyer from the City of Ottawa on some of the farming problems. It always does one's heart good to come from the country and hear a lawyer discuss such problems and explain a bill as clearly as did the Leader of the Government yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It is a good thing for the lawyers too.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It works the other way as well.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Honourable senators, I am not quite clear myself as to what the advantages of this bill will be to the farming community, but it has taken the present Government a long time to come forward with a new piece of agricultural legislation.

As the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) has stated, we have had at this session two agricultural bills, one dealing with the Farm Credit Act and the other with the Farm Improvement Loans Act, but these were merely extensions or amendments to existing acts. We heard great promises in the past year and a half of what was going to be done for the farmers. First, we were going to have two ministers of agriculture, one for eastern Canada and one for western Canada. Apparently the Government has changed its mind or sees the possibility of conflicting interests, since neither minister would be in full control of national policy. Then there was to be legislation to free the farmers from the cost-price squeeze. Finally, we were going to have a guarantee of $2 a bushel for wheat—this was mainly for the west—even though wheat at that time was over $2 a bushel. These promises have all been forgotten.

The minister in one of his peregrinations saw something in England and, being a man of very few ideas, he thought of this sharing of farm machinery as something new which might enhance his stature among agriculturists as a minister with new and advanced ideas. I have here a clipping taken from the Family Herald of October 8, 1964, written by David Suderman; it appeared on the editorial page of this national agricultural magazine. I quote:

> When he introduced his highly-touted machinery bill to the House of Commons, Agriculture Minister Harry Hays declared that it would set up a farm machinery credit program fundamentally different from anything proposed before. Basically, however, except for providing an additional source of credit to farmers, the measure's main feature is to give official recognition to machinery co-operatives and joint ownership of farm machinery, neither of which are new ideas.

This, however, is not a new idea; it has been used for many years by farmers as a means of cutting the cost of certain implements, such as water tanks, post-hole drills, brush mulchers, etc., but in each case one farmer was responsible for the machine, and kept it in repair and ready for use. The minister, however, has undertaken to put this co-operative program down on paper in the form which you have before you now as Bill C-121.

At the outset, honourable senators, I may say I am going to support this act, not that I think it is of great value but it may help some farmers, and I certainly would not want to deny any farmer whatever assistance he can get. It could help farmers in the purchase of irrigation trenchers, heavy bulldozers for clearing and levelling land, rock pickers, or any other machine which is not used in the rush of planting or harvesting field crops.

The problem of all farmers lies in the vagaries of the weather. When the sun shines and the season is right, seeding must be completed as rapidly as possible so as to produce uniformity of crop, whether it be oats, wheat, barley, sunflowers, soybeans, onions or tobacco. The harvests likewise must be gathered quickly so as to avoid loss due to moisture and weather.

This past season in western Canada has emphasized the fact that each farmer must have his own harvesting equipment to be able to take advantage of the very brief periods of good weather. Although harvesting in western Canada started in August this year, there are still many areas where it has not been completed, and there are some areas where farmers have not even commenced their harvesting.

A group of farmers, when properly syndicated, may under this act purchase all the machinery they need for their farming operations. There must be a minimum of three partners in the syndicate. Three or four small farmers may go into debt to the extent of $15,000 each, which means a total debt of $45,000 or $60,000 depending upon whether there are three or four in the partnership. They must do this in order to get enough machinery to handle all their land holdings. They can then be in a position equal to that of a farmer with large land holdings. If each takes his limit of potential under this act, each would have to pay $3,000 in cash. By this method each one of the partners could reduce the total necessary capital cost of farming his land properly by approximately two-thirds or three-quarters of the total. The interest or service charge would be something like 6 or 7 per cent.

I noted that the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) was quite optimistic yesterday when he said the rate of interest would be in the neighbourhood of 6 per cent, or a little over 5 per cent. However, I think it will work out at 6½ or possibly 7 per cent.

On the other hand, an individual farmer may, under the present Farm Improvement Loans Act, purchase his most-needed farm implements by going into debt to the extent of $15,000, with a cash payment of $3,000 or $4,000 and paying interest at the rate of only 5 per cent on the balance. This would mean a saving of something like 2 per cent when compared with the present proposal. That farmer gives a promissory note to repay the loan in three or four years. He makes his own deal with his banker. This method may be a little slower way of obtaining his implements, but it is more satisfactory to the farmer because there is no loss of independence and it is a sounder scheme.

Under this bill the farmer normally will have to engage a lawyer to draw up an agreement in writing with his partners, and he will have to sign a joint note binding himself to repay the full amount of the loan should anything happen to his partners. Anyone who has backed a note as guarantor knows what usually happens. The well-to-do man or the most reliable usually gets stuck for the payment of the note. It is human nature to get the money from those who show most responsibility for their covenants, and it is human nature for the weaker to rely on the stronger. In the homesteading days many farmers who guaranteed their neighbours' notes were stuck for them.

It has been reported in the other place by the Minister of Agriculture that the syndicate must establish the equity of each partner in the equipment purchased, so that if one of the partners dies or moves away his equity can be sold to a new member. This is all very well if a new member can be found, but suppose there are no new members to be had in that particular district. In that case the remaining two—if there were three in the original syndicate—would have to assume the balance owing, and this could work a hardship upon them. It might happen that the partner who was strongest financially might die, leaving the weaker ones to carry the debt. Under such circumstances—and I am sure they will arise continually—this debt might easily ruin the small family farm.

One of the members of the syndicate could suffer serious financial loss due to hail, fire, frost or drought, and thus be unable to meet his obligation in that year. What happens then? In a partnership such as this bill anticipates each farmer is fully responsible for the full debt.

My conclusion is that this bill, on the face of it, may help and will help in some cases, but I foresee many anguished and disturbed communities. Farming is a hazardous industry, and many unforeseen problems can happen to a partnership formed under this or any other legislation before the partners finally pay off their loans. Provision should have been made for extending the repayment of these loans in the event of the difficulties which I have already enumerated, such as the death of one of the partners or a partner leaving the district.

There is not a great deal of interest in this bill among the farmers out west. They have read about it in the papers and seem to be conversant with its provisions, but they cannot see much value in it. The criterion of the more recent legislation brought forward by the previous Government was to assist the farmer by making more credit more easily available. This legislation seems to throw in road blocks. One solution that comes to my mind, which might have been worked on in place of this present bill, would be to arrange for various agencies in the farming areas which could do custom work and have sufficient implements ready and available at all times.

Having been in the farm land business for many years, I have personal knowledge of many unforeseen difficulties that do occur in purchases of machinery or lands, due to many causes, and I am sure honourable senators are aware of these. For that reason, I do not think that the present bill is as well thought out as it should have been. However, I am going along with it because it may help in some cases such as that of a father and his sons, or three or four brothers operating separate farm units.

The great problem, however, which has never been touched as yet is that of the cost-price squeeze—the high cost of farm machinery as compared with the comparatively low price of farm products and the lack of good markets. There is need for a comprehensive study of these matters before legislation is brought forward. This bill is a mere flea bite in the solution of the total problem of the farm industry in Canada.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on this bill as it affects my own province. As you know, Prince Edward Island is a small province. The farms are small, between 100 and 150 acres. If two or three farmers can join to purchase farm machinery and farm 500 acres between them, this would be of wonderful assistance.

Recently, when travelling by train, I was speaking with a woman who was left a widow with six children while in her early forties. She has a 100-acre farm, and farmed it herself with the help of a few neighbours to plow and plant. She had a $1,000 mortgage on her farm, and has paid it off. She gave her six children a college education at Prince of Wales College, and they became teachers, nurses, and so on. She told me that anyone who wished to do so could make a good living, but it was hard work. When I mentioned this bill, she said that if it had been in force in 1950 it would have been of wonderful assistance to her as she and others could have bought machinery for farm work.

I am in full accord with the bill; I believe it will be of tremendous value to those who live in provinces where farms are small.

Hon. Frank C. Welch: Honourable senators, having been a fruit-growing farmer, I should like to say a few words on this bill. In addition to fruit growing, I was at one time in the business of selling heavy machinery. This bill has many good points, but there are some opportunities for abuse. I would be surprised to read in a year's time that the provisions have not been abused.

There used to be a method by which one could get machinery without mortgaging his farm. All a respectable farmer had to do was get a loan from the bank, which the Government would guarantee to the bank, and he was able to get his machinery, take it home and use it. He could use it on his farm whenever he wished and did not have to wait for his neighbour to finish with it, nor did he have to wait for his neighbour to renew the loan. Those with farming experience know that group ownership does not work—you must own your own machinery in order to take full advantage of the weather.

However, I would rather see in this bill something in the way of a floor on farm produce. This would be doing the farmer a real justice.

Bill C-121 embodies a very important principle, namely, that the problems facing Canadian agriculture, and indeed the problems facing Canadian farmers, must receive more attention and more diligent efforts from legislators in an attempt to solve them. However, it is unfortunate that while the principle of the bill is pointed in the right direction, the provisions themselves will be a weak charge fired only in the general direction of the problems.

It may be true that some farmers, in some areas, will be assisted to some degree, but this is a far cry from what is needed to solve the "farm problem." Since it does provide to farmers some measure of assistance, no matter how small, it should on that basis alone be worthy of support. As the sayings go—"A half a loaf is better than none at all" or "My neighbour's good fortune is mine."

The real problem facing agriculture is its adjustment to keep pace within the process of economic change. Whether we like it or not, the continued growth of the nation and the nation's economy will bring about change. It has wrought change in the past, and it shall continue to do so in the future. Any nation which is moving ahead in the process of economic development, particularly as it becomes more and more industrialized, must face the economic fact of life that its occupational structure will change. It means that more and more opportunities are provided in manufacturing and service industries, and consequently those individuals in agriculture and other primary occupations who are operating on a marginal basis are drawn away from the farms into other areas which to them are more lucrative. We have seen this happen here in Canada. The 1961 census reported 480,903 farms in Canada; this was a decrease of 142,188 farms from the total recorded in 1951, a drop of nearly a quarter in a decade. Since there is only a minor decrease in total acreage under cultivation, it is evident that part of the decline was due to the merging of small farms into larger ones, part to the abandonment of marginal farms, and part succumbing to urban sprawl. If the nation continues to progress, that process will continue.

The real problem occurs because fewer farmers are forced to provide increased production—a role which in the past they demonstrated could be performed more than admirably. As a consequence, however, increased productivity has made agriculture a more efficient and a larger-scale enterprise. Thus today we are faced with the very serious problem of those individuals who are still forced to maintain farms on marginal land or who farm on a small scale, being forced to compete against the large-scale operation. While it may seem very callous to say that slowly over time this trend of decline in the agricultural labour force and in farm owners will continue, it is a problem which we must face and attempt to make this often painful adjustment more palatable. This will not be done by providing more debt for the small farmer and chaining him to the unrewarding task of paying interest for most of his future. This should not be inferred to mean that small farmers cannot operate efficiently and be competitive, but rather that those individuals who are restricted by their type of holdings, or methods or quality of land, face insurmountable odds.

Debt affects output adversely when it is so heavy that the farmer is virtually working for the moneylender. Indeed there are many countries where the farmers are so heavily in debt that they cannot afford to make the annual interest payment and repayment of principal as they become due. Farmers' incentives in such situations are sadly depressed. If in time the farmer manages to repay his debts, in all likelihood it will be time for him to replace worn or outdated equipment, and hence he must once again sell his soul and carry the burden of debt.

Small farmers, of necessity, have a very high propensity to incur burdensome debt. Bill C-121 may well provide them with the opportunity. More important, the problems of increasing farm income, improving marketing, occupational readjustment, and the fundamental issue of rising farm costs, require a carefully considered and integrated plan of action by the Government. In this light, Bill C-121 reflects one sticking his fingers into the hole in the dam, when there is no hope for assistance and when other holes may burst through at any moment. The problems facing Canadian farmers are finely interwoven and require a concentrated and integrated attack, not piecemeal measures.

Let us come more specifically to the provisions in the bill. The major shortcomings of the extension of credit to farm machinery syndicates have been noted in the House of Commons. However, it is important to carefully screen the bill to see who can really be helped by it.

First of all, to attain maximum benefits from expensive equipment a farmer must have a farm large enough to provide increased production at lower cost. In many cases it is doubtful that either his cost saving or production would be improved if his farm were extremely small. If, however, we conceded that some individuals in this category would be helped—and I think this would be a small percentage—to what extent will this assist farmers in general? According to the 1961 census for Canada as a whole, 44 per cent of all farms are larger than 240 acres; another 42 per cent are between 70 and 240 acres; the remaining 14 per cent are quite small.

Thus, for the very small farmer I would expect that very few of this 14 per cent could really derive extensive benefits from syndicate purchases of expensive machinery. In fact, our low-income farmers might find the increased debt burden intolerable.

The larger-scale operator has enough demand for his equipment that it would be difficult for him to consider joint usage for most equipment. In addition, the large-scale operator will be better able to finance expensive equipment on his own, and indeed will probably prefer to do this. However, this is the category of individuals who seem best suited to derive benefits from the legislation. They could efficiently make use of extra equipment because of their scale of operations, they would gain greater returns—hence their ratio of debt to return would be lower—and, finally, they would be able to carry the debt load much easier than small farmers.

Yet the legislation is envisaged as being of assistance to the small farmer.

Another important factor is that the average-size farm in western Canada is 582 acres, while in eastern Canada it is only 153 acres. If our assumption that the larger farmer would best be able to take advantage of the legislation is correct, then it would appear that the western farmer is the individual who can best gain from the legislation.

While it is necessary that we do not bear too much regional bias, it does seem strange that legislation designed to assist in bringing some solution to those farmers who are handicapped by the high cost of machinery, bears most weight in other than the distressed areas. Of the total farms in Canada in 1961, 76 per cent were in the category of commercial crop and livestock farms, having an annual potential output of $1,200 or more. In the east, however, they made up only 45 per cent of farms, while in the west they represented 80 per cent. This indicates that a high proportion of farms in the east are of the marginal-subsistence type or small units. Remarks made in the House of Commons on the bill also indicate the rate at which net farm income is rising in the east—certainly not a rate which would indicate that progress is being made to solve the problems confronting the low-income farmer in Canada.

Also, the demand for machinery falls into specific categories. Most farms already have the basic equipment. New machinery in the west could handle large-scale operations, but in the east the very nature of farming and the types of additional equipment required would be restricted to a few items. It might be fairly difficult to find adjacent farmers with similar demands.

Figures for 1961 show that there were 480,000 farms with 358,000 automobiles, 550,000 tractors, 300,000 trucks, and 156,000 combines. It is a safe assumption that there is at least one vehicle, truck or automobile, and generally both, per farm, and an average of more than one tractor. Hence demand for more equipment must be in specialized areas.

If the Government is genuinely interested in assisting the farmer in machinery purchases, its attention would be much better directed towards attempting to curb the high cost of machinery and equipment to farmers all across the country, rather than aiming at piecemeal measures which provide limited assistance to certain areas and categories of farmers who are not in the most acute need of that assistance.

For those small farmers who are bold enough to venture into these syndicates, it may provide more headaches than benefits. Credit is a marvelous institution, but it must be exercised with care and within the bounds of common sense. Those limited few who will accept such responsibilities and who will be successful, however, dictate that support cannot be withheld from the bill, despite its lack of assistance in meeting the fundamental problems and issues.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on this bill. Before doing so, however, I wish to join with the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) in his remarks expressing the pleasure and delight of all members of this house at the splendid reception which was given on Monday last to Her Majesty the Queen.

When Senator Inman of Prince Edward Island rose to speak I was reminded of the welcome to the Queen by her province. In voicing an expression of my feelings, I do so not only on behalf of the Atlantic provinces, but the rest of Canada. We were indeed proud of the splendid program in Charlottetown on the 100th anniversary of the Conference of 1864, and also the splendid reception given Her Majesty by Charlottetown, that city small in size but great in heart.

Honourable senators, Bill C-121, to provide for the extension of credit to farm machinery syndicates, was thoroughly discussed in the other place, I believe for five or six days, and all the good and bad points were brought out.

I listened to the Leader of the Government speaking carefully of the good points yesterday, and I congratulate him on his presentation and explanation of the bill. Today, Senator Pearson mentioned that possibly the honourable leader, as a lawyer, would not know as much about the farming industry as do the farmers. Since listening to the remarks of the honourable leader, and those of the two senators who are farmers, I feel that possibly Senator Pearson's statement is true. However, the lawyers could be greatly interested in this bill. I can foresee a lot of legal business for the lawyers across Canada if the provisions of this bill get into full operation, and indeed the lawyers may become the beneficiaries rather than the farmers.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What about the machinery companies?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: And the machinery companies, of course; it is understood that they will do well.

I am not going to repeat the arguments which have been used. The shortcomings were very well brought out by the two previous speakers. However, the Leader of the Government mentioned yesterday the fact that this scheme had been tried out in Great Britain. Possibly that is the only country in the world where it is being tried out; and I might add—as the leader also mentioned—that it is not sponsored by the government in Great Britain. I believe it is sponsored by the Farmers' Union and by one of the great banks, Barclays Bank. He also said there were 600 syndicates in Great Britain. Britain has a great many farmers, and with 600 syndicates, if they had only three to a syndicate, it would mean that only 1,800 farmers had shown any interest in the syndicates; but I have not the least doubt their syndicates are much larger than that, just as they would be here.

There is no comparison between farming in Great Britain and in Canada. I think most of us during visits to Great Britain have seen their small farms. I remember when I was over there years ago, there was what one might call the "one-horse farm," just a few acres and that was before the days of mechanization. Now that the horse is no longer used and farms are becoming mechanized, I can understand three or four small farmers joining together to buy a tractor, because that is a piece of machinery which on a few acres of land would hardly be a necessity, even in these times of mechanization. As I say, I can understand a few British farmers joining together for that purpose, but can you compare that situation with that existing in Canada? Senator Inman mentioned the 100-acre farm, but I believe the smallest farms across Canada, and even in the Atlantic provinces, are 150, 200 or 250 acres.

In regard to the essential machinery, such as the tractors I have mentioned and, on the dairy farm, the milking machines and other machinery used by the so-called small farmer in Canada, these could not be shared with his neighbour. There is certain specialized machinery, as has been pointed out by Senator Pearson, which can be shared, but it is only specialized machinery.

Then again, it occurs to me that in these days of mechanization and automation, the farm too is becoming automated, as the leader mentioned yesterday. At least it can be said that the farms are becoming larger and larger. This is one of the results of this and other legislation.

Today, with so much machinery being used, the young people are leaving the farms. There are now fewer farms and fewer farmers than there were a few years ago, although we are producing more and more on the farms. Indeed, we produce so much we do not know what to do with it. A few years ago we had 600 million bushels of wheat on the prairie farms that we could not sell. I remember we also had millions of tons of butter we could not sell. We did give some of it away to hospitals, and similar institutions, and we sold some at very low prices to such countries as India. The same situation applies to pork, and to practically every commodity we raise in this country at one time or another.

Then this thought must arise in your minds, as it does in the farmers': Why must so much emphasis be placed on so much more machinery on the farms, bearing in mind the farming methods we have today? Of course, I know we must go along with progress, but still, why should we emphasize the fact we must have more and more machinery and at the same time know we cannot even sell what we are producing now?

Hon. Mr. Horner: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: What we need in this country is not more farm machinery, but more markets in which to sell the farm produce, for we can raise unlimited quantities of produce in all parts of this country. The farmer needs cheaper transportation and more markets.

I repeat, I cannot see the great urgency for a bill of this kind, although I am not opposing it. There are many other matters concerning this bill on which I could speak, honourable senators, but I do not see any necessity for prolonging the debate. However, I repeat that I do not see any great necessity for this legislation. I think there is an abundance of credit available to the farmer. Indeed, an abundance of credit is becoming available to everyone. The other day I heard a man say that Shakespeare must have been wrong when he said, "Neither a borrower nor a lender be," because we in Canada are becoming a nation of borrowers, with the encouragement of our Government and of legislation such as this.

Take a young farmer. If he wants to go to college he can borrow money to do so and take 10 years to pay it back. If he wants to go into farming he can borrow again, and keep on borrowing until he has prejudiced his whole future as far as financing is concerned. I feel we should and must encourage more independence among our people. I also feel that the greatest encouragement we can give to our farming community is, first, as I said a moment ago, to provide more foreign markets for their produce and, second, in this widely spread out country of ours, to keep our transportation costs as low as possible so that farmers and others in the extremities of the country can sell to the great cities in central Canada. Today those are the two main requirements as far as the farming community in Canada is concerned.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak on this bill, but being a lawyer and a practical farmer, and hearing it so brilliantly introduced by the Government Leader, I think I should say a few words.

First of all, speaking solely from the point of view of the Province of Ontario, I think this bill infringes on the act embodied in the legislation of Ontario to give young farmers loans for their farms or to buy not only implements but also cattle, feed and other things they need in their farming operations.

Let us analyse this bill. What does it cover? Does it cover milkers? I am in the dairy business. If I am going to have three other partners with me interested in having cows milked at a certain time, how are we going to do it? Is one partner going to milk at 5 o'clock, one at 6, and one at 7? The same applies to a bulk cooler for milk. You cannot transport it from one farm to another. It has to remain where it is installed, and it has to remain at a certain temperature, 40 degrees.

What about tractors? Can you tell me that farmers are going to purchase tractors together and trade them around from one farm to another? On my farm there are three tractors and they are being used constantly by the people I employ. If I had three other partners, what would I do? Would they call up at noon and say that they wanted this tractor at 1 o'clock or 2 o'clock? This legislation obviously cannot apply to tractors or plows. There is only one season for plowing. It cannot apply to harrows or mowers. When you are harvesting hay you need the mower when the weather is good for cutting and baling the hay. Likewise with sideloaders and balers.

What does it boil down to? The honourable Leader of the Government mentioned "combines." What are combines? They are used for harvesting during the ripening of the grain, and that in Ontario is a short period of time. I have had experience of this nature. I was in on a combine partnership with a relative of mine, and at mid-season he came and told me, "I am sorry, but we have to cut own grain, and you will have to do what you can." I had to buy a combine and do it on my own. If that happens with two people, what is going to happen with three? In Ontario when the wheat, oats or other grain is ripe, the combine is used at that time and that time only. So I do not see how this bill helps in any way.

I appreciate what my friend Senator Inman said about the widow. What is going to happen if there are three deaths in this syndicate? What will be the situation then?

Hon. Mrs. Inman: May I say something here? This kind of co-operation has been going on in Prince Edward Island, a small province, for a long time. I remember when I was a little girl the farmers used to co-operate very nicely, and helped each other and worked in such a way that there was never any ill-feeling. They would agree to cut your grain next week, and cut somebody else's on Thursday or Friday. That is the way they get along there.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Learned and beautiful senator, I am corrected. However, I still say that Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) and other lawyers in this chamber know that there will be an unprecedented succession of tax problems if the three people involved in the syndicate should die at the same time.

I would also point out that the banks—and again I speak of Ontario—have been very generous in their loans to farmers to buy farm equipment and machinery. In my view the Government is now trying to outdo the banks and move into their province, although the banks have been very good to Ontario and indeed to Canadian farmers. I think in doing so the Government is adding conflict to conflict. Why have a syndicate at all? Why not amend the act so that a farmer can go to the Government by himself and borrow up to $5,000, since the maximum for a syndicate of three is $15,000? The act does not specify the rate of interest and I do not know what it will be, but I know it will be one-half or one-quarter per cent more than what a farmer would pay on a loan from his own bank in his own locality.

To me this bill is sheer window dressing, and it is not worth it.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, like the honourable senator who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Willis) I had no intention of speaking on this bill. However, having heard the remarks of Senator Pearson and the others I think I should say a few words.

I gather from Senator Willis that he is an agriculturist. It has been said that the difference between a farmer and an agriculturist is that the agriculturist makes his money in town and spends it on the farm, and the farmer makes his money on the farm and spends it in town.

I congratulate the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) on his presentation. I do not know whether he is an agriculturist, as I am, or not, but I think he did very well and is to be commended on his very fine effort.

Now my home is in Saskatchewan, in the heart of the wheat belt, where we have many farms of considerable size, one section, two sections, three, four, five and upwards. We also have some 160-acre farms. It is well known that a 160-acre farm cannot support an $11,000 or $12,000 combine, so the farmer does not try to buy one. In fact I found that in that area the farmers were not interested in this system at all because all they did was to have their nearest neighbour combine the 75 or 100 acres of crop they grew each year. By paying $2 or $3 an acre for combining and hauling to the elevator, or storing on the farm as the case may be, the farmer was able to operate quite economically.

As I say, I found no enthusiasm whatever in that area for this bill, but I did in fact find considerable criticism. The first criticism was that they would not under any circumstances sign a joint and several obligation in the nature of a note or contract or any other kind of document to make themselves liable for the whole debt. Like Senator Pearson and Senator Horner, I have had some experience in signing notes. In about nine cases out of ten I have had to pay the note myself because other people fell down on their obligations. That, I think, is the chief objection to this bill. It will not help the farmers very much but it certainly will help the implement dealers.

A friend of mine who lives on a farm in the Rosetown area came into my office one day and I had a talk with him about farm machinery. He told me he had just bought a fine new tractor that cost him $5,000, and a combine which cost him $7,000. I said to him "How do you pay for those machines? How can you afford them?" He said, "That is easy; I made up my mind years ago that since I was going to spend my life working for the machine companies I was going to have the best equipment available." That really has nothing to do with this bill, but I mention it in passing.

Certain questions arise which need to be answered, and for that reason I am glad that the honourable Leader of the Government has agreed to send this bill to committee for study. There are some questions I would like to ask. For example, how do farmers get into the syndicate, and how do they get out of it? Who decides what type of machinery is to be bought? What happens if there is disagreement between members of the syndicate? What happens if they want to use the same machinery at the same time? What about care for the machinery, and repairs? What happens if one member goes bankrupt, and what happens if one member should die?

These are only a few questions. I presume that the Leader of the Government when he winds up the debate will say that all these matters will be dealt with by regulations. However, if this bill goes to committee these are questions which in my view should be answered. When we have this information we will have a better understanding of what we are being asked to pass.

Hon. J. Wesley Stambaugh: Honourable senators, it is always interesting to me to hear lawyers saying how farmers should behave and how they should operate their farms. It is interesting to hear them discuss the troubles the farmers can get into, and of course the more trouble they get into the better it is for the lawyers. In fact at times the lawyers can make more trouble than the farmers can make for themselves.

However, as far as this bill is concerned I would say that the farmers around my district must be different from what they are around Rosetown and the other places we have heard about. I also have had considerable experience with regard to signing notes for my neighbours. However, my experience has been rather different. In nine cases out of ten when I have signed notes I have had no trouble whatever. I lost very little by doing so and received considerable pleasure because I was able to help my neighbours.

Also, in my own district I have been a little more fortunate than some of my neighbours. I have been able to get good machinery, and when automation came in I was one of the first to get a tractor and was able to do some work for my neighbours with it. I was one of the first with a combine harvester and a combine seeder. In many places I was able to help my neighbours at various times. I did not have any trouble collecting my fee either, and the experience has been a rather happy one all the way around.

I think the same will be true with respect to this bill. If a few neighbours want to get together and buy some machinery, then under this bill they will be able to do so. I can think of machinery that they might buy to their advantage, and in particular a tractor, swather, as well as a combine seeder and combine harvester. Of course it may happen that each will want to use it at the same time, but they can always flip a coin to determine who should use it first; or they may decide that one may have it first this year, and another man will have it first next year.

In my part of the country the main crops are wheat, oats and barley. Wheat and oats are raised in about the same quantities, and there is not quite so much barley. As these crops do not ripen at the same time, this machinery can be used at different times. Generally the barley ripens first, followed by the oats and then the wheat. We use swathers in harvesting the barley and oats, and we cut and thresh the wheat direct.

I can see that some difficulty may arise, but it will not be serious. Most of the criticism that has come from those honourable senators who have spoken against the bill can be likened to putting up a straw man and knocking it down. There can be benefit derived from this legislation. Some people will use it, but nobody is forced to use it. If they can borrow money from the banks to better advantage, then they will not make use of this legislation. If it is of no benefit to a farmer, then he will not use it; but to some farmers it will be of benefit. I can see nothing against the bill, and I am heartily in favour of it.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, it has been my intention all along to speak in the debate on the second reading of this bill, and I have nothing new in the remarks I intend to make.

One of the serious matters that is raised by this bill is the whole question of credit, and surely I am in order if I speak about that. One of the things I feel the greatest responsibility for is the advice I give to young farmers. I tell them, without any hesitation at all, that taking care of their credit is the most important thing. Perhaps it is the most important thing to any man, but it is of special importance to a farmer. What shape will a young man's credit be in if he signs a joint and several note for $100,000? How welcome will he be at the bank if, indeed, it is possible for him to get into the bank? He has simply no credit left at all.

This is the complaint that I have heard all over the west in regard to ordinary farm loans. I have been told that if a farmer wanted a loan on a quarter section and he was asking only what that was worth, then the lenders wanted everything else, and that farmer's credit was tied up completely.

I do not know what difficulties may arise in connection with these syndicates or partnerships, but the trouble might go even as far as murder. It is difficult to find a group of men who can take care of machines. We in western Canada have been all through this. The big threshing machines were the first to appear, and some operators made money with them, but there were others who could not run them at all. Some operators found difficulty in not being able to hire men. Men would not work for them. Their machines were left idle, and the company took them back. It is against human nature for a group of from three to seven men to have the same idea about taking care of machinery.

We speak of a standard of living. What kind of a standard of living is being advocated when it is suggested that farmers tie themselves up in groups of from three to seven in order to take on a joint debt? This is advocating the setting up of one of the greatest quarrelling groups that could ever be invented by man. It is torture!

The man who is capable of running machines is going to get them, and he cannot be stopped from getting them. He will have them, and he will know how to run them.

With all the availability of facilities for borrowing that the honourable Leader of the Government has mentioned, it seems to me that our trouble in the future will be in selling what we produce. What is the sense in encouraging syndicates to buy machinery in order to produce more without knowing whether we can sell it? This is not the way to make people happy. We seem to have gone all out on this thing called money. Young people are told: You must make a lot of money. Honourable senators, that is not what makes people happy, and it is not the way to raise a family, and yet our people are being taught that the whole thing is to grab what money they can. There is a way of life, but it certainly cannot be found by joining up in a syndicate and signing a promise to pay $100,000.

It is rather too bad, now that the banks have been made into very nice places. If a farmer joins one of these syndicates he will then have no more occasion to go into a bank. He is all through there.

Honourable senators, I would like to see several amendments made to this bill. The whole measure, in my opinion, is entirely unnecessary. It is the purest kind of farce, and it could be very dangerous. It might even be, as I said, the cause of loss of life. I have seen quarrels occur in connection with machines that are jointly owned, and they have been the bitterest quarrels I have ever known. I am convinced they will take place.

I would suggest that this "joint and several" provision be taken out of this legislation. It is unnecessary in any event because each one of the members of the syndicate would be worth the whole amount. However, having regard to all the other kinds of loans that are available, the legislation is unnecessary. I am opposed to it. It is very bad, and it can be very dangerous for the reasons I have stated.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I enter this debate with some trepidation because I am another lawyer talking on an agricultural topic. However, do not forget that many a farmer goes to a lawyer and asks him for his advice. For the most part my practice has not been to get people into trouble in order that I might get them out of it, but rather to keep them out of trouble in the first place. Were a farmer to come to me and ask for my advice with respect to the signing of a joint and several note, I would tell him not to do it except under very exceptional circumstances.

My friends who have been criticizing the bill have done so from the point of view of the possibility of the farmer getting himself into trouble by signing a note of this kind, but is not that the function of the farmer himself? Somebody has said that this will not be a cure for all the farmers' troubles and problems. Of course it will not be. Rome was not built in a day, and neither is a successful farming community constructed in a day or the legislation in regard to it. It is a step-by-step operation. One of the Opposition speakers—I think it was Senator Pearson—said it was a flea bite. He said that he was going to vote for it because he thought it might be of some value. Well, that is some concession. I think it may be of some value, but I do not overestimate its value at all.

My friend, who is smiling at me, the former Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), said it would benefit the machinery makers and not the farmers. If it benefits the machinery makers then that must be because the farmers think it is of some value to them, because it is only when they act that the machinery makers come into the picture at all.

I have been speaking so far as a lawyer, but my most vivid recollections are of the days when I lived on a farm. It is a long long time ago since I was farming with the desperate necessity of making a living. My father went on a farm when I was 10 years of age and we came off when I was 16 years of age in 1894. The recollections I have of the farming of those days are still very vivid in my mind. I have been interested in farmers and farming ever since and I have seen changes that have taken place in farming.

I can remember my father going out with a team of horses and a single blade and plowing all day long, perhaps seven or eight hours or something of that kind; and finally coming home at night with the horses lathered with sweat, dragging their feet behind them, and he tired out. The horses had travelled, I suppose, two miles an hour or something of that kind. As the land there was fairly heavy, if he had plowed an acre of land he had done fairly well.

At the present moment I have a farm. I am not a big farmer like my friend across the way (Hon. Mr. Willis) but I have a farm and I have a tractor, a fine big diesel tractor. It drags not one blade but three; so on that ground alone it accomplishes at least three times as much as did my father on the farm prior to 1894. Not only that, while he travelled at perhaps two or three miles an hour this tractor may travel at eight miles an hour or thereabouts. That would be about three times as fast as the horses. So if you take first the three blades doing three times as much work and travelling three times as fast, that gives us nine times as much production. Not only that, on this tractor we have lights so that we can use it all day long and all night long if we wish. My father could plow for eight hours only. A tractor of this kind with its lights can be used for a full 24 hours of the day if we wish. That would be three times as long, so we have 27 times the production we had in those old days on the farm.

Honourable senators, you need not mind the exactness of my mathematics. The facts are that with the combines, tractors and other farm machinery of today the farmer is not comparable with the farmer of those old days. Legislation of this kind becomes imperative. It is not that we want to go into syndicates or sign notes. It is because the farmer today simply must have this machinery that will keep up with the times, not for local consumption or life on the farm but in order that farmers in Canada can compete with farmers abroad who have adopted high machinery qualifications for their work. There has been talk here about our markets abroad. Certainly, if we were to continue farming as my father farmed many years ago, we would not be able to compete with the Russians, for instance, who are making more and more tractors and enlarging their farms and becoming up to date. We, too, must keep in pace with the progress of our times.

Gentlemen, this is not an ideal bill. I shall not go into it in detail. There are strong objections to the signing of a note of this kind. I would not advise it to any client of mine except, as I said, under exceptional circumstances. But why not give the farmer the opportunity? He has just as much intelligence as we have here. Why not give him the opportunity to use this bill if he so desires? It is another string to his bow. He may get himself into trouble but that, gentlemen, is his business, not ours. If we present him with an opportunity which he may use, he probably will thank us for it. It is a step in the right direction in the mechanization of our farms, the increasing of our production and, above all, the reduction in the cost of production on the farm which will make us competitive in the markets abroad.

While I am not enthusiastic about this bill I certainly am going to vote for it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if honourable Senator Connolly speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am sure we have all enjoyed the debate on this measure which has taken place this afternoon. I suppose it proves many things. It seems to me to prove in the first place that if you scratch a lawyer hard enough or long enough you may find a farmer or an agriculturist. We certainly uncovered a few here this afternoon.

I thank Senator Pearson for his remarks. I am not as pessimistic as he is about the prospects for the success of this legislation. I am not too optimistic either about the prospects of success for those lawyers who may think of getting a lot of business out of drawing these syndicate or partnership agreements. I think it is the intention, as I indicated last night, that the Farm Credit Corporation will have a good deal to do with the preparation of these agreements and will help those farmers who desire to form a syndicate, in drawing agreements, in the knowledge they have gathered from the British experience and from what they know about matters of this kind.

Senator Pearson referred to the risk involved in the partnership, particularly arising out of the joint and several liability on the note. I cannot speak out of personal experience, but I would think that the farmer is as sharp and as acute about entering into a partnership as any man from any other segment of society. I would think that farmers would choose their partners with a good deal of discernment.

As Senator Stambaugh mentioned, no one is forced to enter one of these partnerships or syndicates. As Senator Roebuck said, this is another facility available as a source of credit for the farming community.

I thank Senator Welch for the references he made, particularly to the agricultural problems in Maritime Canada. He stated that this legislation is a far cry from all that is needed. I am the first to admit that is so and I have had to say this about the Farm Credit bill and about the Small Loans bill. In themselves, none of these measures will solve the problem of the farmer. However, even if this bill is but a flea bite in one sense, it could have a fairly wide application for good.

I was pleased to hear Senator Inman refer to the co-operative aspect of farming in the great Province of Prince Edward Island. I think that what she described as the attitude of farmers one to another there is something which was behind the thinking that went into the making of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask the leader a question? He said that there is no compulsion. Perhaps he has never been through the experience of being the only likely man to join to buy some expensive machinery. You may not favour it but, because of Mrs. So and So and because of the farmers where you live, you are practically compelled to go into the syndicate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That may be, but it is up to the individual person to take his own responsibility in that respect, and this is done every day.

Let me talk about the area with which perhaps I am most familiar—the legal profession. Fairly early in life one forms associations or partnerships. One takes a risk, just as one's partners take a risk with you. But it is open to you not to take the risk. It is open to you to practice alone. So too is it open to any individual farmer not to bother about this source of credit but to go and get it from the bank or, as Senator Willis suggested, under the Small Loans Act or some other commercial source. It is up to the individual, and of course nobody is more of an individualist in this country, or perhaps any other, than the farmer.

Senator Brooks quoted Shakespeare to us. This I like to hear. He quoted the line: "Neither a borrower, nor a lender be." I wish he had continued, because another line says: "And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry." That is particularly applicable in this context. But I think the farmers have been dulling the edge of husbandry in this country in a considerably big way.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That was written 300 years ago.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. Certainly, that is another factor. Farmers have used credit from the Farm Credit Corporation, and from other sources of federal and provincial legislation, to which reference has been made today. Farmers are into the commercial banks and other lending institutions to the extent of $225 million to $400 million at this time, at rates varying all the way from 7 per cent to 20 per cent, depending upon the kind of institution to which they apply for their credit. The rates that are going to be applicable to this act are not going to compare to that. I had to hesitate last evening when Senator Farris asked what the rate would be. I am informed that it will be approximately 6 per cent. But if the edge of husbandry is going to be dulled by borrowing by credit, that edge has been pretty well dulled already, I should think.

Senator Willis says that this measure will infringe upon provincial credit legislation. I do not think "infringe" is the word the honourable senator intended or should have used. It is supplementary to other federal legislation which provides credit for farmers. It is supplementary to credit facilities that are provided by provincial governments, and they are considerable.

Senator Horner referred to the great dangers of a young man being involved jointly and severally with partners on a $100,000 note. I would point out to him that this, of course, is the maximum amount that can be borrowed by any syndicate, and whether or not a young man such as he describes would qualify as a credit risk for a loan of this magnitude is another matter.

Hon. Mr. Horner: A young man would be a better risk than an old man, wouldn't he?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): He might be, although perhaps I would rather have my honourable friend on a note like this, if I were going to lend the money, than a young man.

I thank Senator Roebuck for his intervention, because he has put this measure into very good perspective. I do not think he says it is the answer to all the farmers' problems. I think probably he will be found to be critical of some of the particular provisions of the bill. However, he has helped a great deal, following other speeches which were made this afternoon that were not too critical but more critical than Senator Roebuck's—I do not object to that—in putting the matter into perspective, into focus, the way I believe the measure should be considered.

Again, I thank all honourable senators who have participated in the debate.

I would propose that when the bill receives second reading it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I have one question to ask the honourable leader. Has it ever been considered that instead of joint and several notes by syndicate members, the liability be limited to one-third to each of the three signers?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think this has been considered, but I understand that the conclusion reached was that considering all the circumstances the joint and several liability is preferable in the general interest.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I have a few questions to ask the honourable leader. First, has there been any widespread, popular demand for this legislation? Secondly, has any estimate or forecast been made of the probable use of it once it is enacted into law?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I cannot give any specific answers to the honourable senator on either of these points, but I am informed that a great deal of interest has been expressed, both in eastern and western Canada, in the offices of the Farm Credit Corporation, which is the agency that will administer this legislation. There has been a good deal of interest indicated. I must add, in fairness, as I said last night, that this is experimental legislation. But it is going to be a self-sufficient operation. If it goes slowly, all right. Perhaps it will pick up as time goes along, if it does not start out with a great rush. Perhaps it is a matter of farmers who have the facilities made available to them learning just what the value of these facilities will be and working out among themselves ways in which they can best use it.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable leader if the officials of the Department of Agriculture will be the principal witnesses in committee?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes. I would think the principal witnesses would come from the Farm Credit Corporation. Mr. G. Owen, who is chairman, would probably give evidence that will be most satisfactory to all honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Will any farm organization be represented?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I know of none.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I suggest that possibly the agricultural division of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics might put on record the data as to the number of modern combines and implements, and the extent to which they are distributed in the different provinces. This would show, for instance, whether the major part of this expenditure might be applied to western Canada. Such information, I think, would be essential to a better understanding of this bill and possibly shed further light on the subject.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I will draw that to the attention of the authorities, and if there is such a division of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, or elsewhere, which can provide the information, I will see to it that it is represented in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill C-129, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

He said: Honourable senators, no doubt from time to time we all have had occasion to note with wonder how, when once a piece of legislation which serves a useful purpose is placed on the statute books, it seems to grow and expand in succeeding years.

The Crop Insurance Act which was passed in 1959 and which is indeed a useful piece of legislation, is now to undergo its first expansion to better meet the needs of the farmers of Canada, if the proposed amendment is enacted.

In explaining the development of the Crop Insurance Act, a few words must be said about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This act will, of course, remain in full force and effect, but as at first glance it might seem to serve some of the same purposes as the Crop Insurance Act, I would like to give a very short outline of the history of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Following the drought years during the 1930s it was considered necessary to develop some substitute for direct relief which had been used to assist farmers in disaster years on the prairies. Honourable senators will, of course, appreciate that the constitutional responsibility for providing assistance for those who suffer disaster such as crop failure rests with the provinces. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was designed to enable farmers, in times when they had something to sell, to contribute to a scheme which would enable them, as a right, to secure assistance in times of crop failure. So the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was passed to assist the provinces in meeting their responsibility to citizens in distress. This act, however, only applies to the spring wheat area in Canada, which includes the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Peace River district of British Columbia. During the period from 1939 to the present, farmers of the spring wheat area have received, by way of payment made under the act, $340 million, and have paid, by way of a one per cent levy on grain sales, $153 million. I would point out that the operation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is not affected in any way by the Crop Insurance Act or by the proposed amendment. Now, however, in an area where his province has introduced crop insurance, a farmer has the option of purchasing crop insurance or remaining under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

It only remains to say that, while the Prairie Farm Assistance Act did and still does afford some measure of relief, its application is limited to the areas mentioned, and the coverage made possible is limited to $800 per farmer, depending on the extent of crop failure. Actual payments made to farmers have averaged $245.

The Crop Insurance Act has general application to all of Canada, and the coverage which may be obtained extends to 60 per cent of the value of the long-term average yield in any area. It is interesting to note that the average amount of coverage provided for farmers in 1964 was just over $2,000.

This act is designed to provide assistance to provinces who enter into crop insurance programs, to make it possible for farmers to ensure a return of the costs of production of their crops. It is not the intent of the legislation to insure profits, but rather to enable provinces to provide insurance which will protect farmers' working capital.

Three provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island—have crop insurance programs in operation, and some 8,600 farmers purchased coverage for crops in 1964 totalling $18,000,000. It is expected that Nova Scotia and Alberta will commence the operation of insurance schemes in 1965.

From the beginning provinces were hesitant greatly to expand crop insurance operations because they feared that widespread disaster in the early years, before reserves were accumulated, would create a serious financial problem for the provincial governments. As a result the provinces requested that the federal Government, with its far greater resources, provide reinsurance for a large part of the provincial liability. The amendments before us are designed to provide that reinsurance and thus enable provinces to make crop insurance available to a great many more farmers.

The amendments are for the purpose of adding additional provisions to the Crop Insurance Act. Nothing is taken from the original act. All that is done is to create a new alternative to assist the provinces, so that the provinces will be able to introduce their own crop insurance scheme, without any fear of financial disaster.

Finally, honourable senators, let me say a few brief words about each of the several sections of the bill before us.

Section 1 provides an alternative to the present loan provision, whereby the province may reinsure a portion of its liability to its own farmers who have taken out crop insurance. The existing loan provisions are left unchanged.

Section 2 provides for the establishment of a special account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund to be known as the Crop Reinsurance Fund. The reinsurance premiums paid by the provinces will be paid into this fund, and in the event of claims, if there are any deficiencies, interest free, advances will be made from the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

New section 4B of the act—In the event of a claim the province is solely liable up to:

(i) the total of all premiums collected in that year; plus

(ii) any amount available in the reserve fund of the province Crop Insurance Fund; plus

(iii) 2½ per cent of the total liability under all policies in force that year.

When all these amounts are exhausted, the federal authority pays 75 per cent of the amount remaining unpaid and the province the remaining 25 per cent.

Section 3 provides that the premiums collected may only be used to pay losses, reinsurance expenses and 50 per cent of administration expenses.

Section 4 provides that insured farmers will receive back the full amount of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act levy.

Honourable senators, should the bill receive second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, first I would like to congratulate the sponsor, Senator Cook, on the very concise and clear manner in which he presented this bill.

I am a great believer in crop insurance. Ever since I was a young boy I have heard farm organizations and farmers as individuals ask for crop insurance. I think crop insurance is good legislation and I support it wholeheartedly.

As the sponsor has pointed out, crop insurance was first introduced and placed on the statute books in 1959, being chapter 42, and since that time three provinces have tried it out on an experimental basis. These have been sort of pilot projects, because there are many difficulties to overcome in crop insurance that only experience can solve.

I certainly hope the amendment we have before us today is not the last one we shall have, because I think many others will be necessary.

Probably the most progressive province with regard to crop insurance has been the province of Manitoba, because of the three provinces that have passed complementary legislation, which is necessary before crop insurance can function, Manitoba during the last crop year covered 6,400 farmers, while Saskatchewan covered 2,200 and Prince Edward Island 75. As a matter of fact, Manitoba started in the crop year 1960-61 with 2,500 farmers, covering a liability of $4 million. Now, as I stated before, they have some 6,000 farmers and the liability covered is $14 million. According to the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba they are hoping that with this amendment, which in part has been suggested by the Manitoba Minister of Agriculture, it will be possible next year to cover 50 per cent of all farmers in Manitoba, with a liability of some $25 million.

As I stated previously, this is the kind of legislation on which it is essential to proceed slowly. This is not because crop insurance is unpopular. It is not because it is unwanted by the farmers that they have not moved faster. But the provinces have been a little reluctant to enter into such a scheme for fear of some catastrophe resulting in a complete crop failure and the provinces would be faced with greater financial obligations than they could bear.

This amendment provides for two things, the first being that in the case of such a catastrophe resulting in complete crop failure the province can choose one of two alternatives, either a loan from the federal Government to cover the loss, or by seeing to it that they are reinsured with the federal Government. I merely wish to point out, as has been so ably explained by the sponsor, that this act is not a relief measure such as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was at its beginning. In view of the premiums that the provinces will have to pay to be reinsured, this act will be actuarially sound and over the years the premiums will cover the losses. The difficulty has been that at the beginning, in the case of severe loss or complete crop failure, some provinces were not sure that they could wait for a number of years to cover the losses.

The thing most desired by the farming community is stability, since that is one of the things they lack most at the present time. Of course this amendment or crop insurance cannot solve the problem of fluctuations in price. However we have the price stabilization act to take care of that. But this act can solve to some degree the problem of fluctuation in yield. I would like to point out to honourable senators that during the last 10 years there has not been a crop failure to the same extent as there was some years ago, for example in the 1930's.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Why?

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: On account of the improvements in farming methods, chemicals, insecticides and herbicides.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: And the good weather man.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: Not only good weather, but the improvements in the preservation of moisture and because of the scientific way in which farming is carried on today. Over the last 10 years the yield under similar conditions to those existing in the 1930's has been much higher because of these improvements.

Now to work out crop insurance on as sound an actuarial basis as life insurance is a little more difficult because those companies have figured out when one is supposed to die, but it is a little harder to figure out when a crop failure is likely to occur. But I think the companies have worked out fairly closely when it is likely to occur, and that will be an additional protection to create stability over the years as far as fluctuation in yield is concerned.

We have covered many other situations by legislation. Earlier today we were discussing an act whereby further credit is given to the farmers; we have had the Farm Credit Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and these things are now fairly well taken care of. I would hope that with these improvements and these amendments more provinces will come in under the Crop Insurance Act. I know Alberta is just about ready to come in. They have enabling legislation but they have not yet come into the scheme covered by this act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable senator for my own information what is the definition of "crop failure"?

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: Well, it is considered to be a crop failure if the yield is under a certain number of bushels through frost or for various other reasons. There can also be grasshoppers, or hail or many other hazards that can cause crop failure.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The farmer then carries the first loss, since it is only if he loses more than so many bushels it is considered a crop failure.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: To a large extent. There must be limited insurance because otherwise the premiums would be too high, but at least the insurance will cover the cost of production. I was very glad to hear Senator Cook speak of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and to say that it is not being discontinued. Some fear has been expressed in the past that it will be discontinued and replaced by the Crop Insurance Act. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has served and in fact still serves a very useful purpose as has been explained by the sponsor. The farmer pays a one per cent levy which is taken right off his grain cheque. The amount paid in is about half of what has been paid out. The remainder has been made up from the federal treasury. Since the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is not being discontinued, the farmers will have the best of two worlds. If a farmer does not wish to come under the Crop Insurance Act he can still take advantage of the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, but if he does decide to come under the Crop Insurance Act, then he cannot take advantage of both.

It should be remembered also that while the Prairie Farm Assistance Act serves a useful purpose in some areas it does not protect the farmer individually because it covers only failure occurring in an area, for example a township. One farmer may be unfortunate, while his neighbours may have a good crop, and so he would not derive any benefit under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Honourable senators, the hour is late, and I do not wish to speak at any length. However, I am very keen on this legislation which I consider to be excellent, and I hope we will have many more amendments of this nature as experience shows we need them. I heartily commend this bill to all honourable senators.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, I wish to congratulate the sponsor for his very clear explanation of the bill, and also the last speaker for his very fine remarks in commending this insurance bill to you.

The crop insurance bill of 1959 broke new ground in providing assistance to the farm industry, and in a sense it carried the former Prairie Farm Assistance Act somewhat further in the protection it afforded to the farmer. I had the privilege in 1959 of introducing the crop insurance bill, and I am pleased that it went through this house at that time without objection. If this amendment is brought forward to improve the original act, then I am pleased to support the amendment.

Today only three provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island, have availed themselves of the benefits that can accrue to farming communities as a result of this crop insurance. I am pleased to hear that Alberta and Nova Scotia have passed enabling legislation, although they have not yet set up pilot areas to test the strength or weakness of the crop insurance plan in their respective provinces.

I hope there will come a day when the crop insurance scheme will become universal so that all farm communities can make use of it, and that it will not be too costly for those who farm what are called sub-marginal lands. Some of the areas that are considered good insurable risks are more subject to hail and frost than areas that are not considered the best type of land for insurance coverage. There are other areas that are subject to drought but, on the other hand, they do not, as a rule, suffer from frost, and in the future it should be possible for them to come under an insurance plan that covers all areas of Canada. Once the crop insurance plan becomes general the premium could very easily be reduced.

At this point I might mention that when the Municipal Hail Insurance Scheme in the Province of Saskatchewan was placed before all the municipalities they were able either to accept or reject it, but in the greater part of the south half of the province they undertook to insure under that scheme. Individual farmers again can reject or accept municipal hail insurance. The Municipal Hail Insurance Scheme covers almost all areas of southern Saskatchewan, and the farmers find it comparatively cheap to have hail insurance on their land. When this insurance becomes universal it will bring with it a reduction in the premium.

Honourable senators, I think this bill, giving the provinces the right of reinsurance to a total of 75 per cent over and above the total of reserves and premium receipts, is a good move and I shall certainly support it.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Finance which was presented yesterday.

Hon. T. Darcy Leonard moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I realize the hour is late, and I shall try to make my remarks as brief as possible. However, I think the Senate is entitled to an explanation of the report that the Standing Committee on Finance brings before it today.

The report is in two numbered paragraphs. The first deals with the quorum of the committee, but that paragraph is really subsidiary to the paragraph that is numbered 2 and which deals with the power of the committee to sit during adjournments of the Senate. Therefore I shall deal first with paragraph 2, which is the important part of this report.

When your committee was set up and commenced its sittings last June it decided to embark upon a study of the recommendations made by the Glassco Commission with respect to the estimates. Those recommendations are quite sweeping. They are designed to bring about greater efficiency and greater economy in the management of the Government's financial affairs. In embarking upon this study the committee was aware that it would require a number of sittings and the hearing of a number of key witnesses. This study did not exclude the consideration by the committee of any items of expenditures in the estimates. The committee was quite free to consider any of those items, and any questions could be asked about them of any witnesses brought before the committee to deal with them. However, as the matter of the consideration of the Glassco Commission's report is rather important it was decided that at this stage it might well receive the consideration of a parliamentary committee and that before the recommendations are implemented consideration might be given to them by this committee.

Towards the end of June we ran into some difficulty. The sittings of the Senate were uncertain. The committee could not sit if an adjournment was for more than one week, and although we might try to estimate the time at which the committee might be sitting we had to fit that into the timetables of a number of our witnesses who had other engagements and who had made arrangements for their summer vacations. The Steering Committee of the Standing Committee on Finance decided upon a program of eight meetings, and as these were going to extend over a period of time it was felt that they should start with the commencement of the regular fall sittings of the Senate.

At these eight meetings we would first hear Dr. Davidson, the Secretary of the Treasury Board. Dr. Davidson is a very experienced civil servant of long standing in various departments of Government. He is a dedicated civil servant, and one who commands high respect in Parliament and throughout the country, and has for a great many years. With Dr. Davidson the committee would hear also Mr. Steele, the former secretary of the Treasury Board, who is now Under Secretary of State. These two gentlemen would be followed by Mr. Balls, the Comptroller of the Treasury; Mr. Henderson, the Auditor General, and then Dr. Bryce, the deputy Minister of Finance. Time would be left for another two meetings at which the committee might consider the report that it would present to the Senate, or hear further evidence or rehear any of the witnesses who had appeared previously.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I am sorry for interrupting the honourable senator, but will he allow me to ask a question? I did not understand what evidence the committee will be hearing. Is it the report of the Glassco Commission upon which these gentlemen will be examined?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Perhaps I might amplify that. The Glassco Commission, in dealing with the estimates, has made some very sweeping recommendations, as I have said. I can give only a few examples. One of them is that the number of votes under which the estimates are brought before Parliament should be reduced, thus providing a smaller number of votes for Parliament to deal with. A second and very major recommendation is that in the preparation of the estimates, and in the form of the estimates, they be put under the heading of programs of expenditures. At the present time the emphasis is on details of expenditures. The thought behind that recommendation is that as a department embarked upon a program of expenditure, even though details of expenditures with respect to that program were kept, there would be a deeper sense of responsibility upon the department to see that the program was being carried out economically, and there would be more opportunity afforded Parliament of examining into the carrying out of that program. That, in turn, involves giving to departments a greater responsibility with respect to the estimates. The next step is that it involves a change in the controls that are now placed upon the departments in carrying out their programs of expenditures.

These are important matters, and they are just some of the recommendations. These are the things we have been dealing with in the committee so far.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It sounds very sensible.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: We had our first meeting of the fall session yesterday, at which Dr. Davidson spoke for several hours.

Under the schedule it is planned to have a meeting next Tuesday at which Dr. Davidson will finish his evidence and will be subjected to examination and cross-examination. When Dr. Davidson's evidence is completed we will hear from Mr. Balls during the following week, and then from Mr. Henderson, and so on according to this program. The program is subject to the calling of additional witnesses and the holding of additional meetings, but it does present an orderly way of dealing with these recommendations, a study of which seems to be important for this committee to be engaged in.

We are facing again the possibility of some uncertainty in the sittings of the Senate, for reasons with which all honourable senators are familiar. It may be that the Senate will not sit next week or the week after because no business is coming to it in the way of public bills from the House of Commons. That would mean a postponement of this program, but perhaps that is not so important as is the effect it would have on the committee's being able to maintain continuity in its studies. For instance, Dr. Davidson's evidence should be completed before we hear from the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the Comptroller's evidence should be completed before we hear the evidence of the Auditor General.

Therefore, if this report is adopted it is planned to go ahead with the meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance scheduled for next Tuesday even though the Senate itself is not sitting. The committee will then sit on eight successive Tuesdays until its work is completed, with the idea of presenting a report to this house before the Christmas recess. Other meetings may be necessary also. There may be more than one meeting a week. We have been in touch with all those witnesses and they know that these dates are scheduled for them. They are preparing their material and we would get a most efficient consideration of the work of the committee, if this can be carried out.

That is the reason why the committee asks for authority from the Senate to sit even though the Senate adjourns for more than one week. Under the present Rule 85, we cannot sit if the Senate adjourns for more than one week. For example, if tomorrow or Friday we were to adjourn for a longer period than one week, with the suspension of the rule the Finance Committee could sit next Tuesday and similarly from week to week.

I realize there are some disadvantages. I realize that there are some senators who would like to be at meetings of the Finance Committee, and if the Senate does not sit it would be difficult for them to be there. However, there are some offsetting factors. The proceedings are all being printed and will be made available as rapidly as possible to the members of the committee. The present meetings are of a preliminary character, and it is my view that when we come to meetings dealing with the report itself those meetings will be held when the Senate is sitting, so at that time all members will have an opportunity to deal with the report itself, review all the evidence that has been heard and, of course, recall any witness of whom they want to ask further questions.

There is also an advantage, in a way, in having a meeting, say, next week. Many senators are here as a result of having been called back this week and will stay on without going home if there is an interregnum of one week.

Honourable senators, that is the main reason for the report. The other section is a matter of form. The present quorum is nine members. The suggestion of making it seven is done through an abundance of caution, as the lawyers say. On the theory that if nine is the right figure when the Senate is in session, seven might be appropriate in regard to a period when the Senate is not sitting. Also, it will make the task of the chairman a little easier if, no matter what the circumstances, he can count on seven at least. I myself think there would be many more than seven, but nevertheless out of an abundance of caution I would suggest we make it seven.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We are most grateful to honourable Senator Leonard, who has explained this motion in a very clear way. He has pointed to the important work it is proposed to do in the Finance Committee.

It is worth saying here that very often the work done in committees of this honourable house is as important as that done by the house itself. We should give more attention and attach more importance to the work of our committees than we have been disposed to do. Certainly, the outside public has a very high idea of the value of the work of Senate committees.

In acceding to the proposal before us now we are reinforcing that view in saying that we intend to maintain the high reputation which these committees enjoy and that this is something we should all support.

Report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Cook for the second reading of Bill C-129, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, after listening to the speech made yesterday by the honourable sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Cook) and the speeches of Senator Hnatyshyn and Senator Pearson, I find that there is very little left for me to say, except that this bill to amend the Crop Insurance Act of 1959 is something that the provinces have been asking for and for that reason we should give it second reading and speedy passage.

When the Crop Insurance bill was first introduced in 1959 it was sponsored by the honourable senator from Lumsden (Hon. Mr. Pearson). At that time he stated it was something new in the form of farm legislation; that it would likely turn out to be less than perfect in every particular, and that it would probably be necessary to amend it from time to time. The purpose of the bill now before us is to amend the 1959 Crop Insurance Act.

I take it that it is good business to reinsure any risk which, if it materializes, may put you into bankruptcy or prove financially embarrassing. The purpose of this bill is to protect the provinces that enter into this scheme, and to make it safer for them to carry on the business of insuring the crops of the farmers.

Honourable senators, in my opinion, it is not necessary to send this simple bill to committee, and it is my hope that it will be given second reading, and possibly third reading, today. In these circumstances my remarks will be quite brief.

I would like to call the attention of honourable senators to the fact that in 1939 the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was passed after several very dry years. That act was passed for the purpose of giving the farmers drought relief. I know something about the operation of it in the province of Saskatchewan where it has worked out quite well, and many farmers wish it continued in force even though the maximum relief that can be obtained in any one year under that act is $800 per farmer.

I might say that in the district in which I carry on my farming operations we have not had a crop failure since 1937. That is quite a record, because there were crop failures in 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and on up to 1937. The crop in 1937 was, I think, the worst I ever grew. In fact, we did not thresh anything on our lands in my home district that year.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Why? Was it because of drought?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We had had no rain whatever, and of course we were not farming as well in those days as we are now, and the crop just did not grow. We had absolutely nothing.

It was probably as a result of that experience that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was passed in 1939. Under that act every farmer, no matter who he may be, pays one per cent of the amount he obtains for his crop when he delivers it to the elevator. That amount of one per cent is deducted from the purchase price. On crops of wheat, oats, barley and flax—although flax was not in this category at the beginning—we have been paying this amount of one per cent all these years. I am happy to say that I have never yet qualified for prairie farm assistance on any of my lands, but I am quite content to pay my share of the cost because it helps to build up the fund so that others who have suffered crop failures can obtain this form of relief.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: You have the protection.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: However, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act did not give individual coverage. If a certain number of sections of land which surrounded your land did not qualify, it made no difference; the whole area qualified and each person was able to obtain the assistance. It was never on an individual basis. One man might be located 10 miles away from the area which I have just mentioned and even though he had no crop at all he could not get any relief under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

On account of this, many farm organizations all over the country kept asking for some form of crop insurance. Also, in Saskatchewan a commission was set up to study the economic future of the province. After a thorough study lasting two years or more and costing quite a large sum of money, the commission brought in its report recommending, among other things, the adoption of some form of crop insurance. Finally, the government of the day brought in the Crop Insurance Act of 1959. We are amending that act today at the request of certain provinces, for the purpose of establishing a crop reinsurance plan. This has been fully explained by the former speakers, and I do not intend to elaborate.

It was suggested to me by an honourable senator who is familiar with farm matters in western Canada, that there might be some overlapping in the Province of Saskatchewan because that province has municipal hail insurance. He suggested that I should explain this to honourable senators when I spoke this afternoon.

It is quite true that we have municipal hail insurance and that every farm is insured to the extent of $5 per acre against loss by hail. However, any person who does not wish to carry that insurance and chooses to insure his crops against hail in a line company, can opt out of the Municipal Hail Insurance Act. There may or there may not be some overlapping. The person who opts out and who signs up for crop insurance under the Crop Insurance Act would get nothing more than what he would get in case of loss under that act; but if he did not opt out he would get his municipal hail insurance in the case of a loss by hail and he would also get whatever he was entitled to under the Crop Insurance Act. But in that case he would be paying two premiums: he would be paying a premium to the Municipal Hail Insurance Association, which is collected in the form of taxes by the municipality in which he resides, and he would also be paying a premium under the Crop Insurance Act.

I think that what I have said will make the picture clear to honourable senators. That is one of the reasons why I am speaking today. I adjourned the debate last evening, not for the purpose of holding up the bill, but simply to read what the other speakers had said and to decide whether it was necessary to deal with anything else.

One matter which I think has not been fully explained is that under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, when the farmer takes his wheat to the elevator, one per cent of the selling price of the grain is deducted, but when he comes under the Crop Insurance Act he gets a card, which he takes with him when he goes to the elevator with his grain, and the elevator company does not deduct the one per cent. However, the difficulty has been that when the Canadian Wheat Board made its payments later on they deducted the one per cent, and the farmer lost that no matter whether he came under the Crop Insurance Act or not. Under section 4 of Bill C-129 this is rectified. This section provides that the one per cent that has been deducted by the Wheat Board will be repaid to all farmers who have had the deduction made.

I have one further remark to make. At the present time, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Prince Edward Island have adopted crop insurance under this act. Nova Scotia and Alberta have passed enabling legislation. These are the provinces which have asked for this legislation, and this bill provides for reinsurance. If the bill is passed, I hope they will also decide to come under the act.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Cook speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Cook: Honourable senators, I am sure we all agree, in view of the excellent contributions to the debate, that the sense of the house seems to be that this bill be not referred to a committee. I therefore ask honourable senators to give favourable consideration to the motion for second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Cook: With leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

AUTHORITY TO SIT DURING SENATE ADJOURNMENTS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Cook, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, moved that the report be adopted now.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, this may appear to be a matter of repetition, because yesterday when the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance (Hon. Mr. Leonard) presented a similar motion, which I understand to be independent of the motion now presented, I spoke of the importance that I think all of us attach to the work of the committees of the Senate, even when the Senate is not in session.

Without repeating what I said yesterday, I would ask that the views I expressed then apply also to this motion. However, because this motion gives me an opportunity to speak again, and also because I have the responsibility of piloting public bills through this chamber, I would like to record the appreciation that all of us feel to the chairmen of our various standing and select committees for the valuable service they render the Senate and Parliament in the work they perform. To be chairman of a committee is not always an easy task. It is not always easy to ensure that there is a quorum. The decisions that have to be made, and the judicial way in which they are best made in the interests of the Senate and Parliament, often impose a heavy burden upon our chairmen. We have able committees in the Senate, as the public recognizes, and I say that our present chairmen are worthy of the high traditions established by outstanding men who occupied these positions in the Senate in the past.

Report adopted.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

15 October 1964

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 15th October, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

A. G. Cherrier,

Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate.

PRIVATE BILL

MOUNTAIN PACIFIC PIPELINE LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved the second reading of Bill S-41, to incorporate Mountain Pacific Pipeline Ltd.

He said: Honourable senators, before proceeding with my remarks on the motion for second reading, perhaps I may be permitted, as chairman of a committee, to say thank you to the Leader of the Government for his very kind remarks made with respect to chairmen of committees. While in my own case I think his remarks are somewhat exaggerated, nevertheless, I appreciate them, as I am sure the other chairmen do.

In sponsoring a bill for the incorporation of a pipeline company, I am a little out of my usual field. However, I can give the Senate the benefit of the information which has been given to me by the sponsors of the application, and if the Senate sees fit to give second reading to the bill, as I assume it will, then I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. The sponsors of the bill will be present at the committee, and will be able to furnish fuller information than can I, in my ignorance, concerning this pipeline.

The purpose of this bill is the incorporation of a pipe line company pursuant to the National Energy Board Act, to gather and transmit natural gas liquids from western Alberta to the west coast of Canada. This project will include construction of a gathering system in the gas fields of Alberta, and a 580-mile, 8-inch pipe line from Edson, Alberta, through the Yellowhead Pass route, to Port Moody, British Columbia. A very substantial proportion of the products is intended to be shipped to Japan and other foreign markets.

The natural gas liquids involved in this project are ethane, propane, butanes and pentanes, all of which are constituents of wet natural gas which forms a substantial part of the natural gas reserves of Alberta. Ethane, propane and butanes are widely used in petrochemical manufacturing plants as the raw material for such products as ethylene, propylene and butylene, which in turn are used in the manufacture of synthetic rubbers and plastics, plastic fibres, ethylene glycol, or anti-freeze, and to produce paints, solvents, explosives, pharmaceuticals, detergents and many other products. In the expanding petrochemical manufacturing industry the uses for these basic raw materials is considered limitless. The fourth constituent of wet natural gas is propane, which is widely used for domestic and commercial heating in areas where natural gas is not available.

To date, a large proportion of these liquids have been consumed as part of the natural gas, whether it be in exported or domestic use. This constitutes a loss to the country of a valuable resource which, if extracted, can be profitably used for the purposes which are above described. The Alberta Government has recognized the value of these components and has enacted legislation which subjects all natural gas export permits to the reservation that these liquids might be required to be extracted in the province before the export of the natural gas. To date this legislation has not been invoked.

The initial capacity of the 8-inch pipe line will be 17,000 barrels per day. The pipe line will be designed to carry a number of petrochemical products in addition to the four above described basic raw materials. The design of the pipe line to accommodate these other products will be of significant value to the petrochemical industry in Alberta as it will allow the secondary industry a means of access to the west coast.

The purposes of the Mountain Pacific project will in no way duplicate any of the established gas or oil pipe lines in Canada, which can generally be divided into two groups: firstly, oil pipe lines and, secondly, natural gas pipe lines. In the first class are such pipe lines as Trans-Mountain, carrying oil from Alberta to the west coast, and Interprovincial Pipe Line, which carries oil from Alberta to eastern Canada. Secondly, there are the natural gas pipe lines such as West Coast Transmission which transports vapour gas from inland British Columbia to the west coast, the Alberta and Southern Pipeline which connects Alberta to U.S.A., and the Trans-Canada Pipeline from Alberta easterly to Ontario. The only liquid gas extraction plant and pipe line is that of the Pacific Transmission Company connecting Empress, Alberta and Winnipeg, Manitoba and using as its source of supply natural gas in the Trans-Canada Pipeline system.

The Mountain Pacific project has been planned by two Canadians, both experienced in the oil and gas industry. One is Peter Colwell Bawden, and the other is Gus A. Van Wielingen, both of whom are from Calgary.

Mr. Bawden was born in Toronto and, like a number of other young men, followed the advice of Horace Greeley and went west, and the west has been good to him. He is the son of Mr. Harry Bawden of Toronto, whom I have known very well for a good many years. Mr. Bawden is an investment banker in Toronto who is highly regarded and experienced, and I think he is known to a good many honourable senators. His son, Peter Bawden, is the majority owner and president of Peter Bawden Drilling Limited, one of the largest oil well drilling companies in Canada. This company commenced business in 1952 with one drilling rig and about 20 employees; today, together with its wholly-owned subsidiaries, it controls 28 drilling rigs and over 600 employees in Canada and Australia. The Australian affiliate, Richter-Bawden Ltd., is the largest contract oil drilling firm in that country.

Mr. Bawden's experience and initiative made possible the drilling of the first oil well in the Canadian Arctic Islands in 1961. It was the most northerly well ever drilled in the free world.

Mr. Bawden has actively participated in the affairs of the petroleum industry in Canada. In 1962 he was president of the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors, and has a number of other activities —which are listed and can be ascertained— to his credit.

Mr. Gus A. Van Wielingen has had 17 years' experience in the natural gas and petrochemical industry of Canada, the United States and foreign countries. For more than six years he was a senior associate and a director of J. C. Sproule and Associates Limited, an engineering consulting firm specializing in oil and natural gas exploration and production, with headquarters at Calgary. Previously Mr. Van Wielingen was chief gas engineer for a large international oil company operating in Canada, and during his many years in the industry he has participated in many of the major oil and gas developments in Canada. Mr. Van Wielingen holds a Bachelor of Science degree in mechanical engineering from the University of Amsterdam.

Mr. Bawden and his company have spent over two years investigating and researching the potential markets and sources of supply, the feasibility of transporting the liquid gases from Alberta to foreign markets, and the financing of the project. Canadian Bechtel Ltd. and J. C. Sproule and Associates Ltd. were retained to advise on the engineering aspects of the project, and Mr. Bawden, Mr. Van Wielingen and others have spent lengthy periods in Japan and elsewhere assessing the potential markets and prices. Some substantial producers in Alberta have been approached and a sufficient number have been "interested" to assure the initial supply to meet the requirements of the project.

Results of the marketing studies and negotiations in Japan have shown that the project should be proceeded with immediately to capitalize upon the presently expanding market for liquid gases in that country. This expansion in Japan is taking place at a rapid rate and, furthermore, the Japanese industry has expressed a desire to develop a source of supply as an alternative to the Persian Gulf which is presently their main source. Marketing and transportation surveys have demonstrated that the Canadian liquid products can be sold in Japan at prices competitive with the Persian Gulf supplies. It is estimated that the Japanese market could absorb liquid gases from Canada in quantities valued at $10 million annually. Transport to the Japanese market will be by refrigerated tanker. The shipping distance from the west coast of Canada to Japan is shorter by about 2,600 miles than the route presently in use from the Persian Gulf to Japan, and this adds substantially to the advantage that the Canadian product will have over the present supply to Japan.

In addition to the sale of the products to the Japanese market, it is foreseen that substantial sales can be made on the west coast of Canada as well as in the western United States.

Mr. Bawden and Mr. Van Wielingen also believe that a secondary petrochemical industry will gradually develop, both in Alberta and British Columbia in the areas serviced by this pipe line, with a resultant increase in demand for the gases and consequent benefit to those provinces.

Dominion Securities Corporation Ltd., one of Canada's leading financial firms, has given us the assurance that the project can be financed, subject to suitable contractual arrangements for the purchase and marketing of products.

It is estimated that the cost of acquiring the rights-of-way, constructing gathering systems, storage facilities and the 8-inch pipe line to the west coast will be $38 million. Assuming that early approval of the project can be obtained from the energy boards—of course this does require the consent of the National Energy Board of Canada and of the Alberta Oil and Gas Conservation Board— the completion of the pipe line during 1966 is contemplated. The construction of the whole project would employ approximately 1,800 men, and as a going concern the enterprise will have a substantial number of employees.

This bill provides for an authorized capital stock of 10 million common shares without par value and 250,000 preferred shares with a par value of $100 each. It provides that the majority of the directors shall be Canadian citizens resident in Canada. The head office of this company is to be at the City of Calgary.

I think that is all the information I have. I will do my best to answer any questions honourable senators might ask, although, as I said at the outset, I do confess my ignorance on the subject in general. However, in the light of the information which has been supplied to me and which I have given to this house, it is my view that this bill should receive second reading and then go to committee for further consideration and for the hearing of evidence in connection with it.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Will the honourable senator tell us if there is any such thing as a deadline for the passage of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I assume, honourable senator, there is no hidden meaning in that question. In fact, there is no deadline.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Then, there is no fear of closure.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I would like to ask if there are any shares held by Japanese in this company. The Japanese have been combing this country recently to see what they can get, and now for the first time we have a pipe line to pump oil out of Alberta practically direct to Japan. As I say, the Japanese have been combing this country very carefully to see what they can get from this country to help their industrial works in Japan. I understand there are approximately 50 of them here at the moment, and for that reason I ask if there are any Japanese holding shares in the company.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, my understanding is that the only people presently financially interested are the people I have mentioned to you, Mr. Bawden and Mr. Van Wielingen, and the other petitioner, Mr. Lougheed, who is a solicitor in Calgary. Of course no shares have been issued because the company has not yet been incorporated, and until it is incorporated and receives the necessary permits no shares will be issued.

I think there are two questions really involved in considering this point. The tanker fleet might very well be owned by a different company than this pipe line company, and the shipping facilities used for the transport of the liquid gas might be leased. I do not think it has yet been determined how it will be done. It is conceivable that this company or its associates might themselves construct and own their tankers. The point to be considered is that these liquids are to be transported by refrigerated vessels or under pressure, and therefore special tankers are required to transport the liquids from Canada to Japan or to any other country. I would suggest that the specific question be put to the sponsors of the bill when we are in committee.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is very important, I think.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

ADDRESS OF LOYALTY AND AFFECTION FOLLOWING VISIT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the following message has been received from the House of Commons:

Resolved: That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To Her Most Excellent Majesty:
Elizabeth The Second

By the Grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms and Territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

The . . . Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, wish humbly to convey to Your Majesty this expression of our deepest loyalty, affection and respect, and of our heartfelt appreciation of your recent visit to Canada.

The presence in our country of Your Majesty and His Royal Highness Prince Philip on the occasion of the centennial of the meetings of the Fathers of Confederation held at Charlottetown and Quebec City warmed and moved the hearts of all true Canadians. Your messages will be an inspiration and guide to the Canadian people as we work together to achieve the national progress of which you spoke so movingly.

We pray that you may continue to reign for many years as our gracious and beloved Sovereign.

Ordered: That the said Address be engrossed, and that a Message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that the House of Commons has passed the foregoing Address and requesting Their Honours to unite with this House in the said Address by inserting therein the words "Senate and".

Attest.

Léon-J. Raymond
The Clerk of the House of Commons

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by honourable Senator Brooks, P.C.:

That the Senate do agree with the House of Commons in the said Address by filling up the blank spaces left therein with the words "Senate and".

Honourable senators, both Senator Brooks and I have been uniquely honoured today by our colleagues. By their direction, we alone are to speak to the resolution for them and on behalf of the entire Senate of Canada.

The visit to Canada of Her Majesty and her husband, His Royal Highness the Prince Philip, is a great national occasion. They came to mark the centenary of the conferences at Charlottetown and Quebec out of which this new northern nation was born. Their coming reminds us of the progress we have made since the small colonies of those days so long ago agreed to federate. In the intervening century British North America has become Canada. And Canada has been forged into a distinctive modern nation of the new world by the energy, the intrepidity, the inventiveness and the integrity of those early colonists, their descendants and the hundreds of thousands of others who came here to share her abundance and to help work out her destiny.

No one will say that the task has been easy. All will agree that some national problems remain to be solved. But this is a way of life with a great, a dynamic and a progressive people.

Nations, like men, do not live by bread alone. The basic elements of the spirit of a nation are in the minds and hearts of its people—honour above all, confidence in their common destiny, integrity in their dealings, charity in the broad sense to other men, energy, capacity and a reliance upon Divine Providence.

Nations, too, like men, must pause occasionally to assess their position. Canada has paused this year. She has looked back momentarily to the significance of the fateful meeting in that little room in Charlottetown one hundred years ago. She has surveyed the development since. The visit of Canada's Queen and her speeches here have put into perspective the spiritual motives without which this great endeavour would have been impossible.

From the beginning, the influence of the Crown upon Canada has been benign. In more recent times it has been increasingly so, probably because it has become more personal. The visit of Her Majesty on this and other occasions, like the visits of her father and of her mother on earlier occasions, have emphasized this. The fact is that the relationships between the Crown and Canada have provided a pattern for the modern development of the Commonwealth and of the many countries which now make up its membership.

I would go further today—though it may be anomalous to do so. As Canada has progressed in independence and self-reliance, the personal attachment of her people to the Queen's person has in fact grown stronger as reliance upon Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom has diminished. Her Majesty is in truth the Queen of our people.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The attitudes of our people reflect this fact, but more especially is it reflected in the faces and in the voices of our little children, who are its best and its most objective witnesses.

(Translation):

Honourable senators, the visit which the Queen of Canada paid our country affords an opportunity to recall the motto of the province of Quebec: "Je me souviens". As soon as the British regime was established in Canada —under the very terms of the capitulation of Quebec and Montreal, under the Quebec Act of 1774 and under the British North America Act—our constitution recognized, without any reservation, certain fundamental rights to French-speaking Canadians. Those rights dealt with language, religion, civil code, customs, and education.

Let us recall first of all that such an arrangement was entirely foreign to the imperial policy of those days. Today, that policy has become steadfast and enlightened. It is enshrined in our constitutional documents and practice. It has been forcefully recognized in the speech delivered by Her Majesty in the Quebec legislature last Saturday. In effect, rights formerly called the fundamental rights of minorities are truly the guarantee of real equality between all Canadians.

At this milestone in our history, when so many of our traditional beliefs are subject to political debates, the statements of the Queen of Canada, who came among her people, emphasize not only those fundamental principles but establish also a link of admiration, affection and loyalty between all her Canadian subjects and their youthful, gracious and courageous Queen.

(Text):

Honourable senators, we are all conscious of the fact that there has been among us a gracious and beautiful young woman whose sincerity, whose dedication, and whose courage has touched the hearts of us all.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I deem it a great honour and privilege to be the seconder of this motion.

The idea of introducing a motion such as this before both Houses of Parliament was suggested in the House of Commons a few days ago, and it was debated briefly there at that time.

This morning, the House of Commons, with enthusiasm and sincerity, unanimously passed the Address, without debate. The members of the Commons are the elected representatives of the people of Canada, and therefore in passing the address that house expressed the sentiments of the people of Canada from coast to coast.

Honourable senators, it is fitting that we in the Senate, on our own behalf, should join in sending a message to Her Majesty. The Senate is a branch of Parliament, and although ours is not an elected body, the members of this house come from all parts of Canada and represent the people from all parts of the country.

I am sure that Her Majesty knows the general feeling of the people in Canada. I think she has the faculty of looking below the surface, and is able to see clearly what is in their hearts.

Her Majesty sent a message after she had left our shores, one paragraph of which I am sure indicates her understanding:

> Please convey my warm thanks and those of my husband to the Prime Minister, Government and people of Canada for the kind and loyal welcome which they have given us.

His Excellency the Governor General replied for the people of Canada. I do not think it would be out of place for me to say here how proud we have been of the manner in which Their Excellencies, the Governor General and Madame Vanier, have performed their duties, not only on this but on every occasion since His Excellency became Her Majesty's representative in Canada. His message in part says:

> The presence of Your Majesty and of His Royal Highness amongst us has strengthened our admiration and affection for, and pride in, Our Sovereign.

Those well chosen and, may I say, most appropriate words, express the feelings of Canadians, and I am sure that under ordinary circumstances they would have been sufficient.

I enjoyed the remarks of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I am not going to follow him in reciting the development of our great country since Confederation. That has been well done by him. Nor do I think it necessary to review the outstanding attributes and qualifications of Her Majesty as our Queen. She has, in full measure, all the queenly virtues people can expect and hope for from their Queen—courage was mentioned by the Leader of the Government, which she exhibited on her visit—dedication to duty, self-sacrifice, to mention only a few. But however much we admire these virtues in our Queen, I think we admire even more the homely virtues—her home life, her happy family life, the love of her husband and children. Time and time again it has been said that the family life of our royal family provides a splendid example not only for her subjects but for all peoples everywhere.

If I may make a personal reference, honourable senators, I had the great honour of accompanying the Queen on three occasions, twice in Ottawa and once in Great Britain. On those occasions I noticed that on meeting dignitaries of state, the army, navy, air force, and other services, she was most courteous and very queenly; but it was when as our Queen she met, as it were, the common people that she showed up at her best. I was greatly impressed on two occasions when she met the old veterans at the National War Memorial by the interest she showed in them and their families, and also the great warmth and friendliness she showed in chatting with the Mothers of the Silver Cross.

The Leader of the Government has said that the Crown is part of the Government of this country. It has been since the days of Confederation. The Fathers of Confederation one hundred years ago realized that the Throne was and would continue to be an emblem of unity for all our people.

On her recent visit here and in her public appearances and utterances, the Queen, by her tact, reserve and understanding, not to mention her unflinching courage, demonstrated that she will continue to help to bring about a better understanding among all peoples in Canada. Indeed, as Her Majesty said:

> True patriotism does not exclude understanding the patriotism of others.

I am sure that her influence has already been felt and appreciated.

In closing, honourable senators, may I say that as long as we have the Crown—and personally I hope we will continue to have it for many generations—and as long as we have a Sovereign such as we have today, it is easy to say, "God bless the Queen, God bless her gallant husband, God bless her family."

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I now move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks):

> That the Honourable the Speaker do sign the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen on behalf of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered, That the Clerk do go down to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that the Senate have passed the Address to Her Excellent Majesty the Queen, conveying to Her Majesty the expression of our deepest loyalty, affection and respect, and of our heartfelt appreciation of her recent visit to Canada, in the manner set forth in the said Address hereto attached, and have inserted in the blank spaces therein the words "Senate and".

ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks):

> That the following Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General, namely:
> To His Excellency General the Right Honourable Georges P. Vanier, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, upon whom has been conferred the Military Cross and the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.
> MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:
> The Senate ..... of Canada, in Parliament assembled, have agreed to an Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen, conveying to Her Majesty the expression of our deepest loyalty, affection and respect, and of our heartfelt appreciation of her recent visit to Canada, in the manner set forth in our Joint Address hereto attached, and respectfully request that Your Excellency will be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks):

> That the Honourable the Speaker do sign the said address to His Excellency the Governor General on behalf of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered, That the Clerk do go down to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that the Senate have passed an Address to His Excellency the Governor General respectfully requesting that His Excellency may be pleased to transmit our Joint Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen, conveying to Her Majesty the expression of our deepest loyalty, affection and respect, and of our heartfelt appreciation of her recent visit to Canada, and more particularly set forth in the said Joint Address, and request the House of Commons to unite with this House in the Address to His Excellency the Governor General by inserting the words "and Commons."

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I would like to suggest that we conclude this auspicious occasion by all the members of the Senate rising and singing "God Save the Queen."

The Senators thereupon rose and sang "God Save the Queen."

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

> Report of the Superintendent of Insurance of Canada, Volume II, Annual Statements of Fire and Casualty Insurance Companies and of Accident and Sickness Insurance transacted by life ininsurance companies in Canada, for the year ended December 31, 1963, pursuant to section 9 of the Department of Insurance Act, chapter 70, R.S.C., 1952. PRIVATE BILL

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF DENTISTS OF CANADA—FIRST READING

Hon. Donald Smith presented Bill S-44, to incorporate The Royal College of Dentists of Canada.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FLAG DESIGNS

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, I give notice of a question that I shall ask when the house meets again. I want to know the exact number of flags exhibited in Room 356-S of the Senate on Tuesday last. I might have two or three comments to make, but on account of the solemnity of this sitting I shall wait until the next one to make them.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to the order for Notices of Motion:

Hon. John J. Connolly moved that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 3, 1964, at eight o'clock in the evening.

He said: Honourable senators, although this motion is for an adjournment to a definite date, it may well be that the Senate will be recalled earlier. I am sure I speak for all honourable senators when I say that this motion will not in any way interfere with or delay progress of legislation through Parliament. If there is legislation ready for consideration at an earlier date—and this would include a bill for interim supply or any other bill—after consultation with His Honour the Speaker the Senate will be notified as to when it should reconvene.

Motion agreed to.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER FOR SECOND READING STANDS

On the Order:

> Second Reading of Bill S-16, intituled: "An Act to amend the Marriage and Divorce Act".—(Honourable Senator Pouliot).

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I ask leave for this bill to stand until December 21 next.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands until December 21.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted, without touching the merits of the bill itself, I now rise on a question of privilege and a point of order, based on a vote passed by the Senate on July 21, three and a half months ago, to ask the Government to refer this Bill S-16 to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision.

It has been said there is no jurisprudence on the matter. That is not true, but if it were true, it would be a better reason to have a decision made by the Supreme Court of Canada to decide whether the Parliament of Canada or the provincial legislatures have jurisdiction with regard to the rights of married women. It is clear. No man or woman in this country can substitute himself or herself for the courts to establish a jurisprudence and to decide what legislative body has any authority.

My contention is not at all that I am infallible, but I appeal to your intelligence, and refer you to the majority vote of two to one insisting upon the submission or the reference of this matter to the Supreme Court. It is enough to understand that there is negligence somewhere.

I do not want to use harsh language tonight, but I find there is something lacking in the Department of Justice. I know very well, having looked at the record, that when Sir Allen Aylesworth was the Minister of Justice of Laurier, and when Mr. Justice Doherty was the Minister of Justice of Borden, when Mr. Lapointe was the Minister of Justice of Mackenzie King, and also when Mr. St. Laurent was the Minister of Justice of Mackenzie King, such a matter would not have been left in abeyance for so long.

One may say that the Minister of Justice is a new man. This is not an excuse at all. If he is not competent to run his department he must do as he has done with regard to the leadership of the house—he must resign.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I have waited three months to say that. I have read an interesting book written by the late French academician Emile Faguet, entitled, in English, The Cult of Incompetence. I am sorry I have not two copies of it, because I know what I would do with the second one.

I leave it at that, and if I do not receive a satisfactory reply between now and the time the supply bill comes before the Senate I shall have something more to say about it.

Order stands.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN-MONTANA PIPE LINE COMPANY SECOND READING

Hon. Donald Cameron moved the second reading of Bill S-43, respecting Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company.

He said: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether proceeding with this bill at this time is an exercise in optimism or futility, judging by the rumours I hear that no Senate bills are going to go through the other place for some time. However, I am always an optimist and for that reason I shall proceed tonight.

The Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company was incorporated by special act of Parliament, being chapter 87 of the Statutes of 1951. Except for the Canadian directors' qualifying shares, the company is a wholly-owned subsidiary of The Montana Power Company which has its head office at the City of Butte in the State of Montana. Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company was first organized during the Korean war when heavy demands for gas from Montana industry, and in particular the Anaconda Copper Mining Company, required The Montana Power Company to look to Canada for additional supplies of gas.

When the Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company applied for its act of incorporation in 1951, its sole purpose was the construction and operation of a pipe line from the Pakowki Lake area in Alberta to the Alberta-Montana border. Accordingly its statutory powers were drafted with that purpose in mind. I might say that the Pakowki Lake area is about 50 miles south and a little west of Medicine Hat. In addition, in 1951 the governments of Canada and Alberta had not yet defined their present gas export policies, and this was reflected in the drafting of the act of incorporation.

Since 1951 the governments of Canada and Alberta have adopted policies encouraging the export of natural gas, and the Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company has from time to time received permits allowing it to export increased quantities of natural gas from the Pakowki Lake and adjacent areas to service the Montana market. The Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company has accumulated earnings in respect of its pipe line operations which it now wishes to invest in the exploration and drilling of natural gas in Canada. By so doing, these funds will be used in the development of the Canadian petroleum and natural gas industry instead of being returned to the parent company in the United States.

Pursuant to a 1962 amendment to section 83A of the Income Tax Act of Canada, companies whose principal business is the operation of a pipe line for the transmission of oil or natural gas may deduct, in computing their income, expenses incurred in exploring and drilling for petroleum or natural gas in Canada.

The purpose of this bill is to grant to the Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company authority to explore and drill for natural gas and oil and, further, the authority to acquire by licence, lease and other means, property rights in lands where it is intended to explore and drill. It should be noted that, aside from the express grant of drilling and exploration powers, the powers which the applicant is requesting in this bill are those which are now commonly granted to pipe line companies incorporated by special act of Parliament.

The petitioner presently employs about fifteen persons, all of whom are Canadian citizens, upon its operations in Alberta. The petitioner's present operations are restricted to the transmission of natural gas by two 16-inch pipe lines. One pipe line of 18 miles length connects the Pakowki Lake area to the international boundary between Alberta and Montana. This pipe line is used to transmit natural gas, purchased by the petitioner from Canadian-Montana Gas Company, to the international boundary where it is sold to the parent company, the Montana Power Company. The Canadian-Montana Gas Company from which it purchases the gas is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Montana Power Company. Its second pipe line is of four miles length and connects the Cardston area of Alberta to the international boundary and is used to transmit natural gas, purchased from the Alberta & Southern Gas Company Limited, to the international boundary where it is sold to the Montana Power Company.

The petitioner itself owns no real property except the land and easements upon which its pipe line facilities are located.

To date the petitioner has taken no steps to undertake exploration and drilling in Alberta because it is without statutory power to do so.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask what is the size of the pipe in the shorter line?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Sixteen inches—they are both 16-inch pipes.

If the company is granted the extension of powers sought by this bill it will immediately take up mineral rights from the Alberta Government for the purpose of conducting exploration and drilling.

The Canadian directors of the Canadian-Montana Gas Company are J. E. A. Macleod, R. J. Burns, M. E. Lomas and H. B. Tiffin. The first three named are solicitors of the City of Calgary, and Mr. Tiffin is a geologist of that city.

If the bill receives second reading I propose to ask that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, in connection with this motion I would like to mention that there is to be a meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on Thursday morning next. As this seems to be a very simple bill perhaps it could be dealt with by the committee at that time, provided the incorporators are ready to proceed.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I will try to have them here at that time.

Motion agreed to.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF DENTISTS OF CANADA—SECOND READING —DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald Smith moved the second reading of Bill S-44, to incorporate the Royal College of Dentists of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move second reading of this bill. I consider it a privilege to be asked by the sponsors of the bill to undertake the task of introducing it into the Senate. The sponsors have some choice in this matter because there are in this chamber two members who have practised dentistry for some time or who are now so engaged. I might say a similar situation exists in the House of Commons, where I understand there are several members of the dental profession. I suppose the sponsors chose me, a retired dentist, rather than a practising member just starting on his career both here and in the profession of dentistry, because they thought I would be more neutral in my attitude towards this bill. I can look back on my career as a practising dentist, while my colleague Senator Phillips can look forward to his. I might also add that he may well find that having passed an examination, or for some other reason, he will become a fellow of the proposed Royal College of Dentists of Canada.

Bill S-44 is a bill to incorporate such a college. The purpose of the bill is to recognize and promote high national standards of specialization in the dental profession in all provinces of Canada. The new corporation will be empowered to set the qualifications for the recognition and designation of specialists in established branches of dentistry.

In the incorporation it is also provided that special qualifications in professional areas not necessarily regarded as specialties may also be recognized and designated. It is important to note that the proposed corporation will not interfere in any way with the powers of any provincial dental examining board nor will it override those powers.

I am pleased to be able to tell you that the proposed legislation has been approved by the dental organizations and boards in every province of Canada. It is also supported by the societies in Canada representing the three presently recognized specialties of oral surgery, orthodontics and periodontics. I do not think it necessary to explain those terms for you.

The incorporation is being sought following consideration of the subject by the Canadian Dental Association for a number of years, which resulted in the approval by the association of a resolution in favour of the proposed legislation. The Canadian Dental Association has some 6,000 members, which number constitutes 99 per cent of all dentists in Canada.

The eight original incorporators named in the bill are all members of the executive council of the Canadian Dental Association. These members represent the interests of the profession and of the public in the various regions of Canada: the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, the Prairie provinces, Alberta and British Columbia.

I have been advised that the proposed bill of incorporation is patterned upon similar legislation which, in 1929, incorporated the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada. The bill now before the Senate for consideration seeks the same powers and privileges and has similar objectives.

We are all aware of the growth in the number of specialists and indeed specialties in the field of medicine and surgery which has filled a growing need. The need for specialists in the field of dentistry has not been as acute, but it has been a growing one.

I believe the time has come for the incorporation of a governing body for the dental specialists of Canada. They should be given an opportunity to be nationally recognized and to be designated as specialists. This opportunity will be given them if Parliament sees fit to give its approval to this bill.

One of the effects of the act which incorporated the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada has been to limit the practice of medical and surgical specialties to those who are Fellows of the Royal College. This effect has flowed from the general policy of the larger hospitals to restrict appointments to their staffs to this group of recognized specialists. Of course, this policy has not been practical in the smaller hospitals in the towns across the country and, therefore, those who have not yet attained their fellowships are not precluded from practising as specialists in the smaller hospitals. There is a difference, I think, in the application of this proposed legislation to the profession of dentistry, and that follows from the fact that dentistry in general is practised outside hospitals. There will be, therefore, no restrictions imposed upon members of the dental profession who do not become members of the Royal College.

I hope I am forgiven—and I believe my honourable colleague Senator Phillips will be one of the first to forgive me—if I make a personal reference in a suggestion to those who will be the members of the new council, with respect to the appointment of a particular person as one of those chosen without examination, and as an honour, to become a Fellow of the Royal College of Dentists of Canada if and when the legislation passes

Parliament. Clause 6(1) of the bill reads as follows:

> The Council may, after the coming into force of this Act, and without examination, select and admit as Fellows, dentists of distinction who are graduates of at least ten years' standing of a recognized university, who are domiciled in Canada and who, in the opinion of the Council, have given evidence of high ability in one of the branches of dentistry recognized as specialties by the Association. The initiative in such cases shall lie solely with the Council in co-operation with the national organizations of the recognized specialties. Applications from Candidates themselves will not be considered.

Then follow other provisions for the appointment of Fellows following examination and qualification.

In respect of this class mentioned in clause 6(1) of the bill I have in mind one very distinguished Canadian dentist who can be categorized as a Fellow, qualified as a dentist of distinction, and one who has given evidence of high ability in one of the branches of dentistry. I am referring to Dr. William W. Woodbury of Halifax.

Dr. Woodbury was one of the pioneers in this country in the development of the specialty of orthodontia. During his active years in the profession, which cover a long period of service, he established for himself an international reputation in this field. He was for a long time professor of orthodontia and Dean of the Faculty at Dalhousie University, until his retirement a few years ago. During his many years at Dalhousie—and I am sure Senator Phillips will agree with me in this—he gained the respect, admiration and indeed the affection of all with whom he came in contact. He was a great exponent of the value of a well-rounded and full education. This gentle and kind man made a significant contribution. I am sure that I will be joined by many who would be very happy to see the honour of being one of the first appointments under this clause of the bill to go to such a man.

I make this suggestion in this public fashion in order to save embarrassment, perhaps, to the one whose name I have mentioned, because his modesty would urge him to ask the member of the council from the Atlantic provinces not to bring up his name. The name of the member of the proposed council to represent the Atlantic provinces is Dr. Christie from Halifax, who during Dr. Woodbury's days of active practice was his protégé. From my knowledge of his movements he has occupied the same office that Dr. Woodbury occupied for many years. It might be said that Dr. Christie's judgment in this matter would be swayed by the great modesty of Dr. Woodbury, and by mentioning Dr. Woodbury's name in this chamber I am sure it will come to the attention of the proposed council and will be very carefully considered.

Honourable senators, I do not think I need go into the details of the bill. As I have said, it is not an exact copy of the bill which some years ago incorporated the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada but it is very similar to it.

I should like to say as a postscript that the dental profession is the only one that to my knowledge has had the opportunity to support a program which could, if it receives public acceptance, reduce the need for its services by about 60 per cent. For some years every local dental society, every provincial association of dentists, and the Canadian Dental Association have been urging the adoption of fluoridation of community water supplies as the only presently known means of reducing dental decay and its consequent effects upon general health.

Despite this informed opinion, however, which is based upon careful observations in Canada over many years on the effects of fluoridation, relatively slow progress has been made. The extent to which public opinion has been swayed by ill-informed and prejudiced opponents of fluoridation, whose chief weapon has been their skill in the creation of false fear in the public mind, has been puzzling the members of the dental profession. I am happy to have this opportunity, honourable senators, of expressing the hope that fluoridation will be accepted by the public at a faster rate than it has heretofore, because I firmly believe that in its public acceptance lies the only apparent hope for improved dental health in future generations of Canadians.

Before I resume my seat I should like to advise honourable senators that if this bill receives second reading it is my intention to refer it to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, before which some of the sponsors of the bill will appear and be very glad to enlarge on any feature that I have failed to cover this evening.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: May I ask the honourable senator if the purpose of the bill is to permit the Fellows to practise as dentists in any province of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Honourable senators, as I said in my opening statement, I have been advised that the proposed incorporation of the Royal College of Dentists of Canada will not interfere in any way with the powers of any provincial dental examining board, and neither will it override those powers.

Hon. Mr. Vien: The question that was asked of the honourable senator is: Will the dentist who receives a diploma or certificate from this college be empowered to practise dentistry in any province of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): My understanding is that it has nothing whatsoever to do with the right of a dentist to practise in any particular province. A fellowship in the proposed Royal College of Dentists will simply entitle one who has passed the examination, or who has otherwise been made a Fellow of the college, the right to use after his name the designation "Fellow of the Royal College of Dentists of Canada." The public will be advised that this particular person has had sufficient special training in order to entitle him to become a Fellow, and therefore perhaps will feel that they are in the best hands that they can find when they require the attention of a specialist. But it has nothing whatsoever to do with the right of any dentist, fellow, or otherwise to practise any form or any specialty of dentistry in any province.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, is it not true that this is simply a recognition of special qualifications and training, that it is an honour to be elected to this college, rather than having anything to do with a person's legal qualifications or right to practice?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: As a member of the bar is designated a Queen's Counsel.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Yes. A lawyer does not have to write an examination to become a Queen's Counsel. I have never heard of an examination to become a Q.C.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: If it is purely an honorary matter, I would suggest that our esteemed colleague Senator Smith, who has just spoken, and Senator Phillips of Prince Edward Island, should be the first two Fellows of the Royal College.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I do not intend to oppose this bill, but I have not had sufficient time to peruse it and consider all the implications which might arise from it. Therefore, I would move the adjournment of the debate until tomorrow, in order to look a little more closely at the measure and to get in touch with those who are more familiar with this subject than I am. I am not at the moment opposed to the bill, and I do not expect that I will have any objection to it. I intend to take it up tomorrow, so as not to delay the passage of second reading.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Vien, debate adjourned.

HON. G. PERCIVAL BURCHILL

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I would like to invite your applause to an honourable senator who has been of great advantage to this Senate and to Parliament. Today we are celebrating the 75th birthday of honourable Senator Burchill, and I would ask you to join me in extending to him most sincere congratulations and good wishes on this occasion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 4, 1964

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt tabled:

Report on the Old Age Security Fund and of temporary loans made to the fund during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1964, pursuant to section 11 (4) of the Old Age Security Act, chapter 200, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

PRIVATE BILL

ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES OF CANADA—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-36, to incorporate the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada:

Your committee recommend that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of their proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-36, to incorporate the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

1. Page 2, line 32: after "body" insert "may become or".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave, I move that the report be adopted now.

Honourable senators, a brief explanation of these additional words should be given to you at this time. Clause 7 of the bill before us this morning contained a provision for enacting, amending or repealing by-laws for any and all purposes of the association and including, as it stated, the "terms and conditions upon which a corporation, organization or body shall cease to be a member." The committee felt that, by implication or inference, this would prevent the association from enacting by-laws on the basis of which people could become members. Therefore, we suggested it should read "terms and conditions upon which a corporation, organization or body may become or shall cease to be a member." The amendment would add the words "may become or".

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Donald Cameron moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The reports now before us for consideration have been recommended by the Commissioner. Each report also has been read by some member of the Divorce Committee, and examined and signed by the chairman.

He said: Honourable senators, in days gone by every petition for divorce took the form of a bill which, on receiving three readings in the Senate and in the House of Commons, and being given royal assent, became an act of Parliament.

The present custom is to have the Commissioner hear the evidence and in appropriate cases recommend the granting of a divorce by resolution of the Senate. If the Senate considers these reports and grants the resolutions, they will stand before the Divorce Committee for the next thirty days, during which time anyone who wishes to inquire into or oppose any one of them may have the opportunity to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these resolutions be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I move that these resolutions be considered at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF ACTUARIES— SECOND READING

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon moved the second reading of Bill S-45, to incorporate Canadian Institute of Actuaries.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill to incorporate the Canadian Institute of Actuaries. Very briefly, it may be said that its purpose is to provide for the same recognition by the Parliament of Canada of the actuarial profession as has been given to other professions by act of Parliament from time to time.

The Oxford dictionary describes an actuary as an expert on insurance who calculates risks and premiums. If the dictionary were revised I think that definition might be considerably expanded today. It is true that that is one function of the actuary. In connection with that function, the actuary must analyse and prepare statistics both in respect of events or occurrences which are the subjects of the premiums and reserves. His statistics will include not only the events which are the subject of the premiums and reserves, but also the expenses likely to be incurred in connection with the transaction, and the rate of earnings on any amounts generated for investment.

At this stage I think I should disclose my interest in this matter, though I will not refrain from voting. I am an Associate of the Society of Actuaries, but lest any honourable senator be under any misapprehension let me say I took my examinations many years ago, when I was going to university and when the requirements were much less severe than they are now. I would not want to write my bar examinations now either!

A fully qualified actuary today must be qualified in, among other things, advanced mathematics with particular emphasis on the theory of probabilities, the theory of risk, the theory of statistics and the theory of finance; simple and advanced accounting; cost accounting; finance, economics and investment; impact of medical, mental and physical impairments, environment, occupation and human behaviour on duration of human life and ability to work; impact of environment, structure, weather and human behaviour on rate of damage to or loss of property from any and all causes; financial impact of human illness and injury and of damage to or loss of property. He must also have some of the characteristics of a lawyer in that he must be qualified in the drafting of certain types of contracts.

As I say, the day was many years ago when these requirements were very much simpler.

Most universities or colleges in Canada and elsewhere offer courses in pure mathematics; and a few in Canada, such as Queen's University and the Universities of Toronto, Western Ontario, Manitoba, British Columbia and Laval, offer courses in the special mathematics an actuary is required to use in his work. However, no educational institution in Canada, or elsewhere, provides instruction in some of the subjects in which a person is required to be proficient in order to qualify as an actuary. As a consequence there have grown up in most countries organizations comprised of qualified actuaries which prescribe courses of study, and conduct written examinations for qualification for membership in the organization. The information a student has to study to complete the examinations is available in textbooks, professional journals, etc., prescribed by the respective organizations and most likely written by the members themselves. In England the organization is known as the Institute of Actuaries. In Scotland it is known as the Faculty of Actuaries. Both of these organizations were founded by royal charter and, while their memberships are drawn largely from Great Britain, many members of the two organizations are to be found in Canada, in other countries of the Commonwealth and in the United States.

The two pre-eminent actuarial organizations in the United States are the Society of Actuaries, composed mainly of actuaries serving the life insurance business, governments and consulting actuaries, and the Casualty Actuarial Society, composed mainly of actuaries serving casualty and property insurance companies. In addition there is the Fraternal Actuarial Association and the Conference of Actuaries in Public Practice. The Fraternal Actuarial Association is composed mainly of actuaries serving fraternal organizations, and the Conference of Actuaries in Public Practice is composed mainly of consulting actuaries retained on a fee basis to install and supervise pension and welfare plans. A number of the members of these last two organizations are members of the Society of Actuaries.

The Society of Actuaries in the United States is incorporated and holds a position in the United States similar to that held by the Institute of Actuaries in England and by the Faculty of Actuaries in Scotland. None of the other actuarial organizations in the United States is incorporated, although at present all four organizations there are cooperating in a proposal to apply to Congress for an act to incorporate an organization to be known as the American Academy of Actuaries which will be designed to establish minimum qualification standards that are common to each of the four organizations, that is, qualification up to the level where the actuary is finding it increasingly necessary to specialize in one of the branches served by the respective four organizations.

The earliest actuaries in Canada and the United States were members of the Institute of Actuaries (Great Britain) or the Faculty of Actuaries in Scotland. Growth of life insurance business in Canada and the United States and the similarity of the problems faced by the business in each country soon led the actuaries in both countries to form an organization of their own. This was known as the Actuarial Society which, upon merging with another actuarial organization known as the American Institute of Actuaries, became incorporated in the United States to form the present Society of Actuaries.

The majority of Canadian actuaries are members of the Society of Actuaries, having prepared themselves for and passed the examinations set by that or a predecessor organization. The Society of Actuaries, although incorporated in the United States, is regarded as North American in scope, serving both Canada and the United States. About 20 per cent of both the Fellows—260 out of 1,426—and the Associates—197 out of 983—reside in Canada. A Canadian has served from time to time as president of the organization and Canadians are always represented on the governing body and the various committees of the organization. Mr. K. R. MacGregor, who was until recently the Superintendent of Insurance and is now president of the Mutual Life of Canada, is currently a vice-president of the Society of Actuaries, and four of the eighteen non-officer members of the Board of Governors of the Society are residents of Canada. Out of a total of 322 committee memberships, 40 are held by residents of Canada. Canadians serve on the examination committees of the organization, thus ensuring that the examination curriculum is sufficiently broad to make it possible for fellowship in the organization to be accepted in Canada, as well as in the United States, as full qualification as an actuary.

The number of actuaries in Canada has gradually increased until at present there are approximately 300 persons who are fully qualified as actuaries, and approximately 150 partially qualified. By that I mean there are approximately 300 Fellows of one of the three institutions to which I have referred, and 150 Associates or the equivalent.

In the past, because of the development of the science and because of the fact that educational institutions were not—and in my opinion never will be—fully qualified to train an actuary through to his fellowship, actuaries centred around a city found it convenient to meet from time to time to discuss common problems. In this country that means they are to be found in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg, in which cities are situate the head offices of the life insurance companies. In these cities the actuaries formed clubs in which to meet and discuss common problems. There was the Toronto Actuaries' Club, the Montreal Actuaries' Club and the Winnipeg Actuaries' Club, the Toronto club being by far the largest. That club arranged seminars for young actuaries, and also tutorials and courses for Associates who were proceeding to their Fellowships. Its meetings came to assume so much importance that in 1946 it was decided to open its membership to all actuaries in Canada, and at that time the name of the organization was changed to the Canadian Association of Actuaries. Membership in the association is restricted to fully qualified actuaries, or to persons in the process of becoming actuaries or, in other words, to Fellows of the three societies I have mentioned, and Associates or the equivalent thereof in the Faculty of Actuaries.

Persons in Canada eligible for membership in the Canadian Association of Actuaries are, almost without exception, members of that association. If this bill receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Figures that I do not now have at hand can be given to the committee when it considers the bill. However, I think I am safe in saying that less than one per cent of the Fellows and Associates of the various organizations I have mentioned who are resident in Canada are not members of the Canadian association.

In these circumstances the association feels it could properly be said to represent, and to be the only Canadian organization qualified to represent, the actuarial profession in Canada.

Actuaries in Canada believe that it would be in the interests of the profession, and would also prove to be a source of benefit to the public, if the present association were incorporated.

At the present time, as far as I know, any person is entitled to call himself an actuary. One could say he has read the books at home and so on, as a result of which he is an actuary, and thus qualify himself in the same way as in days past people qualified themselves as members of other professions. With the extension of pension funds, and the provinces putting themselves on record stating that they are going to take on the responsibility of supervising the solvency of such funds, and so on, it becomes important to both government and the public that the term "actuary" be defined.

At the present time several statutes, both federal and provincial, refer to the word "actuary," but some of them do not define it. Where it is defined in such statutes as the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the definition is usually to the effect that "actuary" means a Fellow of the Institute of Actuaries of Great Britain, the Faculty of Actuaries in Scotland, or the Society of Actuaries of the United States. So our professional definitions, where they occur—and in some statutes they do not occur at all—are all related to bodies incorporated outside this country. If this bill becomes law the corporation which it creates will provide the means for defining an actuary in terms of a Canadian organization.

There is the other fact that a federally incorporated organization in the circumstances of the actuarial profession probably provides the best means for professional representation and identification in the provinces where there is no qualified actuary, or not a sufficient number of such persons to make feasible the formation of a provincial organization, whether by incorporation or otherwise. This is the situation in all the provinces other than Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba. Only in those three provinces is there a sufficient concentration of actuaries to make any provincial association possible.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Are there such organizations in Quebec and Ontario?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: There were, senator. I think I have said that there were three actuarial associations or clubs, one in Montreal, one in Toronto and another in Winnipeg. In 1946 they merged to become the Canadian association, with branches which meet in those three localities.

To indicate what I mean I will mention that as at January 1, 1964, there were, including Fellows and Associates, 297 actuaries in Ontario, 103 in Quebec, 38 in Manitoba, and only 12 in the other Canadian provinces. Those figures indicate that a series of provincial incorporations is quite unrealistic.

Hon. Mr. Power: May I ask if the provincial organizations now in existence ever undertook to give recognition to persons wanting to use the title "actuary?" Did they assume any authority over persons using the title "actuary?"

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: No, they have assumed no authority. They have had no right to assume such authority. The only authority for the definition of an actuary, in my opinion, is found in certain statutes where the word "actuary" is defined.

Hon. Mr. Power: As I understand it, if that statute, which is a statute of Canada, prescribes that nobody shall be employed as an actuary unless he is a member of a British or American society, then our statutes do not recognize any Canadian, as such, as an actuary. Am I right in that? It recognizes them only in so far as they belong to some foreign association?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: The statutes recognize Canadians as being actuaries, but the actuaries must belong to a foreign organization. One of the purposes of this bill is to provide a Canadian recognition.

Hon. Mr. Power: But what prevents a man who lives in Winnipeg from calling himself an actuary now?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: So far as I know, nothing. He would not be recognized, of course, by the Superintendent of Insurance if he purported to sign an actuarial report of a life insurance company. There are other circumstances in which he would not be recognized, but so far as I know there is nothing in law to prevent anybody calling himself an actuary.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Is there not a course for actuaries given at McGill and Laval universities? After a person has completed that course the university must give him some form of license to practise. Is such a person called an actuary?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: He may be called an actuary, and without doubt Laval University, McGill, Queen's, Toronto, Manitoba, and Western Ontario, among others, are educational centres from which most of our actuaries come, but I know of no university which gives any degree in actuarial science. Such universities give a degree in pure mathematics and the various other branches of mathematics. Apart from the few statutes that provide that an actuary must certify a statement, and so on, and which then define an actuary as being a member of one of the three foreign bodies I have mentioned, there is nothing to prevent any person calling himself an actuary. Such a person would be under no liability and have no responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Croll: If section 5(2) of the bill means what I think it means, are you not setting up there a qualification or providing an opportunity to differentiate between people who belong to the organization and those who do not belong, by granting some sort of title or degree? Does not that subsection give that authority?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That is what is intended, senator. I am going to discuss briefly the sections of the bill. A Fellow of the Society of Actuaries—and most actuaries in Canada are Fellows of that society—is entitled to put after his name the letters F.S.A.; and an Associate, such as I am, is entitled to put the letters A.S.A.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Are we not giving them authority there to grant degrees? That is the point I am getting at. Is that what you want, and have we the right to do that?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: What is proposed here is not the granting of a degree. No one is going to put a gown on his shoulders or a hood over his head. The society, if incorporated, will or may designate initials which when carried behind the name of a member will indicate the status of that member in the organization.

I shall run through the terms of the bill very quickly. Clause 1 deals with the incorporation of certain persons as the Canadian Institute of Actuaries and, in French, Institut Canadien des Actuaires. I could describe in detail the professional qualifications of the incorporators and the regard in which they are held in the profession, but I shall refrain from doing so. I shall simply say that one of the applicants for incorporation, Richard Humphrys, civil servant of Ottawa, is now the Superintendent of Insurance.

The purposes and objects of the institute are set out in clause 2 and are self-explanatory. Clause 3 provides that the head office of the institute shall be in the City of Toronto or at such other place in Canada as may be provided for by by-law from time to time.

Then in clause 4 there are set out the normal powers for holding property, borrowing money and so on. Clause 5 provides that the persons whose names are set out in clause 1 and all other persons who are members of the association immediately prior to the coming into force of this legislation, that is, members who are either Fellows or Associates of the Faculty of Actuaries in Scotland, the Institute of Actuaries in Great Britain or the American Society of Actuaries—

Hon. Mr. Croll: And there are no others?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: There are no others. It provides that they shall constitute the first members of the institute, but otherwise the number and qualification of members, the various classification of members, the voting and other rights attaching to each classification, the conditions of, circumstances and manner of entry into and termination of membership and generally the conditions, privileges and obligations attaching to membership in the institute, shall be such as may be determined from time to time by its by-laws. In other words, the professional body will, like other professional bodies, prescribe the terms and conditions under which one may enter into membership and will set out the obligations and responsibilities such a member has.

Then I come to subclause 2 of clause 5, to which Senator Croll referred. If the institute so provides by by-law, members may put some letters after their names, presumably indicating whether they are Fellows of the institute or Associates of it, such as is provided by the other three professional bodies which have been incorporated.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That has the object of identification.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That has the object of identification.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: There were 400 in the organization in the three different categories? Are there many others who may be practising actuaries, but who may not be allowed to practise after a bill of this kind is passed?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: There is no suggestion that anybody will not be allowed to practise. That is not contained in the bill. I can go out and call myself an "accountant" or something of that nature, but if anyone is foolish enough to hire me, without my having some identifying letters after my name, he accepts me on his own responsibility. No one is going to be deprived by this bill of the right to earn a living in the way they have been earning it.

On a practical basis I do not think this question will arise at all. People who employ actuaries are highly sophisticated people and they do not take anyone who walks in off the street and says, "I am an actuary."

Clause 7 gives the council the right to make by-laws and rules, and delineates five particular matters, which are normal in a bill of this nature. Changes in the by-laws, rules and regulations have effect only until the next annual meeting.

Clause 8 provides that the act shall come into force on January 1, 1965, or on the day on which it is assented to, whichever is the later. The hope of the association is that the bill will be passed at this session of Parliament and become effective on the first day of the New Year.

Hon. Mr. Croll: This bill appears to be breaking new ground, as I read it. I am not sure that I thoroughly understand it. What concerns me more than anything else at the moment is that there may be somebody, some place in this country, who calls himself an actuary, who has been making a living as such, and who now learns that we have passed a bill and he is no longer an actuary or cannot call himself one.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: No, no, senator; there is nothing in the bill that prevents any Tom, Dick or Harry from calling himself an actuary.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I appreciate the point about calling himself an actuary, but it is not very long before they distinguish among themselves whether one belongs to the society or not. I have no objection to the bill being given second reading on condition that it not be dealt with in committee for a week or two in order that the people in the country may have an opportunity to become acquainted with it. If we hear nothing from the people who are concerned and who know more than we do about this, I shall have no objection to it at all. However, we will deal with that at the appropriate time, if that is satisfactory to the mover. Otherwise, I should have to adjourn the debate in order to discuss the bill with some other people. I do not want to hold the bill up. You could make it for a week or ten days hence, if you wish.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: It might be satisfactory if it went to the Banking and Commerce Committee a week from today. I can assure the honourable senator that this bill had the approval of the former Superintendent of Insurance, and that one of the applicants for incorporation is the present Superintendent of Insurance. I have been in the life insurance business for more than 30 years and I know of no person in Canada holding himself out to be an actuary who is not eligible to be a member of the Canadian association under the conditions I have described. Surely it would give everyone interested sufficient time if it came before the committee, subject to the approval of the chairman of the committee, one week from today. I would not wish to have two weeks' delay, if it can be avoided.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It may not be in your hands before this week is over. We may be away from here for a couple of weeks. I have no objection to that course, on the further understanding that the committee sits while the Senate is sitting.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: That is an understanding on which I cannot make any comment.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What I am stressing is that the committee not be called while the Senate is recessed. If the Senate is sitting, I do not mind a week hence.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I am in the hands of the chairman of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Surely we should abide by the rules, which give a week's interval between the reading of this bill and the meeting of the committee. If the Senate is to be adjourned at that time, let us consider the point then instead of providing for it now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time. time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. McCutcheon, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

SETTLERS SAVINGS AND MORTGAGE CORPORATION—SECOND READING

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson moved the second reading of Bill S-46, to incorporate Settlers Savings and Mortgage Corporation.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill results from a petition which was filed in this house some time ago on behalf of a group of residents of Winnipeg and its environs, who prayed for the enactment of an act to incorporate Settlers Savings and Mortgage Corporation. The bill is brief by reason of the fact that it seeks an incorporation under the Loan Companies Act, which is chapter 170 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. That act provides for a model form of bill, and Bill S-46 is in that form.

This bill names the applicants for incorporation, who will also be the provisional directors of the company. It sets out the capital stock of the company and the amount that is required to be subscribed and paid in before the company can be licensed to do business. It also specifies that the head office of the company shall be in Winnipeg.

The most important clause in the bill is clause 7. It says:

> The company has all the powers, privileges and immunities conferred by, and is subject to all the limitations, liabilities and provisions of the Loan Companies Act.

Honourable senators, as we are all aware, the Loan Companies Act is a very important statute of this country, relating to the assembly of capital and the loaning of capital for development purposes. It contains broad powers, but also contains considerable limitations.

Any company which is incorporated under the Loan Companies Act is closely scrutinized, and its business strictly supervised by the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada.

I would like to say a word about the name of this company—Settlers Savings and Mortgage Corporation. The incorporators told me that they had quite a time deciding upon a name before they chose the word "Settlers". The reason for that you may deduce from reading in clause 1 of the bill the names of the incorporators, all of whom are persons of European descent, non-Anglo-Saxon, non-French. They are men whose parents or grandparents were settlers in Canada many years ago. Indeed, one of the applicants for incorporation is a member of this house, and another a member of the House of Commons.

I want to say further concerning the incorporators of this company, that most of them have been known to me personally for a long time. They are all eminent business and professional men of the City of Winnipeg and of the area in Manitoba close to that city. I repeat that they have been successful in business and are now branching out into many fields of commercial endeavour, including the business they propose to carry on under this bill, namely, that of a loan, savings and mortgage corporation.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say in regard to this bill at the present time. If the bill receives second reading I shall propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration.

Hon. C. G. Power: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question. I take it that the word "Settlers", in the title of the bill, refers to the avocation of the incorporators, or someone connected with the corporation. In that case, I wonder why it was not sought to incorporate in French under a name more nearly meaning what the incorporators intended by the word "Settlers". I am not quite sure whether my French would be good, but probably the word "colons" would be appropriate under the circumstances rather than an English word, thus mixing the two languages, a combination which I always strenuously object to in titles to bills. "Settlers" does not mean anything in the French language, whereas "les colons" or "pioniers", or some such word, might be appropriate under the circumstances.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: The sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) said that one of the applicants for this bill is a member of this chamber, and another a member of the House of Commons. That raised one question in my mind. Is it entirely proper for members of either house to be applicants for incorporation under a bill presented to Parliament? If not, it might be necessary to change the applicants. I ask the question merely as a matter of information.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: In reply to my honourable friend, that very point occurred to me this morning when I was reading the bill, but knowing it had been prepared by a legal firm in Ottawa which has had a great deal of experience in these matters, I took it for granted that it was not inappropriate for these persons to be among the petitioners. I had intended to call the lawyer in this city who drafted the bill and to discuss this point with him. My honourable friend's point may be well taken.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. Mr. Beaubien—Provencher): Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Thorvaldson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I wonder whether, under the circumstances my honourable friend described, it might not be advisable to wait until he has received the opinion which he is expecting to get on this really constitutional question, and to adjourn the debate until he has satisfied himself.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: I do not know that it is necessary to adjourn the debate for that purpose. If the bill goes to a committee and it turns out that one of the promoters or sponsors is not eligible, that would require an amendment, or the bill would not be proceeded with. The committee is the place to make such an amendment. If that were done, possibly the bill would move along and make progress rather than be delayed in the house indefinitely.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE BURRARD INLET TUNNEL AND BRIDGE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Sydney J. Smith moved the second reading of Bill S-47, respecting The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is one of the briefest and simplest bills for our consideration, certainly today. It consists of a preamble and one clause, and I will explain it as best I can. The explanatory note outlining the purpose of the bill is very brief. If the measure receives second reading it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, at a hearing of which an appropriate officer of the company will be available to give any further information desired.

The purpose of this bill is to grant authority to The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company to wind up its affairs pursuant to the Winding-up Act of Canada.

This company was incorporated by special act of Parliament in 1910 for the purpose of constructing and operating a bridge and railway over the Second Narrows of Burrard Inlet at Vancouver. The company completed construction of the bridge and railway in 1925. In addition to the railway, the bridge served vehicular traffic and pedestrians. This bridge has been known as the Second Narrows Bridge.

In 1960 the Province of British Columbia opened a new six-lane highway bridge across the Second Narrows, about 200 feet west of the bridge of The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company. This new bridge charged tolls competitive with The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company until March 1963, when they were discontinued. The petitioner's bridge, which had been built before the very great demand for road traffic was envisaged, was two lanes wide and had speed restrictions as low as 15 miles per hour in certain sections. As a result it was not able to compete for vehicular traffic with the new six-lane bridge and was forced to close to road traffic in March 1963.

In November 1962 the petitioner entered into a lease with the Canadian National Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Railway Company for the use of the railway line on the Second Narrows Bridge. The agreement of lease also contained an option to the said railway companies to purchase the bridge. This lease and option to purchase was executed pursuant to parliamentary authority granted to the petitioner by an act of Parliament passed in 1952.

The Canadian National Railway Company, with which the Canadian Northern Railway Company has merged, has exercised its option to purchase the petitioner's bridge and pursuant to an agreement of January 1, 1964, has purchased the Second Narrows Bridge, its approaches and the railway line thereon.

The petitioner owns no other real property nor does it presently have any business undertaking. All of its assets are presently in cash or Dominion of Canada bonds, and bond indebtedness and other debts have been satisfied. The company does not intend to pursue the business for which it was incorporated and, accordingly, wishes to wind up its affairs and distribute its assets to its shareholdrs.

The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company has a capital stock of 8,025 shares, each having a nominal value of 100. Eight thousand of these shares are owned in varying numbers by the District of North Vancouver, the District of West Vancouver, the City of North Vancouver and the City of Vancouver. The remaining 25 shares are owned by private parties. It will be seen that the four municipal corporations control this company.

The special act pursuant to which the petitioner was incorporated in 1910 was made subject to the Railway Act of Canada. By reason of this fact, the company is legally defined as a "railway company" within the meaning of that statute. The Winding-up Act, which is an act of general application to Canadian companies, is excluded from application to a railway company by section 7 thereof, and your petitioner is therefore without legal authority to undertake the winding up of its affairs. The sole purpose of the present act is to grant to the company the authority to wind up pursuant to the Winding-up Act.

Honourable senators might question the propriety of making the Winding-up Act applicable when it is specifically excluded from applying to railway companies. It may be pointed out that the Railway Act makes provision for the sale or merger of railway companies under the supervision of the Board of Transport Commissioners and with the approval of the Governor in Council, but does not provide for the winding up of the corporate entity after sale. In addition, the Exchequer Court Act makes provision for the sale or foreclosure of interprovincial railway companies in certain circumstances. Neither the Railway Act nor the Exchequer Court Act cover the present situation where the whole of the "railway company's" undertaking has been sold, leaving nothing but the corporate shell and liquid assets.

Honourable senators, those are the facts as I know them relating to the application. As I said before, if the bill receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Smith (Kamloops), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF DENTISTS OF CANADA—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne), for the second reading of Bill S-44, to incorporate The Royal College of Dentists of Canada.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, I am glad to be able to state that I have no objection to the second reading of this bill. I have read it with attention and I have received information from reliable sources. As a result I have found that the provisions of this bill do not invade the jurisdiction of the provinces on professional corporations. These provisions are similar to those we find in the charters of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons and of the Canadian Bar Association, mutatis mutandis.

The objects of the bill are summarized in section 3 on page 2. I suggest we should all be in favour of promoting high standards of specialization in the dental profession; in setting up qualifications and providing for the recognition and designation of properly trained dental specialists; in encouraging the establishment of training programs in the dental specialties in Canadian schools, and providing for the recognition and designation of dentists who possess special qualifications in areas not recognized as specialties.

I have, therefore, much pleasure in stating that so far as I am concerned, I concur in the motion of honourable Senator Smith for the second reading of this bill.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, I rise to support fully this bill and in doing so I shall be brief. I regret I was not in the house last evening when Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne) so ably expounded it. It certainly requires no further explanation from me.

Bill S-44 represents an attempt on the part of the great dental profession, which has made tremendous strides in experimental and clinical research, to improve itself. It is comparable to similar legislation enacted in connection with the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada. I assume it is similar to what Senator McCutcheon's bill will do on behalf of the actuaries. And I hope that in the near future we will see legislation coming through to do the same for the legal profession, of which of course I am not a member.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, as a practising dentist I should like to say a word or two in support of this bill. I realize that very little remains to be said following Senator Smith's (Queens-Shelburne) discussion of its contents last evening. He mentioned that the dental society had a choice as to who would introduce the bill, and he referred to the fact that there were two dentists in the Senate and two in the House of Commons. When I was a member of the other place in 1958 there were five dentists in that house. That is one of the reasons why I think that House of Commons was much better than the present one. The present House of Commons is not only short on Tories but it is equally short on dentists.

For some time both the Canadian Dental Association and the provincial associations have recognized the need for a body such as is intended to incorporate under Bill S-44. The average member of these bodies was engaged in general practice and quite often did not have the time to do post-graduate studies. Therefore it would be most awkward, indeed almost impossible, for a couple of dentists in general practice to award certification in some specialized field. The Canadian Dental Association at the urging of the provincial associations set up a committee to establish some means of certification. The committee, which incidentally was composed mostly of members of the Quebec College of Dentistry, spent several years finding a satisfactory solution, and approximately a year ago received approval at the annual meeting in Toronto.

The legislation has since been worked out by a committee of the Canadian Dental Association and a group of attorneys, and if some honourable senators became a bit confused over the licensing authority I am sure they will understand that the confusion is because of the lawyers and not the dentists.

I may say in regard to licensing that when a student writes his final examination in dentistry he may write the National Examining Board, which entitles him to apply for licensing from any provincial association, or he may write the examination of the individual provincial association.

As Senator Vien pointed out to you, there is no interference with the provincial authority in issuing licences. Furthermore, there is no interference with the authority of the provincial associations to grant their own certification if they so wish. They may still carry on and establish a board to award their own certification, which would be recognized solely within their own particular province. I would also add that there is no interference with the right of any dentist to limit his practice to any field, such as children's dentistry. You quite often find in this profession that a dentist who is very fond of working with children will probably spend one year, instead of the required three years' post-graduate work, in children's dentistry and then limit his practice to children under the age of sixteen. This act does not interfere with that right at all.

The Hall Commission on health services recommended a greater use of hospitals by dentists, particularly in the field of oral surgery and orthodontia. As honourable senators know, the hospital to be certified must have qualified specialists on its staff, and should the recommendation of the Hall Commission be implemented, this body will be far more important that it appears to be under the outline of the legislation.

As Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne) mentioned last evening, the members of the committee are willing to appear before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to give any further explanations required. Several senators have asked why this bill is being sent to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce instead of to the committee on Public Health and Welfare. I think the main reason is that dentists are so accustomed to going to bankers to get money to buy Cadillacs and other incidentals that they would feel much more at home in the Banking and Commerce Committee. I am sure they will get a very good reception.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Donald Smith, bill referred to Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 9, 1964

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-135, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1965.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, I propose to ask leave of the Senate to move second reading now, but before doing so perhaps I should give an explanation.

I am prepared at this time to explain this bill, and it is my thought that that explanation might be helpful to the members of this house. Some questions might be raised which, if I cannot answer them this afternoon, I can do so tomorrow. Any necessary discussion can take place today, and then the debate can be adjourned until tomorrow in the expectation that we shall be able to complete second reading then.

If this course meets with the approval of the Senate, I will move second reading now.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, I see no objection to the procedure suggested by Senator Leonard. If I adjourn the debate after he has given his explanation honourable senators will have an opportunity of studying the bill and thus be prepared to discuss it tomorrow.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, in the first place I apologize for the fact that this bill is being presented by somebody other than the honourable Leader of the Government (Honourable Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), who is unavoidably absent. I shall do my best as his pinch hitter.

Honourable senators will find that copies of Bill C-135 have been distributed and are in their folders. This bill, which is commonly known as an interim supply bill, is cited as Appropriation Act No. 9, 1964, but in point of fact it is only the sixth interim supply bill of this year. Appropriation Acts Nos. 2, 3 and 4 were all applicable to the financial year that ended on March 31, 1964.

I know that when honourable senators are considering interim supply bills they like to have in their minds the whole broad financial picture of Government expenditures and, accordingly, I will mention certain figures. The main estimates for 1964-65, tabled last March, totalled—omitting the final hundreds—$6,812,410,000, of which the amount required to be voted by this Parliament was $3,951,590,000. The balance represented statutory expenditures, that is to say, obligations authorized by previous parliaments and commonly called uncontrollable expenditures, such as interest on the public debt. That balance amounted to $2,860,819,000, and it is not affected by this bill. In its consideration of the main estimates the House of Commons so far has reduced them by $600,000, so the present total of the main estimates is $6,811,810,508.

In addition, Supplementary Estimates (A) totaling $404,691,736, were tabled last June, the main item being that with respect to the Columbia River program. In the last two weeks Supplementary Estimates (B), totalling $61,620,145, were tabled, the main item being for winter works programs. At the present time the grand total of the main and supplementary estimates is $7,277,522,389.

To this date interim supply bills have provided the Government with funds amounting to $2,712,028,509, which is sufficient in the normal process of government for the financial requirements of running the country's affairs up to November 1, 1964. This bill provides for a further appropriation of $740,710,974, which is the estimated amount needed to cover expenses up to December 31, 1964, leaving an amount of $964,562,907 which in due course must be authorized by Parliament either by further interim supply bills or by the ultimate and final approval of the estimates.

At the outset I give the Senate the usual undertaking that the passing of this bill is without prejudice to its right to consider and deal with the estimates on any subsequent occasion as fully and as effectively as if this bill had not been passed. I should say also that the bill is in the usual form of interim supply bills.

This bill authorizes two-twelfths of the major amounts of the estimates or, in other words, roughly two months' supply. There are some items in respect of which only one month's supply or no supply is asked for, and in all cases these are votes of which a larger relative proportion was previously granted. In addition there are several votes of which more than two months' supply is requested.

Parliament is concerned, naturally, with any cases where more than normal supply is requested, and because of this fact special appropriations are set out in Schedules A, B, C and D. I think it is right and proper that I should give the Senate an explanation of why more than a normal proportion of supply is asked for these items. I say, however, that in no case will the amount exceed eleven-twelfths of any item, so that in no case is a final disposition being made or an item being finally released by this bill.

Schedule A requests accelerated supply as to an item in the estimates of the Department of Public Works, being Vote 70, amounting to $4 million. Two-twelfths of that amount, being $666,666.67, is the accelerated payment. This amount is needed to assist in the construction of an ice control structure on the St. Lawrence River, just upriver from the World's Fair site on St. Helen's Island. This structure is to protect the World's Fair site as well as Verdun and Lachine, and will help also in the maintenance of water levels in Montreal harbour.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Will that be a permanent structure?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I would hope so. The fact that it is to protect Verdun and Lachine as well as maintain water levels in Montreal harbour would indicate that. I am also inclined to think, subject to what some honourable senators from Montreal have to say, that the World's Fair site on St. Helen's island is likely to be permanent.

The total estimated cost of this ice control structure is $13,942,000, of which the City of Montreal is to pay $2,500,000 and the Crown $11,442,000; so, its total cost is not in these estimates. This payment has been accelerated because the expenditures are heavy in the summer and fall months before the freeze-up.

Schedule B concerns, first, the Department of Fisheries. The additional proportion of this vote is requested, firstly, because of the seasonal nature of the field services provided by that department and, secondly, because a quarterly payment of 25 per cent of Canada's share of the expenses of the International Commission is due on January 1, 1965. These accelerated payments provide for that. There is also an additional proportion required for the capital vote to meet expenditures anticipated before December 31. Adding in these accelerated payments, the total amount that will have been voted after the passage of this bill will be ten-twelfths of this item in respect of the Department of Fisheries.

The next item is under the heading of "Legislation, The Senate," and is made necessary by the length of the present session. I do not think I need say more than that.

The item with respect to the Dominion Coal Board concerns subventions in connection with the movement of eastern coal. As we all understand, shipments of coal are heaviest in the summer and fall months, and it is for that reason that these accelerated payments are needed.

The item for the Post Office is a reflection of the Christmas rush, and it should remind us to get off our Christmas mail and parcels early.

Honourable senators will be particularly interested in the item for the Department of Public Works, Vote 40, because it concerns the new Macdonald-Cartier bridge between Otawa and Hull. We have all seen it under construction and, remarkably enough, the construction is ahead of schedule and payments are due earlier than expected.

I will explain Schedules C and D together because they deal with the same item, one amount being in the main estimates and the other in the supplementary estimates. These items relate to the widening of the McKay pier for use as the site of various buildings, and as the main transit system approach to the new bridge that will join McKay pier and St. Helen's Island. This work is in connection with the World's Fair. It is anticipated that the widening of this pier will be completed in December, hence the request for acceleration in payment.

That covers the schedules to the bill. They deal with all those cases where accelerated payment is requested. Moving on to clauses 3 and 4, these are the usual provisions in interim supply bills, intended, if I may put it in my own words, to put beyond legal doubt the payments made in interim supply bills, even though the estimates themselves have not been finally passed.

Clause 5 of the bill gives borrowing authority for an additional $750 million, as may be required, for public works and general purposes. I know you would like an explanation of that. As you probably know, the unused borrowing authorities expire at the end of each fiscal year and a new borrowing authority is given. So far, Appropriation Act No. 1 gave borrowing authority up to $1 billion for this year. To date, $430 million of that has been used, and there is still in hand and unused under that borrowing authority $570 million. However, this is the time of year when the savings bond issue puts a strain on the Government's cash position and when additional borrowing power is required. Therefore, the amount specified in clause 5 is requested, bringing the total borrowing authority up to $1,750,000,000. This provides an excess or surplus of borrowing power, I understand; but all senators will agree that it is desirable, and even necessary, that a government should have always on hand a reasonable reserve of borrowing authority, particularly in times of difficulty with respect to foreign exchange.

I may say that the total of the borrowing authorizations last year was $2 billion; the year before it was $2,500,000,000; in 1961-62 it was $2 billion; and in the preceding two years it was $1,500,000,000 in each year. Therefore, this borrowing authority of $1,750,000,000 is consistent with the past record.

This concludes the explanation I can give at the present time. I am sure there will be questions, which I shall endeavour to answer to the best of my knowledge and information.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Brooks, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 9, 1964

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, for the second reading of Bill C-135, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1965.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, it is becoming quite an old story to be speaking on interim supply. This is the ninth appropriation bill we have had to deal with this session, and the sixth dealing with supply for the financial year 1964-65.

The honourable Senator Leonard, who sponsored the bill yesterday, called attention to the fact that he was "pinch-hitting," as it were, for the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West). We all note the absence of our leader, and of course we know the reason why. I have a press clipping here which is headed, "Senator named special envoy at inauguration." Our honourable leader represented the Canadian Government at the inauguration of the President of Chile on Tuesday last. He is also representing the Prime Minister at the Fifth Inter-American Conference of Business Executives in Lima, Peru. I am satisfied that both Canada and the Prime Minister are well represented at these functions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I am sure we all hope our honourable leader keeps as far away from Bolivia as he can, because it appears to be quite a hot spot at the present time.

May I say how pleased I am to see our good friend Senator Vaillancourt acting as Leader of the Government in the absence of Senator Connolly. I can also say that the Leader of the Government is well represented in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: In explaining this bill yesterday, Senator Leonard made it clear what the interim supply bill calls for. He made an excellent statement, in the preparation of which I am sure he was assisted by the Department of Finance. At this time may I say that in my short experience as Leader of the Government in the Senate I found that the assistance given to me by the various departments of government was most helpful. As Leader of the Opposition I often wish it was also part of their function to assist me in preparing statements.

As I said a moment ago about estimates and interim supply, we have now had nine appropriation bills before us, six of which have dealt with the estimates of this financial year. I understand that there are twenty-three departments whose estimates are to come before Parliament, and of these nine have been passed. It is not necessary for me to point out to honourable senators that at this very late date in the session it is an extraordinary situation that hardly more than one-third of the estimates have been passed. We are on our way, I believe, to having the longest session in the history of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Molson: It is already the longest.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I was not sure whether or not during the war there was one which was longer, but I gather this is the longest session we have had.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: And the least work accomplished.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I am not going to comment on the matter at any great length, but in his speech Senator Leonard mentioned the fact that additional supply had to be voted to the Senate on account of this particularly long session. I think it is a fair comment that never has the Senate done less work and never has it cost so much. Like the sponsor of the bill I shall not assess blame; that is not my purpose. However, I do feel that I am justified in expressing a humble opinion for what it is worth. It is my opinion that a mistake was made in bringing forward in this Parliament contentious and, at the present time, unnecessary legislation, no matter how important it may become at some future date.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It was brought forward by a Government which did not have a majority in the other place—a 50-50 proposition, as it were, or even less—and by a Government which had no popular mandate from the people. I consider that most of the difficulties we have had in this session, and the long delay which has resulted in the matter of passing estimates and enacting legislation, has been due to the fact that legislation which is not necessary at the present time was introduced. I am satisfied that the estimates could have been passed weeks ago and that other necessary legislation could have been attended to had there been, again in my opinion, better judgment shown in introducing this legislation.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Better judgment by the Government in not introducing it at all.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes. As the honourable sponsor of this bill said yesterday, the combined total of the main and supplementary estimates, which is $7,277,522,389, is the largest amount, outside of appropriations during time of war, that Parliament has voted in the history of this country. It is a far cry from the $35 million that was voted in 1870, and even from the $335 million that was voted in 1935.

Our country, of course, has grown to a great extent over the past 100 years, but I wonder if it has grown in the same proportion as has the financial encumbrances. We have gone from $35 million in 1870 to nearly $8 billion in 1964.

It is not my intention, honourable senators, to endeavour to dissect or review the different items of expenditure. In the first place, the amounts are too great and the items too numerous; secondly, I could not do so even if I wanted. I accept Senator Leonard's explanation of the amounts to be voted in the main and supplementary estimates. I know that they have been thoroughly scrutinized by the staff of the Department of Finance which prepared the explanations that were given yesterday. I am also satisfied that under the system we have for spending money in this country the amounts requested by the different departments and for every other activity are needed.

We were told also that the amount to be voted and the statutory expenditures are nearly equal. The total amount to be voted by Parliament in the main and supplementary estimates is $3,951,590,511, and the interest on the public debt is $2,860,819,977. That is the amount we have to pay as interest on our public debt, and it is almost two-thirds of the amount the Government needs to carry on its activities. I shall not comment on that. I would need the eloquence and knowledge of my good friend, the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) to do so. I am sure he will do justice to that, as he has on so many other occasions.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask my honourable friend a question?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Did I understand him to say the interest on the public debt amounts to $2 billion-odd?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: That is what I understand.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: There must be an error there.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Perhaps I am to blame for that. The honourable senator may have received that impression from what I said yesterday. The figure of over $2 billion that I quoted is the amount of the uncontrollable expenditures, but only part of it is represented by interest on the funded debt. I am looking to see if I have the exact figure—perhaps I shall be allowed to give it later. However, the amount of $2 billion-odd includes a great many items other than interest.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I rather questioned that myself, and I am glad to have that explanation. The figure did seem to be out of all proportion. There is no doubt, however, but that it is large enough, and no blame can be placed on—

Hon. Mr. Leonard: May I interrupt the honourable leader? I can give the figures now if he would like to have them. This refers to Vote 1 in the estimates of the Department of Finance, "Interest and Annual Amortization of Bonded Discount, Premiums and Commissions," which, for 1964-1965, is $1,035,000,000.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is about half.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: As I was about to say, no one government is to blame for this. The trend in this country for some time has been to pay out money for all purposes, no matter what was proposed or from whence the proposition came.

Bill C-135 is like every other interim supply bill, and the explanation given on one could almost do for all such bills. These bills are based on requirements for one month, and in some cases for two months, with special votes for seasonal needs, which usually occur in the Department of Northern Affairs, in Fisheries and other departments, where special work must be done during the summer months.

This bill provides for two months' supply up to December 31. It leaves a substantial amount, about $960 million, to be voted later.

There always are some special items in these interim supply bills. One such item, mentioned yesterday by Senator Leonard, is the estimate for ice control at the World's Fair site on St. Helen's Island, which amounts to $13,942,000. Of this amount, I understand that $2,500,000 is being paid by the City of Montreal. Senator Isnor asked whether this was permanent work, and I understand from the sponsor of the bill that it is.

I should like to ask whether there will be ice-breaking and control operations in the St. Lawrence River, particularly in this area? If so, I hope the operations will be considered as permanent.

Another question relates to Supplementary Estimates (B). We are voting a special amount for coal subventions in the eastern provinces. I notice in Supplementary Estimates (B) that the Dominion Coal Board vote is for $1 only, and I would ask Senator Leonard to explain why that is so. Subventions were paid in the past few years to move coal from Alberta to Vancouver, but I do not see any mention of that here. Possibly it has been dropped. The honourable senator may be able to give some information in that connection.

Other large amounts in Supplementary Estimates (B) occur in the Department of Labour estimates. The main estimate for that department amounts to $114,491,000. The supplementary estimates contain what seems to me to be a very large amount, namely, $50,300,000. I do not understand why it is not possible for that department, when making up its estimates in the spring, to estimate its needs more closely. I would also ask the honourable senator the purpose of this item. I understand it is for winter work, but he may enlarge on that. He may also be able to say how much is to be spent in each province.

The estimates are such that one could ask hundreds of questions on this bill. Some would be pertinent and some quite unnecessary. However, I have touched on the only matters I wish to bring to the attention of the house.

Honourable senators, when I was speaking on the previous interim supply bill on October 7, I made a comment on the Finance Committee. I expressed my pleasure that the committee had been re-activated and was holding meetings. I think four meetings had been held and an outline of future work had been prepared. Some of that work is being carried out now.

At that time we were told that the committee's main study would be the Glassco Report. I am pleased that such a broad study is being made of one general subject. I have often heard questions asked in the Senate regarding small items in the estimates and it always seemed to me that they were very much out of place. I do not think the Senate was ever set up to review the estimates in particular. Reviewing the estimates on broad general questions and problems seems to me to be the real function of the Senate in this respect. I congratulate the Finance Committee on having undertaken this study at this time, as they did on previous occasions.

Although I am a member of the Finance Committee, unfortunately I have not had the time to attend all its meetings; but I attended some and I have read the reports of the others.

The committee has had before it an outstanding list of witnesses. These men are to be congratulated on their knowledge of the matters which they have discussed before this committee. I am sure that all those who attended have found the sittings very instructive and interesting. On listening to the statements of the specialists from the Department of Finance we certainly have a better idea of the preparation and review of estimates before they reach Parliament. It is also helping us greatly with the prodigious report of the Glassco Commission. It would be almost impossible for anyone to make a detailed study of that report, but one can learn a great deal from listening to the remarks of those men who have studied it, particularly in this committee. We certainly get a far better understanding of the proposals and recommendations in the report. I congratulate the chairman of the committee and look forward to the committee's report when it comes before this chamber.

Honourable senators, I have merely touched the outline of matters detailed in the estimates. It is about all one can do, unless we wish to become involved in a very long and detailed argument, and I have no desire for that.

The bill increases the authorization of borrowing powers to $1,750,000,000. I recognize that borrowing powers are necessary and, as the sponsor told us yesterday, although this amount is large it is not out of line with previous years. He mentioned some of the years, and I have looked up others and have found this amount to be consistent with previous years.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, I have only a brief comment to make on one item.

As you will recall, and as was mentioned by the honourable Leader of the Opposition, I interjected yesterday a question as to whether the ice-control construction was of a permanent nature. Because of that interjection I was given rather full information as to the cost of this structure, which is to be permanent, according to the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Leonard), who outlined the various items in a businesslike way. He told us that the structure would cost $13,942,000. Of this amount, the City of Montreal would pay $2,500,000, leaving a balance of $11,442,000 to be paid by the Crown, that is, by the taxpayers of Canada.

I do not say this is a subsidy, but, as in the past, the Port of Montreal and those ports on the St. Lawrence are certainly taking advantage of a situation to assist them in making it possible to further increase their trade as against the Atlantic ports of Halifax and Saint John.

I want to bring that to the attention of the honourable Senator Leonard, the sponsor of the bill, but more particularly to the attention of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the Government of Canada. I am sure that anyone who had $2,500,000 to invest, with a return of over $11 million, would be glad to do so. It appears to me that this deal is just that—an investment of $2,500,000 to get a return of a permanent nature of over $11 million. In addition, I think this has a very close connection with the question of tolls on the Welland Canal. There was certainly no objection from the east in respect to the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway, by reason of the fact that it serves central Canada, but I do not think consideration was given to its possible effect on the Atlantic ports.

The toll charge on the Welland Canal was part of an agreement whereby over a certain period of years of the canal's operation a small toll would be charged to be set up against the debt or the cost of the Seaway. It is now proposed, particularly by Port Arthur and Fort William, to do away with such tolls. I understand that the Port of Toronto has also advocated, by way of a resolution before the Chamber of Commerce at its annual convention, that these tolls be discontinued.

I want to point out to the Government that at the present time there is a debt of approximately $50 million against this particular item. I would hesitate to think that any further steps should be taken to add to what was an agreement whereby over a certain period of years the St. Lawrence Seaway would pay its way.

Honourable senators, I feel justified in bringing this to the attention of the sponsor of the bill. I hope that he and the Government will take note of the matter, to ensure that no effort is made to do away with the toll, thus adding that amount to the bills of the taxpayers, and also operating to the detriment of the Atlantic ports.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask my honourable friend if he has any information or authoritative figures to show whether or not the ports of Halifax and Saint John have suffered, in comparison with the traffic in and out of those two ports in previous years, particularly during that period since the Seaway has been in operation?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Anyone following the progress of business, and having the figures before him, would realize the loss of business in that connection.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I suggest that is not quite an answer to the question I raised. Has the volume of traffic in and out of these two ports declined since the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I did not expect to be asked a question like that, let alone answer in such detail. While we had an increase of one per cent in the traffic at the Port of Halifax last year, I contend we would have had a much greater increase if it had not been for the efforts made by the ports on the St. Lawrence River.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I say, in connection with what the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor) has said, I am somewhat in the same position as he is. The Port of Churchill is not getting all the business it should get, because of the question of the payment of tolls. Like my honourable friend, I do not like to see trade carried on to the detriment of our port, which should be doing five times the business it is now doing.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: If the Port of Churchill could get rid of some of its terrible ice conditions, naturally it would increase its business.

Hon. Harold Connolly (Halifax North): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) in his remarks today was, as always, kindly, courteous and well informed. In fact, I doubt if anyone sitting in this chamber has a greater innate kindness than this gentleman, and he would be the last to reflect, directly or otherwise, upon this chamber and its operations. However, because he did not amplify the statement he made, I suggest that inadvertently he has cast a rather serious reflection upon us, for he said that in this session the Senate is being paid more to do less than ever before in its history.

Now that is a dangerous truism, because it lacks the amplification to which I referred a moment ago. The reason this chamber has done less work should be clearly stated, because if the usual newspaper practice continues, this will be the butt around which our discussion will be reported in tomorrow's newspapers. The reason is not because of an unwillingness or an incapacity on the part of the Senate, but because the House of Commons did not make it possible for the Senate to function as diligently and regularly and at the same cost as it normally would.

Honourable senators, lest there be some among us who might be inclined to impute blame to some other body, I say the reason that the Senate has not functioned as diligently this session as in other years is due entirely to the conduct of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I thank my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Halifax North) for giving an explanation which probably I should have given. However, my remarks were based on the item in the estimates mentioned yesterday by the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Leonard), who said that an increased amount had to be put in the supplementary estimates because of the increased length of the present session. I am sure the public must know that the responsibility for this is not on the shoulders of the Senate, and could not possibly be. However, I am very pleased indeed that my honourable friend called attention to what should be obvious.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, the compulsion is upon me to say something about this supply bill. We have had a number of these bills this session, and, of course, in the working of our public economy it is necessary for Parliament to pass upon and approve the expenditures before the money is spent.

Sometimes I wonder just how valuable that procedure is. Under the previous government, occasionally I expressed my disappointment at the growth of expenditures and of the dangers I felt they constituted to Canada. I am bound to say that I see very little change, if any, which has come about as a result of the change in administration. The growth of our spending, for instance, for the servicing of our debt is shown in our estimates.

I think my good friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) was astray, if I understood him aright, when he spoke of the cost of servicing our public debt.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: As a matter of fact, the amount provided in the estimates, which we are covering today in part, is a total of $1,037,893,000. That is not an inconsiderable sum of money. That covers the interest and annual amortization of bond discount, premiums, commissions and so forth, and the cost of servicing and of issuing new loans, which by the way is $2,893,000.

It is interesting to reflect that 27 years ago the total budget of Canada for all purposes was around $550 million. That is, it was about one-half of what we have to appropriate now for interest alone to service our debt. That gives an indication of the growth of our debt.

I do not hold with those economists who say public debt is on the whole a good thing. Their theory is that if the Government spends a lot of money it is distributed all over the country and the economy as a whole benefits from it. There are margins within which that may in a measure be true. But you have to consider that public debt is not different in its application from a debt incurred by an individual. An individual may incur debt for a useful purpose. He may incur it to increase his production, and the production of wealth; and I would not want to be understood as out and out condemning going into debt. However, if we look at the purposes for which we are spending money we find that a great many are not associated with the production of new wealth, and therein lies a very great danger.

We are in a spending mood in Canada today. I shall not endeavour to assess the reasons for that, but our governing bodies, from top to bottom, are spending freely, too freely, with the result that the total obligations of the federal Government, direct and indirect, along with the provinces and municipalities, is now over $40 billion. That is a serious state of affairs. So far we have managed to get along without a great deal of challenge or criticism; but I would point out to this house that the inflation that has taken place in this country has been a pertinent factor in the increase of all these obligations. When we consider that in the last 15 years inflation has increased in this country by almost 37 per cent—that is, we have increased the gross national product over this period of time by almost 37 per cent through inflation—it is a very shadowy and false foundation upon which to build prosperity.

I say here today that there is no duty more pressing upon Parliament, upon both Houses of Parliament, upon the Government and the Opposition, than to try to maintain stability in the purchasing power of our money. Nothing is more important.

It is not without significance to me that within the last several months some good people have spoken to me about this increase in the cost of living. True, the labour unions try to overcome it by increases in wages. But a person who is living on a fixed income, who is relying on a pension or on the return from investments or savings, is not in that fortunate position and, consequently, this increase in the cost of living is the most dangerous thing facing our economy. It has this further evil, that it hits the very best people we have in this country: it hits those who by saving, industry and hard work have endeavoured to provide for themselves. They find their income eroded year after year, and they do not know where the end will be.

It is of vast importance that in the last 15 years the cost of living has increased on an average of over 2½ per cent a year. If you project that into the future, where are we going to be? The only remedy is to live within our means; there is no doubt about that. Today we regard deficits in government spending as a matter of little or no consequence. We talk about the gross national product, and hope springs eternal that year after year this gross national product will grow and blossom forth, and that we will find there the remedy to the evils from which we suffer. But that will not occur. The increase of inflation is bound to accelerate in the conditions under which we are operating today. Therefore, I say to this house that there is nothing more important for a government, for an opposition in Parliament, for both Houses of Parliament to do, than to give consideration to this vital question, because if history teaches any lesson it is that inflation in the end almost inevitably brings revolution. Time after time in history it has been proved that if you are going to keep your people contented, if you are going to avoid political disturbance, if you are going to avoid disturbances of other kinds, you must deal fairly with them.

When the citizens of this country send us to Parliament to represent them, this is the kind of job they expect us to do. If we fail to do it, I say frankly that we are failing in our responsibility to the Canadian people. And I will add this: there are no finer people anywhere in the world than the Canadian people. They deserve the very best that we, as legislators, can give them, and this problem is one which will not solve itself.

I repeat to my colleagues in this house that there is nothing more important for us and for Parliament to do than to try to search out the reasons why this is taking place, and take the necessary steps to stop it now and prevent its happening in the future.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Leonard speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, in the first place may I express my appreciation of the debate that has taken place on this bill? In particular, I would like to comment on the remarks of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks). As Senator Connolly (Halifax North) said, he is always kindly, courteous and well informed; indeed, he demonstrated that in his remarks today.

The interim supply bill has really two purposes. Of course, its roots are deep in British parliamentary history, going back to the time when Parliament wrested control from the executive over the spending of money, so that today before a government can spend any money at all it must come before Parliament and say how it proposes to spend its money, account for every dollar of it, and receive the approval of Parliament. These expenditures have now reached such proportions that it takes quite some time before approval can be obtained for every dollar spent. As it is necessary in the meantime to carry on the business of government, interim supply bills are brought before Parliament, so that in effect Parliament says to the Government, "We will advance you one month's supply or two months' supply so that you can carry on the business of government until such time as you receive our stamp of approval for your proposed expenditures."

When these interim supply bills come before us we have an opportunity to deal with the estimates themselves and the items and figures contained therein. There is a second aspect to them, namely, the opportunity to criticize the Government that is asking for this money.

Senator Brooks dealt with both these aspects. In the first place he raised some questions with respect to the estimates themselves, and with those questions I now propose to deal to the best of my knowledge. First of all he mentioned, in introducing some further remarks of his, the "extra money" as he called it going to the Senate. I should explain that this is not in fact extra money; this is simply an acceleration of the payment of money provided in the main estimates. There is no supplementary estimate with respect to this. It arises simply because we have been sitting through the summer and this amount of money is due somewhat ahead of time. But having said that I should go on further and say that if we continue to sit, there may well be extra money involved in supplementary estimates. In the meantime, however, this is merely an acceleration of the item in the main estimates.

Before going on to the next question he raised, which was in respect of the Dominion Coal Board, I might at this stage put on record that the interest on the public debt is $1,035,000,000. That is the figure in the main estimates.

Now, dealing with the Dominion Coal Board, there were two questions, the first one as to why there is an amount of $1 shown in supplementary estimates (B). If you read this item you will see that it authorizes annual payments not exceeding $18 million in each of the five fiscal years commencing on the first day of April 1965. That is for the next five years. Therefore there is a vote of $1 to record that there is a commitment to pay amounts up to but not exceeding $18 million for the next five years.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask why it should appear in these estimates if it is for future payments?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: In the main estimates in Vote 70 for Mines and Technical Surveys there is an item for subventions. The amount of subventions for this year is $14,465,000. Representations have been made to the Government that it is desirable to give some assurance that these subventions are not going to stop at the end of this fiscal year, and that the industry needs some assurance of the stability of the subventions so that it can make plans accordingly. That seems to be a perfectly right and proper thing to do. Rather than voting this particular amount each year it has been decided to put this item in the estimates for this year, to indicate that this commitment is proposed to be entered into whereby for the next five years a subvention will be paid.

Senator Brooks also asked about subsidies in respect of moving coal from Alberta to Vancouver. I have no information on that and all I can say is that I shall see whether I can ascertain any further information. I do not think any pertinent information appears in the estimates. There is a further item of $200,000 in Vote 70, being subsidy payments under an act to place Canadian coal used in the manufacture of iron and steel on a basis of equality with imported coal, but I do not know if that applies to the coal to which you refer.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I think it has been suspended.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Referring to your question in connection with ice-breaking operations, I have no information on that. However, it may be possible to have that information given to us in the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): May I ask a question at this point? It is my understanding that this is a result of the decision to establish the World's Fair site on St. Helen's Island and has nothing to do with navigation on the St. Lawrence system. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: The reason given was that it was to protect the World's Fair site, to protect Verdun and Lachine and to maintain water levels. That is as much as I know.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): And since the island is going to be permanent this will be a permanent feature too.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I think that makes it clear that no ice-breaking is connected with it. Senator Brooks' question was as to whether any provision was being made for ice-breaking, and I have no information on that. I would assume nothing is being done about it at the present time, but I can find out more about it.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I happen to have had an opportunity of discussing this with the engineers who are working on it. It is intended to be a permanent protection by diverting the waters around the island. It has nothing to do with ice-breaking.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Thank you, Senator Cameron.

Senator Brooks also asked about the Labour estimate of $50 million and why this could not have appeared in the main estimates since it was such a large sum. This is intended to be set aside for the winter works program. There are two aspects to this program, the first one being the grants to municipalities for work they are going to do during the wintertime. The second deals with the grant of $500 to each person building a house during the wintertime. Until a decision had been made to operate the winter works program again this winter, this item could not be included in the main estimates. Because that decision has now been made and because it is now known the extent to which such program would be carried on, the amount now appears in the supplementary estimates. The $35 million in respect of grants to municipalities is the same sum as in the preceding year. The $15 million to cover the grant of $500 for each house built during wintertime is $5 million less than the $20 million grant of a year ago.

I should also express my thanks to Senator Brooks for his comments about the meetings of the Standing Committee on Finance, and I assure him that we propose to continue these with a view to finding the answers to any questions concerning the estimates.

Senator Brooks went on to avail himself of what I would call the second aspect of an interim supply bill, that is, to voice some criticism of the Government. While I do not necessarily agree, and may in fact disagree with what he said, nevertheless I do respect his right to make this criticism. It seems to me that this is a proper exercise of the right to debate an interim supply bill.

This is one of the privileges and rights that Parliament has when the Government comes seeking interim supply. But, I would add also that while that right or privilege can be properly used, it can also be abused, as can other privileges. While pointing out that it has been correctly used in this chamber, I would suggest that honourable senators might be interested in reading the debates of the House of Commons over the last ten days on this bill.

Senator Isnor raised the question of the effect of some of this work at Montreal on navigation in the harbours of Halifax and Saint John. As I come from Toronto I shall not enter into a debate as between the needs of the harbour at Montreal and harbours in the Maritimes, but I do think that this is a subject that might be pursued at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance, at which time we can obtain further information.

We have always listened with great interest to Senator Crerar, and it is good to have the benefit of his wisdom and long experience in the public life of Canada. He voices the feelings of us all when he speaks of inflation. I have the same strong feelings on this subject as he has, although I am not quite so concerned, perhaps, about the total amount of the public debt. It is true that the figure of $40 billion is a large one, and it is also true that a large part of it does not represent productive assets. Perhaps that test is one of the better ones to apply to the public debt. However, this year the gross national production of Canada should run to $46 billion, and that has to be compared with the gross public debt of all levels of government of $40 billion.

To put this in terms of an ordinary person —I know this is not a proper comparison, but it is, nevertheless, a comparison that may occur to anyone—a man owing a total amount of money that is less than his annual income would not be considered to be heavily in debt. That is one comment I have to make. I know it does not answer in full Senator Crerar's argument, but if you were to go back over the history of government financing in Canada you would find many occasions on which the gross public debt in comparison to the gross national production has been at a higher ratio than it is at present. I qualify that statement by saying that I am not a proponent of greater public debt. I am saying simply that there are other factors to be taken into consideration when dealing with it.

Honourable senators, I think I have dealt with the questions that have been asked. As I have said, I shall endeavour to obtain information with respect to those I cannot answer, and that information will be available at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance next Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: May I ask Senator Leonard a question? Would he agree that the degree of inflation we have produced during the last 15 years has been an important factor in the increase of our gross national product?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Yes, I agree with that.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): The same factor has been important in respect to the greater public debt.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Yes, you have to put the same factor against the increase in the public debt, if you are going to talk about real production. The comparison is still between $40 billion and $46 billion.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: A glance at our Order Paper will indicate to honourable senators that there is very little, if anything, left on it. We have had a debate on this bill, and if it meets the convenience of the Senate I move, with leave, that the bill be given third reading now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa

5th November 1964

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 5th November, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,

A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary
to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to the order for Notices of Motions:

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by honourable Senator Lambert, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 24 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I am moving that the Senate do adjourn until November 24 on the understanding that there is no business before it. This afternoon I received notice of committee meetings next week, and I point out that while the Senate is adjourned certain committees will be at work. The Joint Committee on Consumer Credit is meeting next Tuesday morning, and the Standing Committee on Finance is meeting in the afternoon. Although the Senate may not be in session, the members are finding plenty of work to do for the country.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, I am not opposing this motion, but I do think it would be better if we adjourned until December 1. That is one week later than November 24. My reason for suggesting this is that the Order Paper of the House of Commons seems to indicate it is pretty certain that if we return on November 24 we shall find ourselves again with little or nothing to do.

The honourable Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt) has stated that committees will be sitting. That is true, but in the light of the fact that His Honour the Speaker has the power to call us back earlier should there be business to place before the Senate, I would personally much prefer to have the Senate adjourn until December 1. In saying that I am not challenging my good friend Senator Vaillancourt, who has discharged his responsibilities, as he always does, very well indeed.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: I am in the hands of honourable senators.

An Hon. Senator: Let us adjourn until November 24.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: If the honourable Acting Leader of the Government agrees with the remarks of the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), then I suggest we adjourn until December 1 on the understanding that we may be called back on November 24 if the House of Commons passes some of the items on its Order Paper.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, may I, as a junior member of the Senate, make a suggestion? Would it be possible to have a notice sent to the press that the Senate is adjourning to the call of the Chair. Tomorrow it will be stated in the press all over Canada that the Senate has adjourned until November 24, and people will say: "Well, there's the dear old Senate again." This appears every day in the Canadian Press summary on Parliament: "Senate stands adjourned," giving a certain date. Is it possible under the rules to have it go out merely that the Senate stands adjourned at the call of the Chair and that the call of the Chair could come next week. At least, that would give the impression that we might do something.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: It would be convenient if we could adopt that easy solution of the problem. Actually, it is only fair to say that the date, November 24, was suggested after some inquiry in connection with the proceedings in the other house as well as here. Having arrived at that estimate, I do not see that we can do anything further about it at the present time. If we have to come back then and adjourn again, we will have to accept that as part of the trials and tribulations of this overworked body.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, according to the law and the rules of Parliament, it is necessary to fix a date; but we may be summoned to meet before that date.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: We cannot extend the time.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Let us leave it as November 24.

Motion agreed to.

HON. W. ROSS MACDONALD, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON APPOINTMENT AS CHANCELLOR OF WATERLOO LUTHERAN UNIVERSITY

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, before we adjourn I wish to present my felicitations and congratulations to one of the ablest members of this chamber, Senator Ross Macdonald. Our distinguished colleague has been appointed to succeed the late Senator Euler as Chancellor of Waterloo Lutheran University. I wish to present, on your behalf and on my own, my best felicitations to Senator Macdonald.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1965.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the royal assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 24, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 18, 1964

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the Clerk had received a certificate from the Secretary of State of Canada showing that John Black Aird, Esquire, had been summoned to the Senate.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons, which was read by the Clerk Assistant; took and subscribed the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk, and was seated:

Hon. John Black Aird, of the City of Toronto, in the Province of Ontario, introduced between Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) and Hon. Mr. Hayden.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. John J. Connolly: With leave of the Senate, I move that the message be taken into consideration now.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SENATE MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), with leave of the Senate, moved:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a joint committee of both houses of Parliament to consider Bill C-136, intituled: "An Act to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors";
> That twelve members of the Senate be designated by the Senate at a later date to be members of the joint committee;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, a few days ago there was an all-party agreement in the House of Commons to the effect that when the item on the Order Paper of that house dealing with the Canada Pension Plan was reached the debate would be limited to three days, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of this week, during ordinary sittings. This means that by agreement of all parties in the House of Commons a motion for the approval of this measure in principle and its reference to a committee will be put to that house before the time of adjournment this evening.

As honourable senators know, for some time it has been contemplated that this bill, which is voluminous and intricate, should receive the attention of a special committee, and it is felt by the Government that that committee should be a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. It will consist of 36 members, of which this house is to appoint 12. The House of Commons has already agreed to the setting up of this committee although it has not as yet named its members. In order that a vehicle be available to which that house may refer the bill this afternoon, it is necessary that the Senate consider this motion today.

All honourable senators will agree, I think, that it is highly desirable not to duplicate the studies in committee that must be made of this bill. The appointment of a joint committee will make for a great saving of parliamentary time. The joint committee will also provide honourable senators with an opportunity to consider the bill, to hear the explanations that will be given of it, and to hear the representations that will be made to the committee by outside bodies.

It is highly appropriate, therefore, that we nominate 12 of our members to sit upon that joint committee. Indeed, this procedure has been followed on other occasions by joint agreement of the two Houses of Parliament. The resolution that we pass must also provide that if this joint committee sits when the Senate is not in session, or indeed when the Senate is in session, its members who represent this house should be entitled to be there as of right.

That is an explanation of the general principle involved in this motion. All honourable senators are familiar with this kind of measure, as such measures have come before us on many occasions.

Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to say I am sorry that the notice recalling the Senate could not have been sent sooner. This could not be done because its dispatch depended upon the arrangement made by all parties in the other house; it went out, after consultation with our honourable Speaker, as quickly as it possibly could after I received the firm information.

In the event that some honourable senators might have difficulty in getting seats on aircraft, I should like to inform the house that I telephoned the President of Air Canada and asked him particularly to facilitate any applications by honourable senators to return to Ottawa for today. I do not know if anyone had difficulty getting reservations, but the president promised to do what he could. It is most gratifying to all of us to see so many senators here.

An Hon. Senator: What about the fog?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The fog I could not disperse, and snow in the Maritimes I could not deal with.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I am sure that all honourable senators will welcome the setting up of this joint committee, the purpose of which has been described by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is an important committee.

Some honourable senators here will recall a similar joint committee which was set up in, I believe, 1951 to consider the whole question of old age pensions in so far as the federal Government is concerned. Its deliberations extended over some months and its report was the foundation on which was based the present Old Age Security legislation, viz. the flat rate categorical old age pension. In passing, it is interesting to note that two of the witnesses who appeared before that committee are now sitting on the treasury benches in another place.

It is 17 months since there was first introduced into another place a resolution authorizing the consideration of an act to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions. There have been two other resolutions since that time, two other bills, and today we have before us Bill C-136, which was distributed only on Thursday of last week.

We have the minister's speech, which she has distributed to honourable senators, of some 26 pages. We have press reports indicating that several other ministers have spoken at length on this matter. We also have the actuarial report which was tabled yesterday afternoon, which honourable senators can see is not double spaced, is in foolscap size and contains 23 pages.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And the White Paper.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: I was about to add that I could not put my hands on the White Paper, to complete the volume. There is another document we have not got as yet —the Economic Report. Why the minister was not prepared to table it and make it public at this stage, I do not know. It will be available to members of the committee, but if there is to be intelligent discussion before the committee it must be available also to people who wish to make representations to the committee, and under circumstances in which they can have a reasonable time to develop their views and present their arguments.

Honourable senators, I am supporting the motion. I have nothing more to say than that the proposals in this bill are of great economic importance and may be of great social importance. Therefore, honourable senators who are subsequently appointed to this committee will have a heavy responsibility to see that all persons who wish to make representations are given an opportunity to do so, that serious consideration be given to those representations, and that the members of the committee apply their minds to developing the best possible report.

I merely insert a caveat, which probably is quite unnecessary. The Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), said that in the setting up of the joint committee we would avoid duplication, and that it was important there should not be duplication. I agree that that is important. On the other hand, many bills are reviewed in both the Banking and Commerce Committee in the other place and in the Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate. I would not want it to be assumed that I was accepting the fact that because we shall be associating with members of the other house in a joint committee that would preclude us from a thorough study of the matter in a committee of this house.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am most grateful to the honourable Senator McCutcheon for the remarks he has made.

First, I should say it is the intention of the Government that there shall be a thorough study of this extremely intricate measure. Indeed, I think the volume of material which has already been made available indicates that if a study is to have any meaning at all it must be thorough. Much work has already been done, and reports upon various aspects of the bill have been made. Frankly, these will take a great deal of understanding, because there are questions of financial commitments, matters of judgment, and mathematical aspects. A great deal of time will have to be spent before judgment can be passed as to how sound or unsound are some of the proposals. This is the task of the legislator, the man or woman who will sit on this joint committee.

May I say in passing that even though we appoint only 12 members of the Senate to the committee, it will of course be open to any honourable senator to attend the meetings of the committee. I am sure there will be no difficulty arranging for any questions to be asked, should any honourable senators desire information not otherwise made available to the committee through the mouths of witnesses or from other sources.

In answer to the other point raised by Senator McCutcheon, so far as I am concerned—and I am sure so far as the Government is concerned—what is done by the joint committee will not tie the hands of the Senate. The Senate has to take its own responsibility with respect to this measure, and after it has been dealt with in the other place and comes to the Senate for consideration, we will cross the bridge at that time—and we in this chamber are pretty good at crossing bridges in our own provident way.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I wonder if I might ask the honourable leader what proportion in numbers from either side of this house will be represented on the joint committee? As the honourable leader pointed out, this will be an important committee, and I think we should have that information as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In similar situations I think the approximate proportion of about two to one was applied. It might be appropriate if we had eight from this side of the house and four from the other side. However, perhaps the honourable Leader of the Opposition and I can discuss this question; in any event, we shall have a consultation before a motion is made actually naming the senators concerned.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-72, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE SENATOR BLAIS

TRIBUTES

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the routine proceedings are called, I rise to say how very sad I am sure we all felt when we heard that our distinguished colleague, the Honourable Aristide Blais, died on Tuesday, November 10 last. Perhaps it was significant that Senator Blais should have died on the eve of Armistice Day, having served in World War I in the Medical Corps as a surgeon. He carried the rank of major for most of the war, and was subsequently promoted to lieutenant-colonel.

Senator Blais was appointed to the Senate in 1940. He served all but a quarter of a century. I am sure that I speak for all honourable senators when I say that he was highly respected and dearly beloved in the Senate.

Senator Blais was born in the County of Montmagny in the Province of Quebec. He studied medicine and graduated from Laval, Canada's oldest university. He did graduate work in surgery in Paris. He went to Western Canada just after the turn of the century. He settled in Edmonton and there practised his profession, in which he achieved a reputation of great distinction. People who knew him in those days have remarked about the high regard for his professional competence. They have also testified to the respect to which he was held by people in all parts of his home community.

Senator Blais' life exemplifies a fine Canadianism. Speaking in the Senate on one occasion in 1942, he reflected upon this aspect of his life without drawing a conclusion. It is for us to draw the conclusion now. This I think we can do very well from the remarks he then made. He said:

> It has been my privilege to live in Edmonton for the last forty-two years. When I went there in 1901 I was made very welcome by my English compatriots. The French-Canadian population was then very small, and my practice soon began to develop amongst my English-speaking fellow citizens. At that time, to my great sorrow, I could hardly speak English, but I knew enough of the language to appreciate their hospitality and their great qualities of mind and heart. I have learned a lot from them in many ways but first of all I have learned to love them. Today some of my best friends are English-speaking citizens, with whom I can discuss in complete frankness all problems confronting Canada. I have always lived in harmony with them without surrendering any of the principles which underlie our faith and our traditions. I often feel that if most of my compatriots in Quebec were given a similar opportunity a better understanding would prevail among us.
> What is dividing us? It is the lack of a common medium of exchange—language. That is why I have always advocated, indeed urged, that English language and literature should be made compulsory subjects in our universities, especially for those who will be our leaders in the future. I am confident that if we knew each other better, all obstacles would soon disappear. We could benefit enormously by a knowledge of our respective cultures. Mutual esteem would unite two great forces, and these forces pulling together would accomplish a miracle and make this Canada of ours a veritable Promised Land.

These are remarkable words, uttered more than 20 years ago.

When Senator Dan Riley died in 1948, Senator Blais, with his capacity for friendship, told of Senator Riley's great personal qualities and particularly of the regard in which he was held, especially by the Indian tribes of southern Alberta. He said on that occasion:

> No Calgary stampede was a success if Senator Riley was not seen riding in a parade at the head of the Indian tribes who had gathered there for that occasion.

It seems to me that this man, born in Montmagny County, Quebec, through these few phrases delivered in the Senate, somehow epitomized the spirit of the west.

We shall miss his friendship, honourable senators. We shall miss his great courtesy. We shall be consoled with the thought that he died full of years and invested with much honour by his colleagues here.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, as has been well said by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), we have been greatly saddened by the recent death of one of our oldest and most respected fellow senators.

I did not have the opportunity or the honour of knowing Senator Blais very well, for he was ill most of the time I have been a member of this house, but I knew him well enough to understand that it was not necessary to know him long to be able to recognize his great qualities of kindness, courtesy, chivalry and cheerfulness, even during the last few years when, as you all know, he was suffering from an incurable disease.

I often thought of Senator Blais as one who belonged to that class of fine and perhaps older gentlemen whose numbers, I am sorry to say, seem to be becoming fewer.

Senator Connolly has spoken of our late colleague's splendid war record. Those who served in the First World War knew of his commendable war service. Reference was also made to his civilian record, which I am also sure is well known to everyone in the Senate and almost everyone in Canada.

Senator Blais was always anxious to assist others. I recall a number of occasions on which he made representations to me for assistance for veterans, men who had served with him or who had applied to him for assistance in pension matters. He worked assiduously for them. I remember one particular occasion when he spoke about something that he thought was possibly his due, and he was shy and almost apologetic in asking for consideration for himself when, under our veterans' legislation and from every standpoint he was entitled to far more than he asked for or expected to receive.

Senator Connolly has also mentioned the fact that Senator Blais came from eastern Canada, from the Province of Quebec. He was one of thousands who went from eastern Canada, from Quebec and the Maritime provinces, to the west in former days and made a wonderful contribution to the development of that particular part of Canada. I join with Senator Connolly in saying that it does not matter whether a man comes from Quebec, the Maritime provinces, or anywhere else; if he has the qualifications and the right attitude he can go anywhere in this great country of ours and make a worthwhile contribution. To his great credit, this Senator Blais did. He exemplified the spirit of the many men who left eastern Canada and went to help build up that great part of Canada which we call the west today.

I wish to endorse everything the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate has said, and extend to Senator Blais' family the sincere sympathy of us all in his passing.

He lived to a ripe old age; he accomplished all that could be expected in his life span; and I am sure that in his latter days he had no regrets, that he was well satisfied with the life he had lived and what he had accomplished.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, Senator Blais was a practitioner of medicine in the Province of Alberta, and I think it appropriate that I should pay a brief tribute to his memory and express our sympathy to his wife and daughters.

The late senator practised medicine generously and kindly, and so endeared himself to his patients. He rose to fill a high place in the district in which he lived; he was honoured for the work he did in his military capacity during the First Great War, and he was most appreciated by those who knew him best. However, he suffered a serious accident in later years and was not able to participate to any great extent in the deliberations of this chamber, but the quotations that have been uttered today show where his heart was. His whole record illustrates the truth of that old poem which says:

> The glories of our blood and state
> Are shadows, not substantial things;
> There is no armour against fate;
> Death lays his icy hand on kings.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, coming as I do from western Canada I feel I should say a word or two about Senator Blais, but first I must congratulate the Leader of the Government on his most appropriate remarks.

Senator Blais was a remarkable man. Travelling about Edmonton, I do not know of a man who would not be delighted to say a good word about him. I remember at a sale in southern Alberta not long ago a lady asked me if I knew him. She told me what a wonderful man he was, about his driving in the earlier days in a horse and buggy out to St. Albert. Edmonton was not very large then. Everyone spoke highly of him as a man, a humanitarian and a gentleman. He has been in many ways my ideal, and he was a powerful exponent of the method by which the two races in this country can get along together. He was greatly missed when he gave up his immense practice in Edmonton.

I wish to express my sympathy to his widow and his two daughters.

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I think that no member of the Senate was more intimate with Senator Blais than I was, especially during the last few years when he was so ill.

Senator Blais and I were appointed on January 29, 1940. I had known him before and in time we became very, very fast friends. He was one of those medical men who kept himself up to date in matters concerning his profession. Every brochure or pamphlet printed concerning medicine or surgery was to be found either in his office or in his home, and he was continually reading such publications to keep himself up to date.

I was instrumental last June in inducing Senator Blais to move to Vancouver. There were two reasons for this: one was the milder climate and the second was the fact that he had a daughter living there whom he cherished dearly. On going to Vancouver he entered the Shaughnessy Hospital, where he died a short time ago.

Many senators here today and indeed many who have gone before were frequently in Dr. Blais' room on the first floor consulting him on their various ailments. He was always kind, thorough, and gave them the best advice any medical man could give.

I know both his daughters, one of whom is now living in Pasadena, married to a doctor, and the second living in New Westminster. On my own behalf and on behalf of my wife I wish to extend my deepest sympathy to our late colleague's dear widow and daughters on their sad bereavement.

(Translation):

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable colleagues, as a French Canadian from the province of Quebec, I wish to join with those who paid well-deserved tributes to the late Senator Blais, whose first name was Aristide. It was a predestined name, because he was a just man.

(Text):

I was just saying in French that the first name of the late Senator Blais was Aristide which is symbolic of a man who is just. Aristides was a Greek, well known for his spirit of justice.

(Translation):

Honourable colleagues, I met the late Senator Blais here in the Senate. I admired his punctuality. Despite the infirmities which afflicted him during his last years, he regularly attended the meetings of the Senate to show his sense of duty and to prove that he was interested in the matters we were discussing.

One of the most intimate friends of the late Senator Blais was the Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe who was his university classmate—there was only one year's difference in their ages—and who told me that he had the deepest admiration for the late Senator Blais.

Born in the small parish of Berthier, in the county of Montmagny, the late Senator Blais, at the beginning of his career, conquered the province of Alberta where he practised medicine and surgery with selfless devotion and a wonderful spirit of charity, which were recalled by our colleague, Senator Gershaw. He was the physician to the poor. He treated them with the same devotion as he would treat his wealthiest patients.

I shall never forget Senator Blais' wonderful smile. Whenever I met him, he wore a kind and gracious smile. He liked to recall his experiences in the West and was quite fond of his adopted land, the Province of Alberta.

It is always a moving experience to attend sittings like this one, where we pay tribute to the departed. I have listened to many final tributes and each one conjured up deep memories.

We all spend our time together here under the same roof. We have our difficulties, our problems. Our views often differ. But each one of us is trying to do his best, and that is what has been recalled by all those who have so eloquently spoken of the late Senator Blais.

In passing, may I say that one of our colleagues in particular did a great deal to help Senator Blais before he died. I am talking about Senator Arthur Beaubien who looked after him like a brother and helped him in many ways. It was a gesture of good fellowship. It is a worthy example I am happy to mention, even at the risk of disclosing a secret.

Honourable senators, I join with all those who spoke before me to extend my wife's deepest condolences and mine to Mrs. Blais, widow of the late senator, and to his daughter, in their sad bereavement.

(Text):

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, as a representative of the vast prairie country in which Dr. Blais spent the greater part of his life and service, I wish briefly to pay tribute to his memory. The late Dr. Blais belonged to a generation that has gone; he was a friend of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and Sir Wilfrid died more than 45 years ago. Our late colleague was among the first to enlist in the medical service during the World War of 1914-1918, and he distinguished himself, as the leader on this side of the house (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) so eloquently pointed out in his remarks. He ended his career in the service as a lieutenant-colonel in charge of a clearing station where the men broken in battle were first treated and looked after. That was one of the most honourable posts in which a medical officer could serve.

Senator Blais was a man of great charm. He belonged to a generation that valued highly grace, charm and courtesy and all those amenities that mean so much in life. He was a distinguished surgeon. I recall an occasion 40 years ago in Alberta when his name was mentioned to me as that of the leading surgeon at that time in the City of Edmonton.

He served in the war. He served humanity in his profession. He was a fine and honourable citizen who in his way admirably served his country. We can all agree that his passing leaves us a little bit poorer than we were.

MONUMENTS ON PARLIAMENT HILL

INQUIRY RE SUGGESTED UNVEILING

On the Order for Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, the question that I am about to ask is not for an immediate answer. I shall be satisfied if I receive an answer next week. I referred to the subject matter of my question earlier in the session. It is a public matter, and is known by all. My inquiry concerns the Baldwin-Lafontaine monument on this hill, which has been standing, exposed to all the elements—rain, snow, hail, wind and storm—for 50 years. This year is the 100th anniversary of the death of Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine, who was a prime minister of Canada and a chief justice of King's Bench in the Province of Quebec.

My question is this: Will that monument be unveiled by a person of note—the Governor General, or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, or the Speaker of the Senate, or the Speaker of the House of Commons—before the end of the centennial year of the death of Lafontaine? If the Government waits until 1965 to unveil that monument, people will ask, why have they waited so long to do something that should have been done 50 years ago?

REPUBLIC OF CHILE

REPORT ON INAUGURATON OF PRESIDENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, and in view of the fact that at the time of the last sitting of the Senate I was not present, perhaps I should take this occasion to explain my absence. As honourable senators know, I have been in South America, representing the Government of Canada at two functions.

My first mission was in Chile. In the September elections the Christian Democrats of that country won a rather overwhelming victory, and Eduardo Frei assumed office as president of the Republic of Chile on November 3. It is fair to say, I think, that generally throughout the Americas, and generally too in the Western world, President Frei's victory is regarded as most significant.

The election was orderly. It was thoroughly democratic, and the transition from the old to the new regime was carried out with dignity and smoothness.

President Frei received some 56 per cent of the popular vote. In this election the vote of women was counted separately, and it was overwhelmingly on the side of Frei.

Frei's chief opponent in the election was Alliende, the leader of the Socialist-Marxist coalition. The principles upon which Frei's party are founded are democratic, and while they are basically Christian they have no denominational slant or aspect. They are opposed on the left to extreme socialism and communism, both of which are factors in the political life of Latin America. They are opposed on the right to harsh materialistic capitalism, which too has been a factor in their social structure.

Some 60 countries, from the Americas, Europe, Asia, Africa and Australia, were represented at this inauguration. Canadians were seated alongside the delegation from the United States, and this provided me with many opportunities to talk with the very distinguished leader of the United States group, Mr. Adlai Stevenson. I may say that our talk was especially interesting on November 4, the day after the election in the United States. I cannot help but think that if the same circumstances had prevailed at other times Mr. Stevenson might well have been "Mr. President."

Lord Shackleton was the head of the delegation from the United Kingdom. He is the Minister of State for Air in the Wilson Government. Many honourable senators have known him—Senator Aseltine, particularly—at meetings of NATO parliamentarians, where he played a prominent part at all times. He is a famous son of a famous Antarctic explorer, and there was a special interest among Chileans in him because of the collaboration given his father by Chile in years gone by. I may say that Lord Shackleton showed more than ordinary interest in the current parliamentary process in Canada, particularly that in the House of Commons, but I would like to assure honourable senators that in our discussions I was as objective and non-partisan as I possibly could be.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: You are not placing that on very high ground.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It was on very high ground, senator.

Chile's liberator and her national hero is Bernardo O'Higgins, whose career, including an early retirement after his work was completed, continues to inspire them. On his monument is inscribed one of his sayings: Vivir con honor o morir con gloria, which means: Live with honour or die gloriously. I was rather proud to stand with Mr. Kelly, the Australian representative, at the O'Higgins monument when a wreath was placed there on behalf of all foreign missions. Mr. Kelly and I agreed it was another great day for the Irish.

France too sent a special delegation under the leadership of M. Jacquinot, one of her Ministers of State, who has quite recently been in Canada.

I need say little of the ceremony of the inauguration in the National Assembly. President Frei and the members of his cabinet were all sworn in by the President of the Chilean Senate. The occasion was both impressive and informal. The retiring President Alessandri and his cabinet were roundly applauded by the crowded galleries when they entered the chamber. Alessandri was a respected president. I think Chileans believe that nothing became his occupation of the office like the dignity of his leaving it. Alessandri was president for six years. He was an independent. The new regime was welcomed with an enthusiasm which approached a din. The contagion of these high spirits carried out onto the crowded streets and into office buildings.

Everyone at the inauguration then proceeded on foot to the 400-year-old cathedral where the most distinguished and progressive Cardinal de Silva Enriquez presided at a Te Deum ceremony in the high Christian tradition.

The City of Santiago that day had the air of a Roman holiday. I rode with the Canadian Ambassador, Mr. Bernard Summers, who comes from Newfoundland. As we moved along, and as the people realized we were from Canada because the flag was on the front of the car, through many successive blocks, they crowded the car, which was travelling at about three miles an hour, calling "Canada, Canada" and cheering. They wanted not only to shake hands, but they lifted the little children so that they too could shake hands. Honourable senators, to say that this was a moving experience is to put it in a very low key.

I watched the reception given the new president at a military review one beautiful afternoon. I saw him on television as he received his party supporters from all parts of Chile on the night of the inaugural. It was most impressive. I was privileged to have a private talk with him in his office before I left Santiago. While he has never been to Canada, he knows many Canadians and he, like so many other Chileans, is most friendly to the people of this country. He expressed the hope that, as years go by, Canada would take a greater part in Latin American affairs. He said that, with our practical experience in industry, in economics and in world affairs, he thought we could have a profound influence for good in matters affecting all the Americas. Mr. Frei is a young, intelligent, well-informed man devoted to his country and to its people. He impresses one with his sincerity as well as with his friendliness. He holds out great promise for the future of Chile and probably too for leadership in Latin American affairs.

I talked to many Chileans—retired ministers, new ministers, professional people, businessmen—but I should like to refer especially to one. He is Señor Horacio Walker Larrain, a distinguished lawyer, a former foreign minister, a former member of the National Congress, and one of the founders of the Christian Democratic Party in Chile. He spoke warmly of President Frei, of the men around him, of their struggle, of their capacity and of their ultimate success. I think it fair to say also that responsible people throughout Chile feel greatly relieved that Frei and his Christian Democratic Party were ready and able to win office at this critical time in the life of that country. I think, too, that many Chileans are somewhat surprised that the movement should have achieved success so quickly. They are both pleased and relieved that the needed party organization was available when quite obviously a strong subversive apparatus was in being.

Honourable senators, modern Chileans face many problems. In this they are not unique. Education is perhaps first and with it can come orderly social and economic progress, even more than they have it to date. A fine new start has been made. The desire is there and the ideas are there. Probably there will be mistakes. However, there is no question of the value of the goal they have set themselves.

At this time of year Chile is a delightful place. It is spring. The green in the Santiago Valley is refreshing. The fields and the vineyards are alive. The trees and the shrubs are in bloom. The people are friendly. Their music, their singing, their dancing, the colours of their folk costumes and customs, all impress visitors most favourably.

Honourable senators, may I say also how proud we can be of the Canadian representation in Santiago. I have already mentioned Mr. Bernard Summers, the Ambassador. I must also refer to Mr. J. Y. Grenon, Mr. Z. W. Burianyk, Mr. R. E. Gravel and Mr. Maurice Hendrick. What they did for Mrs. Connolly and myself, and what their wives did, made a very strenuous program a great delight.

I should like also to have on the record of this house the fact that I am most indebted to two Chileans whom the government put at my disposal to help me carry out the program, a rather strenuous one, which they set out. One was Señor Clemente Perez Zanartu, a distinguished lawyer of Santiago, a personal friend of the new president and one of the men who had much to do with the success of the Christian Democratic Party in the election.

I would also like to thank Señor Francisco Ignacio Ossa, a secretary in the Department of External Affairs of his country, who will go a long way, I am sure, in the foreign affairs of Chile.

Honourable senators, I was also invited to address a meeting of the Inter-American Conference of Business Executives in Lima, Peru. This meeting was opened by the Honourable Fernando Belaunde Terry, Constitutional President of the Republic of Peru. President Belaunde spoke with a deep knowledge of conditions in his country, with a deep love and an intimate knowledge of the people of his country. He was one of the most impressive people I met when I was away.

On the day I spoke, I was preceded by a former President of Peru, Señor Bustamante, who is now a member of the World Court at The Hague. Señor Bustamante made a speech in which he talked about important developments to be expected in the field of international law, as a result of the development of the idea of the Common Market in Europe and of the two other trade areas set up in Latin America, in which they are all interested. He was talking to business executives from the Americas and he received a very attractive hearing. Most of the 400 people at the meeting, although speaking Spanish as their first language, did me the compliment of listening to the English rather than using the ear phones. Perhaps this explains why they all said very politely that I made a good speech.

I should report also that I had a very warm interview with the Peruvian Minister of External Affairs, with the President of the Chamber of Deputies and especially with the President of the Senate. He invited me to address the Senate from the floor of their chamber. I need not say how honoured I felt on behalf of this chamber. I regret, however, that because I had an engagement to see the President of the Republic, I could not do this. However, I was rather amused, if I may interject this, at the fact that one of their problems in the Senate in Peru is to make sure that at all times they have a quorum for the transaction of business.

The President of Peru is a true friend of Canada. The Ambassador arranged for a five-minute interview for me, but the President protracted this to over a half hour. He asked many searching questions about this country. The dynamic society of Latin America is bound to be of increasing importance in the Western World. The total population of Latin America is now more than 200 million. This is about the same as the combined populations of Canada and the United States. I am informed that projections to the end of this century indicate that then Latin America may have a population of 600 million, while the population of North America may not exceed 300 million at that time. This tremendous increase will present problems not only for Latin America but for the world at large, particularly for the West at large. Great economic growth will undoubtedly result but social and economic problems will also flow from this great increase in the numbers of people. In the light of these facts, when the late President Kennedy stated that he regarded Latin America as the most critical area in the world, I think he was right.

Canada's trade with the area in 1963 was valued at about $650 million. More than two-thirds of this represents Canadian purchases from the region. A very large part of our imports from South America, of course, is made up of petroleum products originating in Venezuela. The sad fact is that only four or five per cent of Canada's world trade is with the countries of Latin America, and Canada is the fourth largest trading nation in the world.

Without repeating all the matters I mentioned in my speech, I told my audience in Lima that day that we too have watched with interest the "development of the Latin American Free Trade Association and the Central American Common Market. Both have been patterned on the concept of the European Common Market. They are bold and progressive steps. We wish you well with them," I said, "because we believe they can do much to strengthen economies, open new markets, develop efficiency of production and raise standards of living." But I added, "We would hope, however, that these associations would look outward, as well as inward, as indeed we hope the European Common Market will do. Otherwise they can defeat their purpose."

I also added that I hoped my coming to the meeting would perhaps be another small token of the interest Canada has in the development of Latin America. I said that we would like to be associated with them as they move forward, as their economies expand, as their population grows, and as their countries become greater—because they are dynamic countries which are becoming greater.

Honourable senators, there is another matter to which I would especially like to refer. Outside of Peru, there is a settlement called Pampa de Comas. This is a mission operated by the Oblate Fathers. It is under the direction of Father Birch in Ottawa. The Director on the site is Father Godin. There are a couple of hundred thousand Peruvian people living in this settlement. They have come out of the hills, attracted by job opportunities in Lima. They live in adobe huts without sanitation, water or power. The land is very dry.

The mission runs a chapel, school, a trade school, and clinic. There may be some 30 Canadians. Some are priests, some nuns, some lay brothers teaching in the school; but there are quite a number of laymen and laywomen. There are German technicians, a few American nurses, a few Peruvian doctors, and they are training Peruvians to carry on the social service work there, providing for this extremely destitute community on the outskirts of Lima. In addition to the drugs the get from Canadian sources free for their clinic, they have to spend, in these most discouraging circumstances, about $800 each month on pharmaceuticals alone.

Honourable senators, I consider this work to be of an heroic character. These people give two, three or four years of their lives to it, because the Peruvians have not the trained people to do the work. Most of these Canadians are French-speaking from the Province of Quebec, and receive extremely low pay for what they do.

It seems to me—I could not help think at the time, and have thought so since—that as we in Canada plan our external aid, we might give serious consideration to establishing even a minor program of help for projects of this kind. It is technical aid in the very real sense, and it is urgently needed.

When I was in Santiago the ambassador there held a reception, to which some 60 Canadians working in Chile were invited. As was the case in Peru, some of them were clerics, but many of them were laymen and laywomen. They, too, are working in the field of social service, and they are rendering this service for low salaries, and have done so for a number of years.

As I have said, this is technical aid, voluntarily provided to countries which need this kind of assistance. They are teachers, social workers and scientists of various kinds. I believe that the image of Canada is higher in each of these countries because of the work these people do.

In many of the places I visited representatives of the press came to see me. Invariably, they asked whether Canada was considering joining the Organization of American States, and in every case I replied that Canadian membership is likely to come in time, if it is desired by the other members. However, if it comes, Canadian public opinion must be more conscious than it now is of conditions in Latin America and of the extent of Canadian interests in that region. I went on to emphasize, however, that even if Canada is not now a member of O.A.S., this fact does not prevent the development of closer ties between Canada and these countries—ties of an economic, a political and of a cultural character. Already they are developing. A good foundation, even if it is modest, is now being laid, and the prospects for the future are promising. It will not only be for the Government, but for the business community as well and for people engaged in cultural activities of all kinds, to develop initiative in this respect.

In conclusion, may I pay a very special tribute to the Ambassador of Canada in Lima,

Mr. Freiman Tovell—perhaps many honourable senators know him—and his very attractive and able wife. I should like also to say how much their planning added to my visit to Peru. Mr. Tovell is in charge of a fine staff which includes Mr. G. Choquette, from Quebec City, and Mr. D. J. McEachran, from Vancouver.

Finally, perhaps I should add that on the same day that I left Santiago I played golf, and badly, because I was tired, for the schedule had been trying. I played on one of the most beautiful courses I have ever seen, and one which reminded me very much of the course at Banff, under the shade of the Rockies. This one was under the shade of the Andes.

On the Sunday afternoon, I had the pleasure of witnessing six most interesting bull fights in the ring at Lima. The following Saturday afternoon I attended one of the most exciting Canadian football games I have ever seen. It was an athletic weekend to wind up an extremely interesting trip.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, before the honourable leader moves the adjournment of the house, could he give us some idea of the business this chamber will be required to deal with for the next few days or weeks?

Before the honourable leader replies, I should like to congratulate him on the comprehensive and interesting report of his trip to South America. Before he left for South America, I had already stated that Canada would be well represented there. After listening to his report today, one needs no further proof of that fact.

May I also take this opportunity—I do not feel it is out of place for me to do it now—to congratulate the new member of the Senate, Senator Aird. I have not had the opportunity of meeting Senator Aird, but I am sure he will enjoy the Senate, the companionship that he will find here, and that he will make a great contribution to the deliberations of this chamber. I wish heartily to congratulate him on his appointment.

Now, if the honourable Leader of the Government will tell us what the business is for the next few days or the next week, we shall be grateful.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, tomorrow we shall debate second reading of the bill respecting redistribution. If the debate is concluded tomorrow and the bill passes, we could have royal assent tomorrow evening.

Tomorrow the Senate will be receiving a report from the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce in respect of the Companies Act amendments. It is not proposed to debate this tomorrow. I do not know whether the chairman of the committee intends to give any explanation tomorrow; I gather not.

The proposal then would be that we reassemble probably on Tuesday evening to deal with the amendments to the Companies Act, and the following day consider the private bills that are now before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. If these matters are dealt with by the middle of next week we may then adjourn because I understand the other place will be dealing with the Estimates for some considerable time. However, may I enter a caveat and say that I am advised this is the program, but it is subject to change, just as the Senate when it is adjourned is always subject to recall.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask what private bills are to be considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would say any bills that have already been referred to the committee—I understand there are three or four.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: What are they?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is the bill respecting actuaries, the bill to incorporate Settlers Savings and Mortgage Corporation—

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Will the bill to incorporate the Bank of British Columbia be under consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There are three on the list for hearing.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What bills are before the Banking and Commerce Committee for hearing?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The bill to incorporate Canadian Institute of Actuaries, the bill to incorporate Settlers Savings and Mortgage Corporation, the bill to incorporate the Royal College of Dentists of Canada, and the bill to incorporate the Bank of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Senator Hugessen also reminds me that there are two bills before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and notices will be going out for the meeting of that committee as well.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

CANADA PENSION PLAN BILL

JOINT COMMITTEE—COMMONS MEMBERS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

> Ordered: That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours thereof.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE

NOTICE OF MEETING

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, before petitions are presented may I be allowed to say a word with respect to the notice of meetings of committees which appears on the last page of our Order Paper?

We had convened a meeting of the committee on Transport and Communications to sit on Thursday next to consider two bills of relatively minor importance, Bill S-43 respecting Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company, and Bill S-47 respecting The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company. The meeting was arranged for next Thursday on the assumption that the Senate would be sitting at that time. However, I understand now that that is not to be the case, and arrangements have been made to hold a meeting of the committee tomorrow morning at 10.30, in lieu of the original time and date. The sponsors have been advised, and have informed us that they will be ready and willing to proceed tomorrow morning. Perhaps honourable senators who are members of the committee would be good enough to accept this as notice of the meeting.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: There will be no inconvenience on the part of anybody?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: No. I made sure the sponsors were advised as early as possible and they said they would be here in support of their bills.

COMPANIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-22, to amend the Companies Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with certain amendments.

For text of report see appendix, p. 1091-7.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. F. W. Gershaw, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 579 to 608, inclusive, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAIWAYS

PASSENGER SERVICE AT RIVIERE DU LOUP —INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have a few questions to ask, and they are written in French. I shall explain what they are about. This book that I am holding represents the station at Riviere du Loup, and to give you an idea of where the train stops, I shall say it would be in the anteroom of the Senate. Passengers who come to the station have to walk one-third of a mile in order to board their train.

Instead of stopping the train in front of the station, then disconnecting the engine to take oil at the tanks and connecting it afterwards, they take the whole train far away from the station. There are poor women with children, with parcels and luggage, who have to walk such a long distance. This is an absurd situation, and the question I ask is this:

(Translation):

> Why does the C.N.R. stop its passenger trains, at the scheduled time, a quarter of a mile west of the Rivière du Loup station?

(Text):

That is my first question, and it is easy to understand after the illustration I have given.

[Later:]

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is the Rivière du Loup station the one you obtained after years of effort in the other place?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Well, I did not obtain a new station, but I had it repaired at such a cost that it was equivalent to the building of a new one.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It provided more jobs.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Honourable senators, I know that many people in the Province of Quebec think that we in the West get a lot better treatment than they get in Quebec. However, we have two beautiful trains running through the town where I live, the Supercontinental and the Panorama. We would be pleased if those trains would even stop within 200 yards, so that we would only have to walk to them. But they do not stop at all, and I have to go all the way to Edmonton, 75 miles, to get either one of them. I think the people of Quebec are treated just as well as we are, perhaps even better.

PUBLICITY RE "THE SCOTIAN"—INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: My second question has to do with extending to the train known as the Scotian, which runs between Halifax and Montreal, the publicity given regarding the Champlain train between Montreal and Quebec.

For a time the Scotian was badly equipped —there was scarcely sleeping accommodation on it. Now it is a crack train, a beautiful train. However, it is for the most part empty because the people remember the bad service formerly on that train. It is now a very good train and needs to be publicized more often than I do it.

My question is this:

(Translation):

> Why does the C.N.R. not publicize the "Scotian" which runs between Halifax and Montreal, as much as the "Champlain" which runs between Quebec and Montreal?

(Text):

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: What is your question, anyway?

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: It is this:

> Why does not the Canadian National publicize the Scotian, which runs between Halifax and Montreal, as much as the Champlain, which runs between Quebec and Montreal?

There is nothing that pleases me more than to oblige my colleagues, especially my neighbour.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PRONUNCIATION OF "NOËL" BY FRENCH ANNOUNCERS—INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: I have another question about the C.B.C. It is written in French, but I will translate it for the benefit of my colleagues. It is a bilingual question—written in French and spoken in English. It is this:

> When will the management of the C.B.C. give definite instructions to its announcers and commentators, of French language, to follow the example of their English-speaking compatriots, to pronounce correctly the word "Noël"?

If I ask anyone of my English-speaking colleagues how the word "Noël" is pronounced, he will say "Noh-ell," and he will speak of "Noh-ell," the great feast of Christmas. But the commentators pronounce it "Na-hel". It is a French word which is correctly pronounced by all Englishmen, and always mispronounced in French over the C.B.C. and the other stations. I have complained about it in the Senate, but, like certain sermons, one has to repeat it. The first time I mentioned it there was an improvement of 50 per cent. I hope now it will be 100 per cent; and that Mr. Ouimet and all the members of the staff of C.B.C. who are very well paid, will not distort the French language when they speak of the great feast of Christmas, in French.

It is unfortunate, because there are many announcements for the Christmas sales, yet they speak of "vente Na-hel". It is silly—and they are so conceited and pretentious.

CANADA COUNCIL

NAME, DATE OF APPOINTMENT AND QUALIFICATIONS OF PRESIDENT —INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have two more questions, if you would permit me, and then I shall sit down. Shall I read this one in English?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: If you please.

An Hon. Senator: No, in French.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I am embarrassed. I may not read it at all, and you will be disappointed. Listen to this:

> What is the name of the president of the Canada Council and when was he appointed?

I will say it in French:

(Translation):

> 1. What is the name of the president of the Canada Council and when was he appointed?
> 2. Is he a man of letters? If so, what are the titles of his books, and where and when were they published?
> 3. Is he a painter? If so, in what city and when was his first exhibition held?
> 4. Is he a sculptor? If so, to what school does he belong and where are his works displayed?
> 5. Is he a musician? If so, what instrument does he play?
> 6. In what cities and when did he give concerts?
> 7. Does he make records and where can they be bought?

And I could add:

> And at what price?
> 8. Is he chartered accountant or an auditor? If so, what are his qualifications and where did he obtain them?
> 9. What was his business, or his job or profession at the time of his appointment?
> 10. If he was neither a man of letters, nor a painter, nor a sculptor, nor a musician, nor a chartered accountant, why was he appointed rather than an artist?

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCES —INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable colleagues, now I must relate to you a very sad matter. Last week a tragedy occurred to a young family living in the lower part of a duplex dwelling in Quebec City. On this occasion the mother left her three months' old baby in the charge of the lady upstairs, whose husband was the master of a lioness cub which he kept as a pet. This, of course, was a careless thing for the mother to do, and the lioness mauled the baby so badly that the infant died. Afterwards, the lioness was treated as a vicious animal should be treated—a provincial policeman came and shot it.

Now I come to my question:

(Translation):

> Over the past ten years, how many death sentences have been commuted in the case of individuals found guilty of (a) murder, and (b) rape and murder, and on what date was each of those commutations decided?

I will not make any comments, but I am putting these questions on the order paper in the hope that the government will answer them in due course.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. C. G. Power moved the second reading of Bill C-72, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith.

He said: Honourable senators, notwithstanding its long and somewhat involved title, this bill is a comparatively simple one. The aim and object of it is that Parliament dispense with the function, which since Confederation it has exercised, of allocating the boundaries of ridings within each province, and hand over to bodies of a less partisan nature the duty of making this redistribution. Generally speaking, I think this object meets with pretty general agreement and even with a substantial measure of acclaim.

Before going into the details of the sections of this bill, I would like to explain in a broad and general way how it is proposed to go about reaching this objective. It is proposed to constitute ten commissions, one for each province, which, after having been given the number of the population of the province, shall divide that population into the number of districts allotted to the province under section 51, of the British North America Act. Each commission will sit in the province to which it is allocated, will hear representations and, after its study has been completed, will draft a representation order which will in due course go to the Parliament of Canada, to the House of Commons, and be discussed there to ascertain whether there are any objections to it. After that it is to be returned to the commission, and a representation order is to be issued, followed by a proclamation which brings into force and effect the redistribution effected, after the Parliament during which time this work has been done has been dissolved. In a few words, that is what it is proposed to do under this bill.

To go to the sections of the bill, section 11 really provides for the beginning of the work. It says:

> As soon as possible after the completion of any decennial census, or—

And, this is the case at the present time, because we are dealing with the census of 1961.

> —in the case of the census taken in the year 1961 forthwith after the coming into force of this Act, the Dominion Statistician shall prepare and send to the Secretary of State and to the Representation Commissioner a return certified by him showing the population of Canada and of each of the provinces and the population of Canada by electoral districts...

As soon as possible thereafter the commission is set up. It is composed of four members, one of whom, in the case of each of the ten commissions, is the Representation Commissioner. The other commissioners are appointed in the following manner: one, the chairman, by the chief justice of the province from among the judges of the court over which he presides; and the other two by the Speaker of the House of Commons. Therefore, of the four commissioners, one is the Representation Commissioner ex officio, so to speak, on every commission, two are persons residing in the province concerned, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons, and one is a judge appointed by the chief justice of the province concerned.

Then, the commission having been set up, the Representation Commissioner computes or calculates the number of members of the House of Commons to be assigned to his province under the provisions of section 51 of the British North America Act; and the commission thereupon proceeds to do the work allocated to it.

Under the provisions of this bill each commission is to receive instructions as to the matters which it must take into consideration in dealing with the redistribution of ridings. First of all, they > ...shall proceed on the basis that the population of each electoral district in the province... shall correspond as nearly as may be to the electoral quota for the province, that is to say, the quotient obtained by dividing the population of the province as ascertained by the census by the number of members of the House of Commons to be assigned to the province as calculated by the Representation Commissioner under section 12.

That is the first and essential principle.

Each commission may depart from the strict application of the rules by taking into consideration certain factors, such as, geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity, density or relative rate of growth of population of various regions, the accessibility of such regions, and any special community or diversity of interests of the inhabitants of various regions of the province. It goes on to say:

> ...but in no case...shall the population of any electoral district in the province as a result thereof depart from the electoral quota for that province to a greater extent than twenty-five per cent more or twenty-five per cent less.

So, the tolerance established by this act is 25 per cent.

While I am on that point, perhaps it has not been generally understood by the public and, I think, by people connected with Parliament, that while discrepancy exists at the present time between rural and urban districts with respect to population and the number of voters on the lists, a discrepency also exists to a certain extent as between urban divisions themselves.

I have noted here, in order to show this, that in the Province of Ontario you have Bruce with an electoral population—that is to say, number of electors on the list—of 17,382, according to the 1963 general election. You have Wellington-Huron with 18,440 electors on the list. Then, as against that, in the same province, in the urban constituency of York-Scarborough you have 162,950 and in York Centre 106,741. Then we have Renfrew South with 19,760. However, at the moment I am looking for some of the Toronto ridings. There we have one riding, Trinity, with 26,543 as against York-Scarborough with 162,950. The point I wish to make is that there are vast discrepancies even between two urban constituencies.

In the Province of Quebec there are of course some very small rural constituencies, including Îles-de-la-Madeleine with a voting population of 5,684, and Kamouraska with 17,000. We have Lotbinière with 18,000 and then, even in the City of Quebec or the surrounding district we have the constituency of Quebec West with 33,000 and Quebec South with 36,000. Then we have Quebec-Montmorency, which is a suburban constituency with double the number of either of the two previous constituencies, namely 76,000. On the Island of Montreal, in the city—and I am not sure whether these are suburban or city constituencies—we have Cartier in the centre with 19,944, and Laval, which is more or less suburban rather than entirely urban with 112,822.

Hon. Mr. Denis: Are you speaking now of population or the number of electors?

Hon. Mr. Power: Voting population. We have St. Ann in the city with 19,601 and we have Mercier with 120,083.

So, honourable senators, you will see that the discrepancy is not entirely as between urban and rural constituencies. Even within urban constituencies there are discrepencies, but not perhaps to the same extent. Nevertheless there are large discrepancies.

The commission may hold as many sittings as they deem desirable, but they must have at least one public hearing at which persons who have objections may attend and set them forth. This hearing must be advertised in the Canada Gazette and in the press. A person wishing to make a complaint must give a certain number of days' notice to the commission that he or she will appear and make representations.

Each commission shall complete its report not later than a year after the receipt by the chairman of the copy of the return of the last census. When the report has been completed a draft representation order is forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and if 10 members of that house, irrespective of the provinces from which they come, file objections with the Speaker the matter is then debated in that house and the representations, objections, and the discussions in the House of Commons are forwarded to the representation commission in question. That representation commission deals with these representations and objections and in due course, when they have been dealt with, a final representation order is made by the commission in question and forwarded to the Secretary of State, who issues the proclamation bringing the representation order into effect. As I said, this is to take effect after dissolution of the Parliament during which the work has been done.

Those are the essential points of this bill which I commend to your consideration.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask a question of honourable Senator Power? First, with regard to the appointment of the commissions, in clause 6 it is stated that the chairman shall be appointed by the chief justice of the province. I am not entirely clear on that. For instance, in Quebec should it be the Chief Justice of the Appeal Court or the Chief Justice of the Superior Court?

Hon. Mr. Power: I am not clear on that either.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: My second question is with reference to paragraph (b) of clause 13. I would have liked the honourable senator to comment upon the principle or the rule which is inserted there and which would indicate that dual ridings may be continued in the existing two cases, but not otherwise. I was wondering whether this is a sound principle. If it is good it should be extended to other places and if it is not good it should be abolished.

Hon. Mr. Power: I wonder if my honourable friend thinks it is for us to declare whether a principle contained in the bill, after an amendment had been proposed at the last moment, is good or bad. Does my honourable friend think it is part of my function as sponsor of the bill to comment on that? An amendment was made to the bill in the other place at the very last moment, whereby dual constituencies were permitted. I remember on one occasion when I was chairman of a redistribution committee of the other house we brought in a report doing away with dual constituencies. However, if I am not mistaken, it was my honourable friend Senator Isnor in the House of Commons who insisted that dual constituencies should be retained, and there was not very much objection to that. I think there are only two such ridings left, Halifax and Queens. Apparently the persons who are interested in these constituencies have reasons to believe that dual constituencies should continue.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I see no mention in the bill of the Chief Electoral Officer.

Hon. Mr. Power: He is the Representation Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Will he play a role in this?

Hon. Mr. Power: Actually, Mr. Castonguay is both. As far as I know there is no reference in the bill to the Chief Electoral Officer as such.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: He is the Representation Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. Power: Actually, he is the Representation Commissioner, and if I remember correctly the act which constituted the Representation Commissioner made the Chief Electoral Officer, as such, the Representation Commissioner. I do not think it specifically named Mr. Castonguay. I think it stated that the person who was Chief Electoral Officer should automatically be the Representation Commissioner.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to comment to any great extent on this bill. There is not much to be said regarding Bill C-72. By that I do not mean that it is not important. Very much to the contrary, I consider this is one of the most important bills that we have had before Parliament in quite a number of years. It is important because it concerns everyone in Canada, dealing as it does with the matter of voting and the election of members of Parliament, which is a most important subject.

When I say there is not much to be said about this bill, I mean there is not much left to be said because it has been studied very carefully for a long time in the other place by the people who are most concerned, namely, the members of the House of Commons. As we all know, the original bill has been changed. Compromises have been reached between the different parties, and there is now general agreement. This, I am sure, is a great accomplishment in respect of a measure of this kind. It was brought about by the determination on the part of all members of the House of Commons to produce as far as possible a redistribution bill that was as fair and nonpolitical as possible.

We shall have to wait, of course, to see how this legislation works out in practice, but the least we can say about it at present is that it makes a splendid start.

I congratulate Senator Power on his explanation of this bill. I know of no one better versed in matters of this kind. He has had the practical experience of running in more elections than anyone else in Parliament at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And, successfully.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Yes, he has been very successful. He saw that there was proper distribution.

I remember when, in 1952, he had much to do with piloting the redistribution bill of that time through the House of Commons, and I was interested enough to look up the speech he made on March 13, 1952. At page 421 of the Debates of the House of Commons of that year he is reported as saying:

> . . . the suspicion exists in the public mind that those redistributions (in the past) had for their primary motive political advantage or personal political interests.

That is exactly what this bill is designed to prevent.

> It seems to me that the time has now come when the members of this house should endeavour to dissipate that suspicion that exists in the minds of the public.

I do not think the act passed in 1952 successfully achieved that purpose.

I found it very interesting to read on in Senator Power's speech of that time. On the same page I find these words:

> As my friends and associates from Quebec know well—

And I include those from other parts of Canada as well.

> —I have never been a white-plumed Sir Galahad constantly seeking the Holy Grail of electoral purity.

That is very beautiful language, and it is also true.

Hon. Mr. Powers: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I should like to give honourable senators a short history of this bill. At the outset I point out that there is no senator on this side of the house who opposes it. It is well known that Canada's Constitution states that after each national census representation in the House of Commons must be adjusted to compensate for shifts in the population, but this has not always, if ever, been done. The last census was taken in 1961. Thus, approximately three years have passed before Parliament is asked to give authority for the drawing up of new constituency boundaries. In the meantime we have had two federal elections based on the old distribution, and some even say that we may have a third before the electoral boundaries are readjusted.

In 1962 the previous Government introduced a redistribution bill, but that was withdrawn because the census figures were not available until June of 1962 and, as we know, there was a general election on June 10. The same Government introduced the bill again in 1963, but the general election of 1963 prevented new legislation. It was late in 1963 that the present Government introduced a redistribution bill, but that session ended without any action upon it. In March of 1964 the bill was introduced again, and debated for three days, but was then withdrawn by the Government until April. When the Prime Minister drew up his list of legislation having priority before the beginning of the flag debate, consideration of this bill was omitted. I might say that this surprised many members of Parliament and also the public in general, because this legislation was very important and urgent, and it was felt that it should have been dealt with at that time.

In April the bill was discussed for five or six days, and then we heard about it briefly again in September and October. The House of Commons began its consideration of it in earnest on November 10, and it is now before this house. Only after these weeks and months of procrastination are we finally considering it.

Some particular points in this bill have already been mentioned. The constituencies as drawn up after the 1951 census heavily favoured the rural vote. The honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Power) has pointed out that there were not only discrepancies between the rural and urban centres as such, but there were discrepancies —although I imagine comparatively few—in the urban constituencies as well. We all know that since the Second World War there has been a tremendous growth in the urban centres of this country. The population of cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Calgary and Vancouver has increased to a great extent. Many immigrants have come to this country since that time, most of whom have gone to the cities, and people who were living in rural districts have moved into the cities. The farming population has been decreasing because fewer people are required on the farms. The result of all this is that the city constituencies have become overcrowded, and the population of the rural constituencies has become smaller and smaller.

The redistribution carried out by the Government of the Right Honourable Mr. St. Laurent, and previous redistributions, have never been satisfactory to both major parties because they were handled by politicians. As Senator Power said, the aim is to get this matter as far away from politics as possible.

It is generally conceded, I think, that Mr. Diefenbaker, when taking up the problem again in 1962, proposed a principle in this field which had genuine historical importance. That principle was that questions of redistribution should be taken out of political hands and placed in those of impartial people. This was his idea, and the idea contained in the legislation that he proposed. That principle still holds today, as is reflected in this bill.

In the past, the party in power, with its majority on the redistribution committee, could, and often did, juggle the constituency boundaries to suit its particular desires. This was not true of any one particular party; it was true, as we all know, of the different political parties at different times. Politicians are human, and the parties are made up of human beings.

This present bill was introduced in the House of Commons on March 2 of this year. Second reading was moved on March 9, and the bill was read the second time and sent to the committee on April 15. The report of the committee was made on Monday, November 16, and the Commons passed the bill.

When it was originally introduced the bill contained two important departures from the past which proved to be stumbling blocks preventing earlier passage in the House of Commons. First, the bill proposed that a latitude or tolerance of 20 per cent be allowed on each side of the average population of a constituency. The basic constituency population is 65,000, and a population of 70,000 is envisioned except for the Province of Prince Edward Island which has four ridings, each with an average population of approximately 26,000.

The Opposition party's stand on this point was a demand for a tolerance of one-third, or 33⅓ per cent. Honourable senators will recall that a compromise was agreed to by all parties, and the bill now provides for a tolerance of 25 per cent. I think this is very sound. Despite the fact that there are these very large city constituencies, the rural constituency is entitled to great consideration.

For instance, in my province, in the constituency of Charlotte, the people are interested in fishing, farming, forestry and such activities, relating to many departments of Government. These are matters in which the man living in the city has no particular interest. There is the matter of rural mails to be dealt with. The representatives of rural constituencies have to travel many miles to see their constituents, whereas a few blocks may contain all the members of a constituency in a city.

The bill also proposed that the work should be done by 10 independent commissions, with one for each province. There was reluctant but general agreement on this proposal, as opposed to the alternative suggestion of one committee for the whole country. A basic argument in favour of the Government's proposal was that 10 separate commissions would save time in doing the job. No doubt this is true and it will be particularly necessary at this time, where so much time has been lost in making the redistribution.

The original bill also provided that the Representation Commissioner should sit on each four-man commission. That would be the Chief Electoral Officer, as we know him at the present time. It proposed also that one of the other members of each committee should be a senior judge nominated by the provincial chief justice and that he would act as chairman. It also provided that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition each would appoint one man to each provincial commission. This was in the original bill but, as the sponsor of the present bill has pointed out, this point was changed in the bill we have before us now.

In the other place, the New Democratic Party moved an amendment, subsequently accepted by the Government, that would eliminate the proposed activity by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, by putting the power of appointment in the hands of the provincial chief justice. The amendment did not come to a vote, however, until November 12, and it was defeated. In the interim, the Government and the official Opposition came to an agreement whereby the honourable Speaker of the house was given the responsibility of appointment as originally intended for the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. The final vote for appointment by the Speaker was carried 92 to 11. This seemed the best possible solution. It may not be an ideal one, but there is more to be said in favour of it than against it. Thus each group in each province would have the responsibility of redrawing their respective provincial constituencies.

Honourable senators, may I say here that this was the idea which the honourable Leader of the then Government had in 1962.

As explained by the sponsor of the bill, it provides two months for the establishment of the commission, a year in which they must do their work, 60 days in which to resolve doubts over their recommendations. This in all represents 14 months. Honourable senators will see that it will take a long time to effect this redistribution.

On the basis of 25 per cent tolerance, experts tell us that virtually every riding in Canada will be changed. We can see what a tremendous task lies ahead for party organizations, for candidates, and for others to adapt themselves to a totally different constituency map. Estimates of the time required to perform this task range from three months to six months. The latter period mentioned may seem close to a minimum.

The work of the commissions will not be completed, taking the present redistribution, until about mid-March 1966. When the political parties have completed their adaptation to the new boundaries, it will be mid-September 1966 before the country will be ready to hold an election based on this redistribution bill. If a general election is held before then, one wonders if the country will be receiving fair representation based on the population distribution of Canada as returned in the 1951 census and 1952 electoral map.

The bill reduces to a minimum the possible gerrymandering which has been mentioned several times, both by the sponsor of the bill and by myself. This is a most desirable improvement. There is, no doubt, a lack of enthusiasm among some members, not because gerrymandering is reduced to a minimum but because some members of the House of Commons see their constituencies absolutely disappearing under this new arrangement, and this would naturally make them quite disturbed and unhappy.

The sponsor of the bill has mentioned a glaring contrast in city populations. He mentioned the Magdalen Islands, as we call them, with a population of only 13,000, and compared that with York-Scarborough with 267,000 persons. Of course, when you look at populations, there is no comparison at all. We must remember that the Magdalens are little islands far out in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and they have many problems that York-Scarborough never dreamed of. Nevertheless, there is too much discrepancy and it will have to be changed.

Honourable senators, I have more notes here, but I shall not weary you by further comments. There has been general agreement on this bill by practically all members of the House of Commons. In this chamber, there is no objection on our side of the house. Furthermore, as far as I can see, there is no reason why this bill should be sent to a committee, in view of that general agreement.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have very little to say because, as my Leader has already mentioned, practically everything has been said, if not here, at least in the other place.

We are in agreement with the three main principles involved in this bill, the first being to put an end to gerrymandering which has taken place in previous redistributions; the second, to keep for Parliament, and especially for the House of Commons, a certain control over this problem of redistribution; the third, to apply as far as feasible the principle of equal representation for every vote.

It is not the fault of any particular party or government if this bill is not passed until three years after the 1961 census has been completed, with the result that the new redistribution or the new electoral map will come into force only at the end of 1966. However, this may point to some weakness in our system. If another election should take place before the new electoral map comes into being, the consequence could be that the distribution based on the 1961 census would not serve during the 10 years between 1961 and 1971. In such a case the new electoral map could serve only for an election in 1971, right at a time when, in practice, we would be taking another census.

I am wondering, therefore, if some study should not be given to a method which would be more efficient and quicker. I have been wondering whether one year is not too long, and if we could not provide for a shorter delay than one year for each provincial commission to report. In fact, each commission will have all the elements to work with right from the beginning. There will be no delay, for everything has been prepared by the Bureau of Statistics and by the electoral commissioner. Some time could be saved in that way.

Honourable senators, I merely point out that under circumstances like this, which have prevailed since the end of the 1961 census, what we are proposing to do here may not have any practical result, and may really not serve the purpose before it is time to take another census and perhaps another electoral map.

I have already mentioned—and this is a question of detail—that section 6 of the bill does not make it clear who is going to appoint the chairman of each provincial commission, and the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Power) does not know.

Hon. Mr. Power: Although I know something of the difficulties which exist in Quebec with respect to the protocol about this matter, it has been pointed out to me that there is really one Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec, and one Chief Justice of the Appeal Court. I have never attempted to resolve the question of precedence as between the two, and I do not know that the act has done so, either.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I do not know. I have not had the time to examine the acts which could settle the problem. However, there is no doubt that in Quebec the chief justice of the province usually has been considered as being the Chief Justice of the Appeal Court. He is called the chief justice of the province. My colleague will remember that usually he is the one who acts as the administrator of the province, because he is considered as the senior member of the judiciary.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would think, for what the remark is worth, that the language in the statute is used by design, because I understand that the office in each province is designated in the words that are used in section 6. Perhaps that might resolve the problem.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I suppose the designation of "chief justice" will be found in the Judicature Act.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the language is precise.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The way it is expressed in this bill leaves it open to interpretation.

Finally, honourable senators, as I have said, I am not fully convinced of the purport of paragraph (b) of section 13. I have no personal opinion as to whether or not the system of dual ridings is good. It may be that in large cities dual ridings might be a good thing, but if such is the case, why restrict the power of the commissions to the only two existing ridings? Would it not be a good idea to ask the commissions to recommend—

Hon. Mr. Isnor: The commissions may recommend dual ridings, or otherwise, but not that they must do so.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am sorry, but I think if we read the wording of the bill correctly, it will be found that it applies only to the continuation of the two existing dual ridings. The provision applies only to the commission for Prince Edward Island and to the commission for Nova Scotia.

Paragraph (b) states:

> where, immediately before this Act was assented to, provision was made for any electoral district in the province to be represented by two members of the House of Commons, the commission may—

That applies only in these two cases. Therefore, if it were found to be a good thing to establish other dual ridings, commissions could not do it elsewhere than in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and only with respect to the continuation of the two presently existing dual ridings.

Those are two comments which I submit to the Senate, and possibly to the special attention of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West). I merely wish to say that we are all in agreement with the principles, and, as was said by my leader (Hon. Mr. Brooks), I thank the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Power) who certainly has shown his very wide experience in this field. He has explained the changes which would be brought into the system which has prevailed until now. A bill having the same principle was before the House of Commons in March 1962 and another early in 1963, sponsored by the former government, which shows clearly that we are all unanimous in wanting to apply definitely the principles of fairness which should govern the redistribution of our electoral ridings.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, the first thing I wish to say is that we are indebted to Senator Power for a lucid explanation of this bill. Without any question, this measure is a march forward from the existing method of apportioning our federal constituencies, and a substantial step in advance of some of the methods which hitherto existed in arriving at constituency boundaries.

In the democratic system of representative government it is always open to us to make progress, and I think it is satisfying that as the years pass we appear to be arriving at sounder principles of establishing our federal constituencies.

There was a time in British history when they had what was known as the "rotten boroughs". The rotten borough was usually a territory that was under the control of some titled nobleman, and his selection for a candidate of Parliament at Westminster was always elected, or almost always. Occasionally his authority was challenged, but only occasionally. In this country we left the job to the Parliament of Canada. There have been occasions in the past, as I think Senator Power will agree, when both the old parties were tempted to indulge in unfair practices in drawing constituency boundaries, and they would endeavour to hive the supporters of one party, if possible, in one constituency, and leave it open to another one or two constituencies, perhaps, to be favoured by the opposite party. That, of course, is scarcely in accord with our theory of free representative government.

The proposals in the bill now before us really afford, for the first time, I think, a good opportunity—perhaps not a perfect opportunity, but a very good one—to get away from that unsound practice.

There is one point only upon which I have any reservation, and that is in bringing the Speaker of the House of Commons into the matter of making appointments to these commissions.

The Speaker of the House of Commons, by long tradition—certainly in the Mother of Parliaments at Westminster, and we have been moving steadily toward it in this country—should be someone who is always above the party battles. It will be interesting to see how this works out, but I would regret very much indeed if the Speaker, with the best intentions in the world, became the object of criticism by any political party because of the appointments he had made to these various provincial commissions. That would be most regrettable. However, probably this is the only way out of the dilemma at the present time. I have no doubt that the Speaker, irrespective of what party he belongs to, will try to do a thorough job in regard to these appointments and that, as far as he can, he will get men who will approach their responsibility with the high purpose with which they should meet it.

There were two other points. The tolerance between constituencies is probably a sound basis. Certainly, Senator Power gave illustrations of the wide discrepancies that exist, not only between rural and urban but between urban constituencies as well, discrepancies that certainly call for remedial action. But how is the unit of representation arrived at?

Under our constitution, Quebec was given a fixed number of constituencies—that has been altered since—and the total population of the country was divided by that number of seats, which happened for years to be 65, so that the total population in Canada divided by 65 gave the unit of representation. Then, with that unit as a base, there were, of course, the wide tolerances that not infrequently but very frequently arose. So my first question is: How is the unit of representation arrived at?

Then there is a second matter, that if the unit of representation is, say for illustration, 40,000, how will that affect a province like Prince Edward Island? If that basis were strictly adhered to, Prince Edward Island would lose a seat. Is there a provision in this bill comparable to the old provision in the B.N.A. Act that the representation of a province in the House of Commons cannot drop below its representation in the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Power: Section 52 of the British North America Act says:

> The Number of Members of the House of Commons may be from Time to Time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate Representation of the Provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

Section 51A says:

> Notwithstanding anything in this Act a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That answers my question. To sum up very briefly, I think this is a forward step. It may be experimental in some respects, but it is by the process of trial and error in matters of this kind that we ultimately reach perfection. As far as I am concerned, I am very glad to see that this progressive step has been taken in effecting the redistribution of our federal constituencies.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I am rather disturbed concerning the effect this bill might have on the representation from the Province of Saskatchewan. We now have 17 constituencies, many of which are very large. For example, in central Saskatchewan the Rosetown-Biggar constituency is 100 miles square. When redistribution takes place, and we are probably obliged to take in all of Kindersley in order to have the required population in that area to constitute a seat, the new constituency will be 150 miles long and 100 miles wide. In the northern part of Saskatchewan the constituencies extend as far as the 60th parallel of latitude. In some cases that is a distance of 200 miles.

Can the sponsor of the bill tell us exactly what is going to happen in a case of that kind, where the distances are so great? Will the geography of the country be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Power: All I can do is quote section 13(c)(i) of the bill itself, which says that if > special geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity, density or relative rate of growth of population of various regions of the province, the accessibility of such regions or the size or shape thereof, appear to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable,

That is, from the general rule of equal representation—then the commission may depart from the strict application of the rules.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It appears such circumstances will be taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. Power: Yes, by the commission.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In any event, I have read and heard it stated that in Saskatchewan we will lose—

Hon. Mr. Power: Three seats.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: —under this new distribution at least four seats, which will bring the number of seats down to 14 or even 13.

Hon. Mr. Power: As far as I know, it is three seats, and that will reduce the number from 17 to 14.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We would lose three seats?

Hon. Mr. Power: Yes, you would lose three seats.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask the sponsor of the bill a question for the purpose of clarification? When the number of members to represent each province is established and this tolerance of 25 per cent as between the rural and urban constituencies comes into effect, does that mean the commission will have to keep within that 25 per cent in designating the boundaries of a constituency?

Hon. Mr. Power: Twenty-five per cent, up or down. I have not done the figuring myself, but I have figures taken from a newspaper that, for instance, in New Brunswick the highest maximum would be 74,000 and the minimum 44,000.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: And each constituency has to conform to that?

Hon. Mr. Power: Yes, exactly—within 25 per cent.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Power speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. C. G. Power: If I may be permitted at this time, perhaps with respect to the questions asked by my honourable friend and successor in the House of Commons, Senator Flynn—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: For a very short time!

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We are all glad he followed you here.

Hon. Mr. Power: —perhaps I could simply say that I am just as embarrassed as I can be with respect to the Chief Justice of the Province of Quebec. I do not know the answer to that question.

With respect to the tolerances spoken of by my honourable friend Senator Crerar, he was a little doubtful about the nomination of the Speaker of the House of Commons to make the appointments. May I say generally as to this bill, that I do not think perfection was obtained. Nearly all the do-gooders, who are glad to get something they seem to like, played with it and did their darndest to make the bill so perfect it almost did not go through the House. So, like a good many others, I am satisfied that one has to put up with a slight amount of imperfection in order to get the general principle of the bill through. It is for that reason I support it very strongly.

With regard to the appointment of the two extra commissioners other than the Representation Commissioner and the judge, there was considerable discussion. Personally, I think I would have favoured the appointment of two politicians by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition, because I firmly believe it is not a disgrace to be a politician. After reading the debates and the discussions in the newspapers about this, I began to feel as if I were almost a gangster or a goon, and that anybody who was in politics throughout his life was to be sneered at and condemned. In matters of this kind, which are purely political, I feel that the commissioners should not all be judges. In fact, one judge said to me yesterday, "An ordinary judge does not know anything about this business, and, if he does know anything about it, then he should not be a judge." In my view it would be far better that somebody who knows something of the feelings, the sentiments and the ideas of the people, and the interests involved in each constituency and each province, should be appointed. That is my own view, but I take it that the general opinion in the other place, arrived at perhaps by compromise, was that the Speaker of the House should appoint them. I am satisfied with this because it helped to get the bill through.

Now, if I may become garrulous in my old age and talk about something that has not much to do with all this but which may serve as an explanation: In 1882, when the first great gerrymander was brought about by Sir John Macdonald, I do not think the people of the country objected to it very much. They thought it was part of the game. Sir John was a great man and he did much for Canada, and the Grits who complained were only yelping at him and were not worthy to be listened to in matters of this kind. I think the people of the country felt that Sir John was a good Prime Minister and that he should stay there. If he took some devious way of staying there, then so much the better for him.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Those were the good old days.

Hon. Mr. Power: It shows the tendency of the people. As time went on people began to think there should be some fairer play as between the political parties. The minority Grits' howling began to get stronger. As time went on it was felt that the two parties should have a fair share of redistribution. When we came to the time of Sir Wilfrid himself, and afterwards Mackenzie King, this distribution had been shared between the parties, and as a result of the good feelings between the parties, Mr. Mackenzie King, in 1934 I think it was, and later on in the forties, had one of the smallest constituencies in Canada, the constituency of Glengarry which by all normal rules for constituencies should have been wiped out, or could very well have been covered or encompassed in some other constituency. But in the house it was Mr. John MacNicol, a leading Tory from Toronto, who moved that the constituency should be left untouched. That is an indication that the parties were agreed, by a kind of chivalrous argeement, to divide the constituencies among themselves.

As time went on the conviction grew throughout the country that redistributions were not for the benefit of the particular persons or parties, but for the electors. And so we have come to the point now where the general opinion in the country is that the electors must have a fair deal rather than any particularly popular leader or political party. The electors must have equal representation or the nearest thing to it.

I know my honourable friend, Senator O'Leary (Carleton), was at one time a candidate in the county of Gaspé which at that time contained within its boundaries the Madeleine Islands. I do not know whether during the course of his campaign he had time to go there, although it was an important part of the Gaspé constituency.

Over half a century ago, in 1912, I went to the Madeleine Islands in connection with a provincial by-election. Perhaps there has been a change since then, but at that time there was every reason for making it a separate constituency. It had no connection whatever with the Province of Quebec. Religiously—and they are very religious people there—the population was under the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Charlottetown. They were miles away from anywhere. There were no airplanes at that time. You could not get there at all during the wintertime, as far as I know. Commercially, the Madeleine Islands belonged to Newfoundland years ago, and the property was owned by a British admiral and his descendants in Montreal. In trade, such as it was, importing was carried on from Halifax, and it was mostly liquor—and not very good liquor at that, as well I know. The export trade was with an American concern from Gloucester in the United States which purchased all the cod, lobster and herring. There was no sound reason why the Madeleine Islands should belong to Canada at all, as far as I know. Their interests were entirely different.

I also remember that at that time in Quebec we talked during the campaign about James Bay, and we might as well have talked about the Uganda railroad, as far as these people were concerned. There was a question of a Canadian navy, and most of the population of Quebec were against it. But these people, being surrounded by the sea, felt they would like nothing better than to get jobs in a navy.

I know that to two or three redistribution committees the Madeleine Islands posed a problem. They did not want to belong to Gaspé, and with all due respect to the "Madeleineos," Gaspé did not want them either. There was a suggestion that they should be joined to Bonaventure but that did not go. There was also a suggestion, because they had similar trading habits and interests to those of the people of the north shore of the St. Lawrence where many people were fishermen, that the islands should be joined to Saguenay, several hundred miles away. There was no geographical connection whatever but merely some similarity of interests.

It is very well to say there are great discrepancies, but where are you with a situation like the Madeleines? That is one of the problems which one of the commissions will have to settle, and frankly I would not like to have to do it.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I would suggest that Prince Edward Island take them over.

Hon. Mr. Power: I remember before the war you could only get to the Madeleines by taking a Canadian National train to Pictou and then by boat to Prince Edward Island and to the Madeleines. Now you can get there by air.

As I said, this is one of the difficulties that will face this commission and one which it will have to settle satisfactorily. It is my hope that they will find some means of doing it to the satisfaction of some of the people.

Most of the questions that have been asked I cannot answer except by telling you a story about something else. I do not think I have anything further to say with respect to this bill, honourable senators, but I should like to point out for purposes of information only, that the Manitoba legislation dealing with the division of the province into electoral constituencies provided that that work was to be carried out by a commission composed of the Chief Justice of Manitoba, the President of the University of Manitoba and the Chief Electoral Officer of the province. The report of that commission, except for one single exception, was adopted, and received general acclaim. I mention this to indicate that this sort of thing has been done, and successfully done, at least once in Canada.

I recommend again this bill for the approval of this house.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

(3) The amalgamation agreement shall further set out

(a) the name of the amalgamated company;

(b) the objects of the amalgamated company;

(c) the amount of its authorized capital, the division thereof into shares and the rights, restrictions, conditions or limitations attaching to any class of shares;

(d) the place within Canada at which the head office of the amalgamated company is to be situated;

(e) the names, callings and postal addresses of the first directors thereof;

(f) when the subsequent directors are to be elected;

(g) whether or not the by-laws of the amalgamated company are to be those of one of the amalgamating companies and, if not, a copy of the proposed by-laws; and

(h) such other details as may be necessary to perfect the amalgamation and to provide for the subsequent management and working of the amalgamated company and the manner of converting the authorized and issued capital of each of the companies into that of the amalgamated company as determined pursuant to paragraph (c) above.

(4) The amalgamation agreement shall be submitted to the shareholders of each class of shares of each of the amalgamating companies at general meetings thereof called for the purpose of considering the agreement, and, if three-fourths of the votes of each class of shares cast at each meeting are in favour of the amalgamation agreement, the secretary of each of the amalgamating companies shall certify that fact upon the agreement under the corporate seal thereof; and thereafter the agreement shall be deemed to have been adopted by each of the amalgamating companies unless the amalgamation agreement is annulled in accordance with the procedure outlined in the following subsections.

(5) Within seven days of the final vote on the amalgamation agreement, any shareholder or shareholders holding at least ten per cent of the shares of any class of shares in any of the amalgamating companies may apply to the chief justice or acting chief justice of the court of the province in which the head office of the company is situated, or a judge of the said court designated by either of them, for an order annulling the amalgamation agreement: Provided that such application may be made only by a shareholder or shareholders whose dissent was recorded at a meeting of any class of shareholders called to consider the amalgamation agreement.

(9) The amalgamating companies shall, within six months of the date of the final vote on the amalgamation agreement, jointly file with the Secretary of State the amalgamation agreement together with a certificate from the secretary of each of the amalgamating companies establishing the percentage of those who voted in favour of the agreement and the percentage of dissentient shareholders, in respect of each class of shares.

provincial Act such as amalgamation may be authorized; and, if the conditions hereinafter set forth are complied with, such companies may thereafter continue as one company.

(2) The companies proposing to amalgamate may enter into an amalgamation agreement as hereinafter provided, and in so doing shall comply with the provisions of subsections (2) to (10), both inclusive, of section 128A. In addition, the amalgamation agreement shall stipulate whether the amalgamated company is to continue under this Act or under the provincial Act.

(3) The provincial company shall provide the Secretary of State with a certificate signed by the Lieutenant-Governor, Provincial Treasurer or such other body or person as may be authorized to confirm the amalgamation agreement under the provincial Act, to the effect that all of the requirements of the said Act have been satisfied, and that he is prepared to confirm the amalgamation agreement, by letters patent or otherwise, as provided for by the said Act.

(4) The Secretary of State may, if he is satisfied that the foregoing provisions have been complied with, issue letters patent confirming the amalgamation agreement.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to the order for Notices of Motions:

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, with leave, I move, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, November 24, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the honourable Acting Leader (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) on what he bases the particular date, Tuesday next, November 24, to which he suggests we adjourn. I am sure we all recognize the great difficulty involved in setting the length of recesses, but our return must be based on a cogent reason that we will have legislation before us at that time with which to deal.

My understanding is that the other place will be discussing the Estimates for the balance of today and probably all next week, and that after the Estimates have been disposed of they will resume the flag debate. If such is the case, it would seem to me that there would not be very much business for us to attend to if we return on Tuesday next. It also occurs to me that if such is the case, and it being possible to recall us at any time —honourable senators have every opportunity to know what is going on by following the news—we could set a later date and be called back sooner if necessary. But if we adjourn only until next Tuesday, then we must resume whether there is any business to attend to or not.

Therefore, I would ask the honourable Acting Leader if he knows what business will be before us at that time and the reasons for adjourning our sittings to that date.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether my honourable friend the leader on the other side recalls, but we have an extremely important report from the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, containing a large number of proposed amendments to the Companies Act, to deal with on Tuesday evening. I imagine the discussion on that will take most of the evening and perhaps part of the next day.

I would also draw his attention to the fact that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce has been summoned to meet next Wednesday morning to deal with a number of bills. They are: the Bank of British Columbia bill; the Canadian Institute of Actuaries bill, which received second reading last week; and the Royal College of Dentists of Canada bill. I think it is altogether likely that one or two of those bills will be ready to be reported back to the Senate on Wednesday afternoon.

I am not in the confidence of the Government or the leader on this side, but I think the idea of adjourning until Tuesday next, rather than until December 1st or 8th, was to try to clear up the business we have before us. I imagine that when that has been done there will be a fairly long adjournment if, as the leader on the other side says, the House of Commons is to discuss the Estimates all next week, followed by the resumption of the flag debate.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I see no reason for urgency in dealing with the report of the Banking and Commerce Committee on the Companies Act. As we all know, there was a subcommittee appointed to study and review the bill section by section. The subcommittee's report, running to some twenty typewritten pages, was presented to the standing committee on Wednesday last, and every one seemed to be satisfied with the proposed amendments. That bill has been before us for several months, and I think its further consideration could wait; I see no special urgency about it. I believe its consideration is the main reason we are being asked to sit on Tuesday evening next.

With regard to the other bills, I can see no reason for urgency in dealing with them on Wednesday next. I support fully the proposition made by my leader.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, generally I do not do so, but on this occasion I must disagree with the views of my colleagues sitting in front of me in regard to next week's sittings.

I do so because I am the sponsor of the bill to incorporate Settlers Savings and Mortgage Corporation, which is now scheduled to come before the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on Wednesday morning next. I know that some of the interested parties who reside in Winnipeg have made plans to come to Ottawa next Wednesday to appear before the committee, and I would not like to see consideration of that bill adjourned because I know these individuals are anxious to have this legislation move ahead.

I am sure that Senator McCutcheon is in a similar position with regard to his bill concerning the Canadian Institute of Actuaries. Consequently, I hope that the plans for meeting next week will be carried out as proposed by the Acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Hugessen).

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): May I add that I am in the same position as Senator Thorvaldson. I would be extremely pleased if we were to adopt the motion proposed by the honourable the Acting Leader.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

CONSUMER CREDIT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons stating that the name of Mr. Saltsman has been substituted for that of Mr. Orlikow on the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Consumer Credit.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965. (English and French texts).

CANADA PENSION PLAN BILL

FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson, Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons appointed to consider Bill C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors, presented the first report of the committee:

Your committee recommends that its quorum be reduced to twelve (12) members, provided that both houses are represented.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: With leave of the Senate, I move that the report be adopted now.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, first, I should like to congratulate the honourable Senator Fergusson on her appointment as co-chairman of this committee. I would like also to ask her who the other co-chairman is, when and how often the committee proposes to sit, and why it is recommended that the quorum be 12 and not a larger number.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: The other co-chairman is Mr. A. J. P. Cameron of Toronto. No final decision has been reached as to how often the committee will sit. The next meeting will take place tomorrow afternoon at 3.45. It is hoped to have meetings on three days per week, with usually two meetings in one day.

As to the reason for the reduction in the quorum, it was thought that this would be a reasonable number of members to expect to attend in view of the large number of committees meeting at the same time. Of course, both houses must be represented at the meetings. Originally the quorum was fixed at 20 members, but the committee decided to ask that this be reduced to 12, as it was thought it would be easier to get the attendance of that number rather than the larger number.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is a very important committee.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) had not been so agile on his feet —he is younger than I am, and much more able to rise quickly—I would certainly have preceded him. I rise now primarily to say that I am sure all honourable senators are gratified that one of our number, and particularly one of our ladies, should have been selected by a very important committee to be one of its co-chairmen.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: And also one from New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The Leader of the Opposition is beating me to the punch every time this evening. Certainly, the fact that Senator Fergusson comes from the Atlantic region is important, and the fact that she comes from the very green province of New Brunswick is of great significance. I am sure we all wish her, and the other members of the Senate who are on this committee, success in the work they will carry out.

On the point as to the reduced quorum, may I add, without in any way wishing to embellish what Senator Fergusson has said, the normal practice on joint committees has been—and I recall the one that sat in connection with the affairs of the National Capital Commission a number of years ago—to reduce the quorum to ensure that the work of the committee can continue. However, I think, and this should be on record, that the attendance on the part of representatives from both houses at these important committee meetings is usually extremely good. In the case of emergencies, however, when representatives are called to their respective houses or to other committees, it is the part of prudence to have a smaller quorum so that the work of the committee can continue.

I simply conclude by saying that I hope Senator Fergusson and her colleagues from the Senate will enjoy a successful and pleasant experience on the committee.

Report adopted.

PASSENGER SERVICE AT RIVIERE DU LOUP

REPLY TO QUESTION

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, when a question is asked in this chamber it should be answered as fully as possible in this chamber. On Thursday last my honourable colleague, Senator Choquette, asked me this question—I now read the question and the comments following it:

> Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Is the Rivière du Loup station the one you obtained after years of effort in the other place?
> Hon. Mr. POULIOT: Well, I did not obtain a new station, but I had it repaired at such a cost that it was equivalent to the building of a new one.
> Hon. Mr. FLYNN: It provided more jobs.

I have some gifts for my esteemed colleague, Senator Choquette, who is well liked by all of us for his intelligence and his great heart. The first is a copy of a speech made in the House of Commons on July 21, 1931. I do not have a copy of the Hansard available, but the full text of that speech was published in Le Soleil of Quebec and I am pleased to send it to my honourable friend with my compliments.

I have another gift for him; it is an editorial of the Toronto Globe of February 11, 1932 entitled "Monsieur Pouliot Wins," and I have an excerpt from Hansard of February 9 of that year, in which a full page is devoted to the Rivière du Loup station. Now may I tell you in one or two words what happened?

Sir Henry Thornton, who was a great diplomat, called for tenders on the basis of plans which had been drafted by the engineering division of the railway. The cost had been included in the estimates of the railway and had been approved by the old railway commission, and everything was ready for tender. However, the tenders were called in such a way that the first notice appeared just on the eve of the election, and the other notices appeared after the election when Mr. Bennett had been elected. A Conservative had tendered at a price which was $38,000 higher than the lowest tender received. This lowest tender was by a Liberal. A delegation came to Ottawa to have the contract awarded to the higher Conservative bidder, and since it was not possible to do this the whole project to build a new station was cancelled. I had worked hard to have that station rebuilt. Instead of doing it, the Bennett government repaired the old station at a cost higher than that of the contract.

I have a final gift for my honourable colleague. It is an editorial from the old Toronto Globe, the Newspaper founded by George Brown, dated February 10, 1932. The headline is in French. This was a great honour, since such a thing had happened only twice in the history of that paper. The first time was for Marshal Joffre—the victor of the Battle of the Marne, at the beginning of the First World War—when he came here after the war; and the second heading speaks for itself in these words:

VIVE J.-F. POULIOT!
VIVE LA BELLE GARE
A RIVIERE DU LOUP!

Et Vive la Presse, Qui,
Dit-il, a Gagne Cette
Grande Victoire!

Mais Surtout le Globe

I have another question to answer. It was put by my deskmate, whom I like very much. When I went to Rivière du Loup my friends asked me who the senator was who made these remarks in the Senate:

> I know that many people in the Province of Quebec think that we in the West get a lot better treatment than they get in Quebec. However, we have two beautiful trains running through the town where I live, the Supercontinental and the Panorama. We would be pleased if those trains would even stop within 200 yards, so that we would only have to walk to them. But they do not stop at all, and I have to go all the way to Edmonton, 75 miles, to get either one of them. I think the people of Quebec are treated just as well as we are, perhaps even better.

I told them that Senator Stambaugh is my deskmate, that he is the best Liberal in the Senate, and that we are very good friends. With respect to his question I telephoned the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and I was informed that Bruce Township, 48R14 west of the 14th meridian—the whole township—had a population in 1961 of 342 people, and that the unincorporated Village of Bruce had a population of 171. If the crack trains of the C.N.R., and even of the C.P.R., have to stop at every village with a population of less than 200 people, I wonder if we shall ever have fast trains in this country.

My second answer to my honourable friend is that he does not have to travel 60 or 70 miles from Bruce to Edmonton, or to Wainwright, to catch a fast train, because when the Senate does not sit he lives in the City of Edmonton.

COMPANIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce with respect to Bill S-22, intituled: "An Act to amend the Companies Act".—(Honourable Senator Hayden).

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I have an unusual motion as chairman of the committee. I move:

That the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce be not now adopted, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration.

When the motion is put I will give my reasons for making it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Hon. Senator Hayden, seconded by Hon. Senator Crerar, that the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce be not now adopted, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration.

Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, the portion of this report dealing with the proposed new section 128B which the committee is proposing, appears to involve serious constitutional questions. The purpose of this section is to lead the way in company law to provide for an amalgamation and procedures for amalgamation between a federally incorporated company and a provincially incorporated company.

There are two things covered by Bill S-22 in respect of which this report relates. One is to put an amalgamation procedure in the federal act, providing for the amalgamation of two or more federal companies. That does not present any problem. The procedures we outlined by way of amendment are important, I think, and at the proper time I shall give an explanation of them. But, with respect to the other section we inserted, we received some submissions from organizations that appeared before us to the effect that when we were considering amalgamation we should consider it in its entirety and try to deal with the situation in regard to amalgamations involving one or more federal and one or more provincial companies.

We did that, but since the publication of the report questions have been raised which point to the fact that we are operating in what the constitutional lawyers like to call a grey area, in which the law is not too clear. I would say that in one aspect of what we are doing the law may be clear enough, but in its entirety I think I would have to agree that it is not absolutely clear. I felt that this question should be specifically considered by the committee before we finally put it forward, if indeed we are going to insist that it go forward as part of this report, and as part of this bill, which ultimately will go from this house to the House of Commons.

There are many good features in this bill, and particularly in the amendments that we have proposed, which would give a modern, up-to-date and more flexible federal statute. I would hate to think that we might imperil all of that by provoking a constitutional debate—we have had enough of those, and it looks as though some more are in the offing. The real merit of this bill, with the many provisions it makes by way of amendment, might get lost. I feel that instead of going ahead with the report at this time, in view of the fact that these questions have been raised, and seriously raised, the committee should be reconvened. Therefore, I am proposing that the committee reconvene this evening when the Senate rises, because we have not a great deal before us on the Order Paper. There we can consider this aspect, and also whether in the circumstances we should insist that this particular provision be incorporated in the amendments. That is my reason, after giving the matter full consideration, for making the motion I have made this evening.

We shall not delay consideration of this report. I am sure we can deal with the matter this evening, and present an amended report, if necessary, tomorrow afternoon and debate it.

There are times, particularly in presenting amendments in the legislative field, when one likes to pause and give a little more consideration to a situation if there is a feeling that within reason you may be provoking legal considerations and constitutional aspects that may be upsetting to business and corporate relationships. It is for this reason that I make this motion.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I congratulate honourable Senator Hayden for his caution in dealing with this legislation. As a member of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce I have found that he is an ideal chairman. I congratulate him wholeheartedly for the excellent work he does in that capacity.

Honourable colleagues, the provisions of this bill, after it is adopted, will become part of the Revised Statutes of Canada of some future year, after being studied by the commissioners who will be in charge of the revision of the Statutes. Many months ago, in March, a bill was passed by this chamber for the revision of the Statutes of Canada of 1952. It passed three readings in two sittings. That bill was explained very well by honourable Senator Choquette, with the clarity of a lawyer of great experience. We passed the bill, and since that time it has been one of the gems of the jewel box of the Orders of the Day of the House of Commons. I understand that precious stones are indestructible—they are everlasting. But I cannot conceive why a bill passed at two sittings of the Senate should still lie there for such a long time without having been adopted by the House of Commons. There seems to be no reason for it.

Honourable senators, it is important to appoint a commission for the revision of the statutes. The bill now before the Senate will be the object of the study of those who will have the duty of revising the whole statute book. I wonder if the gentlemen appointed to perform that work will use a chain saw and a big axe to cut all the deadwood to be found in the statute book. That would be a useful work.

I remember distinctly that some 30 years ago, in 1934, Mr. C. H. Cahan, then Secretary of State, sponsored a new Companies Act. That act is still in force and has not been amended for 30 years. That legislation was fully discussed in the House of Commons and in this chamber. It was far from perfect, but it lay in the statute book for 30 years without amendment. A few amendments are proposed now, probably to lower the water stock level and perhaps to evaporate it entirely, which would be a good thing.

Honourable senators, the only reason I give my limited support to this legislation is that, by an amendment, provision is being made for the approval of a judge, in the case of amalgamation. That is a wise course.

We will await the discussion in committee on this proposed legislation. I have high confidence in those honourable senators who sat on the subcommittee, as well as in all my colleagues who are members of the committee. I hope that we will have good company law, which can be understood by everyone and not by chartered accountants alone.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

Revised Capital Budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the year ending December 31, 1964, pursuant to section 80(2) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

PRIVATE BILLS

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF DENTISTS OF CANADA—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-44, to incorporate The Royal College of Dentists of Canada:

Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-44, to incorporate The Royal College of Dentists of Canada, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 4, line 13: Strike out "its business and affairs" and substitute therefor "the business and affairs of the College".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Honourable senators, the amendment is a simple one and is for the purpose of clarification. Section 11 of the bill, which refers to the making of by-laws, provides authority to make such by-laws as it may deem necessary; that is, this association, when it is incorporated, may pass by-laws for the government and management of its business and affairs. It was intended to apply to the government and management of the business and affairs of the college. The amendment makes that clarification; otherwise possibly "it" might be taken to refer back to "Council", which is used in the earlier sections of the bill.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): With leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF ACTUARIES—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-45, to incorporate Canadian Institute of Actuaries:

Your Committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-45, to incorporate Canadian Institute of Actuaries, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: With leave of the Senate, I move third reading now.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to delay passage of this bill, but I have a few words to say on it.

When the committee was considering this bill this morning I pointed out that I felt the public voice is lost when power is gained by a non-government, private agency over a public enterprise, by a body which is not publicly accountable and which determines matters of policy to the exclusion of public influence, without the right of appeal to some recognized authority. In my view, that is carrying the delegation of the powers of Parliament much too far and is jeopardizing the freedom of the individual.

I made the point this morning, but it did not register. I do not intend to hold up passage of the bill, but I make the point again at this time to indicate that this principle may plague us in the days to come.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HON. SYDNEY J. SMITH

FELICITATIONS ON GOLDEN WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, in a meeting of the Standing Committee on Divorce this morning I was authorized, indeed I was instructed, to make a report verbally, which I know is entirely out of order.

The report is to the effect that we have been informed that our colleague Senator Sydney Smith of British Columbia, and Mrs. Smith, will tomorrow celebrate their golden wedding anniversary. The committee also instructed me to wire Senator and Mrs. Smith our congratulations. To the congratulations of the members of the committee I would like to add those of the members of the house who wish to join with me—you may signify this by a round of applause, and we shall add that to the telegram.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I am sure the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) and I would wish to be associated with the sentiments expressed by Senator Roebuck this afternoon with respect to our esteemed colleague Senator Sydney Smith. I should like to add to the views expressed by Senator Roebuck how gratified we all are that Mrs. Smith has successfully put up with Senator Sydney for so long, and to remark that it is fairly obvious to all of us that Senator Sydney must indeed have married a child bride.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: As the Leader of the Government has said, I am very pleased to associate myself with these congratulations. May I also add, as far as Mrs. Smith is concerned, that I believe she has had a much easier task in putting up with her husband than have the wives of most senators in putting up with their husbands.

PRIVATE BILL

SETTLERS SAVINGS AND MORTGAGE CORPORATION—AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report of the committee on Bill S-46, to incorporate Settlers Savings and Mortgage Corporation:

> Your committee recommends that authority be granted for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French of its proceedings on the said bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden reported that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce had considered Bill S-46, to incorporate Settlers Savings and Mortgage Corporation, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

> Page 1, line 19: Strike out "Hypothèque" and substitute therefor "d'Hypothèques".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave, I move that the report be adopted now.

Honourable senators, this is a very simple amendment that was requested by the promoters of the bill. The word "Hypothèque" in the French title is changed by adding the letter "d" and an apostrophe, making it "d'Hypothèques". As I have said, this change was requested by the promoters, and we were happy to oblige them.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

COMPANIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FURTHER REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had further considered Bill S-22, to amend the Companies Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with certain amendments.

For text of amendments see appendix, pp. 1124-9.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave, I move that the report be taken into consideration now.

Honourable senators, you heard something about this bill last evening, when I made a motion to refer it back to committee for further consideration in relation particularly to one section proposed by the committee and having to do with amalgamation as it might apply in the case of one or more federal companies seeking to amalgamate with one or more provincial companies. The committee met last night after the Senate rose, and there was a remarkably good attendance. We discussed the advisability of proceeding with this particular amendment, and in view of all the circumstances it was finally decided by the committee that it should not proceed with it at this time.

The main reason for coming to that decision was that there are so many good things in the bill by way of amendment, and provisions which modernize to a considerable extent the Companies Act, which the committee felt might be imperiled if this particular amendment were in it when the bill is being considered in the other place. It was felt that this amendment might promote a full-scale discussion on the constitutional aspect, because in seeking to provide procedures by which a federal company and a provincial company might amalgamate we are stepping constitutionally on ground that is not clearly defined. It seemed to be the common view that there was a grey area.

I use that language not because I profess to be a constitutional lawyer, but because it does seem to be the language of those who are constitutional lawyers. When such experts are unable to give a definite answer on constitutionality—that is, where the cases do not clearly state whether a procedure is constitutional or unconstitutional—they talk about there being a grey area. This particular amendment seemed to be in such an area.

This suggested amendment gives leadership in this direction, and the method that we proposed to employ for that purpose is now a matter of record. In going that far we have possibly issued a challenge not only to the provincial authorities and the federal authority, but to lawyers and those in corporate operations, and eventually this field may be further explored to the end that a procedure can be worked out.

While the committee was sitting last evening it also made what we might call some incidental and consequential amendments to items that were already incorporated in the first report submitted to the Senate. Those amendments involved no change in substance. In other circumstances it was a further simplification of the arrangement within sections that we had drafted; provisions were made easier to read and to follow by dividing them into subparagraphs instead of having a whole provision in one paragraph.

I think the tone of the bill has improved as a result of the changes we made last night. The main thought I had in mind, in taking advantage of the occasion to do that, was that I would rather make those changes here and now than have the bill sent back to us from the other place with some suggestion that our language in this regard or our arrangement in another regard was not as it should be.

Having said that, I think I should touch on a few of the highlights of the report. I do not think it is important that I should go through the details of the bill and indicate the many changes, but possibly I could touch very briefly on some of the highlights.

The first point which I should like to mention is the question of the prospectus. When a federal company is proposing to offer shares to the public under the federal Companies Act, a prospectus must be filed with the Secretary of State. There are elaborate sections in our Companies Act at the present time, and have been since 1934, outlining the documentation which must be done and the information which must be furnished before you can offer shares to the public.

Since that act was drafted, our provinces have enlarged very considerably their securities laws, and of course there are securities laws in foreign countries. Notwithstanding that, a federal company might have to file documentation under the Ontario Securities Act, if it were going to offer shares to the public in Ontario; and if it were going to offer some of those shares in the United States of America, it would also be obligated to file documentation under the Securities Exchange Act in the United States. There would still be the requirement that you must in all those circumstances file under the federal act in detail all the required information.

This amounted almost to suffocation in the paper work involved. There was so much detail that one wondered which was the more important, the paper work or trying to hit the market at the right time in offering shares to the public.

The bill as it came to us provided that where there was an obligation under a provincial authority or under a foreign authority to file a prospectus or other document in connection with the offering of shares to the public, the requirement that you file under the federal Companies Act was waived. Then there was provision under which you could deposit a copy—true, as it came to us, it said "certified copy"—a copy certified by that public authority. That presented difficulties.

In addition we thought of cases where, under the provincial securities laws and under foreign securities laws, there are exempt transactions; that is, they have in their statutes transactions in respect of which you are exempt from the requirements of filing a prospectus. We thought that in those cases the exemption should also apply in relation to the obligation to file under the federal Companies Act. Therefore, we amended the section in the bill so as to provide this exemption or waiver, not only where there was an obligation to file but also in respect of transactions, offers of shares to the public, where the transactions were exempt.

We felt we could do this quite safely because there is a subclause in this particular clause of the bill which gives to the Secretary of State, notwithstanding this right of waiver, authority to demand that a prospectus, if he deems it to be in the public interest, be filed under the federal act in any event. We leave the matter of the requirement of procuring a certified copy of the filing with the provincial securities commission or the foreign securities commission. We toned down the requirement which was that you must produce a copy certified by that public authority, the obtaining of which might make for lengthy delays at times. Alternatively, the secretary of the company may certify under the seal of the company that this is a copy of the prospectus or other document that was filed and in that form is acceptable to the Secretary of State.

The next item is one which sparks a lot of interest these days, namely, the subject of disclosure. In the hearings which we had —and the members of the committee will recall this—we heard representations from quite a number of organizations, including The Canadian Bar Association, the Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto, and a number of other organizations. We also had submissions from a number of legal firms across Canada whose practice takes them into this field. We had recommendations on this question of disclosure, in the sense of what information those who are running the company should be obliged to disclose to the shareholders of the company.

I should tell you what our present law is under the Companies Act. It is that a director or officer who has been buying and selling shares of the company of which he is a director or officer during the year, must furnish to the secretary of the company, before the annual meeting, a statement of those tradings, and that statement is to be available at the annual meeting if any shareholder wants the information. That was felt to be a sort of haphazard, lackadaisical way of doing things. The bill went on to add another class, that is, any shareholder of the company who holds more than 10 per cent of the voting shares must furnish a statement of trades within 30 days of the trades to the secretary of the company, who must enter those in a book kept especially for this purpose, and that book is to be available for inspection by any shareholder during normal business hours of the day. Then it went on to require that the directors shall present the information which is contained in this book to the shareholders at the annual meetings.

Some of the objections that we had, especially from the chartered accountants, were to the effect that this might pile up a tremendous amount of paper. Their suggestion was that the obligation to file this information with the secretary of the company should be one where those officers and directors, and shareholders having more than 10 per cent of the outstanding voting shares, should file this information with the secretary of the company within 30 days from the end of the month in which the transactions took place.

Then we went on to recommend to this effect: instead of saying that the directors "shall present", we said "the directors shall disclose" to the shareholders at each annual meeting what is in this book. Then we put in another provision requiring the secretary of the company within 30 days after he has received this information on tradings to furnish a copy thereof to the Secretary of State so that it gets into a public place. There we make that information available without charge only to the shareholders of the company.

The concept that we had, if I may elaborate briefly, is that the Companies Act is intended to deal with relationships between shareholders and their company; we also felt that if you have directors and officers in a preferred position as to information with respect to the day-to-day operations of the company and its success or lack of it, and you have shareholders who have a commanding stock position as a result of which they might be in a position to get this information—in some cases it is called the "insiders" or "inside information"—we felt that the information should be available in a convenient way to the general body of shareholders.

We did not feel that this was information which should be published to the public at large, for two reasons. One was that this is more or less to level out the position of the ordinary shareholder in relation to other shareholders who are also officers and directors and who have a commanding stock position with greater access to information. Secondly, if there is any member of the public who for curiosity or for other purposes wants to find out what trading is going on, it is very simple for him—let him invest a few dollars in a share or two, and as a shareholder he would have a right to go in and inspect. We felt in this direction that this was fair enough. We have sections in the Companies Act which deal with the offering of shares to the public and the special conditions that must be satisfied. The matter of dealing with the public, in any event, is more in the provincial field.

Under the heading of Property and Civil Rights, you have the provincial securities commissions where there are elaborate requirements, where shares are to be offered to the public, which must be satisfied.

If the stock is listed, you have also very particular requirements as to the information you must present in listing the shares. Then there is the information you must add from time to time in amending the listing if there are any material changes in the organization or operation of the company. That is why we limited the scope of our requirements on disclosure in the amendment which we submit.

Under another heading in the federal act preferred shares were redeemable or could be purchased or cancelled out of what were called net liquid assets of the company available for that purpose, or if the company made an issue of shares with the intention of using the proceeds to redeem preferred shares that were already outstanding. We had many submissions on this subject. Many of them went to the point that this procedure inhibited the proper functioning, and presented difficulties in dealing with redemption or purchase of preferred shares for cancellation, where you were limited to such redemption or purchase of sales for cancellation out of the net liquid assets of the company.

We had recommendations that this section be eliminated, and provision made for a right of redemption or purchase for cancellation out of capital. Finally, we came to the conclusion that with some revision of section 61, which deals with redemption or purchase of preferred shares for cancellation, and some changes in language, etc., we would leave that section in, but we provided elsewhere in the bill for redemption of preferred shares out of capital. However, it is subject to the conditions in the Companies Act whereby, of course, the redemption out of capital cannot be done in circumstances where the company is insolvent, or where that redemption might lead to insolvency.

When Senator Vien introduced the bill on second reading, he gave some explanation of the provisions dealing with mutual fund shares. The committee felt that some of these provisions required clarification.

May I point out first the difficulty is that when you are talking about a mutual fund share you must consider the question, when is a share not a share? I suppose the answer is: when it is a mutual fund share, because a mutual fund share is a participating interest in a mutual fund which is operated by a company, and it is not in that sense a share of the company. However, over the years that mutual fund operations have been carried on they have used the language of our Companies Act.

You talk about redemption or purchase for cancellation. One of the essential conditions of a mutual fund share is that the holder of that share has the right to present it to the company at any time and at a price which is worked out according to a formula. The company must accept the surrender of it, and at that price. So we defined a mutual fund share in the bill which is now before you.

We also felt, and we had representations to this effect, that since the mutual fund shares now outstanding use the language "redemption or purchase for cancellation" in their letters patent or supplementary letters patent, when this bill becomes law, and the language would be "surrender or acceptance of surrender" of a mutual fund share, we should provide a bridge that would relate the earlier language to the words surrender or acceptance of surrender, which will hereafter be used. Accordingly, we provided that where letters patent or supplementary letters patent contain the words "redemption or purchase for cancellation", they shall mean "surrender or acceptance of surrender of the shares." Thus we have satisfied all representations, we have clarified the procedures, and you now have in the modern sense something that is workable and easily understood.

Then there was a provision in the bill which came to us putting some limitation on when a shareholder has a right to present his mutual fund share to a company and demand his money. The limitation would not permit him to do that when there was insolvency in the fund. However, where a mutual fund is set up there can never be insolvency, because your interest is a percentage of the mutual fund, whatever may be the amount of the fund. Therefore, we struck out those provisions.

I should tell you briefly that there is an amalgamation procedure in the bill. Its introduction in our federal Companies Act is new —it did not exist before. The procedure permits two or more federal companies to amalgamate. The committee made some changes, and there was some discussion in committee, which I shall relate. The bill as it came to us provided that if two federal companies were going to amalgamate and they settled on their amalgamation agreement, they must call meetings of the shareholders and of the various classes of shareholders of the companies going into amalgamation, and at such meetings called for that purpose 75 per cent of the shares of each class represented must be voted in favour of the amalgamation, or it does not carry.

The bill then went on to provide that after that was done the company must then go to the court, on notice to the dissenting shareholders and on notice to the creditors, to ask the court to sanction this amalgamation agreement. The majority in the committee came to the conclusion that when you are dealing with amalgamation procedures you are dealing with a straightforward commercial transaction, and not something in the nature of compromises and arrangements under the act, where they affect internally the rights of various classes of shareholders in one company.

The committee felt that these procedures requiring an application to the court should be reversed, and therefore we provided by way of amendment that when the shareholders have approved, then it is up to the dissenting shareholders who have at least 10 per cent of the shares of any class to go to the court if they want the court to annul the agreement.

So far as creditors are concerned, the committee felt they were amply taken care of when reference was made to these provisions for reduction of capital in the Companies Act, because if this amalgamation involved any reduction in the capital of the company, the committee felt it was sufficient if they were made subject to the reduction of capital provisions in the Companies Act. Those provisions deal specifically with such a situation and in that respect afford ample protection to the creditors.

In committee we finally came to a vote on which procedure was to be adopted, that is, whether or not the provisions of the bill paralleling the provisions for arrangements and compromises should be followed, requiring the company to go to court—and several senators thought that provision was good and should remain—or whether the provisions which we provided were the ones which should be in force. The view of the committee was that the right given to the dissenting shareholder to go to the court was to be preferred, and that is the form in which it is now before you.

An added view supporting the procedure recommended that there was a close similarity between amalgamation of two companies and one company selling its assets to the other company. Certainly, in the sale of assets by one company to another company there is no provision requiring that you must go to the courts. In some cases a majority of the shareholders only is required where you are selling the undertaking of the company. We felt, in the circumstances, that all the different interests were being amply and properly protected by what we have done.

I should now tell you about the printing of restrictions governing preferred shares. All those conditions under the law must be printed on the back of the certificate. As the ingenuity of man has increased, with his ability to devise and create additional types of preferred and deferred shares and conditions, these conditions became yards and yards long, and the obligation to put them on the back of a certificate required equal ingenuity, very often to the point that the conditions had to be reduced photographically, and the print became so small that a magnifying glass should have been provided with each certificate in order to read it. We agreed to leave in the law the provision requiring the conditions to be put on the back of the certificate, but we added, alternatively, a provision that there could be a notice printed on the certificate to the effect that these shares were subject to conditions and limitations etc., and that a copy of those could be procured without charge from the secretary of the company.

Another question arose of a similar nature in connection with the seal. There was a provision in the bill as it came forward to us, that the English name and the French name of the company must appear on the seal. Knowing how long the names of some companies are, by the time you get both of them on the seal of the company some of them are going to be as big as a pie pan, or even larger. We left that provision in but we added to it, alternatively, that the company might have two seals, which would be equally valid; so the company could have one seal for the English name and another for the French name.

Before I conclude, I should mention a few other matters. For instance, under the federal Companies Act, a director, in order to be elected or appointed, must be a shareholder. Under practically all of provincial statutes of which I know, as, for instance, in Ontario, the provision is that if he is an elected director and qualifies by acquiring shares within ten days afterwards, that is sufficient to meet the requirement. So we have put a provision of that kind in the federal act.

We have also brought the federal act into conformity with many of the provincial ones in the matter of proxies, because the federal act required that the proxy must himself be a shareholder. Showing a preference for the broader provision in the provincial acts, we have adopted the position that the proxy need not himself be a shareholder.

You will be pleased to note that all the schedules that are attached to the Companies Act are to be repealed by this bill. The thinking behind that is that the statute is explicit as to what must be included in a petition for incorporation, and all the forms that are provided are so out of date in relation to the methods and what is to be included in petitions to incorporate companies nowadays, with the various classes of stock, etc., that usually they are not used. A solicitor who is preparing the papers has the whole thing typed out anyway. As Mr. Lesage, the director of the Companies and Corporations Branch, says, "By eliminating the forms, maybe I am not a good civil servant, but at least the lawyers will have to work a little harder to prepare the material to present to the Department of the Secretary of State." Perhaps there is something in that.

We took advantage of the opportunity to tidy up many other provisions, and include others not already in the bill. We had requests which we considered and weighed carefully, and then we made certain changes; but I think you can understand those from reading the report.

Before I close, I want to say that we had at least half a dozen meetings of the Banking and Commerce Committee on this bill. On most of those occasions we heard witnesses and had briefs presented to us, some by individuals who did not appear as witnesses and others who appeared. There was very full discussion and questioning. Then we had a number of meetings of the main committee to discuss various headings—some of those I have discussed with you today—and to get the view of the committee.

Then we appointed a subcommittee which sat even during recesses of the Senate and worked on its own. Finally, it produced, for better or for worse, the document which is now before you. I must commend the efforts of the members of that subcommittee, and in a particular way the efforts of two who were so faithful in their attendance and so expert in the contributions they made. I refer to Senator Leonard and Senator Choquette. Some members of that subcommittee were not at as many meetings as others, but we held meetings at which every member had his say. The document that resulted is the one you received the other night. Then we had cause for further reflection and went back at it last night, and this is the result of the combined thinking of the members of the committee, for you to accept, reject or amend as you, in your judgment, may think fit.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, as you all know, I am not a corporation lawyer, and it would be presumptuous on my part to try to add anything to what has already been so clearly explained by the chairman of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You look like one.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: However, I would like to speak for a moment or two in connection with the motion for the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on Bill S-22, to amend the Companies Act.

I believe that the report speaks for itself. Over fifty amendments to the bill, some of great importance and others of lesser importance, are now commended for the favourable consideration of the Senate. I have already concurred in them, and I support them unconditionally. However, I would like to speak, not so much of the substance of the amendments as of the process and procedure which have brought this project to fruition.

I was much honoured at having been asked to serve on the subcommittee appointed by the main committee to consider the representations made by many responsible bodies representing Canada's lawyers, accountants, manufacturers, and others, and to report on the bill to the main committee.

I do not flatter myself that my appointment was due to any particular expertise on my part in the field of corporation law, but I need hardly add that some of the best qualified people in Canada in that field did serve on the subcommittee.

Let me name my colleagues on that subcommittee: Senator Molson, one of Canada's leading industrialists; Senator Leonard, an outstanding corporation lawyer and executive; Senator Bouffard, a leader in corporation law of the Bar of Quebec; Senator Cook, a leading corporation lawyer and executive from Newfoundland; Senator Walker, a leader of the Ontario Bar in corporation matters; and Senator Wallace McCutcheon, who, in addition to being a lawyer—he says he has reformed—and an outstanding industrialist, is, I understand, in some way qualified as an actuary! I will speak of Senator Hayden in a moment.

For myself, I was available and, to my great satisfaction and advantage, was in regular attendance, as Senator Hayden has already told you. At the numerous meetings of the subcommittee, I confess I learned much more than I was able to impart. I was tremendously impressed by the devotion and capacity exerted in the matter by all members of the subcommittee under the distinguished and dedicated leadership of Senator Hayden, who is, of course, the chairman of the main committee and was zealous in his other capacity as chairman of the subcommittee.

A thorough and exhaustive job of work was done, and I feel bound to say that this particular project provided a prime example of the quiet, hard work performed by the committees and, indeed, subcommittees of the Senate, work which is in the main unheralded and unsung, but which will be reflected for years to come, to the general advantage of all Canadians, in the statute books of this country.

In closing, honourable senators, I think we owe a vote of thanks to our able and willing Law Clerk, Mr. Hopkins, as well as to another able man in the Department of the Secretary of State, the brother of Premier Lesage of the Province of Quebec.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I do not wish to detain the chamber for more than a few moments. Even if Senator Choquette had not said what he did, I believe it would be only proper for the Leader of the Government in this chamber to rise on this occasion, first of all, to thank the chairman and the members of this committee for the monumental task they have undertaken and discharged. This bill consisted of 42 printed pages when it came to the Senate. It was a voluminous bill. The amendments that were made by the subcommittee, were concurred in by the main committee, and which are now about to be approved by the Senate, comprised some ten pages of small printed material. This is one of the major and most voluminous pieces of legislation to come before Parliament this session.

Senator Choquette has said a great deal about the dedication and the capacity of the members both of the subcommittee and the main committee. I know the press will not bother with this particular portion of the debate. Nevertheless, this is an invaluable service rendered by dedicated parliamentarians to Parliament and to the country. I believe when the opportunity presents itself this fact should be pointed out. This is one of those occasions. This is the Senate operating at its best. This is a second chamber doing something that is invaluable for the country.

You might get this kind of expertise if you obtained the services of individual members of the bar, the profession of accountancy and from the ranks of business and industry in this country—if you could find a suitable forum. But, in addition to that, to have men who are experienced in dealing with legislation do this work in this most thorough, objective and nonpartisan way is a credit to our parliamentary institutions.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: And to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Of course, to the Senate too. I hope that when people talk about what the Senate can do they will remember a performance like this.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): With leave of the Senate, I move third reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965, presented the following report:

> The Standing Committee on Finance to whom was referred the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

For text of report see appendix, pp. 1130-4.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Hon. F. W. Gershaw): Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard, with leave of the Senate, moved that the report be taken into consideration now.

He said: Honourable senators, I understand that mimeographed copies of the report of the committee are now being distributed in the chamber, and of course the report will also be printed in today's proceedings. In the meantime with the assistance of these mimeographed copies you will be able to follow the report.

I should start by offering a word of apology for the short notice given when calling this morning's meeting of the committee. The steering committee decided last evening that it was desirable that the committee should meet today, and we agreed to meet at two o'clock so as to have an opportunity to consider the report. Then we discovered that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce was meeting at two o'clock to consider the Bank of British Columbia bill. With the co-operation of the chairman of that committee, we managed to work in a committee meeting at 11 o'clock this morning. While a notice of the meeting appeared on the bulletin board when I came in at eight o'clock this morning, and I received mine quite early, I understand that some members of the committee did not receive their notices in time to attend. Nevertheless, there was an excellent attendance at the meeting and the committee did receive the report and considered it for submission to the house this afternoon.

While I intend to proceed with the explanation of the report today in the hope that it will be helpful to honourable senators, the debate can, if necessary, be adjourned so that members may have an opportunity of studying the report and at a later date debate and discuss it at length.

I should also pay tribute to the members of the committee who have participated in the discussions and in the preparation of the report. I mention this particularly in view of the fact that the attendance at the meetings was excellent, even when the Senate was not in session. We received faithful, loyal and competent service in the committee.

This report might be divided into three main divisions. The first is made up of paragraphs numbered 1 to 15, which refer generally to such matters as the form of the estimates, their preparation, and certain remarks dealing with procedures and the character of the estimates. The second division deals with what is called the Glassco Report recommendations, and the third or final division deals with the estimates in general.

Coming now to the first division of the report and beginning at paragraph No. 4, I would call attention to the fact that:

> This is the first occasion since 1956 that the Estimates have been referred to a committee of the Senate. Prior to 1956, the Finance Committee under the chairmanship of the Honourable Senator Crerar, and later of Honourable Senator Hawkins, studied the estimates and made reports thereon which were helpful and valuable. In the interval, since 1956, an important development that has taken place is a report, officially known as the "Report of the Royal Commission on Government Organization" but more commonly called the Glassco Report after the distinguished Chairman of the commission.

Our report deals with this later on.

Then, in connection with the estimates you will see on page 2 a description of how the estimates are prepared and the procedures adopted before they finally reach Parliament. For example, work on this year's estimates started on July 1, 1963, when the departments had to submit to the Treasury Board their plans for expenditures, and establishments, that is, as to the numbers of staff they would need. When these are received by the Treasury Board they are analysed, studied, discussed and if necessary revised. Discussions take place between the deputy ministers of the departments and the Treasury Board, and then the ministers who constitute the Treasury Board meet and deal with the estimates and have further discussions with the ministers of the various departments. The resulting recommendations go to the cabinet which makes a final decision, following which the estimates are printed and placed before Parliament. Generally they are tabled in Parliament on the first day of February preceding the year for which the estimates are provided. In other words the estimates for 1964-65, covering expenditures from April 1, 1964 to March 31, 1965, normally would have been tabled on February 1, 1964. Actually they were tabled on March 3, 1964.

Then on page 2 at paragraph 8 the report goes on to say:

> In the light of the time factor involved in this procedure, it is understandable that from time to time during a fiscal year supplementary estimates are prepared and submitted to Parliament to cover expenditures unforeseen at the time of the preparation of the main estimates, or resulting from subsequent legislative action.

In this year we have had three such supplementary estimates, including Supplementary Estimates (C) tabled two days ago. As of November 24, 1964, when this report was prepared, the estimates had not yet been approved by Parliament and therefore no final supply bill has been voted by Parliament for the expenditures for this year.

> Because it has been necessary to supply the government with money on account so that it may carry on the business of the country, some five interim supply bills have been passed by Parliament so far this year, providing generally for expenditures for nine months and, in some cases, for ten or eleven months. It > is an anomalous situation that most of the money has been spent before Parliament has approved the expenditures themselves.

The procedure that has been described in this report is consistent with the pattern that has been followed for some years.

> It is familiar to all members of Parliament and need not have been set out in this report, were it not for the fact that in recent years criticisms have been voiced that seem to warrant examination.

Then, reading on from paragraph 11:

> It is far from satisfactory to have so long a period of time elapse before the final vote of supply by Parliament and to have so much money spent before the estimates have been approved. Having in mind the increasing multiplicity and magnitude of parliamentary duties, it would be desirable to bring about an earlier disposition of the estimates and the consequent bill or bills of supply. In this connection it is noteworthy that in the United Kingdom 26 days before August 5th of each session are given for the consideration of the annual estimates on supply. Therefore, there is a limit on the debate and a deadline for the final passing of supply.
> 12. The consideration of the estimates has traditionally provided an opportunity for debate, not confined to the items of expenditure, but also on grievances, within relevant limits, against the executive government. Indeed, at times this aspect of the debate may completely overshadow consideration of the financial items themselves.
> 13. The Senate as an integral part of Parliament has to debate and vote upon supply bills before they are passed. Traditionally, it has exercised both the above-described functions when dealing with supply bills, namely, scrutinizing expenditures and airing any grievances which honourable senators may have against the executive government. Depending on circumstances, therefore, a debate could take two or three days, or no longer than one day.
> 14. In so far as the financial aspect of supply bills is concerned, so long as the estimates are referred to the Finance Committee at each session, an opportunity is provided for the examination and scrutiny of expenditures. As to the other aspect, the airing of grievances, the rules of the Senate do provide other opportunities for members to raise such questions. Nevertheless, it is desirable to preserve and protect our rights in this respect in the debate on supply bills. Unfortunately, it has happened on a number of occasions over the past ten years that the Senate has been faced with an indirect form of closure forced upon it by the pressure of events and primarily caused by the insufficiency of time between the date a supply bill reaches the Senate and the deadline by which the Government's legislative authority to spend would be exhausted.
> 15. Your committee calls attention to this situation in the hope that ways and means may be found to bring about an earlier and speedier disposition of the estimates and of the Supply Act or Acts based thereon, and to express its willingness to deal with such estimates with promptness and dispatch to meet any earlier deadline that Parliament may wish to prescribe.

So far the committee's report deals with the preparation, and form of, and the procedure in connection with, the estimates, and the comments that the committee has to make thereto. We then come to the sections dealing with the report of the Glassco Commission. At the foot of page 4 the report includes what the Glassco Commission says, and which epitomizes their approach to the estimates.

> The conclusion is inescapable that the present procedures in developing and reviewing the estimates are wasteful and inefficient. The form of the estimates does not permit intelligent criticism and, in placing the major emphasis on the nature of expenditure rather than on its real purpose, the matters coming under senior review are the less important details of administrative judgment. Any valid assessment of performance by departmental management is excluded and it is virtually impossible to form any objective judgment from the estimates as to the desirability of continuing, modifying or enlarging specific programs in the public interest.

The report then continues:

> Your committee concurs in general with this analysis.

The report then proceeds to deal with certain specific recommendations of the Glassco Commission, and it reads:

> (a) That the number of votes be reduced and all cost elements of individual programs be consolidated within the same vote.

Our comment there shows that in 1961-62 there were 495 votes in our estimates, which number was over three times that currently used in the United Kingdom. In the current estimates for 1964-65 those votes have been reduced to approximately 240 in number, and no doubt there can be a further reduction.

The second recommendation of the Glassco Commission considered by the committee is:

> (b) That departmental estimates should be prepared on the basis of programs of activity and not by standard objects of expenditure.

Your committee's comment on that is that it agrees that the primary emphasis in the estimates should be on the "program" rather than on the standard objects of expenditures. The report continues:

> The significance of an expenditure must be related to the purpose for which it is being incurred. Departments should justify their estimates by relating them directly to the program that occasions them and, in turn, justify the program as being worth the amount expended upon it, not only on its own account but also in competition with other needs for which money is required. This change however should not take place at the expense of omitting relevant details such as are contained in the standard objects of expenditures.

The next recommendation is:

> (c) That the establishment review should be part of the overall review process of expenditures.

Your committee says that the logic of this proposition is self-evident.

The next recommendation is:

> (d) That all departments and agencies should be required to prepare and submit to the executive long-term plans of expenditure requirements by programs, and that based thereon an overall forecast of Government expenditures and prospective resources for a period of five years ahead should be prepared annually.

Without reading it all, the report says in the last sentence of the next paragraph:

> The use of such a forecast does not involve a decision to agree with projected expenditures but its value would lie in preventing decisions being made currently that would not take into account the future consequence of that decision by itself, and also in the context of its relative effect on overall operations.

Then we come to the most significant of the Glassco Commission's recommendations in respect of the estimates, namely:

> (e) That departments and agencies be given the necessary financial authority and be held accountable for the effective management of the financial resources placed at their disposal.

In essence, this means decentralization of financial responsibility.

The report continues:

> The theory supporting it is that by making a department itself responsible for its financial expenditure, it will exercise that responsibility more effectively and economically than if some outside body is, as the report puts it, "likened to a policeman patrolling the departments to ensure financial rectitude."
> Your committee desires to sound a word of caution in connection with this recommendation. The change, of itself, will not automatically bring about the desired improvement. Its success will depend upon how the key personnel in the civil service respond to the challenge involved in this delegation of greater responsibility to them, and assume the higher degree of accountability for the efficient and economical financial management of departmental affairs. In each department there must be a fully qualified and competent financial administrator under the deputy minister. In this connection your committee has noted with approval that a course for training such personnel has now been set up in the Civil Service. It is to be hoped, but it still remains to be seen, that skilled and competent internal financial management within departments will bring about greater efficiency and savings.

It should be made clear, perhaps, that such extension of authority within the department refers only to expenditures authorized by Parliament. Indeed, the change may well require even greater vigilance and a more careful scrutiny of public expenditures by the executive and by Parliament.

The next recommendation of the Glassco Commission is:

> That the costs of major common services be charged to user departments.

The committee's comment on this is:

> At present in many instances free services are provided to various departments of government, among which might be mentioned accommodation, furniture, power, franked mail, superannuation and other employee benefits. Your committee agrees with the principle of this recommendation and, so long as its implementation does not superimpose an elaborate or expensive system, it is desirable that the costs of such services should be charged to the user department of them.

The next recommendation is:

That where appropriate, revenues be offset against related expenditure, and that votes be shown in the estimates and controlled on a net basis.

The committee's comment on that is:

As the Glassco Report states, it is normal in industrial budgeting to relate revenues and costs. In government those revenues derived from services rendered are generally only incidental. Your committee agrees in principle with this recommendation of the Glassco Report and we have noted that the officials of the Treasury Board are studying the practical problems it presents for the purpose of seeing how far the desired result can be achieved.

There are other recommendations contained in the Glassco Commission's report that do not relate to the estimates, but your committee dealt only with those that did relate to the estimates. The report emphasizes that decisions to spend are, in the first instance, decisions of government policy, and that even Parliament's control over such decisions must be viewed in the light of our system of responsible government. The report continues:

Therefore, the total amount of the estimates and the objects thereof are the primary responsibility of the government of the day and, once those decisions have been made, the most that management can do, and in practice parliamentary scrutiny also, is to see that the expenditures are made as efficiently and as economically as possible, and without waste, extravagance or duplication.

I come now to the final part of this report, which reads:

20. In addition to its studies of the Glassco recommendations, your committee inquired into a number of matters concerning the estimates in general and also as to particular items. The questions and the answers submitted by the Treasury Board officials appear in the printed proceedings of the committee, with suitable appendices where required, and for the purposes of this report it is sufficient to say that all relevant information was obtained upon the items as to which members were concerned.

21. The following observations are made as to the estimates in general. The main estimate for 1964-65 totalled $6,703,513,508, or $84,378,008 more than those of the previous year. It should be noted, however, that there was a substantial reduction in the current estimates of the Department of National Defence from those of the preceding year, amounting to $109,000,455.

It would be misleading, however, to compare the estimates of respective years without taking into account the supplementary estimates. In the current year supplementary estimates have been filed totalling $221,763,280 and the Minister of Finance in his budget speech in March estimated that the total expenditure for the year would be about $7,125,000,000 or $233,000,000 more than in the preceding year, an increase of a little more than 3 per cent. It is interesting to follow the trend of increases in expenditures over past years, and a table of the history for 10 years is appended.

I think the table is on the copies of the report that you have in your hands. You will find it of interest to see just what percentage of increase has taken place in each year since 1955. On the average, it would be more than the 3 per cent that has taken place in this last year. Sometimes it has run as high as 9 per cent and sometimes it has been as low as 1 per cent.

This year's percentage increase in federal expenditures should also be viewed in relation to the 8 per cent increase in the Gross National Product of Canada for the current calendar year over the preceding year, as currently estimated.

In the course of its deliberations, your committee considered the place of crown corporations and agencies with relation to the estimates. Some of them do not appear in the estimates at all and others appear with inadequate information. Having in mind that the purpose of the estimates is to enable Parliament to scrutinize the financial operations of government, your committee believes it would be useful on another occasion to examine the financial statements of one or more crown corporations and to give the managements thereof the opportunity to testify as to their operations. Your committee would be prepared to undertake such action if the Senate in the future should deem this advisable.

Your committee desires to record its thanks and its appreciation for the evidence submitted by those senior officials of government who appeared before it and their courtesy and co-operation.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the debate on the consideration of this report, I think it is only fitting that I, as a member of the committee not heard from too often, should pay a tribute to our chairman. I hope this is not a usual course, that anyone who presents a report should have bouquets thrown at him.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Why not?

Hon. Mr. Haig: The honourable Leader of the Government has mentioned quite often the work of the committees in the Senate. This committee report, I think, breaks new ground, in that we have discussed and considered certain aspects of the Glassco Commission Report and certain recommendations made therein. These certainly will affect the operation of the estimates and the financial arrangements of the Government and their consideration by both houses of Parliament.

Therefore, I have pleasure in moving adjournment of this debate until the next sitting of the house, so that the members may read this report. I would recommend that they also read the reports of the proceedings of the Finance Committee.

In closing, I repeat the attitude of all members in the committee, in expressing appreciation of the help and co-operation given to the committee by its chairman, honourable Senator Leonard.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, debate adjourned.

CONGO ATROCITIES

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY TO RELATIVES OF VICTIMS

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I believe that no one in this chamber has yet said a word about the enormous tragedy which has taken place in the Congo. I have been mindful of it because I am familiar in my travels with the Bible Institute at Three Hills, Alberta.

I noticed in the press that a Canadian missionary was over in the Congo with his wife and six sons. He was one of those who was shot and killed, and two of the boys were slightly wounded.

Of course, from all over Canada people serve as missionaries, in foreign fields, to assist the less fortunate people in any way they can.

It is sad that this tragedy should occur, in this day and age. Although one might say the Congo is a long distance away, it is only about one day's travelling time by modern means of transportation.

Perhaps we should check a little to see if some mistake was made, to see if some of the loss of life could have been avoided. I hope we might learn something for the future, that might save the lives of people who go out as missionaries. There are several missionary sisters who are not accounted for yet.

Honourable senators, I would like to extend my heartfelt sympathy to the families who have lost their relatives in the Congo.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 1, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

HON. W. ROSS MACDONALD, P.C. AND HON. NORMAN MCL. PATERSON

FELICITATIONS ON APPOINTMENT AS UNIVERSITY CHANCELLORS

Hon. Olive L. Irvine: Honourable senators, may I be permitted this afternoon to pay honour to two of our most beloved senators on the high honour that has been bestowed upon them recently.

Senator Ross Macdonald was a few weeks ago appointed Chancellor of Waterloo Lutheran University, succeeding the late Senator Euler. I congratulate you, Senator Macdonald, and I know that you will grace the position with dignity and charm.

Our second colleague to be honoured is a native of my own Province of Manitoba, a great Canadian, in the person of Senator Norman McL. Paterson. He is a man I have honoured and admired for many years. His qualities are the qualities of the heart—he is gentle, honourable and sympathetic. Throughout the years his heart has gone out to many good causes, and in his own quiet way he has been a benefactor to many. In the western provinces he has been active throughout the years, in its rural and urban development, and still maintains that position in the great organization which bears his name. Although he is now a resident of Ottawa, we of the Prairie Provinces look upon him with strong affection.

In late October, Senator Paterson accepted the invitation to become the first Chancellor of Lakehead University, situated in Port Arthur, Ontario. His long association with the Lakehead in the past, and his continuing interest, will add immeasurably to the stature and position of the university throughout Canada.

The Lakehead College of Arts, Science and Technology will change its status from its present form to that of a full university and will grant degrees in arts in the spring of 1965.

The emergence of the college into the status of a university marks a monumental achievement by citizens of Northwestern Ontario. The years between the inception of the college and its present buoyant position are few, indeed, emphasizing the drive and determination of a community in which the senator was an ardent and intelligent leader. It is a happy and a fitting circumstance that Senator Paterson shall be the head of the new university, and I, along with all my colleagues, will agree that the appointment was richly and justly deserved.

May we extend to you, honourable senator, our warmest and most sincere congratulations.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all indebted to the honourable senator from Lisgar (Hon. Mrs. Irvine), who has just spoken. I assure her, as well as our two colleagues to whom she referred, how much we endorse all she has said.

Senator Macdonald has given many years of service to Parliament and, indeed, to Canada. Throughout his great career he has been most interested in the training of young Canadians. Now, as Chancellor of one of our growing universities, he will be able to give still further direction in that field.

Senator Paterson has been a captain of industry—perhaps a captain in a very special sense. He has done much in the development of the economy of this country, and he has contributed greatly to furthering the cause of higher education in many places.

We are all honoured to be associated with these two distinguished Canadians as their colleagues in the Senate.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I must say that I am taken completely by surprise by the gracious words uttered by Senator Irvine.

It had not been my intention to be present in the chamber this afternoon, but when I heard that Senator Leonard was to bring in his report on the way the finances of the country should be administered, I came in to hear what he had to say. To my surprise, I heard the remarks which have just been made by Senator Irvine and Senator Connolly, which I greatly appreciate.

A few days ago, Senator Vaillancourt referred to my appointment. Therefore, I wish to thank the two senators who have spoken this afternoon and also Senator Vaillancourt.

Waterloo Lutheran University is a young institution. At any time it would have been a high honour for me to be its Chancellor, but I consider it an even higher distinction in view of the fact that its first Chancellor was one of our colleagues, now deceased, the honourable Senator Euler. I hope I shall be able to carry on in the fine tradition established by him.

The university of which Senator Paterson will become Chancellor is younger than Waterloo Lutheran, but I should point out that the latter dates back to about the year 1910, at which time it was a theological college. Shortly after, it widened its interests and embraced the study of the arts generally, and its two or three enrolments in 1911 have since expanded to approximately 4,600, and the number is growing. It is indeed a young and growing university.

I would also like to point out that although the university bears the name "Lutheran," it is open to students from all denominations. The majority of the students are not Lutherans, but are from the Anglican Church, the Roman Catholic Church, the United Church of Canada, and the Presbyterian Church. Indeed, the university welcomes students from all denominations and from all parts of Canada.

Honourable senators, the position of Chancellor is almost wholly honorary, but he is required to be present at convocations and to confer degrees. I learned recently that the first degree I shall confer will be upon the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. I trust that as time progresses, at least one of your sons, grandsons, or great-grandsons, will appear at Waterloo Lutheran University in the role of Prime Minister of Canada, and receive a degree from its Chancellor of that day.

Hon. Norman McL. Paterson: Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to thank Senator Irvine and the other senators who have spoken, for their kind remarks. To be a chancellor of a university is for me a new experience, for I did not have the good fortune of a college education.

I am glad to hear Senator Macdonald say that all that will be required of the Chancellor will be the conferring of degrees at convocations. I look forward to that duty with a good deal of apprehension, but I am assured it can be done.

I shall not be required to assume my duties until after the New Year, because the college will not begin to assume the dignity of a university until 1965. However, I visited it the other day. It is an exciting, growing enterprise, with pile-driving, cement blocks, and mud everywhere, and with classes already in progress in some of the rooms. I am confident that it will eventually become a great university.

Thank you again for your kind remarks.

PRIVATE BILL

INTERPROVINCIAL PIPE LINE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson moved the second reading of Bill S-42, respecting Interprovincial Pipe Line Company.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-42 is indeed a simple one. Its purposes are fully set out in the explanatory notes. You will see that the purpose is to divide each of its present 40 million authorized shares of par value of $5 each into five shares of the par value of $1 each.

The bill also sets out the reasons for this move, which are to enable the smaller investor more easily to take part in the growing and prosperous company, and also to enable some of the company employees to participate in the future prosperity of the company.

In this latter connection, the company has a voluntary employees' savings plan by which the employees are enabled to invest in the shares of the company, if they wish. It is for both these reasons that a division of the stock would be of great benefit.

At the present time the stock has risen to a rather high market value. In the explanatory notes you will see that in June the shares of the company had a market value of approximately $85 each. In the intervening months that value has again risen, and in recent weeks the shares of the company have been selling at approximately $95. As you will appreciate, this is a high price for a small investor to pay. The ordinary man on the street who has a little money to invest would certainly rather have five or ten shares of a stock selling at, say, $10 or $20 a share than one or two shares of a stock selling at $100 or $200 a share. It is also true that employees investing some small part of their savings would find a price of, say, $95 rather high for their purposes. In some cases it might mean buying fractions of shares. As I say, this $95 price has the effect of limiting the number and types of people who can invest, although it is naturally a source of some gratification to the shareholders.

As I must disclose my own interest, I should say at this point that I am a modest shareholder. While I am happy to see the price has reached this $95 level, nevertheless I am only a name on a list. I do not attend company meetings, and I do not know most of the officers of the company. However, I am quite content for them to manage that small part of my funds as long as they continue to administer the company in the way they have over the last few years.

Before dealing with the splitting of these shares I would like to say a few words about the background of the company. The history of this company is very short, but it is also extremely interesting. It is only 15 years old, having been incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1949. In that very short period it has become a complete success story. It was financed entirely by private capital, and operates a pipe line system which now extends some 3,428 miles from the Redwater field in Alberta to Toronto and Buffalo in the east. It is an oil pipe line—carrying mostly crude oil, not gas—in which some $312 million had been invested by the end of 1963. Last year some 172 million barrels of crude oil were delivered by the system. This works out at an average of over 470,000 barrels a day. So, it is a sizable operation.

As I stated a moment ago, the company has been a complete success, has good earnings and has made an excellent return to its shareholders. This is so in spite of a progressive policy on the part of the company over the years since its inception to reduce its rates for moving oil. This has been done several times since the company commenced operations, and during that relatively short period the cost of moving crude oil through its system has been reduced by 42 per cent, which is a sizable reduction.

In that connection I would like to mention one item that appeared in the annual report for 1963, which says:

> Rate reductions of 2 cents per barrel on the movement from Edmonton to Sarnia and 3 cents per barrel from Edmonton to Toronto were made with lesser reductions for the medium haul movements. The rates for the short haul movements were not adjusted. The Company further reduced its transportation charges by relinquishing half of the allowance oil normally charged in pipe line operations for handling and evaporation losses. This represented about 1¼ cents per barrel cost reduction to all shippers.

In other words, it not only reduced its tariff by the two or three cents I mentioned, but also reduced the normal quantity of allowance oil, representing a further 1¼ cents per barrel cost reduction.

Its record from the day it started business has been that of a clean-cut operation in which, I feel, its management and directors should take great pride. As it has grown it has become one of the large companies of the country, and I think all of us could take some pride in its very existence and the way its operations have been conducted.

To return to the question of the splitting of shares, the company appeared before Parliament again in 1952, at which time it requested that its original shares of a par value of $50 be split 10 for one, to a par value of $5. At that time the price had reached approximately $180 a share on the original stock, which was considered to be too high. The new stock was listed and proceeded to be traded at about $18 a share after that 10-for-one split. That is the same stock that is now being sold in the $95 range.

I might also mention that by 1952, when the bill was introduced to split the original stock 10 for one, the company had already introduced a voluntary employees' savings plan, which has now been in existence for more than 12 years.

When success stories like this are mentioned I believe there is a great tendency on the part of people to think there is something sinister or evil afoot, or at least that perhaps there is something hidden. I would like to say that if this company can be criticized for anything, it is only that it has been such a complete success. I do not think there is anything concealed, anything hidden. It is a straightforward transportation operation which, as I say, has been tremendously successful.

To counter the suggestion that splitting stock could in any way be considered unusual, I would only draw your attention to the fact that it is indeed a common practice for successful companies; whereas, the company that is not doing well will not very likely try to split its stock because it will neither help the officers nor the shareholders, nor will it increase the earnings. By way of contrast, I would say there are few large, successful companies that have not at some stage or other split their shares. I have here a list of companies which split their shares in 1963 and 1964. I do not know whether it is complete, but in 1963 there were 14 substantial companies which split their shares, and in 1964 a further 14 large Canadian companies did so. That illustrates the point that this is not an exceptional request.

The only reason we take particular notice of this fact is that in such a case as this, a company incorporated by Parliament must apply to Parliament. A company incorporated under the Companies Act merely holds a shareholders' meeting and applies for supplementary letters patent.

I would say, honourable senators, that the motives or reasons for introducing this bill are good; it is quite justifiable for us to assist the company to carry out its objectives in splitting its shares. If second reading is given to this bill, as I submit it should, I will be glad to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, as a rule I am opposed to this idea. As the senator very well explained, this is a successful company and has been doing this sort of thing right along.

We hear a lot of talk about encouraging Canadians to invest their money in companies connected with transporting Canadian oil and so forth. But I can think of a number of companies where Canadians have not had an opportunity to do so. I certainly do not remember ever having had an opportunity of doing so. But I do remember being pressed very hard by companies that were no good and just took my money. The real killings were made by companies of which I had never heard, and their stocks and shares had been taken up before any Canadian heard about them.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Perhaps you were not in on the ground floor. You could have got in on the first floor.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes—the second floor up; but that would not have been very profitable since I did not know anything about it nor did any other Canadian. I think if the company was prospering and their shares were up to $200 or $300 each it would have been right to call the attention of the Canadian people to that fact. Actually, people got the impression that the stock had not gone up at all.

I wanted to get in this complaint that no attempt has been made to sell good companies to Canadians. I know one company, the Redfern Oil Company of California, who were to come to Calgary. They did so, and they took $30 million profit from there, and then they sold the company back again and took their millions. There was no effort made to sell that stock to Canadians.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, I want to say a word or two on this bill. I know very little of the company concerned, but the president is my next-door neighbour. He is a very competent and honest businessman. We have had some business dealings together, and between us have acquired some property in our neighbourhood. I have found him to be competent and honest. I just wanted to make this point clear.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: I can commiserate with Senator Horner because I did not have the opportunity of getting in on the ground floor either, but I did have an opportunity of getting in on the first floor, and that was back in 1953. I spoke to a gentleman who was quite a financial wizard and one who was a recognized leader in the business world. I asked him about buying this stock at $18 a share, I think it was, and he told me not to buy it because it was overcapitalized.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Molson, bill referred to Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 1, at 8 p.m.

128A. (1) Any two or more companies incorporated under this Act, including holding and subsidiary companies, may amalgamate and continue as one company.

(2) Companies proposing to amalgamate may enter into an agreement for the amalgamation prescribing its terms and conditions and the mode of carrying the amalgamation into effect.

(3) The amalgamation agreement shall further set out

(a) the name of the amalgamated company;

(b) the objects of the amalgamated company;

(c) the amount of its authorized capital, the division thereof into shares and the rights, restrictions, conditions or limitations attaching to any class of shares;

(d) the place within Canada at which the head office of the amalgamated company is to be situated;

(e) the names, callings and postal addresses of the first directors thereof;

(h) such other details as may be necessary to perfect the amalgamation and to provide for the subsequent management and working of the amalgamated company and the manner of converting the authorized and issued capital of each of the companies into that of the amalgamated company as determined pursuant to paragraph (c) above.

(4) The amalgamation agreement shall be submitted to the shareholders of each class of shares of each of the amalgamating companies at general meetings thereof called for the purpose of considering the agreement, and, if three-fourths of the votes of each class of shares cast at each meeting are in favour of the amalgamation agreement, the secretary of each of the amalgamating companies shall certify that fact upon the agreement under the corporate seal thereof; and thereafter the agreement shall be deemed to have been adopted by each of the amalgamating companies unless the amalgamation agreement is annulled in accordance with the procedure prescribed in this section.

(5) Any shareholders holding at least ten per cent of the shares of any class of shares in an amalgamating company and whose dissent was recorded at a meeting of any class of shareholders called to consider the amalgamation agreement may, within seven days of the final vote on the amalgamation agreement, apply to the chief justice or acting chief justice of the court of the province in which the head office of the company is situated, or to a judge of the court designated by either of them, for an order annulling the amalgamation agreement.

(8) Where an order is made under subsection (7) annulling an amalgamation agreement, the amalgamation agreement is thereby annulled.

(9) Where a reduction of capital may result from an amalgamation agreement, sections 51 to 56 and section 57 apply, mutatis mutandis, as if the amalgamation agreement represented an application for supplementary letters patent confirming a by-law reducing the capital stock of the company.

(10) The amalgamating companies shall, within six months of the date of the final vote on the amalgamation agreement, jointly file with the Secretary of State the amalgamation agreement together with a certificate from the secretary of each of the amalgamating companies establishing the percentage of those who voted in favour of the agreement and the percentage of dissentient shareholders, in respect of each class of shares.

(11) Not less than eight days following the final vote on the amalgamation agreement and upon receipt of evidence that no application was made under this section for the annulment of the amalgamation agreement or that, if such an application was made, it was dismissed, the Secretary of State may issue letters patent confirming the agreement; but the requirement of eight days' delay may be dispensed with if the amalgamation agreement has received the approval of more than ninety per cent of the votes of each class of shares cast at each meeting of the amalgamating companies.

(12) Notice of the granting of letters patent pursuant to subsection (11) shall forthwith be given by the Secretary of State in the Canada Gazette.

(13) Upon the issue of letters patent pursuant to subsection (11), the amalgamation agreement has full force and effect and

(14) All rights of creditors against the property, rights, assets, privileges and franchises of a company amalgamated under this section and all liens upon its property, rights, assets, privileges and franchises are unimpaired by the amalgamation, and all debts, contracts, liabilities and duties of the company thenceforth attach to the amalgamated company and may be enforced against it."

APPENDIX "B"

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

(Presented by Hon. Mr. Leonard. See p. 1114.)

Wednesday, November 25th, 1964.

The Standing Committee on Finance to which was referred the Estimates laid before Parliament for the Fiscal year ending March 31, 1965, report as follows:—

1. On May 20th 1964 the following order of reference was adopted by the Senate:

> That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1965, in advance of the Bills based on the said Estimates reaching the Senate; and that the said Committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

2. In obedience to the foregoing, the Committee held a meeting for organization on May 21, 1964. The Honourable Senator Molson was elected vice-chairman and a Steering Committee was appointed consisting of the Honourable Senators Flynn, Haig, Smith (Queens-Shelburne) and the chairman and vice-chairman.

3. Subsequently the committee held 11 meetings and heard evidence from senior officials of the Treasury Board, from the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Auditor-General and the Deputy Minister of Finance.

4. This is the first occasion since 1956 that the Estimates have been referred to a Committee of the Senate. Prior to 1956, the Finance Committee under the chairmanship of the honourable Senator Crerar, and later of honourable Senator Hawkins, studied the estimates and made reports thereon which were helpful and valuable. In the interval, since 1956, an important development that has taken place is a report, officially known as the "Report of the Royal Commission on Government Organization" but more commonly called the Glassco Report after the distinguished Chairman of the Commission. Under that shorter title it is designated in this report.

5. The Glassco Report dealt with many matters other than the Government Estimates, but as your committee is concerned only with the Estimates, it is that aspect of the Glassco Report that has demanded our attention.

In dealing with the Glassco recommendations, it is desirable to re-state the place and importance of the Estimates in our Parliamentary system of government, and the methods and procedures whereby they are currently prepared, presented and approved.

6. The control by Parliament of the spending by the Executive has its roots deep in our constitutional history, going back in England as far as the days of the Long Parliament. In Canada, it was embodied in our Act of Union, and in the British North America Act. The Executive alone can initiate measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer, and in order to do so it must table in Parliament its Estimates of Expenditures. In the case of its Main Estimates, these are tabled on or about the commencement of the fiscal year to which they apply, so that Parliament may have early and ample opportunity to deal with the spending program for the new year. They are usually tabled on or about February 1st each year.

7. Many months of preparation, however, have preceded the tabling. About the first day of July 1963 the Treasury Board requested the various departments of government to submit to it their establishment plans (that is to say, the expected numbers of staff members) and their expenditure requests, setting a deadline of November 1st, 1963, for such submission. Then during the months of November and December 1963 these submissions were studied, analyzed and, if necessary, revised by the Treasury Board and its staff. Discussion, argument and negotiation take place vigorously between all levels of Treasury Board staff and departmental staff during this period. The Ministers who are members of the Board met in December 1963 and conducted an intensive review of the estimates. It is at this stage that the various Departmental Ministers appear before the Treasury Board as suppliants for their particular areas of responsibility. The results were then recommended by Treasury Board to the Cabinet. The final decision on the Estimates was made by the Cabinet and thereafter the Estimates were printed and placed before Parliament.

8. In the light of the time factor involved in this procedure, it is understandable that from time to time during a fiscal year supplementary estimates are prepared and submitted to Parliament to cover expenditures unforeseen at the time of the preparation of the main estimates, or resulting from subsequent legislative action. Three such supplementary estimates have been tabled in Parliament for the current year, to date.

9. As of November 24th, 1964 the Estimates have not yet been approved and therefore no final supply bill has been voted by Parliament for the expenditures for this year. Because it has been necessary to supply the government with money on account so that it may carry on the business of the country, some five interim supply bills have been passed by Parliament so far this year, providing generally for expenditures for nine months and, in some cases, for ten or eleven months. It is an anomalous situation that most of the money has been spent before Parliament has approved the expenditures themselves.

10. The procedure as so described for this year is consistent with the pattern that has been followed for some years. It is familiar to all members of Parliament and need not have been set out in this report, were it not for the fact that in recent years criticisms have been voiced that seem to warrant examination.

11. It is far from satisfactory to have so long a period of time elapse before the final vote of supply by Parliament and to have so much money spent before the Estimates have been approved. Having in mind the increasing multiplicity and magnitude of Parliamentary duties, it would be desirable to bring about an earlier disposition of the estimates and the consequent bill or bills of supply. In this connection it is noteworthy that in the United Kingdom 26 days before August 5 of each session are given for the consideration of the annual estimates on supply. Therefore, there is a limit on the debate and a deadline for the final passing of supply.

12. The consideration of the estimates has traditionally provided an opportunity for debate, not confined to the items of expenditure, but also on grievances, within relevant limits, against the Executive.

Indeed, at times this aspect of the debate may completely overshadow consideration of the financial items themselves.

13. The Senate as an integral part of Parliament has to debate and vote upon supply bills before they are passed. Traditionally, it has exercised both the above-described functions when dealing with supply bills, namely, scrutinizing expenditures and airing any grievances which honourable senators may have against the Executive. Depending on circumstances, therefore, a debate could take two or three days, or no longer than one day.

14. Insofar as the financial aspect of supply bills is concerned, so long as the estimates are referred to the Finance Committee at each session, an opportunity is provided for the examination and scrutiny of expenditures. As to the other aspect, the airing of grievances, the rules of the Senate do provide other opportunities for members to raise such questions. Nevertheless, it is desirable to preserve and protect our rights in this respect in the debate on supply bills. Unfortunately, it has happened on a number of occasions over the past ten years that the Senate has been faced with an indirect form of closure forced upon it by the pressure of events and primarily caused by the insufficiency of time between the date a supply bill reaches the Senate and the deadline by which the government's legislative authority to spend would be exhausted.

15. Your committee calls attention to this situation in the hope that ways and means may be found to bring about an earlier and speedier disposition of the estimates and of the Supply Act or Acts based thereon, and to express its willingness to deal with such estimates with promptness and despatch to meet any earlier deadline that Parliament may wish to prescribe.

16. In carrying out the reference to it this year, your committee did not examine in detail the estimates of any particular department, but it did consider the estimates in general, and questions as to various aspects of a number of departments were put to the witnesses before us. The committee did devote considerable time to the procedures, forms and substance of the Estimates and in particular made a study of the recommendations of the Glassco Report to which we have referred. These recommendations were designed to bring about greater economy and efficiency in the financial management of the Government. They have all been under intense study by the Government and its officials; some have been accepted and are being implemented, and others are in the process of being put into force. Four outside management firms have been engaged to do pilot studies for four different departments of government for the purpose of determining how the Glassco suggestions can best be built into the departmental systems of accounting and financial reporting.

17. The Glassco Report made this general statement, at page 94, of Volume I of the abridged Edition:—

> "The conclusion is inescapable that the present procedures in developing and > reviewing the Estimates are wasteful and inefficient. The form of the Estimates does not permit intelligent criticism and, in placing the major emphasis on the nature of expenditure rather than on its real purpose, the matters coming under senior review are the less important details of administrative judgment. Any valid assessment of performance by departmental management is excluded and it is virtually impossible to form any objective judgment from the Estimates as to the desirability of continuing, modifying or enlarging specific programs in the public interest."

18. Your committee concurs in general with this analysis. Certain specific recommendations are then made in the Glassco Report and some of the major ones with our comments thereon are as follows:

(a) "That the number of votes be reduced and all cost elements of individual programs be consolidated within the same vote."

Departmental estimates are broken down into subdivisions classified as "Votes" for the convenience of Parliamentary decision. This recommendation has been accepted by the government and largely applied in the 1964-65 estimates. In 1961-62, the Main Estimates included 495 votes, over three times the number currently used in the United Kingdom. The 495 votes have been reduced to approximately 240 in the current estimates and no doubt there can be a further reduction.

(b) "That departmental estimates should be prepared on the basis of programs of activity and not by standard objects of expenditure."

Your committee agrees that the primary emphasis in the estimates should be on the "program" rather than on the standard objects of expenditures. The significance of an expenditure must be related to the purpose for which it is being incurred. Departments should justify their estimates by relating them directly to the program that occasions them and, in turn, justify the program as being worth the amount expended upon it, not only on its own account but also in competition with other needs for which money is required. This change however should not take place at the expense of omitting relevant details such as are contained in the standard objects of expenditures.

(c) "That the establishment review should be part of the overall review process of expenditures."

In essence, this means that the determination of the number of staff required in a department should be part and parcel of the determination of the cost of the various programs of the department. The logic of this proposition is self-evident and it has been accepted by the government and is endorsed by your committee.

(d) "That all departments and agencies should be required to prepare and submit to the Executive long-term plans of expenditure requirements by programs, and that based thereon an overall forecast of government expenditures and prospective resources for a period of five years ahead should be prepared annually."

At present government budgeting and accounting are on a year-to-year basis. This is necessarily so, because Parliament should and does annually exercise its control and review of a government's administration. Nevertheless, a government should be aware of its probable longer term financial requirements. Increases in population alone will make greater demands upon many branches of government service. Most businesses now must project their budgets ahead for five years or more to be ready to meet changing conditions, obsolescence, new products and other potential developments. The use of such a forecast does not involve a decision to agree with projected expenditures but its value would lie in preventing decisions being made currently that would not take into account the future consequence of that decision by itself, and also in the context of its relative effect on overall operations.

(e) "That Departments and agencies be given the necessary financial authority and be held accountable for the effective management of the financial resources placed at their disposal."

This is probably the most significant of all the recommendations made by the Glassco Commission. In essence, it is a de-centralization of financial responsibility. The theory supporting it is that by making a department itself responsible for its financial expenditure, it will exercise that responsibility more effectively and economically than if some outside body is, as the report puts it, "likened to a policeman patrolling the departments to ensure financial rectitude".

Your committee desires to sound a word of caution in connection with this recommendation. The change, of itself, will not automatically bring about the desired improvement. Its success will depend upon how the key personnel in the civil service respond to the challenge involved in this delegation of greater responsibility to them, and assume the higher degree of accountability for the efficient and economical financial management of departmental affairs. In each department there must be a fully qualified and competent financial administrator under the Deputy Minister. In this connection your committee has noted with approval that a course for training such personnel has now been set up in the Civil Service. It is to be hoped, but it still remains to be seen, that skilled and competent internal financial management within departments will bring about greater efficiency and savings. It should perhaps be made clear that such extension of authority within departments refers only to expenditures authorized by Parliament. Indeed, the change may well require even greater vigilance and more careful scrutiny of public expenditures by the Executive and Parliament.

(f) "That the costs of major common services be charged to user departments."

At present in many instances free services are provided to various departments of government, among which might be mentioned accommodation, furniture, power, franked mail, superannuation and other employee benefits. Your committee agrees with the principle of this recommendation and, so long as its implementation does not superimpose an elaborate or expensive system, it is desirable that the costs of such services should be charged to the user department of them.

(g) "That where appropriate, revenues be offset against related expenditure, and that votes be shown in the Estimates and controlled on a net basis."

As the Glassco Report states, it is normal in industrial budgeting to relate revenues and costs. In government those revenues derived from services rendered are generally only incidental. Your committee agrees in principle with this recommendation of the Glassco Report and we have noted that the officials of the Treasury Board are studying the practical problems it presents for the purpose of seeing how far the desired result can be achieved.

19. It is not our function in this Report to deal with recommendations of the Glassco Commission other than those relating to the Estimates. We have said enough to indicate our approval in general of the relevant ones. We emphasize, however, that decisions to spend are in the first instance decisions of government policy and that even Parliament's control over such decisions must be viewed in the light of our system of responsible government. Therefore, the total amount of the Estimates and the objects thereof are the primary responsibility of the government of the day and, once those decisions have been made, the most that management can do, and in practice Parliamentary scrutiny also, is to see that the expenditures are made as efficiently and as economically as possible, and without waste, extravagance or duplication.

20. In addition to its studies of the Glassco recommendations, your committee inquired into a number of matters concerning the Estimates in general and also as to particular items. The questions and the answers submitted by the Treasury Board officials appear in the printed proceedings of the committee, with suitable appendices where required, and for the purposes of this report it is sufficient to say that all relevant information was obtained upon the items as to which members were concerned.

21. The following observations are made as to the Estimates in general. The Main Estimates for 1964-65 totalled $6,703,513,508, or $84,378,008 more than those of the previous year. It should be noted, however, that there was a substantial reduction in the current Estimates of the Department of National Defence from those of the preceding year, amounting to $109,000,455.

It would be misleading, however, to compare the Estimates of respective years without taking into account the Supplementary Estimates. In the current year Supplementary Estimates have been filed totalling $221,763,280 and the Minister of Finance in his budget speech in March estimated that the total expenditure for the year would be about $7,125,000,000 or $233,000,000 more than in the preceding year, an increase of a little more than 3%. It is interesting to follow the trend of increases in expenditures over past years, and a table of the history for ten years is appended. This year's percentage increase in federal expenditures should also be viewed in relation to the 8% increase in the Gross National Product of Canada for the current calendar year over the preceding year, as currently estimated.

22. In the course of its deliberations, your committee considered the place of Crown corporations and agencies with relation to the Estimates. Some of them do not appear in the Estimates at all and others appear with inadequate information. Having in mind that the purpose of the Estimates is to enable Parliament to scrutinize the financial operations of government, your committee believes it would be useful on another occasion to examine the financial statements of one or more Crown corporations and to give the managements thereof the opportunity to testify as to their operations. Your committee would be prepared to undertake such action if the Senate in the future should deem this advisable.

23. Your committee desires to record its thanks and its appreciation for the evidence submitted by those senior officials of government who appeared before it and their courtesy and co-operation.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

T. D'Arcy Leonard,
Chairman.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons stating that the name of Mr. Marcoux has been substituted for that of Mr. Olson on the Joint Committee on the Canada Pension Plan.

HON. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT

FELICITATIONS ON FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY IN PARLIAMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, today is an important milestone in the history of the Parliament of Canada, because on December 1, 1924 a young man was elected to the House of Commons of Canada. He was re-elected in 1925 and 1926, in 1930 and 1935, in 1940 and 1945, in 1949 and in 1953. In July 1955 he was summoned to the Senate.

I should say too that with this tremendous record of continuous service in both Houses of Parliament, he succeeded a great-grandfather, a grandfather and father, all of whom had been members either of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec or the House of Commons of Canada. This is truly a remarkable record of public service. I am, of course, referring to the distinguished senator from Rivière-du-Loup, the electoral district of Témiscouata, the Honourable Jean-François Pouliot.

Senator Pouliot's record has been surpassed only by that of one other of our colleagues, to whose record we will have an opportunity to refer on another occasion: I am sure all honourable senators would wish me to extend our best wishes to our good friend Senator Pouliot.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, I have just been notified of this very interesting event and I cannot sit idly by without saying a few words.

For quite a number of years I had the great honour and privilege of sitting in the House of Commons with my colleague Jean-François Pouliot, and now we are together in the Senate.

Forty years is a long time. I might say it is a long time for him to have been travelling in the wilderness. He should have been over here with the Conservative party, where he really belongs. He has made a wonderful success of his parliamentary life, succeeding, as he did, such illustrious ancestors.

I do not know of any member of Parliament who has worked harder than our good friend Senator Pouliot. While he has made a great contribution, I have not always agreed with everything he has said or with everything he has done. However, I am sure that he has always been sincere and that he has made a great impression on the Parliament of Canada. I wish him many more years to continue with us in that capacity.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, it would appear that this is the season for extending felicitations to those who are celebrating anniversaries. Yesterday Sir Winston Churchill celebrated his 90th birthday, and today we are rejoicing with Senator Pouliot on the occasion of his fortieth year in Parliament. I take the occasion to draw attention to the fact that one of our very charming lady senators from the Province of Quebec celebrated a birthday on Sunday last. I would add of course that her appearance belies the number of years which she has attained.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I thank very warmly the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks), and my former leader, honourable Senator Macdonald (Brantford), for their extremely kind wishes. I was taken by surprise because I did not expect that the fortieth anniversary of my first election to the Commons would be mentioned tonight.

You have all been very good to me. In thanking you I wish to take this occasion to tell you that I consider it a great honour to be a member of the Senate of Canada, and I have never missed an opportunity to inform our fellow citizens of the excellent work being done by my colleagues of the Senate.

Honourable colleagues, you have been kind to me in different ways; you have always listened to me and you have often nodded your approval of various points I have made. I understand very well that it is difficult for you to agree with me on everything, but I have gratefully received your approval individually and separately on nearly every matter that I have discussed before you.

If I have been a member for Temiscouata County for 31 years, I owe it to the fact that my great-grandfather, my grandfather and my father were faithful servants of the people. I tried to imitate them as well as I could. If I was elected the first time not as an independent Liberal but as a straight Liberal against the official nominee of the Liberal party, and against the federal and provincial Liberal organizations, it was because I was fighting a just cause. Mr. Lapointe and Mr. King realized that two months afterwards when both of them introduced me to Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons.

Times change, of course, but I told Mr. Lapointe after my election of December 1, 1924, that I would continue to be a Liberal, as I was before and during the election. I must confess that all the time I was a Member of Parliament, and after I had the honour of becoming a member of this chamber, I practised what I may call "co-operative liberalism," which means that I have given my party, the Liberal party, the benefit of the doubt when I was not absolutely sure that the party was right.

Many colleagues I knew are gone In the 31 years I sat in the House of Commons I knew about 1,500 members of Parliament, and now there are so many new faces there. The old-timers had mostly gone, and I had to come to the Senate to find them. It was a pleasure, and it reminds me of very happy moments of my parliamentary career.

Now, honourable colleagues, I must convey my thanks to my wife, in the first place, because if I have survived so much turmoil and so many difficulties it is because of the good care she took of me, and the happy life we have had at home.

I must convey also my warmest thanks to the former electors of Temiscouata County, whom I consider as my friends. I never had an organization with a president, a vice-president, a secretary and a treasurer. Nothing like that was established in Temiscouata County, when I represented it in the commons. Friendship was the password. In the first place there were my grandfather's and my father's friends. Then, there were my friends, and finally, the sons of my friends. Three generations of Liberals have supported me. At my first election I had the support of many Conservatives who continued to vote for me and I would not call them otherwise than good Liberals.

In concluding I must tell you a good story. My opponent, the official nominee of the Liberal party in 1924, had been a provincial member for many years. The question was: "Should there be a Conservative candidate?" A very good friend of mine went to see Mr. Arthur Meighen, who was the Leader of the Conservative party, and suggested to him that it would be much better not to put up a Conservative because general elections were coming soon, and I would then be the easiest man to defeat. If this strategy were followed, then the Conservative candidate would stand a good chance of being elected to represent Temiscouata County. Contrary to his suggestion to Mr. Meighen, I was re-elected for 31 years.

As Members of Parliament the main way to keep our friends is to give our constituents every opportunity to meet us and to tell us everything that they have to say about politics, and for us to be honest with them and to work hard. I have tried my best to do so, and I am sure that hard work is a wonderful recipe for survival in politics.

Honourable colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, I have been touched by the most generous words which have been spoken this evening.

I must take this opportunity to congratulate my good friend and former leader, honourable Senator Macdonald (Brantford), who is a fine gentleman, and as chancellor he will add prestige to Waterloo Lutheran University. The choice was an excellent one. He is a man of wide culture and I am sure that the university could not have done better than to select him as its chancellor.

There is another colleague whom you eulogized the other day. I was not in the chamber when the two new chancellors were congratulated. It is a great tribute also to Senator Paterson to have been chosen as the first chancellor of Lakehead University. His speech was most modest. He said that he did not have the privilege of a college education. But he has been a life preserver for Carleton University, and now he will be a life preserver for Lakehead University. He will help the youth of this country by supporting that seat of learning.

Honourable senators, you are too generous. I am overcome with emotion. Thanks a million.

(Translation):

Hon. Mariana B. Jodoin: Honourable senators, may I thank the Honourable W. Ross Macdonald, for the good wishes he has just extended to me on my birthday. I may be getting older but my heart remains forever young.

Some time ago, I had the opportunity to appear on television. I was asked then how senators welcomed female members to the Senate. Here is what I answered. Since I came to the Senate eleven years ago, senators have always treated my female colleagues and myself with much respect and kindness. I added: They are men of great ability, and such men never fear the rise of a woman because they know well that we are there not to take their place but to support them.

I thank you very much, honourable senators.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 10, 1964

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-140, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1965.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be now read the second time.

Honourable senators, this is a measure which is normally described as the final supply bill for the fiscal year. Copies of the bill have been distributed and are in the desks of all honourable senators. This in itself, I think, is somewhat unusual, because when we get supply bills, interim and/or final, we very seldom have copies of them. However, it was possible to distribute copies on this occasion because the House of Commons passed this bill on Friday last.

Since this is an important bill, being the final supply bill, subject to the introduction of additional supplementary estimates, I thought it might be helpful to honourable senators if, in addition to the bill, I provided a memorandum indicating the amounts of money involved and the way in which it is proposed to deal with them. The memorandum, consisting of two foolscap sheets, has been distributed to all honourable senators.

Perhaps I should direct my remarks along the lines indicated in the memorandum, to make it a little easier for honourable senators to follow the discussion and to see how the various figures are related one to another. I will commence at page 2, where there are indicated the amounts required for the financing of the Government program for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965. These are the amounts which were provided for in the main estimates and the Supplementary Estimates (A), (B) and (C).

Honourable senators will note from that portion of the memorandum that the main estimates provide a total of $6,811,810,508, of which $2,860,819,997 are statutory payments, that is, payments which do not have to be voted every year because they are provided for in the continuing statutes of Canada. Examples of payments of this kind are family allowances, payments for disabled people, and other similar payments. The total of the main estimates to be voted is $3,950,990,511.

In addition to the main estimates, there have been presented to Parliament three supplementary estimates, namely, Supplementary Estimates (A) of $404,691,736, and Supplementary Estimates (B) of $61,620,145; both of these have been before this chamber on other occasions in connection with other supply bills; and finally, we have Supplementary Estimates (C) of $89,270,001, which came before this chamber for the first time this evening. The total of the main and supplementary estimates which Parliament is asked to vote is $4,506,572,393.

In addition, there is an amount of $882 million which has to be paid out of the Old Age Security Fund for old age security payments. The total amount required by the Government to finance its operations for the fiscal year is that shown on page 2 of the memorandum, namely, $8,249,392,390.

In addition, the Government does require certain borrowing authority. For the current fiscal year the amount required to be borrowed for the various financial operations which are handled in this manner is $1,750 million. This is somewhat less than the amount last year or the two preceding years, but it is close to the amounts that have been borrowed in recent years. This is the requirement.

Today being December 1, the fiscal year has only four more months to run. Parliament has from time to time granted interim supply. Particulars of the various bills of interim supply are given at the top of page 1 of the memorandum. Six different bills are listed there for a total of $3,452,739,484.31. This is the amount of money that Parliament has already granted to the Government, and represents nine-twelths of the main and Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B). The first Appropriation Act granted supply for two months, the next for one month, the next for one month, and the next for three months. The Appropriation Act passed some weeks ago was for the months of November and December. If this bill now before us is passed, then supply shall have been granted by Parliament to March 31, 1965.

Particulars of what this bill grants are in the next portion of the memorandum on page 1. It will, in the first place, provide the balance of the main estimates for 1964-65 in the amount of $918,875,269.38, that is, three-twelfths of the main estimates, because nine twelfths has already been granted. It will also grant the balance of Supplementary Estimates (A) in the amount of $30,532,935.40, the remaining three-twelfths of Supplementary Estimates (B) of $15,154,702.91, and the entirety of Supplementary Estimates (C) of $89,270,001, or a total of $1,053,832,908.69.

Honourable senators, it is one thing to be using box-car figures, and it is another thing to be dealing with the details as to how these figures are made up. Therefore, I should say first, concerning the balance of the main estimates to be granted which are referred to in the latter portion of the memorandum I have provided, particulars of that $918 million-odd are contained in Schedule A of the bill. Schedule A begins on page 4 of the bill and concludes on page 28. It is voluminous because it recites all the items of the main estimates which have not been fully voted by Parliament. As I have stated, three-twelfths of this total amount of the main estimates on these items are voted under this bill.

Honourable senators, I do not think I would be expected to make a detailed analysis of, or even make reference to, any of the many items in the main estimates set out in Schedule A. However, if any questions arise out of any of these items, I shall be happy to provide what information I can.

I am now dealing with section 2 of the bill. Section 2(a) provides for the approval of the amount required to authorize the spending of the balance of the main estimates, in the sum of $918 million, the particulars of which are contained in Schedule A. Section 2(b) provides the same authority for Supplementary Estimates (A). Section 2(c) provides the same authority for Supplementary Estimates (B). Section 2(d) provides the authority for the spending of the money contained in Supplementary Estimates (C).

The particulars of Supplementary Estimates (A) are contained in schedule B of the bill. This is a fairly voluminous schedule, beginning at page 29 and ending at page 40. Again I say, if there are any particulars honourable senators require special information upon, I will be happy to supply them, if I am able. Schedule C, which begins at page 41 and runs to page 43, gives the particulars of Supplementary Estimates (B). Schedule D of the bill gives the particulars of Supplementary Estimates (C). These are the supplementary estimates which come before the Senate for the first time on this occasion.

I have dealt with section 2 of the bill, have indicated what its purpose is, and have indicated, both from the bill and the memorandum, the amounts which the bill proposes to grant.

Now may I just refer to the other sections? As honourable senators will see, the bill itself is very short.

Section 3 provides that the amount authorized in respect of an item may be paid or applied only in respect of and for the purposes of that item.

Section 3(2) provides that each item in the schedules is deemed to have been enacted by Parliament as of the 1st day of April, 1964, which is the first day of the current fiscal year.

Section 4 deals with the commitments. It provides that where authority is granted to enter into a commitment, it may be entered into only in accordance with the terms of the item involved, if the Comptroller of the Treasury certifies that the amount of the commitment does not exceed the total amount of the commitment authority granted in the item.

Section 5 provides that the amounts paid or applied under the authority of this Appropriation Act shall be accounted for in the Public Accounts of Canada in accordance with the pertinent provision of the Financial Administration Act.

The form of this bill is one we have grown accustomed to in Parliament, and one with which we are all familiar. It is in the usual form of the final appropriation bill. While I do not propose to discuss details of any of the items in any of the schedules, the fact is that many months ago the Senate referred the estimates to its Finance Committee. That committee has sat and, indeed, its chairman presented its report to this house at the last sitting. The Finance Committee had before it not only the main estimates but also Supplementary Estimates (A), (B) and (C).

Honourable senators, in presenting an interim supply bill it is customary to give assurance that the passing of any item will not prejudice the right of any senator later to raise a question on any item in it. That assurance is not necessary at this time. This is the last shot at the main estimates and at supplementaries (A), (B) and (C), as presented to Parliament. If there are any questions I can answer this evening, I shall be happy to do so. I hope my explanation has been adequate.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all indebted to the Leader of the Government for the explanation he has given. He has just said he would be glad to answer any questions.

I wish to speak briefly in connection with Supplementary Estimates (C), recently filed and appearing at pages 44 and 45 of the bill, and in particular with the items that have to do with Veterans Affairs. These estimates provide for an increase in veterans allowances and disability pensions.

If honourable senators have looked at Supplementary Estimates (C) they will have noticed that the estimates also provide for the schedules to the act being repealed and new ones inserted. They also provide for various other sections of the Pension Act being amended, which have to do with clothing allowance, disability allowance and things of that nature.

Honourable senators, this may or may not be a new procedure. I am not an expert and do not pretend to know, but I understand that the procedure in the past has usually been that when the Pension Act or War Veterans' Allowance Act is to be amended, a bill for that purpose is brought before the House of Commons. It then receives second reading in the other place and is referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. There are many senators here who, during their days in that "happy" other place, served on that committee. That is one committee where there was perfect harmony, and it always turned out the best possible job in favour of the veteran.

It seems to me unfortunate that on this occasion the Government did not follow that well defined practice, because various veterans' organizations—principally the Legion and others of the same type—usually wish to appear before that committee and make representations. Those who have served on that committee in the past will readily recall the excellent representations and presentations made by the Legion on various occasions.

I am not complaining seriously about the way this is being handled, but when the Leader of the Government rises at the end of the debate perhaps he could tell me if there is some special reason for making these amendments in this rather unusual way.

These allowances under the War Veterans' Allowance Act and the Pension Act are being increased by approximately 10 per cent. In their brief, the Legion asked for an increase of 33⅓ per cent, or that the pension rates be increased in order to bring such rates into line with the salaries of civil servants as they existed following World War I. To do that would mean increasing the basic rate to approximately $3,500 a year.

I am somewhat curious to know just what yardstick the Government used when they made the decision to increase the allowances and the disability pensions by 10 per cent. During the last 12 or 18 months senators and members of Parliament have had a "slight" increase in pay. Judges, members of the armed forces and very large numbers of civil servants in various categories have all received increases in varying degrees. For that reason I am curious as to why 10 per cent was decided on rather than 20 per cent. Pension rates are supposed to be based on the income of the average worker in the common labour market. That has been an accepted principle over a long period of years. It has always appeared to me most unfortunate that veterans who have rendered the highest possible service to their country should be placed on the lowest possible income level so far as consideration of their pension rates and allowances is concerned. But in accepting the income of the average worker in the common labour market as a standard, we find that payments for 100 per cent disability are still below the average wage paid in the common labour market.

The Legion has presented a brief to the cabinet each year, generally on November 11. In the brief presented this year, they make this comment at page 4:

> Since pension rates are supposed—

And I emphasize the words "are supposed"— > to be based on the income of the average worker in the common labour market, these figures and those in Appendix "A" clearly demonstrate that pension rates are vastly inferior to those to which they are supposed to relate and to which they did, in fact, relate in 1920.

And in Appendix "A" attached to their brief they show that a 100 per cent disability in 1920 for a single veteran was $900, while in 1964 it is $2,160. The disability rate for a married veteran in 1920 was $1,200, and in 1964 it is $2,880. Then they show that in the civil service a customs guard who received $1,260 in 1920, in 1964 received $3,740. They also cite the wages of cleaners and helpers who in 1920 received $1,200 and in 1964 receive $3,500.

Disability pensions are paid on the basis of rank, and when you compare the old schedule of pensions set out in the amendment of 1960 with those in the schedule of Supplementary Estimates (C), you will find under the old rate that a brigadier's disability pension amounted to $540 a year more than that of a private soldier or those of the rank of colonel and below. Under the new schedule there is a difference of $300. Furthermore, there was a difference of $504 in the pension that a brigadier's widow received and that of a widow of a colonel and all ranks below. Under the new schedule the difference is $336. One wonders why there is this difference.

If you look at page 9 of the Supplementary Estimates (C) you see the most peculiar assessment of all, because there it shows that the widow or the dependent parent of a veteran up to the rank of lieutenant-colonel can receive up to $1,428 a year pension, while the dependent parent of a colonel or other officer in that group would receive $1,512. The third grade is brigadiers and higher ranks, the dependent parents of whom would receive a pension of $2,160. Now, it is rather difficult to understand just what yardstick one uses in deciding that the parent of different grades or ranks in the army or the armed forces should be entitled to a pension varying from $1,428 to $2,160. Especially is this the case when the wives and children of all ranks receive exactly the same rate of pension.

Honourable senators, you have made or possibly will make a brief examination of the schedules to the Pension Act as set out in Supplementary Estimates (C). If you do so you will readily see that the scale or rate of pension is based on the rank of the veteran. I would appreciate if the leader would comment as to why the custom has been followed for so long in awarding a pension for the same degree of disability and have it based on rank.

It seems to me there is a great difference in the way pensions are arrived at in civilian life as compared with the way they are arrived at for those who have served in the armed forces. In civilian life both parties, the employer and the employee, make an equal contribution. One could hardly quarrel with that, but when you assess the pension for those who have served in the armed forces I think you operate on an entirely different basis because here the officer and the private have made exactly the same contribution. Indeed, in many cases the private has made a much greater contribution than the officer. Each one has given a part of his body in some way or other, and each is now disabled physically to the same degree, say, 50 per cent. When you come to award a pension, both are again on the same level, because as mentioned in the Legion brief, pensions are supposed to be based on the income of the average worker in the common labour market. Both the officer and the private are now living on civvy street and both have to compete in the same way under our system of private enterprise. In my opinion they are equal and on the same level since they both have the same 50 per cent disability.

Therefore, honourable senators, is it not correct that the pension paid to a disabled veteran is to make up the difference between the earning capacity of the disabled veteran and that of the employee who has no disability? If that is correct, then the veteran who has 100 per cent disability should receive a pension equal to 100 per cent of the earnings of the average worker in the common labour market.

The Legion brief clearly points out that in their opinion an increase of 10 per cent is still far below the earnings of the average worker in the common labour market. While I do not wish to labour the point unduly, I would like to read to honourable senators certain remarks contained in the brief presented to the cabinet on November 11 of this year. At pages 3, 4 and 5 of their brief they say:

> . . . the pension increase, however, of "approximately 10%" falls far short of the requirement as set out in previous briefs and emphasized in our telegram to the Prime Minister on October 6.
> As of March 31, there were 148,705 disability pensioners; more than 60 per cent of these—a total of 90,910—were pensioned at 20 per cent or less; the maximum increase in the basic rate of pension for those in this group will be only $3.60 per month; 58,386, or 40 per cent of all pensioners receive a pension at 10 per cent or less; some of these will receive $1.80 per month, but more than 5,000 will receive only 90 cents a month—
> The Department of Labour indicates the average hourly wage for a general labourer in 1963 was $1.67. Based on 40 hours per week this gives an annual wage of $3,473.60.

Honourable senators will recall that, as I read a moment ago, the Legion suggested the pension rate be increased to $3,500.

> While it is acknowledged that the pensioner enjoys free medical treatment for his pensioned disability and is not subject to income tax, the discrepancies that exist go far beyond the small advantages he enjoys. The prohibitions that attach to his disability are suffered for 168 hours per week, 52 weeks per year, whereas the Government or other employee receives his far superior reward for terms of endeavour to 40 hours per week, in a year that is shortened by annual vacation and sick leave.
> Comparing the salaries and Pension rates prior to the Minister's announcement yesterday with those in similar categories in 1920, we find an ever-increasing advantage for the Civil Servant over the position of the 100 per cent disability pensioner. As stated above, the 10 per cent increase is grossly inadequate and does little to relieve the advantage which has been gained by the Civil Servant over those who have lost loved ones and veterans who have lost limbs, their eyesight and incurred other disabilities in honouring their obligation to this country—
> The Royal Canadian Legion therefore recommends—

> That the Government act at once to bring pension rates in line with salaries of Civil Servants as they existed following World War I.
> As we indicated to you in our telegram of October 6, this relationship can only be restored by increasing the basic rate to $3,500 per year.

It seems to me that this practice of paying pensions on rank is entirely wrong and should be changed. It should make no difference whether a veteran served as an officer or as a private. All veterans and their dependents should receive exactly the same pension for the same percentage of disability.

The Legion's brief also makes reference to the benefit of the doubt provided by section 70 of the Pension Act. Anyone who has ever had anything to do with the Pension Act can almost repeat it from memory. Section 70 presently reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything in this Act, on any application for pension the applicant is entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which means that it is not necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences and presumptions in favour of the applicant.

With respect to that, the Legion had this to say at page 6 of its brief:

> As we stated in our brief last year we have for many years been indicating our dissatisfaction with the Pension Commission's interpretation of section 70 of the Pension Act. The majority of applications under the legislation are affected by the Pension Commission's policy in applying the Benefit of the Doubt. Tied in with the Benefit of the Doubt are, "conditions not recorded on enlistment" and "retroactive awards."

The Legion has set out in its brief a number of cases, giving all details. In one case in particular there were six appeals or appearances before the Pension Board and the Appeal Board, all of which were rejected, but the seventh appeal was successful and the widow was awarded an entitlement. The Legion pointed out:

> Because the Pension Commission apparently did not apply the Benefit of the Doubt until the final decision, this widow lost pension for approximately forty-four months, amounting to $6,000. The veteran—

That is, her husband.

> —during his lifetime, was without treatment entitlement and pension. Prior to his death the Pension Commission had assessed his total disability at 100%, but he was receiving only a 20% disability pension for two other pensionable conditions. Had the Pension Commission, when he applied for entitlement in 1954, taken the same action it did in 1964, and sought an opinion from one of the departmental consultants, it is likely that entitlement would have been granted in 1955, rather than in 1964.

Any honourable senator who has had dealings with the Pension Commission on behalf of veterans will recognize these old familiar words, "the condition was pre-enlistment and was not aggravated by military service." This is without doubt one of the most annoying phrases used by the Pension Commission. I know of no other ruling or finding which enrages veterans as much as this one. Everyone knows that on enlistment a veteran is given a most rigorous and detailed medical examination by highly qualified men. The soldier is given tests, including a very complete X-ray examination. After all that, he is passed by the medical officer, accepted into the service and marked down as A-1. His medical sheet is clear and clean in every respect as to his physical condition on the date of his enlistment. Yet, in so many cases, the medical authorities and the Pension Board bend over backwards to find that the present condition of the veteran was of a pre-enlistment nature, and that the disabilities now complained of were not aggravated by military service.

Is it not reasonable, honourable senators, for a veteran to take the position on appearing before the Pension Board, that if his medical history sheet shows no record of pre-enlistment disability, then such present disability should be accepted as arising during his war service and be attributed to such service? Will any reasonable man say that the soldier is being given the benefit of the doubt when the medical officers who examined him on enlistment found him in A-1 condition, and then later on discharge, or after discharge, the same medical officer attached to the Pension Board for some unknown reason says that this disability under review was a pre-enlistment condition and was not aggravated by military service?

The Pension Act contains no definition of the word "doubt," and the Legion has suggested that an amendment be made in which "doubt" is defined. I heard honourable Senator Pouliot say tonight that he always gave his party the benefit of the doubt, so he might be able to pass on this proposed amendment. It is as follows:

> "Doubt" means that doubt which would exist in the mind of a reasonable man on the street after hearing all representations.

That is all I wish to say on behalf of the veterans and these amendments. Certainly those who receive war veterans allowances will appreciate the assistance that is given the veterans, as will also the disability pensioners. I do feel that the increase of 10 per cent is not sufficient when compared with other increases that have occurred. It is certainly not in line with the wages paid in the common labour market.

If no other honourable senator wishes to speak tonight, I should like to adjourn this debate because I want to ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) some questions in regard to a return that he gave me some time ago on the expenses of the troops that Canada has around the world.

I do not wish to be faced tomorrow with the objection that one is not allowed to speak twice on second reading. If some other honourable gentleman wishes to speak now, perhaps I could adjourn the debate later.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I would like to ask one question which the honourable leader may not be able to answer at once, but perhaps he will give me the information later. I see that the total expenditures of the Government for the year in question is $8 billion-odd. Considering our population at a little less than 20 million, that would give a per capita expenditure of a little more than $400. I would like to know how that compares with the per capita expenditure of governments such as the United States, Great Britain, or comparable administrations.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Obviously, I do not have the answer to that question now.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I would not expect it now.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words, by way of appeal to the Leader of the Government. Some 2,200 men from my native province, Newfoundland, served in the Forestry Unit in the Second World War. Men from that province also served in the Forestry Unit in the First World War. A large number of men from Canada's mainland also served in the forestry units, in both the First World War and the Second World War.

The men who served in the forestry units from the mainland and from Newfoundland in the First World War—and that was before Newfoundland came into Confederation—come under the Veterans Act and receive benefits comparable to those of the men who served in the trenches.

The men from Newfoundland who served in the forestry units in the Second World War have been looked upon by the Government of Canada as second-class citizens. I mention no particular government, as one is as bad as the other, since this particular point has been raised before both parties. Those men got no consideration at all comparable with the foresters who served in the forestry units from the mainland of Canada. Let me point out again that in those days Newfoundland was not a part of Canada; but for the benefit of honourable senators I would point out that for the purposes of the War Veterans Allowance Act, the expression "Canadian forces" includes any forces raised in Newfoundland; and "domiciled in Canada" and "resident in Canada" include domicile and residence in Newfoundland either before or after the union of Newfoundland with Canada.

There are about 2,200 men concerned. Like those of us here, they are getting older. They were not youngsters when they went over to serve in the forestry units. The members of the Merchant Marine got compensation. These men went on board ships and crossed the ocean.

In the Second World War, these men in the forestry units were asked to enlist only for six months. They did so. At the end of six months they were given the opportunity to sign up again for the duration of the war. Most of them did so, but some got out and went into the navy and army. Those who signed up for the duration were not allowed to break off that engagement and were not allowed to enlist in other parts of the armed forces. They had to stay in England, or wherever they were sent, and perform the duties assigned to them.

These men formed a special force; they knew their job; most of them were woodsmen. They were subject to the bombing raids, as were other people in the British Isles or in other parts of the war area. Many of them were killed; many died through accidents in the work they were carrying out; others were injured. In Newfoundland today we have many injured men from that force, receiving practically no consideration from the Government of Canada.

Honourable senators, just before I left home to come to Ottawa, I had the honour of listening to these men at one of their meetings. I felt ashamed not only to be a Newfoundlander but to be a Canadian, to think that these men were not getting the same consideration as their fellow foresters from the Canadian mainland. Why does this happen? Someone told me it is because they did not have uniforms. Let me say that when they enlisted at the beginning of World War II, Great Britain could not afford to give them uniforms. They went in their own uniforms. At the end of six months they were told: "We want you, but if you sign up you will not be allowed to transfer to the army or navy." Some decided not to sign and they went into the army or navy, many of them giving up their lives in those services. Those who signed for the duration of the war were ignored. That is a scandal.

Honourable senators, I have said these few words to bring this matter to your attention, and particularly to the attention of the honourable Leader of the Government. I am sure he will take every step possible to bring it before the proper authorities.

I feel hurt about it, and I think all honourable senators here share that feeling, especially my fellow senators from Newfoundland. We feel that a wrong has been done, and I want that wrong corrected. We in Newfoundland now are Canadians and we want the same treatment as is given those men in other provinces who served in the forestry units in the Second World War.

I was not in a forestry unit in the Second World War, nor was I in one during the First World War, but I was in the trenches and I understand these men. They gave up good paying jobs in those days. In the Second World War they were the first to go overseas, to serve this country's cause in whatever capacity they were called upon to serve. They got, I think, $2 a day. They were earning much more than that in Newfoundland at that time. They ran the same risks as the rest of our men who went overseas in the Second World War. They ran the risk of being torpedoed on the way over, and of being bombed when they were there. We all know about the bombings in England during that war. Many men of those units died there, and many came back maimed. I appeal to the Government to make this correction. It needs only a small amendment to the War Veterans' Allowance Act. Then those who require assistance can be looked after.

That is all I wish to say with regard to this bill, under which several billion dollars are being voted. I believe every cent is necessary. There may be a little waste here and there, but that is bound to happen.

I would ask the honourable Leader of the Government to take this matter up with the Government at the earliest opportunity.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable Senator White leave to adjourn the debate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: May I be allowed to speak tomorrow?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): In case any honourable senators are in doubt, I may say that the debate will go on tomorrow until it is concluded. Therefore, any honourable senator who desires to participate will have an opportunity to do so. I would certainly welcome any speeches that may be made.

On motion of Hon. Mr. White, debate adjourned.

REPLY TO FELICITATIONS ON GOLDEN WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

Hon. Sydney J. Smith: Honourable senators, as I was not present at the last sitting of the Senate, when congratulations were extended to Mrs. Smith and me on the occasion of our golden wedding anniversary, I should like to take this opportunity to express our deep appreciation of that demonstration of friendship and goodwill by honourable senators.

We had a wonderful time with our family and friends during the past few days, and your gracious gesture contributed greatly to the occasion. Thank you very much.

GREY CUP TRAIN

DAMAGE TO COACHES BY FOOTBALL FANS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to call attention to what took place in the special train from Ottawa to Toronto on the eve of the recent Grey Cup Game. Seats in the coaches were damaged and some windows were broken, and everything had the appearance of being torn to pieces.

I am wondering if that is an illustration of the culture of our two great races, about which we hear so much. If that is an example, where are we heading? People who, in other respects, are considered to be responsible persons, wrecked property of the railways which, in the case of the C.N.R. belongs to the people of Canada. Death might easily have occurred from this behaviour. I understand that broken glass covered the floors of the coaches. It was an exhibition of wilful destruction that is a bad example to the rest of the world. I think it is a sad state of affairs.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 25, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard for concurrence in the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, last Wednesday afternoon, November 25, when the honourable Senator Leonard presented the report of the Finance Committee for concurrence, I made a few preliminary remarks before moving the adjournment of the debate, indicating the great help and co-operation and assistance the chairman had given to the committee. I would also like to include in those remarks appreciation of the great help and assistance that the officials of the different departments gave to the committee, by giving of their knowledge and experience to us.

Introducing the report, the chairman indicated that it was divided into three main divisions, the first being paragraphs 1 to 15, referring to the different forms of estimates, programs, and so on; the second, a discussion of the recommendations of the Glassco Report, dealing with financial management control; and the third dealing with the estimates in general. This appears on page 1115 of Senate Hansard of November 25 last.

Honourable senators, I think the very important part of this report, which I would like to discuss for a moment, is paragraph 11, at page 1131, where it indicates that a long period of time elapses before the final vote of supply by Parliament and the actual spending of that amount, which means that the Government has spent or is committed to spend a very large part of the money before Parliament gives it approval.

I would suggest, as also indicated in the report and in the testimony of the committee, that this should, if possible, be corrected so that the estimates do not come in the final dying days of a session.

Of course, I realize that discussions of this kind in this chamber have not a great deal to do with Parliament, since the estimates must go before the other place first. It must be clearly understood that in all financial matters respecting the Government, the elected representatives of Parliament are the final arbiters of expenditures.

Realizing the fact that under our rules we proceed faster than the other place wants us to go, probably the Senate Finance Committee could assist Parliament in discussing estimates which are of a more routine nature, yet would not eliminate the right of elected members to make sure that they have full opportunity of questioning the Government on their spending program, to air grievances, or raise points which they feel affect their constituencies or ridings.

As was indicated by the Chairman of the Finance Committee, the committee learned a great deal about the actual management and financial control of the Government, and I think that its report will be of great use in future years.

I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators to page 1117 of Senate Hansard, where paragraph (e) of the report is mentioned. There the Chairman stated:

> That departments and agencies be given the necessary financial authority and be held accountable for the effective management of the financial resources placed at their disposal.

The Chairman then added:

> In essence, this means decentralization of financial responsibility.

Honourable senators, that is not going to be accepted by every member of this committee or every member of this house. I can assure you of that.

Dr. Davidson, Secretary of the Treasury Board, stated, as appears on page 186 of the Finance Committee's report:

> There is, of course, full recognition on the part of the Government, the Treasury Board, and the departments concerned that if the departments are to take on any of these additional responsibilities in the field of financial management that have hitherto been held as the responsibility of the central control agencies, we must ensure, first of all, that they have the personnel trained and qualified, as well as their organization structured in such a way as to enable them to discharge the responsibilities.

Later he went on to say:

> With that in mind, training programs are now being developed under the auspices of the Civil Service Commission—for example, the Society of Industrial Cost Accountants, at Carleton University. It is hoped to produce, over a period of a year or so, a sufficient number of qualified cost accountants so that they can be settled into position in the departments where the transfer of responsibility is likely to take place earliest—

In other words, they are not going to take all departments of Government at once and change financial responsibilities, but they are going into certain ones first.

> —and it is hoped that the departments will be prepared to accept these responsibilities if, as and when any are transferred by Government decision, from central control agencies to the departments.

So I would suggest this means without using such fancy words, that within the department the Government chooses to initiate this program there would be greater flexibility in dealing with these estimates, subject, of course, to the fact that Parliament had voted moneys for a certain specific purpose or program. This, honourable senators, must never be forgotten, that Parliament has final authority over the estimates, so the department cannot go beyond that authority.

It was indicated to us that during the period of years under the present system some items have had to go before Treasury Board. Last year there were some 16,000 requests from the different departments to Treasury Board for permission to do certain things. They ranged from a highly specialized and expensive defence installation to the question of whether tea and crumpets should be served at a function at the Experimental Farm—right from the top to the bottom. If we have high-priced, efficient departmental officials, from the deputy ministers down, why cannot we give them a little more authority to deal with the running of their departments within certain bounds?

I repeat, it was a great pleasure to sit on the committee under the chairmanship of the honourable Senator Leonard, and an education to listen to experts from the Department of Finance, Treasury Board and the Auditor General's department. As I indicated earlier, it would pay us all to study and read the reports of the Finance Committee meetings.

To conclude, honourable senators, I think that in the future this committee can perform a very useful function, and I hope that when things around this capital city of ours are on a more even keel it will be possible for us to explore in depth certain departments or crown corporations. Earlier this session it was indicated in this place that a certain department or section of a department needed investigation for particular reasons, and I think we could do that work. We have the officials; we have the committee; we seem to have the time, so why cannot we, when we resume, have this committee make explorations in depth of the workings of either a department or crown corporation? I know all honourable senators have a particular interest in certain crown corporations and departments which they would like further investigated.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Molson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 10, 1964

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), for the second reading of Bill C-140, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1965.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, in May I spoke briefly on Canadian participation in the United Nations and other peace-keeping operations. On that occasion I asked the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) for some information which he has now supplied. I should like to comment briefly on the information as given to me.

The largest operation in which Canadian forces are engaged is that connected with the Gaza Strip. The cost to date of this operation has been $46,005,000, of which it may be that the sum of over $15 million will be recovered. At that time Canada paid the cost of the sea and air lift, amounting to $605,561. Probably this amount is not included in the other figure I have given. Anyway, Canada paid the cost of the air lift and was not reimbursed. Speaking about the air lift to the Gaza Strip, the report which the leader has given me reads as follows:

> . . . Canada absorbed the costs of the initial sea and air lift of the Canadian contingent and its equipment to the Middle East and was not reimbursed by the United Nations for these costs.

On page 2 of the same return, there is the further comment:

> Information is not available on all of these expenditures and it is therefore impossible to state what is Canada's share of the total costs of the operation.

I should like to point out to honourable senators that while the figures given in the return show the total cost to be over $46 million, it may be that the correct figure, including everything, will greatly exceed that amount.

In May, speaking in regard to the length of time the Canadian forces have been in the Gaza Strip, I made these remarks, which are reported at page 574 of the Debates of the Senate:

> The Canadian forces have been in the Gaza Strip since the fall of 1956. Is it not reasonable to ask after this long period of time if the size of the force could be reduced, and why the Canadian forces should not be brought home? If it is still necessary to maintain this type of peace-keeping force in the Gaza Strip, the Canadian troops can be replaced by troops from other United Nations countries. No doubt when the Canadian forces went to the Gaza Strip it was to be for only a short period of time, but almost eight years have elapsed since they were sent there. This same problem of length of service now faces the new Canadian peace-keeping force in Cyprus.

In the return that the honourable Leader of the Government gave me there are two interesting comments in regard to Canadian troops in the Gaza Strip force. The first reads:

> When the United Nations Emergency Force was set up by the United Nations General Assembly, it was not intended that this force should be permanent.

And then at the conclusion of the statement there is this comment:

> It would not be easy to replace the Canadian component of the UNEF with troops from another country.

I would be very happy if the honourable Leader of the Government would explain why it would not be possible to replace Canadian troops by troops from some other member nation of the United Nations.

There is another peace-keeping force in Palestine that was set up in 1948. That force is concerned with the application and observance of the general armistice agreement between Israel and the several Arab States. The cost to Canada to date has been $1,479,000, and it is still continuing. There is no recovery so far as these costs are concerned. This force has been operating since 1948. One cannot help wondering how much longer the force will operate and when their mission will be completed.

I would like the honourable leader to indicate when a force such as this will finish its duties and why, if necessary, it cannot be replaced by other troops.

It may be of interest to indicate some of the other forces around the world to which Canada contributes. The first one is most interesting. When the so-called armistice was signed in the Korean War, an armistice commission was set up, but Canada since 1955 has maintained two men in Korea. The total cost of those two men to Canada today is the small, insignificant sum of $160,000, and that cost is still continuing.

In 1955 there was set up a peace force for Indo-China, which is still continuing. That force has cost Canada to date $10,219,000, of which the sum of $2,166,000 may be recovered.

For the force in the Congo, which is listed as a continuing force, the cost to date has been $12,500,000, of which about half that amount may be recovered.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Are there any Canadian forces in the Congo?

Hon. Mr. White: In the Congo, the report shows "270 all ranks." It is listed as a continuing operation. The date of this report is June 1964. There may have been some changes since then.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: May I interrupt for a moment? The United Nations force in the Congo terminated on June 30, 1964.

Hon. Mr. White: This paper I hold in my hand is out of date. The covering letter is dated June 4, 1964.

There is a small group of Canadians in Yemen, and another in New Guinea. There is another force for the India-Pakistan border dispute. This last-mentioned group was set up in 1949, and has been operating for some 15 years. I would like to ask the honourable leader, when he replies at some later date, to give some indication of just what this group has accomplished after 15 years, and what further it hopes to accomplish. The cost of this group to date has been $951,000—practically $1 million.

The total cost of all these various groups to Canada comes to more than $72 million. Of that amount $25 million may be recovered, and if that occurs the cost to Canada will be around $47 million.

We have a force in Cyprus, which is not included in the return. We all recall that when this force was set up Canada agreed to pay the cost for the first three months. These costs are given as $3.5 million.

On page 12 of the return furnished by the honourable leader, there is this comment in connection with the force in Cyprus:

> Until the Security Council discusses the possible extension of the resolution establishing this force, and in particular the financial basis for any such extension, we are unable to say what financing measures will be taken to continue the force.

I would like to ask the honourable leader if he is able to advise the house how much longer Canada is committed to keeping this force in Cyprus and what further final arrangements have been made as to how the cost is to be apportioned.

When I spoke in May I asked the Leader of the Government if he would give some information as to who is liable for pensions paid to members of military forces who were injured, or to the dependents of those who were killed, while serving in these forces around the world. There was no mention of this in the return filed. As everyone knows, there have been both injuries and fatalities. Only last week two soldiers were killed in the Gaza Strip when their jeep struck a mine. All I would like to know is whether or not Canada is liable for the full amount of these pensions or whether, since it is a United Nations project, that body plays any part in pensions.

When one examines the long and varied lists of forces and commissions in which Canadians are serving around the world, and when one calculates the total cost to the Canadian taxpayer, one realizes that Canada has done not only her full share but probably more than her share. In fact, at times it appears as if Canada were to eager to contribute forces for these various policing organizations around the world. After all, there are now 115 members of the United Nations. Is it unreasonable to ask that all nations make some sort of fair and equal contribution in both men and money to these forces?

Certain countries which are members of the United Nations have refused, to date, to pay their part of the cost of the Gaza Strip and Congo operations. In fact, the nonpayment of their share of these costs has created a present-day crisis at the United Nations.

In 1958 the then Secretary General of the United Nations made suggestions as to certain permanent international forces to meet future emergencies. The United Nations refused to accept his recommendations. The U.S.S.R. and other communist countries, and certain African and Asian countries which had recently received their independence, opposed the organization of any peace-keeping force by the United Nations. Apparently they did not like the idea of the United Nations being able to put force behind international decisions in a way which might interfere with their own national policies.

Countries which join the United Nations should accept the responsibilities associated with membership in such an organization. If troops are required, each country should contribute in turn and all should pay their portion of the cost of the force.

I would ask the Leader of the Government to advise the house, at some future date, how Canada stands in the number of troops supplied, and the annual cost to Canada of such troops compared with other UN nations who have supplied troops for peace-keeping forces.

I think it would be interesting if the Leader of the Government would explain the method or manner or procedure followed at the United Nations when it is decided to set up a peace-keeping force, and how the quota from and the cost to each country is decided.

I realize that the honourable leader has not immediately available the answers to the various matters I have raised, and I will be quite satisfied if I can have the answers after the Christmas adjournment.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, I wish to put a few remarks on record regarding Vote 10, at the bottom of page 17 of Schedule A to the bill. I refer to the vote for scholarships and grants in aid of medical research.

There are a great many medical research-minded graduates from the colleges and universities of Canada, but a great many of the brilliant students go to the United States. My information is that the United States per capita expenditure on medical research is about five times that spent in Canada. After Canada has paid for the tuition of these students, it is only fair that she should have some of the benefit of their accomplishments, which are truly great.

Only today, we read in the newspapers of a case in Winnipeg of a little girl of 14 years, who has an implanted mitral valve in her heart. This is working well and is enabling her to live a normal life. Marked success has been attained in the field of medical research during the last few years. For instance, the dreaded disease of poliomyelitis is now almost under control. We now have such things as insulin and similar drugs for diabetes, vitamin B_{12} for pernicious anemia, tranquilizers for mental cases, and sulfa, penicillin and other antibiotics which have been used successfully in treating infections. Children's diseases, such as scarlet fever, measles, chicken pox and diphtheria are now almost under control. In fact, so great has been the progress in recent years that the average life span, which was around 50 years at the beginning of this century, is now 68 for men and 73 for women.

Medical research should always be carried on under the guidance of universities. There is not a university in Canada that does not need more money; there is not a medical faculty that would not be glad to carry on more medical research, were the funds available.

I have enumerated some of the accomplishments, but much remains to be done. There should be more experiments regarding tissue transplantation, the transplantation of organs, heart conditions, cancer, muscular dystrophy, and many other fields. For instance, mental patients occupy about half the hospital beds in Canada, and a lot remains to be done in the treatment and care of medical cases. Even in the medical-legal world there remains much doubt as to the exact standing of criminal responsibility, irresponsible impulse, and such subjects. In vascular diseases we are not yet sure what diet should be followed. There are very many things that could be done along these lines.

My suggestion is that more research work should be done, and that the Government should spend less money on issuing pamphlets and reports that are never read; that they should get out of the broadcasting business and spend more money in the areas I have mentioned. I believe that such action would greatly add to the sum total of human welfare and comfort.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, I just want to say a few words on one particular item, Vote 65, which appears on page 5 of Schedule A of the bill. The sum of $12 million is set aside for payments in respect of projects and programs under the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act. In looking up the estimates in the Blue Book I find that $9,300,000 is set aside by the federal Government for participation with the provinces in the purchase of lands or in certain projects the various provinces are undertaking.

Honourable senators will remember the idea behind the introduction of the ARDA program was to find ways and means of improving the level of living of the small farmer: first, by enlarging the economic unit; second, by technical training; third, by extending unemployment insurance benefits to farm workers; fourth, by vocational and technical training for those who wish to enter into other occupations; and, finally, by establishing small industries in local areas to give the farmers on the smaller farm units some outside work, to encourage them to stay on the farms.

As an officer of the Canadian Tree Farmers' Association I was at a meeting not long ago, and the farmers in that area were very much annoyed—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator say to what area he is referring?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: This is an area in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: The farmers in that area were very much annoyed by the provincial Government apparently stepping in and buying the lands which had temporarily fallen into disuse. That is, people who were living on land that was not being used to any great extent were being offered by the provincial Government prices well above the local level, and these older people were selling their land at an enhanced figure to the Government. I presume that part of this $9 million helps provide the province with enough money to pay 50 per cent of the cost price of this land which is being bought. The farmers at the meeting claimed that if they had known that these farms were for sale they would have bought them to enlarge their own farm units so that they would become economically sound. With the province stepping in and buying this land, apparently no thought is given to what is going to happen to it. They do not know whether they are going to keep it and let it lie idle, as has been the case for quite a while, and have it grow up into wild bush of no value.

Another point raised by the farmers in that particular area was that if instead of buying up land in this fashion the Government would set up a small mill, the farmers, through their co-operative, could work along with the federal and provincial governments in building up such a mill and thus provide work for themselves. Some farmers said they did not know whether they should go into the bush and cut wood this winter, because they have no market for it. It seems to me this is something that should be seriously looked into by the authorities and those concerned with the ARDA program.

I wanted to draw the attention of the Leader of the Government to these points. I think if he drew the attention of the Government to them, the errors could be rectified and the authorities would not continue buying this land and pushing up its value so high that local farmers cannot buy it.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I had worked on a speech during the week and had decided last evening and this morning that I would not deliver it; but somebody once said that hell hath no fury like an undelivered speech. So, after conferring with my leader at noon today, I decided to speak.

I want to speak respecting two items in the estimates: one, providing for a vote of $88 million to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; and another, later on, providing for a loan of roughly $15 million to the same corporation.

About the loan, I shall merely repeat what Senator McCutcheon said in this house a few weeks ago: this, in no sense of the true word, can or should be called a loan. The Government of Canada has about as much chance of recovering that loan of $15 million as if they had made it to me. This is not a loan: this is a grant; this is a subsidy. To call it a loan is, in my judgment, sheer humbug to mislead the people of Canada.

I have no doubt at all that under its bookkeeping system the Government puts this down as an asset. If they do they must be relying on the most inactive asset in the history of the world. On the other hand, I suppose the C.B.C. puts it down merely as a loan and not as an expenditure.

I know I am treading on almost forbidden ground when I venture to say a word of criticism against the C.B.C.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Why?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Because there seems to be in this country a conspiracy of silence by the press and the Parliament of Canada about the tremendous extravagances of the C.B.C., as I shall proceed to show shortly. If you say a word against this sacrosanct organization you will promptly be asked why the C.B.C. should not have as much autonomy as the B.B.C. If you say a thing often enough people will come to believe it. For example, the Canadian Press, a usually reliable organization, stated in a dispatch from Ottawa not long ago that the C.B.C. was merely seeking, they said, the same completely autonomous position with respect to programming and administration as was enjoyed by the British Broadcasting Corporation.

The truth is that the B.B.C. is much more under the active and continuous control of the British Government than the C.B.C. is under the control of the Canadian Government. I have here a publication entitled Britain—An Official Handbook, the 1964 edition. It is prepared by the Central Information Office of the Information Department of the United Kingdom and is sold by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in London. This handbook contains a chapter on sound and television broadcasting, and at page 481 you will find the following:

> The BBC and the ITA are independent authorities in the day-to-day operations of broadcasting, including programmes > and administration. The Government, however, retains ultimate control, and the Postmaster General, as the responsible Minister, is answerable to Parliament on broad questions of policy and may issue directions to the BBC and to the ITA on a number of technical and other subjects.

The B.B.C. operates under a licence issued by the Postmaster General under the Wireless Telegraphy and Telephonic Acts, and he may rescind that licence, suspend it or end it altogether for any cause.

It further says that

> The Postmaster General also has powers to prohibit the broadcasting of any particular matter or class of matter—

Listen to that!

> —or to revoke the licences of the BBC or ITA at any time;

These powers are treated as major reserve powers, but nevertheless their very existence, and the very existence of this power of the British Government and of the Postmaster General over the B.B.C. acts as a deterrent.

Further, from page 482 I quote the following:

> In the discharge of its responsibilities the BBC is required to ensure that its services are used, as stated in the preamble to the Charter, 'as a means of disseminating information, education and entertainment', and to pay heed to the requirements of the Licence (for instance, it must allow the broadcasting of any announcement at the request of a Government department—

I repeat:

> —it must allow the broadcasting of any announcement at the request of a Government department, and must not broadcast commercial advertisements or sponsored programmes). It must refrain from expressing editorial opinion on current affairs—

Directly or indirectly.

> —and on matters of public policy, and it is relied on to treat controversial subjects with complete impartiality.

I submit that there is vastly more government control over the B.B.C. than is exercised by the Parliament of Canada over the C.B.C.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: What are you reading from?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I am quoting from Britain—An Official Handbook issued by Her Majesty's Government in London. I shall be pleased to send it to you in due course.

I have no intention of offering any criticism of programs on the C.B.C. On the whole I think these programs are reasonably good, and if you want to find out for yourself how good they are you should go to New York some day and stay in your hotel room and turn on the programs of the two major broadcasting chains there. However, I must say that I am at times somewhat disturbed by certain programs. I would never under any circumstances go in for censorship. I think in a mature society these things must be left to public taste and public morality. Public taste will in the long run cure these programs if they are bad.

I am against people snooping around looking for what they call immoral programs, or snooping around bookshops to find books that are bad. I am all against that. I wish sincerely such people would devote more energy to trying to get people to read good books, which I am sure would be better for all concerned. And this, I feel, applies to the C.B.C. broadcasting.

Sometimes though I wonder about programs dealing with, for example, homosexuality. This is something that has come down through the centuries, and I think it is for medical clinics, for theologians or psychiatrists, and that one simply cannot deal with the subject adequately or safely in a television broadcast brought into the home. This, of course, has become a favourite current topic. With the older novelists it used to be that the theme was, boy meets girl—boy gets girl. Now the theme seems to be, boy gets boy. I wish there was some means of getting the C.B.C. to avoid that sort of programming.

What I am really concerned with is the cost to this country of the C.B.C. The report of the Glassco Commission—and in many respects it was very complimentary to the C.B.C.—at page 26 said this:

> But no evidence exists of any weighing of cost against need and the impression gained is that, generally, the pursuit of high quality has been carried on without taking into consideration what the country can afford.

Honourable senators, that is the case I wish to present. It is all very well to have good programs, and we should insist on the best programs possible but, after all, this country can only afford so much. When you have this organization coming to us and asking now for the sum of $88 million, and on top of that a loan of $15 million, you begin to ask questions. Can we really afford this sort of thing? Do you realize that according to their 1964 report, the cost of C.B.C. unsponsored programs, that is programs without advertising, last year amounted to $64 million? That works out at $1,200,000 a week for programs that were not sponsored. Can a country of this size at this time afford that?

There is another aspect of the matter. They state here that their programs carrying advertising, that is, sponsored programs, amount to $31,116,000. But the advertising did not pay the total cost of the programs. In fact, the sponsors paid $1 million less than the cost of the programs to the C.B.C. When a newspaper or magazine sells advertising, it has a rate card. If General Motors Corporation comes to us and asks for a page, we can quickly tell them exactly what it is going to cost, and it is based on the total cost to us, whether it is black and white, two colours, or three colours, and we take a profit of five or six per cent if we are lucky. But C.B.C. is selling advertising below the cost of the programs. This is where some of the tremendous losses come in.

Take one program as an example of what I have in mind, "Front Page Challenge". This is a sponsored program. But the sponsor does not pay the cost of the program. In the first place, he could not afford it and, in the second, the C.B.C. itself does not know what the program is going to cost. They brought Mr. Randolph Churchill over from England at a cost, I am told, of more than $2,000 to make one appearance on that program. No sponsor will pay for that. They brought Mr. Bennett Cerf from New York not long ago. All honourable senators know who Mr. Bennett Cerf is. He is a publisher who appears on that tired program called "What's My Line". They brought him from New York to appear on this program at a cost, I understand, of $1,000. Honourable senators, this is nonsense!

Take their practice in the matter of news. The C.B.C. today has correspondents in Tokyo, in Moscow, in China; they have two at the United Nations and two in Washington, and others in London, Bonn, Paris and, I believe, one in the Far East. I assure you, honourable senators, that this is utter and complete nonsense. In all the capitals of the world there are news agencies such as the American Associated Press, the Canadian Press, the United Press-International, and the great and famous Reuters News Agency. In addition to those there are the New York Times Service, the Herald-Tribune News Service, the Chicago Daily News Service and the Chicago Tribune Service. All or most of our papers subscribe to these. We have the New York Times News Service, and we are a small paper. Other papers—the Montreal papers and the Toronto papers—are also subscribers.

What do you get? Night after night you listen to some newsman speaking from Bonn, from Paris, from Moscow, at tremendous cost to the C.B.C. What is he saying? He is telling you something that you read in the afternoon paper six hours before. This goes on and on, and I can assure honourable senators that it costs something to keep a correspondent in Moscow, in Tokyo, and two in Washington.

Then you have what they call "Capital Report." I am bound to say that I think the C.B.C. news service department is perhaps one of their best, but they go overboard with these services. You have a man like Mr. James M. Minifie who will speak on a Sunday afternoon and tell you in a few minutes everything that is wrong in Canadian-American relations. You have some university professor from the University of Western Ontario or the University of Manitoba speaking on "Weekend Review," who has all the answers. He knows what is wrong with Canadian foreign policy. This goes on week after week, and this is the sort of thing that is resulting in these enormous costs.

Incidentally, I forgot to say when I was quoting from this report that the British Postmaster General is the responsible minister who reports to the British Parliament. Any of us who know how Westminster works knows perfectly well that these estimates could be subjected to the closest scrutiny. What scrutiny, what examination is there in the Parliament of Canada, in the other place, of the estimates of the C.B.C.? Actually, if you get up there and ask a question you are told that it will be referred to Mr. Ouimet, the President of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. My information is that nine times out of ten the answer never comes back. If you complain about this you are told: "Keep the C.B.C. out of the hands of the politicians." This is said over and over again in the press. It is said by these young commentators and television experts. I hear it repeated every week—whatever we do we must keep the C.B.C. out of the hands of the politicians.

Honourable senators, who are the politicians? The politicians are the persons the people of Canada elect to represent them in Parliament, and their primary and historic function is to examine, scrutinize and criticize the Queen's estimates. Apparently, while that is accepted, while you can criticize, question and examine the estimates of the executive, it is heresy in this country at the present time to ask anything about the estimates of the C.B.C.

I know I shall be told that they issue an annual report. Well, I have their annual report in front of me. Most of it is taken up with glorifications of the programs of the C.B.C., and many claims are made for them.

Some of them are just. But what do they say about their financial operations? Let me read the first paragraph about these operations. It says that the total income for the year was $111 million-odd. That is the total income for the year. I have seen that paragraph appear in our Canadian newspapers showing that the C.B.C. had a very small deficit for the year. The fact is, of course, that of the $111 million some $80 million went to them by way of a grant from the Government. But this is not shown in their statements as they appear in the press. They say that their income was $111 million, and in August they said they had something left over to pay back to the Government. Now, imagine! This year the grant was only $80 million-odd. I venture to say it will be more next year.

A few days ago in the other place two or three questions were asked about the C.B.C., and an example was given of their extravagance. There is in the C.B.C. a sort of Parkinson's law of stone and mortar. They put up a building here in Ottawa, which was opened a few months ago, at a cost of $3,355,000. The furnishings—and I am not surprised at this; I think it is a fair estimate—cost $135,000. Presumably this building has a board room where the governors or the heads of the departments can meet. This is inevitable. Yet, a few weeks ago the program directors of the C.B.C. from all over Canada came to Ottawa, and where do you think they met? They did not meet in this grand new building that you see on your way to the airport. They took their meeting to the Seignory Club.

This is the trouble with the C.B.C. They have a psychology of spending. They have no sense of responsibility whatever to the taxpayers and to the Parliament of Canada, and as long as this rule of silence continues—this silence in the press and in Parliament about this organization which has become a sort of principality, in fact, almost a state within a state—you dare not criticize it. You are attacked the next day if you do, as I am sure I will be attacked in the press clear across Canada for daring to say a word against the C.B.C. Not only that; you are denounced as an anti-intellectual, as a low-brow, as somebody who cares not for Canadian culture.

I said I was not going to say anything about their programs, and I am not. On the whole I think they are good, although not all of them. Sixty per cent of their programs are concerned not with culture at all, but with entertainment. But, there is one other aspect of this matter that I think should be brought to the attention of this house.

I said a moment ago that when we of the Ottawa Journal, or Maclean's magazine, sell a page of advertising to General Motors or British American Oil we sell it from a rate card. They know exactly what they are buying and we know exactly what we are selling. But the C.B.C. does not do that. The C.B.C. sells its program at a loss, and that loss is made up by the C.B.C.'s competitors —by Maclean's magazine or the Ottawa Journal. We are taxed to pay a subsidy to people who are competing with us, and that, I think, is an immoral thing. It makes a mockery of our talk of free enterprise in Canada. We are taxed to pay for the subsidy given by the Government to our competitors.

What is the effect of this upon the magazine media of Canada? I know a little about this. I happen to have been the chairman of a royal commission that investigated the state of Canadian magazines. I do not know where the report is now. Somebody once said that if Moses had been the chairman of a royal commission the Israelites would still be in Egypt. I console myself with that saying.

What this Commission found was that the plight of Canadian magazine media in Canada today is caused not only by the fact that we allow two United States owned publications to take 45 per cent of all the advertising revenue, but by the fact that a Government organization like the C.B.C. is assisted by the Government to compete with the magazines for advertising. I venture to say that in two years the great publication, Maclean's magazine, will not exist, because it cannot go on with the losses it is sustaining at the present time.

This is what is called planning—planning by which you subsidize an organization like the C.B.C. to put your magazine media out of business.

The late President Kennedy, in one of the last speeches he made, said that the communications media of United States magazines and newspapers were as vital to that country as were its defences. Honourable senators, that is true.

We have no national newspapers in Canada. We have no London Times, we have no Manchester Guardian, we have no great weeklies like the Spectator, the Economist, the New Statesman, and so on. Therefore, for dialogue and discussion, for debate and for self-examination on a national scale, we must or ought to depend on our national magazines. If they go we shall cease to have Canadian voices in this country at all.

I do not want to go on to Canadian neutral newspapers. There is too much violence in the world already.

Honourable senators, this is a dangerous position for Canada. The C.B.C. is being subsidized to an extent that this country cannot afford and in a way that is enabling it to endanger the existence of our magazines. There is no question about this at all. I have a number of supporting facts here but I am not going to bore you with them.

In going through these estimates I have been impressed by one point. This Government which, in the days of its opposition, talked so forcibly, so eloquently and so truthfully about the need to get costs down, is showing no real, no effective, effort to cut costs.

I am not blaming one party. When the party to which I belong was in office, it also spent too freely. Every government at every level is spending beyond this nation's capacity. A lot of it comes from a fallacy existing now, that we are a world power—yet we are not. We adopt that psychology, we look upon ourselves as a world power and we are doing the things which honourable Senator White mentioned a few moments ago, doing them so easily, rushing into when, as he mentioned, nations far richer than ours are holding back. This policy cannot continue. We cannot continue to permit the C.B.C. to go on as at present.

A few years ago, when the Canadian National Railways was losing $40 million or $60 million a year, we said it was a white elephant, a millstone around our necks. You remember that Lord Atholstan was writing of "a whisper of death." Today we have the C.B.C. asking us for twice the sums that the Canadian National used to ask for, and no one dares say a word about it.

There is only one remedy for all this. I was tremendously gratified the other day when Senator Leonard made his admirable statement. As I listened to him and heard him tell of the work the Finance Committee had done and what it hoped to do in the future, I could not but think that here at last was an example of real Senate reform, Senate reform from within the walls of this chamber, by senators themselves, not the sort of thing you hear from economic and political illiterates outside this chamber, or that is snatched from election campaign literature.

This is a hope, but I am afraid it will be too late. Before this situation goes too far, there should be set up in this Parliament a standing committee which every year will bring before it Mr. Ouimet, just as they bring Mr. Donald Gordon, and ask him to give an accounting of what he is doing with Canadian money. I repeat, we are spending too much money at every level, we are piling debt upon debt and inevitably, if we go on, the waters of inflation will mount the dam, with loss and misery for us all.

(Translation):

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, the speech which our colleague just delivered stirred in me some thoughts which I have intended to express for a few years.

The C.B.C. should not disappear, because private television is not too good. However, the money we spend towards the C.B.C. should not be used to cause dissension in this country.

When I see what went on during the Queen's visit and during the preceding weeks, I realize that the C.B.C. endeavoured to prove that in the Province of Quebec many people would do whatever they could to prevent such a visit. That is false because the culprits who committed the few acts of misdemeanour which occurred came from outside Quebec City.

Three weeks before, efforts were made to create an atmosphere of suspicion so that people would stay home and think that something terrible would happen during the Queen's visit. I had stated, months before, that we, the people of Quebec, would show her our good hospitality.

But when we find that the C.B.C. brings to the fore foreigners who came here to raise dissensions within our midst, I think we are giving too much money to that corporation.

It seems to me that the C.B.C. should be some sort of training school and not a school fostering division in our country, especially when I think that a Quebec newspaperman who had written a true and sensible article against all those agitators and who had been invited to express his views on television, at Quebec City, had been turned down in Montreal because they did not want such a controversial matter to be discussed, while a few days later a foreigner was afforded the opportunity to talk to us for ten or fifteen minutes, about Quebec's separation from Confederation.

Some people are responsible for what is going on. There is a fifth column in the C.B.C. and it should be taken out of there.

If we want to celebrate the Confederation centennial in 1967, we must set our own house in order.

Some time ago, I met a C.B.C. official and he told me: It is difficult, sir, to have all the authority we should have, because if we fire someone, there is a strike. We are being set up. In some sectors, communist unions are in place, anarchists are there to try to destroy our nation just as they are attempting to do it in many other countries.

The C.B.C. is not there merely to broadcast news and movies, sometimes more than shocking, immoral movies. That is no excuse for the private T.V. which sometimes shows even more stupid pictures.

Since the C.B.C. is our own national organization getting government subsidies of something like $88 million, besides its advertising revenues, and $15 million in loans,—which is something important—it seems to me that this corporation should endeavour to school our young people in order to give them good common sense and teach them what is beauty instead of always showing them what is evil, depressing, what kills and disorganizes the family, in brief, creates anarchy.

Honourable senators, have you even had an opportunity to see on T.V. a movie praising family life, starring people who love each other and who actually work for peace and good? No. On the contrary, it is always matrimonial triangles or affairs involving up to five persons, intimacies, murders. Killings are shown, methods of killing are demonstrated. It is wondered afterwards why our young people are depraved and know how to kill each other.

It seems to me that with the money given to that corporation we should get constructive as well as educational programs, particularly with moral overtones.

There is talk about freedom; but does freedom only exist for evil? I feel that we too should be free to do good and to show where it is, instead of always pointing to evil, because happiness exists in this world when one is willing to find it. In order to be happy, however, one must act accordingly. Unfortunately, people take the opposite view and say: In the past, such filth was to be found in books. I agree, but pictures did not exist as they do today; pictures make an impression, and corrupt even more than words, especially children. If you have ever observed a child of 8, 10 or even 12, you know that pictures make an impression on him.

I sat for some 30 years on the school board of my small town. It is extraordinary but, at the beginning of television, when boxing or wrestling matches were shown, the next morning all you could see were boxing or wrestling matches in the school yards. I remember an accident which cost the school board several thousand dollars; a child was spread-eagled and crippled for the rest of his life. It was always very difficult for the teachers to control the children the day after the televised wrestling match.

I will say no more. I hope that one day we will understand that if we want to live in peace in our country, television will have to teach us how to live in peace, how to do good and not evil.

(Text):

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I certainly enjoyed the remarks of the two previous speakers, and I share their view that the Canadian Government should exert some control over the C.B.C. Indeed, I believe the sentiment on all sides today is that our Government should have some restraining hand in the operations of the C.B.C.

My purpose in rising is to ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) if, when he is obtaining the answers to the questions asked by Senator White, and in respect to the remarks of Senator Hollett last night in reference to the forestry units of Newfoundland, he will also look into the situation with respect to the Hong Kong veterans.

Just lately I have had a good deal of correspondence and representations have been made to me with respect to the treatment of the Hong Kong veterans. I know a lot has been done for them, but I believe they are now asking that something more be done. I understand a study is being made of the situation. However, I wish to say, and with this I think most of you will agree, that we cannot do too much for the Hong Kong veteran.

I realize that Canada has treated her veterans generously compared to other nations of the world, and for that I am sure all Canadians are proud. However, in my judgment, the Hong Kong veterans deserve special treatment. That is why I ask the honourable leader to check what is actually being done for them.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Connolly speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I am sure we will all agree that this may be a difficult debate to close. Although the debate has been brief, it has been a good one, and conducted on a level eminently worthy of the membership of this honourable house.

Last evening I commenced the debate by saying that this is an important measure. Of course, the final supply bill, subject to further supplementary estimates, is always an important measure because of its character. It is also important because, as the welfare state grows—and none of us for a moment would doubt the fact that we live in a welfare state—the ramifications of government go further and further into the private sector of the economy and into the private parts of the society in which we live. As this process continues, the Government must extract more money on account of the services that the state is continually called upon to provide, and to enlarge those services already provided.

I do not intend to suggest that I am going to answer every question that has been raised. I am sure that is more than any honourable senator would expect of me.

Honourable senators, first I should say that the questions raised by Senator White on the interim supply bill last spring, and which he raised again today, are of extreme importance. He has kindly said that he would not expect detailed answers today. I am sure he will not be surprised when I assure him that, in any event, I could not give the answers today.

I do not think it is enough to deal with specific questions about this important issue which has been raised by Senator White, and mentioned by the honourable senator from Carleton (Hon. Mr. O'Leary) in his speech, and to let it go at that. I would hope that, perhaps not before the end of the year, but in the new year we could find an opportunity to deal with this question in a more comprehensive way than is done by the process of asking questions and providing answers. I could have a talk with Senator White about this matter, and possibly we could arrange to have a reasonably lengthy debate and discussion in another forum that this house provides for the investigation of matters of this kind.

Senator White said that he sometimes gets the impression that we are trying to do too much in the international sphere. This is an idea shared by many members of the Senate and many other Canadians. However, it is important to keep clearly in focus the policy, which has been a bipartisan policy.

I do not like to refer to what I myself have said about serious matters like this, but it comes to my mind that when I was in Lima, Peru, a couple of weeks ago, the Latin American countries were saying, "What more help can you give us? How can you do something more comparable to what the Americans are doing in the Alliance for Progress, and in other ways?" I replied—and I confess that I did so with a certain amount of pride—that there are indirect benefits that flow to the South American countries from things which Canada does, one of which has been our help to preserve the peace of the world in areas where it is threatened, for if the peace of the world is not preserved, then the economic growth that these countries require or the social development they look for cannot be achieved. So we do something for other countries, as well as for ourselves, when we engage in these peace-keeping operations.

It may be that we can be critical of the fact that in some of these operations we try to do too much. Perhaps we do not cut down soon enough, or we do not adjust to meet the required conditions. I think this is a matter for debate. However, I do feel, as I believe is generally felt by Canadians, that the contribution which Canadians make to peace-keeping is a valuable one.

I should like to add that the people involved in the trouble spots, I think without exception, rather welcome the intervention of Canada, perhaps in preference to that of many of the other countries which might want to intervene. I believe one of the reasons why we have been asked to help so often is that apparently we are considered to be fair. We have no imperial ambition; we are not thought of as trying to sell a bill of goods to anyone. This is a national attribute of which all Canadians can and should be proud, and as honourable senators go abroad and discuss matters of this kind with people, I think they too feel deep down a glow of pride in the work that Canada is doing in these fields.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): May I say to Senator O'Leary (Carleton), Senator Vaillancourt and Senator Burchill that I think the question they raised—and particularly Senator O'Leary's remarks regarding the C.B.C.—is one of the utmost importance, not only to Parliament but to each and every Canadian. Certainly, we have a new industry, a new medium of communication, a new entity on the Canadian scene that has affected our lives since its inception and development within the memory of all of us—perhaps more than any other single instrument that has been developed in the peacetime life of our country.

I recall an address by the first president of the C.B.C. to a meeting of the Canadian Club in Ottawa, and Senator O'Leary was probably present too. Nobody knew what television was really going to be like. Mr. Dunton said on that occasion that many people had asked him, "What effect is television going to have upon Canadian life?" I remember his answer so well because I thought it a "flip" answer, but he knew what he was talking about. The answer he gave was, "plenty." I think Senator O'Leary has proved the point Mr. Dunton made those many years ago when television first began.

Senator O'Leary says the general feeling is we should not dare to criticize the C.B.C. Frankly, I take the opposite view. Any parliamentarian has the right and, in many respects, the obligation to criticize, if criticism is warranted. I would remind the senator, who is a classical scholar too, that carved above the door to the drawing room of our Speaker's Chambers is a Latin aphorism, Sapara Auda, which means, "Dare to be prudent." What he has suggested here this afternoon lives up to that adage. I believe we can dare to be prudent about matters like the one he has raised. In this field he is an expert, for he has had the experience of being the chairman of a royal commission and of a distinguished lifetime spent in the field of journalism and letters in this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Senate reform, he says, can begin by action within the Senate. I agree. I think it is for senators to decide what they can do in the public interest. I certainly would invite Senator O'Leary and other interested senators to broach this question of an examination of the C.B.C. when the Finance Committee is again set up. It is a proper subject of investigation. However, I would say that they, daring to be prudent, would want to do it at the appropriate time and in a thorough-going and appropriate way. At the moment there is an investigation being carried out under the chairmanship of Mr. R. M. Fowler, who has already examined broadcasting in Canada, and perhaps the report of this inquiry might be awaited before the Senate takes action. I certainly would be the last one to suggest that the Senate or its Finance Committee should adopt the attitude of "hands off the C.B.C." I want to dispel that thought if it exists in the Senate. I am sure we are all grateful to Senators O'Leary, Vaillancourt and Burchill for their contributions on this point.

I can assure Senator Burchill that on the point he raises regarding the Hong Kong veterans—on which I confess I have no information at the moment—I will inquire, and when I have some information I shall send the results of my inquiries to him.

I thank Senator Pearson also for his remarks on the ARDA program. He always takes a practical approach in the speeches and points he makes here. If there is a "bug" in this new program—and it is a new program, having been inaugurated in the last four or five years—he has pointed up something that does bear investigation. I promise to bring it to the attention of the Minister of Forestry, under whose jurisdiction this falls.

We are always impressed by what Senator Gershaw says, particularly when he speaks, as he did today, on the importance of medical research. Again, this is a program which involves the expenditure of tremendous amounts of money. I am sure we all agree it would be desirable if some kind of strings could be attached to the research and medical experts who are trained in this country at public expense and who then export themselves to other countries. A few years ago when the Senate Committee on Manpower and Employment was discussing this very point, I think the conclusion reached was that we make up more on the swings than we lose on the roundabouts, and that the experts that we do get in all fields of technical, scientific and cultural endeavour from abroad probably outnumber those who go elsewhere. However, it is a continuing problem and I thank Senator Gershaw for bringing it to our attention.

Now might I speak to some of the points raised last evening? Perhaps first I could deal with the one Senator Roebuck raised, because it is specific. He asked for a comparison of Canadian Government expenditures per capita with those of the United Kingdom and the United States. I have spoken with the authorities at the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and they have produced what they describe as a valid comparison of the total government expenditures in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States—that is, federal, provincial and municipal for the Canadian subject; federal, state and municipal for the United States; and national and municipal for the United Kingdom, there being no intermediate level of government in the United Kingdom. The per capita figures are as follows:

Canada	$604
United Kingdom	$492
United States	$864

Senator Hollett asked a number of questions last night with reference to the Newfoundland Forestry Units, particularly in the second war.

The information that I have is as follows.

As he said, they were enlisted in World War I in the armed forces. In World War II they were enrolled in the Newfoundland Overseas Forestry Unit as a civilian unit. All members of the unit in World War II who served for at least six months in the United Kingdom and who volunteered to serve for the duration of the war are eligible to receive the same rates and allowances that are provided for in the War Veterans Allowance Act, under Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. These are the same rates as apply to merchant seamen who served at least six months at sea, and whose service must have included at least one trip through dangerous waters. The increase in the rates of the ceilings now proposed for the schedules of the War Veterans Allowance Act, I am informed, applies mutatis mutandis to Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. Therefore, members of the Newfoundland Overseas Forestry Unit will benefit to the same degree.

Senator Hollett made a particular point about the mainland foresters in World War II. My information is that these people were in the army, and as such were eligible for war veterans' allowances. But the Newfoundland unit was a civilian unit and, as I said, the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, Part XI, applies to them, and they have the same rights and the same ceilings as they had under the War Veterans Allowance Act of 1962. I understand the difference is that they are not eligible for pensions under the Pensions Act.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I think it came under compensation, did it not?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, they are under the allowances act.

Senator White asked a number of questions last evening dealing generally with veterans' legislation. I say to Senator White, as I said some time ago in connection with a speech made by Senator Walker, that Newman once said that successive generations build upon the shoulders of the ancient, and we build upon the experience and the developments that our ancestors have produced. I think this is particularly true in respect of a good many of these programs, and generally speaking veterans' legislation from the First World War on through the second, and indeed through the so-called peace between the wars up to the present time, has been progressively liberal—with a small "1", of course—and as Senator Burchill has said, veterans' legislation in Canada is as good as if not better than that to be found anywhere else in the world. I think we are operating within that kind of framework.

Senator White asked, why did we do this through an appropriation act? Why didn't we amend the statute? That is a good question, and I may not be able to give as good an answer. It was done before and it was criticized, but all honourable senators will know what I mean when I say that probably the most effective and fastest way to see benefits turned into real benefits is not by means of a suggestion on a piece of paper, even if that paper is a Government Order Paper in the other house. Perhaps the best way to accomplish the result desired is to do it this way rather than by amending the statute. I should point out, of course, that this bill is a statute and it is a perfectly legal way to do it; it is not a hidden way, since Senator White himself has seen it and we have been debating it. Certainly, if it was desired to do it before the end of the current calendar year, then this seems to be the most effective way of doing it. At any rate it is now before us.

Senator White suggests that the amount is not adequate or appropriate. He also has some criticism of the fact that pensions were originally based on wages paid to unskilled labour and that they should therefore now be increased by more than the amount proposed, since wages in the unskilled labour market are somewhat higher than the rates proposed here. Well, the last pension increase was given in May of 1961, and what the authorities have tried to do is to equate as closely as they could the change since that last amendment with the changes in the wage structure in the unskilled market. That is what the suggested new figures are supposed to reflect. Senator White himself pointed out that there are certain other fringe benefits which flow from these pensions—they are tax-free and there is protection for widows and children.

Senator White also wondered about the granting of pensions according to rank. I should point out that no increases in the rates payable to those who held a rank above that of captain, colonel or group captain in World War I are proposed, and in fact none have been made since the end of World War II. So, the rates for those who served in lower ranks are in fact gradually overtaking the rates payable to the higher ranks, and the time will come when the rates will be equal. I am informed that the American experience is that the rates for the lower ranks have in fact overtaken the rates paid to the higher ranks.

The distinction was made as a result of a precedent copied from the British legislation and which in those days was also in the American legislation. It is being eroded away and in time, perhaps quite soon, the two scales may be the same.

There is a difference, I suppose, between a situation like this, where you are dealing with veterans, and what you find in compensation cases in the courts. The comparison may be unfair, but if Senator White had two compensation cases arising out of a motor car accident, one on behalf of an unskilled labourer and one on behalf of an architect who commands huge commissions, then I think the claim would be much larger in the second than in the first case. I do not say this basis of comparison is on all fours with the situation respecting a pension for a disabled ex-service man, but there may be some reason for considering the other aspect.

Senator White also raised the question of aggravation of pre-enlistment conditions. I have talked to the Chairman of the Pension Commission about this matter. He says that certainly there have been a good many cases of very serious complaint about men who were given a clean bill of health on enlistment in the forces, but when later they applied for a pension they were told that in the opinion of the commission the disability from which they suffered was attributable to a condition that existed before enlistment. They in turn cite the certificate that was given at the time of their enlistment. I understand that the commission at times has uncovered a good many cases where definite evidence has turned up which proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that a man whose medical certificate showed he was in A-1 condition at the time of enlistment in fact was not.

I was told of one man who made a claim on the basis of having traumatic arthritis of the knees. It was later discovered on his own testimony that some years before he had enlisted in the Second World War he had fallen off a train—he was hobo-ing through the country at the time, as I think the expression was—and he had considerably damaged his knees and was in hospital three months. This did not show up on the certificate. It was found that the condition of which he was complaining at that time really existed before he enlisted.

There are many such cases. Many files have been built up. The commission tries, I am informed, to be completely objective and fair. They do their best. I suppose, too, the development of modern medical science puts facilities at the commission's disposal which make it easier for them to be more definite about their findings, and that will be the case more and more as time goes on.

Regarding section 70 and the benefit of the doubt, I might mention that I was talking to a very distinguished member of this chamber who was responsible for the drafting of this section. I do not want to take his name in vain or to paraphrase him unfairly, but I understand from him—and he will correct me if I am wrong—that he approached the problem first through two of the ablest counsel in Canada, Mr. Isaac Pitblado of Winnipeg, who happily is still with us and at the Bar, and Mr. Aimé Geoffrion of Montreal. What was proposed to them was that the benefit of the doubt that should be available to an accused in a criminal trial should also be available to a veteran in a case where he was making an application under the Pension Act, and where it was not certain whether or not his case had been established fully.

I suppose, like any judge or jury, the Pension Commission can make mistakes. The present minister seems to feel that the section, in the light of the experience of the board, could be improved. He said this in the other place in October. I promise Senator White that I will bring to the minister's attention the remarks he made on this point last night, supplemented by a very poor rendition of what I am sure a former Minister for Air might have said had he been speaking in my place this afternoon.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): With leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I have two questions to ask, and they can be answered when we meet together again. The first one is: Will the C.B.C. instruct its French broadcasters and commentators to pronounce the word "Noël" correctly until next Christmas?

Honourable senators, you may laugh. We have been speaking of reform, but this is merely the correction of one single word. I am wondering if someone will tell the broadcasters to stop making mistakes in pronouncing that word.

I remember one occasion that Mr. St. Laurent, when he was prime minister, complained of the C.B.C., and the socialist policy was to condemn him for interfering with the management of the C.B.C. I merely want the correction of the pronunciation of the French word "Noël". It is well pronounced by all Englishmen who say it, and I want it correctly pronounced by the French commentators.

My second question is about the C.N.R. trains at Rivière du Loup station. I was certainly disappointed that the Government did not answer my inquiry. The trains stop far west of the station, and it is a great inconvenience. We seem to be laughed at by the management of the C.N.R. in that connection, but I think of the women with children who have to walk a long distance in order to catch a train. It makes no sense, and I hope that my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) will rub the ears of his colleagues who are responsible for the estimates of the Canadian National Railways, and that in turn his colleagues will rub the big ears of Donald Gordon.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I will rub Mr. Gordon's ears myself.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, I wish to say just a word. I am not at all satisfied with the statement made by the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) with respect to the Newfoundland Foresters, because he made it seem that everything in the garden is lovely. It is not lovely. We shall hear more about it from the Foresters in Newfoundland.

I want the honourable leader to have the matter placed before the proper authority in the Government, because I am sure that his answer does not give the ordinary listener a true picture. I am sure the honourable leader has done the best he can, but I want to keep this matter alive.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Of course this matter need not end here. There is no reason in the world why it should. I do say to the honourable senator that in so far as his points relate to war veterans' allowances then they are on par, as my answer indicated, with the allowances granted under the War Veterans Allowance Act to other servicemen.

On the question of the pensions themselves, this is another question. Perhaps the honourable gentleman would get specific information on the question of pensions and I will go further with it then.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Thank you very much.

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, I intend to speak only for a moment or two. It is because of the fine work of the Standing Committee on Finance under the chairmanship of honourable Senator Leonard that I bring up this point. One of the points which brought about considerable discussion as to the compiling of the Auditor's Report was the manner in which the estimates are presented. We did not take the departments individually; we took the whole question of all the estimates.

I want to point out to the honourable leader and to honourable senators that in this particular bill which we are discussing we find figures dealing with the St. Lawrence Seaway under three different headings. I do not want to open up again the subject of the Seaway and the amount of money being expended. However, in fairness it would almost appear as though they were covering up certain figures and making expenditures that they are not showing under the proper headings.

On page 26, there is a vote under the heading "St. Lawrence Seaway" for $2,838,000. Then on page 28, two pages later, we find another item for the St. Lawrence Seaway, $10,300,000. On page 38, under item 103a, there is an item under the National Harbours Board having to do with the St. Lawrence. This amounts to $5,237,801. That gives a total, in connection with the St. Lawrence development, of $18,375,801. I feel that we should put this in one lump sum to show the amount of money being spent on the St. Lawrence operation.

Honourable senators, may I also mention that in Schedule A, page 20, vote 70, there is a federal grant for constructing an ice control structure, another $4 million. This should be included with the other items to show a true picture of what it is costing to operate the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I wonder if the honourable senator really thinks of item 103a on page 38, involving an expenditure of over $5 million, as being in connection with the St.-Lawrence Seaway? It is expenditure in connection with the Canadian Universal and International Exhibition of 1967.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: It might be under that heading, but it is generally recognized that that is so because of the pressure brought to bear by certain interests to put it in this way. It rightly belongs under the St. Lawrence operation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to the order for Notices of Motions:

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, December 14, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE

AUTHORITY TO SIT DURING SENATE ADJOURNMENTS

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators arising out of the motion which has just been passed, may I move, seconded by Senator Lambert:

> That the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications be empowered to sit during adjournments of the Senate and that Rule 85 be suspended in relation thereto.

The reason for the motion is that we had called a meeting of the committee for tomorrow to consider Bill S-42 and unless we get this permission we cannot sit.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

THE ECONOMICAL MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved second reading of Bill S-48, respecting The Economical Mutual Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, before proceeding with an explanation of the bill, I would like to thank Senator Taylor (Norfolk) for presenting this bill last evening when I was unavoidably detained on coming into the Senate chamber. If he had not presented the bill last evening, we could not have proceeded with the second reading at this time.

The bill has the purpose of providing a French equivalent for the name of the company. The present name is The Economical Mutual Insurance Company. The French version of the name suggested in the bill is L'Economical, Compagnie Mutuelle d'Assurance. I should mention that if and when the bill is in committee the company will request a small change in the name proposed in the bill.

This company was incorporated on June 24, 1871 under the provisions of chapter 52 of the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, 1859, under the name The Economical Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Berlin. The head office of the company was established at the Town of Berlin, in the Province of Ontario, now the City of Kitchener, and it has remained there ever since. This company has always been a mutual company and has never had any share capital.

On February 2, 1917 the company's name was changed by the deletion of the words "of Berlin". Its corporate name thereafter was "The Economical Mutual Fire Insurance Company".

The company as presently established was incorporated in 1932 under the provisions of chapter 54 I Edward VIII Canada. Under the provisions of that act it acquired the rights and property and assumed the obligations and liabilities of the company so established under the provisions of the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada. In 1952, the company's corporate name was changed to The Economical Mutual Insurance Company, by chapter 60 of the Statutes of Canada.

The company transacts almost all classes of casualty insurance business, other than ocean marine, across Canada except in the Provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan. Its gross premiums in 1963 were $10,842,923. As at December 31, 1963, the company's surplus was $7,521,015.

The company has been carrying on business in the Province of Quebec continuously since 1937. It conducts its Quebec business through a branch office in Montreal and has some 200 agents throughout the province.

Honourable senators will no doubt be interested to know that the late Senator Euler was for a long time president of this company and held that office at the time of his death.

If this bill receives second reading today, I shall propose that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald (Brantford), bill referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard for concurrence in the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, since the hour is advanced my remarks in connection with the report of the Finance Committee will be brief. At the outset, I would like to say that when the Senate referred the expenditures of this country, as proposed in the estimates, to the Finance Committee for study, it created an opportunity for a very useful exercise.

The task of the committee in reviewing the estimates was, first of all, to reach an understanding of the methods of preparation of the estimates, and also of the basis on which the items were produced. All of that appears clearly and concisely in Senator Leonard's report.

It was necessary, however, for the committee to study this aspect of the estimates at some length, because no intelligent inquiry or criticism of estimates can be made until the fundamentals are clearly understood. During the course of that study, many interesting matters of general principle were discussed. The discussions, which are recorded in the published proceedings, were useful.

The observation is often made that if the affairs of government were conducted in the same way as business, they would be much simpler and clearer, and there would be almost no problems at all, but that because of these archaic practices and systems government finance and financial management present a very complex picture.

As we studied these matters in committee, the farther we went the more we realized that business and government have very different problems. For example, in business we have little difficulty in distinguishing between capital and current expenditures. Perhaps one of the few occasions is when it comes to the time of deciding which are expenses from an income tax point of view. Generally speaking, however, not only do we do this as a habit, but we are compelled to do so under the Companies Act, by the requirement of a separation of these items in the balance sheet and the financial statements.

We discussed whether, during the year, government expenditures for buildings and major capital works could not be kept separate from current expenditures, and immediately we found many reasons why the present system might be just as good, if not perhaps better.

We also learned that the United States and Great Britain are on a cash basis, just as we are in Canada. In fact, this was a subject of committee investigation in the United Kingdom. They reached the conclusion that while the business practice of separation of capital and current expenditures had some merit, perhaps for purposes of government of a country the cash system was in fact the best.

Another aspect that strikes one is that in government the details of very large inventories of supplies, parts, and so on are recorded meticulously, but that record consists of numbers, such as so many shovels, so many horses, so many paper clips, with no value attached to these items. Of course, if we did that in private enterprise, we would be quickly out of business. It may be that this is appropriate for government accounting, but I am not sure that it is.

There is no write-off for obsolescence or depreciation of these inventories. Instead of write-offs, inventories are examined periodically, and items that are declared obsolete or surplus, go to a surplus establishment, like War Assets, which disposes of them. Last week I read that several hundred air force tunics were up for disposal, and they could not get a single bid for them. Perhaps I am digressing; however, this demonstrates that there are many areas in which business practice is not necessarily the best for government.

Another item touched on in the report is that of the principle of estimating for net expenditures, that is, taking the estimated expenditures of a department and offsetting against those expenditures any revenues which might be expected. Of course, this would be done in business; it is sound practice. In studying the matter, one finds perhaps a department with revenue as well as expenditures, but the expenditures arise in one part of the year and the revenues in another. So how do you operate that department and take care of the expenditures until your revenues start coming in? Again, that is a complication which would not normally arise in business.

A further handicap to the principle of estimating for the net expenditures is that before all government departments could change to that system, we would first have to achieve this other end that is dealt with in the report, that of a change in the system to financial responsibility within the department instead of having it remain with the Comptroller of the Treasury. Again, that is something which on the surface sounds simple but which on deeper examination presents considerable complications.

Another short discussion occurred as to whether, in fact, all the work that goes into the preparation of the estimates is necessary. In our governmental financial administration system we start the year with the estimates, as we all know, the Blue Book, and having gone through that year, we end up the following year with another formidable set of accounts which are the public accounts of Canada. One might reasonably ask: If the estimates are prepared in careful detail, with great exactitude and consideration in relation to all problems involved, is it then necessary, when that money is spent, to go back and put it in even greater detail again at the other end? The public accounts comprise a large volume that sells to the public for $13.50—it is a mammoth work. If all possible details were presented in the first instance, at the beginning of the year, then when the money had been spent and the operations carried out, it might be possible to have a considerably simpler form of report than is the case today. Actually, I understand this is under consideration by the Public Accounts Committee in the other place and by the Treasury Board, and I would like to think that some of the vast quantity of work might be reduced by giving the complete detail at the beginning or at the end of the year, but not necessarily at both ends.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable senator whether the Glassco Commission made any recommendation in connection with this problem?

Hon. Mr. Molson: I do not think it did on this particular point.

I suggest it is well worth while reading the proceedings of the Finance Committee meetings, for the reasons I mentioned earlier. The method and the basis of preparation of the estimates become quite clear, as set out by the witnesses who appeared before the committee. Those witnesses were all very competent. I was most impressed, as I know all members of the committee were, by the intelligence, integrity and vital interest those senior civil servants bring to bear on the financial problems of this country. I was also impressed with the fact we are extraordinarily fortunate in Canada in the calibre of the public servants we attract to those senior offices in the civil service.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Molson: I would just like to say that in retrospect, looking at the work of this committee, and as outlined in Senator Leonard's report, it is apparent that changes were occurring to some extent before the Glassco Commission, but perhaps not enough. Since the Glassco Commission the recommendations have either been implemented or are being seriously and thoroughly studied. So one can say that progress has been and is continuing to be made. I think there is every hope there will be continuous improvement in the form of the presentation of the estimates.

In conclusion I would like to say one further word. The Senate owes a considerable debt of gratitude to the Chairman of the Finance Committee. He handled the program of sittings and the evidence before that committee in an absolutely exemplary way. I for one found it not only a pleasure but an honour to serve with Senator Leonard, and on behalf of the Senate I would like to thank him for the work he did on the committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, may I add a word to what Senator Molson has said.

Having served on the Finance Committee ever since I had the honour of becoming a member of this chamber, I want to say that I believe it is a most important committee, that it does a tremendous amount of good work, and that it should be given more priority among our committees.

I remember the pleasure I experienced, and the mass of information I acquired, when I sat on the committee under the chairmanship of Senator Crerar. On that occasion we went into the estimates. We did an entirely different type of work from that which has been done this year, and I as a member of this branch of Parliament obtained a tremendous amount of information. Senator Lambert was associated with Senator Crerar in drafting the report and the general work of the committee, and they performed a monumental task.

I join with Senator Molson in what he has said about the present chairman of the committee. Senator Leonard has done an outstanding job.

I should also like to pay tribute to the senior civil servants who appeared before the committee, all of whom impressed us very much. I do not know what Senator Leonard's experience has been, but in the past the various chairmen of the Finance Committee have had some difficulty at times in getting these gentlemen to appear before the committee, not because of any reluctance on the part of the individuals concerned but because they were so busy carrying out duties for their ministers and for their departments. It was difficult to pry them loose and to get them to appear before the committee. Because of this difficulty our committee did not meet as frequently as we would have wished. But whenever they did appear it was a wonderful experience and we appreciated very much the information they gave us.

The suggestion has been made that in another year another phase of the work might be dealt with, that is, an examination of crown corporations. This is all to the good. We might also consider the advisability of investigating what I call the overlapping as between federal and provincial expenditure. In a number of areas such as agriculture, fisheries and others, where funds are provided by the federal authority, we find the provinces are also operating. There is a tremendous amount of duplication. Such situations have grown up over the years. In the earlier days the federal Government operated in certain fields and the provincial governments operated in other fields. They each did a good job. But the procedure nowadays, with the spending of money by two separate sets of officials operating in the same fields is wasteful. More money could be saved and more efficiency achieved if we could eliminate that duplication and overlapping, and I think it is something for us to study in the future.

I wish to close by saying that I join very heartily in the tribute paid to the chairman and to the members of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform honourable senators that if honourable Senator Leonard speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, I rise first of all to express appreciation to those who have spoken in support of the report, namely, Senator Haig, Senator Molson and Senator Burchill. I should also add my appreciation of the remarks of Senator O'Leary (Carleton) concerning the committee, in dealing with the supply bill. May I also add my thanks for the kind remarks about my personal participation in the affairs of this committee.

Senator Burchill has made reference to possible fields of study to be undertaken by the committee in the future, and Senator O'Leary (Carleton) has suggested that the matter of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation might be studied. Referring to Senator Burchill's remarks regarding witnesses, I should say that we had no difficulty whatever in having witnesses appear before us. This applies so far as the witnesses themselves and the appropriate Government ministers were concerned. The only difficulty we had, and I cite this as an example of the spirit of co-operation that exists, was when the Auditor General was scheduled to appear before the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons on the same date as he had arranged to appear before our committee. He was in the hands of both Houses of Parliament, and I want to pay a tribute to the Public Accounts Committee of the other place and to their chairman, Mr. Baldwin, for agreeing that Mr. Henderson should appear before the Senate Committee and for postponing their own hearing to another day to facilitate this.

As you all know, the Finance Committee is a standing committee of this Senate, and therefore having discharged this present reference to us, if after the Christmas recess—assuming we are going to have a recess—the Senate desires this committee to undertake any further study, I am sure I can assure you that it will be ready to do so.

I move the adoption of the report.

Report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, perhaps this is a good time to ask the Leader of the Government what business we might expect to await us when we return on December 14.

Hon. John J. Connolly: I thank the honourable Senator Brooks for raising the point. At the time I made the motion that the Senate do adjourn until December 14, I did not mention, although I am sure it is thoroughly understood by all honourable senators, that this adjournment is subject to recall. It may be that we shall have to return before December 14. I think all honourable senators now understand that, as does the general public.

When we return on the evening of the 14th, subject to what may come to us by way of message from the other place, I would propose that we proceed with the three motions standing in my name in respect of the trade agreements. I understand that the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce has scheduled a meeting for the evening of December 14, after the Senate rises. Whatever other business will be before us on the following and subsequent days will be dealt with as it arises. I am afraid my crystal ball is a little cloudy, and I cannot go further than that at this time.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable leader if there are any priorities as far as business is concerned. Has the Government any particular priority regarding, for instance, the labour code, or the flag, or how they will be presented in this chamber?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): As I understand it, the priority before the other place at the moment is the flag question. They are dealing with the report of the special committee on the flag. I understand they propose to deal with that to a conclusion.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: What do you mean by a conclusion? They cannot conclude the matter of the flag in the other place. It is a matter for both Houses of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): By saying "to a conclusion" I simply meant that they will deal with whether the report should be adopted or rejected. If the report is adopted, I assume then that the house will have finished its consideration of the matter. I think we might take it on at that time.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: By way of resolution?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I would think so.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE LATE SENATOR HORNER

TRIBUTES

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, it was with a deep feeling of sadness that we learned today of the death in Saskatoon of the dean of the Senate, Ralph Byron Horner. Senator Horner was with us when we last met here on December 2, and it comes as a shock to know that he should now have left us permanently.

Through the years there have been few members of the Senate as well liked as Senator Horner. He was born in the Province of Quebec, in fact, in the district of Pontiac near by Ottawa. On his father's side he was Irish, and on his mother's side he was Irish also but with a mixture of Scotch. These two racial strains did much to temper the character of Ralph Byron Horner. Certainly, he had a fine sense of humour, and this was the graceful and gracious thing in his character which endeared him to all his colleagues.

In his early days the late senator went west, and became part of the warp and woof of that part of the country. He had nine children, which is a large number for him to have looked after as well as he did and still carry out his duties as a servant of the public.

Senator Horner was outspoken, both publicly and privately. He was a man who believed in the principles of the party to which he belonged. He tried to live up to them in his life and in the speeches he made. But the friendships he made on both sides of the house were never affected in the least by his adherence to party principles. He was a self-made man and was proud of this fact. He was a farmer, a fact of which he was equally proud. He was a rangy, raw-boned type of man, and his physical appearance reflected the kind of life he lived, as well as the things he believed in.

Senator Horner was a staunch westerner. On November 18, about a month ago, we paid tribute to another westerner, Senator Blais, who sat on the benches on this side of the house. You will remember that among the tributes paid to Senator Blais there was a fine, short tribute paid by Senator Horner. Going out of the chamber that night, he came to me and said how pleased he was with the tributes that had been paid to his old friend from western Canada and how much they had touched him. He belonged in so many ways to the western union.

Honourable senators, we can all be happy in his long life and the lifetime of service that Senator Horner gave. And we can feel honoured that he was one of our associates. For that reason, I do not mind telling this story about him. After the 1958 election, there was somewhat of a decimation of certain parties in the other place, and the C.C.F. party returned with eight members. After that election there were four Horners in Parliament, two of his sons, one of his nephews and himself. I remember remarking to him, "Within your own family you almost have a national party." He was eminently proud, and properly so, of his family and particularly of his two sons who had been elected to Parliament.

Just last spring most of us attended that significant ceremony in which he was honoured on his eightieth birthday. At the same time we honoured the senator and Mrs. Horner on their fiftieth wedding anniversary.

I am sure that I speak for all honourable senators who have known Mrs. Horner—and she has been here faithfully with him through the years—when I say how deeply we feel for her in her sad bereavement.

I am very pleased to be able to say that Senator Aseltine, an old and intimate friend and Senator Horner's former room mate, will represent the Senate at his funeral.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, we were all greatly shocked at the news of the passing of our dear friend, Senator Horner. I did not know until quite late this afternoon, that he had passed away, although I received a wire yesterday from Saskatoon to say that he had entered hospital there.

The loss of Senator Horner is felt by all of us. He had been a personal friend of mine for many years. When I first came to Ottawa in 1936 I met some senators at that time, through having known the late Senator George B. Jones, whom I succeeded as member from Royal. Senator Jones was a great friend of Senator Horner, Senator Haig and Senator Aseltine, all of whom later became close friends of mine. Indeed, I became deeply attached to them.

Senator Horner passed away while approaching his 81st year, although he appeared to be much younger. One recalls his tall, erect figure, as he addressed the Senate, without notes, and how he would speak on almost any subject that arose, and address himself to it intelligently, having a good background of information.

Perhaps one of Senator Horner's great accomplishments, if I may call it such, was the fact that he was the father of nine children, all of whom have distinguished themselves. I was told by a friend of mine in the West, who knew Senator Horner and his family well, that the Horner family was one of the finest to be found anywhere in Canada. They all met with great success in life. This must have been a cause of joy to Senator Horner and his gracious wife.

In his private life Senator Horner was a pioneer breeder of horses and a highly successful farmer in Northern Saskatchewan. He was also a director of the Canadian National Railways. All of this shows how diversified his interests were. He was indeed a man of many parts.

Senator Horner was summoned to the Senate on December 30, 1933, and shared the honour of being the co-dean of the Senate with our good friend Senator Aseltine. I believe that both were sworn in at the same time.

To say that our late colleague was one of the most colourful and dynamic members of the Senate is to put it mildly. He was a man who always called a spade a spade, and was never known to mince his words when he held convictions, either for or against you.

For these reasons, and I could list many more, Senator Horner was one of the most respected, beloved, and colourful men I have met in public life in Ottawa.

I often thought of Senator Horner as being similar to a character I read about in fiction in my boyhood. No doubt most honourable senators have read the novel entitled David Harum—the story of a very honourable man, and a great character who understood human nature and knew all about animals. He was also a shrewd businessman. I always thought of Senator Horner as being very much the David Harum of the present day.

The honourable leader mentioned the reception given Senator Horner by his two sons in honour of his 80th birthday last June 26. Many of us attended that function, and I particularly remember what Senator Horner said on that occasion. He said, "In my long, full life I have had much for which to be happy"—and, indeed, he had. "I enjoy good health and many friends." And he could have gone on to say, "I have a very fine family."

It has been mentioned that he always took an active part in our debates. I walked out of the chamber with him last week and as he left I said, "I will be very glad to see you back next week, Senator Horner." He said, "I am coming back. I am anxious to speak in the debate that is coming up on the flag."

Honourable senators, I would like the Leader of the Government to extend my sympathy to Senator Horner's widow and to his sons and daughters. Now I am going to leave it to my very good friend Senator Aseltine, who was associated with Senator Horner for so many years, to pay further tribute on behalf of those on this side of the house.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, this is a very sad occasion for me, one of the saddest of my whole life. Byron Horner's sudden death was a great shock to me; it was the last thing I expected. When I passed through the City of Saskatoon on Saturday evening last I telephoned his residence to ascertain if he would be coming down on the same plane as I was, because he had said that he would be sure to be on that plane. However, I could get no answer, and so came to the conclusion that he had travelled on an earlier plane or by the C.N.R. Today when I heard of his sudden death I was very much surprised.

Honourable senators know that I was intimately acquainted with Senator Horner for many years. In fact, I knew him intimately even before he was made a senator. As has been stated by previous speakers, we were both summoned to the Senate on the 30th day of December 1933, and were sworn in on the same day. In addition to that, we occupied the same office in the Senate, room 471, for 25 years. Thus, I think I should know the man better than anyone else in this chamber.

It has also been stated that at the time he was summoned to the Senate he was a director of the Canadian National Railways and represented on that board the farmers of the Province of Saskatchewan. When he passed away he was the dean of the Senate. Now I suppose that I am the dean of the Senate, much as I regret the event that makes that possible.

Senator Horner had a colourful career. He pioneered in the Blaine Lake district in the Province of Saskatchewan, but was born in the Province of Quebec, across the Ottawa River, up near Shawville. He spent his early life lumbering, and he had some remarkable stories to tell of his experiences in the lumber woods, taking out timber and running it down the streams. He was a tough, capable lumberman in those days.

He grew up on a farm and became interested in stock raising of all kinds. His first advent to western Canada had to do with the shipping of horses to work on the farms before the west became mechanized. He spent many years doing just that. Later when the farms became mechanized he shipped horses for many years from west to east for use in the lumber woods.

He finally settled at Blaine Lake on a beautiful farm, where he became a leader of the community. Blaine Lake has one of the largest settlements of Doukhobors in western Canada. They were always able to depend on Senator Horner for good advice. He sold them their horses and backed their notes at the bank, and when they could not pay their notes he paid them himself. He was a real father to the Doukhobors, and I think that they appreciated him very much.

As has been previously stated, Senator Horner had a mind of his own which was full of good ideas. He had many strong opinions, it is true, and he did not hesitate to express them whenever he considered it necessary. He was a lovable character, a sincere and loyal friend, and he made friends very easily. He took a prominent part in the work of this chamber. He was chairman of one of our committees and was regular in attendance at all times. In fact he made his work in the Senate his lifework from the time he was appointed until the time of his death.

Senator Horner owed much of his success in life to his wonderful little wife, Mae. She was loyal and helpful at all times. My wife is going to miss her very much, since they were bosom friends and spent most of their time together when the Senate was in session. They even took painting lessons together, and loved each other very much.

As has been said, Senator Horner had nine children. I know each one of them, and I consider them to be the most clever family I have ever met. One son, William, is an engineer. Hugh is a medical doctor and at the present time a member of Parliament for a riding in the Province of Alberta. Jack is a rancher and also a member of Parliament for a riding in Alberta. Byron is a lawyer, and Norval runs the farm at Blaine Lake. Bennett is also a medical doctor. I might add that he was given the Christian name "Bennett" because he was born during the time that the late Lord Bennett was Prime Minister of Canada, a short time before Senator Horner was appointed to this chamber. He has three lovely daughters, all married and residing in western Canada.

Taking it all in all, Byron Horner was in my opinion a great Canadian, a great pioneer, and a man who loved the soil. He loved Canada dearly, and he is going to be very much missed by all of us.

As has been stated by the honourable Leader of the house, I shall be leaving tomorrow to attend the funeral which takes place on Wednesday afternoon. My wife will meet me in Saskatoon and we will be there together. I shall then have the opportunity to convey to Mrs. Horner and to the members of the family present the deepest sympathy of every member of this chamber. I shall convey to them our most sincere regrets and wish them Godspeed in the future.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I think we all experienced a tremendous shock this evening when on entering this chamber we were informed of the death of our dear old friend, Senator Ralph Byron Horner. As Senator Aseltine has said he and Senator Horner were appointed to the Senate in 1933—they were numbers one and two, in the seniority list, and Senator Farris and I happen to be numbers three and four, having been appointed in 1937. We have sat in this chamber with Senator Horner for 27 years.

I think it is only fitting that one who comes from and represents that part of the Province of Quebec in which Senator Horner was born should join in the tributes being paid to him this evening.

I did not know Senator Horner at all well for the first two or three years of my membership in the Senate. But it so happened, and very luckily for me, that on an occasion of my going to Winnipeg by train, Senator Horner was on the train with me. Thus we had an opportunity of getting to know one another. We had our meals together, and by the end of the journey I think I had a pretty good idea of what our colleague was like.

Senator Horner was a real character, and I think that was what it was that endeared him so much to the Senate. I remember once telling him in the course of a debate between us in this house that no one could ever tell what he was going to say next. That was part of his charm. But while you could not tell what he was going to say next, you always could be sure that what he had to say was based upon long experience and much knowledge of men and affairs.

We shall miss him deeply, honourable senators. I do not know what more I can say of him than that which Hamlet said of his father in those famous words:

> He was a man, take him for all in all,
> I shall not look upon his like again.

To his loyal and devoted widow, who was with him constantly all these years during his service in the Senate, and to the members of his family, I join in expressing our deepest sympathy.

Hon. William A. Boucher: Honourable senators, it was with very deep regret that I learned of the passing of my very good friend of many years, Byron Horner. He was one of those oldtimers who played a very important part indeed in the development of Northern Saskatchewan.

I wish to extend to Mrs. Horner and her family my deepest sympathy in this, their hour of grief.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, it was a shock to me today to learn of the passing of Senator Horner. Like Senator Aseltine, I tried to reach him on the telephone before I left last Saturday to see if he was coming back, but got no answer.

His passing is a deep sadness and sorrow to me because I have known him since I was a young student. I have always admired his frankness in speaking at all times on all topics. I admired his friendliness. As has been mentioned today, he was extremely proud of being a westerner, but he was also extremely proud of being a Canadian, because I think he liked all parts of Canada as well as he did his beloved west. But, above all, he was especially proud of his family, of which mention has been made. Most of them are university graduates, and all of them are good and respected citizens. That, honourable senators, to me is a great accomplishment.

I shall miss him as a friend and a kindly adviser. On this occasion I should like to join with others in extending my deepest sympathy to his widow and to his sons and daughters.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I should like to pay a tribute to Senator Horner. While we were not of the same colour, politically, I will say that Senator Horner's was one of the first hands extended to me in friendship when I came to the Senate.

I well remember the occasion of a trip to the St. Lawrence Seaway when Senator Horner took me under his wing. I was a novice at that time, and I appreciated very much his kindness and everything he did to help me on that occasion. Through the years I always found him and Mrs. Horner very sincere friends. I shall miss him, and also Mrs. Horner, to whom I extend my sincere sympathy on this sad occasion.

Hon. James Gladstone: Honourable senators, as a friend of the late Senator Horner I should like to present on behalf of the Indians their very sincere sympathy. I knew Senator Horner for a very long time. When I first came to Ottawa in 1947 to present the views of our organization in Alberta to the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, of which he was a member, he did all he could to establish a better understanding for our people. Several senators who were members of that committee have since passed on, and in this respect I mention Senator Farquhar and Senator Blais.

Since 1947 a lot of water has flowed down our lakes and rivers. As late as yesterday I was looking forward to seeing Senator Horner again. When I returned home from church yesterday I told my wife that I anticipated the question of the flag would be put before the Senate, and that I knew one good stalwart who I would go to for advice, Senator Horner. He has now passed on and gone to the happy hunting ground. May his soul rest in peace.

I was very proud to be one of Senator Horner's closest friends, and I know that my wife will feel very grieved when she hears this sad news. She was looking forward to meeting Mrs. Horner here in Ottawa next year, because they were good friends.

On behalf of the Indians of Saskatchewan I should like to express our very sincere regrets that Senator Horner has left us, but we know he has gone to a happier place.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I would be unhappy with myself if I did not join in the tributes that have been paid this evening to Ralph Horner. He was a pioneer in western Canada. Frequently we discussed the early days of the west and compared our pioneering experiences.

The late Senator Horner went to western Canada in the very early days of this century. I recall his saying to me that when he landed in Winnipeg he had only a few dollars in his pocket. He obtained work with a farmer in the Winnipeg district where he worked, as I recall, for two years. He saved his money. He went on to Saskatchewan and got a homestead in the Blaine Lake area and commenced his farming operations.

He was a good farmer and an intelligent farmer. He hated sham and pretence. He liked the solid qualities in men—qualities which he had outstandingly. What were they? Well, there was courage. He was never afraid of expressing himself. One might not agree with his views—indeed, at times his views might be quite wrong—but at least he had the courage to stand up and speak for them. That is a quality we can always admire.

He had steadfastness. He was a good neighbour. He believed in the principles of the Christian ethic where the injunction is laid upon us to help our fellow men. He believed in that. He had a sense of public service, not only in his community but in a wider field. This was the kind of man Ralph Horner was. It was a great pleasure and joy to me to know him, even if at times we differed rather strongly.

In conclusion I have just this to say that the qualities Ralph Horner had—friendship, courage, steadfastness, the desire to help, where he could, his fellow man—are the qualities to which all through the whole story of civilization humanity has paid tribute. These were the qualities of this man, and I say to this house tonight that we have lost a sterling colleague who, after long service in the house, has gone to his reward. We shall cherish his memory, and our sympathy goes out not only to the two sons who are members of the House of Commons but to his helpmate through life, his charming wife, in her hour of great sorrow.

PRIVATE BILL

INTERPROVINCIAL PIPE LINE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-42, respecting Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Molson: With leave of the Senate, I move third reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN FLAG

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR DESIGNATION OF NATIONAL EMBLEM

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, December 15, 1964, I will move:

> That this house do recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to have designated as the national flag of Canada a red flag of the proportions two by length and one by width, containing in its centre a white square, the width of the flag, bearing a single red maple leaf, or in heraldic terms, described as gules on a Canadian pale argent a maple leaf of the first.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, far be it from me to want to delay discussion of a question which has occupied the other place for so many days—and, I would add, so many months—but I do think that, under the rules of the Senate, we should receive two days' notice of this type of motion. I would ask Your Honour to rule on this point.

Rule 23 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada reads as follows:

> Two days' notice must be given of a motion for any of the following purposes:
>
> (a) To make a new rule or standing order, or to repeal or amend an existing rule or standing order;
>
> (b) For an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, not merely formal in its character;
> (c) For an Order of the Senate for any papers or documents not relating to a Bill or other matter appearing among the Orders of the Day, or on the notice paper;
>
> (d) For the appointment of a special committee;
>
> (e) For the adoption of the report of any such special committee;
>
> (f) For the second reading of a Bill;
>
> (ff) For the adoption of a resolution of the Senate dissolving or annulling a marriage pursuant to the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act;
> (g) A like notice is required of any inquiry, not relating to a Bill or other matter appearing among the Orders of the Day, or on the notice paper.

Honourable senators, section 24, which I will refrain from reading through, enumerates a series of motions or types of motions which require notice of one day. I refer next to Rule 25, which enumerates motions for which no notice is required, the last two paragraphs of which read:

> (s) Other motions of a merely formal or uncontentious character;

Honourable senators, as I explained at the outset, it is not my intention to delay in any way discussion in this chamber of a most important question, but I do know that we are almost taken by surprise and that some honourable senators who wish to speak on this important motion might not be prepared to do so. I am asking that Your Honour rule on this point of order.

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, speaking on the point of order, I hope I may be permitted to say that the honourable senator who spoke just before me, he was giving the general opinion of his political group in this house.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Who is that?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I refer to you, my friend.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I never spoke on politics.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): He referred to certain rules governing this house, in order to explain the conditions in which a debate on a motion has to take place. But at the end of his quotation, it is mentioned, if my memory is correct, that with the unanimous consent of the house we could proceed with the discussion in due course of time, as suggested by the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: The Leader of the Government did not suggest that.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I would think there would be no difficulty in having the unanimous consent of this chamber, in spite of the objection that was put up by my honourable friend Senator Choquette, to the effect that some of his colleagues are taken by surprise. It was a surprise to me to hear today in this house that somebody might be taken by surprise concerning this debate which has been going so long in the other place, and the motion that was introduced in the other place today about which the whole country was informed some days ago. It has come to us today, and if some colleagues of the honourable gentleman are not quite prepared to speak tomorrow or the day after, I think that it will be very easy for us to adjourn the debate for a few hours.

Honourable senators, in view of the circumstances surrounding that debate, it would be a good move, in the eyes of the country, if we, in that part of the Canadian Parliament which is called the Senate, were to show good will by giving unanimous consent to the proposition just made by the Leader of the Government.

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, the educative lecture that the honourable senator (Hon. Mr. Fournier, De Lanaudière) has just given us on the way we should act in these circumstances has been most informative.

As I read the press, there is a debate going on in the other place at the moment, and it is far from me to predict what the result of the vote will be at one minute after one o'clock tomorrow morning.

I merely rise to support my colleague, Senator Choquette, and to say that as I read the rules there must be two days notice given of the motion by the Leader of the Government, and also to say that as far as any plea for unanimous consent is concerned, I am not giving unanimous consent.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order, the notice was given pursuant to Rule 24 (j). I canvassed this situation carefully before deciding that the appropriate action to be taken at this time was the action that I took a few moments ago. The honourable senator from Ottawa East (Hon. Mr. Choquette) mentioned Rule 25, which states that no notice is required. He and I agree on that point.

I think there is nothing in Rule 23, which requires two days' notice, to help us here.

Upon reading Rule 24, however—and I do not want to repeat all its sections—paragraph (i) says:

> For an adjournment of the Senate, other than the ordinary daily adjournment or that under Rule 14, 25 or 44.

This requires one day's notice. So does Rule 24(j).

Rule 24(j) states:

> For any purpose to which neither the next preceding nor the next succeeding rule applies.

And, of course, the next succeeding rule is Rule 25, which does not cover this procedure.

I submit that Rule 23 does not apply, and that the appropriate action in the circumstances is governed by Rule 24(j).

May I say also that in following the course I did, I had the idea of meeting the convenience of the Senate. After the Senate rises tonight, the Banking and Commerce Committee is to meet. An unexpected development occurred during the course of the day which has taken up the time of the chamber more than could have been anticipated a few days ago.

I believe honourable senators will agree that throughout this somewhat difficult fall session I have tried to suit the convenience of the entire Senate when calling the senators together in the chamber, and in trying to arrange the business in such a way as to be the least inconvenient to all members of the house. This is the consideration which prompted me to move as I did, and I submit, honourable senators, that I am fortified by Rule 24(j).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, after hearing Senator Choquette and Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), I think that in the circumstances Rule 24(j) should apply. Rule 24(j) states:

> For any purpose to which neither the next preceding nor the next succeeding rule applies;

I agree with the honourable Senator Connolly that in the circumstances notice of one day is justified.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I appeal the decision, and call for a vote on the ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in all the senators.

Honourable senators, the honourable Senator Choquette having raised the question of the sufficiency of one day's notice given by the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) of a motion respecting the designation of a National Flag of Canada, and I having ruled that one day's notice only was required under the rules, and the honourable Senator Choquette having appealed my decision, the question now is: Shall the Speaker's ruling be sustained?

Those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please rise.

The ruling of His Honour the Speaker was sustained on the following division:

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN

REGULATIONS OR POLICIES OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

On the Notice of Inquiry of honourable Senator Fergusson:

That she will inquire of the Government:

1. Are there any regulations or departmental policies in effect in the Post Office Department, or in any other Government Department, which discriminate against or adversely affect the employment of women?

2. If so, what are they?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Answered by a rather voluminous document tabled earlier this evening.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PASSENGER SERVICE AT RIVIERE DU LOUP—PUBLICITY RE THE "SCOTIAN"—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Mr. Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. Why does the Canadian National make the passenger trains stop at the time indicated on the timetables at a quarter of a mile west of the station of Rivière du Loup?

2. Why doesn't the Canadian National make as much publicity for the "Scotian" train, which runs between Halifax and Montreal, as for the "Champlain" running between Quebec and Montreal?

Hon. John J. Connolly: The Management of the Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. The diesel fueling facilities are west of the Rivière du Loup station which makes two stops necessary. Eastbound passenger trains make a first stop to take on fuel and a second at the station for passengers. Westbound trains stop first at the station for passengers and then for fuel. The operating timetables show one arrival time, the two stops being so close together. The passengers disembark only at the station.

2. The publicity the "Champlain" receives vis-à-vis the "Scotian" primarily depends upon editorial estimates of public interest in these trains. The "Champlain" being an innovation and a response to a long-time public demand, in recent months it may have received more attention in the news media than the "Scotian." In Canadian National advertising, full support is given to all the major passenger services.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I was at the Rivière du Loup station yesterday at 7.50 in the morning to take the "Scotian". It was a long train and the parlour cars were stopped at least 700 feet west of the station. I saw mothers with young children and old ladies with luggage who had to walk that long distance. The answer given by the railway officials is not at all satisfactory. It is difficult to understand why the Province of Quebec is treated so badly, especially the eastern part of the province, which is under Moncton, N.B.

His Honour the Speaker will remember that not so many years ago he and I, and all the members who represented the constituencies east of Lévis, signed a petition to the then Minister of Transport asking that the eastern part of the Province of Quebec be under the control and management of the Central Region of the Canadian National Railways, which region at that time extended from Rivière du Loup to the Lakehead.

The other day the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) said that he would rub the ears of the President of the Canadian National Railways. I thought he did that so gently that Mr. Donald Gordon liked it. The only remedy in this case would be to change the date of Boxing Day and have it tomorrow, in order that the whole matter is settled.

There is no excuse for not stopping the train so that the passenger cars are in front of the station for at least ten minutes. After the passengers have boarded, the train could be moved westward so that its fuel tanks may be filled. I am asking this for the convenience of all passengers.

Honourable senators, I spoke of the advertising that is made in respect of one train only, the "Champlain," between Montreal and Quebec City. I have in my hand some pamphlets about the "Ocean Limited." Many people want the same publicity extended to the "Scotian," which is a very good train. For a time the accommodation on that train was very poor and it lost its good name, but now the cars are better and the train should be advertised as much as the others.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PRONUNCIATION OF "NOEL" BY FRENCH ANNOUNCERS—INQUIRY STANDS

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, with respect to the wrong pronunciation of the word "Noël" by the French announcers and commentators of the C.B.C., I wonder if the news I have received is true, that the French announcers have been instructed to pronounce that word as well as do the English-speaking announcers. I hope that tomorrow the honourable Leader of the Government will be in a position to tell us. If it is true, it will mean a reform and a change in the pronunciation of one word. Honourable senators may say that it is a very small thing, but it is important because it is a reform. It is a lesson to those "know-alls."

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

COMMUTATION OF SENTENCES—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Mr. Pouliot inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

> In the course of the past ten years, how many sentences for capital punishment have been commuted in the case of persons found guilty of (a) murder, (b) rape and murder, and on what date has each of these commutations been decided?

Hon. John J. Connolly: The answer to the honourable senator's inquiry is as follows:

> There are no cases of persons having been found guilty of rape and murder. Section 499 of the Criminal Code provides that:
>
> "No count that charges an offence other than murder shall be joined in an indictment to a count that charges murder."
>
> Section 856 of the old Criminal Code was to the same effect.
>
> In the course of the past ten years the number of persons whose sentences for capital punishment have been commuted to life imprisonment is as follows:
> (a) 1955, six: January 5, 1955; January 14, 1955; January 20, 1955; June 29, 1955; October 26, 1955; December 14, 1955.
> 1956, nine: January 5, 1956; February 2, 1956; March 15, 1956; April 19, 1956; May 1, 1956; May 24, 1956; May 24, 1956; May 24, 1956; July 5, 1956.
> 1957, six: April 1, 1957; June 14, 1957; June 14, 1957; July 26, 1957; December 12, 1957; December 12, 1957.
> 1958, fourteen: January 15, 1958; February 5, 1958; April 4, 1958; April 17, 1958; April 17, 1958; June 6, 1958; July 10, 1958; August 26, 1958; August 26, 1958; September 8, 1958; October 9, 1958; November 27, 1958; December 30, 1958; December 30, 1958.
> 1959, thirteen: February 14, 1959; March 17, 1959; April 18, 1959; April 23, 1959; April 30, 1959; June 13, 1959; July 9, 1959; July 16, 1959; August 13, 1959; November 19, 1959; December 10, 1959; December 15, 1959; December 15, 1959;
> 1960, six: January 12, 1960; January 21, 1960; April 11, 1960; May 11, 1960; August 17, 1960; December 1, 1960.
> 1961, eleven: March 23, 1961; April 18, 1961; May 19, 1961; June 2, 1961; June 15, 1961; July 12, 1961; August 9, 1961; August 21, 1961; November 8, 1961; November 8, 1961; December 5, 1961.
> 1962, two: April 9, 1962; July 31, 1962.
> 1963, seven: February 21, 1963; March 12, 1963; March 12, 1963; May 9, 1963; June 27, 1963; September 12, 1963; October 3, 1963.
> 1964, four: January 7, 1964; April 23, 1964; June 18, 1964; November 3, 1964.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Honourable senators, with respect to the answer that has been given as to clemency in matters of murder and rape, I will say that the so-called experts of the Department of Justice have tried to split hairs. They often do that. One part of their answer is futile. The other gives the number of commutations of death sentences, which is so formidable for the last nine years that it is really shocking. Let us hope that the Government will be very careful about its policy in regard to clemency for sex perverts convicted of offences such as rape and murder.

Hon. John J. Connolly tabled:

PRIVATE BILL

THE ECONOMICAL MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-48, respecting The Economical Mutual Insurance Company, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 1: Strike out clause 1 and substitute therefor the following:—

"The name of the Company is hereby changed to Economical Mutual Insurance Company and the Company may use, in the transaction of its business, either the name Economical Mutual Insurance Company or the name Economical, Compagnie Mutuelle d'Assurance, or both of such names, as and when it so elects. It may sue or be sued in either or both of such names, and any transaction, contract or obligation heretofore entered into or incurred by the Company in the name The Economical Mutual Insurance Company, and any transaction, contract or obligation hereafter entered into or incurred by the Company in either the name Economical Mutual Insurance Company or the name Economical, Compagnie Mutuelle d'Assurance, or both of such names, shall be valid and binding on the Company."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Honourable senators, the changes made by the committee in this bill are not of any consequence. They involve a change in the legal drafting, with no change whatsoever in the meaning. The designation of the name is now set out in the first sentence of clause 1. The other change is that the article "the" is dropped from the English name of the company and the article "le" is dropped from the French name. These changes were made with the consent of the company and of the Superintendent of Insurance.

Report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, as we are aproaching the end of the present session, I ask the consent of the Senate to move the third reading this afternoon.

With leave, I move third reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PASSENGER SERVICE AT RIVIÈRE DU LOUP—NOTICE OF FURTHER INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I give notice of an inquiry to be placed on the Order Paper tomorrow about an urgent matter, namely, the stopping of trains in front of the station at Rivière du Loup.

This is the Christmas season, when parents travel with young children, and it is absurd to think that they have to walk nearly half a mile in order to get into the coaches of the trains. There is ample time for the trains to stop for 10 minutes in front of the station, and then take five more minutes of the 15 or 20-minute timetable stop to fill the oil tanks of the locomotives, westward of the station.

I hope the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly) will continue his good work and insist at once upon the railway, and particularly upon the directors of the Canadian National Railways, that this be done. Two new directors from the province of Quebec were recently appointed to the C.N.R. One of these men is travelling around as head of a commission, and I do not know what the other does. However, at the present time the Province of Quebec is very poorly represented on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

I will not dot my "i's" nor cross my "t's" today, but tomorrow I may do so unless there is a satisfactory result in the meantime.

Just before I entered this chamber today I met colleagues who informed me that they suffered from the same stupid arrangements in other parts of the country. Apparently the management of the Canadian National Railways think that they are infallible and never make a mistake. In this case, they are making a gross mistake. I insist on a prompt solution of the problem.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR DESIGNATION OF NATIONAL EMBLEM—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved, pursuant to notice:

> That this house do recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to have designated as the National Flag of Canada a red flag of the proportions two by length and one by width, containing in its centre a white square, the width of the flag, bearing a single red maple leaf, or in heraldic terms, described as gules on a Canadian pale argent a maple leaf of the first.

He said: Honourable senators, the resolution to establish a distinctive Canadian flag, as the nation approaches the centenary of its foundation, must be assessed in the background of the nation's history; and we can remind ourselves today, as this year's celebrations in Prince Edward Island remind us so forcibly, that Confederation in its genesis was both accidental and experimental.

In 1864 the four Atlantic colonies had decided to investigate legislative and fiscal arrangements which would bind them more closely together for their mutual advantage. At that time in the Canadas, parliamentary deadlock had stifled progress. All the colonies of British North America too had a sense of danger resulting from unrest and civil strife in the United States. In this atmosphere the concept of a larger union of the British colonies in America took hold. It stimulated the imagination of statesmen from the Maritime areas, as from the Canadas alike. It began as an idea of mere colonial union; but the vision of a new North American nation stretching from sea to sea soon emerged. The British North America Act provided the framework upon which the new nation could be built.

We should remind ourselves too that all this development was evolutionary. Revolution and armed uprising formed no part of the process. It was the antithesis of the severance of old moorings as had happened a century before in the United States. This was characteristic also of the revolutionary movements in Europe in the 18th and 19th centuries, but it was not true of British North America. The new organization was to be a federation founded upon the familiar British institutions; the parliamentary system would prevail; British assistance, sharing of experience and, indeed, British supervision would continue, though many of the trappings of colonialism were bound to disappear in time.

In the Confederation Debates Macdonald referred to the ultimate emergence of a nation "friendly" to Britain. And minority rights, consecrated over a century before in the Quebec Act, and, contrary to all earlier imperial policy, granted in the terms of capitulation of Montreal and Quebec, were reaffirmed. In one respect the recognition of these minority rights was the Ark of the Covenant. We should remember too that if the formation of the federation was, in a sense, fortuitous its development as a federation was to be gradual. Nor was its development always easy. The financial implications for the small populations in the dispersed colonies were rather overwhelming. So too were the physical tasks. Communications were primitive; the populations within the colonies were sparse and scattered; education and the means thereof were restricted. Wealth there was, but it was undiscovered. The separate economies were local and lean.

It is not for me here to trace the domestic development of the past century which transformed this fledgling association into a modern industrial and commercial society. Successive generations of Canadians have shouldered this gigantic task with intrepid courage, with intelligence and with imagination. Successive generations of politicians have forged the policies to achieve the subdual and the development of a vast continental empire. Politics there were, but no political party does or should claim sole credit. A new nation was being built. The people who were here at the outset and their descendants and the hundreds of thousands of new people who came here, to them is the credit.

There was help from abroad: capital, know-how, expertise. A developing nation needs this help desperately, and how well we see that today in the modern, new and developing nations. There was in this new nation on the new continent a feeling of self-reliance, a determination on the part of its peoples to provide self-help. These qualities have underwritten the glorious achievement, the great domestic experiment which has now proved itself as Canada.

Hoops of steel bind almost literally St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia. So do the highways and airlines, the telephone and telegraph, the radio and the television. Gas from Alberta energizes factories in Quebec. The Seaway and the Maritime ports and railways ensured the prompt delivery of half a billion tons of Canadian wheat these past 12 months. Uranium from the Canadian Shield gave birth to the nuclear age, with all its hopes and all its terrors. Canadian machine tools helped re-establish European industry devastated in the late war. Canadian education and Canadian research provided leaders in many fields of human endeavour.

This is not even a sketch of the whole story, and the end is not yet. The experiment has provided a sense of satisfaction for Canadians that is considerable. The integrity of our people, the stability of our institutions have inspired confidence to investors both here and abroad. The image of Canada is good and it is distinctively Canadian. Within a few generations a national individuality and a national personality have emerged.

No one doubts the fact that in her domestic affairs Canada has achieved a complete jurisdictional autonomy. In her external relations the picture is almost as complete, and what is lacking is within the power of Canadians to remedy. But it was not so from the beginning.

In the earlier years situations arose abroad in which it became imperative for this new nation, regardless how loosely organized, regardless how small it was, to assert positions really not anticipated before Confederation. In retrospect, it is easy to say now that there was a long struggle ahead.

Professor Creighton describes the frustration experienced by Sir John Macdonald in 1871 over negotiations in Washington regarding the North Atlantic fisheries. This was only a few years after the union. Sir John was distressed, even disillusioned, by the authority claimed and asserted by British representatives of the British Parliament over matters which he conceived, quite properly, to be of vital and primary interest to Canada. The importance of this position, as he asserted it, would grow with the years. Macdonald may have lost that battle but he made a great beginning. The campaign would go on and it would succeed.

When Sir John Thompson was Prime Minister, he was successful in negotiating arrangements with Britain whereby Canada would have the final say in such matters as copyrights, patents, and trademarks. These were the days in which there was no Department of External Affairs, when the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister seem to have dealt with such problems themselves.

In Laurier's time some trade arrangements were made by Canada, which were ratified by reciprocal legislation. This, however, was exceptional. But it was a foot in the door. However, when the International Joint Commission was established in 1909, despite the considerable progress made to that time, the Imperial Government in fact appointed the Canadian representatives on Canadian advice. How far we have moved from that position today!

Many of the important milestones in our progress towards national autonomy were fashioned in imperial conferences. Countries of the Empire, other than Canada, like ourselves, realized the importance of an increasing measure of self-determination in external relations. These imperial conferences began to be held in 1887. They were designed to discuss such Empire problems as trade preferences, Empire federation, and Empire defence.

I hope it will not appear facetious, honourable senators, if I say that for many of the early conferences the discussions were as between the mother hen and the chicks. The burdens at that time for the mother country were very great indeed. But the chicks were growing fast. They were flexing muscles. They were realizing the potential of their own positions. In the perspective of history neither side can be criticized for asserting its own position as strongly as it did.

But the notion of greater independence was taking hold in the dominions. It developed gradually, and in some countries there was a lack of unanimity. For example, in Canada on the question of imperial defence, Sir Wilfrid Laurier insisted upon a general measure of Canadian autonomy. The Naval Services Act of 1910 crystallized this attitude. But this view, considering the immediate need, was not shared by Sir Robert Borden when he assumed office in 1911. I shall not discuss the debates which took place in this Parliament on that issue. But within a few years war was upon us, and when it arrived the conduct of Canadian foreign policy, the declaration of war, the making of peace—the authority to do these things was clearly in the hands of the Imperial Government.

Honourable senators might read with profit the Debates of the Senate of 1914 on the issue of Canada's position in respect of the outbreak of war, and, indeed, compare those speeches with the speeches made in this chamber in 1939 on a like issue. During the First War the Canadian forces were generally at the disposal of the British. The Minister of National Defence, Sir Sam Hughes, and indeed the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, were far from complacent about the status quo. It was due to their efforts that Canada's voice became more effective in the war discussions.

In the larger field of Empire relations, too, an increasing measure of consultation with the Canadian and other dominion governments was practised. So much was this the case that at the Imperial War Conference of 1917, Sir Robert Borden and General Smuts of South Africa sponsored a resolution which called for the preservation of the "powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs ... based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth". Ambiguous though it might have been, this resolution was, in fact, a gigantic step forward.

In 1919, at the time of the Versailles Treaty, due to the policy of Sir Robert Borden, His Majesty's Canadian plenipotentiaries signed on behalf of Canada, and Canada became a member of the League of Nations. She was also a founding member of the International Labour Organization.

Honourable senators, war accelerates many developments. The First World War and its aftermath brought Canada far along the road of national autonomy. By 1921 the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen had assumed the office of Prime Minister, and he too continued this forthright approach. He urged closer consultation on imperial matters, especially in commercial and political treaties which would affect the dominions. In respect of matters touching the relationships between Canada and the United States, he was adamant that Canada's views should be definitive. The extent of his prestige in the councils of the Empire is evidenced in the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Within a few years Mr. Mackenzie King became Canada's spokesman. Early in his prime ministership he established a position of self-determination for Canada in the Chanak incident of 1922. On that occasion he asserted the principle that no Canadian troops would be dispatched to the Near East without the prior approval of the Parliament of Canada. In the same year, when the Halibut Fishing Treaty between Canada and the United States was concluded, the documents were signed on behalf of Canada by the Honourable Ernest Lapointe alone. Both of these events were monuments erected upon older foundations.

Perhaps the most significant of all steps taken at imperial conferences was the definition of the new status of the dominions, which was adopted in 1926. The committee which recommended the definition sat under the chairmanship of the Earl of Balfour, and Canada, South Africa and the Irish Free State were leaders on the side of the dominions. This is not to say that there was British opposition. Mr. King was not the Canadian Prime Minister when the Statute of Westminster was passed in 1931, but that statute reflected his policy and the 1926 definition.

During the time of Mr. Bennett's prime ministership the development proceeded. As I have said, the Statute of Westminster was passed in 1931. In 1932 the Imperial Economic Conference was held in Ottawa, and Canada played a leading role. When the Bank of Canada was established during Mr. Bennett's time, an important element of national sovereignty was confirmed. That element was the right of a nation to control its own monetary policy.

When war came in 1939, Mr. King was again prime minister. This time, unlike 1914, the declaration of war was made on behalf of Canada by the sovereign, but the step was taken only after the Canadian Parliament had approved the proposal. The war effort was large and effective, and heroic in the services. On the home front it was tremendous. Throughout, it was distinctively Canadian. Canada financed it all, and in addition provided substantial aid to her allies.

At the conclusion of the war, when the United Nations was established, Canada was one of the founding countries. Canada has since given strong, effective support to the work of the United Nations, and in no area has this been more effective than in the peacekeeping operations upon which she is embarked.

Canada, in Mr. St. Laurent's time, became an original, and continues to be a valued member of the NATO Alliance. She has never hesitated to stand alongside the other free nations in the defence of the West.

In Mr. St. Laurent's day, Canada asserted her right to recommend to the Queen the appointment of a Canadian as the Queen's representative in Canada. In this time, too, the Supreme Court of Canada was designated as the court of final resort for the determination of judicial disputes in Canada. In 1949, upon the petition of the Canadian Parliament, an amendment was made to the British North America Act which would empower the Parliament of Canada alone further to amend the act in respect of matters coming within federal jurisdiction. Once the Canadian authorities agree as to detail, as they have agreed in principle, the Constitution of this country will be completely patriated. We are upon the threshold of this development now.

The evidence of the sovereignty of Canada is fortified by the existence in Ottawa of nearly a hundred official representatives of foreign countries. Canada's foreign aid program, begun in wartime and augmented through the peace, is further evidence of her autonomy. And the examples can be proliferated.

In all essentials, Canada possesses the substance of sovereignty. A new northern nation is in being. It is autonomous at home. It is acknowledged abroad. This resolution emphasizes that this nation should have, as one of its distinctive symbols, a distinctive flag. It is time that this important symbol should confirm the substance.

The symbol which a nation chooses for its national emblem is sometimes an arbitrary one. The Stars and Stripes of the United States and the Tricolour of France, are examples. And, even when it is based upon an abstraction, circumstances like war or revolution can invest it with a deep emotional content. Changes too may come to it, but in all essentials it remains the national flag.

A suitable device can also emerge from a country's history, from the long usage and accepted practices of the people. Such a symbol can reflect in a distinctive way the physical characteristics of the country. This, in turn, can symbolize the character of its people, because notions of a people and of the land they inhabit are closely interwoven.

Canada, even today, is a new country. Canada is a northern country. The beauty of its physical attributes is renowned. The natural wealth which that beauty enshrines is tremendous. We tell this to our own people. We tell it to the world. We use it, and quite properly, to attract visitors and investors alike. Our effort and our enterprise is channelled in this direction. In a very real sense our countryside is a wonder of the world. In our northern summer we never cease to marvel at its verdure. In the magic of its autumn, its spectacular hues astound us afresh each year. And the maple in its many species predominates. It clothes our land with a glory as does the heather in the Highlands, like the shamrock around Shannon, like the magnolia in the early summer of the southland.

In the spring we tap it for a product as distinctive to Canada as wine is to France, as olives are to Spain, as citrus and coffee are to the tropics. Its wood we move into our markets, both at home and abroad. The discard of its leaves replenishes the fertility of our forest soil.

Canadians have long accepted and used the leaf of the maple as the badge of this youthful country in all its loveliness. Distinctive devices used by the defence forces of any nation have a deep emotional connotation for its people. In the badges and banners of the three Canadian forces and of the veterans' organizations, the maple leaf appears almost universally. I am told that in the military cemetery at Hong Kong, where many young men of that campaign of the late war are laid to rest, the graves of the Canadians are distinguishable from all the others by the device of the maple leaf on the markers. This is true of other cemeteries where young Canadian servicemen are buried.

The maple leaf has an important element of an official acceptance in our country. British monarchs approved in 1868, by Royal Warrant, designs incorporating the device in the armorial bearings of Ontario and of Quebec.

In 1870 the maple leaf was confirmed as a Canadian badge by Royal Despatch.

In 1921 the maple leaf was part of the design approved by His Majesty the King for the Canadian Coat of Arms.

In commerce, the maple leaf finds acceptance in trademarks and in industrial designs on Canadian products. This is no insignificant body of evidence on its distinctiveness. Canada's common carriers in the civilian field, and its service vehicles of various kinds in the services, display it.

Ours is indeed the land of the maple. Even the word itself, "maple," has a connotation, even a flavour, which means Canada.

I was told a story recently by the Turkish Ambassador to Canada. He was a competitor for his country at the Olympic Games at Amsterdam in 1932. He said that in his mind's eye—and he has a photograph of the occasion—he can still see Percy Williams of Vancouver breaking the tape in the 100-meter dash. William's arms were extended. He looked like the Winged Victory of Samothrace. And the trade mark of the victory was the red maple leaf emblazoned on Williams' white jersey.

Honourable senators, the design which this resolution proposes is simple. It needs no expert to explain it. A child can draw it. Its colours are basic, they are traditional for use in banners, and the combination is both attractive and arresting. It contains the symbol of no country but our own. It neither gives offence to any of the racial elements of the Canadian mosaic nor does it favour any one of our racial or linguistic strains. It is for all.

It is a beautiful flag. It is a symbol around which we can build our hopes and in which we can centre our pride. It has been approved by a great majority in the House of Commons after a prolonged debate and after a study of six weeks by a special committee.

Honourable senators, I commend the resolution to your favourable consideration.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I must say in the first place that I approach my task with some trepidation. I had not thought that this motion would come to us in this form and that it would come to us today. I had a hope—a vagrant hope, I discovered—that the Leader of the Government would permit me to adjourn the debate. I must say, however, in fairness to him, that he gave a very good reason for not doing so, when he explained to me that Senator Crerar —who, I expect, will support me—is leaving for the west this afternoon and would not have an opportunity to speak if the debate were adjourned today.

Now, as to the speech we have just heard from Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), I must say that he spoke to us with all the moderation, restraint and scholarship which we have learned to expect from him in this house. I hope he will not think me offensive if I add that a great deal of what he said seemed to have little or no relevance to the character of the flag which his motion proposes.

I think it was Voltaire who once said, "If you would converse with me, define your terms." I hope, therefore, in what I have to say here today, that I will stick as strictly as possible to the specifics. It was, I think, on May 27, though I may be a day or two out, that the Prime Minister introduced in the other place a resolution for this flag. As I read what he said on that occasion, I could not help thinking of the lines of Wendell Phillips:

> We feel the thing we ought to be beating beneath the thing we are.

The Prime Minister opened his speech on that occasion by appealing to the Right Honourable Mr. Diefenbaker and to the leaders of the other parties, that they might now bury their prejudices and their differences and unite with him in support of this flag. Well, honourable senators, exactly 100 years before, give a day or two one way or the other, George Brown, that old antagonist of John A. Macdonald, forgot his old enmities, forgot his grudges, and for the sake of a Canada whose unity was vexed at that time, for a Canada in a state of torment, approached his old enemy and said in effect, "Canada is bigger than we are; we have a common love for Canada, we want Canada to survive, and because of that, let us forget our differences and unite to work out something of strength and unity for our common land."

Alas, honourable senators, the Prime Minister did not follow that noble historic example. He did not come to the house and take advantage of the wonderful opportunity that was his. Here you had the position where two of our historic parties had declared in their conventions, in their annual meetings, that they were in fact in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. That was established. Now we are approaching the Canadian centennial, Canada's 100th birthday. What a wonderful opportunity for the Right Honourable Mr. Pearson to have said to the other leaders: "On an occasion such as this, what finer birthday for Canada than that we should sit down together as Canadians, think of our common country, and in some way, by God's grace and in God's name, work out a flag that will be acceptable to all our people."

I am not sure that a greater opportunity in statesmanship has ever been missed in this country. As I listened to Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) a while ago, when he retraced all those steps taken by Canada on her path to nationhood, I could not help thinking how much greater statesmanship was shown to bring about those steps than has been shown in trying to bring about a national flag.

I said a moment ago that before discussing a flag we should try to define it. What is, what should be, a national flag? One of the best definitions I could find was given by a man who was not only a great president of the United States but who was in fact a great historian. Woodrow Wilson, speaking in 1915, laid down these conditions, these essentials of a national flag. He said:

> The things that the flag stands for were created by the experiences of a great people. Everything that it stands for was written by their lives. The flag is the embodiment, not of sentiment, but of history. It represents the experiences made by men and women, the experiences of those who do and live under that flag.

Honourable senators, I hope to speak here today with whatever restraint is permitted by my Celtic blood, but I submit to you, sir, in all sincerity, that the flag which was presented to us by the motion before this house today is not an embodiment of our history.

In the House of Commons last week I listened to two splendid speeches, one by the Leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition and the other by the Prime Minister.

I am proud to say that from listening to these two speeches I was given a new pride about the Parliament of Canada. I was proud that we had two leaders who would speak in such a way in our Parliament. But, honourable senators, in one of his passages, the Prime Minister spoke of a flag which he said would neither dishonour nor betray the past, but which would look at the future, a flag which would look forward and not backward, and which would salute the future.

I must say that I was astonished to hear a man who at one time was a teacher of history make a statement of that kind. Surely the Prime Minister must know that without veneration for the past you cannot effectively salute the future. Surely he must know that a flag in itself is a teacher of history, that it teaches history in our schools, that it teaches history wherever it is flown, and that you cannot snatch from that flag something that belongs to it, something historic in it, without betraying the past. You may salute the future, but when you snatch from an historic flag something that has belonged to it for half a century or more, you betray the past to a certain extent.

Honourable senators, you cannot take a bit of native foliage and put it on a piece of bunting and call it a flag. I shall come to this later on.

The Prime Minister, in the same speech, spoke of the absence from our national flag of symbols which to a large part of our people seemed to represent early differences. He went on, later in the same passage, to identify these people as "Canadians in Quebec."

As one who was born in Quebec, as one whose ancestors sleep in the soil of Quebec, and as one who was reared there, who went to school there, who made his first communion there with French Canadians, I for one refuse to believe, and will continue to refuse to believe, that the majority of the people of Quebec want to tear the last vestige of the Union Jack symbol from the Canadian flag.

Surely that is understandable. Surely the Union Jack in North America, in Quebec, in Canada, has never been a symbol of tyranny, of oppression, or of dishonour. Surely this is something all of us should try to remember at this time.

I call as witness to this, a man who was a glory of French Canada, yes, and a glory for us all—Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Speaking in Paris in 1897, he said:

> We have liberty—

Meaning we of Quebec.

> —absolute complete, more complete—pardon my national pride for the affirmation I am making—more complete than in any country whatsoever in the world: liberty for our religion, with its worship, its ceremonies, its prayers, its customs; liberty for our language, which is the official language as English is: liberty for all the institutions that our ancestors brought from France, and which we regard as a sacred heritage. Equality is ours. What other proof of it could I give you than this? In our country, where the majority is of English descent and of the Protestant religion, the last general elections have brought to power a man of French descent and Catholic religion, who has always strongly affirmed his race and his faith...

Honourable senators, I can imagine what was in the mind of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he made that noble affirmation. I am sure he was thinking of the truth, that in the Province of Quebec, in French Canada, the Roman Catholic religion, its schools and its churches, received legal constitutional and religious freedom years before Daniel O'Connell won Catholic emancipation in the British Isles. No doubt, he was thinking of the fact that long before Daniel O'Connell won Catholic emancipation, the Presbyterian Scots of Cape Breton elected Laurence Matthew Kavanaugh to the Legislature of Nova Scotia. And I am sure he had in mind, as well, the fact that long before Macaulay delivered his great speech on Jews in the British Parliament, the French Canadians of Three Rivers elected Ezekiel Hart to the Legislature of Canada. This was the spirit, this the freedom and the toleration that was built up under the Union Jack in the Province of Quebec.

Honourable senators, are you telling me that the French Canadian is so lacking in intelligence, chivalry and appreciation that he does not remember these facts?

We were told not long ago by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) that a maple leaf is a symbol that has been on the tunics of our soldiers, buried with our soldiers, and so on. That is true. I shall come to that later on, and I think I have a very good answer for it. What I am complaining about now is that the things in our history about which Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke, the things of which Taché spoke, when he said that the last gun in British North America in defence of Canada would be fired by a French Canadian, are being forgotten.

What I complain about with this flag is that it does nothing to note, to remember, to commemorate the French achievement on this continent. What is there on this flag to tell us of the discoverers, the great soldiers, the men who journeyed up this very Ottawa River to death and immortality? What does it tell us of the missionaries who illumined our history with the fires of martyrdom? Nothing on the flag to commemorate these things! Not only does it tear from our flag any fact which commemorates the British contribution, but it leaves off the things, the glorious things, to which the French discoverers and founders of this country contributed.

Honourable senators, I am going to be asked why I, of Irish birth, should stand here to extol the Union Jack. Before coming to the reply, let me answer something that was said by the Leader of the Government about the maple leaf. I speak not one word of disrespect for the maple leaf. It is true that it has been the symbol of our soldiers. But what about Ireland? If there is a plant, if there is a flower, if there is a growth anywhere on this earth more associated with a single nation, it is the shamrock of Ireland.

They speak of badges on the tunics of our soldiers. That shamrock was on the badges of all the soldiers of the Irish brigades that left Ireland after the Treaty of Limerick. It was carried by Irish regiments who down the centuries billowed British battlefields with their graves. Yes, and it was carried by Thomas Francis Meagher, when his Irish brigade stormed the heights of Fredericksburg to be acclaimed by Lee.

Certainly you use the maple leaf as badges for your soldiers, but that is not the meaning of a flag. When the Irish came to design their own flag, they did not put the shamrock on it, they did not put the harp on it, they merely presented a flag to unify their country, the two historic colours of Ireland, orange and green. This was an appeal to the granite qualities of the north to unite with the cloudy and lightning genius of the south, in common love for their common country. This was their hope for an answer to the prayer of the Protestant poet, Ingram:

> Then let the orange lily be they badge, my patriot brother;
> The everlasting green for me, and we for one another.

That is the mission, that is the purpose of a flag, to unite your people, to unite them for their common good.

Oh, you ask me—and I said I would reply—why I, an Irishman, should extol the Union Jack. I think it was Cardinal Newman who once said that though England's sins have been great, her repentances were always greater. Honourable senators, who, whether of Irish blood or not, could deny the proof of that, when in two world wars, when the free world was under siege, when liberty was under siege, England made history's greatest atonement for whatever might have been her sins of the past?

I think too of what was once said by a great Irish-American orator, Bourke Cockran. He said he was willing to forget that England was the home of Cromwell because she was also the home of William Ewart Gladstone. Today Irish exiles and their descendants are willing to forget that England was the home of Cromwell because in recent decades she has been the home of men who met good faith with good faith and goodwill with goodwill.

For myself, I would not have you think I stand here and say you must have the Red Ensign or nothing. I personally am not in favour of the Red Ensign. I want some flag which will keep some vestiges of the British on it and yet also commemorate the contributions of the French and other nations. I am not even standing here advocating a plebiscite. I am speaking to the Canadian heart of you senators who sit here and who should be, I hope, a bit above the battle as we see it in the other house.

When I personally think of the flag I do not think of it in terms of traditions that have the colour of blood or numbers left on the field. I think of England's flag and what happened under it; I think of Burke; I think of Fox; I think of Pitt; of the great men who contributed to parliamentary life; of the men who proclaimed the great maxims of freedom by which we live. I think of the nation which, with one tragic exception, became the fatherland of parliamentary government and liberty. I think of Shakespeare; I think of Milton; I think of Swinburne. I think too of Magna Carta; I think of the petition of rights; I think of the system of trial by jury. I remember as a boy how thrilled I was once when reading a magnificent passage by Macaulay, in which he spoke of an Australian lying out under the Southern Cross and reading by its light those unforgettable words from Magna Carta:

> To no man shall we refuse,
> To no man deny,
> To no man delay justice and right.

These are the things which a flag should represent—the history of the people, the history of civilization. And so, I say a flag should be a teacher of history. God knows, there is need in this country at this time to get our young people to respect the past.

I mentioned once before in the presence of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) the story of Renan—Renan who had broken with his church, who had gone from the orders which he held in the church. She had appealed to history against him, and he became one of her most formidable antagonists, and yet, as an old man, when he came to write The Souvenirs of My Youth he pleaded for the past. He spoke of the importunities of childhood. He told of how, in hours of twilight, he could hear the church bells on the Breton coast calling him to his prayers. "I could not choose but hear," he wrote, and in a passage of haunting and mournful beauty he pleaded with men to love the past, to not forget the past—to love it and not forget it, even though you disagreed with what it had brought and done.

This is the plea I make for a flag, that it be a flag of history, a flag to teach history, a flag to teach patriotism and love of country.

Now, honourable senators, to make an end, I am going to make a brief appeal to this house in what I think is the spirit of this house. After all, this Senate was created as a house of conciliation, as a house of compromise, a house which, in calmness, would sit down and, without passion, take a second look.

I am going to ask you to do that very thing. I am going to ask you to see if we cannot recapture at this time, when our nation is so vexed by the torment of disunity, something of what came into this country two decades ago. After all, deeper, far deeper than anything which divides us, deeper, far deeper than the surface and perhaps hard and bitter things said by both sides during these past three months—deeper than all these things is our common love of Canada. And I would be sorry, I think I should hate myself, if ever I came to believe that the men whose faces I am looking into, some of them my oldest and tenderest friends, had less love for Canada than I have. It is to that spirit, to that spirit in this house and to that spirit in this nation, that I appeal today.

All of us remember those dark days of a few years ago, those days when our sons went out from us into the storm, those days when the telegrams came, and those days when Canadian youth on all the oceans, on all the continents and over Germany's flame-lit skies, gave Canada their last measure of devotion.

Honourable senators, if these could speak to us now, do you think they would not ask us to bury our differences and to give Canada, the land for which they died, a flag which would unite our country? Surely, there is nothing strange or extraordinary about this. Surely, they would ask us to sit down together, in the love and fraternity which came with common peril in their hour, to work out a flag that would appeal to all peoples in our country.

So, honourable senators, seconded by honourable Senator Grosart, I beg to move the following amendment:

> In amendment, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "Government" and substituting therefor "that the Government suspend further action on the proposal for a new Canadian flag in order to give reasonable time to the people and Parliament of Canada to reach agreement on a flag which will incorporate appropriate symbols of the founding peoples of this nation and which will be acceptable to all elements of our population.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, it will certainly be my effort today in whatever words I address to this house to speak with moderation. This controversy over the flag has gone on for many months. It has been the subject of debate in the House of Commons for many weeks. It has been the subject of discussion and, indeed, sometimes of controversy in all the villages, towns and cities of this vast land. That is not a bad thing. I do not think it is a misfortune if, on occasion, we are disturbed a little emotionally, or if, on occasion, feelings run rather high over differences, whether those differences be about a flag or about anything else. It is not, I repeat, a bad thing. Indeed, it is a sign of strength and virility, because a people who cease to have convictions or opinions on any matter of great public importance are a people headed in the wrong direction.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), in his admirable review today, sketched the development of what might be described as Canadian nationalism. I am not opposed to nationalism if it is kept within proper boundaries. I am of Scottish descent and I am proud of it. In the same way Senator Flynn, who smiles across the way at me, is proud of his French descent.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And Irish.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I have no quarrel with him on that.

But it seems that a flag issue or an anthem issue reaches deep into the consciousness and stirs emotions that very often find expression in rather forceful language.

I make no bones about it in this house: I am for a distinctive Canadian flag, and I emphasize the word "distinctive". What does "distinctive" mean? I took the time to look it up in the dictionary, and it is quite clear from the definitions given that "distinctive" means something different, something separate and distinct from anything else.

The controversy has raged, and it is not, I repeat, a bad thing that it should, over a symbol like the Union Jack or the Red Ensign. So far as a Canadian national flag is concerned, neither one is a distinctive symbol. The Union Jack is the flag of our English and British motherland. The Red Ensign has been the symbol of the British merchant marine for over a hundred years, and even today, at this very moment, the Red Ensign stands at the masthead of a thousand ships in the harbours of the world and across the bosom of the vast oceans. How can such a symbol be described as a distinctive symbol?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Who is asking for it in this house?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It is not a distinctive symbol.

Now, if we are to have a flag—and, as I have said, I am 100 per cent for it—then it should be a distinctive flag, and one that when anybody looks at it he or she will say "There is the flag of a nation that has achieved its independence." It should not be possible to confuse it with anything else. To be otherwise, I think, would be, shall I say, almost a degradation of a national symbol or a flag.

Now may I say a word or two about Senator O'Leary's (Carleton) amendment? I can understand the senator's feelings expressed in the eloquent address he gave us a few moments ago, but what is to be gained by postponing this matter further? Senator O'Leary's plea, if it means anything, means delay. He said, in effect, let us think about this for a while longer, and perhaps we can come up with some symbol that everyone will agree upon. Now, is that a likely possibility? I ask it in all reason. Here we have been discussing a flag for months, not only in this Parliament, but as I said earlier, throughout the whole country. It has been discussed in the newspapers; it has been discussed wherever people have gathered together. What more can be said about it?

This Parliament has the responsibility, and it should not evade it, of determining the symbol we should have. Ours is a representative Parliament with members elected to the House of Commons. In passing I may say that in my judgment it is more appropriate for this issue to be discussed and settled in the House of Commons than it is in the Senate. After all, we are not elected representatives; some people think we should be, but we are in fact appointed representatives, and in a matter of this kind I shall be guided, if I had no guidance of my own, by the consensus of opinion expressed in the House of Commons. This opinion was expressed last night, or I should say early this morning, in a very definite manner. May I say here that I consider it to be of great significance that after the final vote had been taken, and after months of controversy, some of it bitter controversy, all members of the House of Commons stood together and sang "God Save the Queen" and "O Canada." In my view that was a fitting termination to a long and, at times, an acrimonious debate. Perhaps we can learn something from that. I would hope that the discussion in this house will be moderate.

I respect every other man's opinion. I respect those among our people in Canada who would cling to the Union Jack. I respect the opinion of those who would like to see the Red Ensign as our national flag. But these are not of Canada. We are now nearing the end of 100 years of our Canadian Confederation, and I think the time has come when we should definitely establish our own distinctive flag. One of the reasons which prompts me to urge this is the cosmopolitan nature of our population. I have here the figures which I received the other day from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. They show that 43.8 per cent of the inhabitants of this land are Anglo-Saxon in origin, 30.4 per cent are of French origin, and 25.8 per cent are of origins other than those two. Whom have we brought and welcomed to this country? We have almost every nationality in Europe. We have among them our Ukrainian friends, who, believe me, have perhaps a finer understanding of what freedom means than many others; we have our Icelandic friends, Germans, Poles—all of these. Why did they come to Canada? They came to a land of freedom.

I remember well many years ago when a Ukrainian settler back in the bush settled upon a homestead, after receiving the title to it, knelt down and kissed the ground that was his own. That is the sort of thing that makes for Canadian nationhood. I say to this house that we cannot hope to unify all our different peoples in a great spirit of unity unless we have a distinctive symbol.

What made the United States the great country it is today? Its population was even more diverse than Canada's, and yet under their symbols, their national anthem and their flag, they have unified their country.

Many years ago I played baseball. I am still interested in baseball, and one thing that I watch on television is the World Series. It has been a striking fact to me that before the ball game starts on the diamond the people stand in their thousands and listen to the singing of their national anthem. While that singing is going on the flag—the Stars and Stripes—is slowly rising majestically to the masthead. Who can measure the impact of that on a people? Who can measure how it solidifies them, and how it gives them a pride in their own country? Then, if the dark days come they stand and fight and fight and fight to preserve their heritage. That is what I hope in future years will develop in this country. But, I do say to this house that it is essential for us to have a flag and an anthem—a flag that has no similarity to any other flag, and a distinctive flag within the meaning of the dictionary term. If we get that I shall be content.

I shall not live to see the full blossoming of all this. These controversies will pass away, and this flag, whatever it is, will be accepted by the Canadian people. I am thinking not of the present generation, but of the future generations. I am thinking of the youngsters who will come along and who will look on that flag flying at the masthead at their schools. They will salute it and believe in it. I say to this house that in my humble judgment it will prove one of the greatest unifying forces we can have in this country.

For that reason, honourable senators, I intend to vote against the amendment and support the resolution of the honourable Leader of the Government.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, at the outset may I congratulate the honourable Senator Crerar, who has just spoken? When one looks at him and thinks back over 40 years when he was a cabinet minister and one of Her Majesty's Privy Councillors, one can only marvel while he speaks. Even though we do not agree with what he said, we admire the man and the manner in which he said it.

May I say, too, how well the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), whom we all admire for his personal qualities and the way in which he has led this house, placed the position of the Government. He did it in a very fair way.

Honourable senators will excuse me, I am sure, if I salute today the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton) for his eloquence. I respectfully suggest that there is no one in this house who outmatches him in eloquence, and his eloquence is matched with good common sense and an abiding and passionate love of Canada.

I rise today more in sorrow than in anger at the axe-wielding incident of closure that occurred in the other place last night. I am sorry to think that it could have taken place, and that the new flag should have its birth and inception under such circumstances.

I am not speaking today as a member of this side of the house to conduct a filibuster, because we have no intention of doing that. We do, however, reserve the right to express, briefly but nevertheless sincerely, our opinions on this whole matter.

May I invoke your support, before it is too late, for the amendment of the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton), and to let this matter be discussed, not for the purpose of adopting the Red Ensign but to have on our flag, even though it is the proposed emblem, tucked away perhaps in the middle of the maple leaf—the symbols of the fleur-de-lis and the Union Jack. Somewhere, some place, they should be shown on this flag.

Much is to be said for the habit of children saluting the flag. They are not saluting a piece of bunting; they are saluting a symbol—a symbol of the traditions and the heritage of their own country, a symbol of nationhood. The Red Ensign, because it is the Red Ensign that we have at the present time, has in it the two symbols, the Union Jack and the fleur-de-lis. It conjures up for all of us, I think, our traditions, our history, the heroic sacrifices of our dead, our free institutions, our Parliament, our courts, and all of our freedoms, but above all it conjures up in the mind of every one of us the standard of high integrity and the standard of ethics that we as public men and public servants owe to Canada.

Might I respectfully suggest that if some of the participants who are now being investigated by a judicial inquiry had had before them in their offices the Union Jack or the Red Ensign, including the fleur-de-lis, or if they had had above their beds something to remind them of the high standards that the people of Canada look to them to discharge—had they paid more attention to these symbols and to the significance of them, honourable senators, then we could rest assured—

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. Walker: —we could rest assured there would have been no investigation necessary.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, the honourable senator is entirely out of order. This is something that should not be referred to in this debate. This is a matter before a judicial inquiry, and my honourable friend has made a mistake in bringing it up.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, it will be a new day when anybody takes advice from the honourable senator on parliamentary procedure. He has been notoriously wrong in the past, and I must point out to him that if he reads the record of the House of Commons he will find that reference was made to this incident long after the judicial inquiry was set up.

I have been shocked by the vehemence of the attack—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I think the point raised by the honourable Senator Roebuck is well taken. I feel sure that the honourable Senator Walker, who has had some experience in the application of the rules of the house, knows that he is out of order when he mentions these things. I shall ask him not to continue in that vein.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, as an old friend and acquaintance of yours, and because of the respect I have for the Chair, I will obey any ruling you make, but I will not take any lesson in parliamentary procedure from the distinguished senator who has just interrupted.

I have been shocked by the vehemence of the attacks made on the former Prime Minister in the other place, as he fought for the maintenance of the symbols and traditions of our inheritance. I was shocked at the manner in which the publicly-owned C.B.C. and the editors of certain newspapers have attacked him. As one who has had some slight experience in libel law and, if I may say, as one who has acted as counsel for Canada's largest newspaper, may I say it is obvious beyond words that these attacks are not only malevolent, malicious, defamatory and sadistic, but they are downright nonsense, trash, nasty and insulting.

Why are they so bold? Why are they so bold as to attack the former Prime Minister because of his stand on this flag question? Is it because he refused to reply to personal attacks? Is it because they know he will not reply to personal attacks on himself?

In connection with this matter may I say that I have urged upon the Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition in the other place that he issue a writ of libel against some of the pip-squeaks in the C.B.C. who have been attacking him, and to single out some editor as a defendant in a libel action. But, no, he always refuses, pointing out that the purpose of a libel action is to clear one's fair name and reputation, and not to punish others. He feels that his fair name will be cleared at the polls, not by a jury of twelve but by a population of 19 million.

But what a pity it is that in discussing a subject like that of a flag the prejudice and hatred of man towards man should exemplify itself by the poor, partisan, miserable attacks on the former Prime Minister.

Now, enough of that. But is it not correct, that the Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition in the other place is right on this flag question, just as he was right on the Arrow, just as he was right on the devaluation of the dollar, just as he was right on Canada's participation in NATO? He was damned at the time because of his decisions in respect of those matters, just as he is being criticized at the present time.

May I suggest that we are all, including the Right Honourable Mr. Diefenbaker, sick and tired of this protracted debate. The debate was worthwhile in an effort to preserve for Canada the symbols which we hold dear. He was fighting, not to save a piece of bunting but to maintain a principle, to maintain the symbol of all that Canada holds dear, past, present and future.

What next? May I respectfully suggest, and predict, not as a prophet of doom, but as one who watches our love of Canada wane from year to year and our traditions ignored from year to year—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Wax from year to year.

Hon. Mr. Walker: One person who waxes happy is the honourable Leader of the Government. We are talking now about Canada, its symbols, its tradition. In the minds of the public they are one. The next move which you will see, if I am correct—and if I am not I may be told so—will be directed towards the abolition of the monarchy. The next move will be an effort to take Canada out of the British Commonwealth, and the next will be to make Canada a republic.

Honourable senators, my concluding words to you are these, that powerful forces are now working in this country to destroy what we hold dear to us. They gloated over the "axe job" that happened yesterday. It is not too late to stop their assault and to renew our faith in Canada, to preserve—we do not care how, whether it is in the Red Ensign or in some other design—some vestige of our inheritance, some vestige of our traditions, by including in some way the Union Jack and the fleur-de-lis.

Honourable senators, I trust we may all think seriously about this matter and give some deep concern to the amendment proposed by the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton). This is our last chance. We are separating the nation now as it never has been separated before. Many senators on the other side have expressed their personal opinions, and they have been quoted in the press, supporting the Red Ensign. I am looking forward to seeing them rise in this house, to express their desire to see the Red Ensign, or some other design including the Union Jack and the fleur-de-lis, carried on as a symbol of all that we hold dear, past, present and future.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I find myself in the same position as that of many of my colleagues tonight. I have some sympathy at this moment for my friend Senator Choquette, who opposed the motion last night ostensibly because his colleagues were not ready to go on with this discussion. I little expected that, less than 24 hours later, I would find myself on my feet saying what I have to say. However, this speech is not one which Leonard W. Brockington, one of Canada's most distinguished lawyers would call "The most carefully prepared extemporaneous speech ever given." It is certainly extemporaneous and is not carefully prepared, but it comes from the heart.

I intend to start by complimenting those of my colleagues who have preceded me. They have well maintained the tradition of this house, and they have lent distinction to this particular debate. In saying that, I refer to the debate in the whole of the Canadian Parliament.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) commenced in his usual diplomatic style, and referred quite appropriately to the fine contributions to the building of Canada by Sir John A. Macdonald. He went on to pay a tribute to Sir Wilfrid Laurier—and I was happy to see that Senator O'Leary (Carleton) did the same. Then he referred to the contribution by Mr. Borden and of course to that distinguished luminary of this particular chamber, Mr. Meighen. He found even some kind words for Mr. Mackenzie King. I must say here that, as I listened to my friend Senator O'Leary, I felt he distinguished himself by his eloquence, he pitched his theme on a high note and, if I were back in the classroom today marking papers, as I have done in the university for some considerable time, I would give him "A plus" for eloquence. I would give him very high marks for making a contribution which was distinctive in its literary quality and which appeals to the emotions of Canadian people. I think it makes the Senate a better place for his having spoken.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: On the other hand, being a practical farmer from the west, I do not think I could give him high marks for his logic. I say that in all kindness, and I will come back to it later. The discussion so far, with this particular exception, has been the kind of thing we like to think the Senate of Canada stands for. I must say frankly to Senator O'Leary that I cannot support his amendment. I feel this is where some of his logic begins to fall apart.

We are discussing a matter on which in the other place there were some 280 speeches, and it is stretching the English language a long way to dignify some of them by calling them speeches. We have discussed this subject on the radio, we have discussed it on television, in the press, in our churches, we have discussed it wherever people meet. But there is by no means unanimity now, and there never will be unanimity on this particular topic.

No matter what length of time Senator O'Leary may be prepared to give the Senate, or a committee of the Senate, to bring in a new design, we could never achieve a greater measure of unanimity than we have today.

As I sense the pulse of the people of this country, and I have wide contacts, my feeling is that, at a very modest and conservative figure, 65 to 75 per cent of the Canadian people want a distinctive Canadian flag.

I was a little disappointed last night that many of my colleagues were not over in the other place, in the galleries, listening to the discussion which took place—though it certainly was not the Canadian Parliament at its best. What impressed me most was that the galleries were packed. Who made up the majority of the people in the galleries? Young people, young Canadians, the future citizens of this country. I made it my business to move among them and to listen to them. I could be wrong but, as I sensed their expressions, there was a feeling that they, too, wanted a distinctive Canadian flag. They were not unhappy with the maple leaf flag; they might be quite happy with another design, but that is not the point.

In spite of the emotion which has been generated, particularly in the other place, on this issue, Canadians are not basically an emotional people. We are true to the traditions of all northern peoples. We find it hard to become excited and steamed up about any issue. I sometimes feel that it would be better if we were a little more emotional, and injected into our national life a little more colour and pageantry, both of which are associated with emotion.

Like many honourable senators, I have travelled in many parts of the world. One of the things which impressed me while driving through the countryside of Denmark, Norway and Sweden, was to see their national flag flying on every schoolhouse and public building, and frequently in the farmyards and over the farm gates. I like to see that sort of thing. It is colourful, has meaning and gives distinction to the people. In Canada we do not practice that to anything like the extent I would like to see. I hope that when we evolve and accept a new Canadian flag, we shall fly it in thousands, and thus inject a little more colour into the life of this nation.

A great deal has been said in the past about symbols. I listened to Senator O'Leary with interest when he spoke of the place of the shamrock, and as far as the Irish are concerned I agree with him. I think the only reason the Irish did not put the shamrock on their flag is that they never thought about it.

As one of Scottish descent, I might feel equally fervent about the thistle. In all frankness, as one whose family, like others, was deeply involved in World War II, particularly at sea, having had eleven relatives of one branch of the family perish at sea, under the Red Ensign, I must say that I would have been quite happy to go along with the Red Ensign. However, I know from my experience of the Canadian people that the great majority who came from other lands have no particular feeling about the Union Jack or the Red Ensign. It is not that they do not respect them, it is that they do not feel they are part of their life, but rather a certain acquired characteristic.

Reference was made some time ago by Senator Crerar to the role of Ukrainians in Canada. I have always had an affection for them. Often I go to Toronto, and listen to the Ukrainian choir. I love their folk singing and dances. I think there must be some affinity between them and the Scots, because their music and dancing express a similar vitality and life. Ukrainians have added much to the life of Canada. From the very days they came to this country they have been, as described by Mr. Sifton, former Minister of Interior, as "the men in sheepskin coats." No people are making a greater contribution to our universities than are the Ukrainians. They are talented in music, painting, the theatre, and in many other ways. One of the reasons for this is that they are a volatile, emotional people, who express themselves vigorously in emotional ways. I am quite sure that if 10 years from now I were to go into a community like Smoky Lake, Alberta, which is 85 per cent Ukrainian, and the maple leaf flag were flying over the schools and public buildings and elsewhere in that and similar communities, those people would venerate that symbol of Canada and Canadianism as strongly as they do now the Union Jack or the Red Ensign.

We are on dangerous ground when we talk about symbols. The shamrock is the symbol of Ireland, and the thistle is the symbol of the Scottish people. Both the Irish and the Scots are proud of their symbols, but they are no more proud than are Canadians the world over of the maple leaf. Wherever you see the maple leaf today it means Canada. At the gravestones, throughout the far-flung corners of the Empire, and in Hong Kong, Italy, France, Flanders, the maple leaf means Canada. People who served under that distinctive symbol believed in what the maple leaf stood for. So I am quite happy with the maple leaf. I would have been happy to accept three maple leaves, but I like one better. Therefore, I am quite in favour of this distinctive symbol.

I have been rather pained and disturbed to hear some people say that you cannot distinguish between the maple leaf flag and the Peruvian flag. All I can say to such people is that if that is the case, they should pay a visit to their local oculist.

I have with me an edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica in which there is a picture of the Peruvian flag, and I will pass it around, or you may obtain it at the library, so that you can see the difference between the two flags. If anyone could possibly mistake that flag for the single maple leaf flag, he had better, as I have said, go to the oculist at the earliest possible moment.

I agree that symbols are vitally important. The shamrock generates in my friend Senator O'Leary all the lyric poetry of the Irish people; it gives him a sense of the smell of the boglands, the lilt of Irish laughter, and brogues. I want to see the day in Canada when its young people will feel the same filial affection for the maple leaf—and I am sure that day will come.

When you say we are throwing out the Union Jack, throwing out the Red Ensign, that we are tearing out the roots of the past, that I do not believe and cannot accept. I yield to no man my feelings of pride in the Union Jack and what it stands for—all the things that Senator O'Leary said so well. Certainly that is vital, important and part of our heritage. I appreciate everything the Red Ensign stands for, even in its short career, but I am as sure as I am standing here that if Canadians will do as they have done in the past, stand behind something that is a symbol of Canadian unity, this symbol will hold for them and generate for them the kind of affection given by people of other countries who venerate their own national symbols.

The Union Jack and the Red Ensign stand for fine things in our experience of the past. They do not mean so much to new Canadians. Now we shall have a new flag by means of which we shall also transmit the fine traditions of Magna Carta and everything the Union Jack stands for: freedom of speech, loyalty, courage, devotion, and all that Canada stands for.

Five or six years ago I was in New Delhi, India. I spent half a day in the Supreme Court there. This was under the flag of India, which had been flying there since 1949, a pretty new flag. The men were as black as you like, because many of them seemed to have come from the south. They were colourful in their robes and wigs. Their speech was as English as people in the West. Here these people were carrying the British tradition of law and justice into a completely different environment. If the people of India can transmit the British legal tradition, and if they can understand what those traditions mean—that is the important thing—we can do it too.

Whether the Red Ensign or the Union Jack will be held affectionately in the hearts of the Canadian people, and have the kind of meaning to them as those other symbols of the past, will depend on what we Canadians do about it right now. In Canada we have tremendous opportunities. We have one of the richest countries in the world—rich in resources and people, rich in the heritage from other lands. We have a vital people. We are enriched by the streams of culture, the skills and the traditions of many other countries.

Let us unite these in terms of work, in terms of achievement, in terms of legislation and justice in the solution of the spectres of poverty and unemployment, and let us bring a solution to the problem of automation, and provide those realities in terms of education, health and high living standards. These are the concrete realities which will give meaning and purpose to this new flag in Canada. I venture to suggest that in a short time Canadians will be just as proud of the new flag as any Britisher is of the Union Jack or anyone in the United States is of the Stars and Stripes. It will depend on what meaning we give to it in terms of the things we do, as Canadians, in attempting to solve our problems.

Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak today—what I say is completely off the cuff—but I am delighted with the standard of the discussion, up to this point at any rate, and the tone of conciliation. I believe that we have an opportunity today to justify the responsibility and the trust that has been assigned to us in constituting this the house of sober second thought.

I respect Senator Grattan O'Leary's desire to have another flag, or to come up with another design. I do not think that suggestion is practical. I do not care how much time you gave the committee to do it, you would get no more unanimity than you have at the present time. So I say, let us get behind the design we have and give it meaning and purpose in terms of the potentiality of Canada today. Then, in 10 years it will be the symbol of a united people, through which French, English, Ukrainian, German and even Chinese and Japanese will feel this has meaning to them in terms of opportunity, of justice and of freedom—opportunity that is equalled in no other country in the world. That is the challenge to us today; that is a challenge I am sure all Canadians can and will live up to.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to speak today. However, I have hurriedly prepared a few notes.

First, I would like to congratulate the Leader of the Government for his words of wisdom and moderation in speaking to the motion. I would also like to congratulate our principal speaker on this side, Senator Grattan O'Leary, for the wonderful address he has delivered. I feel quite moved when I listen to an Irishman speak; and he is one of the best of Irish speakers.

Senator Crerar has said that we should have a distinctive flag. Senator Cameron supported this view, and mentioned a dictionary he had with him which carried a picture of the Peruvian flag. I looked up the Peruvian flag in a dictionary I have, and noted that it is exactly the same as this proposed flag, except that the Peruvian flag has a coat of arms where the proposed Canadian flag has a red maple leaf. At a distance you would not know which flag you were flying, the Peruvian or the Canadian. It might be that if you had one flying in this chamber you could tell the difference right away, but I do not think you could from any distance.

Honourable senators, at the outset I want to say that I love my French compatriots—I think a great deal of them. They are so very hospitable; they love their homes. And what emotion could be more admirable in a man than that he loves his family and his home? They love their church, and from a Christian point of view that is a wonderful emotion.

On the trip down from the west to Ottawa we very frequently have a French hostess on the Air Canada plane. These hostesses are typical of the French people. They are asked to do a job, to make the passengers on the plane comfortable, and in doing so they inject their whole personality into their work. This is so typical of the French make-up, they inject their whole personality into their work, and everyone feels much better for their presence. This is the attitude of the French hostesses, God bless them, and we love it when we travel on the planes. It is typical of all Canadians in Quebec.

However, having said that, I want to emphasize that Quebec has a number of very serious problems. Among such problems are, first, the rural slums in back areas of Quebec; second, there is the lower educational standard among the general populace. These two problems make it very difficult to fit the average man into either a technical or white collar job. So, economics is an important problem in Quebec.

Now let me get down to this amendment. Quebec has been led through a series of emotional concepts. In 1958 the party presently in power federally lost its hold in Quebec at the polls. Again, in 1963 it suffered a serious loss. The question is, what to do to strengthen the position of the party in relation to that overwhelming vote in Quebec and so return the present Government in 1965 or 1966, or whenever the next election occurs.

These are surmises on my part, but one of the first things the present Government did was set up a commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. As was anticipated, this has caused dissension in Canada. In particular, it appealed to the rebellious and noisy young people in Quebec, who are demanding their rights from the English people—from those "bad" English Canadians. The idea is to divide and conquer.

The second step was to introduce a flag, wiping out the English connection with the past and making the English Canadian anti-Quebec. Having taken this step, this same party prolonged the debate in the other place until they had in the end to use closure, or the guillotine, to close off the debate.

The present Government could at any time during these past few months have set aside the flag resolution in the other place and brought in other legislation that was pressing for consideration. But no, they were anxious to win the next election. They thought that with the aid of the news media they could destroy the Conservative party in Canada and, more particularly, in Quebec. To my mind the flag resolution was sheer political blackmail being practised in the Province of Quebec.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. I am very sorry to interrupt the honourable senator, but the expression he used is unparliamentary, and I would ask him to withdraw it. During his speech he has apparently gone beyond his intentions. I hope the honourable senator will see fit to withdraw that expression.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I apologize.

Honourable senators, I have nothing further to say, but I feel that this flag will not now unite Canada and that it never will.

Senator Cameron suggested that 65 or 75 per cent of the people want a distinctive flag. I think he is right. However, in western Canada everybody I spoke to in the German settlements and in the English settlements wanted to know why we prolonged this debate. I said, "Well, do you want a new flag, or are you satisfied with the present one?" "Oh, we didn't want to change our flag," they replied. This is the sentiment I have found all through western Canada, wherever I have been. They did not want any change, but they were quite willing to make a change if it would bring about unity with Quebec.

Honourable senators, I support the amendment.

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot: Honourable senators, I know I tell you nothing new when I say that I was born in Rivière du Loup, Quebec, that my father was born 108 years ago in Rivière du Loup, Quebec, that my grandfather lived 150 years ago at Rivière du Loup, Quebec. Rivière du Loup is 400 miles east of Ottawa, on the south shore of the St. Lawrence River. It is a splendid part of the country. At that point the river is 20 miles wide with beautiful islands, Hare Island, White Island, the Pilgrims, Green Island, and the Brandy Pots which got their name from the smuggling that took place in the olden days. The air is pure; it smells of seaweed when the tide is low, and when it is high the river is like a lake below my veranda.

The people of Rivière du Loup are wonderful people; they are friendly and broadminded, and they would not recognize themselves in the picture that has been painted of them by honourable Senator Pearson. They would ask, "Of whom are you speaking? You are not speaking of us. You are speaking from the planet Mars, or you are lost on the moon—you are the first man to get to the moon." I say that in a jocular way. I am not offended, because I know the honourable gentleman was not serious, and I am sure he has never visited Rivière du Loup. I know he has never met the people of Rivière du Loup. I am proud to be one of them.

Quebec is a delightful province. I am sure his colleagues from the Province of Quebec, or those who have visited that province, will say to him, "My dear Pearson, why did you say that? You don't know what damage you have done to the party." It rather reminds me of the man who was trying to reach the summit of a mountain and he was depending upon his alpenstock, but the alpenstock broke and he fell down.

One point that strikes me is that the honourable gentleman represents Prince Albert, the place where his honourable Leader lives at the present time. I shall speak of him; I know him well, and he is a friend of mine.

I remember seeing on one occasion a picture of a good-looking gentleman with curly hair and with the stature of an officer. He was in front of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. There was a brass plate at the door on which was written full length "Dominion Bureau of Statistics." He stared at it, rolled his eyes and said "Dominion will stay in there." It was said by no less than the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, before he became "right honourable". He looked again at that piece of brass. He was so enthusiastic about it that he could have written a poem about the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. He was thinking of that; he did not want to change anything in it. As we know, it remained as it was then.

I know my fellow citizens well enough to give them the benefit of the doubt, and I know very well that in the Province of Ontario and perhaps in the Province of Saskatchewan where my honourable friend comes from, there is the salute to the flag in the morning by the little children who go to school. Sometimes they may miss their prayers, but the first thing they do is to stand erect before the flag and salute it, just as John Diefenbaker stood erect before the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. However, they salute that flag, a flag which has no maple leaf on it at all. It is the Union Jack. It was done in the Province of Ontario and perhaps it was done in some other provinces as well. I am not sure of that. But I know it was done in Ontario. I do not disapprove of that. But what I do complain about is that the same thing was not done in the Province of Quebec for the fleur-de-lis. In that respect the Province of Quebec is not as far advanced as the Province of Ontario.

I should also say that in my view the national flag has its right to a place in our churches as well as in the public square. Take for instance, the tricolour of France—blue, white and red. If you visit the greatest church in Europe where the kings of France were crowned, Notre Dame de Paris, there you will see the French flag, the tricolour, hanging, just as you will see the Union Jack in Westminster Abbey and, indeed, in Westminster Cathedral, because the English-speaking Roman Catholics have the same respect for the British flag as do the Anglicans.

As I have said, I regret that in the Province of Quebec the schoolchildren have not stood at attention at least before the flag of the province before we had a national flag of our own. But if they were not called upon to stand and salute a flag, it was because the people of the Province of Quebec were intelligent enough to understand that the Union Jack, although it is perhaps the most beautiful flag in the world, was not the flag of our country. It may be the flag of the Commonwealth but it is not the flag of Canada, and that is why the people of the province of Quebec had enough judgment to decide that the schoolchildren should not salute a flag that was not that of their own country.

The people of the Province of Quebec want only one thing in this country; they want to be respected and to enjoy peace. That is all they want. They do not want to quarrel with Canadians from any other province. They respect them, but they also realize, since they are not parochial, that Canada does not stop at the boundaries of their own province. They realize that as they are at home in the Province of Quebec they should also be at home in any other part of Canada from coast to coast, and that is why I am happy to make the comparison between the St. Lawrence at Rivière du Loup and the Juan de Fuca Strait at Victoria. From my verandah in Rivière du Loup I can see the Laurentian Mountains 20 miles away across the river. From there I can see beautiful sunsets. In the same way the people from Victoria, British Columbia, see the impressive Olympic Mountains in the State of Washington. The difference is that the mountains across from Victoria are in the United States, while the mountains that I can see in Quebec are part of our own country and part of our own heritage.

I hope you will understand that when somebody listens to a speech like that made by my honourable friend, a speech of which he could never be proud, while it may not provoke me to indignation—because I like him and I have consideration for him, as I have for all my colleagues—it may arouse in me regret that he had not taken the trouble to inform himself when he was chairman of the Land Use Committee of the situation existing in this country. In that committee he had people coming from all parts of the country and from all parts of the Province of Quebec. They told him about the difficulties of the settlers, although there are as many prosperous farmers in the Province of Quebec as there are in other parts of Canada. Perhaps they do not use mechanization as much as is done in the west, but they are progressive farmers. They are up-to-date farmers who can be compared favourably with anyone. But he did not take advantage of his chairmanship to become informed about the vital problems of Canada, and when I think that the gentleman has spoken in that manner of my Province of Quebec—the province where I am living—I am so disappointed that I cannot express it.

I must tell him something, and I could exchange notes with him, as I could with any English-speaking colleague, about what my family has done as Canadians. In the first place, my maternal great-grandfather, Louis Bertrand, who was born early in the last century, was elected in the 1830s by acclamation as the member for Rimouski, which at that time included Témiscouata. He voted for the 92 resolutions to promote responsible government, and when Robert Baldwin was defeated in York he offered his seat to him, and Baldwin became the member for Rimouski. The thing was done with the help of my paternal grandfather, Jean Baptiste Pouliot.

Moreover, I can tell you that my grandfather, who was a member of the Legislative Assembly, voted against Confederation because he thought it meant legislative union. He was one of the parliamentarians who signed a petition to Lord Carnarvon for the delaying of the adoption of the British North America Act so that the Maritime provinces would have a breathing spell and time to organize themselves to face the situation, and thus be happier in Canada.

I am not going to insist on it, but I can tell you that in my family the speeches of Edward Blake, of Mills, of Alexander Mackenzie, of Cartwright and many other English-speaking Liberals were translated into the French language and were distributed in Quebec as election propaganda, because at that time, except for Laurier, the Liberal public speakers in the Province of Quebec were very few. Those pamphlets containing speeches made to Ontario English-speaking Canadians were distributed in the Province of Quebec by Quebec Liberals to serve as their own political propaganda. Was it not pretty good?

Now, honourable colleagues, having said that I must tell you that Canada has the right to have a flag. Canada, our country, has undoubtedly the right to have her own flag, just as the Province of Nova Scotia has the right to have its own flag—a flag that was given it by King James—and just as the Province of Quebec has the right to have its own flag, which was voted upon unanimously by the Quebec Legislature and without any consideration of political affiliation.

Mr. Duplessis, the Premier at that time, met the Honourable Joseph Adelard Godbout, who was later a member of the Senate, and mentioned to him his proposal for a flag. What did Mr. Godbout say? Mr. Godbout, who was Leader of the Opposition, said: "That flag will be the provincial flag of the Province of Quebec. It will not be the flag of Duplessis. It will not be the flag of Godbout. It will be the flag of the Province of Quebec." Instead of playing politics with it, Mr. Duplessis moved his proposal for a flag, and it was seconded by Mr. Godbout, and adopted unanimously.

I have written in the local paper down home that Mr. Pearson, the Prime Minister of Canada, should follow the example of Mr. Duplessis, and that Mr. Diefenbaker should follow the example of Mr. Godbout. Mr. Pearson was ready to follow the example of Mr. Duplessis. He did so, and the resolution that is on the Order Paper is precisely what Mr. Duplessis moved in respect of the Quebec provincial flag. But, very unfortunately, the Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition in the other place thought it beneath his dignity to follow the example of Mr. Godbout.

I remember that in this very chamber one day I mentioned what Mr. Frost, the former Premier of Ontario, had said about the Red Ensign. It is fascinating to think that in the Province of Ontario the official flag was the Union Jack. Everybody knows it. But, after consideration, Mr. Frost decided to change it to the Red Ensign. What did Mr. Frost do finally? Mr. Frost said that the time was ripe to choose the maple leaf as the Canadian emblem on Canada's national flag. That was said by Mr. Frost, the former Premier of Ontario, and who could be more Conservative than the former Premier of Ontario, who was a good politician, and an able statesman. He was revered by our Conservative friends when he was Premier of Ontario, but now that he has left politics his opinion does not seem to count with them. Is it not most unfortunate?

But, there are reasons for hope. The tone of the debate here today, compared with what I heard yesterday in the House of Commons, is very different. It is not at all the same thing. Here there is more dignity. Sometimes some people who are misinformed make mistakes of fact and reasoning, but they should be forgiven. One who sincerely believes in the truth, and who knows the facts, must be intelligent enough to understand. I will not say any more about it.

This is the time for us to have a flag of our own. Canada is a great country. All the countries of Central Africa have flags of their own. I remember after Mr. Prudham, a former minister in the St. Laurent Government, went to one of the new African states, he told me that the first thing he saw was the raising of the flag. How can my honourable friends opposite be displeased about the move for a new flag when we think that in the West Indies Princess Margaret, the sister of the Queen, was present when the Union Jack was taken down? I do not remember it positively, but she may well have been the one who raised the flag of the new country. What about Prince Philip, the Consort of Her Majesty the Queen, who did likewise? Nobody was surprised. They recognized the fact that we live in an era of progress within a democracy. From the time that President Woodrow Wilson spoke of self-governing minorities, those people have had the right to be autonomous and to show their independence by flying a flag of their own.

Is not Canada at least the equal of the central, eastern and western African countries? Those countries have pride. They are a proud people. Their spokesmen are eloquent because they speak with their hearts; they are not afraid to behave like patriots. I have heard them at the United Nations in New York. I have heard the representatives of all the new African nations speaking beautifully. Those men were educated at the great French and English universities of Europe, and they were the best of all debaters at the United Nations. What struck me was their patriotism, but does patriotism become an empty word in the context of all that is said about internationalism and federalism?

If I have spoken as I have it is not because I am anti-British, but because I am pro-Canadian. I have great respect for Her Majesty the Queen, who is the symbol of authority, and the head of our Government in the widest possible sense.

I am from Rivière du Loup. I am from the Province of Quebec, but I am also a Canadian, and I am proud of it.

Now, honourable colleagues, what shall we do? How long will you prolong this discussion? What will you have to say about Quebec? What has the Laurendeau-Dunton Royal Commission to do with the Canadian flag? Was that royal commission set up to appease Quebec? Quebec does not have to be appeased, and I have said so many times. The question of the flag exists from the beginning, from a long time ago. If you go back to the volumes of Hansard of the 1920's, you will see that the first one who mentioned a Canadian flag at the House of Commons was Cameron McIntosh of The Battlefords, a member whose name should be remembered. What was the flag that he proposed? It was the Red Ensign. That was the beginning. He was a pioneer. His suggestion was the first one for a national flag.

Afterwards, there was an infinity of models of flags. There was the flag of the League, one red triangle, and one white triangle with a green maple leaf in between. I cannot see that any man with a head on his shoulders would propose such a flag. Another one which is proposed is a flag with three triangles. According to the science of heraldry, triangular flags are the flags of the illegitimate branch of the family. They were not proud to propose such flags.

I have written a series of articles in La Presse to the same effect as what my learned friend Senator Cameron has said, to tell the readers of La Presse what were the different flags of the world. There was the flag of Siam with an emblem on it—it was an elephant. Yet the members of the Opposition said in the House of Commons that no country had its emblem on its national flag. But you did not look at the Encyclopaedia Britannica which is here, and which I have also at home. My colleagues may not have looked at the pictures of flags that we find in every school dictionary, when half of the national flags of the world contain the emblems of their countries. I am not questioning the good faith of my colleague. A man of his importance has no excuse to make such a speech, even for the best possible motive. I have a right to disagree, and I do disagree with my friend. I may have disagreed with all my friends, but this time I know that what I am telling you, honourable senators—it is the sentiment of the immense maturity not only of the Province of Quebec but of the whole country.

When you speak of soldiers, we can speak of soldiers. We can speak of the Legion. Who is heading the Legion? It is mostly Imperials. I can speak of the Imperials, because I may be the only member who had the honour to receive a resolution of felicitation from the Imperials of the British Army in Toronto, when I spoke to the honorary colonels. The leaders of the Legion do not represent the sentiments of the members, of the rank and file of the army, navy and air force, any more than the leaders of labour unions represent the feelings of the members of their unions.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): That is not correct.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: What is not correct?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Your last statement.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Do not argue with him.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Senator Croll tells me not to argue. I will listen to him and he will be my adviser.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: He knows.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: With the experience I have, I shall not discuss it here, but when you come to my office I will show you the files of murder by army doctors, and many others.

On motion of honourable Senator Irvine, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. J. Brooks: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government what he has in mind for the sittings of the Senate for the rest of the week?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): First of all, I think everyone agrees that we have made a fine beginning on this debate this afternoon. I understand from members opposite that some of them are not prepared to continue the discussion this evening. In these circumstances, I think it appropriate that we should not sit this evening.

I think we should consider continuing the debate until a conclusion. I would hope that we would resume the debate tomorrow afternoon—Senator Irvine will open at that time —and we should plan, if we do not finish tomorrow afternoon, to sit in the evenings until a reasonable hour. I am not talking about a late, late session tomorrow. We can continue on Thursday. I do not know how long it is planned to continue the debate, but I do know that many senators desire to speak and it is not the intention of anybody on this side to restrict participation in the debate in any way.

Honourable senators, may I say that there appears to have been some misunderstanding last night. I hope that honourable senators will believe me when I say that when I gave notice of the motion which has been presented this afternoon, I was trying—and perhaps this afternoon's debate proves I have succeeded—to suit the convenience of the Senate. I feel that when honourable senators are here they want to be active and do the work that is available before the Senate. We have been fortunate a few times on the dates upon which we have returned. I think we have been fortunate in being able to make full use of our time this afternoon.

I hope that what I have said satisfies the Leader of the Opposition. We do plan to continue the debate until a conclusion. I think honourable senators will agree that, without overtaxing anybody, we could sit in the afternoons and until a reasonable hour in the evenings until we conclude this debate.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I wonder what is "a reasonable hour?" That is rather indefinite. Could the honourable Leader give us an idea of what he considers to be a reasonable hour? Would it be 10 o'clock?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It might very well be. The rules call for His Honour the Speaker to leave the Chair at 6 o'clock. He has but five more minutes before that happens this afternoon. Normally, under the rules, the Senate resumes at 7.30. I think that if we make the progress tomorrow that we have made today, by 10 o'clock tomorrow evening we might be close to the end of the discussion.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Will we be discussing any business other than this motion?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think it would be the wish of the Senate to conclude this debate first, and then we might deal with whatever other items we have on the Order Paper.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the following report:

> The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to which was referred the Bill S-20, intituled: "An Act to incorporate Bank of British Columbia", has in obedience to the order of reference of June 9, 1964, examined the said bill and now reports that in the opinion of your committee the preamble to the said bill has not been proved for the following reasons:
> At the hearings before the committee, the Premier and other Ministers of the Government of the Province of British Columbia appeared in support of the bill and stated that, if the bill were passed, the government of that province would subscribe for up to 10 per cent of the shares to be issued by the bank; so far as your committee is aware, there is no precedent for the ownership by the government of a province of a substantial proportion of the shares of a chartered bank operating under the provisions of the Federal Bank Act; this could involve the effective control of a federal chartered bank by the government of a province, a situation which would raise important questions of public policy and of constitutional law; your committee is of the opinion that these are matters of general policy which should be determined by the Parliament of Canada in the forthcoming revision of the Bank Act, and that pending such determination this bill should not be proceeded with.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PRONUNCIATION OF "NOEL" BY FRENCH ANNOUNCERS—INQUIRY ANSWERED

(Translation):

Hon. Jean-François Pouliot inquired of the Government pursuant to notice:

> When will the Board of Directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation give instructions to the French speakers and commentators to follow the example of their English compatriots and pronounce correctly the word "Noël"?

Hon. John J. Connolly: The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation informed me that according to universal French rules, recognized by every phonetist, the letter "o" in Noël" is an open o as in expressions such as "col" or "poli". It is the pronunciation used by the announcers on the French networks of the C.B.C.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: This is more than perfect.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR DESIGNATION OF NATIONAL EMBLEM—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton), in amendment to the motion of the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West):

> That this house do recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to have designated as the National Flag of Canada a red flag of the proportions two by length and one by width, containing in its centre a white square, the width of the flag, bearing a single red maple leaf, or in heraldic terms, described as gules on a Canadian pale argent a maple leaf of the first.

Hon. Olive L. Irvine: Honourable senators, on Friday afternoon, December 11 last, the President of the Privy Council in the other place made a statement of the Government's intention to invoke closure to terminate the flag debate.

This debate has been long, but one can be assured that as a result the people of Canada will have a better knowledge of our history, our traditions, and the meaning of national emblems than they ever had before.

As a student and a teacher in my native Province of Manitoba, it was never necessary in our educational system to deal with this particular problem. I can recollect no mention being made of Canada's flag specifically. We were taught to respect the Red Ensign and the Union Jack, and the peoples from every country who settled in our midst were eager and happy to stand by all that we held dear.

Well I remember my first little country school situated out on the prairie, where children of many lands assembled to receive their education. We were a happy, carefree group. There, each school day, we took turns in raising our flag in the morning, and lowered and folded it carefully just before dismissal time. This short but impressive ceremony remains to this day in the minds of every pupil who attended that little school. We were taught that the British and French came here because of the freedom that could be found in this country. They founded a country that was the first in any part of what is the Commonwealth today to have religious freedom, the first in which slavery was abolished, and the first in which representative government was developed. These are the traditions we have been raised under and which represent clearly to us the fact that we are an independent country.

Sometimes I fear Canadians overlook the fact that Canada is composed of more than the two central provinces, Ontario and Quebec. Do we realize that Cabot came to Newfoundland in 1497, and that in 1583 that island was annexed by Sir Humphrey Gilbert? Newfoundland has had a flag from those early years, the Union Jack. Nearly 400 years have elapsed, and they still look with pride on their flag. Nova Scotia too has its flag, granted by Royal Charter in 1621.

Let us look at the history of Manitoba. In 1610 Henry Hudson sailed into Hudson Bay and touched what are now the shores of Manitoba. During the next few years Captains Gibbons and Baffin sailed into Hudson Bay and again touched these shores. In 1668 the ship Nonsuch carried back to England a valuable cargo of furs. The result of these journeys was that in 1670 the Hudson's Bay Company was formed and immediately sent two more vessels into that same territory. On September 1, 1670, Governor Bailey formally took possession of this territory and the surrounding area for the company, under the protection of Great Britain. And what flag was raised?—the Union Jack. However, to keep the record straight, I would like to say that for a brief period of 15 years, from 1697 to 1713, the French controlled Hudson Bay, but by the treaty of Utrecht it came back under British control. Thus, the Province of Manitoba can claim a far longer association with the Union Jack than any other province in Canada, with the sole exception of Newfoundland—over 350 years, to be exact.

With this brief review, is it not a strange coincidence that it was in our City of Winnipeg that the Prime Minister of Canada in May of this year saw fit to present his proposal for a distinctive flag at a meeting of the Royal Canadian Legion, on a Sunday, during a deeply impressive memorial service honouring the 100,000 comrades who lie silent in lonely graves around the world? Personally, I feel this was a serious error on the part of our Prime Minister, and great were and will be the repercussions of the timing of his initial speech.

Throughout this debate much has been said and written, but in speaking on it I feel that I must express my own personal feelings. Judging from the correspondence I have received and what I have read, I am sure that my opinion is shared by many thousands, yes, may I say millions, of my fellow Canadians.

When this controversial issue was first raised I cannot understand why a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament, embracing all political parties, was not set up, as was done in 1946 when there was a recommendation that the Red Ensign should be our flag with but one change, that the coat of arms should be removed and a maple leaf substituted. I am firmly convinced that a joint committee, meeting in calmness and with no political bias, and with no time limit, could have brought in a recommendation acceptable to all. However, this was not done.

It is my hope that the symbol of the Union Jack in the Red Ensign, and the fleur-de-lis, will be maintained in any flag which may be suggested or approved in this country in the future. I feel that once a new flag is raised on the Peace Tower, we will find that many of these things which have gone into our national structure and character during the past century of fairly spectacular progress will be weakened or abolished. Let us not then forget the symbols held so dear by our two founding peoples.

Secondly, I feel strongly that the Prime Minister should have welcomed the suggestion of a plebiscite as a fair means of solving a very difficult problem. There should have been a nonpartisan approach to this matter and it should never at any time have been relegated into the arena of political partisanship. It is true that a government is elected by the people to change old policies or to make new ones. Such questions as the Canada pension plan, income tax rates, agricultural policies, and hundreds of other pieces of legislation are most certainly the responsibility of any government, but the changing of Canada's flag cannot possibly be dealt with in the same general business procedure of our country.

The Conservative party, all through this debate has taken the stand that, after all, it is the people of Canada who are going to live under this flag, so why should they not be given an opportunity of expressing their preference as to the nature and design of their flag. With this view I concur.

It would not be necessary to hold a special election to settle this question. There is absolutely no reason for haste. It could be held in conjunction with the next election, whenever that takes place. A ballot could be submitted to the electorate, illustrated in colour, with the flag committee's choice of five designs, one of which could be marked with an "X" to show the voter's preference. The votes would be counted, not by provinces, but by a central committee, so that there would be no indication as to how any one province voted. By following such a procedure, all would be satisfied that as citizens of this great country they were given the opportunity of voicing their opinion as to what the new national flag should be.

This sums up briefly my feeling regarding the flag issue. I sincerely hope, honourable senators, that when the members of this house decide to have a change of flag it will be done with a clear conscience. I want it to be done on principle. But whether the Red Ensign is ratified or not, or whether a new distinctive flag is decided upon, I pledge myself to serve that flag in the same way that I have tried to serve the Red Ensign which means so much to me.

I shall support the amendment.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I am glad of the opportunity to speak in support of this motion. As a new Canadian I welcome the new Canadian flag. In saying that I should like to make it clear that I mean no slight or disrespect to either the Union Jack or the Red Ensign. These are two old and hallowed flags of respected lineage, and I, like many Canadians of my generation, served under both of them and am proud of both of them.

I recall an occasion in November 1945 when late one evening I was sitting in the other place minding my own business, while the Opposition was discussing the flag and giving the Government of the day under Mr. Mackenzie King a rather bad time. Ian Mackenzie, then leader of the house, walked over and handed me two sheets of paper and said, "Get out there and pitch." Those are not the words he used, but I got the idea just the same. On that occasion I placed on the record of the other place a statement on the flag, made by the Prime Minister, on May 24, 1945, in Winnipeg, in which he said that at the first session of the next Parliament he would ask Parliament to approve and authorize a distinctive Canadian flag.

The election was held on June 11 of that year, and Mr. Mackenzie King's Government was re-elected. Later on, in a speech in the other place, I quoted from the Speech from the Throne of September 6, 1945, in these words:

> You will be asked to appoint a select committee of members of both Houses of Parliament to consider a suitable design for a Canadian flag.

I then went on with my speech, which was a rather emotional one, in which I supported the "Red Duster", and said that I wanted it incorporated in whatever flag would be decided upon. I used these words:

> I should like to say that I belong to the "Red Duster" school because the Union Jack has peculiar and important significance to me. I want to preserve it. I want to incorporate it in whatever flag we have.

And then I went on to talk about my comrades overseas.

In April of the next year, or about that time, when we were dealing with the citizenship bill, I took the occasion again to talk about citizenship, symbols and the flag, and I said this:

> Maybe we shall have the old Red Ensign; maybe we shall have a crest with the maple leaf.

I was developing like the rest of the Canadians, because here today I stand in support of the maple leaf. There you have the evolution of a politician. I think I am as typical a Canadian as is anyone, and I was trying to keep up with the thinking in the country.

Senator Irvine said that she has received representations from which she has reached a conclusion as to what is the attitude towards a distinctive flag. Throughout this long debate I have kept my ear to the ground and have tried to find out what others were thinking. Perhaps I can speak about it in this way.

All of us know what a Gallup Poll is. Most of us know what a Telepoll is. The purpose of these polls is to assess public reaction to public questions and issues. I took what I might well call a "Croll" poll, which is an assessment of public reaction to the maple leaf flag. It is my view that the flag has caught the imagination and enthusiasm of those of 18 years of age and under. As far as they are concerned there is total acceptance —the reluctance to accept it is infinitesimally small. When you get to those in the age group of 18 to 45 there was some hesitation at the beginning, but they accept the flag by as large a majority as almost 75 per cent.

Those persons between the ages of 45 and 70 grow more cautious and their acceptance, I do not think, is over 60 per cent. Of those over 70 years of age, some were reluctant to change but more than 50 per cent of them accepted. From all I can gather, the score is heavily in favour of the proposed flag, and the young people of this country are delighted with it.

Honourable senators, we have to accept the truth of the old Roman maxim "Times change and we must change with them." We of Canada, and our fathers before us have come from many lands to help build this country. We left behind—and I say this as much of the English and of the French as of any other element of the population—we left behind many things that we and our fathers held dear.

It is well to remind the house and the nation in general that we have not come in the main from some dark European morass where learning and culture never flowered. It was not ignorance that led us to reject our homes and our friends and the countries of our birth, to choose Canada. We or our fathers were actuated by the same impulses which one or two or three centuries earlier had led the forebears of the honourable members, whether they spoke English or French, to make this same venturesome, sometimes desperate, move from an old world to a new. So we made our choice, gambled our lives and those of our families, and by and large we won. Not without pain were the deep-grown roots of generations wrenched from the familiar soil, but mercifully soon we found new roots were taking hold in new, far more nourishing clay than we had ever known. We settled into the new scene as gradually the old one faded.

This was Canada for us. This is in the background of every Canadian. What we left behind and what we brought to this country were the customs, manners, anthems, languages, and not the least of all, flags.

For some Canadians, history takes them back to the fleur-de-lis or to the Union Jack; for others, it is some less familiar banner but nonetheless dear to them for all that. These old attachments are slow to die in a new country, and perhaps this is as it should be. It has often been said that Canada is not a melting pot like the United States. Someone has coined the word "mosaic" to describe the fabric of our society. The fact seems to be that, for better or for worse, Canadians do not melt. It is my firm belief and hope, however, that we can and do unite. This, to my way of thinking, is a much more fruitful and rewarding concept than a melting pot or even a mosaic.

I like to think that Canada represents a union of diverse people, much of whose innate strength comes from the very fact that they have not forgotten their diverse past. But I think that which is important about this flag debate which we are experiencing now is that it should be directed not to the past but to the future.

Honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton) made a fine contribution to the debate, at a very high level. It was the eloquence of O'Leary; it was O'Leary at his best.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It was a delight to listen to him and hard to disagree with him, but I was able to do so.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: You made it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, I made it. When I found out that he was going to move the amendment, I hoped that it would be imaginative, that it would be new and startling. When I saw it, I was rather surprised, for I found it not only innocuous but ineffective and, in the circumstances, I felt it was meaningless Here he was, by means of the amendment, tenaciously grasping for yesterday, and through his own will he was immutably stuck with yesterday's mistakes.

What does Senator O'Leary want by the amendment? He wants more time. Time for what? Time is the thing we have the least of. So far as I am concerned, time is running out. After 97 years, I want the flag now, and I cannot wait. So far as I am concerned, the amendment holds out no hope for any solution.

Honourable senators, we must remember that, within our lifetime—indeed, within the last 20 years—the substance of Canada has been changing, perhaps more rapidly than at any other time in our history. Many of the old ways and the old outlooks no longer are appropriate. If the winds of change have been blowing over the great African continent for years, can anyone say that any country, including Canada, has not felt them? Perhaps we are a little too close to the forest to see anything but the trees; but change there is in this country of ours, and more change lies in store than most of us could have imagined 20 years ago.

I am not one given to predictions or to prophecy, but I venture to say that before another 20 years have passed there will be profound changes in some of the most significant aspects of Canadian life.

Does anyone think that even the Constitution of Canada will not undergo major changes within the next decade? Does anyone think that the great debate which is going on in Canada today will not produce far-reaching changes in our social and educational structure? Does anyone think that Canada can just "stand pat" in the world of today?

Honourable senators, I do not wish to stray from the theme of the debate, but we must view the question of a national flag for this country in its true perspective. Like everything else, the symbols of Canada are changing too.

I well remember the school reader we used, when I was a small boy in Windsor. The frontispiece was a stirring composite of a battleship at sea, surmounted by the Union Jack and the Sovereign, and under it was the caption "One flag, one fleet, one throne". That motto is no longer valid. The old Empire has changed beyond recognition. The colonies have become nations in their own right. They have their own flags and their own fleets, and if they have not their own thrones, they do not seem to have any trouble in finding their own presidents.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Are you recommending that?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not recommending anything: I am talking about an accomplished fact. I am not taking issue with this process. It has happened in our lifetime and, let us face it, the end is not yet in sight. But, strangely enough, Canada, which was the first of all the old colonies to proclaim herself a nation, has been one of the slowest to impress both herself and the rest of the world with a sense of her national identity.

I am not proposing to psychoanalyze Canada at this stage, even if I had the professional qualifications to do so, but I do ask this in all seriousness: Is it not time that we stopped living in the past, all of us, and grew up as a nation? We have all heard ad nauseam Kipling's old line:

> Daughter am I in my mother's house
> but mistress in my own.

No doubt Kipling meant to flatter Canada when he wrote that poem, but as far as I am concerned it set back Canadian-British relations by 50 years. I think we have not yet managed to escape from that mother-daughter complex.

Honourable senators, is it not high time, in this year of grace 1964, that we stopped thinking about mothers and daughters and stood on our own two feet? Is it not time we grew up? Is it not time we made an end to old scores? Is it not time that we stopped living in the past? These are rhetorical questions, I grant you, and I suggest to you as strongly as I can that the answer to every one of them is "yes."

Those of us who came to Canada, or whose fathers came to Canada, did so, in the main by choice. Like our fathers, we put behind us the old connections, with the intention of building something new. That, I suggest, should be the aim of all Canadians today. I say that, not because of any hostility to the past; we are proud of our past. We new Canadians and sons of new Canadians have a love for British traditions, which is deep in the marrow of our bones. We are not purporting to be anything that we are not. But we ask ourselves: How far have we gone towards becoming a nation—towards offering a symbol to which we can attach ourselves?

There are those who have been inclined to scoff at the forthright American expression at the reverence of the flag. We have no flag of our own to salute. We have not shouted proudly from the housetop the proclamation that we are Canadians, a nation as distinctive as any that ever came down the pike of history, an up-and-coming nation. We have not realized our own greatness. We travel in the strange conflicting shadow cast by our mother, and by our neighbour, and somehow we still refuse to come out into the warm sun of the world's acclaim.

But, like it or not, we in Canada are taking on a new identity. We are heading towards a new unity, and I make bold to suggest that one of the most appropriate manifestations of this process would be a new national symbol —a new flag.

The honourable gentlemen in the other place have laboured long and waxed eloquent for many days and nights. I do not propose that we emulate them, but I do think that the final product of their midnight oil is well deserving of our consideration and approval.

As for the aesthetics of the new flag, well, I leave that to every man's own conscience. Taste is a highly personal matter about which, according to the old saying, we ought not to argue.

I do think that the single maple leaf presents an image of dignified simplicity, which one would have to go far to improve upon. Let botanist and heraldic schools make of it what they will. I like it. I like it because it shows the world a new and yet a well-known image of a nation, which is perhaps not as well known as she deserves to be. I like it because in every civilized country on the face of the earth the maple leaf is instantly recognized as the symbol of Canada. I like it because it is mine, my very own, and there is nothing else like it in the world. Could one say that of any other single emblem?

But more than the image which we as a nation may present to the world, I am concerned with the image which we present to ourselves. I have called for an end to old feuds and differences, and it is high time that such a call were heeded. We may look down our noses at other countries, but the fact remains that we have had more than our own share of "isms"—nationalism, sectionalism, separatism, to name three of them—and the end is not yet in sight.

I see the maple leaf flag as a symbol around which all men of good will can rally, as a symbol of new and badly-needed unity, as a symbol of a more worth-while future for all Canadians. The only "ism" that I will tolerate is Canadianism. I see the new flag as a living symbol of all that can be strong and fruitful in this nation.

Yet, I am well aware that a piece of bunting will not make a nation any more than going to school will make an educated man. The sense of identity that makes up a nation comes from within men's hearts. In formulating such a sense of identity can we deny the value and effect of symbols? They may not be the sine qua non, but they are a powerful aid and agent.

The maple leaf, honoured in song and history, is just such a symbol as can lift men's hearts above the humdrum and mundane.

Surely we have had enough of other people's flags, emblems and anthems. Will we ever live to see the day when Canada will not look carefully to London or Washington, or both, before committing herself to any course of action? It took us some 90 years or more to institute our final Court of Appeal. We are now ending our 97th year as a nation, and we have still not repatriated our Constitution. Surely it should not take any more time to decide on a national flag. In the eyes of the world we have grown up, and it is time we began to act it.

In closing, may I commend to honourable senators this maple leaf flag, which is before us, in its simplicity, its freedom from old associations and its appeal to national unity. I stand convinced that it augurs well for Canada's future.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, seven years ago I had the privilege of making my first speech in the Senate. On that particular occasion I was followed by the honourable senator who just concluded his speech (Hon. Mr. Croll). He differed from me vigorously at that time, but I do not know that I shall differ from him as vigorously today. The subject under discussion at that time was state medicine, a subject which I am sure is going to arise in the future. When it does arise on the next occasion, I sincerely trust that he will be following me.

I consider it my duty to participate in this debate. That this is an emotional issue, goes without saying. I regret that the honourable Senator Cameron is not in his seat this afternoon. He stated that he would like the Canadian people to be a little more emotional. Well, could you witness any more emotion than you saw yesterday, in the speeches of the honourable Senator Grattan O'Leary, the honourable Senator Pouliot, and in the speech today of the honourable Senator Croll, who has preceded me?

There are two definitions of an emotion, the first being an excitement of the mind, and the second, a medical definition, an uncontrolled tendency to troubled feelings. I am quite sure we do not want the latter type of emotion in Canada. To be a good athlete, you have got to be emotional. To be a good surgeon, or a good lawyer, you have got to be emotional. Whether to be a good university professor you have to be emotional, I do not know.

I have three Christian names, Joseph Taylor Albert. I was given the last name in honour of the Prince Consort, Queen Victoria's husband, by my parents. They also taught me to "fear God and honour the King." In my home, from the time I was an infant and until the present day, there has been a statue of Queen Victoria, and following her, King Edward VII.

Senator O'Leary (Carleton) took the words out of the brief remarks which I am making today, when he expressed how we of Irish blood can plead our cause—as he did, in such a reasoned and sincere manner.

I have been a teacher, a professor, and a marker of papers, for over 25 years, and I also know students fairly well. I give Senator O'Leary full marks, not only for his eloquence, but his unsurpassed literary expression and logic, so vividly demonstrated in his memorable speech in this house yesterday.

If there are two institutions in the world today which demand one's respect and loyalty, they are the Monarchy, under which we are fortunate to serve and live, and, secondly, with all humility, the great Church to which I belong. Those two institutions believe in the dignity of man, in the loyalties, and in a Christian family way of life.

A nation which denies its past has no future. I say to the Prime Minister of this country, let the people speak on this matter and settle it once and for all. Take the question out of politics and put it into the realm of the heart and soul of Canada, where it belongs. When the people of Canada themselves have spoken, I for one will be willing to abide by that decision.

Make no mistake about it, there are extremely important principles involved in this question. It is not merely a matter of whose piece of bunting has the most eye appeal. The flag question is symbolic of several more vastly important ones to this country. Among them is this: Has this flag question become a divisive action for a party in the other place to stand against a proposal which a government advances when that proposal does not represent the views of millions of Canadians? Shall we, in common with the eagerly emerging nations, turn in some strange shame from our great heritage and past, or shall we use them as a proud and solid foundation upon which to build our future?

To my Catholic French-speaking colleagues of Quebec, let me say this: In my student days one of the greatest friends I ever had was the late Dave Trottier, a student of St. Michael's College, Toronto, and a member of the great University of Toronto Olympic Hockey Team of 1928. I was proud of his friendship and he was proud of mine. I can count among my French-Canadian friends some of my closest associations throughout life.

The Queen is the symbol of our free association with the Commonwealth—God forbid that this symbol should ever change—a vast community comprising peoples of very different characters and whose bonds are very liberal. The 1864 conferences that preceded Confederation were convoked by the various sections of British North America to discuss their common interests. At that time the London Government just ignored this project. It can even be said that for the first time in recorded history colonies gave themselves their own constitution.

So in 1964 the Queen came to commemorate the wholly Canadian project. As for the British Crown, after 1760 it has in a way been a traditional ally of the French-Canadians seeking to ensure their survival. This it did for its own interests so that French-Canadians would contribute to the stability of the country and to the maintenance of its own identity, which they have done in a supreme and elegant manner. Away with the bigots—that day has passed. So it was that 55 years before the Catholics of Britain obtained their religious freedom, the French-Canadians gained theirs, as was so well expressed by Senator Grattan O'Leary. The Act of Quebec (1774), which remains the great Bill of Rights of the French-Canadian nationality, had brought about some resentment amongst the English-speaking Canadians towards London, and in London itself it was with shouts of "No Popery!" that many people protested this bill. Nevertheless, George III ratified the bill. He even declared in his Speech of Prorogation that this measure was founded on the most manifest principles of justice and humanity.

Let me recall to your memory that an Order in Council of 1945 did not officially proclaim the Red Ensign as Canada's national flag. It did, however, provide for all the official occasions on which this flag would be flown as Canada's national flag. It just happens, of course, that all such official occasions include every conceivable time that a country would fly its flag. On this basis, there can be no question that the flag is flown as such on our embassies abroad and on international occasions when Canada is represented, such as the Olympic Games, which the Leader of the Government mentioned in his speech yesterday, where I was proud to carry that flag in 1928. How intensely proud I was of being a Canadian and carrying the Red Ensign in the Olympic parade, and on my playing sweater an Olympic crest with the maple leaf.

As to the great and beloved Province of Quebec, on official occasions they have accepted the Red Ensign, and whatever flag is adopted now I hope it will be widely accepted in spite of the fact that in that province they have developed their own emblem, the armorial bearings of which consist of a crown atop a three-part shield containing three fleurs-de-lis, a lion rampant, and a sprig of three green maple leaves. This is widely flown in Quebec, and rightly so; but I pray and I ask that we remain one Canada under the Crown, mutually respecting and believing in one another, for the common good of our great and young nation. Having said that, allow me to proceed.

This legislation far transcends political parties and politicians. There must be no partisanship in this issue. I would be losing faith with those of my friends, deceased and otherwise, and my family, if I were not to stand up here today and express myself. I had two brothers serve in the First World War. I was too young, but I was asked to become the chief consultant in my specialty to the Royal Canadian Air Force during the Second World War. I accepted that responsibility and duty gladly, and, again, how proud I was I had been asked to do so. I had the great privilege of serving under the then Minister of Air, Senator Power, who sits in this house today. There was not an airman or officer who would not have stood on his head for him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Sullivan: As for this flag, surely there is some record of the dedication of this handsome flag under which the finest, bravest of our men have served in three wars? Who can be so ill-informed as to imagine that it is the Merchant Service Ensign when it carries the Coat of Arms of Canada on the fly? Why change it? Who in this still young and dependent country hates Great Britain so much that we must discard the Union Jack which, on a white background, stood alone between us and the invasion in two wars? I repeat, a nation which denies this past has no future. I want a flag just as much as anybody else in this chamber and country, but it must be symbolic and not an arbitrary one, not a piece of bunting, but one which depicts the two founding races of this nation and its other assimilated peoples. What nation worthy of its name flies two flags at its masthead?

I am critical of those who bow to the raucous cries of students who have never known adversity or war, but only soft living today in the universities. I know whereof I speak and I could enlarge on that greatly, but I do not wish to do so. They know only ease and prosperity, and fail to realize that freedom and prosperity were due to those who have gone before and now lie in the cemeteries in Europe and Hong Kong.

This flag issue should never have been brought into Parliament at this time. There is no reason in the world why, in the middle of a legislative program, which has been outlined to us, the Prime Minister should throw in this flag issue without any authority or mandate. Having made this an issue, when we asked that the Canadian people be given a chance to express an opinion, that request was not granted. Regardless of the merits of a referendum, as has been so well emphasized elsewhere on other occasions, no one can tell me that if the Canadian people are consulted and allowed to make a decision on an issue of this kind, it is going to disrupt national unity. Certainly a decision made by a group of men sitting on the treasury benches, accepted by the majority of a house of minorities, is not the way to achieve national unity. One does not achieve national unity by forcing something such as a flag on the Canadian public. These are harsh words, honourable senators, and it is the first time you have heard me express them in this house, but I speak from my heart. I despise partisan politics, I have no use for it, and particularly with an issue such as this, which affects so many families and their loved ones. It should be above the rancour of political partisanship.

All legislation is founded upon the principle of mutual concession. Let him who elevates himself above humanity, above its weaknesses, its infirmities, its wants, its necessities, say, if he pleases, "I will never compromise," but let no one who is not above the frailties of our common nature disdain compromise.

I wonder how many of you read the enlightening article by Bruce West entitled "The Tale of Two Cities," in which he described the scene of the downfall of Nikita Krushchev and the birthday celebration of the greatest statesman of the twentieth century, Sir Winston Churchill. In his concluding remarks he stated:

> Here, then on this Sunday evening, was a tale of two cities and two men and two ways of life. Each tale was interesting enough in itself, but side by side they contained a profound moral that we might well remember in a day when old values are being weighed and old standards so severely questioned.

In closing, honourable senators, I wish to quote from a poem by a friend of mine, a squadron leader in the Royal Canadian Air Force, who was killed at Singapore:

> So long, my Canada! You may not hear again
> From one to whom your very name is dear...
> And so this message I must send you ere
> The yellow tide of death that creeps so near > Flows over yet another of your sons
> Whose priceless freedom is your greatest dower...
> To help preserve this birthright for mankind,
> I dedicate my life to its last hour...
> I go to join my comrades of Dunkirk,
> Narvik, Tobruk, Hong Kong, and many more
> Whose names in tears are written on your heart
> From sunlit West to grey Atlantic shore...
> Gladly give I, as they have given, all
> One man can give to pay the debt I owe
> To you, my Canada, who, freedom-blest,
> This blessing on your children still bestow...
> The sands are running out... the yellow pack
> In full and snarling cry is closing in!...
> So little time is left in which to play
> My humble part... but, if my death should win
> One single foothold for the steps of those,
> My brother, who—to save your freedom dear—
> Must follow me, with gladness I shall go
> To meet my Maker... and without a fear.

At least I can speak today for him and others like him.

My epitaph to him—

> He died, this son of Canada, for you, and me
> To help preserve your towns from raining hell—
> Your wives from rape—your daughters from the lust
> Of beasts—your shores from shot and shell...
> He died for lack of guns—of tanks—of planes—
> Of ships—of all that wins in modern war...
> All he had left was courage!

To all my honourable colleagues in this revered and venerable chamber, I say let this Senate, this most essential branch of Parliament, rise in all its majesty and glory and give this legislation a sober second thought. Let Canada speak, let the whole of Canadians speak and I, for one, and I am sure the vast majority, when that verdict is rendered, will accept it in the full and loyally follow. Therefore, in this vein of thought and my own heartfelt reasoning, I support the amendment to the resolution and I thank you for listening to me.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, it is with a great deal of pleasure I rise to speak today. I congratulate the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) on his lucid introduction of this legislation. He did it in a very fair, nonpartisan manner, and as always he did it very well. I also congratulate my colleague the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton). I do not think I have ever listened to a greater oration than that which he delivered yesterday.

I also congratulate the others who have spoken in this debate. However, might I remind Senator Croll that he was sworn in as a minister of the Ontario Government in 1934 under the Red Ensign. Whatever he may say now, he must remember that. I knew, of course, that my colleague, the revered surgeon Senator Joseph Sullivan was a great hockey player, having played goal for the Varsity Grads in the Olympics of 1928. He is running close to Senator O'Leary as an orator. In listening to him speak I could only wish that I had more Irish blood in me than I have.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Who wouldn't?

Hon. Mr. Willis: I want to make it clear that we on this side of the house are not filibustering; we are speaking on our own. We have had that privilege conferred on us by our leader, Senator Brooks. We can say whatever we like, and, as I have said, we have no organized filibuster. But, as a senator appointed to this chamber, I feel I have the right to express my view.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Willis: I hold in my hand a copy of the Speech from the Throne delivered on February 18, 1964. Is there any mention in that of the flag? No, not one word of it. The word "flag" does not appear.

Now I want to ask the Leader of the Government and honourable senators opposite, why the urgency at this time since it was not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne?

May I remind my honourable friends opposite that at Easter 1964 the Prime Minister of this country made a speech in which he said there are certain priorities in legislation that have to be put through. Was the flag among them? No, it was not. He never thought of it at that time, apparently. The chronicle of the flag is this, and I quote from the Ottawa Gazette of December 15, 1964.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think the honourable senator has reference to the Montreal Gazette.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Probably it is. At any rate it is not friendly to our party or to this side of the house. It says:

> May 14: Prime Minister Pearson tells a few reporters at confidential briefing that new flag legislation will be introduced in Parliament shortly, says Government will stand or fall on the issue.

Did my honourable friend know about that at that time? Did my honourable friend or the honourable Senator Macdonald (Brantford), who was leader of the house at that time and a cabinet minister, know about that flag? Had he ever seen it, or had any of the honourable senators opposite ever seen it?

What right has one man to stand up and say he is going to introduce a flag, and later show it to reporters, and still later show it to the cabinet and take it to Winnipeg? We of my party are not opposed to a distinctive Canadian flag. We have welcomed it in our resolutions at conventions and at annual meetings. We want a distinctive flag, but we think its selection should be approached in a very careful, considerate and sober way. We do not think it should be introduced by one person, no matter how nice a man he may be, and no matter if he is Prime Minister of Canada.

I think the original design should have been submitted to a joint committee of the Commons and the Senate. Why did they not adopt the course adopted by the Right Honourable Mackenzie King in 1945 and 1946?

What is a flag? A flag embodies the heart and soul of a people. Surely in a period of six or eight months one cannot hope to reach agreement on what the design of a flag should be. As I have said, we of this party would like to see a distinctive flag, but we would also like to see thereon some of the traditions and heraldry of the past. I think we are entitled to that.

I cannot forgive the present Government for having a committee on this flag without having this chamber represented on it. The Parliament of Canada consists of the reigning Sovereign, the House of Commons and the Senate, and I think this chamber was shamefully ignored in that committee. I take the Government to task for that. I ask each honourable senator on the Government side whether they ever saw the design first produced by the Prime Minister to his cabinet. I venture to say that many of them wish they could answer the question as to when they first saw it.

A flag must not be the imagination of one man; it should be considered by a committee of all parties in both the Commons and the Senate. But we were completely ignored.

In 1945 the late revered and great Prime Minister of this country, Mackenzie King, called a committee of both houses under the chairmanship of Walter Harris, who was later the Minister of Finance and house leader, to consider this matter. He reported that the committee could not agree. Later, in 1946, another committee of both houses was set up to propose a flag, and its report received the approval of a majority of the committee. I think the voting was 23 to 1. Yet, Mr. Mackenzie King at that time refused to accept that committee's proposal. Later they brought in a report recommending the Red Ensign with other amendments, to which Senator Irvine referred in her splendid speech.

Why did Mr. Mackenzie King in that day and age, as Prime Minister of Canada, take that attitude? Why should we today accept a flag that is thrust upon us by the Prime Minister of Canada without the consultation of this house? This is why I agree wholeheartedly with Senator Grattan O'Leary's amendment.

All honourable senators have seen the postcards that are on sale at hotels and bookstores. One carries a picture of a standing boy, saying: "This is my flag." When you open the flap you read inside: "Colour it yourself." It reminds me of the truth squad and the colouring books that were so prevalent during the last election campaign.

I say to honourable members of the Senate that we are here to take a second look at legislation, and I do not think that we should subject this flag to the ridicule that it is being subjected to across the country.

Honourable senators, I do not want to delay you long, but I do say that this flag, in my opinion, smacks too much of Madison Avenue advertising. It does not have on it any symbols whatsoever of our past. We are not saying that we should have the Red Ensign. Nobody on this side of the house has ever said that. We are entitled to have our opinions of a flag. What we want is a distinctive Canadian flag which has on it some of the tradition and heritage of the past of this country. We are entitled to that.

As you know, there were some 2,000-odd flag designs submitted in 1945, and to the Committee of the House of Commons that was appointed this year there were almost as many submitted. When you have as many designs as that submitted to a committee for consideration, why should our new Canadian flag be rushed through in such a short period of time?

I say that we as a nation should grow up. Our hundredth anniversary is not until July 1, 1967. In the time from now until then why should we not give careful consideration to our flag? Some people have advocated that there be a plebiscite. Perhaps that is wrong—I do not know—but I do object to the way in which this business of the flag has been handled. I object to the fact that one man brought in a flag design. I know it is not the one that is before us now, because it was changed by the committee of the House of Commons, but that is where it originated. That is wrong. I say that a committee representing all the people of Canada—representing the House of Commons, the Senate and the ethnic races—should have been called together and told to produce a distinctive flag by 1967.

Honourable senators on the Government side think that we are all in favour of the Red Ensign, or that we oppose a distinctive Canadian flag. That is absolutely wrong. We on this side of the house want just as much as they do a distinctive Canadian flag, but I, for one, am opposed to the design that is submitted to us and which we are asked to approve. Perhaps we should have a referendum. I want something that is distinctive for Canada but which also represents the great traditions of our past and of what we owe to our forefathers.

I was very surprised to hear Senator Croll criticize Rudyard Kipling. I think Rudyard Kipling was one of the greatest poets this world has ever known. He spoke not only for England and the colonies but for the Commonwealth and for Canada. When Senator Croll says his poetry puts us back 50 years, he is speaking utter nonsense.

Honourable senators, I am making a plea for your support of the amendment moved by Senator Grattan O'Leary. I think that amendment is a sensible one at this time. I want each honourable senator to rise in his or her place and state when he or she first saw the new flag that the Prime Minister produced.

Hon. Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Do you want to swear us in first?

(Translation):

Hon. L. M. Gouin: Honourable senators, the speech I am called upon to make today is one of the most important in all my life, perhaps the most important one. But having just come out of the hospital, I am far from being in as good shape as I would like. That is why I am asking you, honourable senators, to bear with me as much as you can.

Opinions on this flag issue are tragically divided. This makes us realize once more how far we are from having achieved our national unity. To this sacred cause of our unity in diversity I have devoted all my efforts. In this, I have followed as best I could the example set by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Ernest Lapointe, Louis St. Laurent and his worthy successor, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. I have also been inspired by the political creed of my father, Sir Lomer Gouin.

The flag, honourable senators—and on this point we all agree—is the emblem of the fatherland. This idea of the fatherland necessarily implies a certain degree of national unity. It will soon be a hundred years that we have been living under a system of federal union. But in Canada, the idea of the fatherland has yet to be adequately defined. Such a vital matter is giving rise to an unfortunate confusion.

For every true Canadian, regardless of his racial origin, his language, his religion or his province, his one and only fatherland must, of course, be Canada. But is our great and vast country really the fatherland for all our fellow citizens?

First of all, we must ask ourselves what is the fatherland. According to the etymology, it is the land of our fathers, the native land. I know of no precise equivalent in English for the word "Patrie".

The words "homeland" or "home" are the terms closest to our word "patrie". Etymologically, the word "fatherland" corresponds to it. As regards the word "motherland", it is synonymous with "mère patrie", which means the metropolis of a colony. For many Canadians, their homeland is still a particular region in the northwest of the old continent, of Europe, cradle of our civilization and of our homelands, English, Scottish, Irish, or Welsh, etc.

In France, as well as in the British isles, the idea of a Homeland with a capital H, the idea of Homeland is clear and precise. Whether he be from Brittany, Poitou, Alsace, whether he be Flemish or Provençal, the Frenchman recognizes without any hesitation France as his homeland. The English, the Scotch, the Welsh, the Irish from Northern Ireland each have their small homeland that they love very dearly, but their homeland is unquestionably Great Britain.

Recently, we heard many people from Quebec state that their homeland is Quebec. In looking at the gigantic map of Canada and considering the space filled by our province, many of our people could say: "Great country, small homeland". It may seem strange, however, to call a small homeland a territory as large as Quebec.

Local patriotism which I just referred to also exists in the Maritimes, in Ontario, in the Prairie provinces and British Columbia. Most of the time, such regionalism has much merit. It is easy to understand and to feel such a particular belonging to our own native region. Such a patriotism is the most natural feeling in the world. In itself, it does not lead to any conflict of loyalty to our great Canadian homeland and our smaller provincial homeland.

If I were to adopt the attitude that my homeland is French Canada only, I should then include in it, in addition to Quebec, the whole of Canada as there are throughout Canada isolated groups, of lesser or greater importance, of French Canadians or Acadians in whose veins flows the same blood as mine, of common origin and faith, in short who are my brothers and who, on their mothers' knees, learned the same sweet French language and the same prayers.

Even those who consider their province as their homeland should see in Canada at least another homeland. Still, it must be recognized that there are amongst Canadians a rainbow of patriotic hues and shades. In addition to the provincial patriotism which I have attempted to describe, there are various forms of patriotic and intellectual colonialism which, in the final analysis, favour the flag of the mother country. However, we should all be mature enough, removed enough from the people of our country of origin to give first place in our hearts to Canada and to want to give, without further delay, its own emblem to Canada. Among international powers we are respected everywhere, but we are the only country in the world without its distinctive flag.

Our patriotism must not be centred on France, Great Britain, the United States or any other country. Canada must not be content to be a mirror faithfully reflecting, in international affairs, either Britain's or the United States' policy. Canada is not a colony, whatever Louis Delboz or any other expert in international law may say. But as long as we fly the Union Jack or the Red Ensign, foreigners will conclude that we are still under London's imperial tutorship. Anglo-Canadians most certainly have the right to cherish the Anglo-Saxon culture from overseas. When the French Canadian sees Old France as his parent, his eternally young ancestor, and the great mother of his own civilization it shows but a highminded filial piety. Both our cultures, the French and the English, are among the brightest treasures of modern civilization. But the English-speaking Canadian, though he may respect Great Britain, is no Englishman, he is a Canadian.

Though deeply, intensely and passionately attached to French culture, I am, nevertheless not a French citizen, but a French-speaking Canadian.

In this respect, we have experienced a thorough evolution. When a child, I saw my relatives on my mother's side proudly unfold the tri-coloured French flag on every great holiday, as did very many people in Quebec.

When I was young, I used, with much feeling, to recite Louis Fréchette's poem "Le Drapeau" (The Flag), of which I shall now quote a few verses:

Regarde, mon enfant, ce chiffon souverain
Qui mêle—avec l'azur du firmament serein—
Dans l'éclat radieux de son pli tricolore,
Aux rougeurs du couchant les blancheurs de l'aurore.
Ces trois couleurs, drapant de leurs pures clartés
Trois principes féconds dans un seul reflétés,
C'est insigne éternel de toute indépendance.
—Chapeau bas, mon enfant!—le drapeau de la France.
Incline-toi devant ses lambeaux vénérés,
Avec amour baise ses plis sacrés;
Car ce drapeau, digne des chants d'Homère,
Ce drapeau, mon enfant, c'est celui de ta mère!
Et toi, mon fils, toujours français comme ton père,
...si la bannière auguste
Devait cesser de luire au soleil canadien,
Sois son appui suprême et son dernier gardien!

For my compatriots of French Canada, as for me, the French flag is not our flag anymore. We still respect it but we are full-fledged Canadians and we expect as much from the English Canadians. We want to preserve and even develop our intellectual ties with France but we are quite different from the French people, as we like to say.

In 1763, the flag of our last king "folded its white wing and crossed the seas again". We had to wait for more than 150 years to see the fleur-de-lis fly again in Quebec and on the Peace tower. It includes as you know, a white cross on a blue background with white fleur-de-lis at the four corners.

Nova Scotia has had its own flag for more than 200 years. The Acadians too had their national banner: the tricolour with a star, if I remember well.

But it is high time that Canada should have her own distinctive flag. That is what this eminent statesman that I am proud to have as chief, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, has thoroughly understood. He realized that the vast majority of people of this country, as a whole, felt an imperative and immediate need for a truly Canadian flag. This symbol is most essential to the full development of our national unity. The Liberal party has strongly committed itself to the national flag issue during the last election campaign and the people, through their vote, have accepted it.

True to his commitment, courageously, patiently, tenaciously, Mr. Pearson and his distinguished colleagues have overcome the obstacles that stood in their way. The representatives elected by the people have adopted by a strong majority the flag proposed and recommended by a great majority of the members of a special committee of the House of Commons. Honourable colleagues, the only thing left for the Senate to do is to reject the dilatory amendment so eloquently moved by the honourable Senator Grattan O'Leary. Personally I intend to support the resolution so brilliantly moved by the Government Leader in the Senate.

This red maple leaf on a white background with two red vertical bands is not the standard of one party; it is truly the free and conscious choice of the representatives elected by the people. It is this choice that we are asked to confirm right now. As for me, it is with joy, emotion and tenderness that I will accomplish this historical gesture giving Canada, "my country, my love", its own truly Canadian flag. The maple has always been for our Canadian land the symbolic tree of our country. No other Canadian symbol has such a sacrosanct meaning to us. A poet of our own, a great historian, wrote an inspired poem wonderfully bringing to light the mystic role played for us by "La leçon des érables". I will use as a peroration the poem thus entitled. Its prodigiously talented author, Canon Groulx, has already given his heart to the fleur-de-lis. I do not know what are his sentiments with respect to the flag we are discussing. But, "La leçon des érables" proves that it is pre-eminently for us the national tree and that history establishes the maple leaf as our most distinctive symbol. Here now is part of the lines of this inspired poem:

La leçon des Érables

Hier que dans les bois et les bruyères roses,
Me promenant rêveur et mâchonnant des vers.
J'écoutais le réveil et la chanson des choses
Voici ce que m'ont dit les grands érables verts.
Si notre front là-haut si fièrement s'étale;

Si la sève robuste a fait nos bras si forts,
C'est que buvant le suc de la terre natale,
Nous plongeons dans l'humus des grands érables morts...
Dans nos feuilles, parfois, une brise commence,
Dolente, le refrain des vieux airs disparus,
Écoutez: elle chante et l'âme et la romance
Des aïeux survivants en nos feuillages drus...
Nous respirons vers Dieu la prière du sol!
Prier, chanter avec la brise aérienne,
Et l'âme du terroir et l'âme des aïeux;
Et puis, se souvenir afin qu'on se souvienne,
Voila par quels devoirs l'on grandit jusqu'aux cieux!
Ainsi, dans la forêt, près des bruyères roses,
M'ont parlé l'autre jour les grands érables verts.
Et, songeur, j'ai connu le prix des nobles choses
Qui font les peuples grands, plus grands que leurs revers.
Ils gardent l'avenir ceux qui gardent l'histoire,
Ceux dont la souvenance est sans mauvais remords,
Et qui, près des tombeaux où sommeille la gloire,
A l'âme des vivants, mêlent l'âme des morts.
Ils le gardent surtout ceux dont les lèvres fières
Ont gardé les refrains du parler maternel:
Épopée ou romance où l'âme de nos pères
Vient prier et vibrer d'un accent éternel.
En parlant bien sa langue on garde bien son âme.
Et nous te parlerons, ô verbe des aïeux,
Aussi longtemps qu'au pôle une immortelle flamme
Allumera le soir ses immuables feux;
Que montera des blés la mâle villanelle,
Que mugira le bronze en nos clochers ouverts,
Et que se dressera dans la brise éternelle,
Le panache hautain des grands érables verts!

I did want to conclude with this poem which glorifies much better than I could the great maples of the land of Quebec and of the whole of Canada.

(Text):

Hon. M. Wallace McCutcheon: Honourable senators, I will detain you but a few moments. I regret that it is not within my competence to rise to the heights of oratory of the honourable Leader of the Government, of Senator Grattan O'Leary, Senator Sullivan, or Senator Gouin, to mention but a few honourable senators who have taken part in this debate. It has been a debate of very high order. I hope that nothing I will say will lower the tone of the debate, though I expect I shall be somewhat less emotional than some of the honourable senators who have spoken.

I think it is necessary to set the framework within which this discussion is taking place. I listened with interest to Senator Croll this afternoon. I am sorry he is not here now to hear the compliments that I propose to pay him. Better than almost any man in this chamber he is adept at setting up straw men, and then proceeding to demolish them. He did an impressive job in that respect this afternoon.

I was particularly interested, of course, in the "Croll Poll," and I would commend him to the marketing division of my friend Senator Molson's company.

Hon. Mr. Molson: A very fine gesture!

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: The amendment moved by the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton) is, in my opinion, an eminently sensible one, and I intend to support it. I intend to support it because it faces reality —the reality of a country already divided on its symbols. It attempts to head off the more serious danger to our national unity if this closure-imposed flag is raised.

Before I proceed further, let me say that I am not here pleading a case for the Red Ensign. What I am appealing for is that we try to obtain a flag that will unite, rather than divide the country. Such a flag, in my opinion, will bear some symbols of our country's history, of our two principal founding peoples and their contribution to Canada.

Many of us here, as well as in the other place and throughout Canada, have been asking—and Senator Willis raised this point —why this debate? Why the insistence on a new flag now? Why has this issue taken top priority in public discussions since last May?

On May 15 last, just two days before he appeared before the Canadian Legion in Winnipeg with his three maple leaf flag, the Prime Minister outlined his list of legislative priorities in the other place. I could bring editorials and news comments indicating that if that were the list of priorities, there would have been, as the event established, no summer recess. As Senator Willis mentioned, there was no mention in that list of priorities of the flag, two days before the Prime Minister's speech to the Canadian Legion in Winnipeg. There was, of course, the usual "out" that any leader of a government announcing legislative priorities must give, that other matters may arise to be dealt with. However, at the time the Prime Minister made that statement in the House of Commons, he knew he was going to speak to the Canadian Legion on the night of May 17, and he knew what he was going to say. He made no reference to it. Honourable senators can refer to the list of priorities, and check them for themselves, for I do not intend to go over the list. A number of those urgent priority items have not seen the light of day since, and a number of others are mouldering on the Order Paper in another place.

Surely no one will argue that there were not more important things for Parliament to do during these past months—and I remind honourable senators of the days and weeks this house recessed because there was no business before it. Surely no one will argue that the Government, which has the responsibility for arranging the business of the house should not have turned its attention, and Parliament's attention, to some of the real problems facing this country.

The economic and social priorities that must be decided upon on a long-term basis by this country have been suspended in mid-air, without decision, while the Government pressed on and on to divert the attention of Parliament and the country to the question of symbols. When there is so much of substance to be considered and resolved, the Government has been preoccupied with symbols. "Symbols instead of substance" will be a fitting epitaph for the present Government, when that epitaph is written in the not-too-distant future.

The Prime Minister has been proclaimed, by himself as well as by his friends, as the great proponent of national unity. Senator Gouin referred to him a few minutes ago. No one questions the Prime Minister's sincerity, but the sad fact is that his judgment is bad, and that his lack of good judgment has caused more disunity in the country than many of us have seen for long years.

The Prime Minister, it is clear, does realize that we have a problem of national unity. To solve this problem, which honourable senators know runs very deeply, the Prime Minister proposes to invent some symbols. In the event the cure will aggravate the disease, and has aggravated it. This policy is one of tokenism on the part of the Government. They think they can bring about unity by displaying the externals of unity. The sad thing is that they are going to be disappointed, as a result of their naïevete.

The Prime Minister's predecessors in office, to whom Senator Gouin referred, realized that for any measure in this wide and very sensitive area of national unity there must be a consensus of support in the country. It is the way of compromise and conciliation. It is one area where government and people must move ahead together. The process has been slow. At times it has been painful. I know and appreciate the fact that it has also been frustrating, especially at times to our French Canadian fellow citizens in Quebec, who on some measures would have wished to move much more quickly; but there have been times as well when because of Quebec's insistence on its legitimate prerogatives, its tendency to see invasion of provincial rights where the rest of Canada has seen no such invasion, the developing process has been too slow for English Canada also.

Senator Croll referred to the national anthem. I think I can illustrate what I mean by the necessity of consensus when I say this, looking back 20 years I do not think that there could have been any consensus if a resolution had been introduced in the other place—as I suspect it will be one of these days—declaring "O Canada" as our National Anthem. I think that might well have produced the type of disruptive and bitter debate which we have read about as having occurred in another place. I suggest that today that resolution would go through with little or no discussion at all, because by delay and compromise, by dialogue, a consensus has been reached. This necessity for delay and compromise on these emotional issues is the price we all have to pay.

Public opinion in all the provinces of Canada has had to be nurtured and developed slowly on all these issues, for governments of Canada since Confederation, until recently at least, have realized the compelling necessity for a consensus in these areas where unity is involved, before taking any hasty action. Hasty action in these areas is self-defeating; it weakens the very unity we are all trying to accomplish.

It should be clear now, despite the "Croll Poll," if indeed it was not clear before, that there is not a consensus in the country in support of the flag now proposed. On the contrary, there is a deep division.

Only the other day we read in the Ottawa papers of the organizations and individuals in this very city, who stated that they will not fly the proposed new flag. Let me hasten to say that I do not agree with that sentiment. When the Parliament of Canada has decided on a distinctive flag, I will respect it as the flag of my country. I mention these reports merely to show the depth of the emotion and the area of disunity which some people brush aside very lightly. Surely this is no way to herald the advent of a flag that must stand for Canada in the future; but that is the position in which the Government has tried to place us.

We, as members of the Senate, in this chamber, can do a service for Canadian unity, not by rejecting a design, not by imposing one of our own, but by giving, as Senator O'Leary's amendment states:

> . . . reasonable time to the people and Parliament of Canada to reach agreement on a flag which will incorporate appropriate symbols of the founding peoples of this nation and which will be acceptable to all elements of our populations.

If you ask me how long that will take, I say I do not know.

I am not impressed with the glib statements that have been made elsewhere, that we have waited for 97 years, and this must be done now. We waited a long time to achieve the consensus, which I feel we have, for instance, on the National Anthem. We have waited a long time to achieve consensus on a number of other matters. If we have to wait a little longer to achieve consensus on this issue, then I am quite satisfied to do so. It seems to me that is the reasonable course; it is the course of reason and reality.

In this chamber we now have an opportunity to remove some of the sting of the last few months and weeks, to repair some of the damage. We could remove the stigma of closure from whatever new and distinctive flag is eventually raised in this country. We can do all this by conscientiously performing one of the duties that is ours as the second chamber, to examine and re-examine Government legislation and proposals dispassionately, fairly, reasonably and with perhaps a surer appreciation of the long-term national interest.

I support the amendment and I commend it to all honourable senators.

Hon. John Hnatyshyn: Honourable senators, I rise to express my support of the amendment moved by Senator Grattan O'Leary. I would like to congratulate him on the eloquence and clarity with which he presented his remarks. I would also like to congratulate the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) for the manner in which he introduced the subject in this house. There have been many interesting speeches, and I agree with previous speakers who have said that the debate has been on a very high level.

In my opinion, this amendment was moved in a spirit of compromise, in the hope that we shall adopt a flag that will be acceptable to the great majority of Canadians. I do not think the flag submitted meets with the approval of the majority of Canadians. It is felt by many that a new flag should include symbols of the founding races of this country and other groups that have helped to build up this great nation of ours. Many people in Canada feel that the flag should have thereon the Union Jack and the fleur-de-lis.

Along with many others who have spoken, I am in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag.

Hon. Mr. McCutcheon: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: The party to which I belong is in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. I agree with Senator Grattan O'Leary that both leading parties in this country want a distinctive flag. What a chance was missed to set aside party politics and to bring in a flag in a way that would not have created as many difficulties as has the manner in which the flag under discussion has been handled.

In my opinion, the creation of a distinctive flag does not mean that the past should be ignored. I speak as one whose origin is not that of either of the founding races. I am proud of my origin and proud of the contributions that my ancestors made to Canada. However, I am also equally proud of the contributions made by the founding races to make this nation what it is today. I would like to see a flag that recognizes these contributions.

People of the same origin as myself came to this country because of the freedom that existed here. The Union Jack was respected by these people because it stood for freedom. No nation can be great if it ignores its history. We are not forming a new nation. Canada has existed for 97 years, and I say, with all the sincerity I can command, that though there have been some difficulties we have done extremely well, and there is no one today who cannot be proud to be a citizen of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hnatyshyn: The present design does not embody our history. It does not represent the sacrifices, experiences and achievements of the past. I am afraid that it will cause more disunity than unity. There are millions of people in Canada who strongly feel that the Union Jack should have a place on a distinctive flag. They are not just stubborn about it, for they are also of the opinion that the fleur-de-lis should have just as prominent a place. Surely it should be possible to work out a compromise by which the vast majority of our people would unite and agree on the type of flag Canada should have.

It is too bad this important issue has been handled the way it has. I think it would have been possible, and still is, to come to a decision that would have the support of all parts of Canada. I agree with previous speakers that the way the flag question was introduced was unfortunate. Last May the Prime Minister said, "We shall have a three maple leaf flag, and the Government will stand or fall on the issue." He threatened the people of Canada with an election unless we accepted a three maple leaf flag. There was a deadline set. First it was July; later it was the occasion of the Queen's visit. The Prime Minister modified his position as far as an election was concerned by saying, "There will be a free vote." Then the question went to a committee of the other house. A most unfortunate thing occurred while the flag question was being studied by that committee, and it was that during that time the Prime Minister set yet another deadline and said, "We shall have a flag by Christmas and it will be the maple leaf design." Honourable senators, in my opinion that made the flag a political issue, which it need never have been.

I suggest the flag is such an important matter for our country that there should be no hurry in choosing it. It is one of the most important matters that Parliament has been called upon to decide. It would be tragic if a decision were arrived at without exploring all the angles, so that we had reason later to regret it. A flag is a symbol of a nation, a symbol for which the people should have a warm attachment. It is important to the people of the nation that any flag chosen should have the support of the vast majority.

It is unfortunate we did not tackle the problem by appointing a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons. I repeat the flag should never have been a political issue. We are all interested in a new flag, as Canadians and not as party members, no matter to what party we belong.

Surely it is not too much to ask that we take our time and select a suitable design, one that would be less controversial than the proposed design. I feel strongly that a committee of both the Senate and House of Commons could introduce some new ideas so that we could adopt a flag which would be genuinely accepted by the Canadian people.

There should be no winners or losers on the flag issue. The flag adopted should promote national unity, not bitterness. That is the reason I support the amendment.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, the story of the flag is getting rather old, and I do not know of anything I could say that would add much to our knowledge of the subject. However, we do say things in a different way, and we are anxious at an important time like this to say something which will show the people we represent that we are interested in the matter and we want to give them leadership on an important question such as the flag.

Honourable senators, may I say just a word with regard to my old friend Senator Horner, who died recently. As I approached Parliament Hill yesterday morning I saw the flag flying at half mast, bearing a message from the Hill that a member of Parliament was dead.

Senator Horner was a unique and good man, and a good senator. He was a warm-hearted man who loved his friends. He was always close to the grass-roots, and that is where the real strength of our country is to be found. I wish to take this opportunity to extend to his widow and his distinguished family the heartfelt sympathy of my wife and myself. We will miss him here, but to them comes the real sorrow.

Now I turn to the flag. In the House of Commons last week a distinguished member said this:

> My people came to Canada 150 years ago. The German people made their contribution to this country in the area of Nova Scotia around what is now Lunenburg when they came there in 1750. In western Ontario and eastern Ontario many of the United Empire Loyalists were of German . . . origin.

Well, I come from Lunenburg. I was born there. I think it is a progressive town. We are told it is a town with character, and it has the atmosphere of the old and the new. We think the people there are progressive, and we think they are excellent Canadian citizens.

When Louis Prince of Lunenburg became King George of England, he and his successors, other Georges, wanted to have Nova Scotia as a common denominator of the kind of citizens that were in this country. So he went to his camp followers and friends in Germany and arranged that they should come to Nova Scotia. They came to Halifax in 1749—900 of them at that time, and the next year 1,000 more came. Then it was decided to move them down the shore to Lunenburg, and 1,500 went to Lunenburg. About 400 stayed in Halifax.

My mother, who was German, comes of that stock; her ancestors were among the German settlers who came in 1753. My father was a Scot from Prince Edward Island. So we have mixed blood too, and we can share with others in that we are citizens of Canada largely because our people have been here for a long time, and a divided ancestry makes it most interesting.

Now, I have said my mother was of German stock; and I would add that she had nine children, four of them sons. There was mention today of allegiance to the Queen. I should say that of the four sons every one was in military service. My youngest brother was a surgeon in the army. Our only son was an officer in the navy.

When I first entered the Legislature of Nova Scotia there were two members from many counties in Nova Scotia, and in many cases one was a French member and the other British. When I was a member of the legislature in 1916, I think there were five counties having French representatives in that house. We came to be good friends; they were splendid people; we had no differences because of race or religion. I considered them to be a little better than I was because they could speak two languages, while I could speak only one. One of them is now a senator, the honourable Senator Comeau. He is, I think, the oldest member of this chamber, being about two months older than Senator Crerar. While his children were brought up to speak their mother tongue, French, his daughter won the gold medal for English at Pictou Academy.

Later I came to Ottawa and became a room-mate of a French Acadian, Vincent Pottier, M.P. He is now a judge in Halifax. We spent nearly 10 years together, and I learned much from him because he had the better education. However, I had more experience, and together we worked out many problems satisfactorily. We came to have the highest regard for each other.

At the present time I do business with many French people. It is not necessary to have a contract; their word is as good as their bond. There are no conflicts about freedom or place. We all have equal opportunities. They are splendid artisans and great citizens; they are a God-fearing people who attend their church, and in my view they are a tremendous asset to the province from which I come.

Let us also take a look at New Brunswick. Recently the Premier of New Brunswick, a brilliant young Acadian, has been advocating unity with Nova Scotia. Well, he must come down to the British of Nova Scotia, since they are now in the majority in the legislature. It seems to me that this is a situation where we find citizenship at its best. We live happily together. We do not like to think that there is anything that pulls us apart. We in Nova Scotia know that while we do not become wealthy, we do live well and we live in a way which, I think, makes good citizens.

Now, if any person had told me five years ago that I would subscribe to a new flag I would have been angry. The flag means much to the maritime people. It is really part of their language, and the Union Jack is very popular. The Red Ensign comes to us, however, from the British merchant marine. In 1930, when the Statute of Westminster proved to be our emancipation, we retained the Red Ensign which was still the flag of the merchant marine. It was declared Canada's flag by order in council, which denotes that it was to be temporary, with a view to being changed when necessary. I think Mr. Mackenzie King said at that time that it would be the flag of Canada until Parliament decided otherwise. Parliament has now decided otherwise.

I have been a borderline case since the discussion started. I went so far as to design a flag and submit it to the committee. It had a Union Jack in the corner. That design was deleted by the committee when they made their selection. That committee has now reported to the House of Commons, and by a large majority the maple leaf flag was selected when the committee reached the hour of decision.

In my public life and in business I have made many decisions, some good and some bad, and sometimes under very difficult circumstances. In the existing circumstances I now support the maple leaf because I think it is timely, and I think it is of benefit to the country.

I may say that my wife, who is of German stock as well as having an Irish mother, is rather like Senator O'Leary (Carleton) in that she is a little slow about forsaking her idols and joining in the parade. However, she is liberal, and I think she will stay in the fold.

When mention is made of the maple leaf, I am reminded of a young lady who appeared on the television program "Maritime Gazette" some time ago. Her name is Miss Dorothy Walker. She is a physical education teacher in Halifax, and she chaperoned the women members of the Canadian Olympics team that went to Japan. She recounted that when she and her party arrived there wearing sweaters bearing the maple leaf emblem, the Japanese girl who met them said: "Oh, you are from Canada. What a beautiful emblem."

Honourable senators, I think that Mr. Pearson has given us an official Commonwealth flag. We have never had one before. In my area we are pretty close to the Crown. Our people do not change very much. On the waterfront in Lunenburg, the town where I live, the Union Jack is flown, and the idea of retaining the Union Jack as the Commonwealth flag seems to me to be something that will please the people there very much.

I should point out that the red flag is very much misunderstood. I have travelled in Africa, along the Mediterranean coast, and also in Europe. When I am abroad I usually go down to the waterfront of the different cities I am visiting to look at the ships. When you see a ship flying the red ensign you know that it is part of the British merchant marine. You have to look very carefully to see the Canadian flag flown by a Canadian ship, and if there happens to be no wind it is even more difficult to find the red flag bearing the Canadian emblem. The people in those countries do not know anything about it, and the Canadian coat of arms on the fly does not mean anything to them. Of course, many Canadians do not know about it, but the whole thing is completely misunderstood by people abroad. If they do happen to understand it they usually say "Oh, well, you are under Great Britain. You are a colony of Great Britain." That is not good enough in the present day.

We all know that wonderful Canadian song:

> In days of yore, from Britain's shore,
> Wolfe the dauntless hero came,
> And planted firm Britannia's flag
> On Canada's fair domain.

He planted Britannia's flag; he did not plant the Canadian flag. The flag that he planted has been with us for a long time, and I think that we have now grown old enough to have a flag of our own.

The Red Ensign is, after all, a mercantile flag. The Union Jack is the real flag of Britain, and I know that the proposal to fly it as the Commonwealth flag will please many people in Nova Scotia, because they fly it now.

Much has been said about the imposition of the closure rule in the House of Commons. Mr. Howe invoked closure in 1957, and there was much said about it. There is not much said about it today because the pipe line was built, and is still operating. Mr. Howe was a businessman. Perhaps he went a little too fast, but I think it would be a good thing if we had Mr. Howe with us today because he was a great Canadian who did a great job for this country.

Honourable senators must agree, after the long debate in the House of Commons, that people were getting discontented with the fact that it seemed to be going on endlessly. Now that it is all over I think that there is a better feeling in the country. Moreover, Nova Scotia has a flag of its own. It is an emblem of which the Scottish people especially are very proud. I read in the press the other day that the Premier of Manitoba is going to propose a flag for that province, and will bring it up at the next session of the legislature.

The three maple leaves are on the escutcheons of Quebec and Ontario. One morning I came out of the Lutheran church which is near the Garden of the Provinces, and I said to the minister, "Let us go down and look at the flag of Quebec." He sent one of the young men down to look at it, and then said: "Well, that is Quebec's coat of arms, on which they have the three maple leaves." Ontario's coat of arms also has the three maple leaves. It seems to me that the maple leaf is the real emblem of this country.

The maple is a fine tree. It seems to me that when we are talking of selecting a flag we must acknowledge the fact that we are not going to select one that suits everybody. I have never known of any reform that did not cause some friction. If a reform did not cause friction, then it was not much of a reform. In my part of the country people say: "A little rough water doesn't hurt a good ship." It brings out the merits. Let us have a little rough water with respect to this new flag, but let us be sure that we are right. If we are right then time will cure all the troubles.

The idea that we should not have this flag is wrong. We are not hurting anybody in having a flag of our own. The maple leaf flag is a distinctive flag, and a flag should be distinctive. It is a flag that is easily interpreted. The maple leaf is an emblem that the world knows about through the activities of our country in war and in sports. We could not get a better emblem.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is this a sales talk?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I was opposed to this flag for quite some time, but after I had heard the speeches and had really thought about it I came around to the belief that this is the right thing to do, and we should do it. I hope that we shall pass this resolution. I hope that we shall all learn to love this flag. To love a flag, honourable senators, you must be acquainted with it. You must have it with you for a time. It must not be thought that all at once it will be embraced like the old flag.

Honourable senators, this flag is emblematic of the changing world. Canada is changing, as the world is changing. It is sad to think of what happened at the last Commonwealth Conference of Prime Ministers when our good friends, the South African people, who are splendid, God-fearing people, and who were in dire danger, were eliminated from the Commonwealth. Many people in this country did not like it. But we are learning. In the Congo we learned a lesson. We learned that the old friends are the best friends, and I think that in the future we should be more careful.

The Constitution of the United Nations says that no one country shall interfere in the internal affairs of another country. In South Africa the people must be able to live in safety in the country that they have made and which they regard so highly. They have made a nation for themselves—a nation that is one of the best in the world.

I shall not take up any more of your time, honourable senators, because we must bring this debate to a conclusion. However, I think that when our people read the Debates of the Senate, and especially the great oratory of the honourable senator from Carleton (Hon. Mr. O'Leary) and others, they will say that the Senate is a valuable second chamber. They will say that this has been a good review of what was done in the lower house. I shall be glad to have been able to give a little leadership in respect of a problem about which our people are disturbed. This is a change for the better. It is for the good of Canada.

The Honourable the Speaker called it 6 o'clock and left the Chair until 7.30 o'clock.

At 7.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, there is one thing that I have discovered in this debate and that is that to do real justice to it you need to be one of two things, you must be either an Irish Canadian or a French Canadian; the rest of us are out in the cold. Such has been the quality of the oratory in this debate of members of these two races.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): You do not put the Catholic Church into that?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: When I tell you that any Irish in me goes back about 1,000 years, you can understand that I feel quite alone in participating in this discussion this evening.

However, honourable senators, we are engaged in a discussion which is of tremendous significance to our country, but what is really involved now is that most important attribute of a sovereign nation, namely, the unity and harmony of its people. It is true that it has taken a long time for the resolution on the flag to get here, and we are aware that all sides of this question have had ample exposure in the other place.

Consequently, there may be no great purpose in debating the subject further here, if this side of the house deemed that in the result we would be crushed merely by the weight of numbers and a partisan spirit. On the contrary, we have some conviction that reason and good judgment may prevail in the deliberations of this body. That is the reason for the amendment presented by the honourable senator for Carleton (Hon. Mr. O'Leary), which I am proud to support with all my conviction.

As my remarks will be directed entirely to the amendment, I shall read it into the record. It is as follows:

> That the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after "Government" and substituting therefor "that the Government suspend further action on the proposal for a new Canadian flag in order to give reasonable time to the people and Parliament of Canada to reach agreement on a flag which will incorporate appropriate symbols of the founding peoples of this nation and which will be acceptable to all elements of our population.

However, with reference to the Senate's part in this debate I was somewhat shocked when I turned my radio on yesterday morning and listened to the program, "C.B.C. News Commentary". These were the words I heard by a C.B.C. representative on a C.B.C. station, speaking of the Commons flag debate. He said: "Well, it is all over, all over except possibly some shouting in the Senate."

"Shouting in the Senate". This, to my mind, was a most disrespectful and insulting remark, if I may say so, made by this C.B.C. commentator concerning the senior parliamentary body of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I believe it would have been at least educational for him if the gentleman who made this statement had been in our galleries yesterday and had listened to some of the very thoughtful and restrained speeches made here, including of course those of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), of the senator from Carleton (Hon. Mr. O'Leary), the senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), the senator from Banff (Hon. Mr. Cameron), the senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Walker), and others. Indeed, I wish to pay my very high respects to those gentlemen on the quality of their contribution to this debate yesterday. The gentleman who spoke on the radio might not then have called it "shouting in the Senate". Perhaps I might send the C.B.C. a copy of our Hansard, at least for yesterday.

Nevertheless, perhaps a reason for this person making this unprovoked attack on the Senate may have been induced by the manner in which the Senate has been ignored and brushed aside in the proceedings that have taken place in regard to the selection of a design for the proposed new Canadian flag. I object most strongly that this body was not, as in my judgment it should have been, made a part of or had representation on the committee of Parliament to select the design for a national flag for Canada.

In the result, a flag comes to us from the other place, ready made, and without anyone here having had anything to do with the selection of the design. The proposed design is simply brought to us and we are told to take it or leave it. We are asked to be a rubber stamp for the other place. Indeed, I was somewhat surprised when the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) suggested yesterday that the Senate, being a non-elected body, should not be too concerned with this question of Canada's national symbols. Surely we should not agree with that proposition, in the light of the very strong emotions aroused in our people on this issue and indeed in the light of the great importance that it has for the people of Canada.

In respect to this matter involving, as I have said, the basic symbols of our nationhood, arousing as it does the deepest emotions of many millions of Canadians, the present Government has, to my mind, unwisely, seen fit to throw this time bomb into the other house where it lacks a parliamentary majority. It has stubbornly and obstinately demanded that the debate on it must have priority over other matters which in the national interest required to be dealt with.

More recently it has kept the debate going under circumstances where ministers of the Crown have been immune from answering questions in Parliament, at a time when the country's newspapers have been making disclosures of improprieties by ministers that have literally rocked this whole nation; and, finally, it has applied the ultimate weapon of closure in the other place.

What, may I ask, was the real purpose of all these unorderly events? It was so that a Prime Minister with an obsession could have Santa come down his chimney with a flag for his Christmas stocking. Surely such procedures need to be reviewed in this house.

As the honourable senator from Carleton (Hon. Mr. O'Leary) said yesterday, the occasion of the changing of our symbols of nationhood is a time for greatness, not a time for petty politicking. I have no objection to the Liberal Party putting a plank in its platform promising a new flag in two years; but I object most strongly when a new Prime Minister fails to recognize the precedent established by wiser men and, instead of following their example, adopts measures which have created national division and disunity in our country, unprecedented except in time of war. Indeed, such a degree of blundering and misadventure has been the history of the present Government that any measure coming from it to this house of sober second thought should be highly suspect, and certainly should not be rubber-stamped here without the most searching inquiry and critical debate.

I am far from being alone in saying the present Government has been a fumbling one. The editor of the Montreal Gazette put the matter very succinctly in one paragraph of the edition of November 30. This newspaper referred to the Government as "The awkward Squad" and went on to say, in the editorial, in one paragraph:

> The storm in the House last week, which came close to bringing the Government to defeat, is something far more than an incident. It dramatically demonstrates the Government's primary weakness. It is its perverse disposition to take its stand on shifting ground. One measure after another is poorly planned and publicly corrected, with retreat and humiliation. This constancy in fumbling, and talent for misadventures are seriously undermining and obscuring much of the Government's good intentions and real achievements.

I ask this question at this time: By what standard of parliamentary democracy should the Senate of Canada be expected to concur in a decision of this importance, involving the most sacred treasure of the Canadian people, our national flag, just because 11 out of 15 members of the other house choose to come and approve the one design selected in this manner, and at which committee, by all reasonable standards, this body should have been represented, but was not.

We, in the Senate, are placed in the position that not one of us had anything to do, nor anything to say, in selecting the design of the flag which is now brought to us for approval, involving, as the honourable leader's resolution does, the depriving of millions of Canadians of the symbol which for almost 100 years, has had such an important place in the heart and soul of this nation.

I for one condemn in the strongest way possible the fact that up to this point the Senate of Canada has been ignored and treated as a class in a kindergarten school. I say that the method adopted by the Government in this matter is both as wrong and humiliating for this body as it is disruptive of the unity of our country. It has set race against race, region against region, family against family. By the conflicting emotions it has engendered, it has set father against son, mother against daughter, and has made no pretence whatever of seeking that amicability or unity which is so essential to our well-being as a nation.

Apart from being an error in judgment, which should be severely condemned here, it consists also of a needless departure from parliamentary precedent in our own country.

Compare and contrast if you will, the action taken in 1945 by a seemingly much more responsible government, in regard to the issue of symbols of our nationhood which required consideration at that time. Did the government of that day throw the flag question willy-nilly into the House of Commons? Would either the Right Honourable Mr. Mackenzie King, or the Right Honourable Mr. Louis St. Laurent do anything like that? The answer is definitely no. The government of that day did what any wise government, without thought or expectation of political advantage, would reasonably do: It appointed a committee of Parliament, not only a committee of the House of Commons, but of the Senate and the House of Commons. To my mind, that was proper, highly proper, and conformed in those circumstances to the best traditions of a democratic society such as our own.

I have referred to the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Flag of 1945-46. I have read our Senate Hansard of the time, and I have read most of the proceedings of the committee. Let me pay my tribute to one member of that committee who is here today, the honourable Senator Lambert, who was a joint chairman of the committee. The record discloses that he did an extraordinary amount of work and played a tremendous part in all the proceedings of the committee of that day.

Any one who is really interested in this question should pay to Senator Lambert the honour of reading the speech that he delivered, when the resolution for the appointment of the committee came to this house in 1945. It is thoughtful and thought-provoking. Perhaps he might express the identical views today as he did then, I do not know. However, I suggest that this speech revolved largely around the question of what is a "distinctive national flag." And I am well aware of the fact that Senator Lambert was one of the 23 persons out of 24 who voted on the final report of that committee, which decided in 1946 that the flag then approved by that committee, and which included the Union Jack in the top left corner, was a "distinctive Canadian flag". Certainly this selection could not be confused with any other, except at a distance, when, indeed any flag can be confused with another.

However, it was interesting to me to note a statement made by Joseph Howe quoted in Senator Lambert's speech as appears in Senate Hansard of November 21, 1945, at page 301:

> A wise nation gathers up its records, preserves its muniments, and fosters national pride and love of country by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

Senator Lambert concluded his speech as follows:

> It seems to me that at this time, as we in common with the rest of the world enter upon a new era of history, a Canadian flag should suggest these things increasingly to the mind of our people. It is this thought which should be ever present with the members of the joint committee that will be appointed after the adoption of this resolution.

The honourable Senator Lambert, for whom I have always had the highest regard, may suggest that I have quoted him somewhat out of context. If I have done so, no doubt he will make reference to the fact. I merely wished to quote part of his speech.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): In view of his reference to the utterances of Joseph Howe, it seems to me that the implication is created that because there may be a new national flag, one would desecrate the graves of illustrious ancestors. Would he say that that was correct?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I doubt very much if the honourable senator's question is relevant to this discussion. I think perhaps I should not be sidetracked by answering at this stage.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): A nice way of avoiding it!

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: It would take too long to answer.

I want to say that I hope that Senator Lambert still believes in the principle he enunciated so many years ago. Indeed, don't we all?

A flag should represent the glories of our past, and the greatness of our heritage. Why not, therefore, join with us in support of Senator O'Leary's amendment? It envisages, I believe, a joint committee of this house and the other place—men of good will coming together, as they did 18 and 19 years ago. This time, however, I suggest that we need such a procedure, not only to select designs for a flag for Canada, but also for the purpose of binding the wounds and repairing the broken hearts of those who have been so grievously afflicted by the debate of the past six months, and the results flowing therefrom.

We have spoken overly much of a distinctive national flag. What, for instance, could be more distinctive than a flag containing those eternal symbols of our past: the Union Jack, the fleur-de-lis, and, if you wish, a maple leaf emblazoned on such a flag.

Yesterday I listened carefully to Senator Cameron's extremely able and persuasive speech. I congratulate him on it. Indeed, I would wish that the result he envisages could come true, but I am afraid it will not; at least, for a long time there may be many sore and severe wounds to be healed.

Senator Cameron never gave one thought or phrase to those millions of Canadians who feel mortally wounded at the tearing away of the Union Jack as part of our national emblem. Furthermore, let me say that Senator Cameron based most of his argument on his statement that he was sure 60 per cent to 70 per cent of Canadians wanted a distinctive Canadian flag. It is just a matter of definition of the word "distinctive". I would say that 100 per cent of Canadians want a distinctive Canadian flag, in so far that it is not the flag of any other country—which even the Red Ensign is not, inasmuch as it distinctly contains on the fly the Canadian Coat of Arms.

If the honourable senator looks at the terms of reference of the 1945-46 Joint Committee on Canada's National Flag, he will ascertain that by a majority of 23 to 1 the committee deemed that the flag it accepted, which included the Union Jack, was a distinctive Canadian flag. That is what the terms of reference required the committee to do, to present a design of a distinctive national flag. As far as I can see from the reports and proceedings of that committee, no one suggested that the flag recommended by the committee—although not adopted, it is true—was not a distinctive national flag. Would not such a flag be even more distinctive if it also incorporated the fleur-de-lis, which that proposed flag did not? Surely, such a flag is more distinctive than the proposed flag vis-à-vis the flag of Peru?

Honourable senators, you can be as callous as you like about this matter. You can wield your majority rights if you wish. Nothing can stop you in this house from crushing a minority like a bulldozer wipes out a fly. But let me say this: I doubt if there is a case in history where a flag was born in circumstances paralleling what we have here, where a Prime Minister set deadlines and then put his majority into action against the minority, and finished the deal by the lethal weapon of closure.

I say that is not the way to give birth to a national flag; that is a serious error, the ultimate result of which will be bitterness, division and disunity, and may eventually help lead to the disintegration of our nation as we know it today.

I plead with honourable senators to give to this matter sober second thought, as it is our duty to do in this chamber, and to support the amendment proposed by the honourable senator from Carleton.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, my first word must be one of appreciation and gratitude to my friend from Winnipeg, Senator Thorvaldson, for his reference to myself in connection with the joint committee of both houses which considered this same problem in 1945-46.

In connection with that I would like to offer, first of all, a word of sympathy and approval regarding the unenviable task just performed by the parliamentary committee which, after several weeks of intensive discussion, produced in its final report the recommendation which is now the subject of our debate.

To a certain extent, I contrast some of the circumstances which characterized the meetings of the committee on this occasion with those which I had to deal with some 20 years ago. First of all, the joint committee of both houses in 1945-46 had to sit in the humid, hot weather of the summer months, and I remember very vividly that despite the fatiguing course of the discussion, the hearing of many resolutions and many witnesses, and the hanging of many samples and designs of flags on screens in the railway committee room, the membership of that committee stayed with its job consistently and, I think, devotedly, without regard for any sort of distinction that might have aroused either racial or sectional feelings at any time. Ultimately, when the report was made, it was made with a very large measure of unanimity. With one exception, the members of that committee, who were present at the final drafting of the report, voted in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. I believe I am not exaggerating in the slightest degree when I say that, as I recall it, the obvious purpose and intention of the membership of that committee—which represented a pretty broad cross-section of all parties at that time, including Mr. Coldwell of the C.C.F.—was to display a magnanimous attitude towards the prospect and project of establishing a distinctive flag for Canada, regardless of its design or anything else.

In the end, as is well known now, in the exhibition of the flags which was presented in connection with this report in the upstairs room there was a design which was supposed to have been a fair representation of what was recommended at that time, but I found it had certain shortcomings because it was not an exact replica of the submission in 1946. The submission at that time of a flag that would have been acceptable, with one dissentient, was a modification of the present merchant marine flag, so as to reduce the size and proportions of the Union Jack in the corner by half its present size, leaving in the fly a large area which was to be filled with a white circle superimposed upon which was to be a maple leaf of autumn colourings of red and gold. That represented the submission that was made at that time with the unanimous approval of the committee, but for this one exception.

I should have said, in the first place the resolution to set up this joint committee emanated from the Government of the day, in the name of the Prime Minister, and when the report was presented to the house for adoption, objection was taken to the presence of the Union Jack, even in its reduced form in the flag. When it became evident that a definite cleavage of opinion existed on this point, the Prime Minister was instrumental, I think, in having the whole subject of the report referred to the Governor in Council for consideration. In that way I believe he wisely forestalled or anticipated possible disruptive discussions that might not have been fair to the whole conception of the committee. That was the last that was heard of that report of the joint committee over which I presided.

I think it is only fair to say that in the early forties a directive was issued from the Department of External Affairs to its representative legations in different parts of the world, that for purposes of Canadian identity during that period, and until further instructions were issued, the merchant marine flag with a Canadian Coat of Arms in the fly should be flown at the masthead of our legations abroad. That has continued to be the case during the past 20 years, until this resolution which resulted in the appointment of a new committee was adopted, and the report which we have before us today is the result of its deliberations.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: May I ask the honourable senator, did not that also specify it was a distinctive Canadian flag that was to be flown?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: In the report, as I recall it, there was no reference made to those words, but it was quite well assumed that the reference to the committee in the first place, coming as a result of the Prime Minister's resolution, was that it should inquire into the possibilities of introducing a distinctive Canadian flag. To that extent the report might be considered as representing the fair and unbiased opinion of that committee.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: The Prime Minister used the word "distinctive".

Hon. Mr. Lambert: He may have used that word. I cannot recall the wording of his resolution but, at any rate, that was the request of the committee.

That is quite right; I will accept that reading of it. There was no question about the purpose or objective of the committee as I presided over it. My colleague at that time was Mr. Walter Harris, later to become the Honourable Walter Harris, and he shared with me some of the responsibilities of presiding over that committee. He was party to the report as well.

However, I would like to point out that this report that we have before us today and the pros and cons of which we are considering, comes 20 years later. I submit that the report of this most recent committee of the House of Commons, which was presided over by a very able and responsible chairman, Mr. Batten from Newfoundland—and from what I know of his performance I think he was just as good a chairman as could possibly have been appointed to head that committee—reflects an objective point of view which was adjusted to the changes that have taken place during the past 20 years. It reflected the will of the majority of the committee. I do not think there was any great difference between the findings of that committee and the findings of the committee in 1945.

I think it is very important in our approach to this subject to remember that the priceless value of compromise is in the liberty and freedom which is involved, rather than in the arbitrary alternative of autocratic action. The feeling in 1945 was unmistakably as favourable to a distinctive Canadian flag as it has been in the most recent report.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: But there is the question of definition.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: If I may proceed with a few remarks—I do not want to be too long because much has been said on this subject already.

I should say how much I appreciate the contributions made to this debate from the very beginning. I think the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) made a very comprehensive, acceptable and able presentation of the whole subject from an objective point of view, without partisanship and without any particularly invidious connotations. I would also like to refer with deep admiration to my friend and colleague Senator O'Leary (Carleton), for his eloquent presentation of his point of view in relation to the future of this flag.

I think that when one has considered all that has been said in both houses so far, one realizes that if there is any point of contention at all, it boils down to whether or not this is a distinctive Canadian flag—whether or not it may or may not be an ideal design, reflecting fully and adequately the aspirations of the present Canadian people, or expressing the potential measurement of future generations in connection with the insignia that we call the Canadian flag, representing us at home and elsewhere in the world. Time alone will reveal its true significance. But what is really being expressed here today is not the be-all and end-all of the great desire for national identity. The crystallization of sentiment in metaphorical form, whether it be in verse or musical measures or physical guise, is the process which must be subject to the profound and subtle influences of evolutionary advancement in the life of this still young country.

It may be said with much truth that great national symbols are born, not made. The Union Jack itself in its final form has been the by-product of the gradual processes of evolution. The Stars and Stripes was born of the deep and simple devotion of an unknown woman whose attachment to her native soil was the source of her inspiration. It is worth noting that for a period following the secession of the thirteen colonies and the Declaration of Independence, the Union Jack continued to adorn the upper left-hand corner of the first version of the Stars and Stripes, and the respect for their British background in the old dominion of Virginia is still manifested in the flying of the Union Jack over the replica of the old Government House in Williamsburg, which with so many other structures now memorializes the pre-revolutionary days in that state.

It surely suggests, in that respect alone, a gratifying recognition of the common historic origins with so much that is cherished in the history of Canada as well.

And so I submit that out of this declaration which is contained in the resolution before us today we can develop even larger conceptions than are expressed in this initial effort to proclaim the note of nationhood. Particularly will this come to pass if through school and church, and the parliamentary councils of the nation, the vital attachment of the people to the soil of Canada receives due emphasis and attention. Let the positive and not the negative note be emphasized at this time for the future of this historic venture.

Let us also remember the spectacular increase in the population of Canada since the end of the last war, consisting mainly of largely diverse peoples and races in this new land to which they have come from countries and continents in other parts of the world, and whose regard for the adoption of a new Canadian flag by the representative action of those who represent them in Parliament will do much, in my opinion, to enhance the bright future that Canada will have in its aspirations towards nationhood.

The gratifying background of the whole thing is that we have today in Canada, I think, in contrast even with the point of view expressed in 1945 and 1946, when I was chairman of the joint committee, that it is undeniably reflected in the viewpoint of the younger generation which has matured and increased in numbers since that time. I feel through my own family, which has grown up during those years, that there is only one point of view, and it is to have definite recognition in the world where we have made the pretension, at any rate, of having some determining voice in its future affairs.

Hon. Clement A. O'Leary: Honourable senators, before I proceed with the main text of my brief remarks I should like to refer to the fact that today before the Orders of the Day were called I asked that a correction be made in the report of the Debates of the Senate of December 15, I was referring to an interjection that was incorrectly attributed to me. However, I did make an interjection which is correctly reported as:

> That is not correct.

That was when I advised Senator Pouliot that his statement was not correct.

Since that time I have apologized personally to Senator Pouliot for the rudeness of this interruption, but I did not apologize for the substance of my challenge.

Senator Pouliot said, in part:

> The leaders of the Legion—

And I presume he was speaking of the leaders of the Royal Canadian Legion.

> —do not represent the sentiments of the members of the rank and file of the army, navy and air force, any more than the leaders of labour unions represent the feelings of the members of their unions.

To my mind, this was a general and rather sweeping statement of condemnation of the Royal Canadian Legion. That is the way I interpreted it. It was a condemnation of the effective democracy of that organization. I want to say simply—and I think I have a right to do so—that I have been a member of that organization for too long, and have participated in too many of its democratic processes, right through from its branches to its provincial commands and to its dominion command, to sit idly by and allow such a sweeping, destructive condemnation to appear on the record of this house. As a one-time member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs of the other place, I can say that my colleagues and comrades there never shared a view such as that expressed by Senator Pouliot.

I should like to add further that the well-trained veterans' officers in the service bureau of the Dominion Command can render efficient and valuable service to members of Parliament, and, yes, even to senators, all of whom at some time or other must be asked to assist in the problems of veterans.

Suffice it to say, I have the highest respect for the Royal Canadian Legion, for its executive and staff from the top down. In saying that I am sure I have the support of the majority of veterans of this country, and the support, I might add, of a notable upholder of the Royal Canadian Legion, its efforts and its work, in the person of a former Minister of Veterans Affairs and the present distinguished Leader of the Opposition in this chamber.

Without either condoning or condemning the practices of some labour unions, I should like to point out that the comparision that Senator Pouliot made was not valid in that he was comparing voluntary membership, on the one hand, with compulsory membership on the other.

I am sorry that Senator Pouliot is not in his seat. However, he will read my remarks tomorrow morning and, being the distinguished gentleman that he is, will understand the point I am attempting to make.

In considering the resolution as amended, I think most of us will agree that it would be rather difficult to ignore much of what has already been written and said on this subject. In my remarks I promise you I shall make a conscientious effort to deal with the subject as objectively as possible, and attempt to remain strictly relevant, by first granting that the topic under discussion is an entirely new one for this chamber as of December 14. In so doing, it is nevertheless necessary to review the background and the purported reasons why we have this subject of a distinctive national flag—to use the words of the resolution—before us now. I might say as well that I may not find it the easiest thing in the world to remain entirely objective, because by its nature the subject is a very personal one for most Canadians and, I am sure, for all parliamentarians. Most honourable senators who have already spoken have pretty well demonstrated that fact.

In so far as background is concerned, it is my understanding that this subject is before Parliament in the year 1964 because the promise to "adopt" or "attempt to adopt, if possible" a distinctive national flag within two years of being elected to office was included in the platform of the present Government party prior to the last federal election. I want to state immediately that I recognize and accept the fact that its background extends considerably farther back than that, which fact, incidentally, Senator Pouliot brought out very well yesterday afternoon. However, I repeat that this election promise has been offered as the basic reason for this resolution being before us at this time.

I then ask: Is this good and sufficient reason in itself? I think not, and I do so not because I consider the subject unimportant, nor do I seek to dismiss responsibility on the part of those so promising. I do feel, however, and very strongly, that this should be a question of relative values, and in the light of the events of the day a party, once having assumed power, must make a responsible and realistic assessment, and thereby establish priorities. I believe, too, that in this instance the mood of the day should have dictated that discussion and decision on such a subject was indeed untimely, and, heaven knows, there were and are priorities sufficient and grave enough to excuse any government for not proceeding in this direction at this time.

Notwithstanding these much more urgent and pressing problems, this Government strove and finally succeeded by rather drastic and questionable practice to bring this very contentious issue before us for discussion at this time. And it anticipates, I presume, decision and disposition of the matter to that degree within the powers of this chamber.

Thus, it is not at all strange that many very strongly suspect the Government's real reason for this action—quite over and above the keeping of an election promise within a defined time limit. Surely, it cannot be argued that there was any great public clamour for a new flag at this time. I know of none, but I will say that once the Government of the day introduced the subject in the other place, I am sure all honourable senators here will have noted that the greatest, strongest and most united representations we have since heard come from those who support the retention of the Red Ensign as Canada's flag. I am not advocating that course, because I fully comprehend the necessity for understanding and compromise, thereby automatically but consciously and willingly sacrificing even some of those things we cherish.

Senator O'Leary (Carleton) gave us a rather lengthy list of those in his speech yesterday when moving the amendment. I will not repeat them.

In a recent major speech by the Prime Minister of this country, one further reason was advanced for introducing this very contentious topic, and I must say that in this instance the argument for "at this particular time" was not put forward too strongly. His argument was in support of the necessity for "change", and on this occasion he cited the example of that which was done in 1945 when the Union Jack was replaced by the Red Ensign. He pointed out that although many people opposed that change he now felt certain that such action was, and I quote, "a desirable and inevitable stage in our national progression". Perhaps I will have more to say on this particular point when another resolution will, I understand, appear before us shortly.

Honourable senators, up to this point I have attempted to refute what I believe were the two most substantive arguments raised for bringing forward this resolution to both Houses of Parliament at this time. At least I would hope that they are the most "substantive", in that they were the key ones advanced by the Prime Minister himself. Now I come to the point where it is necessary to face the fact that, whether we like it or not, the subject of a distinctive national flag is before us here and now. I believe it will be well at this stage to state what I feel is my objective. I can only say that I am very unhappy with this design we have been asked to approve. Were I to list all my reasons, many of them would simply be a repetition of those outlined when the amendment was proposed.

I believe the reasons outlined when the amendment was proposed were "substantive ones." Following my line of argument, this is the reason that I heartily endorse the amendment.

Someone has, perhaps unkindly, called this proposed design an "extinctive" rather than a "distinctive" flag. In all seriousness, this pretty well describes my feeling about it. To be more specific, I sincerely feel that our loss has been too great. In the spirit of understanding and compromise to which I have referred, I personally would willingly and very gladly accept the third choice of the Commons Flag Committee. To my mind, this design made room for both: it allowed for a retention of the history, culture and traditions of the two founding nations, and it was very obviously conceived in the bicultural mood of the day.

I apologize for referring to Senator Pouliot by name when he is not here, but I must quote his words. Yesterday he stated, in part, that the Union Jack was "perhaps the most beautiful flag in the world." I concur with him wholeheartedly, except that I remove his "perhaps". Therefore, the closer we come to such beauty, even with certain variations, I say that we would then be giving our country a flag second to none, a beautiful, meaningful flag for a beautiful country, meaning everything to us as Canadians. Then we could be truly as proud of our flag as every last one of us is of our country. I believe this should be the case.

Now, I have just expressed my view, but what of the views of the majority of Canadians? Here I do not agree with the proposer of the amendment, in that I maintain that neither the elected representatives of the people nor we here in this chamber, nor both combined, have the right to decide for all Canadians on a matter of this deep personal significance. I stand for a plebiscite in the next general election, but I will not argue the case here because it would not be relevant to the amendment and, incidentally, I have no intention of proposing a further motion. Consequently, I will support the amendment, in the hope that before another year has passed, perhaps others will see this subject as I do at the present time.

Senator Cameron has indicated that there will be no unanimity, irrespective of the length of time we may take. Another senator from this side of the house has agreed with him. I shall not prejudice the mentality and future views of Canadians except in a hopeful spirit, and I believe that time can soften the "hard-shells" and make possible a worthy compromise. Very true, it can be said that one body of this Parliament has already spent much time on this subject, but I was very happy to hear Senator Crerar say, in effect, that in his view this time was not wasted by any means. I believe he referred to it as healthy controversy.

Again, speaking on the time element, in so far as this arm of Parliament is concerned, no opportunity was afforded the members of this chamber to participate in any way in this most important question until December 15. I deplore the fact that there was no joint committee of both houses set up for purposes of recommendation, if for no other reason than to serve as a guide for the Canadian people, offering them suitable and appropriate choices for their final decision.

Senator Pouliot said yesterday that if the Leader of the Official Opposition had followed the example of Mr. Godbout, there would be no problem at all and we would not be faced with a contentious issue, that unanimous approval would have been the order of the day. All I can say to this is that, if I followed

Senator Pouliot correctly, and from what I can read of the procedure followed in Quebec at that time, if Mr. Diefenbaker had followed Mr. Godbout's example we would have a resolution before us today dealing not with one symbolic maple leaf, but three. To my mind, however, the making of a choice between the two was not an earth-moving decision, because there is little beauty or substance in either.

Honourable senators, in summary, I have criticized the timing of the introduction of this subject in Parliament; I have criticized the technique and manner of its introduction; I have criticized the present proposed Canadian flag, not for its content, but for lack of it; I have indicated my choice of a flag; I have stated that all Canadians should make the final decision; and I have questioned the time element in so far as this chamber is concerned. Yet, I have not been unmindful of the proper and expeditious dispatch of public business, and I hope I may be forgiven if I say that neither am I unmindful of Christmas holidays.

With these thoughts in mind, and with the sincere hope that possibly Canada may yet receive its just dessert in the matter of what I feel is a worthy distinctive flag, I repeat that I will support the amendment. Unlike Senator Croll, I can wait, and I feel we must wait, otherwise we are inviting disunity, and consequent disaster for our country.

Hon. Sydney J. Smith: Honourable senators, there have been just about 300 speeches delivered during the flag debate, which is now in its thirty-fourth or thirty-fifth day. There is little that can be said now that has not already been said repeatedly, so I do not propose to add another version of the same theme. In fact, I had made up my mind that I would refrain from speaking at all, but that was before my honourable friend Senator Grattan O'Leary introduced his amendment yesterday. That made me change my mind.

I want to congratulate Senator O'Leary on making the finest speech of his career in the Senate. His dramatic appeal for unity was masterly, and I endorse it with all my heart. However, I cannot endorse the amendment with which he concluded his speech, which I considered to be completely contrary to his appeal for unity.

At about two o'clock yesterday morning the proposed new distinctive Canadian flag reached a point that was closer to unanimous Canadian acceptance than had ever been accomplished previously. The flag that had been chosen from among thousands was endorsed by an overwhelming vote in the House of Commons. All that remains to be done now is for us to lay aside our differences and grudges, as suggested by the honourable Senator O'Leary before introducing his amendment, and to unite behind the flag that has been recommended and adopted in the other place.

Let us examine the exact wording of the resolution. It has already been put on record by the honourable senator from Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson). I do not wish to take anything out of its context, so I am going to repeat the body of the amendment, which reads in part as follows:

> In amendment, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "Government" and substituting therefor "that the Government suspend further action on the proposal for a new Canadian flag in order to give reasonable time to the people and Parliament of Canada to reach agreement on a flag which will incorporate appropriate symbols of the founding peoples of this nation and which will be acceptable to all elements of our population.

I will repeat the portion that I want to deal with, leaving out the unrelated part. The main theme is that the Government suspend further action on the proposal for a new Canadian flag in order to give reasonable time to the people and Parliament of Canada to reach agreement on a flag which will be acceptable to all elements of our population.

I wonder if my honourable friend who sponsored the amendment seriously thinks that the people and Parliament of Canada have been unduly rushed into coming to a choice of a flag? Does he seriously think that a further indefinite period for discussion would produce a more unanimous decision? Or does he seriously think that resulting from any further period of consideration, any flag could be produced which would be acceptable to all elements of our population?

Honourable senators, I have no hesitation in saying that it is my considered opinion that such an accomplishment is a forlorn hope. We are individuals, and enjoy the freedom of individuality in our tastes and convictions. We are free to belong to the church of our choice, we are free to join the political party of our choice. We also enjoy countless other choices that reflect our individuality.

Many facets of society are better because of conflicting convictions, but not so in the case of a flag. If we could each adopt the flag of our individual choice, the result would be completely useless; it would not serve its purpose.

In the case of a flag, we must be prepared to submit to conciliation, and to compromise in a spirit of give and take. When we have adopted a common choice, the element of time will start to work and sooner or later, depending on the spirit of our conciliation, the flag will become a valuable influence for unity.

Honourable senators, with due deference and respect for the sponsor (Hon. Mr. O'Leary, Carleton), I find it impossible to support the amendment.

Hon. John A. Robertson: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in the debate on the amendment to the main motion, I do so after considerable thought and a great deal of listening to what has been said in the debate.

I would like first to congratulate my good friend and colleague the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton) for what I believe is one of the finest, if not the greatest, speeches we have heard in respect to the flag debate during the past six months.

I also wish to congratulate the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly), and all other senators who have spoken to this date. This has been a most informative and interesting debate throughout.

I listened very closely to the honourable Senator Pouliot yesterday. During his address I came to a number of conclusions. I notice that my honourable colleague Senator Clement O'Leary, is chuckling—he stole part of my speech, and therefore I shall have to follow a different course.

The honourable Senator Pouliot, from that famous town in Quebec, Rivière du Loup, was, as usual, at his vocal best in speaking of the need for a distinctive Canadian flag. He made his usual approach, employing one of his favourite methods of waving an olive branch in one hand and a baseball bat in the other.

Mention has been made of the approach that Mr. Godbout and Mr. Duplessis took about the flag of the Province of Quebec, and that was just too bad that the same method was not used in the present circumstances. That is all water under the bridge. This new flag was launched in a sea of discontent, one of the very roughest of seas. We are all well aware of the reception it received that memorable day in the City of Winnipeg. I say to all honourable senators that if there ever was an inopportune time to introduce a new flag, that was the day. It was a very sad occasion, and the flag presented at that time is not the flag under discussion and consideration today, but a different one.

In reading Hansard of the other place one must assume that the policy of the Government must have been this: If you cannot say anything good about the new flag, don't say anything. So, honourable senators, they said practically nothing, and this proposed flag was adopted by nearly all Government members along with nearly all those of the smaller parties. This must have been the policy projected through caucus—I can only guess this much, because we do not know what they said and what they did not say. I can assure you that these members will have to answer to their constituents when they return to their constituencies at a later date. Of course, the answer is one for which we shall have to wait.

I listened in this chamber as the honourable Senator Pouliot ran down the Royal Canadian Legion brass. I am sorry he is not here tonight so I could look over and smile at him. He also ran down labour unions and their leaders. Not speaking for the rank and file, I immediately thought of the Bar Association when he said that, and I wondered if he attended all their meetings.

Speaking for myself, I served in the armed forces, along with four of my brothers, under the flag that is presently flying atop the Peace Tower. Like my father and my grandfather, I have lived in happiness and security under this flag throughout a lifetime.

I listened to the honourable Senator Croll's remarks earlier today, and he called himself a new Canadian. I wondered, if he thought he was a new Canadian, what his idea would be of an old Canadian, because I think he has been with us for some 60 years, and if he is a new Canadian then I guess I must be too.

With respect to the "Croll Poll," as he called it, I was most impressed. In fact, I was going to ask him if he conducted that poll in his own backyard. I assume that he did. Then, when he said, "Time is running out. I want a flag now and I cannot wait," I felt like saying, "Maybe Santa Claus will be good to you too." With regard to his remarks about a changing world, Canada, like the rest of the world, has been changing vastly over the last 100 years, and I do not think we have to be advised of that fact.

Then the good senator mentioned living in the past. Well, I can only say that I wish for my family and relatives the same happiness living in Canada this next 50 years that I have experienced during the past 50 years. Certainly, a new flag will never change our standards of living. Again, in reference to the past, I told Senator Croll as he passed out of the chamber, hustling to a committee meeting this afternoon, "Senator when you start speaking of the past I immediately think of the members of your profession. On any occasion I have had the opportunity to sit and listen to a lawyer, in court or in one of the offices upstairs, I have come to the conclusion that they are the champions at digging into the past."

But what about the new flag? What do you think of it? Personally speaking, I cannot say too much for it right now. Being a man of many flags, a railroader, as you all know, I have great respect for flags. The colours are many. We have a white flag, a yellow flag, a green flag, a green and white flag, a blue flag, and a purple flag. All these flags mean something. I could go on and explain to you what they mean. I have only worked with them for the past 25 years, but those who went before me used them too. And what do they mean? Green: "Go!" Red: "Stop!" Yellow: "Proceed with caution!" I could go on and elaborate, but I am sure honourable senators who have served on the transport committee know the answers.

In reference to polls, when I heard of the "Croll Poll" I searched through my pocket and plucked out this article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of December 12, 1964. It is headed:

> Opinion poll favours maple leaf flag

I did not stop there, but kept on reading.

> A privately-organized opinion poll taken in Toronto, Montreal and rural Quebec shows 81 per cent of those polled want a red, white and blue maple leaf flag.

We are away off base. If 81 per cent want this type of flag, then the one that is being suggested today is not the right one. However, I would not want to think that polls are wrong. It says 81 per cent. It mentioned 16 per cent here too:

> Of the total sample of 411 persons, 81 per cent liked the blue version, and 16 per cent liked the red version. Three per cent refused to make a choice.
> The red version is the choice of a parliamentary committee which has completed a study of the flag question. The red flag is now before the House of Commons.

—in more ways than one. I thought that was a terrific figure, 81 per cent—better than the "Croll Poll," as Senator Croll called it.

If I may, I would like to read into the record a letter I received a day or two ago: It is addressed:

> 8559 89 Street
> Edmonton, Alberta
> December 13, 1964
> Senator Pete Robertson
> Kenora, Ontario
> Ottawa, Canada

So he is going to make sure the letter gets to me!

> Dear Sir:
>
> Two of the most beautiful flag designs in the world are undoubtedly the Star Spangled Banner and the Union Jack.

This has been said in this chamber this evening, and was mentioned by Senator Pouliot yesterday. I agree. Then he refers to the Pearson red maple leaf flag:

> The Pearson red maple leaf flag is too plain in appearance to look good flying beside either of these two, and the enclosed flag designs that I have submitted are much more complimentary—all three being stripe designs.

—though there were only two in the package when it arrived, so one must have dropped out. Nevertheless, he said there were three.

> It is my opinion that if the Pearson maple leaf design is adopted it will split the country more than ever. As while the Red Ensign is too British, the maple leaf flag is too extreme the other way. I feel the Pearson design is too plain and meaningless. While on the enclosed designs each blue stripe or pillar, as I choose to call them, is representative of the ten provinces, while the gold band ties in all the provinces to the maple leaf as a wedding ring. The fleur-de-lis occupies one-third of the shield but having top position gives both the French and British equal representation and also shows that the French were here first.

That is something to be considered too.

> I believe that unity can be helped if both the British and French are equally represented on the flag which is a good compromise between the Red Ensign and plain maple leaf design. I hope you will favour bringing these designs to the attention of the Senate.
>
> I knew you in the army in Winnipeg.
>
> Yours respectfully
> These flag designs were submitted to the chairman of the flag committee at a late date but before their design was chosen. I received no acknowledgement from them which would make me feel that their design was pretty well cut and dried.

I have another letter here, but I do not think I will bother reading it.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Is the last part a P.S. or did you write that in yourself?

Hon. Mr. Robertson (Kenora-Rainy River): It is in the same handwriting as the signature.

Honourable senators, as I said, I would have liked to spend a little more time on this, but the honourable Leader of the Government presented this resolution so soon, and since we did not get a stay of execution for a day I did not have time to prepare anything more lengthy than this. Nevertheless, I was happy to be able to voice my opinion in respect of the new flag and the amendment to the main motion. I can only say I am heartily in support of the amendment. Thank you.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, I have had no time to prepare a speech for tonight, having arrived back from Newfoundland late last evening. Let me first of all extend my congratulations to honourable senators who spoke yesterday; although I did not hear them, I have read what they said. I also want to congratulate those who spoke today. Most of the speeches were on a very high level and made me feel proud to belong to a gathering such as we have in this house. I regret that my speech will not be in the same category, for I do not have the ability nor have I had the time to make adequate preparation.

We all understood we were to get a distinctive Canadian or national flag. But nobody has yet been able to explain to me what is so distinctive about the red maple leaf in Canada. Why is it distinctive in Canada? Maple leaves are to be found in many places, including Europe. I remember reading that Tennyson once said that the maple leaf will turn to blood in the fall. He was, of course, referring to the turning red of the leaf. Therefore, it follows that there must have been plenty of maples leaves in England or in Europe away back in Tennyson's time.

I do not wish to cast any aspersion on the flag, because it looks as if we will have to accept it. But will somebody tell me what is so distinctive about it? Surely in Canada we have other things more distinctive than the leaf of a tree. We do not have very many maples leaves in Newfoundland unless we import the trees and plant them in our backyards. We have quantities of spruce and birch and other trees, but no maples. I suspect that in some other provinces there is a scarcity of maple trees. It is true that maple sugar is excellent. In that sense the maple tree is distinctive, but that does not make the maple leaf so distinctive that we should have it as a national emblem. If we have it, of course we must respect it, and if it is embodied in our national flag I shall respect it in the same manner as every other Canadian. I am quite sure, however, we could have found, particularly if there had been a joint committee of both houses, other emblems to submit to the people and then let them decide which one they liked. I think then we would have had something very distinctive as far as Canada is concerned.

Somebody has said we are a young nation. Very well. It has been said we want a flag. That may be, but we do not want any design forced down our throats by somebody who thinks that he or she can do so. Somebody thought about a red maple leaf and said "We will get them to accept that." I do not like it.

I come from Newfoundland, and therefore I am only a young Canadian. There has been talk about old Canadians and young Canadians—I am a youngster. Many of my friends from Newfoundland are also youngsters, as far as Canada is concerned. We in Newfoundland, as you know, are practically all of English, Irish, Scottish or French descent. Whenever England got into trouble we did all we could to help out. As an example, I mention the First World War.

Many of the senators here served in the First World War; there may be one or two young enough to have served in the Second World War. Are you all in favour of throwing out the Union Jack and the Red Ensign? You men who served in the First World War and those of you who lost your sons in the Second World War and who fought to preserve what the Union Jack stood for, are you going to give up the Red Ensign and the Union Jack?

I was afraid I might become emotional, because it is an emotional subject for some of us. Every one of us who fought in any war in which Canada, Newfoundland or Great Britain was involved must have respect for the Red Ensign or for the Union Jack. Whether we are of English, Irish, Scottish, French, or of any other descent, this must be true. We fought under that flag. I fought in France side by side with Frenchmen. I saw Frenchmen die alongside our own Newfoundlanders and Englishmen. What did they die for? They died to preserve that freedom which their forefathers had won and with the loss of which they were threatened.

Are the French Canadians in this country prepared to drop the fleur-de-lis? Are they prepared to drop some connection with the mother country, and are you of English, Irish and Scottish descent prepared to drop all connection with Great Britain, alongside whose people your sons, and indeed some of your daughters, probably died in the Second World War, as did your friends and relatives in the First World War? Do you want to sever all connections? Is there nothing we can put in our flag which would make it distinctive and keep it in touch with our mother countries?

I lay this before you, honourable senators. I said I was proud to hear such excellent speeches, but tonight I am also disappointed. This is supposed to be the place where legislation is given sober, second thought. What do I find? I find that the senators on that side of the house, as well as some on this side, are making this a political issue in the Senate. This is disgusting, to my way of thinking. We should not allow the flag question to be brought into this house and to be handled here as a political issue. In my opinion it is discreditable to this honourable chamber that this should happen, and I ask you all, honourable senators, to consider what you should do with this amendment of the honourable Senator O'Leary. Is it not reasonable? Is he not asking you to do exactly what you are appointed to do, namely, to give it a little more time and to think it over? I ask you to think it over so that the people will have more respect for us.

I do not care what the percentage is for any particular flag, but I do think it would be wise of us to discard political thinking on this and vote according to our consciences, to lay before the people of Canada a sample of distinctive designs, one of which they would choose as a flag for Canada.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to delay you unduly, but today I received this telegram from Burin, where I was born. It is from the Burin branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, and reads as follows:

> Burin Branch Royal Canadian Legion expects you to use your good office to protest against the new flag.

It is signed by Gordon Cheeseman, President. I have numerous other telegrams like that from branches of the Royal Canadian Legion.

I am not protesting against the new flag, but I am arguing for giving our people in the ten provinces of Canada some time in which to think it over. Let them look at it, and let them decide.

It is my personal opinion that we should certainly retain in our flag some symbol of the two founding nations, Great Britain and France. There is nothing of that nature in this red maple leaf which, as Tennyson said, will turn to blood in the fall. I am pleading with you, honourable senators, not to vote down this amendment; do not let it be a political issue with you. We are here to give this resolution a second thought and to take a good look at it, and we should support the amendment moved by Senator O'Leary (Carleton). Let our people make the decision. If Senator O'Leary's amendment is defeated, then we shall not be giving them a chance of making a decision. We shall be saying to them: "Look, this is your flag. This is what you have got to fly over your store or place of business."

Honourable senators, wherever you look across Canada you see the maple leaf. You see it on cans and packages. You will not find the Union Jack on that sort of thing in Great Britain, and neither will you find the fleur-de-lis being used commercially in France. Yet in Canada you see the maple leaf on all sorts of goods that are sold to the people. It would be very strange indeed if one went to England and found the Union Jack on a can of beans. Something has to be done if we are to have the red maple leaf on our flag. There will have to be legislation prohibiting its use in advertising.

It is not my intention to delay this issue. I think Senator O'Leary's amendment is something that should be considered seriously, and not politically. Our people should decide upon the flag they want. In Canada there are people from almost every country in the world, and they are not being given a chance to choose their flag. They are being told: "This is your flag." It is not right for us as senators to allow this matter to go through in that way.

I am not speaking in a political sense. I do not mind what sort of flag we eventually adopt, but I would like to see whatever flag is adopted contain some device emblematic of the founding nations, France and Great Britain. However, if whatever flag is adopted is not the choice of the people of Canada, then it is not going to receive the love and the preparedness to die for it, which any flag deserves.

Our comrades gave their lives for their flag. We buried them in France and around the world because they fought for it and what it represented—justice, peace, honour and security. Let us not sever our connection with the people from whom we came. Honourable senators, I am pleading with you; do not let this be a political vote. The honour of the Senate is in your hands during the next 24 hours. Let us stand by that honour.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, I can appreciate that this is to some extent an emotional issue. We have had an example of that in the speech we have just heard from our honourable friend Senator Hollett. In fact, I am afraid he made use of some expressions which I think upon sober, second thought he will be sorry he used, because he told us the proceedings in this Senate were disgusting and discreditable. I was going to commence my remarks this evening by saying that during the whole of my 27 years of experience in this house I have never known of a debate that has been conducted on a higher plane than this.

Senator Hollett besought us not to deal with this matter in a political way, and I agree with him that we should not. All he asked us to do was to consider very seriously the amendment that stands in the name of Senator O'Leary (Carleton). I propose to do just that for the next moment or two, and in no political way whatsoever. Senator O'Leary asks for delay:

> ...to give reasonable time to the people and Parliament of Canada to reach agreement on a flag which will incorporate appropriate symbols of the founding peoples of this nation—

He and other honourable senators who have spoken have made it quite clear that what they mean by "appropriate symbols" is the Union Jack and the fleur-de-lis.

> —and which will be acceptable to all elements of our population.

There is a fundamental mistake in these two suggestions, namely, "a flag which will incorporate appropriate symbols of the founding peoples of this nation" and "which will be acceptable to all elements of our population." The reason I say that is that every single representative of French-speaking Canada that I know of has said repeatedly throughout these last six months that he has no desire whatever to have the fleur-de-lis as part of the flag of this country. So, you cannot have a flag incorporating appropriate symbols of the founding peoples which will be acceptable to all elements of the population.

So much for the people. The amendment also asks that there be reasonable time so that the Parliament of Canada can reach an agreement on an acceptable flag. Does Senator O'Leary (Carleton) or any other member of this house, or indeed anybody in this country, believe for a moment that under conditions as they exist in the House of Commons today there could possibly be agreement as to a flag, under any conceivable circumstances?

Some honourable senators who spoke this afternoon and evening made rather bitter attacks upon the behaviour of the Prime Minister in connection with this flag issue. I am not here to defend the Prime Minister, but I will say in answer to those charges—and this is the only political element that I am going to introduce into my speech—that so long as the party opposite is led by its present leader in the House of Commons we shall never have agreement on anything. That is as far as I propose to go in this respect.

An Hon. Senator: You are referring to Mr. Tommy Douglas, no doubt.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I was glad to hear Senator Hollett discussing the First Great War. We have heard one or two people tell us that they were Canadian soldiers serving under the Union Jack in two wars. He and I served in the First Great War, and I think we are members of a somewhat diminishing band. There are only a few of us who served in the First War remaining in the Senate. When anybody tells me that we in the First War served under any particular flag, I am apt to regard that statement with a certain amount of irony.

The western front, as Senator Hollett well knows, during nearly four years was a front of fixed trenches with no movement of any kind—trenches extending back two or three miles from the respective front lines—and we lived in those trenches. My honourable friend knows as well as I do that from one month's end to another we never saw a flag, and that a flag had nothing whatsoever to do with our life in the trenches. In fact, if anybody were so ill-advised in our trench warfare as to stick up a flag on the top of the trench, the only result would have been that it would have attracted the fire of the enemy artillery.

Now, as Senator Hollett knows, and as some of my honourable friends know, in the First World War—and I served a year at the front—we had no concern about flags; our interests and concerns were on a very much more personal and perhaps a lower level. We were concerned more with when the next rum ration was coming round and, even more important than that, how we were going to get rid of our lice. Perhaps I might have gone on and expatiated a little on the system we adopted to achieve that result, but I will not do that, other than to say that a flag would have been of no use for the occasion whatsoever.

The only time we ever saw a flag in the First World War was when we were sent away back to divisional headquarters or army headquarters, or to a point miles behind the front line. There perhaps one might see a pennant flying on the hood of some general's car. That was the only connection that we ever had in any way, shape or form with any flag.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: My honourable friend's experience may be different from mine, but that was mine.

To turn to another subject, this resolution is designed to change our present Canadian flag, to bring in the new maple leaf flag. As honourable senators know, our present flag is the Red Ensign, of which the most important and outstanding feature is the Union Jack in the top left quarter of the flag.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Would the honourable senator permit me to put a question? I am not too sure if it is correct to say that the Canadian Red Ensign is the Canadian flag at this time. I understand that the order in council said that this is the flag that should be flown over public buildings, but that is all.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Well, it is generally recognized for the time being as the flag that we recognize as our own. As I say, its outstanding feature is the Union Jack in the top left-hand corner. It is true that on the fly it does have, in a rather insignificant way and not very easily seen, the Canadian crest. But the important thing about it is that our present Canadian flag has its entire emphasis upon the Union Jack.

I have given a good deal of thought to what our Canadian flag ought to be. It goes without saying, I have the deepest of love and respect for the Union Jack. It symbolizes many things. Those were very well expressed by Senator Grattan O'Leary in his speech, but basically the Union Jack symbolizes something that people have forgotten about. During the weekend I happened to be reading an article in the Encyclopaedia Brittanica about flags, and I came across some rather interesting information about the Union Jack.

The first Union Jack was designed at the time when, after the death of Queen Elizabeth, James VI of Scotland, the first Stuart king, became James I of England. At that time, for the first time, the crowns of England and Scotland were united. So James I issued instructions that a new union flag was to be designed to represent the two united countries. That was done. The new union flag was a combination of the Cross of St. George, representing England, and the Cross of St. Andrew, representing Scotland. It was officially called the Union Flag, but in common everyday language it was even then referred to as the Union Jack. The reason for that is rather interesting, too. As I said, this flag was designed by order of James I. James I had the habit of signing all his official documents and orders with his name, not in English but in French. He did not sign "James": he signed "Jacques". That was why the union flag designed on his order was called the "Union Jack".

That flag, that first Union Jack, continued with a slight interruption during the time of Cromwell, until the year 1801. Here I think I have to call upon the knowledge of Irish history of my friend Senator O'Leary (Carleton). In 1801, the independent Irish parliament—which, incidentally, was called "Grattan's Parliament", was it not?—was abolished, and the Irish parliament was combined with the English parliament and the three kingdoms were combined into one. Therefore, in 1801 it became necessary to create a new flag representing the three countries. That flag was designed to include the Cross of St. George for England, the Cross of St. Andrew for Scotland and the Cross of St. Patrick for Ireland, and that is the Union Jack as we know it today.

All honourable senators know, the union of England, Scotland and Ireland no longer exists. Ireland, or at least the greater part of Ireland, has gone out of the union. The question which comes to my mind is this, what connection has the union of England, Scotland and Ireland in 1801, a union now partially dissolved, with the Canada of 1964? That is the question which strikes me as being rather basic in this whole consideration.

The position we have at the moment is that our flag, the basic design of our Canadian flag, the Union Jack, represents, you might say, the past history of less than 50 per cent of our people. I think Senator Crerar gave the figures of the population, the racial origins of Canada, in his excellent speech yesterday afternoon. As I recall them, it was 30 per cent French origin, 44 per cent Anglo Saxon origin, which included English, Scottish, Irish and Welsh, and about 26 per cent of other diverse origins of various kinds.

Honourable senators, you have to ask yourselves this question: Facing that situation, and with the Canada of today and with its population of today, in the proportions which I have mentioned, is it right for the flag of Canada to have the Union Jack as the only really important element in its composition?

I must say that, much as I love the Union Jack, I do not think that the people of English-speaking origin should monopolize our Canadian flag.

I fully agree with Senator O'Leary (Carleton). We have a wonderful history that lives on in the Union Jack; but, after all, we are going to preserve that tradition in the second part of the resolution which will come to us when the House of Commons has dealt with it. We will still be able to fly the Union Jack, or Red Ensign, whichever is decided upon, as representative of our membership in the Commonwealth and our love and affection for everything that the British tradition represents. On the other hand, I do think that we should give the most serious consideration to having a new flag of our own for use within Canada, which every element of our population will be able to look up to with an equal sense that it belongs to them all.

That is about all I can say, honourable senators. That is the reasoning that has led me to the conclusion, quite apart from any matters of political interest—and I do not stand second to Senator Hollett or anybody else, in my belief in the independence of this chamber and our right to make a completely independent choice in these important matters. I say that is what has led me to the conclusion which I want to express, in favour of the adoption of the resolution that is now before us.

(Translation):

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, I have no intention of trying to convert anybody. If I mention the fact, it is because the senator for Winnipeg South (Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson) took Senator Lambert to task a while ago for apparently having changed his mind in the last twenty years. Do not imagine that I shall try to change the mind of those who do not have my opinion. However, I do want to say how glad I am to see the present debate taking place in such an atmosphere of serenity.

Most flags came out of a revolution or a coup d'état, where a dictator takes over, but very few countries proceeded as democratically as our Government has. That is what a people living under a true democratic system—as ours does—can do—

Since this debate started in the Senate, it seems to me that we are dealing with this matter in a true democratic manner. I found one or two speeches deplorable, however, because they contained some unfortunate remarks about the Province of Quebec. Eventually, those people will no doubt, on second thought, be sorry for having said such things.

After the speech of our leader, senator Connolly, there is no need to review the history of our country since confederation. He did so with a great deal of appropriateness and eloquence.

At every international conference that I attended, I have always been embarrassed to note that our country was the only one without a distinctive flag, while the smallest nations represented were proud to display theirs.

It will be argued that we have had the red ensign for some time. But we know its history, and the difficulties it went through since Confederation, but we cannot say that it is truly a national flag, it is the flag of our navy.

At the time of Confederation, England refused to give us the right to have our own distinctive flag; consequently, the red ensign was proposed by Sir John A. Macdonald as second best.

At first, it was tolerated, but later on the permission was withdrawn. There was even a day in South America when diplomats were in an uproar because certain countries objected to our flying this merchant marine flag.

Some suggest that the adoption of the proposed flag will divide the nation. I rather think that speeches delivered in certain quarters and that certain press reports will promote the division of our nation far more than would a flag. Quite the contrary, a Canadian distinctive flag will unite the whole nation. It is obvious that unanimity can never be reached on a flag design, but once we adopt this flag, such unanimity will be achieved gradually, and in a few years everyone will be glad to fly the new distinctive Canadian flag which will be a rallying sign and a symbol of loyalty towards our country.

Some accuse us of ignoring our ancestors because the Union Jack and the fleur-de-lis do not appear on our flag. We are even called ingrates. The fact that I do not wear a necktie which my grandfather or my father wore, does not mean that I do not appreciate my ancestors. Similarly, when our children are leaving us, it does not mean that they do not love or appreciate us any longer because they establish a home and live as they wish and not as people lived 25 or 50 years ago. They are not ungrateful because of that.

As a symbol to represent our country, is there anything better than the maple leaf? As far as I am concerned, I have personal feelings about this whole matter of the maple leaf, and you realize why. To me, it is a symbol, it is the image of the strong and powerful tree rising straight up to the sky with its roots digging deep into the ground. The maple resists every storm and can live hundreds of years. Is that not a symbol of vigour and strength aptly representing a nation that wants to be strong and vigorous? When looking at that tree, you find an inspiration of greatness, beauty, pride and nobility. Could there be a finer symbol than that maple leaf? Some people say that the maple leaf was selected to please the province of Quebec. If that were the case, they would have selected the sugar maple leaf—acer saccharum—but they preferred to select the red maple—acer rubrum—which is found just about everywhere in all Canadian provinces, and not only in the province of Quebec.

I should like, at this point, to volunteer information on the colour of the maple leaf. When fall comes and the leaves fall, the red maple leaf grows a deeper red, while the leaf of the maple sugar tree—the acer saccharum—becomes yellow, not red.

To leave out the Union Jack or the fleur-de-lys from a distinctive flag does not mean that we forget our ancestors or that we disown them; on the contrary, we are proud of them.

Still, it does not suffice to say that we are proud of our forbears; let us also be proud fathers of our sons, for tomorrow. That is how we will develop this country of ours, that we will grow, that we will prosper.

If I were allowed to do so, I would ask every Canadian to rally around that symbol so that it may be truly ours. One must realize that since the treaty of Westminster we are a free country, master of our destiny. Canada not only has the right to appoint commissioners but ambassadors also to other countries and to sign treaties and enter into trade agreements and other treaties with all the countries of the world. Therefore, we are an adult country and we must act like adults.

May that single maple leaf flag fly over our buildings and may we say proudly and sincerely when looking at it: "O Canada, mon pays, mes amours."

HON. C. G. POWER, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON FORTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY IN PARLIAMENT

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, every once in a while we have occasion to pause and to say something that we are all particularly anxious to concur in. On this occasion, it is especially easy for all of us to give our concurrence.

On December 17, 1917, Charles Gavan Power was first elected to the House of Commons. He was re-elected in 1921, 1925, 1926, 1930, 1935, 1940, 1945, 1949 and 1953. He was appointed to the Privy Council in the year 1935. He was, in turn, Minister of Pensions and National Health, Postmaster General, and Minister of National Defence for Air during World War II. He was appointed to the Senate on July 28, 1955.

I do not suppose there is, or ever has been, a man on Parliament Hill as well liked or admired more than "Chubby" Power. If Parliament is an institution, he is one of the bulwarks that has made it the kind of institution it is, because he too in the public life of our country is the kind of institution I think all of us would like to be. This is the kind of career he has had.

From the personal point of view, of course, all of us have deep and abiding affection for Senator Power. Perhaps I speak with too much emotion, but in everything I have said I know you all feel as I do, some perhaps more deeply than I.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, as I came into the chamber a few minutes ago the honourable Leader of the Government acquainted me with the fact that today is the anniversary of the long period of time our colleague Senator Power has served the public as a member of Parliament and as a senator. I entirely endorse what the leader has said.

I remember my first introduction to Senator Power. It was when I entered Parliament as a member in 1936, and Senator Power had been chosen then as a minister in the Mackenzie King cabinet. In the first caucus our party held Mr. Bennett, our leader, was reviewing the ability and standing of the members of Mr. King's cabinet. I might say he was not altogether complimentary to most of them. However, when he came to Senator Power—"Chubby," as he was then called—he said, "In my opinion, 'Chubby' Power has more brains than any other man in the King Government."

I followed his career in the House of Commons. I admired him as a Minister of Veterans Affairs for the wonderful work he did for the veterans, and I admired him for his work in assisting to organize the air force in the Second World War. I may add that when I was Minister of Veterans Affairs, no matter where I went across Canada visiting veterans' hospitals, one of the questions I was always prepared to answer, because I knew it would be asked, was, "How is 'Chubby' Power?" Because of his great human qualities, he gained the affection of the veterans.

It is a pleasure for me to join the Leader of the Government in paying this tribute to a very deserving colleague.

Hon. C. G. Power: Honourable senators, the speech I am about to make has been made quite a few times. These anniversaries have this advantage for me, but they may become somewhat of a nuisance to you because I am called upon to impose a speech upon you about once a year when the house is sitting at this particular time.

The speech is nearly always the same, but occasionally new things come up. For example, yesterday I received a Christmas card and a note with it saying, "In two and a quarter years you and Mackenzie Bowell will have filled a complete century in Canadian public life." Now, I am not quite sure whether that was intended as a compliment or not, or whether it was intended to be a mention of that union between orange and green, of which we heard a short time ago.

On reflection, I began to think that Mackenzie Bowell may have been lucky, although in many respects the fact that he sought and obtained high public office was not of great advantage to him because when he reached the high places, which were the aim and object of his ambition, all he found there was a nest of traitors.

I also began to recall a bit of the past as I listened to that eloquent speech of my good friend, Senator Grattan O'Leary. It occurred to me, in looking back over the past, that among all his other great efforts in Canadian politics and public affairs he had almost made me immortal by reciting in extenso before a Conservative convention a speech I had made at a Liberal convention. I was not invited to the convention that he attended, but listening to his voice over the radio the thought occurred to me that if he had made that speech in my place—that is to say, had the words been by Power and the music by O'Leary—the result might have been somewhat different. He might have reached the top, and then what a mess we would have been in.

It is true, it would not have been the first time that the Liberals had had a Tory leader, but never would it have been so obvious a case of the right man in the wrong place.

These things are bound to occur to us as we listen to debates. The present debate, which is quite a serious one, reminds me of many of the same kind that have occurred in the past. As I listened to my honourable friend sitting behind me, Senator Gouin, I remembered that many years ago there was a motion on the Order Paper of the Legislature of Quebec calling for Quebec to get out of Confederation if the rest of Canada did not want to remain in. I remember that that motion was laid on the table by a very prominent man, the Honourable Joseph Francœur, who was afterwards Minister of Public Works in the Taschereau Government, and later a member of the House of Commons of Canada and a judge of the Court of Appeals. That motion was squelched and rejected after a brilliant speech by the father of my honourable friend, Senator Gouin. So, there is nothing much new under the sun.

The same thing occurs time and again as we go through life. Crises, difficulties, factions, and strong divisions, all appear to be healed as time goes on. As one looks back, one is impressed more and more by the unanimity of willingness to agree to give fair play and to listen fairly and decently to those on opposite sides of politics. Politics is not a bad game, I repeat—and I shall repeat it many times. Politicians are not all damned scoundrels. Some of the finest people in the world have been in political life.

As I look back over the 47 years I have been in politics, and to the time a little before that when I was interested in politics, I find there is much to be grateful for. There is much to be thankful for. One of the principal things is the good will and unanimity of good will among people who take part in public affairs.

I thank you, my friends.

CANADA PENSION PLAN BILL

SECOND REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson, Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons appointed to consider Bill C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors, presented the second report of the committee:

> Your committee recommends that its quorum be further reduced to ten members for the time during which the Senate shall recess, provided that both houses are represented.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be considered now.

Report adopted.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON AGING

INTERIM REPORT

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I have a short report to make.

The Special Committee on Aging, appointed by the Senate on July 29, 1963, has now completed the second stage of its investigation.

The first stage, which continued throughout the fall of 1963, was essentially one of exploration and planning. During this period attention was devoted to examining the problem of aging in its various aspects, to determining the aims and limits of the inquiry, and to establishing contacts with governmental and other bodies in a position to be of assistance.

The second stage was that of public hearings which began in February last and were concluded on December 10 of this year. While the committee from the outset recognized the important contribution which these hearings might be expected to make, it was not prepared for the widespread response its invitation would evoke, nor for the trouble and expense to which interested parties would be willing to go in order to share their experience and concern with us.

In total, 71 submissions were received, which far exceeded our expectation. It might also be observed, as an indication of the spread of interest, that presentations were made to the committee by six departments and agencies of the federal Government and by all provinces except Ontario, which has since launched a wide inquiry of its own; and further, that the 50 voluntary organizations and groups of older people, which appeared or sent in briefs, are situated in different parts of the country and represent not only the fields of health and welfare, but such varied interests as religion, education, business and labour.

What the Senate committee has accomplished in the brief period of its existence must by any reasonable standard be regarded as impressive. It has assembled a body of fact and opinion about the situation of older people on a scale never before attempted in Canada, and its printed evidence, running to some 2,000 pages, will undoubtedly serve as a source of information on the subject for many years to come. Also, the very nature of its inquiry, involving as it has the co-operation of governments at all levels and a wide variety of citizen organizations, has served to direct public attention to the problem of aging and in some instances has already stimulated constructive action.

The committee has now entered the third stage of its inquiry, which is that of sifting the evidence received and preparing its final report. How long this stage will take, it is difficult to estimate. I would remind you that the Ontario Legislature Select Committee on Aging considers three years the minimum time necessary to bring its work to a conclusion, and that a committee appointed by the Saskatchewan Government in 1960 took more than three years to complete a similar study.

Our study is now completed. We began in October 1963 and concluded in December 1964—a little over a year.

The genuine interest of the committee members is attested by their faithful attendance, often at great inconvenience and during periods when the Senate was not in session. The over-all attendance was excellent.

The members brought to the subject not only their interest but both breadth and depth of knowledge and experience. The committee membership included doctors, lawyers, farmers, housewives and businessmen. They were drawn from all ten provinces and were well acquainted with rural as well as urban life.

The Deputy Chairman, the Honourable J. Campbell Haig, and I wish particularly to thank the Steering Committee, made up of Senator Quart, Senator Fergusson and Senator Lefrançois. They were always available to us and their co-operation was forthcoming.

Your committee will continue to push forward with all possible speed, but it would be a mistake to minimize the considerable distance we have yet to go before a carefully considered report can be submitted to this house.

PRIVILEGE

CANADIAN FLAG DEBATE—WITHDRAWAL OF REMARKS

Hon. David J. Walker: Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, may I rise on a question of privilege.

In the heat of the debate the other day I made some remarks about the honourable Senator Roebuck. I was surprised afterwards to read the report of my remarks, and I would ask permission of the house to withdraw those remarks and to express my regret to the honourable senator for any pain those remarks may have caused him. After all, I must not forget that I am not in the other place, where I used to love the cut and thrust of debate. This is the house of sober second thought. Also, as Senator Power has said, it is the house of good will, and this is the season for good will. I trust you will grant this request.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, has the honourable senator leave to withdraw the words mentioned?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR DESIGNATION OF NATIONAL EMBLEM—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton), in amendment to the motion of the honurable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West):

> That this house do recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to have designated as the National Flag of Canada a red flag of the proportions two by length and one by width, containing in its centre a white square, the width of the flag bearing a single maple leaf, or in heraldic terms, described as gules on a Canadian pale argent a maple leaf of the first.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, my first words are congratulations to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), on the fine and appropriate manner in which he introduced this motion. The Canadian historical background he gave and presented was both interesting and instructive.

I would also like to offer my congratulations to my colleague, Senator O'Leary (Carleton), for his magnificent speech. While like him, I also can claim Irish ancestry, I readily admit that I can never match his eloquence or Irish wit.

Various honourable senators have mentioned that this is an emotional debate. True, any debate on the flag is emotional, because any discussion on the flag reminds one of loyalties, honour, duty, traditions, liberty, freedom, wars, celebrations, and, most of all, home.

It may be true that Members of Parliament are the ones who eventually will decide the shape, colour and design of the Canadian flag. However, whether it may be an entirely new flag, rather than the present Red Ensign, or a combination of the present flag with certain changes and additions, Members of Parliament are not the real flagmakers. The people of Canada alone are the real flagmakers. They are the mothers who maintain our Canadian homes; the teachers who mould the minds of the youth of the nation; the men and women in industry, who day by day operate and maintain the machines of industry; they are the farmers, the miners, the foresters, the fishermen and others, who produce wealth from our natural resources. Most important of all, the real flagmakers are the hundreds of thousands of Canadian veterans, both men and women, who in two world wars wrote the name of Canada in flaming capital letters for all the world to see. All these have contributed in their own way to make the flag we have today and what it stands for.

Our flag is still the Red Ensign, and to many it is a distinctive flag. Upon the field of red is the shield of the Canadian Coat of Arms. The emblems on the shield all date back to very ancient times.

For England, there are three gold lions on a red field. The lion came from France and was the emblem on the flag of William of Normany, and ever since 1066 has been incorporated in the heraldry of the British kings. For Scotland, a red lion rampant on the golden field is even more ancient. It was the emblem of the Scottish kings and came to them from ancient Ireland, where it had arrived from the east in about 580 B.C. But it was also the family emblem of Brutus the Trojan, who founded the City of London in about 1100 B.C. For Ireland, there is a gold harp on a purple field. This emblem is equally ancient. For France, there are three golden fleurs-de-lis on a purple field. This emblem held a proud place in the Arms of the British kings from the time of Henry II to George III, proclaiming the French ancestry of the sovereign. There is also a sprig of three maple leaves.

Thus, we can readily see and understand that these emblems represent the early pioneers who were instrumental in laying the foundation of this great country—English, Welsh, Scottish, French and Irish, all branches of one great race, who coming together in Canada have built a nation of which we may all well be proud.

This shield on the flag, therefore, while essentially new, since it represents a young nation, has its roots firmly in the past, and speaks of the very beginnings of our race.

Our flag also has incorporated in it the Union Jack. This emblem denotes our membership in the Commonwealth.

Some resent the Union Jack, because they believe it represents only England. This is not correct, since England's own particular flag is the Cross of St. George, just as Scotland's is the Cross of St. Andrew.

How can anyone argue that any flag of Canada should not have incorporated into its design some emblem or insignia which denotes our past as far as the two founding peoples of Canada are concerned?

Last night, Senator Hugessen gave some brief historical notes of the origin of the Union Jack, of how the first Jack had the Cross of St. George, and later the Cross of St. Andrew. For my part, I was more interested in his all too brief remarks as to how and when the Cross of St. Patrick was added to the Jack. History records that it was about the year 1690 that the diagonal red cross on a white field became known and recognized as the fighting flag of Ireland. This flag had been used in Ireland for many years prior to 1690, but it has been more or less accepted that the year 1690 denotes the date when it was accepted and used as a national emblem. Thus Ireland had a national emblem well over a century before the Cross of St. Patrick was added to the English and Scottish Jack in 1801. Thus the present Union Jack, this emblem of the crossed crosses, is of great significance because it has been the sign of our ancestors from far-distant ages.

We regard Canada as a Christian country. For this reason the Union Jack has an added appeal, because it enshrines the upright cross, the emblem of our Lord's death at Calvary. Personally, I want the Union Jack on our flag because it has the Cross of St. Patrick, which represents Ireland, the home of my ancestors, who came to Canada long before the Cross of St. Patrick was added to the Jack in the year 1801. The Union Jack in our flag indicates that a very large number of Canadian citizens trace their ancestry from the British Isles.

Every one of us has great respect for the past. In your own family you prize and treasure family heirlooms of yesterday, pictures, furniture, jewellery, silver, glass, certain types of clothing, the family home or farm. In business, the older the firm the deeper the pride. The number of years that the family name has been carried on, or the family business or firm—who can deny it? We all take pride in our past. The same applies to one's school, or the "old school tie."

True, Canada is a fairly young country, but over the years we have slowly acquired certain achievements, backgrounds, history and traditions. We have our loyalties, our priceless heritage from the lands of our ancestors. Honourable senators, traditions form the backbone of any nation.

We have today in Canada a Commission on Biculturalism and Bilingualism, investigating and attempting to save and preserve the two cultures of the founding races of Canada. How strange, then, that in the designing and creating of a new flag, apparently no attention, and scant respect, if any, has been paid to the historical background loyalties and the great heritage, traditions and customs of the founding races in Canada.

In Canada, unfortunately, there has always been a body of people who want to tear down and destroy the past. They have no pride, no respect, and care nothing for loyalties, our heritage, traditions, customs or historical background. Their sole aim is to discard and throw out the window all our past, and to buy a 1964 model.

Honourable senators, today is a very good time to pause, to pause well, and take a good look at the past, to review our mistakes and errors of yesterday, and to make sure we will not make the same mistakes tomorrow.

Speaking for myself, while I greatly admire the Red Ensign, I am not committed to it as the only suitable flag for Canada. I am satisfied to accept any flag which will have incorporated in its design appropriate symbols representing the founding peoples of Canada. The flag I suggest is the one that was chosen by the committee in 1946, a red flag with the Union Jack and fleur-de-lis in the upper two corners, and in the centre a golden maple leaf. In my opinion, such a flag and such a design will satisfy a very large body of Canadians. It will satisfy a much larger body of Canadians than the present proposed design passed by the House of Commons. Do not let us deceive ourselves that the proposed flag, while it may be approved by the House of Commons and this chamber, will ever be accepted by tens of thousands of Canadians. This flag has become a political issue. It is being forced and rammed down the throats of Canadians who will never forget the manner in which it is being done.

A new flag will not be accepted by various veterans' organizations. The Canadian Legion, in its brief to the Canadian cabinet, presented on Armistice Day of this year, had this to say at page 13:

> We again bring to your attention the following resolution adopted at our convention with respect to the National Flag:
> "Be it resolved, that the delegates to this, the 20th Biennial Convention of the Royal Canadian Legion, assembled at Winnipeg 17th-22nd May, 1964, reiterate the stand taken by the delegates of our 18th and 19th Biennial Conventions that we urge the Government of Canada to, by act of Parliament, adopt the Canadian Red Ensign as the national flag of Canada . . . "

All honourable senators received a copy of a brief from the Canadian Corps Association, dated June 8, 1964, a copy of which I hold in my hand. This brief indicates, in no uncertain terms, the support of this veterans' organization for the Red Ensign.

Speaking to his men one day, one of the heroes of the Crimean War defined the flag as follows:

> The Flag—It's the Homeland—It's Pride—It's Safety—It's Glory—And it's Memories.

These words sum up in a very adequate manner what our flag inspires in us—the ideals of honour, liberty and home. It recalls, at least indirectly, the duties it imposes. The flag is well nigh an animated being. When it is unfurled before troops it is rendered distinguished acclaim, the drums roll, the bugle sounds, the band plays, the officers salute with their swords, the rank and file present arms, and the citizen bares his head in respect. Honour always stands high in the army, and it was to this sentiment of honour that Napoleon often appealed in his immortal proclamations to the army, such as that celebrated message to the army of Egypt, in which he said:

> Soldiers, forty centuries look down upon you from the heights of yonder pyramid.

One can readily understand why veterans of two world wars and Korea wish to retain the Red Ensign, or at least part of it, in any new flag. As I mentioned, the flag plays a large part in any military operation. Certainly, in World War I the flag was not in the trenches, but it was in France. Last night Senator Hugessen mentioned that fact, and I agree with him. In his remarks he immediately identified himself as an old soldier when he mentioned the rum ration and other things. He could easily have gone on to mention some of the other rights of the soldier, who was always interested, in addition to rum, in more rations, the right to salvage, the right to grouse and above all, the right to damn the sergeant-major.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. White: Any soldier who was on the Somme, or at Passchendaele, Vimy Ridge or Amiens, or at any other engagement, will readily understand and appreciate the life the soldier lived in the trenches. Certainly, there were no flags; but, as I said before, the flag was in France.

Any soldier who was in France will know what I mean when I mention the green envelopes. Our letters from France were censored, but once every week or two each soldier was issued one green envelope, and the letter that was placed in that envelope could be sealed and was not read by the censor. These green envelopes were much cherished, and I am sure Senator Hugessen will agree with me when I say that they had some value on the market.

Old soldiers will also recall the type of writing paper we used. At least one particular type was a rather small sheet of brownish-coloured paper of rather poor quality, and in the upper left-hand corner there was the Red Ensign.

If you will look at the first painting on the walls of this Senate chamber, which depicts the landing of the Canadians in the First World War at St. Nazaire, France, you will notice a large red flag in the stern of one of the ships. While it is difficult to make out all the details, it looks very much like the Red Ensign.

Reference was made yesterday and the day before to the graves of Canadian soldiers around the world. I have visited many of these cemeteries; they are all very beautiful and are a credit to Canada. Like other soldiers, I have helped to bury young Canadian soldiers who did not have the dignity of being buried in a coffin or at a funeral service. Like other soldiers, on occasion behind the lines I have taken part in that sad ritual when one of your comrades was given a burial with at least some dignity. There, a young Canadian soldier, wrapped in a service blanket, was placed in a rough, home-made box, and covering that box was a flag. I have seen both the Union Jack and Red Ensign used on such occasions.

In those days we were all very young. You stood there in silence. Outwardly, but silently, you cursed war and all its tragedies, but inside you wept, for that is the only way one retained his sanity. There we buried a young Canadian, and with him all the hopes, ambitions and dreams of youth. In that far-off land we covered with earth our chum, our friend, our comrade, and, to paraphrase what Rupert Brooke wrote, in some corner of a foreign field there is a spot that is forever Canada.

The press has said that any reference by veterans to the flag has no connection with the issue and should not be mentioned in this debate, that it is only sentiment, and mawkish sentiment at that. Of course, I realize and appreciate there are some Canadians who think little of, or care little for, the welfare of veterans or what the veterans did for the world and Canada in two world wars and in Korea. How can anyone expect these veterans—the blind, the paraplegics, the amputees, the veterans of Hong Kong—to forget the past? Their flag was the Red Ensign, and their flag is going out the window within the next few days. This flag formed part of their lives, and they can never forget it. That is why they wish to retain their Red Ensign, or a new flag that incorporates some appropriate symbol of the Union Jack.

In hundreds of churches of every denomination across this country you will find a shrine of some type with a plaque or tablet. On this plaque are inscribed the names of the boys and girls from that community and vicinity who served in the wars, with a special designation for those who did not come back; and hanging over this plaque or at the side of the plaque, what do you find? You find our flag, the Red Ensign. Does anyone expect that these flags are going to be removed, or replaced within the next few years, or at any time in the future, by what is called a distinctive Canadian flag which has only a single maple leaf? If anyone thinks they are going to be replaced, just ask the parents and the brothers or the sisters of the boys whose names appear on these honour rolls.

We are told that this flag will unite the people of Canada. In my opinion there has never been in a hundred years of Canadian history any act of Parliament more likely to create more confusion, dissatisfaction and disunity than the so-called new flag and the manner in which it is being brought in. Many of you will not agree with that statement, but it is true.

The amendment moved by Senator O'Leary (Carleton) gives us the opportunity even at this late date to prevent this tragedy to Canadian unity. Honourable senators, I suggest that you take a long, hard look at what you are doing before you vote against this amendment, and that you take a still longer and harder look before you vote for the main motion. Everyone who votes for this motion will have to take his share of the responsibility for the disunity this new flag is going to create in Canada.

Before sitting down I wish to refer to the remarks made by honourable Senator Pouliot when he spoke in this house on December 15 as reported at page 1193 of Hansard.

> When you speak of soldiers, we can speak of soldiers. We can speak of the Legion. Who is heading the Legion? It is mostly Imperials.

And later in the same speech he said:

> The leaders of the Legion do not represent the sentiments of the members of the rank and file of the army, navy and air force, any more than the leaders of labour unions represent the feelings of the members of their unions.

I would say to the honourable senator that the Canadian Legion is not controlled by Imperials. If you look at the contents page of The Legionary you will see there a long list of the officers of the Canadian Legion. Looking over that list every honourable senator will recognize some of them: they represent leading Canadian citizens in both the business and professional world. In my view it is entirely wrong for the honourable senator to make the statement that the leaders of the Legion do not represent the sentiments of the rank and file of the Legion. The Legion in Ontario is operated and conducted in a most democratic manner, and to me it is most unfortunate and regrettable that a Canadian senator should make such remarks about the Canadian veteran organization which has such an outstanding and distinguished record. There are over 2,000 Legion branches across Canada, and I am quite familiar with the manner in which the Legion branches operate in Ontario. I am satisfied that the great majority of Canadians are well aware of the record of the individual branches. They know and appreciate the work done by the Legion branches in the community.

At this season of the year many families will have a much happier Christmas because of the Canadian Legion. It leads in sponsoring and providing facilities for sports for young Canadians. It creates and donates sports fields, provides equipment and operates rinks, ball parks, and tennis courts. It gives scholarships. It provides braces, spectacles and other medical equipment for children. In fact the list of achievements to the credit of the Legion and the Ladies Auxiliary of the Legion is almost endless.

No doubt the stand of the Legion on the Red Ensign has displeased the honourable senator, but I would ask, who in Canada has a better right to express their views on what should be the flag of the nation and what emblems should be incorporated thereon? Who has a better right than the Canadian veteran, and who has paid a higher price for that right?

I have always been proud to be associated with the Legion in my small village. It is a fraternity of army, navy and air force veterans and it is the finest fraternity in the world. Class, creed or colour make no difference. They are all bound together by their service to Canada and the Canadian flag. Their motto is that the Red Ensign is Canada's flag and that they intend to keep it flying.

It is my intention to support the amendment moved by Senator O'Leary, and if the amendment is debated, I intend to vote against the main motion.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: I did not want to interrupt the honourable gentleman, who made an eloquent speech, but I wonder if I could ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. White: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

What does he think of the suggestion made by Honourable Leslie Frost, the former Premier of Ontario, that we should accept the maple leaf as the national Canadian flag?

Hon. Mr. White: The Honourable Leslie Frost is entitled to his opinion, as is every other Canadian. I cannot speak for him.

Hon. Frank C. Welch: Honourable senators, coming as I do from one of the Atlantic provinces where the Canadian Red Ensign still proudly waves, I would hang my head in shame if I willingly accepted this new flag that will be known in a few days as the flag that was forced on the people of Canada—the people of Canada who did not have a chance to speak.

While I am very sad, and feel our Government is taking our beautiful flag from us and giving us a maple leaf in return, my main concern now is the disunity that it is causing from east to west and north to south in our nation. In fact, the Government has made so many blunders and has caused so much havoc that other countries are taking a dim view of Canada today. It is my belief, and this belief is shared by millions, that unless the Government gets down to business soon, Canada will be the laughing-stock of the world. They say that Diefenbaker obstructed. This is nonsense. That is what the Opposition is supposed to do, provided they are not satisfied that the legislation is right for the country.

Honourable senators, if you think this country is not being divided let me read to you an article which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle Herald dated December 16. It reads as follows:

> Royal Tour Controversy > Made Miss Canada "Most > Unpopular Contestant"

> St. John's, Nfld. (CP)—Mary Lou Farrell of St. John's, Miss Dominion of Canada for 1964, says she was the most unpopular contestant in the Miss World contest in London in November because of controversy over the Queen's visit to Canada.
> Miss Farrell said she was shunned by the press and photographers excluded her from pictures. "They would pick out so many girls to pose," she said.
>
> "When I told them I was Miss Canada, they would take me out and put another girl in." She said one reporter told her he was leaving her out because "you didn't want our Queen in your country."
> Miss Farrell was eliminated in the first round of the contest in London...

The issue of a distinctive Canadian flag has raged for a considerable period of time. Yet, despite the duration of the debate, the technical manoeuvring, and the behind-the-scenes play, we are in essence far from having found a sensible solution.

The length and nature of the debate indicates that we in Ottawa have not managed to agree on what flag shall fly over Canada. More important, the lines of disagreement represent the pleasure—or in most cases the displeasure—of our many constituencies. Many organizations and groups have expressed their views as well, and opinion is once again divided. Over the long period of debate, much ill will and hard feeling have been created. The lines of argument have emerged very clearly and, rather than accomplishing a "meeting of minds," the debate has only redefined positions and stands, and forced both sides to solidify their viewpoints.

Looking over the situation does not leave a very desirable picture of what has been accomplished. The House of Commons is divided. Our own body, the Senate, is divided. The feeling in the provinces is divided. Ethnic groups are divided. Various sectors of the country are divided. Indeed, Canadians are divided over the flag issue. I suggest this leaves only one step away from having Canada divided.

This is the doing of our Liberal Government. They are the ones who have forced this flag issue on to the floor of the house. They are responsible for retarding the nation's business while they retreated to search for another design. They are the ones who have resorted to closure to force the issue to an unnatural conclusion, and force a flag of their choice on the people of Canada. Force, force, force—this is what the Government of our nation has resorted to in order to have their ideas and their wishes come into effect.

Well, we have witnessed the first sterling example of their success. They have brought this issue into debate because the Prime Minister and his colleagues were sure this would be the salvation of Canadian unity. They forced it through in the name of promoting unity for the nation. They have stuck to their ideas in spite of all opposition, and now we see the result. Unity? No, far from that; not unity, but division. There is division where there was none before; division where serious lines of split were already evident; division where it can least be tolerated. That is the result of gifted Liberal forethought. This is the type of "brainwave" that we do not need in Canada, particularly at this important point of time.

Why should this issue become so firmly resolved in the minds of the leaders of the present regime? The consequences of the flag proposal were visible long ago. Yet, in spite of the wishes of many Canadians, the flag was pushed and pushed. I fail to understand why the wishes of so many Canadians are being disregarded only to save the face of the Government, when they must surely have recognized that they have bungled the whole affair. Rather than coming out and openly admitting this, however, the Government is bent on maintaining that this shall be Canada's national flag, and the wishes of the electors must be disregarded.

It is within the realm of the possible that some day future generations might consider some design other than the Red Ensign to be the national symbol. At such time the idea might meet with favour. At the present time, however, and this is what must concern us, the overwhelming majority do not desire such a change. Surely, if a flag is to meet the requirements of representing the Canadian nation, it cannot merely be accepted by some Canadians. If this becomes the case, then the undercurrent of opinion will continue to clamour for another change in design in a few months or a few years. That, indeed, would be a sorry state.

What is of even more concern to me is the effect all of this is having on our national image. In the past, Canada has been considered as a young, yet responsible nation, capable of voicing an opinion of some merit on the international scene, and being viewed as a nation with a stable and responsible political tradition and governed by rational individuals. Recently, I have been shocked by the expressions of opinions which I have heard from people abroad. Our image is crumbling. We are viewed as unstable and irresponsible. We are being recognized as another young colonial country "feeling the oats" of nationalism and all the inherent flamboyancy which is bound up in such feelings.

Many people are convinced that Canada as a nation is breaking up and can no longer be relied upon. This thing has gone so far that it is virtually impossible to convince people that we are not in the same category as the newly emerging states with their insecurity. But I must admit our present Government is doing nothing to alleviate the tarnish on our image. Indeed, they are merely contributing to the erroneous impressions already held.

I am embarrassed, when asked what we in responsible positions are doing to close the growing breach within our boundaries, to tell people, "We are bringing in a new distinctively Canadian flag to heal the wound." It certainly makes people wonder. "If a new flag would cure all, then the problem could not have been very serious," they say. But I have to tell them that the problem is serious and the flag will not be our salvation because, in the first place, it deals only with reflection of the problem and not the problem itself, and, secondly, many thousands of Canadians do not want this Liberal banner anyway.

While I believe that a rational, intelligent Government would bring in constructive measures of assistance to help Canada regain her unity, her identity, and her place on the international scene, I have found it is folly to try to convince people of this after mentioning our flag fiasco.

I suggest that it is time our Liberal friends allowed other hands to direct the nation's business. We cannot afford much more Liberal rule. They are capable of doing more damage in the space of a few months than good government can correct in years. Before matters go too far and are beyond saving, we must allow good government to have that chance. I am hopeful that day is not too far hence. In fact, the calling for closure might be the last will and testament of our Liberal friends. Perhaps their realization of what the future holds for them has given them cause to think that we need a memento of their term in office. I should think we have all the mementoes we want or need without having to bear the brand of their chosen flag all our days.

In the light of recent disclosures regarding both members and aides and the incompetent way in which they manage both personal and departmental affairs, I submit that it is indeed a miracle that the country manages to survive at all. The Prime Minister's time would have been better spent trying to put his own house in order and giving it a thorough "housecleaning" than in trying to devise flag designs and scheming to perpetrate ways in which to have his will imposed on the nation.

Many thousands of Canadians will continue to fly the Canadian Red Ensign proudly and happily, and would be pleased to see it wave over a strong unified country, governed by mature and trustworthy individuals who seek to bring all Canadians together for a better Canada both at home and abroad.

Honourable senators, I support the amendment before the house.

(Translation):

Hon. Sarto Fournier: Honourable senators, in the history of all nations, one can see periods of hesitation. We have the impression that is somewhat what is happening now in our country. We have witnessed, as Canadians, a very lengthy debate in Parliament, more exactly in the House of Commons, about the proposal made by the government of Canada to create a Canadian emblem, an exclusively Canadian flag.

The debate was rather prolonged and reading the newspapers and listening to the news, we noticed a lack of forbearance at times. In my opinion, that kind of debate is normal. We are, in fact, on the verge of taking a decision that will certainly have an influence on our country's future. We are under the impression that Canada is on the point of making a fresh start, even though the matter now under discussion is not new.

As far as I know, there has been some talk of giving our country an entirely and exclusively Canadian flag for at least the past thirty years. There is no doubt that such an important decision deserved to be thoroughly considered and should be discussed at length.

Since the decision we are going to make will surely have a great influence on the general attitude of the Canadian people, not only for a number of years, but for centuries to come, I feel, honourable senators, that we are considering now a very serious matter and that we have to settle a more important point than those brought before this house in the past century.

Therefore, I consider it as a great privilege and an exclusive honour to be personally and directly involved in the discussion and to take part in the final vote which will take place in the end.

From the events which we have witnessed since last spring concerning the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag emerges a fact which, in my opinion, should not go unrecorded.

In our country, a continual phemonenon has been recorded in the history of humanity. Since the beginning of time—to use a known expression—there have always been two schools of thought, those who ponder for a long time, and those who are always ready for action. More precisely, there are those who are devoted to the past, who feel bound to it, who remain prisoners of the things they have seen, known and experienced in their youth. There are also those, always the same ones, who could like to discard the past and look to the future and who reflect on the present, the events of the day, in view of the future and not in view of the past.

The past has seen the quarrel of the Ancients and the Moderns. Every civilized nation went through that—Greeks, Romans, Latins—and we are going through it nowadays.

Some people are conservative by nature, others are liberal. Some people cling to traditions, others favour progress and development. In all fairness, I must say that those two schools of thought are justified. One reflects experience, the other the risk.

Obviously, it is due to the existence of those two schools, from the beginning of time, that we have witnessed progress because, fortunately, the liberal school has always been stronger than the conservative school. If there were only one school, inertia would settle and, consequently, there would be no stimulus, therefore no progress. As a matter of fact, supporters of the liberal school would gladly live under anarchy while those of the conservative school, being traditionalists, would continue to live the way they were born. There would be no progress, no development, nothing would happen. Since the beginning of the debate on a Canadian flag, an exclusively Canadian flag, we have had two leaders, two masters who played a leading part. The traditional school was very ably represented by Senator O'Leary, and the Liberal school was represented very adequately by the honourable Leader of the Government, Senator Connolly.

The honourable Senator O'Leary spoke with a warmth and eloquence which led us to believe that he did not belong to his school, but rather to ours. I have noted that every time a senator stood up to take the floor after him, he always had a word of appreciation and admiration about the approach of Senator O'Leary. I would add that I regret not being able to present my case as warmly, elegantly and eloquently as Senator O'Leary did.

Moreover, it was a great comfort for me to hear the speech of the honourable Leader of the Government, Senator Connolly. Perfectly at ease, he lived up to his reputation. Indeed, we saw that Senator Connolly can deal with an equal mastery with history as well as economy. There is especially a point that I am pleased to stress, namely, his tact in summing up this development of the Canadian policy, especially since Confederation. He also mentioned some important milestones in our history since the first world war.

I wish to pay tribute to each one of them, for their sincerity, their candour and their intellectual honesty. I must say that, if all those who have written or spoken about a Canadian flag had followed the example set by these two senators, who are a credit to the Canadian Senate, the discussion on the Canadian flag would have been of such a high standard, such a high quality, that instead of wearing our people and getting on their nerves, it would have impressed them and made clearer to them the complex problem raised by this question of a distinctive Canadian flag.

Honourable senators, the traditionalist school and the Liberal school are two expressions of relativity. However, for the Conservatives, this relativity applies to what has taken place, consequently, to the past; as far as the Liberals are concerned, it relates to what is going to happen, therefore, to the future. Now, we find ourselves in circumstances where we have to make a choice. Which shall it be? Are we to choose a Canadian flag with yesterday in mind or tomorrow? Should it bring back the past or stand for the future? Will it recall days gone by or represent what we have now and what is to come?

I hope honourable Senator O'Leary will pardon me if I quote him so often, but his speech had the effect of arousing in us thoughts and feelings which cannot be discarded and which encourage us to reason.

I, therefore, take the liberty of participating very modestly to the dialogue which Senator O'Leary opened so brilliantly.

In support of his argument, he quoted the definition of the flag given in 1915 by a former president of the United States, Mr. Woodrow Wilson. In his definition, Mr. Wilson stated that a flag definitely reflects the past and should recall the past.

Yet, if we look at the American flag today, if we glance at the stars and stripes of our friends to the South who, as we did, were living at first in a colonial state and were born in the lap of England and therefore were a British colony, if we look at their banner, their national flag, we will see no sign of their past, nothing to show that the United States were once, as we were in Canada, a British possession, an English colony.

A revolution will generally bring a new flag. Yet, the American flag reflects no sign whatsoever, to the Americans or to the rest of the world—because today it is flown practically everywhere in the world— it shows no trace of the fact that the United States was once, like Canada, a British possession, in other words, belonged to another country, that it was a colony, which is tantamount to saying that they came under another nation and another government.

If we cast a glance at other flags flown around the world, we see that their designs contradict the point of view put forward by the honourable Senator O'Leary. Let us take a look, for instance, at the flag of the Soviet Socialist Republics which has not been in existence for 50 years yet. However, Russia is an old country, an old nation. At one time, for some reason which it is not my object to discuss today, that people adopted another flag, a new flag. I would say it is a little too red, because it looks like a banner often drenched in blood. Just the same, that flag has no indication of the history of that nation or of that country which is Russia.

Another example, and one closer to us, is a flag that is not yet 200 years old, the flag of France, a country that was born and organized in a splendid way, a country that gave itself political, economic and social structures even before the Christian era under Julius Caesar, a country that has existed for more than 2,000 year. By the way, the city of Paris recently celebrated the 2,000th anniversary of its foundation. Therefore, France existed even before Paris.

Now, during the eighteenth century, France experienced its revolution and after its transformation, selected a flag. The French people could justly claim the honour of being one of the most refined people in the world, one of the most civilized people, one of the most intellectual. They have the true sense of history. But that people chose a new flag.

Honourable senators, that new flag carried no symbol of what France was before 1789. They thought up and made a distinctive flag. They also had their hours of hesitation, but decided to start on a new destiny by casting off their past.

As for us, Canadians, we are also looking forward to a flag of our own, a particular symbol, something really Canadian. We do not want to abandon what belongs to us personally, but we try to get rid of what is alien to us. The fleur-de-lis does not belong to us. The royal union flag, which is called Union Jack, does not belong to us. Those are imported products.

Today we want to give ourselves a pennant and a symbol which would be entirely ours.

I wonder by which feat of strength we might look for inspiration for our flag among the foreign symbols and buntings which would only help to create confusion. It is not because we have contempt for the fleur-de-lis or the royal union flag, but we merely want to be ourselves. It seems to me that we have a right to be. We have not only a right, it is even our duty. After Senator Connolly described with historic accuracy and a distinguished talent the constitutional development of Canada, especially since the first world war and since the statute of Westminster of 1931, which sanctioned legally what existed already in fact and in history, it seems to me that the history of our country is now at a stage of development where we must crown that evolution, which is normal and natural.

In the early days, it was the British empire which drew up the legislation which governed us. That was the duty of the Westminster government, namely, the British government. Thanks to the factors of development, a community was set up which is called the Commonwealth. This community is really a family of British nations which maintains itself in time and space, not through force, guns or threats, but thanks to an inner power which has freedom as its roots.

Now, like Australia, New Zealand and other Commonwealth countries, we are members, we are part and parcel of this British family.

We give it a continuous and sustained approval or, if you prefer, an everyday consent. We are members of this family because we want to belong to it of our own free will.

This participation does not mean, however, that we are going to turn the Canadian flag into a British flag. This does not mean that although we were born on the knees of France, we propose that the Canadian flag be a replica of the French flag.

In other words, this does not mean that our flag will show any symbolic elements of France, of the United Kingdom or the British Commonwealth. France has given herself a flag which sets it apart from other nations, because, wherever this tri-coloured emblem is flown, the presence of France is always felt. In the same way, wherever the Union Jack—or, if you wish, the Royal Union flag is streaming in the wind, whatever the continent or country, it represents the United Kingdom. This is to say that the people of those two countries had enough courage and pride to identify all that was dearest to them and to assert themselves distinctively in the eyes of the world.

Let us now turn our eyes to the United States, which also gave itself a distinctive flag, which is everywhere recognized as typically American. It is a beautiful flag. The Union Jack is a beautiful flag. The French tri-coloured flag is also a beautiful flag. All flags are beautiful when they are authentic; all flags are beautiful when they are not a lie; all flags are beautiful when they are not an error.

Honourable senators, our country is the only one who to this date has presented an ambiguous flag, a flag where Canadians do not recognize themselves and where foreigners do not recognize Canada. There was evolution; the time is ripe, and as was stated by our leader, the honourable Senator Connolly, this evolution must be recognized. We must show to the world what we stand for.

Why hide it? We enjoy an excellent reputation, and we are loved everywhere. We are well looked upon at the United Nations. I have just returned, as a matter of fact, from the last NATO meeting, in which Canada took part. I had the honour of being sent there as a delegate of the Canadian government. I must say that we were extended the most cordial welcome.

We entertain trade relations with more than 150 countries. We have established embassies just about everywhere, we have numerous diplomatic missions, we send delegates throughout the world, and yet we fly a flag which even Canadians do not understand.

Honourable senators, how can you expect strangers to believe we are a free people, a proud people, an independent nation, a completely autonomous nation, heading toward its destiny, taking full advantage of its freedom, when the flag we are flying is a foreign emblem?

Keep in mind that we greatly respect the flag of other countries. I must say at this point, as a Christian, how much I respect the British flag, because it was born out of Christian fervour which was stronger then than today. Of what is the British flag made up actually? Of the superimposition of the crosses of St. Andrew, of St. George and of St. Patrick. Not only as a Christian but as a Roman Catholic, I must say that this flag deeply impresses me. All the same, the royal union flag, the British flag or Union Jack, is still not our flag, because it belongs to another country.

Honourable senators, why should we take as our own what belongs to someone else? Do we need it?

As I said earlier, honourable senators, when Senator O'Leary gave the definition of a flag, he said that it was the embodiment of history. In answer to this, I would say that it is the attire given to the soul of a nation. What symbol was chosen? The maple leaf. It could not be a better one under the circumstances. It was a brilliant idea.

Indeed, in our rich, abundant Canadian vegetation, is there any product more valuable than the maple tree? It existed in Canada before the arrival of the pioneers. The maple has been used for multiple purposes. The maple tree has provided us with heat, light and, more than any other Canadian product, it has been a source of comfort. The products of our Canadian forests are nowadays, after two centuries, an important economic asset of our country, because the maple tree has continued to multiply.

Moreover, I think it is the only tree whose sap can be turned into food. As far as I know, there is not in Canada a more natural product, more genuinely, more generally and more basically Canadian than the maple.

For all people there is a native product dear to their hearts. Thus England has the rose, France, the fleur-de-lis and Scotland, the thistle.

Canadians throughout the country see in the maple leaf, and quite fortunately too, the truest symbol of our country. Instead of leaving it on the coat of arms where it still is, we take it and put it to rest in the folds of our flag.

Honourable senators, the maple leaf is more than a product; once it appears on the flag, it becomes Canada's signature.

I do not wish to prolong this debate, but it is important that all Canadians realize now that by including other symbols in our flag, the fleur-de-lis, which is French, the rose, which is British—perhaps there is a sentimental reason for doing that—we are establishing a link with the past and I say that there is a mistake to avoid there. Why oblige the Canadians of our generation and those of future generations to think of France or of England whenever saluting the flag of Canada?

We have nothing to do with foreign flags and their symbols. We have enough imagination in this country to adorn our flag. Therefore we can do without imported designs. Let France respectfully keep its fleur-de-lis and England its rose, but let Canada choose its own design and colours. Everyone of us understands, I hope, the importance of this question. When the time comes to vote, let us consider a little less the past, beautiful undoubtedly, but the future a little more. We will give Canada a flag which will be exclusively and distinctively Canadian. Let our flag be our own choice and it will testify to our pride and will be flown with honour.

Then, when the bitterness of the present fight will be gone—time is a great healer—I have no doubt, honourable senators, that under a true Canadian flag, all citizens living now and the future generations will be proud, and rightly so, to say in chorus, in the same spirit and with the same feelings, considering the future of our country over which our flag will fly, that the most serious guarantees of order, progress and prosperity rest on unity and agreement.

I believe all Canadians, of any generation, will be proud and happy under a flag which will reflect their mood and their ideal; I believe that all Canadians will be proud to sing:

> Sous l'œil de Dieu, près du fleuve géant,
> Le Canadien grandit en espérant.

Hon. James Gladstone: Honourable senators, I speak at this time with mixed feelings of sadness and curiosity. I am sad to think that a proposal for a Canadian flag different from the one we now have could be considered. And I am curious to know how the people of Canada have let this matter develop as far as it has. I expected to have my say in the flag debate, but as a voter in my home town of Cardston—not as a senator in Ottawa.

Some time ago I was watching "Front Page Challenge" on television, and an Indian leader from Saskatchewan was on the show. During the discussion period, one of the panelists said that since he was one of the real Canadians he must want a new flag for Canada. The chief answered that the western treaties were made with Queen Victoria under the Red Ensign, and that was the flag his people wanted.

In my travels, I have found that most Indians feel the same way. We love our Queen and we love our flag. Under these symbols of justice, we feel safe. Take them away from us and it will be another sign that we are not safe. If you can take the flag away, then maybe the next time you will want to take our treaties away. Even the recent court cases on hunting rights seem to indicate this may already be happening. If we cannot hunt ducks because of an agreement with the United States made in 1921, what are we to think of our treaties?

Treaty No. 6, signed in 1876, has a clause about hunting. When explaining it, Lieutenant Governor Alexander Morris said this:

> You want to be at liberty to hunt as before. I told you we did not want to take that means of living away from you, you have it the same as before, only this, if a man, whether Indian or half-breed, had a good field of grain, you would not destroy it with your hunt.

Governor Morris was the Queen's representative, and he made that promise to us while the Red Ensign was flying overhead as a symbol of fidelity and honesty. Now, since there has been talk of tearing down the flag, there are also signs of tearing apart our treaties.

In Alberta we have an organization called "The Indian Association of Alberta". We have representatives from quite a few reserves, in both the north and the south. At the 1963 general meeting, the association unanimously passed a resolution that said:

> "Be it resolved that the Indian Association of Alberta favours the Red Ensign as Canada's flag."

A copy of this resolution was sent to the Prime Minister to show him how most Indians in Alberta felt about this matter.

I understand that many groups and individuals across the country have written to the Prime Minister or to their members, supporting the flag we now have. Maybe these form a majority; maybe they do not. But is it not the responsibility of this Government to find out? I am sure there are very few members in the other place who can say with any certainty that their constituents are for the Red Ensign, for the proposed flag, or for an entirely different flag. There is only one sure way that this can be determined, and that is by a plebiscite.

Personally, I would not want to see any other flag flying but the Red Ensign. To my people it is more than just a flag. It is a symbol of faith. When my own people, "The Bloods", signed Treaty No. 7 in 1877, each chief and headman was given a Red Ensign. Many of them erected flagpoles in front of their tepees and raised and lowered the flag each day. Under this flag they expected fair play and justice.

Even in the earlier days, before the west became part of Canada, my people knew the importance of a good flag. The Hudson's Bay Company traders used to give a Union Jack to each chief, and when they came to trade, the chief would often carry it at the head of his procession. It also became a symbol, and missionaries and travellers used to hang the flag from their carts so that they would not be mistaken for Americans. Our people knew the flag and they respected the people who carried it.

To my people, the flag is not just a bit of coloured cloth; it has real meaning for them. When the Northwest Mounted Police came to our land in 1874, we welcomed them because of their scarlet uniforms and their flag, both of which made us realize they came as friends.

As a matter of fact, when Colonel Robertson-Ross, Adjutant General of the Militia, toured the west in 1872, he recommended the colour of the uniforms. At Red River he met an Indian who said: "We know that the soldiers of our Great Mother wear red coats and are our friends."

And the mounted police soon showed us that this trust was well placed. There was not one law for the Indian and another law for the white man. They all came under the Queen's law, and those who violated that law were punished, no matter what their colour.

Some of you may say that this is living in the past, that times have changed and we should change along with them. But do not forget that confidence in the future is built upon a knowledge and appreciation of the past. And do not forget that the best way to generate a feeling of patriotism and pride in our country is to recall the glorious events of our history. At one time part of Canada was under a French flag and part of it was under a British flag. But for generations now we have been living under a Canadian flag—an official Canadian flag, I might add. Never before have I heard of a country throwing away one flag for another, unless chaos, or rebellion had changed its entire constitution and make-up. Perhaps the Soviets, when they overthrew the Czars, adopted a new flag. But we have not been through the bloodshed of a revolution. We have not thrown out our old form of government.

I think, during the reams of flag debate, there have been comments about a new flag to help unify Canada. So what is proposed as a national symbol? A maple leaf—the kind that grows in Ontario and Quebec. All we have on the prairies is the Manitoba maple, and I do not think its leaf looks much like the one on the proposed flag. As a national symbol, the maple leaf is useless. To many westerners, it is just another example of the arrogant east thinking that Canada ends at Algoma.

In my travels, some of my people have been puzzled by this flag debate. Off on our reserves, we may be away from the hustle and bustle of political life. And maybe that is a good thing. Maybe one can see things better when there is not too much city smoke clouding the issues. My people wonder what this flag argument is all about. Are we not part of the British Commonwealth? Has not the Red Ensign been carried in pride to war?

You know, honourable senators, among my people a war honour is a great thing. In the old days, if a man had something that he took to battle with him, and he won the battle, he would never cast it aside. He believed that the Holy Spirit protected him, and that the power of that Holy Spirit revealed itself in many ways. If he carried a special shield into battle and came through with honours, he would feel that part of the Holy Spirit's power was in that shield. He would treasure that shield, carry it in other battles, and carry it proudly. And when he went into the medicine lodge to recount his war experiences, he would carry the shield with him, for it had helped him when he needed it most. Then, when he was too old for war, the shield might command an honoured place in his tepee. Or he might give it to his son, so that he too would be successful in war.

Are we the savages, because we treasure these things, or are you modern people savages because you cast them aside?

On this whole matter of the Indian's attitude towards the flag, I must give you an example of something that happened in Lethbridge about 1910. There were a lot of Americans around Lethbridge at that time, and feelings between them and the Canadians sometimes ran pretty high. Anyway, at the 1910 Lethbridge Stampede, a bunch of Bloods were invited to participate in the parade. You can imagine the reaction when the Bloods came into sight. There, in the lead, was the old War Chief, Running Wolf, carrying a great big American flag! The Americans laughed and said that at least the Indians knew who should be running the country. The Canadians said that Running Wolf had been put up to it.

People were curious about this, so someone sent for an interpreter, and they asked Running Wolf why he carried the flag. The old chief had a good reason. When he was a young man he had been in a battle with some American cavalry and had killed the soldier carrying the flag. He recognized the great value of a flag in battle, so he won high honour by capturing it. When he carried it in the parade, he was showing off his greatest trophy.

You will pardon me, honourable senators, if I keep talking about treaties. To the Indian people, the treaty is a bond of trust between them and the Queen. In the west we have had 11 treaties, the first signed in 1871 and the last in 1921. My own people, The Bloods, signed in 1877, while our neighbours to the north, the Crees, signed a year earlier.

The promises, or implied promises, made to our people during those treaties, are very important to us. It is not just the dollars and cents, it is the feeling of trust that is important. Many times our older people caution the younger ones about doing anything foolish. "You will be going against our treaty," they tell them. This is a very important matter to us. We try to keep our end of the treaty, and we expect the Government to keep its end.

Therefore, honourable senators, I support the motion presented by the honourable senator from Carleton (Hon. Mr. O'Leary).

Hon. A. B. Baird: Honourable senators, I have very few words to say. As you know, the beginning of the British Empire was in 1497, the year in which Newfoundland was discovered. Newfoundland's loyalty and patriotism will bear strong and emotional reactions when there is the least suggestion of a change being made to old or new symbols.

Honourable senators, the feeling in Newfoundland is so strong in favour of the Union Jack that I think I can say without fear of contradiction that if Newfoundlanders had known 15 years ago that the Union Jack was to be hauled from the mast and superseded by any other flag, they would never have voted for Confederation.

That is all I have to say.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before beginning to discuss the resolution and the amendment may I make reference to the tributes that were paid to honourable Senator Power earlier in the day.

A short time ago it was my privilege to speak at a mess dinner. I spoke on the Senate and its function, and during my remarks I mentioned how interesting it is for me to meet, sit down and discuss various problems with people who have been in public life longer than I have lived. I mentioned many honourable senators, one of whom was honourable Senator Power.

Afterwards I was pleased that many of the officers, especially the junior officers who were in their early twenties came to me and asked questions about Senator Power. I could answer many of them, except the one that came up most persistently. They wanted to know how he had come by the nickname "Chubby". I am afraid I was not able to enlighten them on that. Perhaps at some time in a conversation with the honourable senator I shall be able to learn the answer to that question.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Just look at him.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I would be very sensitive about that, Senator Connolly.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, not yet.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Earlier this afternoon honourable Senator Rattenbury said to me, "I understand that you and I will probably be two of the last speakers in this flag debate." I said that I was not worried about being the last—I just did not want to be the worst. I know that that is no problem for Senator Rattenbury, but it is for me.

I cannot approach the subject in the manner of a historian, as honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa, West) did, nor can I approach it with the eloquence of honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton). But, I can approach it with the feeling of the people of the province which

I represent—a people who have a great appreciation of the past, who have a deep love of tradition, and who, in spite of recent events, still have great confidence in the future. We find ourselves greatly disturbed by trends in Canada. May I illustrate this by pointing out that while many people in the Province of Quebec were objecting to Her Majesty's visit—and I do not want to leave the impression that they all were—

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: No, no; please permit me to protest against that remark. The people of Quebec were not against the visit of the Queen. What trouble there was was caused by strangers and some people from the United States.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I am very glad to hear the honourable senator's correction, for at that time the town council and citizens of Summerside were complaining that Her Majesty's car was being driven through the town at too fast a speed and that the children who were waiting to welcome her did not have an opportunity of seeing her. I mention these things to demonstrate to you that there is a great love of tradition in our province.

During the past year the history of our province, its traditions and accomplishments, were acknowledged in Centennial Days. Every town and village on the Island had a Centennial Day, and in this way we all became very much aware of our history and, I may say, of the contribution of the two founding nations. We do not like the term "the two ethnic groups"; we prefer to call them the two founding races.

We are very proud of the fact that in our province people of French and English origin live in harmony. We of Anglo-Saxon descent find much that we can admire in our Acadian friends, who are most co-operative and excellent neighbours. They have contributed much to our province. They have given us a premier, a chief justice and many outstanding men in all walks of life. In short, we are proud of the past. We are very proud of our nation, and we feel that we all have a common purpose, privilege and responsibility. We are very proud to be called Canadians, regardless of our racial origin.

Consequently, we do not have the strong desire to change our flag that many other Canadians have. Honourable senators will note I said "change our flag." It was, and is, our feeling that we had a flag in the Canadian Ensign. I prefer the term "Canadian Ensign" to "Red Ensign".

Honourable senators, I cannot recall a politician or member of any party making a speech advocating the so-called distinctive Canadian flag in our province. Members of all parties chose to ignore the campaign literature advocating a so-called distinctive flag—and here I am admitting that the campaign literature of all parties did call for a distinctive Canadian flag. We saw far more important things in the campaign literature, such as projects that would contribute more to the development of Canada and, in particular, to the Atlantic provinces. It is said that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. We in Prince Edward Island say that the political road travelled by politicians from central Canada is paved with broken promises. Perhaps we ignored the literature dealing with a distinctive flag, expecting this to receive the same treatment.

Hence, we are puzzled and, indeed, saddened by the haste to change our flag. We ask: Why this indecent haste? Why this sudden condemnation of all our traditions? Why the substitution of an emblem for our heritage? We also ask: Who is behind this move? Who has elevated the flag issue to a place of utmost importance, and, indeed, who has seen fit to make it the only business of our Parliament? This subject, which has monopolized the time of Parliament, did not even warrant a place in the Speech from the Throne.

We ask: Who, and why, in a space of three months catapulted the flag issue to the position of priority? Throughout the whole lengthy debate no one has given us an answer. Our people have made sacrifices in the past, and are willing to make more sacrifices. If it is necessary to have a distinctive flag we shall again make sacrifices, but, first, there are certain aspects of this issue that must be clarified. We must have some means of selecting a flag design. There must be some method which permits us to have some say, or an opportunity to express our views, in the selection of the design.

You may refer to the lengthy debate in the other place and say that an opportunity was provided there. I cannot agree with that view because the original design was imposed on Parliament. No one knows the method of selection of the original flag design by the Prime Minister, and no one knows his purpose.

Honourable senators, if I may digress for a moment, I will say that I am proud of the contribution of the two members from Queens, the Honourable J. Angus MacLean and Mr. Heath Macquarrie, in that debate. At all times they put forward a reasonable conciliatory viewpoint, and one in which I would like to join. Unfortunately, the other two members from the province sat in silent, sullen submission. They shared in the reluctance of their Liberal colleagues to seize an opportunity that could have given their party an honoured place in history.

We must have also a description—a clarification, if you will—of that much maligned word "distinctive". It is true that many different ideas of distinction have crept into this debate. Unfortunately, most people seem to have accepted what I call the "beatnik" idea of distinction. We all know that beatniks like to discard the customs and they like to wear the same style of dress, so that they become a sort of characterless mass in order to be distinct. I feel that we may be following a certain amount of this trend in our desire to be distinct.

I like to describe those who would completely obliterate our past as nihilites, from the Latin nihil, meaning "nothing". They would completely ignore our past and our traditions.

I ask you, honourable senators, who are really the more distinctive, those who would ignore everything of the past or those who would like to point to our traditions, our racial origin and the contributions of various races?

I am sure honourable Senator Pouliot would be rather surprised, in view of some of the comments on this side of the house, if I were to pay him a compliment. I listened with interest when he was describing his family's history in the Province of Quebec. I would like to think of him, not only as distinctive but as distinct.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Not extinct.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: No, not extinct.

Before discussing in detail the amendment proposed by the honourable Senator Grattan O'Leary, I would like to mention one aspect of the resolution which is causing grave concern all across Canada. I am convinced that at the next general election, possibly in the near future, the Government will use, as an excuse for its many dismal failures, the fact that it is a minority government. In this same vein, many Canadians ask where this Government gets its mandate to force upon us the flag of its choice. I am reminded of a scene in Julius Caesar. Cassius and Brutus are conversing, prior to the assassination of Caesar, and Cassius says to Brutus:

> Now, in the names of all the gods at once,
> Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed,
> That he is grown so great?

You will excuse me for paraphrasing this by saying: Upon what votes doth this our Pearson feed, that he is grown so great?

Honourable senators, think of the support which was used to force this flag through the House of Commons—that unholy alliance, Mr. Caouette and Mr. Fisher. I wonder if they have that much in common with the Canadian people that this alliance should have been utilized to force the flag through the other place.

I have enjoyed the speeches in the Senate. By their very nature and by their content, they have clearly demonstrated to the Canadian people the wisdom and the necessity of having this upper chamber. There has been a difference of opinion, and this of course is to be expected in any debate. If there were no difference of opinion there could be no debate.

There are several remarks to which I should like to refer. I am sure no offence was intended in those remarks, and I hope honourable senators will find no offence in mine. One thing which has been referred to several times is that the gravestones of our war dead can have the maple leaf emblazoned on them. I dislike the idea of bringing in reference to the graves of our fallen heroes as a means of supporting this flag. Those men made a voluntary contribution, the supreme sacrifice, and I feel they have given enough; they have given their all to Canada, and we should not try to utilize them in this debate.

Senator Hugessen made many interesting remarks yesterday. He was troubled by some small things, which seemed to give him much annoyance. I should like to refer to his remark that it would be impossible to have negotiations while we have the present Leader of the Opposition. I feel this remark was entirely wrong. I am sure the honourable senator was aware that it was the Leader of the Opposition who first advocated a committee to study flag designs, to attempt to find some compromise in the other house. It took him six weeks to get a committee, except on terms that were not entirely to his liking, but there was a spirit of negotiation there and an indication that it was not all obstruction.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Phillips: Certainly, sir.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I think the honourable senator has not quoted correctly the remarks of honourable Senator Hugessen. The word he used was not "negotiation" but "agreement". There is a difference between the two words.

Hon. Mr. Phillips: I may have misquoted, but I do not feel there is much difference between "agreement" and "negotiation". We would hope that agreement would follow negotiation.

I should like to refer to the remarks of honourable Senator Hollett last evening. I must say that I enjoyed the sincerity with which they were made. I believe he was the first person to express what I know to be the feeling in Newfoundland, the deep love for and affiliation to the Union Jack, which has been confirmed today by the honourable senator from St. John's (Hon. Mr. Baird). I enjoyed hearing his sincere remarks. Senator Hollett mentioned the fact that the maple leaf is not distinctive, that it is foreign to Newfoundland. He mentioned that it is also used for wrapping meats of various kinds. This is a problem that disturbs me. On various inspection services, we use the maple leaf as a symbol that the meat or fish has been inspected. Should this design be adopted for the flag, I hope that some action will be taken to protect it.

When he was mentioning that the maple leaf was not limited and is not considered distinctive, I thought of a friend's home in Summerside. These people served for some time in Kashmir. They have very beautiful wood carvings and silverware. In fact, I have shown some samples to a number of senators. Until this new design came in I always assumed that these were maple leaves, and I was very surprised to find recently that they are not maple leaves but chinar leaves. These people asked me, what identification would this new flag have in this part of the world. This is an aspect which should receive some consideration.

Regardless of the objective of the flag resolution—and I do not intend to attribute any secondary motive to it—it has created disunity, it has created suspicion and bitterness in many minds. That cannot be ignored. I do not feel we can pass over this and say that time will heal those scars. Therefore, the suggestion in Senator O'Leary's amendment has much to merit our consideration. If the Government were to delay—not discard, merely delay—the resolution for a period of time, that would allow us to salvage a feeling of unity from the present feeling in Canada. It would allow us to develop a flag which would be acceptable to all people and be respected in our time. I feel very deeply that the flag should be respected in our time.

It is all very well to say that in 10 or 20 or 30 years' time, or perhaps even in 40, the flag will be accepted. However, within a very short time Canada will be celebrating its 100th anniversary, and I do not think we should have a flag that will not be respected by a great many people during those celebrations.

Honourable senators who quote figures of public opinion polls, stating that two out of three Canadians favour a new flag, are completely ignoring the fact that a large number of people do not accept or are not in favour of this design.

After all these words, I am sure honourable senators would expect me to give some idea of a flag design that would be acceptable; and naturally I am going to think of a flag that would be acceptable to the Atlantic provinces, for I know this area much better than I know the rest of Canada. I would also point out that while we deeply regret the change, I think many people in the Atlantic provinces would be ready and willing to co-operate with other areas in Canada in an attempt to arrive at a new design, if this is really the wish of a vast majority of Canadians.

The committee of the other house considered but did not accept a modified version of the Canadian ensign. Such a proposal, I think, would fit the terms of the amendment and be acceptable to a large number of people in Canada. The modified version, as all honourable senators know, contained a smaller Union Jack in the corner, three fleurs-de-lis of equal size to the Union Jack in the fly, and in the centre, a maple leaf. I feel that the maple leaf should be green, to signify that Canada is a young, vigorous and growing country. When a maple leaf becomes red, it is ready to fall and die. If honourable senators will look upward, they will note that the maple leaves on the beautiful ceiling in this chamber are green, not red. The Senate has sat in session for many years under the green maple leaf.

In conversations with many of my French Canadian friends, I have asked them concerning their objection to the inclusion of the fleur-de-lis in the flag. Some, but not all, said that it is a sign of colonialism, that it reminds them that their province was once a colony. I do not understand this viewpoint. Certainly Quebec was once a colony, so once were Nova Scotia, Ontario, and British Columbia. Indeed, all of North America and South America were once colonies. That was the only form of government at that time.

Honourable senators, I think we must recall that if the various parts which now make up Canada had not once been colonies, Senator Gladstone would be the only member of the Senate today.

As one of Anglo-Saxon descent, I am not going to attempt to suggest to the French-Canadian people what symbol they should put forward, what symbol would be best representative of their province. However, I would like to explain to them that we Anglo-Saxon people, probably wrongly, have come to associate the fleur-de-lis with the Province of Quebec. We see the fleur-de-lis on your provincial flags. It is on the licence plates of your automobiles, and it is a part of many of the religious flags and shields used in the Province of Quebec.

We have associated the fleur-de-lis with the Province of Quebec, and therefore are putting forward the suggestion of the fleur-de-lis. However if this is not acceptable to the Province of Quebec, I would be perfectly happy, as an Anglo-Saxon, to take any suggestion that my colleagues from that province would care to put forward.

One suggestion among the numerous flag designs which have been received came from the Province of Quebec, and I think this one could be considered under the terms of the amendment. It has ten horizontal bars. The colours could be blue and white, or red and white, or any colour you wish. They come into a circle, and at the end of each bar were the coats of arms of the various provinces. In this design, I found a certain amount of what I would like to see in our flag. Here I found symbols of the two founding races and a recognition of the contribution of everybody to Canada, plus a certain amount of our history.

Many senators have stated that we cannot achieve any more unanimity, agreement, on the design than exists at the present time. I find among the people in the Maritimes that there is no agreement and no acceptance of this flag.

Many sincere people, and they are sincere, keep asking me why the Government seems to consider it to be almost a crime to have a heritage—a descent of Anglo-Saxon origin. These people are not being antagonistic to anyone, they are genuinely confused, resentful and, in most cases, deeply hurt. This I consider to be one of the most unfortunate aspects of this debate.

Before concluding my remarks, I wish to draw to the attention of honourable senators the results of passing this resolution and accepting a flag that will not be accepted by a great many Canadians. Many people are going to feel deprived of the present flag, are going to resent the proposed flag, and will turn to their provincial flags. As honourable senators know, many provinces have their own provincial flag. Nova Scotia has had its own flag for hundreds of years. Quebec, as everyone knows, is proud of its flag. Newfoundland has, as its provincial flag, the Union Jack. Its outspoken premier has left no doubt that he expects the Union Jack to continue to fly in that province.

This year Prince Edward Island adopted its own flag. I am sorry, in one way, to have noticed that in that province the Canadian Ensign and the Acadian Flag are being lowered, and that the provincial flag now flies on the flag poles which formerly flew either the Canadian Ensign or the Acadian Flag. Perhaps I should explain to some honourable senators that the Acadians, in Prince Edward Island at least, fly the tricolour, with the golden star of the Acadians on it. The provincial flag, not the new flag, is replacing the others. I feel that this will further emphasize the provincial trend that is developing all across Canada. The result will not be unity, but disunity.

I urge honourable senators to give consideration to the many merits of the amendment, an amendment that was moved in the spirit of the Senate. I urge senators to take advantage of the opportunity this amendment provides, an opportunity worthy of the Senate. I hope the Senate will rise to the occasion and be worthy of that opportunity.

I make one final plea to you to join us, not in a spirit of partisanship but in the spirit of Confederation. This problem can be solved and we in this chamber can establish a pattern for the solution of future difficulties, a pattern that will stand the stresses and strains of many generations to come.

Hon. Nelson Rattenbury: Honourable senators, I must be frank and admit to a certain amount of soul-searching before I decided to enter this debate at this time. Too much has been said by too many people already. Too much has been said that was deliberately designed to stir the emotions of our peoples to fever pitch. The subject is not a new one; Canadians have talked about having their own flag for many years. Perhaps this debate has served a useful purpose after all because now the temper of our people, as I sense it, is such that they are demanding action and, fortunately, it would appear they are within days of getting it.

I have enjoyed listening to most of the speeches that have been made here in the past few days, and I intend to mention a few of them in the course of my remarks. However, at this time I would like to make a few remarks about the speech made by Senator White this afternoon. He dealt at great length and, I feel, from his heart with the reactions of the veterans of the First World War. He brought us through that horrible conflict. I think he is right. In fact, the press leads us to believe he is right, when he speaks of the reactions of all those veterans of that war and their desire to retain the ensign we have known for the past few years. But I, in my travels, have been exposed to the men and women who are serving today and who, perhaps, served in the Second World War. I sensed in my conversations with them a different attitude, one that is more—I hate to use the phrase "up-to-date", but one that is looking for a change, and that change could very well be the new flag.

I know, even as you do, that there is a certain division among our people as to just what they do want. I think that is a normal reaction. I freely admit that I could not have designed a flag, nor, I suspect—though I have listened to a few suggestions here—could many of my honourable colleagues—certainly, not one which would have satisfied all the people. It would not have satisfied all the people any more than the Government of the day satisfied everyone when they designated the Red Ensign many years ago.

I like the Red Ensign; I think it is a beautiful flag but I do not think, and never have thought, that it should be Canada's national flag; nor, for that matter, any variation or incorporation of it.

It has been said that we cannot or should not forget the past, and I agree that we should not. This country was brought to nationhood by men and women of courage and imagination. They founded a new country in which to live and, in many cases, prosper. The two great founding races were later joined by people from other countries and they, in my opinion, showed equally as much courage as did those who came originally. It has been said in this chamber that only 40 per cent of Canadians can claim an Anglo-Saxon background, 34 per cent are of French origin, while the balance, 26 per cent, came from other ethnic groups. If these figures are correct, they are a truly representative gathering from far and near; and I hope they are all proud of the fact that their ancestors came here and that they are all now Canadians.

I come from an English and Scottish background. My ancestors came to Prince Edward Island three or four generations ago but, to my mother's disgust, I am afraid, I place very little emphasis on that fact. It is enough for me to say I am a Canadian. I was born in this country and when my time comes I hope to die here. I am proud of Canada, as all of you are, but I think a lot of people are placing too much emphasis on where their ancestors came from. That is the point I wish to make.

I have mentioned all this in order to develop the thought that it is necessary to be truly Canadian in our approach to this problem. It might be argued that a flag, to be truly Canadian, should have a conglomeration of symbols, if we were to recognize the background of all our peoples. Why single out only two, as has been suggested by many speakers in the past few months?

Senator O'Leary (Carleton) was at his most eloquent best the other day. He always is when he speaks of Ireland. He brought out the fact that Ireland did not put the shamrock on their flag; but neither, I would like to add, did they use the Union Jack. France has not used the fleur-de-lis, and other countries no doubt have failed to use their symbols as national emblems. But they were not faced with the problem we are faced with today. The Irish are all Irishmen together in one small island—true, it is a little divided at times, but it is all one island. The French are all of a common background in France; the Italians in Italy, the Greeks in Greece, the Turks in Turkey. Oh, I could go on and on ad infinitum, but none of them have had the problem we as Canadians face—a nation of many racial origins, as I mentioned earlier; a nation almost equally divided into three main groups and subdivided into many more, but all united as Canadians. As Senator Cameron said the other day, "We are rich in the heritage of other lands."

On Tuesday last Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), in one of the best speeches I have ever heard him deliver, drew a picture of the growth of our country. He brought us along most eloquently through the pages of our history, from our birth to the present day. It was what I might term a moderate presentation, so typical of the man himself, and he left a message that we would all do well to remember. As a comparatively new member of this chamber, I am happy to see that the same degree of moderation has been shown by most of us during our deliberations.

Speaking in this vein, and assuming it would be a virtual impossibility to please all our people about a design for a new flag, I have asked myself, what is wrong with a flag that has as its motif a maple leaf? What design could have been chosen which would have served to cause less dissension? Quite frankly, I failed to come up with any better solution. Like others in this chamber, I have received many letters dealing with this issue. Those who favoured a new flag have the maple leaf as part of some design or other; others retained the Union Jack in an equal number of designs; while yet a few were adamant that it would be sacrilegious not to retain the Red Ensign.

One gentleman, I might add, an old shipmate of mine, went so far as to say I could not turn away from the old "Red Duster" because I had served under it for so long at sea. I was interested to hear Senator Croll refer to it as the "Red Duster" in his speech. I asked him today about that, and he said the expression was used by the Imperial army in the last war. I did not point this out in my reply to him, but I could have said, "That is one of the main reasons why I favour a new flag."

In fact, I sailed the oceans of the world under the Red Ensign, as we know it in Canada, and we had constantly to point out that it was the Canadian flag, not the more familiar Red Ensign of the British merchant service. We were never ashamed of our flag but, to say the least, it was rather confusing at times.

I shall continue, if I may, in a nautical vein for a few minutes, because I think it is in that area of our economy that in the past most of the confusion has existed.

We have in Canada, as most senators know, three ensigns—the White, flown by ships of the Royal Canadian Navy; the Blue, flown by ships in our Government service and by merchant ships with a specified number of commissioned officers and other ranks of naval reserve personnel as crew members; and finally, the Red Ensign, flown by Canada's merchant vessels, which is the same Red Ensign as we know ashore as the Canadian flag. But it is at this point that I really enter the realm of confusion. Both the Blue Ensign and the Red Ensign have the coat of arms inscribed on them, but, as many of you know, the White Ensign has not. It is the same ensign as is flown by the British navy.

For the purpose of emphasis, I repeat that the identical flag is flown by ships of two different nations, and it is this similarity that exists in our present use of the Red Ensign which gives me cause to support the use of a distinctive flag of our own.

To avoid confusion—or rather in an attempt to avoid it—the naval service, on their own, decided a few years ago to put shoulder tabs on all personnel, reading "CANADA". This has been mentioned earlier in this chamber. That took care of the situation while the troops were ashore. On the ships themselves they painted a maple leaf on the funnel—yes, this same maple leaf we are discussing today and which I have heard derided in this chamber during the last few days.

From this point onward, anything I might be tempted to say would be repetitious—perhaps I am already guilty of being so. I therefore propose to make this perhaps the shortest speech yet made on the subject in either chamber, and I hope one of the last. I would add that Senator Baird seems to have outdone me. However, there is one thought I would like to leave with you.

All of us, at one time or another, have stood proudly while a band played "The Maple Leaf Forever". I earnestly hope that all of us will in the future be proud to stand while the maple leaf flies above us—forever!

Honourable senators, in closing I wish to say I shall be supporting the resolution.

The Honourable the Speaker called it 6 o'clock and left the Chair until 7.30 o'clock.

20224—79½

At 7.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I would like to express my gratitude and congratulations to the honourable Leader of the Government in this house, Senator Connolly, and to the spokesman of the loyal Opposition, Senator Grattan O'Leary, for their lucid presentation of two points of view regarding the design of the Canadian flag. Senator Connolly gave us a scholarly historical sketch of Canada's evolution from colonies to national autonomy and sovereignty, and the arguments favouring the maple leaf as the sole distinctive symbol in our flag. Senator O'Leary made an eloquent plea for the retention in the Canadian flag of the symbols of the founding peoples which would be accepted by all elements of our population.

At this time the eyes of all Canadians throughout our country are focused on the Senate. Our people are expecting us to exercise deep thinking, prudence, moderation and a high degree of non-partisanship, ever bearing in mind the best interests of Canada, and, above all, national unity. We are reminded that justice, truth, fair play and conciliation are the true spirits of the Senate. These are high principles to live up to, but we must always be motivated by them.

The Senate is confronted with the issue of a flag that was passed in the other house by a large majority, but not without resort to closure. The new flag did not receive the support of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. A considerable proportion of the population is vehemently opposed to this flag. It is being introduced in disunity, turmoil and bitterness. This situation is bad—very bad. A flag should be a unifying, not a divisive thing. It is obvious that Canadians are not yet ready for their distinctive flag commanding the support of an overwhelming majority. It is my humble and sincere opinion that the Senate should insist on a flag of unity that has the support of all parties and all elements of our population. Only then can we be sure that our flag will inspire Canadian unity and pride.

At this time I feel I would be remiss if I did not bring to the attention of honourable senators an open letter sent to the Prime Minister and dated May 27 of this year. It was signed by such distinguished Canadian historians as Professor D. G. Creighton of the University of Toronto, Professor W. L. Morton of the University of Manitoba, Dr. Eugene Forsey, Research Director of the Canadian Labour Congress, and several other prominent Canadian scholars, administrators and artists. Written before the commencement of the flag debate in the other house, this message, with a plea and prophetic overtone, deserves careful consideration. It reads:

> We have thought deeply about the flag issue, and believe it necessary to write this open letter to you as an expression of our common feelings. May we emphasize that we do not speak as political partisans, but only as concerned Canadians representing several parties.
> We applaud your decision to seek a distinctive national flag for Canada, and recognize your courage in doing so. We believe, as you do, that the flag should be a source of national unity, and that it should be unmistakably Canadian in character. However, we protest that the maple leaf flag is neither of these things. Its only advantage is that it is innocuous, that it produces tepid approval, mild disapproval, or indifference, and that it can therefore be adopted without any display of strong feeling whatever. We have a despairing feeling that this insipid flag, instead of promoting national unity, will produce only an indifferent response, and in doing so will subtly undermine the Canadian will to survive.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator again tell me the date of that letter?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: The date of this letter is May 27 of this year.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It was written before the committee reported on the new design, I take it?

Hon. Mr. Yuzyk: Yes, that is right. I am reading this in order to give the opinion of prominent historians and leaders. It continues:

> We believe profoundly that this negative approach to our national symbol erodes our national spirit.
>
> The very essence of this country's history, and the reason for our national distinctiveness, has been the long and often turbulent marriage of French and English heritages. We have faith that in their depths, Canadians pride themselves on this union, and on its parliamentary and non-revolutionary tradition. Canada has a continuous history of three hundred and fifty years of French-speaking and English-speaking life together in North America, and two hundred years of union. The creative tension between the two founding peoples has been a guarantee to other racial groups of their continued identity, in contrast to the American concept of the melting pot. These are the positive facts of our history; we cannot change them; they give Canada its sinews. The nation is strong enough to face its own past proudly, and to assert it. Whatever may be said about the use of the maple leaf as a Canadian emblem in the past, it has never gained anyone's vigorous allegiance, and it involves no commitment to the human factor of Canada.
> We believe that Canada has a distinguished culture of its own. We believe that this is a positive culture. We believe that the basis of this positive culture is a frank acceptance of both the English Canadian and the French Canadian civilizations. We believe that a distinctive Canadian flag should reflect this positive fact.
>
> We are not in the position of a country with a revolutionary tradition, creating itself anew; we exist because we have inherited the past without a revolutionary upheaval. It is false and dispiriting to adopt a flag which subtly ignores the truth of our own nature. This is not the kind of symbol to rally a bewildered and demoralized nation.
> We respectfully suggest that you withdraw the maple leaf design for the time being, and that you convoke at once a private meeting of the parliamentary leaders of all parties to agree upon a new design which asserts our history. We profoundly believe that the present proposal will only deepen the spiritual malaise of Canada.

Substantially, I hold the same viewpoint as expressed in this letter. A leaf does not excite me and certainly does not inspire me, no matter what is said or written about it. That the maple leaf is distinctive, I agree, but by itself I cannot associate it with civilization and culture. I am not, however, opposed to its incorporation in the flag, together with other symbols that are representative of human achievement.

The most precious asset that Canada possesses is our human resources. I brought this out in my maiden speech of March 3 this year. Canada was founded by the British and French peoples, who together with many other peoples, now forming a significant proportion of our population, over one-quarter, have developed the civilization, the culture and the way of life that we have today. It is a pluralistic and multicultural society with a Christian foundation, evolving on a democratic basis, which makes us different from that of the United States and gives us our separate identity. By and large we have accepted as our guiding principle "unity in diversity". Because of adherence to this principle of recognizing human values, Canada has made tremendous progress in every field of human endeavour.

I was glad to hear that some of the senators in the course of this debate have paid tribute to the Ukrainian contribution to Canada. I believe the Ukrainians will play a bigger role in the future. This can be said also of the other ethnic groups such as the Germans, Jews, Icelanders, Poles, Italians, Indians and others. The English, Irish, Scots, Welsh, the French, and the other ethnic groups are united as Canadians. We have come out of the past together, are together in the present, and will go ahead together and united into the future.

"Unity in diversity" is a good and viable principle. It now has official recognition. When the present Government came into power, this principle was inscribed in the first Speech from the Throne of May 16, 1963:

> The character and strength of our nation are drawn from the diverse cultures of people who came from many lands to create the Canada that is ours today. The greater Canada that is in our power to make will be built not on uniformity but on continuing diversity....

Since I had spoken on this topic in the Senate some ten months ago—at which time I had stated that the non-British, non-French ethnic groups of the third element would soon unite to work together for the welfare of Canada—a conference with this objective was held in Ottawa on November 8 and 9 this year, under the patronage of the Honourable Maurice Lamontagne, Secretary of State, and the Honourable René Tremblay, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and sponsored by the Centennial Commission. The conference established the Canadian Folk Art Council, supported by government funds, on a permanent basis, with representatives from all the ethnic groups, to plan participation in the Centennial celebrations of 1967 and in the general development of Canadian culture subsequently. This is the putting of the principle of "unity in diversity" into practice and action.

Material achievements of mankind are important, but in my opinion more important are the spiritual and cultural achievements. The imperishable gift of the British to the Canadian way of life is the parliamentary system of government, an evolutionary democracy under the Crown, safeguarding the authority of and equality before the law, liberty, justice, fair play, equal opportunity for all and the dignity of the individual. Through our Parliament we have achieved independence, sovereignty and prestige throughout the world. The French gift of cultural preservation and development, love of Canada, pride in their language and traditions and devotion to religion, have made Canadians more conscious of the meaning of life. All these are profound and precious human values of the highest order, which have been reinforced by the contributions of the other ethnic groups and which should be held perpetually sacred by the Canadian nation. They were gained by great sacrifices and have become our heritage to enjoy, to improve and to pass on to future generations.

A flag should symbolize our great heritage and the undying spirit of the nation. In his admirable speech, Senator Grattan O'Leary referred to the essentials of a national flag, which were outlined by President Woodrow Wilson, himself a historian. It is worth repeating:

> The things that the flag stands for were created by the experiences of a great people. Everything that it stands for was written by their lives. The flag is the embodiment, not of sentiment, but of history.

We are building what we would like to call a great nation. A great and dynamic nation must be dedicated to great and high ideals and principles, which have come from the past and which should be symbolized in the flag. Without the founding peoples and their contributions, there would be no Canada today. It is my conviction that a leaf is too insignificant to represent great human values and the accumulated heritage of preceding generations. What kind of a dynamic spirit can it convey?

I would like to see meaningful symbols of the founding peoples enshrined forever on the distinctive Canadian flag, which could also include the maple leaf. Such a flag cannot be produced in haste. It must be the product of the best minds of our country and should be done in consultation with the component peoples of our population, the provincial governments, the universities, the churches, veterans' associations, the cultural organizations and interested citizen societies. When adopted in Parliament, such a flag should receive the approval of all the parties, at least the two largest. A united effort by the Canadians would produce a flag of Canadian unity which would then be our pride and inspiration. This requires more planning and more time.

Consequently, I support the amendment.

Hon. Léon Méthot: Honourable senators, I have listened very carefully to what was said by the Leader of the Government, and I have also read the French version of what he said in order to appreciate fully the magnificent speech he made.

Starting with the Confederation Debates, he reminded us that Sir John Macdonald referred to the ultimate emergence of a nation "friendly" to Britain, and of the necessity to reaffirm the minority rights consecrated in the Quebec Act. He gave a brief history of our Canada from 1867 up to now, putting in evidence of what was done by our statesmen; and he concluded that no political party claims or should claim sole credit for our achievements. For this I have admired his impartiality and I want to congratulate him.

However, although he made a brilliant exposé of what has been done for Canada, I do not think that those premises draw the conclusion at which he has arrived in regard to the motion we have to vote on.

The intention of everyone in our country is to procure for Canada a distinctive national flag, and on this purpose I agree entirely. I must say, however, that to obtain a distinctive national flag for Canada, we must first agree on what those terms mean.

Personally, I want for Canada a national flag which nobody will be ashamed of; I want for Canada a flag which will be accepted all over Canada; I want a distinctive national flag which will satisfy the thinking and the respect of everyone.

To obtain this result, I think we should first ask ourselves, what is a flag? What is a national flag? What is a distinctive national flag?

To find out what is a flag, I have looked through many dictionaries, and I have finally found the real definition of a flag, which anybody can read in the dictionary of Guerin:

> Un drapeau est un signe metaphorique de ralliement autour d'une croyance, d'un principe, d'un parti.

I will try to translate that by saying that a flag is a metaphoric sign of rally around a creed, a principle, a party.

If we look at the motion on which we have to take a decision, and on the flag that this resolution proposes, we first read:

> That this house does recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to have designated as the National Flag of Canada a red flag . . . etc.

First of all, we are asked to recommend to the Government that the necessary steps be taken to have this flag which, as far as I know, has already been decided upon by a committee of the government. Not one senator was consulted or asked to give his opinion on the subject at this committee. At least, the resolution should have read that the Senate concurs.

Enough, however, on that matter, which is not important, when we have to consider a subject of greater importance.

We are asked to vote for a metamorphic sign of rally. Having read newspapers coming from all parts of this country, anyone must realize that this proposed flag will not bring to the minds of the citizens an idea of unity, but will rather bring an idea of disunion, and even separatism, in some parts of our country.

Does the proposed flag give us the idea of a creed accepted by anyone? Yesterday I was listening to the speech made by the honourable Senator Hugessen, when he was brilliantly revealing the origin and the idea that brought to us the Union Jack. He explained to us that we could see on that flag the Cross of St. Andrew for Scotland, the Cross of St. George for England, and the Cross of St. Patrick for Ireland. Do we see anything like that in a red maple leaf which has not even a colour of life, but represents only a dead leaf? Can we say now that the proposed flag represents a principle, which Webster translates as the beginning, the commencement, the origin, the foundation, which in our case will be Canada? Certainly not; because we do not see in it anything of the great races which founded Canada. On the contrary, in looking at that flag we do not see something which survives in our mind, but that which represents something dead—a leaf that the wind carries away for ever.

A metamorphic sign means something that will immediately, at the sight of it, recall the origin of our country and its founders.

Personally, I want for Canada a national flag. We must remember that the United States was separated from England by a revolution; but that is not the case with Canada.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Méthot: We want a flag which reminds us of our founders. This is the flag we need, and nothing else. We need such a flag with the condition that we will be able to carry it not only in this country, not only in one province, not only in one home, but all over the world—even at a meeting of the Commonwealth.

We must also remember that a flag must rally around it and unite the people of this country, and not divide them.

Honourable senators, this is why I am still convinced that the best thing that was said in these last years was said by a Prime Minister who, although not now in office, is still living. I refer to the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, who said:

> We want a flag that will unite and not divide, and the minute you will agree, I will give you one.

I am 100 per cent in favour of this kind of thinking. This is the reason I will vote for the amendment. A great majority of the country is not in favour of the flag proposed in this motion; as a matter of fact not one would be ready to vote for it if he had not in mind that we are going to have a second flag, one that would clear the conscience of those who would vote for the first one.

The definition of a flag, which I mentioned at the beginning, is that it must be a sign around which a party can rally. This does not, in the present case, mean one party only, but "Canada as a whole party," as was the case in 1867 when Confederation came into being as the product of the Liberal-Conservative party—everybody being united to decide on the British North America Act. On that subject you can read the speeches that were made later on, even by the Honourable Honoré Mercier, when he spoke on Confederation—and he was the Prime Minister of Quebec and a Liberal.

Can we say that the flag proposed is the result of agreement by the whole of Canada? I think it is exactly the contrary. When I saw people in my city carrying this new flag on their automobiles, I was able to see, without being in error, that it was carried by a porte-étendard of only one group of our country, a group supporting the Liberal party.

To try to obtain the consent of a larger group, I noticed yesterday that my good friend, Senator Hugessen, was telling those who were against the new flag, or, at least, not much in favour, that we were going to have another flag. This idea could even be noticed in the main motion, because if we read it we note the words: "That this house recommend to the Government that steps... be taken to have designated as the national flag of Canada..."

In his speech, the Leader of the Government, (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) spoke of a national flag. In the French version, we have the words "comme drapeau du Canada et non comme le drapeau du Canada;" those three different designations meaning that we may, in the very near future, be asked to vote for another flag. I think this would hold Canada up to ridicule.

Does that mean that the motion is asking us to vote for something that we are going to be ashamed of, or for something that we need to correct by a second vote?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Mr. Méthot: I will not say anything more now, except to add that we are really confronted by a motion proposing to have a negative flag, not a distinctive one, which will have to be corrected by another.

(Translation):

Honourable senators, I cannot bring this to a close without recalling the speech made by the honourable Senator O'Leary, who proposed the amendment. I already knew his eloquence, I already knew his vigour, but never before had I had the opportunity of appreciating his wisdom as I did the other day.

Another point I should like to add is that I am a French Canadian, both on my father's and my mother's side. Our immediate forebears were born in Trois Rivières or in the vicinity. I have practised law in my area for some 45-odd years and, with the exception of the last few years, my clientele as well as my practice has been 100 per cent French Canadian.

No one asked me, in order to succeed in life, to repudiate my origins; no one asked me to make concessions. I have never made any concessions, nor have I repudiated my origins.

Honourable senators, I may tell you that we must all preserve the memory of our origins. It is all very well to look to the future and then to the past. It is all very well to say that the Conservatives are not progressive, because in order to be progressive, we should forget those who preceded us. That is not the situation. I believe that on the other hand we should retain our origins.

We realize that in Canada various races live together, in a spirit of unity, and that they progress together.

Let us preserve our origin, whether we be Anglo-Saxons, Scots, French, Jews or of any other race. But we must be united in Canada, and in order to do so, we must not repudiate anything; no one asks us to do so. Let our laws be respected, and Canada will continue to develop as it has done since 1867.

(Text):

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to detain you for any length of time, but I do wish to say a few words in this important debate.

May I say at the outset that I have been very proud indeed to listen to the remarks of my colleagues on this side of the house, and especially to hear what I think are the unanswerable arguments they have presented in support of our amendment.

Before entering into the particulars of this debate, I wish to make it clear that I am not the last speaker for our party on this side. The honourable Senator Aseltine will be be speaking after me. He had a long and tiresome trip to the west and back, and we gave him time this afternoon to rest a little and prepare his remarks. Also the honourable Senator Grosart, who is the seconder of this amendment, will wind up the debate for the Opposition.

It has been a good debate, honourable senators, and like the preceding speakers I wish to congratulate the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) for his presentation of the case for the Government. I listened to his speech with care. From an historical standpoint it was complete and most interesting, but I sometimes wondered, as I listened to him, just what his remarks had to do with the motion before us. He recited a long catalogue of the wonderful things that have happened in this country since the days of Confederation. They have been wonderful events in Canadian history. We as Canadians have every reason to be proud of the accomplishments of our country since the days of Confederation 97 years ago, but I would point out to my honourable friend that the great progress we have made, the many things that we have accomplished, were accomplished under the Canadian Ensign and under no other flag.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What about the Union Jack?

Hon. Mr. Brooks: And they were accomplished, honourable senators, not in spite of our British connections, may I say, but due to them and our French Canadian association and heritage—due to the two great strains of Canadianism, the British and French races, which are the undisputed great races of this world.

With regard to the speech made by Senator Grattan O'Leary, it is not necessary for me to add to what has already been said, but I could not proceed without making reference to it. I have been in Parliament for many years, and I think I can truthfully say that with few exceptions I have never heard a finer speech, either in the House of Commons or the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: I am not only speaking from the literary standpoint, but more particularly from that of the unanswerable logic of his remarks. Frankly, as I listened to him, and as I read his remarks since, I could not and still cannot see how any member of the Senate, unless he is controlled by a deep-rooted political bias, cannot support the amendment which was presented by honourable Senator Grattan O'Leary.

This is the great opportunity for the Canadian Senate to display that sober second thought for which purpose the Senate was established many years ago; and I do not mind saying that the public is watching the Senate with very great interest, to see whether we are going to be a rubber stamp for the House of Commons or whether we are going to assert our own individuality as a Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: They want to see if we will exercise that independence which is so necessary and so clearly indicated at this time—and, may I add, which would so clearly justify our existence.

The debates, both in the House of Commons and here, as far as the Government is concerned, have not been enthusiastic. In the House of Commons for days there were no speakers at all on the Government side supporting a case. But it is easy to understand why they were not enthusiastic. The speeches on the Government side in this chamber have not been enthusiastic. The reason is there is nothing in this flag to be enthusiastic about. In certain quarters there is satisfaction; we know that. However, it is not because of what the flag contains but because of what has been left out of the flag. It is a negative rather than a positive flag that is being presented today to the Canadian people.

Frankly, I had hoped that it would not be necessary for this chamber to debate the issue at this time. I had hoped that the Prime Minister of this country would realize that there is no unanimity in Canada for the adoption of the suggested flag, which is the subject of the resolution before us and of the amendment. In fact, there is a great difference of opinion, according to the polls across this country.

The honourable Senator Croll said the other day that according to his poll—he did not tell us how he took it—he was of the opinion there was a great majority in this country in favour of the new flag. I remember a few years ago when Harry Truman ran for election in the United States, the opinion polls were strongly against him, and when someone asked him what he thought of the Gallup Poll he suggested a formula for polls. I do not know of any poll that has ever been more deserving of this formula than the poll suggested by the honourable Senator Croll.

Honourable senators, at this season of the year our thoughts turn to peace on earth and good will toward men. The Government commits an act which can only bring sorrow and bitterness to tens of thousands of people in this country. The timing was ill-chosen.

I do not intend to become sentimental in this debate, but I must confess that if and when the flag now flying over these parliament buildings is run down and another takes its place, that event will cause me, to say the least, considerable sorrow and heartache; and I know it is going to have that effect on many, many thousands of people across Canada.

Some say the debate has been too long; and indeed, it has been a long debate. But there have been many excellent speeches. Time has been taken which the people say could better have been used for other purposes. However, I would point out to my honourable friend the fact that it was the Prime Minister and the Government of this country who introduced this debate, and the Prime Minister was the only person who could have stopped the debate and gone on with the rest of the business of this country.

Senator McCutcheon yesterday mentioned this matter and dealt with some of the items that could have been attended to. Redistribution, of course, has been attended to and it is an important matter. There is the question of the Canada Pension Plan; that has been off again and on again, as the Irishman says, and I do not know when it will be brought forward again. Time should have been taken with the provinces to deal with these very important matters instead of having this flag debate. Then, there is the labour code to be considered, a very important subject. This too could have been attended to by this Parliament, instead of spending weeks debating the flag issue. There is also the recapitalization of the C.N.R. I could go on and on and mention many such matters which should have been attended to by this Government instead of bringing on this flag issue which the people did not want.

I have no wish to be repetitious, but in other speeches it was mentioned that this was the first opportunity the Senate had to express its views. We have been told this was an election issue. I know what went on in the last federal election in this country, and I do not think the matter of the flag was mentioned on more than three or four platforms across the country. The people knew nothing about it. We did not know there was going to be a flag issue before this Parliament. I say there is no mandate from the people of Canada for a flag. It was never mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. The first we heard of it, as has been said so often, was when the Prime Minister himself introduced the three maple leaves design as a flag.

When the matter had been discussed for many days in the House of Commons, pressure was brought to bear to set up a committee. This is something which should have been done at the very beginning. A joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons should have been set up at the very outset. But after the matter had been debated for many weeks and after all members had taken firm stands on the matter then, and not until then, was a committee set up. In my view that was a poor time to appoint a committee, after members had already made up their minds. We know the result; there was a change in the recommendation for a flag—one maple leaf instead of three, and only that.

Now, honourable senators, I want to compare the procedure used in introducing the flag in this Parliament in 1964 to that used in the twentieth Parliament in 1945 and 1946. At that time it was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and I would like to read to this house what was said on that occasion for those honourable members who have not already read it themselves. I am sure many senators have gone back and read in Hansard the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the first session of the twentieth Parliament. We all know this speech is prepared by the Prime Minister and the cabinet and is read by the Governor General. At that time the words of the then Prime Minister were as follows:

> Honourable Members of the Senate:
> Members of the House of Commons:
> My ministers believe that the position attained by our country among the nations of the world makes it desirable that Canada, like the other nations of the British Commonwealth, should possess a distinctive national flag. You will be asked to appoint a select committee of members of both Houses of Parliament to consider a suitable design for a Canadian flag.
>
> The Government has directed that, pending approval by Parliament of a particular design, the Canadian Red Ensign which was the flag carried into battle by the Canadian army—

And this was recognized by the Government at that time.

> —and which was flown from the Peace Tower on V-E Day and V-J Day as a tribute to the valour of our armed forces and to Canada's achievements in war, may be displayed wherever place or occasion makes it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

There the Government of the day considered the ensign a distinctive Canadian flag. They put it in their Speech from the Throne, and the Governor General read it. Nevertheless, the other day I listened to my very good friend, Senator Crerar—a man for whom I have great admiration, as has everyone in this chamber, because he is one of the great men in Canadian parliamentary life—and I was surprised to hear him state that he did not consider the Red Ensign a distinctive Canadian flag. I am not sure whether he was in the cabinet in 1945, but if he was not, the men who wrote these words were his colleagues just a short time before.

Now I wish to deal with some of the speeches made on the Speech from the Throne of that year, and while I do not intend to quote extensively from them, nevertheless, I would like to cite one in particular. I refer to the speech of the honourable Senator Hugessen who, I regret to see, is not here this evening. He made a very eloquent speech. I might say, honourable senators, that during the first session I was a member of the Senate I had so little to do, since I was not on any of the committees, I spent a considerable amount of time reading from the speeches of senators in days gone by. I found it to be a very gratifying and rewarding task. Few people are aware of the great wealth there is in the Senate Hansard. There you have speeches of men like Meighen and Dandurand and many others. I place Senator Hugessen among those men who have made the fine speeches and also, I may add, Senator Lambert and many others who are still members of this house. I refer you in particular to part of the speech which had to do with the setting up of the committee on a flag, where Senator Hugessen had this to say:

> Now I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am proud of the Union Jack . . . It gives me a thrill to see it flutter in the breeze.

Senator Horner, our late, dear friend, asked: "What is the matter with it now?" Senator Hugessen went on to say:

> The fact remains that it is the flag of Great Britain.

That is right.

> It has no particular designation to show that it has any special connection with Canada—

And I say that that is not what the Government is arguing in the other place at the present time.

> —and, as the Speech from the Throne indicated, I think it is now time for us, like the other members of the British Commonwealth, to design a flag of our own.

He went on further to say:

> I have given some thought to this question of a national flag, and for what it may be worth, I offer some suggestions to the House. It seems to me that it should fulfil three requirements. First, it should incorporate in a position of prominence and honour the Union Jack.

This is Senator Hugessen, who spoke in this chamber last night and defended the new flag, and opposed the amendment of Honourable Senator O'Leary.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: He must have forgotten what he said in 1945.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: There must be some reason. He went on:

> The second essential to my mind, is that it should include in a position of prominence and honour some symbol or design to represent the blood of France that flows in the veins of nearly one-third of our citizens.

That is what we are saying in our amendment.

> The third requirement should be that our flag must bear some symbol or emblem that is distinctive of our own country, and which all the world will recognize as such. I suggest that the emblem might be, for instance, the maple leaf or some similar emblem. A fourth element which I think would be desirable, is that our national flag should be as simple in design as possible.

One would almost think that Senator Hugessen had prepared the amendment that we are now presenting to the Senate.

There were other speeches. The late Senator Duff, coming as he did originally from Newfoundland and later from Nova Scotia, made a strong appeal for the Ensign and for the Union Jack. Senator Kinley spoke. His only objection to the Ensign at that time—and he did not really object to it—was that he thought it might be our flag with some modification. He said it was a flag that was flown on ships at sea. I have been told, and I think anyone who lives in a seaport will realize, that half the flags of the world are flown on both land and sea. That is no objection to it.

Senator Hugessen made the speech I have referred to on October 3, 1945, and I was reading from page 36 of the Debates of the Senate of 1945. I ask myself and all honourable senators—and I am sorry to ask this—how can anyone reconcile the statement made by the honourable Senator Hugessen in 1945, 19 years ago, with the statement he made in this house last night?

Senator Thorvaldson last night quoted Senator Lambert. May I say here that Senator Lambert is another honourable senator for whom I have the greatest admiration, and he also supported, as far as anyone can judge from his remarks, a distinctive Canadian flag which contains something of the history of this country. I shall read what was said by him at that time, and I point out that this was not said in the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne but upon the setting-up of the joint committee:

> In his later years Joseph Howe said this:
> A wise nation gathers up its records, preserves its muniments, and fosters national pride and love of country by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

We have often heard that quotation, and Joseph Howe was a very great Canadian. Senator Lambert went on to say:

> It seems to me that at this time, as we in common with the rest of the world enter upon a new era of history, a Canadian flag should suggest these things increasingly to the mind of our people. It is this thought which should be ever present with the members of the joint committee that will be appointed after the adoption of this resolution.

Senator Lambert was chairman of the committee, and an excellent chairman. I was a member of the House of Commons when this committee sat, as were some other of my colleagues here. Day in and day out, week in and week out, they considered over 2,000 samples, as I shall call them, of flags that were submitted to them. They came to a conclusion. They had a vote, and by a majority of 23 to 1 they recommended a certain flag. It had the Union Jack in the corner and a maple leaf on the fly. The report was never brought before Parliament.

Senator Lambert said last night—and he was more or less correct—that there was a little controversy over the size of the Union Jack. Nobody wanted to discard the Union Jack, but there was a little controversy over the size of it on the proposed flag. Apart from that, there was general approval. It is my opinion—and it was my opinion when I was a member of the House of Commons—that had this report of the committee been brought before Parliament it would have received the support of an overwhelming majority of the House of Commons, and I am sure it would have been passed by the Senate, and we would have had a flag today without all this fuss and nonsense. However, I am told that there were certain few people then who did not want the Union Jack at all, and that that was the reason why it was discarded.

Honourable senators, there are other quotations that I could make, but I shall not do so. I did intend reading some excerpts from the letter of May 27, 1964 that was addressed to the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson by certain outstanding gentlemen. Senator Yuzyk has already read from it. This letter was signed by such men as Dr. Forsey, Dr. Creighton, Professor W. L. Morton, the President of Trent University, barristers, doctors and so on. They are very outstanding men from every walk of life across Canada. I do not think it will be harmful if I quote just two paragraphs:

> We are not in the position of a country with a revolutionary tradition, creating itself anew; we exist because we have inherited the past without a revolutionary upheaval. It is false and dispiriting to adopt a flag which subtly ignores the truth of our own nature. This is not the kind of symbol to rally a bewildered and demoralized nation.

This is addressed to the Prime Minister of Canada:

> We respectfully suggest that you withdraw the maple leaf design—

As honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) called to our attention, this refers to the design with the three maple leaves, but whether it was a design with three maple leaves or one maple leaf does not make any difference to their argument.

> We respectfully suggest that you withdraw the maple leaf design for the time being, and that you convoke at once a private meeting of the parliamentary leaders of all parties to agree upon a new design which asserts our history.

That is what the people of Canada want—a flag that asserts their history.

> We profoundly believe that the present proposal will only deepen the spiritual malaise of Canada.

All honourable senators received a copy of this letter, and they are familiar with its contents.

May I be pardoned, honourable senators, if I make some remarks that have been made before? A flag designed on the basis of our amendment would perpetuate both the traditional designs, as has been suggested, for which our soldiers have fought in two world wars, and would reflect the long history of a unique racial partnership. Such origins should be perpetuated proudly, and not buried in the bland anonymity of a piece of white bunting. A flag is intended to stir emotions, not to dampen them. Only a flag such as we have suggested can truly reflect this nation's pride in its past, and its aspirations for the future.

Some say: Why bother with our pride in the past? Let us only live for the present and the future. I say that no great nation does that.

We have heard some compelling reasons why the symbols of the past should be retained. I intend to quote from a speech made by a man who was Prime Minister for a far longer time than any other Prime Minister in the Commonwealth. This is what Mr. Mackenzie King said, and I hardly need repeat it:

> The new Canadian flag should certainly contain the Union Jack. It would be unthinkable to have a flag for this Dominion which did not contain the Union Jack.

I shall go this far and say that if Mr. Mackenzie King, or Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Bennett or Mr. Diefenbaker, had been Prime Minister of this country during the last 16 months we would not be in the position we are today regarding a flag.

I agree that it is utter folly to speak as some have done of breaking up Confederation if this or that design is not chosen. There is more strength to this confederation of ours than that. Yet, once the relative importance of the issue has been established it is quite right that something should be said about the value of retaining in the national flag the symbols of this country's origins, and this is exactly what we are trying to do with this amendment.

The two great facts of our national existence are, first, our British heritage which gave us our language, our laws, our form of government and, indeed, all the principles and values which guard our way of life, and, second, the Empire of New France which joined with the British in North America in equal partnership. Surely, any flag purporting to represent this country must reflect the dual origin of all the institutions and outlooks which are uniquely Canadian, and which impart a distinctly Canadian character to the people and nation. It is the measure of total inadequacy of Mr. Pearson's proposed flag, that its symbolism reflects not a trace of this rich and unique national heritage. In all sincerity and with all common sense and in my humble opinion, it should be rejected out of hand.

Honourable senators, I have some notes on the history of the Red Ensign. I will not read them. We have had speakers most eloquently present the Ensign before the other house and before this house. It has been our accepted flag since Confederation. It is distinctive. We have had ample proof of that from the remarks I have mentioned tonight.

If I may be personal, my mind goes back—one realizes that he is getting to be an old man—over 60 years ago to when I was in a little school in New Brunswick. I heard my good friend Senator Irvine speak last night, and it brought back very fond memories of those days. We flew the Canadian Ensign. That was over 60 years ago. Two boys were always selected in the school each week to look after the raising and lowering of the flag. They were very proud to do it. It was the Canadian Ensign. Under it tens of thousands of men served in the army, in both wars. I never knew that the Canadian Ensign was not our Canadian flag until I came up here as a Member of Parliament. I am sure most of the people in New Brunswick and across Canada have always looked on and have always thought that the Canadian Ensign was the Canadian flag.

It has been said that the provinces have flags. I listened to the honourable Senator Phillips this afternoon speaking about Prince Edward Island and saying it now has a provincial flag. Quebec has a flag, a beautiful flag. Often when I motor from New Brunswick to Ottawa, I come through Quebec and I see thousands of the fleur-de-lis flags flying. They are very proud of it and they have just right to be, because it shows their history and their past. But in Quebec also, besides there being four million or more French Canadians, there are a million English-speaking Canadians. I have never heard one English-speaking Canadian—although I do not believe they were ever consulted—object to the Quebec flag, the fleur-de-lis. They have been very proud of it and I know that many of them fly it. But we do not want flags in every province. We will have balkanized states if we have flags in every province. This flag that is suggested with a Union Jack and a fleur-de-lis surely will represent us all across Canada.

How about the French-speaking people outside the Province of Quebec? Would it not be well for them to look up to a flag that had the fleur-de-lis on it, that represents the great men in Canadian history of the French race? It would represent Champlain, Frontenac, Jacques Cartier and many others too numerous to mention. The British people would see the Union Jack that represents the great explorers and the people of the British race who helped with their French compatriots to build this great country of ours.

I think that in time people from one end of Canada to the other, French and English, would learn to love and respect the flag which gave them the history and told them something about the past.

Senator White, in his excellent speech, spoke of the Canadian soldiers. It has been said the Canadian soldiers did not fight under the Ensign in France. Well, the flags of the day are not like the flags of medieval days. In those days the battles were different. In battle they gathered around a flag to defend it. As Senator White has said, and as Senator Hugessen mentioned yesterday, in the First World War there were over 300 miles of trenches and mud, and your only associates were lice, rats and the enemy across the trenches. They did not stick up a flag and wave it along the front line. It would have been shot with many bullet holes before it had been up ten minutes.

What happened in France in the First World War? Who were the people who were defending those 300 miles of trenches? On the left we had Great Britain and the Commonwealth; on the right we had France. What were the flags of the countries from which the people came? On the right, from Britain it was the Union Jack, from Australia it was the Australian flag, which is certainly, in their opinion, a distinctive flag, although it has a Union Jack next to the masthead. The New Zealanders had their flag, the South Africans had theirs, with the small Union Jack, and the Canadians went over under the Red ensign. Those were the flags. Whether anybody says that they fought under them or not, those were the flags of the nations which were fighting alongside France in those days when the civilization of the world was in danger. The same was true of the Second World War. It is not necessary to emphasize those facts.

I am sorry that there is dissension in Canada over this matter. I think we could have a great united people, and I think we will have, but this suggested flag has made it most difficult. I was very pleased to hear Senator Vaillancourt speak. He asserted—and I think it is a fact—that it is outside influence which is causing a lot of the trouble, not only in this country but in other countries.

I read an article not so long ago on Cyprus, where the Greeks and the Turks were being stirred up. I read that in Switzerland, where there was a Canton for a thousand years, the French and German descendants had got along well, and that now strife is being stirred up. The same is true in Belgium, with regard to French and the Flemish. The same applies in Viet Nam between the Christians and the Buddhists; and in the Sudan between the Arabs and the Negroes.

This is what the article said:

> We cannot help but wonder if there is not some wicked and sinister influence from outside world which is making dupes and tools of the peoples of those countries.

I think we should be very careful in this country. Let them not make dupes of Canadians. Our flag, if we have it, is to have a maple leaf. I am proud of the maple leaf. You could not travel up the Saint John River from Saint John to Fredericton or up around my home in Sussex, New Brunswick, and not be very proud of the maple.

Again, when I was a boy at school, I remember that we were taught different songs, one of which was "The Maple Leaf":

> The maple leaf, our emblem dear
> The maple leaf forever.
> God save the Queen
> And Heaven bless
> The maple leaf forever.

We were taught also "God Save the Queen". That has always been my feeling towards the maple, but I do not think it was ever intended to be the main part of a flag.

Senator Phillips said he thinks he knows the people of Prince Edward Island and the Atlantic provinces, and he does. I have lived in the Atlantic provinces for many years, I think I also understand the people there. I do not care what gallup polls may indicate in Canada, but in the heart of the great majority of the people of the Atlantic provinces they are definitely opposed to any change in their flag.

This afternoon Senator Baird spoke, I am sure from the heart, and for the people of Newfoundland. The old City of St. John's has had a flag for 400 years. It is not going to pull it down for a new flag such as is being offered us today.

Take the City of Halifax, which has, I suppose, as great a history as any seaport in the whole British Commonwealth. I remember it in two wars. There were flags flying from hundreds of ships that left the port. Go to Halifax today and you will see hundreds of flags flying, the Canadian Ensign, if you will. They are flown by the air force, the navy and the army. Is Halifax going to pull down all those flags and put up a nondescript flag like the one that is being offered us? I do not think so!

Throughout Canada we are all proud of Charlottetown, that great little city, for the reception it gave to the Queen, and also the reception it gave to people from other parts who went there to help them celebrate the 100th anniversary of the proposed confederation. Do you think Charlottetown is going to pull down the flag she has had for all these years and put up this new flag? I do not think so. If its people have to do so, they will, but they will not want to.

The same is true of Fredericton, an old, old city. I know the sentiment of the people in Fredericton. They will be deeply hurt and opposed to this change.

I could go on and speak of other cities across the country, the old city of Kingston, Brantford, London, Kitchener, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and Victoria. Are all of these cities, after Christmas, going to pull down their flags and put up a flag, which I know in their hearts they do not like, and will not like for many years to come, if ever they do? Not if we can prevent it.

I hope, as I said at the beginning, that the sober second thought of the Senate will exercise itself and that we shall vote for this amendment. If we do so, I believe we shall be preserving, and will preserve for the future the unity of our country.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I just wish to speak briefly, both to the amendment and to the flag issue generally.

I think that congratulations are in order as to the manner in which this debate has been conducted. I will mention the speech of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West), of the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton), the one we heard this evening from our friend and colleague from Three Rivers (Hon. Mr. Méthot), and the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks)—a fighting speech, I may say. All these speeches were well thought out and ably delivered.

I deeply regret that I was absent yesterday when 15 senators spoke on this debate. At that time Senator Pearson and I were on a very trying mission. In a day and a night we travelled over 4,000 miles. On that account, I hope honourable senators will pardon me if I have not prepared my remarks as well as I would otherwise have done, for I have really not had the opportunity to do so.

From the speeches I have heard, and others which were delivered yesterday, which I have read briefly, it is quite obvious that the Senate of Canada is making an honest attempt to give this controversial matter a good, sober second thought.

I believe I have said something before in this chamber with respect to my ancestral background. My people settled in what is now the United States, in the State of Pennsylvania, many years ago. They settled there when the states of that time were colonies of Britain, and they settled under the Union Jack, as the flag was constituted at that time. The Cross of St. Patrick was not yet in the Union Jack. They were greatly attracted to the freedom of speech, the freedom of religion, and the other freedoms that flag bestowed upon them.

After the rebellion, my people became known as United Empire Loyalists, because they remained loyal to the mother country under whose flag they lived. They received such terrible treatment that they were obliged to give up all of their property—their land, horses and cattle, and their homes, furniture, all their personal effects—and emigrate to another country.

If that had taken place nowadays, they would be called D.P.'s—displaced persons. My ancestors were certainly D.P.'s in those days. They came to Canada and settled in the district along the Bay of Quinte, in the Province of Ontario. I was born at Napanee. My people lived in the Bay of Quinte district also under the Union Jack, and later on under the Red Ensign. There they found and enjoyed freedom of speech, freedom of religion and freedom to live one's own life. They certainly revered the Union Jack and the Red Ensign, and so did I, and have done all my life, and I cannot dissociate myself from doing so at this time.

I intended to speak at some length about what happened in 1945 and 1946 with respect to the selection of a distinctive national flag, and to compare what happened then with what has and is happening now. Much to my surprise, however, the honourable the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) stole some of my thunder. However, one reason for mentioning this is that I was a member of the first committee which was set up in 1945.

I have before me the Debates of the Senate for 1945. At page 285 the following resolution was introduced in the Senate by the Honourable Wishart McL. Robertson:

> That in the opinion of the Senate it is expedient that Canada possess a distinctive national flag . . .

Now comes the important part:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a joint committee of both Houses to consider and report upon a suitable design for such a flag.

And listen to this:

> That the honourable Senators David, Davies, Gershaw, Gouin, Howden, Johnston, Lambert, Léger, McRae, Quinn, Robinson and White be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate as members of the joint committee.

Shortly after the committee commenced its proceedings, I took the place of Senator McRae, as he was unable to be present.

That is the way it was done in 1945, and that is the way, in my opinion, it should have been done in 1964.

Honourable senators will realize that five of the members of that committee are still members of the Senate and taking an active part in the work of this chamber, namely, Senators Davies, Gouin, Gershaw, Lambert and Aseltine.

The committee sat, and Senator Lambert and the Honourable Walter Harris of the House of Commons were made joint chairmen. And believe me they were good chairmen, handling its business completely to my satisfaction, at any rate.

I have here the Journals of the Senate for that year, and I find on page 285 that the committee made its final report on December 5. It was reported that the committee held two meetings, in the course of which the question of a suitable design for a distinctive national flag, in accordance with the Order of Reference of the Senate of 21st November, 1945, and the Order of Reference of the House of Commons of 14th November, 1945, was carefully considered. Then the report states that certain witnesses were heard and addresses delivered on the technical-historical aspects of the question under study. However, the report goes on to say that the committee was not able to formulate a specific recommendation in the time at its disposal, and recommended that a similar joint committee be set up to continue the study of the question during the next session of Parliament. That is about all that took place in 1945.

In 1946 the matter was again brought up. I have in my hand the Debates of the Senate for that year. The House of Commons named its members to the joint committee of 1946, and the Senate, on the 27th day of March, named its members. They were: Senators David, Davies, Gershaw, Gouin, Howden, Johnston, Lambert, Léger, McRae, Quinn, Robinson and White. You will note I was not a member in 1946, Senator McRae having become a member of the new committee. However, because I was vitally interested in this flag question I attended almost every meeting the committee held in 1946. Those senators who were members of that committee and who are still alive and active members of the Senate today are: Senators Davies, Gershaw, Gouin and Lambert.

On the 11th day of July this committee came to a decision as to the kind of flag they were going to recommend to Parliament. I was able to find a copy of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the committee, and I note that on July 11 a vote was taken in the committee and, as has been stated, they decided by a vote of 23 to 1 that a certain flag should be authorized. The only member who voted against the final report of the committee was a member of the House of Commons by the name of Mr. Lacroix.

I have here, honourable senators, the report which that committee submitted to Parliament. It is to be found in the Journals of the Senate of July 23, 1946, at page 362. Briefly, this is the decision of the committee:

> Your Committee held fourteen public sessions.
> The submission of designs to the Committee was publicly invited and up to and including this date, 2,695 designs were received and considered. In addition, communications in the form of written letters, resolutions and printed form cards and printed form letters to the number of 42,168 were received and wherever the sender's name and address were given, receipt was acknowledged.

And then it goes on to say that certain distinguished historians and others gave evidence and assisted in the arrival at the decision that was finally reached by the committee.

> By a process of elimination the members of the Committee finally reduced their selection to one design, which has been evolved in the course of the deliberations of the Committee. The Committee has not prescribed the exact details of the design but has agreed upon the following recommendation:...

And this is the important part:

> Your Committee recommends that the National Flag of Canada should be the Canadian red ensign with a maple-leaf in autumn golden colours in a bordered background of white, replacing the coat-of-arms in the fly; the whole design to be so proportioned that the size and position of the maple-leaf in relation to the Union Jack in the Canton will identify it as a symbol distinctive of Canada as a nation.

That report was submitted to the Senate and was ordered to lie on the table; and that is all that was ever done with it. I understand the same happened in the House of Commons. All the Government of the day had to do at that time was to adopt this resolution which had been decided on by the committee with practically a unanimous vote, and all this trouble we are going through would never have arisen. I do not know why they did not do that. I have never been able to find out why it was not done.

Compare how this matter was handled then to what has taken place this year. The joint committees of 1945 and 1946 were set up by virtue of what was stated in the Speech from the Throne, as the honourable Leader of the Opposition has said. In this case there was nothing in the Speech from the Throne about this at all, but the Government took it upon itself to submit a flag already decided upon and made up, a fait accompli, and to say to Parliament, "This is the flag; we want you to adopt it." Then after a long, long debate it was decided to set up a committee to study the matter, but that committee was not a joint committee like those of 1945 and 1946; it was a committee of the House of Commons alone. Honourable senators, the Senate was completely ignored and overlooked. That is one reason why I will never vote for this flag which that committee recommended. I think it should have been a joint committee; that this house should not have been snubbed by having been left out entirely; and that the Government used bad judgment in the way they handled the matter.

Now, honourable senators, I do not want anybody to think that I do not like the maple leaf. I said I was born in Ontario, and as a boy we used to go out in the spring and would tap these lovely maple trees by boring a hole in the trunk, putting in a spile and hanging a tin can on the trunk. Every day we would go out and gather sap which we sometimes boiled down to make it a little sweeter than it was when it came from the tree.

I love a tree; I love the maple tree and the beautiful leaves that grow on it. But I am not entirely enamoured of a foliage flag. We have green maple trees and we have some red maple trees; we see them here on the parliamentary lawn in the spring. Some of the leaves come out with a distinctive red tinge to them. These trees, honourable senators, are found in eastern Canada, in Ontario and Quebec and part of the Maritimes, but we do not have anything in the nature of a maple tree such as you know it, in western Canada, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia. The people out there do not think as much about maple leaves as do those of us who live in Ontario or who visit Ontario frequently and become acquainted with this lovely tree and its beautiful leaves.

I have nothing against the maple leaf and, as I have said, I want it to appear on our flag. But because of my background, which I mentioned briefly a short while ago, and because of the hundreds and thousands of letters and resolutions which have come to my attention, many of them directed to me personally, I have decided I want something more than a maple leaf on the flag. I want something to indicate our past history and our founding nations, and if we had the crosses as well, then we would have something on it which was of a religious nature.

Honourable senators, I like the Red Ensign very much, but I do not hold out for it entirely. What I would like to see is a small Union Jack at the pole, maybe in the centre of the flag where it joins the pole, and then a lovely gold maple leaf in the centre and some other emblems on the right-hand side—the fleur-de-lis or something to show the connection of the French race—and then perhaps some bars at the top and the bottom to show that the flag is flying from sea to sea. As I have said before I shall not vote for the single maple leaf.

You will gather, honourable senators, that I do not like the flag that has been presented to us by the other place and which we are being asked to rubber-stamp. We have not had anything to do with the design of that flag; we think we should have been consulted and our advice should have been sought. The only way this could have been done properly was by setting up a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament. I, for one, do not intend to rubber-stamp the flag resolution as presented to us by the other place.

I have other reasons. In the first place, this is a flag by closure, which I do not like at all, and I do not like the look of it. It is a dish-raggy, anaemic-looking flag. I come from Saskatchewan where we have dust storms in the spring. Can you imagine, honourable senators, that flag hanging up in a dust storm for two or three days over a public building and getting a shower of rain on it? Why, in my opinion, it would have the appearance of a soiled diaper, and I cannot warm up to anything like that—I have had some experience with those things too.

Another reason why I do not like the flag is because it is a political flag and will divide this country right down the middle. That is the last thing I want to see. In my view it is a strange Christmas present which is being forced upon us. We are being given a flag born in a manger of tumult and frustration, a forced birth so to speak, and we are being asked to thank "Santa Claus Pearson" for it.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Halifax North): Do not forget the wise men dealt with it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The former Premier of Saskatchewan said the other day that the Government should put aside this flag until a greater consensus can be obtained. I never agreed very much with the policies or accomplishments of this gentleman, who was Premier of our province at one time, but I do agree with him on this point. This is exactly what the O'Leary amendment asks for, and I intend to vote for it.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in rising to speak at this late after-dinner hour, I feel rather like that service club luncheon speaker who, as he rose to speak, asked the chairman how long his speech should last, and the chairman replied "Mister, you can speak as long as you like, but the rest of us are getting out of here at two o'clock." I do not know what the plans of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) are regarding hours of sitting, but I shall do my best to finish saying what I have to say before he empties the chamber.

As the seconder of Senator O'Leary's motion, I need hardly say I rise to support it and in Shakespeare's phrase:

> I would we were all of one mind and one mind good.

It is obvious, of course, honourable senators, that we are not all of one mind, and the duty therefore devolves upon me to state as briefly as possible my reasons for supporting the amendment.

It seems to me that before we vote I should remind honourable senators of what this amendment proposes. It puts forward three propositions; first, that further action on the flag be postponed at this time; second, that there be a reasonable time now given in an attempt to reach a greater degree of agreement on the design of our new flag than presently exists; third, that the design which is most likely to achieve that greater degree of agreement is one which would contain the appropriate symbols of our heritage and history.

By implication it seems to me that the amendment goes even further. Indeed, if I read the main motion correctly, it meets most of its objectives. It assumes that we will have a new flag. It assumes ihat we will be a distinctive flag, and it assumes that we will have it soon, or within a reasonable time.

I say that, because it does seem to me that a good deal of the discussion that has taken place, and indeed most of the arguments that have been put forward, presumably against the amendment, have completely ignored this basic fact.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that the arguments that have been put forward so far have not been arguments against the amendment, for the reasons I have indicated. I would say, as a matter of fact, I have not heard a single valid argument as to why we should not at this time devote a little more effort and thought to what is so important in these days in the interests of national unity, namely, that we should have more agreement.

I have heard excellent arguments for a distinctive new flag, and with most of them I agree. But, we are nearing a vote, and I ask honourable senators to search their minds and hearts carefully and cautiously, and ask themselves if there has been put forward here any valid argument why Senator O'Leary's amendment should not be adopted.

Its essence is that there be no precipitate action at this time, and that there be a further effort to reach agreement. Some will say—indeed, some have said—that this advocates delay. Of course it does, but not delay merely for the sake of delay; not delay to avoid decision, but delay to improve decision; not delay to thwart the will of the majority, but delay to give consideration to the feelings of the minority, if, indeed, it be a minority, a fact about which I think there is considerable doubt.

Some will say, as some have said, that no further agreement is possible. That to me is counsel of despair. I would very much doubt if there is a single honourable senator in this chamber at this time who has not in his private or public affairs known innumerable occasions on which something which at one moment seemed impossible proved, after time and effort had been spent on it, possible. Why, then, should anyone say that no further agreement is possible between the protagonists on this issue? What evidence is there to support such a suggestion? On the contrary, as I hope to point out in a moment, there is very considerable evidence that further compromise and agreement is possible if time is given.

There are five main reasons why I think action should be delayed. The first is that if at this time precipitate action is taken on this matter we will have a flag, as many honourable senators have said, born in a climate of intense partisanship. We are going through a period when divisive issues between Canadians have been, and are being, magnified far beyond their true importance. I can fully understand the objection of any Canadian in Quebec or elsewhere—because I am aware that the objection is taken elsewhere—to the Union Jack on any new Canadian flag. To those who see it as a symbol of continuing conquest I am entirely sympathetic, but I can also understand the deep emotional attachment of other Canadians to that same flag. However, I believe, as surely as I stand here, that this Government should in generosity and magnanimity, in consideration for the deep feelings of Canadians, give time in which those two viewpoints can be brought closer together than they are at the present in the suggested precipitate adoption of this flag.

It is unfortunate that this issue comes to us at this time as the result of an election pledge, but that is the fact and we cannot escape it. It is unfortunate that it comes at a time when—and I shall not lay the blame here or there—a new divisiveness has arisen among Canadians. We have heard a great deal lately about co-operative federalism, and yet here it seems to me we are faced with a situation where, whatever the percentages may or may not be of Canadians who are for or against this design, every survey I have seen and every bit of evidence that has come to my hand makes one thing clear, that there is not a majority of Canadians in a majority of provinces who are in favour of this design. I do not know whether this has been overlooked. Perhaps it has been deliberately overlooked, and this is the reason for the adamant refusal of a plebiscite. Perhaps a plebiscite would make this fact clear. Surely, honourable senators, it is a mistake to impose a flag when there is evidence, or at least a very grave suspicion, that the majority of Canadians in the majority of provinces are against this design.

I plead at this time for the application of the principles of co-operative federalism which has had, I must admit, considerable success in solving some other problems. I plead that the spirit and principle of co-operative federalism be now applied, and I suggest that if they are applied honestly the Government will have to say to themselves: We cannot proceed with this when not merely the majority of one province objects to it, but when a majority in a majority of provinces object to it.

Where, I ask the Leader of the Government and honourable senators, is co-operative federalism at this moment on this issue?

My second reason for suggesting that a delay at this time would be in the general interest is that this is, of course, an imposed decision. I need not validate that statement, I think, because it has been already proved in the regrettable use of closure. I suggest that Senator O'Leary's amendment offers a palliative to the harm and the hurt that has been done by it. It offers an opportunity to those who closed the doors, to open them again, and were they to do so I predict that they would draw to themselves the admiration and the approbation of a very large majority of the Canadian public.

At this moment I think of those great lines of Kipling:

> If you can meet with triumph and disaster
>
> And treat those two imposters just the same...
> You'll be a man, my son.

I say to my friends opposite that the apparent victory at this time is "an imposter." I would plead with them to see this imposter, this imposter of the spirit of Canadians, for what he is, and treat this imposter in their house the same as they would treat the other imposter, the imposter of defeat.

My third reason is that at this time the adoption of this flag necessarily means the overriding of the feelings, the opinions, the wishes of a substantial minority, if it be a minority, of Canadians. I have mentioned the provincial aspect of that. I have heard it said that this or that percentage is in favour of this flag or some other flag. I do not know the answer. As far as I know, nobody knows the answer. It is one of the most amazing things about this decision, that no attempt has been made, as far as I know, to get the facts. Indeed, the suggestion that the facts be obtained before this matter went any further, has been turned down. It matters not whether 65 or 70 per cent of Canadians will go along with this new design. What matters is that there are, at the lowest estimate I have seen, 35 to 40 per cent Canadians whose feelings are being ridden over roughshod.

Where does the Senate stand? As I have read the history of this great chamber, what impressed me more than anything was that its greatest historic role was the protection of minority rights. If ever there were an opportunity presented to this honourable body to rise to the occasion of that historic challenge, surely this is it. Surely here, in a matter of the greatest and gravest national importance, the Senate is not going to say "Forget the minority; we will not stand up for that minority."

Honourable senators, if this were a bill affecting a public company and if we were faced with the situation where a majority, following the directions of the executive of a company, were treating minority rights and feelings as they are now being treated here, what would we do? We would refer such a bill to a committee, and we would insist that there be delay until a thorough investigation had been made of the rights of that minority. Will we do this now? Will we do less for those Canadians who have strong emotional feelings on this matter than we would do for a minority of shareholders in an ordinary company?

My fourth reason is that I believe that very shortly our Constitution will be "repatriated"—to use the current, though not altogether correct, word. It seems to me that this would give an excellent opportunity for a much more objective discussion of this question of a flag than we have had so far. Indeed, I think nobody will argue for one moment that there has been any objective collecting done, any objective analysis, any objective assessment or objective judgment in this very important matter.

In the atmosphere that will surely be, when we discuss our Constitution anew, men will cast their minds back to 100 years ago almost, and try to recreate that atmosphere —conciliation, compromise and agreement— which brought about this nation.

I cannot believe that inspired and dedicated men, wrestling as they will be with more difficult and more controversial problems than this, will not be able to deal with this problem more effectively in a few months than has been done so far.

My fifth reason, which I have already indicated, is that surely this is a matter which raises a special challenge to the Senate. I have mentioned the matter of minority rights. I would remind honourable senators that Senator Grattan O'Leary's amendment asks only the exercise of sober second thought. It asks only the cognizance of essential minority rights. It asks only of the Senate action to preserve historic symbols of our history and heritage.

Honourable senators, I come now to the second large principle in Senator O'Leary's amendment. Why do I think that further agreement is possible? Among many reasons, I will mention only four.

The first is that we have already had a measure of agreement, we have already had compromise. The flag which is before us is not the flag which was introduced into the House of Commons at the start of these discussions. The Government wisely, as certain circumstances developed, withdrew from its first position and took other steps which resulted in not merely a compromise, but a compromise flag. In my mind, it should not be criticized on that score.

The Opposition, as I read their attitudes in the debates, and in discussions outside the house, have also compromised considerably. The stand they are taking does not seem to me to be today, or in the last few days of this debate, as adamant as it was in the beginning. Far from it. These two antagonists have come a long way together. What is the evidence that they cannot be brought more closely together? If there is such evidence, I have not heard it. This compromise was achieved under what I think we would all agree are the worst possible circumstances. Senator O'Leary's amendment suggests that, under much better circumstances, much more agreement and compromise could be reached. It has the possibility of that compromise and that will haunt Canadians for a generation, if that possibility is at this time forgotten and arbitrarily brushed aside.

My second reason, cogent to the first, is that this discussion has, in my view at least, brought about a new degree of understanding between English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians.

My impression is that all across this country English-speaking Canadians have come to understand the importance to their French-speaking fellow Canadians of their race, religion, laws, institutions, culture and background. I am assured by those who know much more than I do about these matters that much the same thing has happened in the Province of Quebec, that many there, reading, hearing of the attachment of English-speaking Canadians to certain symbols, have come to understand that those symbols have for others all the deep affection and deep love that those understandable symbols of French Canadianism have for those who hold them. I did not expect in my lifetime to see such a rapprochement in at least a large part of both English-speaking and French-speaking Canada. What a pity it would be, honourable senators, if this new flag, instead of being a symbol of the meeting of Canadian minds, were to be another symbol of the old misunderstanding, misinterpretation and misrepresentation that has divided us in the past.

My third reason for believing that agreement is possible is that we can now turn the horror of the last five or six months into an asset, because I believe that if Senator O'Leary's amendment were adopted, if we had a cooling-off period, a breathing space, those who would then sit down to try to resolve this problem anew would be spurred on by their determination not to let this matter go back into the holocaust of the House of Commons, under the circumstances with which we have been faced with the present decision.

If one looks back to our origins, one finds evidence that this may well be so, for surely it was the fear of return to the old frustrations that was the major motivating force in bringing about Confederation and this new nation.

In Upper and Lower Canada it was the determination not to go back to the struggles of the fifties and sixties, when the capital of the province of Canada was being moved from one city to another every few years, when finally it was impossible for any government to remain in power. In the Maritimes it was a determination not to go back to those economic and other frustrations of other years, which became the motivating force of this nation.

I believe there is a lesson for us to learn in our attempt to resolve this new problem of that new nation.

My fourth reason for believing that agreement could be reached if Senator O'Leary's amendment were adopted is that it would then take this matter out of Parliament. I have the greatest respect for Parliament, but I do know there are matters that can be resolved better outside than in Parliament.

I am fully aware that this matter must eventually come before Parliament, because under the present order in council the Red Ensign, for certain purposes, is the flag of Canada until Parliament decides otherwise; but I suggest that if there is a breathing spell, we could give other bodies outside Parliament an opportunity to tackle this problem. Surely it could be tackled at a meeting between representatives of the federal and provincial governments. I would even go so far as to say that the help of our wise and weighty minds, the Royal Society of Canada, the National Gallery—because of its specific interest—the Canada Council, and others, might well be put to work on this problem, and that if this were done somebody would be able to come back to Parliament with a new design which would have more prestige to commend itself to Parliament than the present design.

Under the present circumstances, if we were now to go ahead and impose this flag, I shudder to think of the predicament in which it would place an honest teacher in one of our schools a few years from now, who had to meet the question posed, with child-like innocence and curiosity: "Teacher, how did we get our flag?"

I tried to put down objectively what an honest answer would be in terms of the present history. It seems to me that it would go something like this:

"Well, my dear, there was an election, and the leader of one of the parties, hoping to be elected, promised that he would introduce a new flag within two years. He was elected. After a while, he felt that he had to keep his promise, so he introduced a design for a flag into the House of Commons. Unfortunately, some mistakes were made, and the idea got around that it was his personal choice. The other major party opposed the suggested flag for this and other reasons, stating that all Canadians should have a direct voice in the choice of their flag. So a long and bitter discussion began, and the question of the design of the flag became a struggle between the two major parties. After a while, the Prime Minister reconsidered his first decision, and had a committee of the House of Commons set up. Unfortunately, its decision turned out to be just as partisan as the bitter discussion that had taken place in the Commons. It recommended a design against the judgment of the members of the official opposition on that committee. So the whole bitter row started again. The opposition members did compromise, just as the Government had done; but they kept on talking and talking, trying to prevent adoption of a flag that offended the feelings of many of their supporters.

Then Christmas was approaching, and instead of leaving the matter over for a while, the Government decided not to do it by agreement, but to bring in a motion called 'closure' whose purpose is to shut the mouths of the people opposed. That, my dear, is how we got our flag."

Honourable senators, the purpose of Senator O'Leary's amendment is to write into that story a better closing paragraph than the one I have just read. If adopted, our history books might be able to add the following:

"However, the problem then came to the Senate, where on the Government side of the house there was a group of wise, tolerant and understanding men, whose judgments and decisions in those days were always above partisanship. So they thought about the effects of a decision reached in this way, and of the feelings of those who were in the minority. Wisely and generously, they agreed that there should be a little more time and effort devoted to further compromise and agreement. That was done, and the Government gave in a little more, and the opposition gave in a little more, and when a new design was introduced into the House of Commons, almost everybody agreed that it was the best possible flag under all the circumstances. That, my dear, is how we got our flag."

A dream, perhaps, honourable senators, but surely one worth dreaming—a dream that I for one believe can be made come true.

Honourable senators, that is why I support this amendment, and make a last plea to the Leader of the Government and his colleagues here, and elsewhere, to give it a last chance, a last try, a last noble effort.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Do honourable senators agree that the honourable Senator O'Leary shall now speak to close the debate on the amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Honourable senators, in taking my leave of this amendment, I shall not detain you for more than a moment.

First of all, I must thank honourable senators for the kindly, flattering inaccuracies of the praise they have given my speech presenting this amendment. But I am sorry to have to add that though I won the cheers of Tuscany, apparently I have not succeeded in winning their votes. This does seem strange to me. I did make my appeal two days ago with a deep, heart-felt sincerity, and it is difficult for me to understand how gentlemen in this house who a week or two ago would, I am sure, have supported completely and with great tenacity a flag design that was before the other place at that time, can now come and with the same great tenacity give the same stubborn support to a flag completely different. I do not like to say this.

Honourable gentlemen opposite have attacked my amendment, have criticized it—I must say often with good manners, sometimes with great debating skill—and only a few seem to have failed to try to understand what the amendment was about. But as I listened to their criticisms, as I heard them advance first one reason and then another, against the amendment, I was compelled to wonder if ever I could have devised an amendment that would have induced those gentlemen to vote for it.

If I may say so, as a very junior member of this house, this is not in the traditions or in the spirit of this house. I sat in the galleries of this house years and years ago and saw men on both sides rise up in their places and not support their political parties in the other place. I am not going to question the motives or the sincerity of any person in this house. I am one of those who believe John Morley's dictum, that the important thing in life is not that two people should agree but that each should hold his convictions in a high and worthy way.

I think the debate in this house these past few days has been conducted with good manners and in a civilized way, and for that I think we can congratulate ourselves. But what does shatter me a bit is what a moment ago I called the tenacity of the support of honourable senators on the other side for a measure which only came to us a few days ago, in the origin or completion of which they had nothing whatever to do.

Yesterday, as I listened to speech after speech on the other side, I felt like saying with Cromwell to the Long Parliament:

> I beseech you gentlemen, by the bowels of Christ, to consider the possibility of your being wrong.

I am not going to try to answer tonight the criticisms that have been made of my amendment, though I think I could controvert them without the slightest difficulty, but I am sure it would only be an exercise in absolute futility.

So, before taking my leave of the debate, I would like to say this. I have had great admiration for the speeches delivered on both sides of the house. I have already expressed my admiration for the manner in which Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) presented his motion to the house, but the speech in this house which moved me most deeply, because I think it went to the very heart of this question—it went to the very heart of the reason for my moving this amendment—was the speech delivered this afternoon by the honourable Senator White.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I think he told this house the truth, that millions of people in this land tonight, rightly or wrongly —and it matters little—will feel that they are being given a flag conceived in political partisanship. And, by the way, no political party should ever be given the title deeds to the flag of a nation. That is what is happening now and that is what will be told on platforms all over this land in the coming election—"We gave you a distinctive national flag." Yes, honourable senators, a flag conceived in political partisanship, a flag born in bitter political controversy, a flag imposed on this nation by closure, and a flag which, in a few days, will be unfurled from the Peace Tower in utter national disunity. That, honourable senators, is a bad thing for our common country.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., seconded by honourable Senator Vaillancourt:

> That this house do recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to have designated as the National Flag of Canada a red flag of the proportions two by length and one by width, containing in its centre a white square, the width of the flag, bearing a single red maple leaf, or in heraldic terms, described as gules on a Canadian pale argent a maple leaf of the first.

In amendment, it is moved by honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton), seconded by honourable Senator Grosart:

> In amendment, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "Government" and substituting therefor "that the Government suspend further action on the proposal for a new Canadian flag in order to give reasonable time to the people and Parliament of Canada to reach agreement on a flag which will incorporate appropriate symbols of the founding peoples of this nation and which will be acceptable to all elements of our population".

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Those in favour of the amendment will please say "Content".

Some Hon. Senators: Content.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against the amendment will please say "Non-Content".

Some Hon. Senators: Non-content.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the Non-contents have it.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker—

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators.

Amendment of Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton) negatived on the following division:

The Hon. the Speaker: The question now is on the main motion.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my purpose at this hour of the evening to unduly delay you, and I do not think that I can add anything which might be new or which might be original to the debate which has taken place. However, I think this debate has brought out in a very clear manner the main points of division between those who support the proposed new flag and those who are opposed to its adoption.

I do not propose to recapitulate the arguments put forward on both sides. They have been clearly and definitely stated, and they are fresh in our memory. It is my view and my conclusion, after listening to the debate, that one of the main arguments advanced for the adoption of the proposed new flag, or of any new flag, rests upon the assumption that Canada as a free and independent nation should have a flag which contains no symbol that might be construed as implying we are under the rule or dominion of Great Britain, either directly or indirectly. It would appear that there is a fear people of other lands and other nations might conclude from our present flag that we are still a colonial possession; that they would mistake us for one of the emerging nations that has not yet reached that stage of political and economic maturity and development which would justify its complete independence. I can appreciate such a point of view, even though I believe it to be a mistaken one.

If we in Canada have been able to build a nation; if we in Canada have been able to play our part in international affairs, as I believe we have; if we have made the name of Canada well known throughout the world, as I believe we have, then we can safely assume that we are not being confused with any other nation or any other people.

Surely there can be no confusion as to our identity. Canada is one of the great exporting nations of the world, sending its goods and products to every other nation on earth, and buying from them in return. Our people have made Canada known by their actions, by participating in international affairs, by their voice and actions in the United Nations and their participation in international conferences, by treaties and trade agreements of all kinds and, yes, Canada was made well known by its participation in two of the greatest wars ever known in human history. If by these actions Canada has not become known as a full and independent state then I for one am very doubtful that this proposed new flag or, indeed, any flag will ever make our status clear.

Honourable senators, I realize, of course, there are other reasons why a new flag is proposed. For example, it is said we should have a flag which cannot be confused with the flag of any other nation and, in particular, which cannot be confused with that of the British merchant marine. I can accept that argument and go along with it, but I do think this argument has been greatly over-emphasized. Apparently we borrowed that flag—with or without permission, I do not know—added to it the Canadian Coat of Arms and used it as the Canadian flag for years. Long before an order in council was passed it was made the Canadian flag. It was used as the Canadian flag, and apparently it had general acceptance. If some confusion now exists, then it should be corrected. Certainly it would give a completely wrong picture of our merchant marine if those thousand ships at sea mentioned yesterday were thought by any person to be Canadian ships, and I would certainly hate to think that any visitor to Ottawa, upon seeing the Canadian Red Ensign flying from the Peace Tower, would mistake this historic building for a British ship at sea, or even wonder why a British flag was flying there.

I have but one reservation as to abandoning the Canadian Red Ensign at this time, and that is a sincere and earnest desire of the Royal Canadian Legion to retain it. I shall have something further to say in this connection in a few moments.

I have also heard it claimed that a new flag would promote national unity, that it would give us all a new sense of national dedication, of national understanding and good will. Of course, we all want national unity. We all want to work with our fellow-Canadians for the greater benefit of our country. But is a new flag necessary? Is a new flag the cure for any disunity that may exist? To my mind a flag follows the attaining of unity; it does not precede it.

Yes, I believe a flag should show that unity and vision, and a purpose in the future, have been achieved in this land. It should be a constant reminder that we are all part of a great country—a country which long ago decided it would show the world it was possible to create a new nation by peaceful means and peaceful progress; to show the world it was unnecessary to use violence and revolution in order to attain independence.

Already, I would think, too many emotions have been aroused to hope that this proposed flag could be used in the foreseeable future to promote a crusade for national unity, if, indeed, any flag could be used for that purpose at any time.

Honourable senators, if any threat to our national unity is so slight that a new flag can overcome it, then we are indeed a fortunate people. On the other hand, if there is a serious threat to our unity then we should forget about a flag and devote our time, our effort, our abilities and our energies to seeking the real causes of it and removing or overcoming them, to the end that we can live in a country where all the citizens have good will, understanding and respect for each other.

Another point of disagreement on this resolution is that there is one school of thought which wishes to retain on any new flag some symbol or emblem of the past of each of its two founding races or peoples, and the other school of thought does not want such symbols. Of course, there is room here for sincere and honest differences of opinion. I happen to be one of those who believe that such symbols should be retained. I will not go into my reasons for my belief at this time. I simply state that I am wholly in agreement with the views expressed, and expressed so well, by Senator Grattan O'Leary on this subject. Those of us whose ancestors came from the British Isles wish to retain on a new flag some symbol of our heritage from that source, and it has been no mean heritage. For those who feel as I do, a generally acceptable symbol would be the Union Jack. We had hoped that those of French descent would accept the suggestion that a new flag should contain some emblem of each of our two founding peoples—ours would be the Union Jack, theirs whatever they wished to have on it. I believe this would have been acceptable to those not of the founding races. Indeed, some people believe a flag containing something to indicate our past might very well serve to remind Canadians, as well as others, that this is a land of two languages, it is a land of two races, it is a land of two cultures, and that it is going to remain that way forever.

I regret such a plan was not acceptable. I regret that our plea for what we considered a reasonable request was rejected—or will be rejected in the course of a few minutes. Many people find it difficult to understand why so little attention was paid to their feelings, why so little attention was paid to their sentiments, why so little attention was paid to their views and to their deep and sincere convictions.

I mentioned earlier the stand taken on this matter by the Royal Canadian Legion. I do not want to interject anything of a personal nature in this debate, but as a member of the Legion for almost 20 years, as one who has been honoured by his own branch many times by being elected to their executive, and more recently by being elected their honorary president, I feel that I know something of the work of this organization of veterans. I tell you, honourable senators, it is a splendid work. Knowing the Legion as I do, I have a tremendous respect for it and for those men and women who make up its membership. I believe those men and women who served their country in time of war are entitled, as of right, to have their views on the matter of a flag given more weight and deeper consideration than the views of non-veterans. I regret their views were not given more favourable consideration.

Honourable senators, some people believe a new flag, without any symbols of our past, must become law because young people expect it or demand it, because the youth of our land want something new and something different, and because after all they are the ones who must be considered, as the future of our country is in their hands. Now, whether or not the youth of our land want a flag without those symbols I do not know. Personally, I would have liked to have seen them consulted in some way, to obtain their views, after they had a full knowledge of what was involved. I believe those views would have been very helpful in deciding this question.

Honourable senators, the hour is late and already I have taken up too much of your time. You will notice, however, that I have not in any way discussed the design of the proposed new flag. I do not intend to discuss it now. To end my speech, as a word of praise or commendation for the new design, I think I can go this far, Mr. Speaker, and say that I do not consider it to be as ugly as the original design containing three maple leaves.

(Translation):

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, since I opposed the amendment proposed by my excellent friend, Senator Grattan O'Leary, and since I intend to support the adoption of the main motion, I believe that for the record I should explain my position. You will understand that I am not too happy to part with my friends on this issue.

The debate which was held in this house during the last three days definitely improved the climate. Personally, I appreciated this discussion, because in my opinion the debate which lasted too long in the other place did not in any way contribute to the "bonne entente" in this country.

This flag issue is not a new one. It appeals to emotions and may appeal to the electorate, because this issue of a national flag could be turned into an electoral affair.

I have no congratulations to offer the government, because I believe that it did not present this problem in an appropriate manner. It should have taken all possible care not to hurt people's feelings. For my part, I agree with those who, on this side of the house, suggested that a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate should have been given the task of looking for a Canadian flag design.

I said that the issue was an emotional one. Reason has very little to do with it. This is shown by the fact that both sides have often used the same arguments to draw completely different conclusions.

The debate has been going on for six months. We have reached the point where a final decision will be taken, and that in a few minutes. In my opinion, once the debate had been started—no matter how badly—a conclusion had to be reached.

Essentially, the division has always been, to my knowledge, between two groups: on the one hand, those who are for keeping and officially recognizing the Red Ensign; on the other hand, those who consider that a Canadian flag should not bear any sign of subservience to another country or anything borrowed from another country. Basically, that is what the debate is all about.

Look what happened in the other place or what happened here. I appreciate that some want to recognize and retain the Red Ensign. I have often discussed this matter with those who feel that way, and I understand them. As far as they are concerned, the Red Ensign, including the Union Jack, stand not so much for a country but for the British parliamentary tradition and the principles of individual freedom, as preserved by laws, the Magna Carta and the triumphs against absolutism and monarchy.

But I believe that what the staunch supporters of the Red Ensign never understood is that for a great many people—no doubt the great majority of French Canadians, but others also—the Union Jack can represent but only one country: Great Britain.

There is nothing wrong with that. But we cannot ask those who consider that the flag should symbolize our own country to have the same feelings when looking at the Union Jack.

In 1945, when a parliamentary committee suggested the adoption of the Red Ensign with certain modifications, some opposition was voiced regarding the inclusion of the Union Jack, but there was also opposition from those who wanted to retain only the Union Jack.

Senator Gouin indicated yesterday that when he was young, at home, the flag of France was hoisted but I remember that when I was young, it was not the Red Ensign that was flown at the mast of the summer home of one of my uncles, but very simply the Union Jack.

There was an evolution. From the Union Jack, they switched to the Red Ensign.

The Red Ensign was never recognized as the flag of Canada. However, by order in council, it was decided to fly that flag over Canadian government buildings for the past several years, but it never succeeded in being accepted by the great majority of Canadians.

There was an evolution. Had the time come to deal with the matter? I doubt it. Personally, I always favoured an exclusively Canadian flag, but I am not sure that the circumstances were truly favourable to a final solution.

However, since the government set out on the road towards a solution, I am afraid that it might not be possible to go back. Consequently, it is to be hoped that the new flag—which, in spite of an opposition that seems to be justified in certain parts, will be tomorrow the official flag of Canada—it is to be hoped, as I say, that this flag will be gradually accepted everywhere. I do not say it will be so tomorrow or in a matter of a few weeks, but as time goes by.

As regards my friends opposite, I hope that much care will be taken not to use that flag for election purposes. I also hope that on this side of the house the bitterness felt during the flag debate will be forgotten. I hope it will even be forgotten that one of them did not share their views, so that gradually this new flag whose design inspires very little enthusiasm—I do not think it has inspired very much yet—because of its simplicity, will become in the future a rallying sign for all Canadians.

It is in that spirit that I endorse the resolution. I feel that as Senator McCutcheon said yesterday, many opponents of the flag, after the battle has subsided, will make a sincere effort to promote its acceptance. This flag must not represent for the supporters of the Red Ensign, a forsaking of British traditions or even an opposition to Great Britain and to the cultural heritage it bequeathed to us here in Canada. We all should agree on the flag selected and the opponents should endorse the maple leaf. Even though it might not be the extraordinary symbol we would wish for our flag, we all admit that it is the only one unlikely to create disunity.

Hon. Mr. Pouliot: Very well.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: With time and like other very simple flags, it could become a rallying sign for a happy people.

(Text):

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, I just want to say a word or two. There are millions of people in Canada who are going to be extremely disappointed tonight. I know that several hundreds of thousands in the province from which I come are going to be disappointed to know, to think, that we in this Senate have taken away from our people a flag which many of them worship.

Speaking for my own province, I am a sorry man tonight and I know that my own people of Newfoundland, in large measure, will be sorry and sad to think that our Government has taken away that which means so much to them.

I am not going to argue against this action now. I hope you will make the maple leaf something which we can all like and adore, as we did our own flag.

I said last night that you were making this a political issue. I was perfectly right, and as I also said last night, I am ashamed of this Senate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am too.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I do not think that anyone in a long time has faced a more formidable task than I do at this moment. I do not propose to speak at great length, and I do not flatter myself that I can deal with the entire debate the way it deserves to be dealt with.

Due to the fine co-operation we have had here in making the arrangements for this debate, it was thought that without proliferating speeches I might wait to wind up at this stage rather than have spoken on the amendment proposed by the honourable senator from Carleton. While we did depart from the strict rules that we have in this chamber to accomplish this, we did so, I think, to suit the convenience of the Senate.

There have been some 38 speeches made by various senators since this debate began, and it seems to have started a very long time ago. I agree, as I think we all do, with Senator Aseltine that the Senate has made an honest attempt to give this very important problem a good sober second thought. I think no one will complain that anyone who wanted to speak was not afforded every opportunity to do so. This was done without any effort on anyone's part to continue the debate unnecessarily, and I think there has been a very frank exchange of views.

Senator Hugessen said last night that he thought the level of the debate on this issue was higher than any he had witnessed in his 27 years in this house. Senator Thorvaldson complained of the fact that it was reported somewhere that, "Now the shouting will start in the Senate." Well, there has been no shouting in the Senate, but there has been reasoned debate.

I desire at this point to pay a tribute to all senators who have participated, for the sincerity they have shown, for the conviction with which they have expressed their views, and for the good faith in which they put them forward. I do not think you can pay a higher tribute to a reasonable body of men and women gathered in a deliberative assembly, when you are able to say that. I know that political considerations have and do move individuals on both sides of the house. I submit, I suggest, and I am convinced, that everyone who has taken part in this debate has honestly, sincerely and with a patriotic motive tried to do what was best and to say what was best in the interests of this country.

It has been said that as a result of what we do here tonight we take away a flag. I prefer, and I believe many of us prefer to say, we are doing something positive, we are doing something uniquely Canadian. We are giving something to Canadians which is representative of the Canada in which we live.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I say more than that, honourable senators—as has emerged already from the debate—that those of us who have these views hold them with enthusiasm.

Let me return for a moment to the question of the debate. If we have achieved a high level of debate, I think the Senate owes much to the approach taken by the honourable Senator from Carleton, Senator Grattan O'Leary.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): His performance, his approach, proves that the Opposition can do more to contribute to a high level of debate than can the Government. No matter how hard a Government tries to put a debate on a high level, if the Opposition decides that course is not going to be followed, that is inevitably the result. With regard to his speech, we have all been impressed with its imagery, with its literary allusions, with its historical references. I know that everyone did not reach that high plateau. Perhaps there has been practice for the hustings in some of the speeches. But I think we have had a good example of objective debate here, and that we may have done something for the Parliament of Canada in our deportment in these last two or three days. We have made a good book. There are some good things that are in our record, and they will be there for Canadians to read as they will.

Honourable senators, may I refer briefly to the speech made yesterday by Senator McCutcheon. I am sorry that he is not here now, but I know he had an engagement away and that otherwise he would have been present. He said that 20 years ago the proposal to have "O Canada" as the national anthem would not have had general approval, but today it would probably be adopted by Parliament without debate. He said the same idea should apply to the flag.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It should be "The Maple Leaf Forever" now.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): There is much to be said for the argument advanced by Senator McCutcheon, and I can understand this argument, as can we all. I think he argued his point very impressively. But, for my part—and I think for the part of the majority of the members of this chamber—I say in good faith, that I believe the time has come to move, as is proposed in this motion on the flag.

Senator Aseltine spoke tonight for members of the 1945 joint committee, and Senator Lambert was the chairman of the joint committee in 1945-46 which dealt with the flag at that time. Senator Lambert has since changed his mind, but we should remember that in these 20 years times have changed, and Canada has changed.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Every country has changed.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): We are not living in 1945 or 1946, we are living in 1964, and if you look at the situation in Canada 20 years ago and compare it to that existing today, you must agree this is a fact.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: Will we change our mind every 20 years?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not think that is necessary. But I do think we can make progress and over a period of 20 years in our constitutional development surely we should make progress. I say this is progress.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not to the Conservatives, though.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is just a convenience.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I hope I am not provoking people. I have sat here without interrupting for two days, listening very patiently and very interestedly to what has been said. I do hope that I will have that privilege accorded to me as I have accorded it to other honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Brooks: It is easy when everything is going your way.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Senator Crerar spoke yesterday. He is the most senior of the privy councillors. He was a member of the Union Government in the First World War and a member of many governments since. Senator Crerar is not a young man, and I would think that perhaps he might have felt that the recommendation by the committee set up in 1946 represented his view at that time. I think many people would be impressed with the fact that now this new design proposed by Parliament in 1964 is the flag that meets with his approval.

Some people have said that the Government has no mandate to do this. This is always a difficult question to decide, but it was part of the Government's program during two general elections.

There has been criticism of the timing used by the Government to introduce this measure. But this would always be an issue when personal preferences are so firmly and so deeply held. I do hope that the emphasis, when this debate is over, will not be on dissension and division. We have had debate. We have had full debate, a lengthy and widespread debate, not confined to Parliament alone. But, honourable senators, we must remember debate is one thing but decision is another, and decision is also necessary. I say the time has come. I say it is Parliament's duty now to make up its mind. And I believe, again in all sincerity, that the proposed design for a new national flag for Canada is more likely to meet with more general approval than any other design suggested at this time.

Senator Smith (Kamloops) said we cannot expect unanimity. This is true. Certainly there was no unanimity in 1946, and obviously there is no unanimity in 1964. But I suggest to honourable senators that more delay is not likely to improve the situation. Now, honourable senators, we are about to make this decision, and having made it, I hope we accept it in the spirit in which Senator McCutcheon said he would accept it, even if he disagreed with it. It will be the national flag of all of us. It will be our duty as Canadians to honour it. In doing so we are not rejecting a glorious history. We are not being untrue to our great traditions, those traditions that have been built by people of many racial strains and creeds and colours in this country. In a young country like Canada we respect our history, but we must also ever remember that those of us who are contemporary in Canada are also here to make history. This flag has been created along the lines of many of the initiatives taken to build this country and so many of the significant steps in the constitutional development of this land. All parties have taken part in various of these steps. They have not hesitated to take steps that were bold. I think that the step that is now proposed is a logical one.

Let us remember, too, that a flag is a sign; it is a symbol—a metaphorical symbol—and I think on this point Senator Hugessen helped us greatly last night. The flag is not the country. The flag is not the history of the country. The flag is to suggest and to signify and to symbolize the country and its people; it is to symbolize all the history of the country, all the traditions of the people and all the history of the people. But it does not purport to spell them out. Much history has been given to us in this debate. Many senators have mentioned the very touching reference made by Senator Irvine yesterday on this point.

The Canadian flag, when one considers the numbers and varieties of people who live in Canada, could not possibly contain a symbol for every racial or linguistic group. The Canadian mosaic is much too complicated to have a national flag of this kind. But what we have and what is proposed by this resolution is a simple, clear symbol which, in my view, suggests the Canadian mosaic as it is today.

There have been many impressive performances in this debate. I think Senator Croll's moving passage about new Canadians is something we are happy to have in the annals of this chamber. I think Senator Cameron's speech giving the western attitude and describing the characteristics of the youth of this country was outstanding. In passing I would say to him that I hope that when he makes his next speech he will forget about the typewriter because he has proved that extemporaneity is his forte.

Senator Sullivan spoke in a deeply moving and restrained way, as indeed did Senator White. I think their speeches are a warning to the oratorical gentleman from Carleton (Hon. Mr. O'Leary), that perhaps he should look to his oratorical laurels so far as they are concerned. Senator White, Senator Sullivan and Senator O'Leary proved that while it may not be necessary to be Irish to be oratorical, it would seem to help considerably.

May I say too that we listened with care and attention to the speeches made in the French language by Senator Gouin, Senator Vaillancourt and Senator Fournier (De Lanaudière). These are speakers of whom we can be proud. They are men who know how to express a point of view, that point of view which is so typical of the people from whom they spring. They gave us a meaningful concept of phrases like "the native land", "the big land", "the beautiful land"—"la terre de nos aïeux".

Senator Hnatyshyn said something that we should not forget. He said that in this matter there are no winners and there are no losers. There is an axiom used by Crown counsel in Canada, which runs: nunquam rex lucratur, nunquam rex spoliatur. The Crown never wins, and the Crown never loses. In a debate of this kind I would hope that none of us would consider that he either won or lost.

We have had speeches from the west, from the east and from central Canada. We had from Senator White that most moving passage in a very distinguished speech about the burial of a young soldier. I am sure it affected all of us very deeply. We had from Senator Gladstone such a wonderful description of the colour of Indian customs. I tell Senator Gladstone that the change in the flag makes no change in any treaty, because a change in the flag will not change the character or the honour or the integrity of the Canadian people.

I am sure we were most interested to hear from Senator Rattenbury. This may have been his first speech in the Senate. If it was not, then it was one of his very early ones and he made a fine contribution.

Lastly, I mention the speech made by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks) tonight. We all know how deeply Senator Brooks feels about this issue. I do not think anybody would feel anything but pride in the way he put his points. His was a magnificent performance, and we will always say we were proud to sit in this chamber with him.

Honourable senators, I do not agree that this flag is conceived in political partisanship. I hope, in any event, it will not be accepted and established in a spirit of political partisanship. When I spoke at the opening of the debate I said that after looking at the significant steps that have been taken in the constitutional development of this country by Liberals, by Conservatives, and by every Prime Minister that we have ever had, we find we have in this land the substance of sovereignty. I say that this resolution will now allow the symbol to overtake that substance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Connolly, seconded by the honourable Senator Vaillancourt:

> That this House do recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to have designated as the National Flag of Canada a red flag of the proportions two by length and one by width, containing in its centre a white square, the width of the flag, bearing a single red maple leaf, or in heraldic terms, described as gules on a Canadian pale argent a maple leaf of the first.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Those in favour of the motion will please say "Content".

Some Hon. Senators: Content.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against the motion will please say "Non-content".

Some Hon. Senators: Non-content.

CANADIAN COMMONWEALTH FLAG

MOTION FOR DESIGNATION ADOPTED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved, pursuant to notice:

> That this house do recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to provide that the Royal Union Flag, generally known as the Union Jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the Commonwealth of Nations and her allegiance to the Crown.

He said: Honourable senators, in a speech earlier this week I attempted to review the progress made by this country as it moved from the position of a colony to that of a nation. Another aspect to our nationhood which is particularly important in this year of 1964, and which will continue to be of great importance, is our position in the international sphere. Canada is a member of the United Nations for the purpose of helping to promote the peace. She is a member of NATO for the purpose of helping to defend the peace. After the First World War, she became a member of the League of Nations and one of the founding members of the International Labour Organization. We are, of course, members of other international organizations and groups, and our membership in many others is sought, including the Organization of American States.

All of this points up to us in Parliament, and to our people in the country, that the world is contracting. It is contracting because of the facility and speed of communications, the ease of travel and, generally, because of the development of technology. If the world has been a contracting one, then the problems of countries all over the world very often become domestic problems for countries widely separated from the trouble spot.

Hunger in the Orient presents a problem for Canadians, they feel the impact of it. The population explosion to be expected in Latin America will present a problem, and we can anticipate that we shall be concerned with the economic, political and social consequences which arise from it. The requirements of technical assistance and aid of all kinds in the developing and underdeveloped countries of Asia and Africa have not only been a source of concern to us, but we have been trying to do something to help solve that problem. Even in the long-established countries of Western Europe, interdependence has become one of the important priorities in their public programs. They have alliances, as they have always had, of all kinds. Perhaps the most significant one of recent days has been the establishment of the Common Market which is designed to bolster their free economies. This international type of organization is required in our day to foster the economic development of developed countries, to foster too the economic development of developing countries. It is necessary also to assure the economic strength of the western world.

Members of the Senate who have attended meetings of the NATO Parliamentarians—and I hope we shall soon have an opportunity to hear reports from some of our representatives who attended the last meeting a month ago in Paris—particularly those senators who sat upon the Economic Committee under Senator Javits of New York, will know what importance is placed by that committee upon the study of these problems.

The importance of the idea of national sovereignty today gives way to the importance of the idea of dependence and of interdependence. Indeed, the central problem of countries and of governments today is not so much one of dealing with wealth as it is one of dealing with poverty.

There are many reasons why Canada should have an interest in affairs beyond its borders. Canada is the fourth trading nation of the world. We have vast resources in this country and upon them we have built immense resource industries which supply products and materials for economies everywhere in the world. We have also, under the impetus of war and for other reasons, developed an industrial capacity. For this too we must find markets abroad, if we are to have continued progress and prosperity. We are highly dependent upon foreign markets. Our participation in the work conducted under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and particularly the Kennedy Round of Negotiations now proceeding at Geneva, is of very real importance in dealing with our trade problems. Government is concerned with these matters. Business, private industry and trade associations, must also be concerned.

In our earlier colonial days we were part of an empire. But that empire has now evolved into a Commonwealth. Canada helped to give the lead to the establishment of the concept of the Commonwealth as it has developed through the years, perhaps more particularly in the 1920s. The lead which we gave, in company with others—with the British, with the South Africans, and particularly with the Irish—was a provident lead. The pattern which was then established for the development of the Commonwealth helped in the years since the Second World War to deal with moves made by developing colonies, particularly in Africa, as they sought their independence.

The composition of the Commonwealth is something which we should have before us as we debate this resolution. Within the Commonwealth there are 20 sovereign independent nations. There are four in Southern Asia: India, Pakistan, Ceylon and Malaysia. There are two in the Pacific: Australia and New Zealand. There are two in the Mediterranean area—Cyprus and Malta. There are eight in Africa, six being in the least portion of Africa: Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Zambia, formerly Northern Rhodesia; Malawi, formerly Nyasaland; and Nigeria. In the west, there are Ghana and Sierra Leone.

In the Caribbean area there are two: Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago. Then, of course, there are Canada and the United Kingdom.

In some of these countries the Queen is the head of state. They are continuing monarchies. The United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Ceylon belong to this group.

Among the Africans there are six republics. Two of the others, Sierra Leone and Malawi, I am told, are in a transitional state, and may eventually declare themselves to be republics.

Cyprus is a republic. The Caribbean countries are in the first category I have mentioned, where they recognize the Queen as the head of the state. India and Pakistan are republics. Malaysia recognizes the Queen as the head of the Commonwealth, but it also elects a local monarch.

In addition to these countries within the Commonwealth, there are British dependencies outside of it, like Hong Kong, which is a Crown colony, and certain high commission territories in Africa. British Guiana, which is in a bit of a grey area, is not a member of the Commonwealth.

There are other dependencies of Great Britain, like the Windward and Leeward Islands. Many of these dependencies enjoy preferences and advantages which Commonwealth countries enjoy, but have not the status of these other countries to which I earlier referred.

The members of the Commonwealth are partners. The influence of older Commonwealth countries, for good within the organization as equal partners, has been much more effective than would have been the case had they been dependencies.

A few years ago I spent an afternoon in the House of Lords. It was a rather significant occasion. It was the day that Lord Home became Foreign Secretary. That afternoon they debated and passed a bill dealing with the establishment of the independence of Nigeria. The bill was to recognize Nigeria's independence within the Commonwealth. The feeling in the house that day was not that they were taking a backward step in the direction of the dissolution of one empire. They felt they were taking a forward step in the development of the Commonwealth.

The question is often asked: What is the bond which unites the Commonwealth? First, of course, is the Monarchy. But there are institutions which have a profound influence, not only to bind the countries together, but upon the individual countries themselves. There are institutions which guarantee the democratic process. They are epitomized in the parliamentary system. There is the concept of an independent judiciary. There is a rule of law. There is a respect for minority rights. All of this depends upon education, upon a concept of honour and a belief in integrity.

There are cultural bonds—bonds that are forged because of the imperishable content of the body of the literature of the language—bonds that are formed by a common devotion to the history of the people and of the institutions of the Commonwealth—bonds also which are promoted and strengthened by the educational institutions now developing so much in so many parts of this far-flung organization.

There are economic bonds too, and the Commonwealth preferences are indicative of the extent and the importance that has been attached to this type of link.

There was a time when the great bond was defence. Now, with the changing conditions in the field of defence, the situation is vastly different. No one country or no few countries within the Commonwealth could really defend themselves completely in this thermo-nuclear age.

In addition to these ties, there are personal ties between the peoples of the Commonwealth. Men and women who have served in the forces in two and more wars have a special feeling for these Commonwealth relationships. In peace, there have been bonds forged by immigration, by settlement and, in special circumstances, as a result of what was done on occasions such as the American War of Independence, when so many people who were living in the country immediately to the south of our border decided that the British institutions were for them, and as United Empire Loyalists they came to Canada and settled here. Their descendants, happily, are still with us.

I think also there is a special meaning in the Commonwealth idea for Canadians who speak the French language. As I said just the other day, more than 200 years ago, in the terms of the capitulation of Montreal and of Quebec, the language, laws and religion of the 60,000 former French subjects who were living in this country were guaranteed their preservation when the British took over. This is something we cannot forget in this country. It was a forerunner of what has happened and what has been happening in our time in other underdeveloped countries. Canada, at that time, was an underdeveloped country. This step was consecrated in the Quebec Act. I have read the report of the debate in the committee of the British house when these provisions were made in the Quebec Act. It was something completely new. Britain herself was embarking on a new approach to the position of people in the colonies some 200 years ago.

I believe that by common consent the Commonwealth not only can be but is a force for the good. Its most significant impact, however, is a spiritual one. It is a western force, a force that is based on the highest ideals upon which western civilization has been founded. A few years ago there was a meeting in Ottawa of the Commonwealth Bar Association. Judges and lawyers came here from all the far-flung parts of the Commonwealth. The principal British guest was the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Kilmuir. I was talking to him about this. He wondered whether these meetings of lawyers and judges from all over the Commonwealth were of value, and whether the Commonwealth concept itself would survive. Neither of us was a prophet. I said to him what I have just said, that there are many reasons for optimism, but perhaps the real appeal is that which is based upon matters of the spirit. If you have that kind of bond, then the other bonds will become stronger.

Of necessity, new international associations have been born in the modern world, particularly since the last war. They have been born of crises. Because they have been put together in this way, and without the bond which I believe exists between the members of the Commonwealth, often there is difficulty in making them work. For this reason, I believe that as time goes on the old association between members of the Commonwealth will be more fully appreciated and valued.

There are opportunities for mutual help between members of the Commonwealth. I think the most recent example is one to which we gave our assent earlier this year, when the Canadian peace-keeping force was sent to Cyprus. Britain, mainly, was trying to maintain order in that troubled country. But the requirements for similar British intervention in Asia and Africa were straining her capacity to perform. We did this, first, to assist in helping keep the peace, but we also did it to help a fellow member of the Commonwealth assist a strife-torn member of the Commonwealth.

The importance of the Commonwealth to Canada can be stressed in many ways. One of our colleagues who has spent some time at the United Nations has pointed this out to me in connection with the Commonwealth seat on the Security Council at the United Nations. There is no problem for the great powers, including Britain, to assure themselves of the representation they feel they require on the Security Council. But at times there is difficulty for Canada. She is not considered to be one of the great powers. She must depend upon the regional groupings to get a seat on the Security Council by rotation. Because of the importance of her membership in the Commonwealth she can at times cut across international boundaries and provide in this way an opportunity for herself to be a continuing force for the good. It may be that Canada stands to gain more by her membership in the Commonwealth than any fellow member.

Honourable senators, this resolution emphasizes all that I have said. At the Coronation ceremony when Her Majesty was crowned, she was described as the Queen of the United Kingdom and Canada. She was also described as the Head of the Commonwealth. The Union Jack, the Union Flag, according to the Garter King of Arms is the royal flag—Her Majesty's flag. As honourable senators have pointed out these last few days, it is a symbolic flag. It contains the crosses of St. George, St. Andrew and St. Patrick. It is an ancient flag, invested with religious symbolism which originated in the days of faith. It now has a modern connotation, because it is the royal flag of the royal head of the Commonwealth, in addition to being the flag of the United Kingdom.

I therefore commend to this House the motion before us, in these words:

> That this House do recommend to the Government that such steps as may be necessary be taken to provide that the Royal Union Flag, generally known as the Union Jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the Commonwealth of Nations and of her allegiance to the Crown.

Hon. A. J. Brooks: Honourable senators, we have all followed the excellent remarks of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West). I think we agree with most of what he has said, particularly when he referred to the necessity for supporting the Commonwealth, which I am sure all right-thinking people in the world consider to be one of the greatest forces for good in existence. As I listened to my honourable friend today, and also a few days ago when he introduced the other resolution, I could not but think that if he were not such an excellent lawyer and such a good politician he would have made a remarkable professor of history for some great university. However, I am not going to deal on this occasion with his historical remarks.

In listening to the sports review over the radio in the morning we have often heard the announcer say, "If you lose, say little; if you win, say less." In my opinion Canada has lost a lot, and therefore I am going to say little.

The flag debate is over and we are all glad of that. There has been one great casualty in this debate. The long, long trail has ended, as far as Canada is concerned, for a flag which I know we have all loved—the Red Ensign. Shortly, we will have a new flag flying over this country, for better or for worse. I know I speak for most Canadians when I say that we will do our best to see that it is accepted and respected by our people. However, I must say this, that I believe it will be a very difficult task in many cases, and I would not be surprised if in some circumstances it should be an impossible task.

I do not know of any other country which has more than one flag. In my view one flag is sufficient for any country, and I feel we should have only one flag in this country. If the Government and the Parliament of Canada listened to the recommendations in our amendment, debated yesterday in the Senate, we would have had a flag which would have indicated not only the Commonwealth status but would also have suited the people of Canada.

However, honourable senators, it has been decided that we must have two flags. But, if we must have two flags, then why not the Red Ensign as the second one? The honourable leader has stated with truth that the Union Jack is the flag of another country. The Red Ensign has been our flag for nearly a century. Generation after generation has lived under that flag. They have respected it, and they have loved it; and, in the words of the eloquent address of my friend Senator White, soldiers have gone to battle under it in two of the greatest wars the world has ever known. I say that that is the flag we should have, if we must have a second flag to represent our membership in the Commonwealth.

I know that the Red Ensign is loved, not only in Canada but all over the world. Not very long ago I was in Fredericton in connection with the opening of a very important institution there, and I met an American from Massachussetts who was staying in the next motel room to mine. At that time our flag debate was in progress, and he had read about it in the papers. He said, "What in Heaven's name is all this fuss about changing your flag? You have a wonderful flag. I have just travelled across Canada; I have seen it flying everywhere, and it is a beautiful flag." He also added, that of the three flags in the world that were best known and loved, the first was the Stars and Stripes, followed by the Union Jack and the Red Ensign. He also said, "Your flag is known all over the world—I know because I have travelled a lot. Why indeed are you people talking about changing your flag?" I did not bother trying to explain to him the intricacies of the situation and the debates we were having.

A few years ago I spent six weeks visiting the cemeteries of the Canadian soldiers in Europe, in France, Belgium, Holland, Italy, Germany and elsewhere. On our car we had the Canadian Ensign, and wherever we went we did not have to tell people that we were Canadians. Whenever we stopped they gathered around us in large numbers because they saw our flag. I remember in Ortona, where was fought one of the great battles in which our Canadian soldiers took part in the Second World War. There were a few people on the street when our car stopped, but it was not long before crowds gathered, shouting "Canada! Canada!" And these were people who only a short time before had been fighting us tooth and nail. They knew our flag.

Then, let us consider Vimy Ridge. Many of you have visited there—I have on three occasions. It is a part of Canada, generously given to this country by the French people.

The Red Ensign has been flying over it for many years past. I wonder what the thousands of tourists and visitors from the surrounding countries are going to think when they see the new flag go up and the old Red Ensign come down. They are going to see the flag with the maple leaf. I hope they will not think that Canada has made a present of Vimy Ridge to the Toronto Maple Leafs hockey team as a reward for winning the Stanley Cup.

We respect the Union Jack; of course we do. What country does not? What would have happened to this world in the two world wars if it had not been for the Union Jack?

Just a few moments ago my good friend Senator Aseltine handed me an editorial from the Toronto Daily Star. It is headed "The Jack for Joey". After discussing the uselessness of another debate on the flag, it leads up to a comment on the official symbol of Canada's membership in the Commonwealth. It says that the Progressive Conservative party and the N.D.P.s are right in favouring the Red Ensign for this purpose. I quote:

> On this issue, the Opposition parties are right. The Red Ensign, combining as it does British and Canadian symbols, is the obvious flag to be flown at royal visits and other ceremonial occasions to indicate that Canada is a member of the Commonwealth. It is far more suitable for this purpose than the Union Jack which is, after all, the national flag of Great Britain. The Ensign has been far more widely used in Canada in recent decades, and is obviously much more popular, than the Union Jack.
> If the Government were to agree to the Red Ensign as the Commonwealth banner, it would reduce the bitterness created by the earlier flag debate. By giving the Ensign an official status, it would soothe the feelings of the many thousands of Canadians who wanted it as the national flag.

The Government seems bent on not reducing any bitterness. It seems to do things that go from bitterness to more bitterness and more bitterness. Here is another paragraph:

> Mr. Pearson's insistence on pushing the Union Jack, in defiance of tact and common sense, gives support to the Conservative charge that he is redeeming a pledge to Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland.

That is not good enough.

Honourable senators, I am not going to say anything more. To make any further comment is useless. The whole situation is bewildering and, indeed, hard to understand. It will be more bewildering to the people of Canada. If it is hard for some of us here to understand, then how much harder will it be for people outside Parliament and in other parts of the country?

In closing I say this: We are supporting this resolution, and as far as we are concerned we see no value in any long debate. We are only met with frustrations and futility.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, I do not intend to make a speech, but I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) before the debate is concluded if he would answer two questions.

My first question is this: Is the Union Jack flown by all other members of the Commonwealth of Nations as a symbol of such membership?

It will be noticed that the resolution states that the Union Jack is to be flown as a symbol of our membership in the Commonwealth.

The second part of the resolution is to the effect that the Union Jack may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's allegiance to the Crown. I should like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government this question: What flag did we fly prior to this date to show our allegiance to the Crown?

I shall certainly vote for the resolution, but I would like these questions answered.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, before the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Connolly, Ottawa West) answers the questions of the honourable senator from Newfoundland (Hon. Mr. Hollett), I would like to put a question. I am certainly not going to make a speech.

The honourable Leader of the Government wrapped up this resolution in noble sentiment and some excellent rhetoric. But I am looking at the resolution itself, which says that the Royal Union Flag, generally known as the Union Jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the Commonwealth of Nations, and so on. Does that mean that the Red Ensign may not continue to be flown? On what occasions are we going to fly the Union Jack in order to show our allegiance to the Crown and the Commonwealth of Nations? Will it be flown on July 1, or on some other occasion? And does this resolution mean that on July 1, or on some other occasion of like nature, we shall not be permitted to fly the Red Ensign?

It seems to me that as the resolution stands it is meaningless. It merely says that we may continue to fly the Union Jack. There is no law in this country preventing anybody from flying any flag, as the Prime Minister reminded us not so long ago when he flew his own flag on the lawn of the Parliament buildings. I cannot see what sense there is in this.

We have here a resolution of Parliament which says: You may continue to fly the Union Jack. If it does not say: "You may not continue to fly other flags, or you may not fly this flag or that," then what on earth does it change? What significance has it? What is the effect of it? I am told I may continue to fly the Union Jack, but so far as the law is concerned I may also continue to fly the Red Ensign. This is the sort of thing that makes me suspect—and I do not want to be ill-natured about it—that there is something in the editorial of the Toronto Star which was just read by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Brooks).

I have another question. I listened to the honourable Leader of the Government in his eloquent way telling about his great faith in the Commonwealth. Well, what does a member state of the Commonwealth such as Ghana do about this? Is it going to have a Commonwealth flag too? Mr. Nkrumah began not long back to show his deep affection for the Commonwealth by removing the Queen's image from his coins. Is he going to have a flag to show his loyalty to the Crown? And if we are to have two flags to show our loyalty to the Crown, are we not saying to India, to Australia or to New Zealand that we are more loyal than they? Are we saying to them: "You have only one flag to show your loyalty to the Crown, but we have two. We are twice as loyal as you are."

Surely, honourable senators, when we talk about having a Commonwealth flag, it follows that this should be the subject of a Commonwealth conference. And surely we are not so naïve as to think that this new Commonwealth is the old Commonwealth that we knew. I recall attending an Imperial Conference in 1921. It consisted of the old family of nations: Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India and others. But, is it now being thought that this new Commonwealth resembles in any respect whatsoever the Commonwealth that existed then?

I remember when Mr. Bennett rose in this Parliament of Canada and objected strongly, and marshalled all sorts of constitutional arguments in support of his view to Ireland's joining the British Commonwealth because it was republic. Well, that sort of thinking is past and gone, but it does seem to me that before we go on talking about the Commonwealth someone, sooner or later, will have to take a good look at it as it is presently constituted, just as I imagine and fear a good look will have to be taken at the United Nations as it is presently constituted.

I think this resolution is humbug, and I have to say this—I do not want to be extreme, but I cannot avoid saying it—that just as the resolution we passed yesterday bruised the emotions and sentiments of many Canadians, this resolution insults the intelligence of all Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform the honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, Senator Hollett has asked me whether the Union Jack is flown by all other members of the Commonwealth as a symbol of such membership. I do not know. I should think that it is a matter for the decision of any one of the several countries involved, because they are all free and independent. It is for them to decide what they shall do to indicate their membership by the use of a flag. It is appropriate for any one of them to decide that in a certain way they will signify their membership.

I do suggest that the flying of the Royal Union Flag, which is the flag of the head of the Commonwealth, is an appropriate way for a country to indicate its membership in the Commonwealth.

Senator Hollett has asked me what flag was flown prior to the date of this resolution to show our allegiance to the Crown in Canada. I think from the resolution itself this is clear, because the word "continue" is used. It is clear that the Union Jack has been used for such purpose. In fact, the same effect would flow from the use of the Red Ensign, because it too has the Royal insignia upon it.

Senator O'Leary (Carleton) asks me what are the occasions upon which this flag will be flown? How can anyone predict what a Commonwealth occasion may be? I would think that with the increasing importance we continue to attach to Commonwealth matters, and to our membership in Commonwealth, we would be disposed to use the flag on every possible occasion that can be considered to be a Commonwealth occasion. It is sought by this resolution to give some official character to the use of the Union Jack. It is hoped that the use of the flag approved by Parliament, for occasions which are Commonwealth occasions, is given a little more significance because it thus becomes an official way of using the flag.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: On division.

Motion adopted, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now take recess and reassemble at the call of the bell at 3 o'clock this afternoon. It is hoped that at that time it will be possible to deal with two bills which I understand are coming here from the other place, one in respect of the Judges Act and one in respect of the Combines Investigation Act.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 3 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I understand that the other place is now on questions and, of course, no one can predict when they will finish. The unofficial estimate of time given to me is that not much more than an hour will be taken on questions.

I am also informed that it is the intention in the other place, at the beginning of their proceedings, to introduce two bills to which I referred earlier today, with the hope that those bills can be passed quickly.

In the circumstances, I think it appropriate to adjourn to the call of the bell, at approximately 4.15 p.m. In the meantime, we will survey the situation. When one or both of the bills pass in the other place, the bell will ring at the appropriate time, which might be a little later than 4.15 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: That is quite satisfactory.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.50 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to the order for Notices of Motions:

Hon. John J. Connolly moved, with leave, that the report of the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament be now adopted.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-112, to amend the Judges Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John J. Connolly, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-112 is an act to amend the Judges Act. A copy of the bill as it was introduced in the House of Commons is on the file of all honourable senators.

I must draw to the attention of the Senate, however, that since the bill was printed and introduced there was a further amendment proposed, which has now been incorporated in it. The Order Paper of December 7 last carried a notice of the proposed additional changes.

The effect of the bill is to provide for five additional judges of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, one extra justice of appeal of the Supreme Court of Alberta, two additional Ontario county court judges, one additional county court judge in British Columbia, and two additional judges of the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba.

For the information of honourable senators as to how these additions are made, I would say that section 1(1) of the bill increases the number of judges of the Superior Court of Quebec to 70. Subsection 2 of that section, as amended, provides for the two additional judges of the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba.

Section 2 of the bill deals with an increase to six in the number of Justices of Appeal of Alberta. Section 3 deals with increases in the number of county court judges both in Ontario and British Columbia.

This bill is in the form of similar bills considered by this house on many previous occasions. In this case, as in all other similar cases, the legislatures of the provinces affected amend their judicature acts to provide for these increases, and then request Parliament to enact legislation to make it possible for these additional judges to be appointed. So, this is done by us in the knowledge that these additional judicial offices are required for the due administration of justice in the courts of the various provinces I have mentioned.

If there are questions that any honourable senator has to ask about this measure, I shall be glad to obtain the answers as soon as possible.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, while I do not propose to vote against this bill, there are several observations I wish to make on the motion for second reading. A glance at the amending statutes listed in the margin shows that bills such as this are to be expected almost every year. Indeed, they seem like flowers and weeds, to seed themselves annually, as if the process were part of the law of nature. Let me review briefly the history of this legislation since the last revision of the statutes in 1952.

By chapter 58 of the statutes of 1953-54, a Justice of Appeal was added to the Court of Appeal for British Columbia, and one Justice to the Supreme Court of Alberta.

By chapter 48 of 1955, a further Justice of Appeal was added to the Court of Appeal of British Columbia, and two judges to the Supreme Court of that province. By the same statute one county court judge was added in British Columbia.

By chapter 8 of 1956, four puisne judges were added to the Superior Court of Quebec, and four judges to the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

By chapter 30 of 1957, one judge was added to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and one judge to the county and district courts of Ontario.

By chapter 33 of 1958, two judges were added to the High Court of Ontario, and six more judges were added to the county and district courts of Ontario. Also, one judge was added to the appeal division of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

By chapter 28 of 1959, six puisne judges were added to the Superior Court of Quebec, and two to the Supreme Court of British Columbia. In addition, three justices were added to the Supreme Court of Alberta.

By chapter 46 of 1960, four additional puisne judges were added to the Superior Court of Quebec.

By chapter 38 of 1960-61, a judge was added to the Exchequer Court of Canada, two more puisne judges to the Superior Court of Quebec, two judges to the Court of Appeal of British Columbia, and two to the county and district courts of Ontario. In addition, one further judge was added to the district courts of Alberta.

By chapter 22 of 1962, two further judges were added to the High Court of Ontario, and seven to the county and district courts of that province.

Finally, honourable senators are aware that by chapter 14 of the statutes of this year, provision was made for an additional judge of the Exchequer Court. The bill before us would add three puisne judges to the Superior Court of Quebec, increasing the number from 44 in 1952—and this is amazing—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Five, not three.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: —from 44 in 1952, to 68.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, to 70.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes. I did not look at the amendment. It would add one Justice of Appeal to the Supreme Court of Alberta, and two Ontario county court judges, increasing that number from 63 in 1952 to 81. It would also add one county court judge in British Columbia.

My point is that the piecemeal, spasmodic and ex post facto approach hitherto adopted with respect to the judiciary has not had the desired effect, namely, to overcome the present backlog of cases unheard and judgments undelivered. This situation causes uncertainty at the best and hardship at the worst. I hesitate to repeat the familiar cliche, attributed to Gladstone, that justice delayed is justice denied, or that the appearance of justice is as important as justice itself, or, as Chateaubriand once said, "Justice is the bread of the nation: it is always hungry for it." It seems to me that what is needed is a new and positive approach, with consultation among the Attorney General of Canada and the attorneys-general of the provinces, whereby the problem may be met with foresight and imagination. There must be a greater anticipation of future requirements.

Honourable senators, I have spoken on nearly every occasion when a similar bill has been introduced. I have been practising law in the City of Ottawa for 32 years, and I say to you that as far as the Province of Ontario is concerned you could appoint two or five additional judges each year and it would not solve the problem which exists at the present time. Right here in Ottawa we have approximately 350 cases that have been on the list for a period of two years. The litigants today are not satisfied that their cases be heard two or three years after they first consult a lawyer. As a matter of fact, it has become difficult for a lawyer today to convince his client that his case, which was handed to him two years previously, has not yet been heard, and litigants are verifying the story told to them by their own lawyer either by telephoning to or communicating with the registrar to find out if the lawyer is telling the truth. As I have said, you could appoint one judge or two or five every year, but this would not take care of the problem.

I think we should be grateful to the newspapers and to newspapermen throughout Canada, because sometimes these people go into the legal problems a little more thoroughly than the Canadian Bar Association and a little more thoroughly than lawyers.

This bill was first introduced in July, and the Montreal Star of July 15, 1964 published an article about it. It is headed "Three New Judges," and reads:

> Quebec province is to have three new Superior Court judges under legislation introduced in the Commons this week, and while the addition is laudable, the question arises immediately as to whether or not this is enough.
>
> The need for more judges is obvious, and it remains for the province to get together with Ottawa to fill the need. Justice Minister Favreau noted in presenting his bill that Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia have passed enabling legislation to receive their new judges. Quebec, we note, has only advised Ottawa that it intends to pass such legislation. It will be remembered that under the constitution the provinces have the authority to set up Superior Courts, but the federal government appoints the judges and pays their salaries.
> Mr. Favreau said he intends to write to provincial attorneys general to ask them to give more notice of their plans to increase the size of their judiciary so that the necessary bills can be introduced earlier in the parliamentary session.
>
> Truly, Quebecers, and Montrealers in particular, have suffered as a result of the long delays in securing justice caused by the backlog of cases before the courts. A new courthouse is finally being built, after generations of pleading. It is to be hoped that Ottawa and Quebec will get together with far greater dispatch to see to it that there are sufficient judges to speed the work of the court.

What I am about to read now is surprising.

> The annual report presented by the chief clerk of Superior Court last January showed that Montreal, the largest judicial district in Canada, had 17,000 cases before it still to be heard. While waiting for the new court house to be built, Associate Chief Justice George S. Challies said slow but steady progress is being made in cutting this backlog. The delay between inscription of summary cases, and their hearing, had been cut from about a year to half that and a further cut was expected. A much longer delay was normal for the 8,000 or so major cases inscribed on the rolls each year.

I have no right to practise in the Province of Quebec and I am not an authority on the administration of justice in that province. However, I understand that the magistrates, who are also called judges, are appointed by the province and they have jurisdiction to hear civil cases over and above criminal cases, involving amounts not exceeding $200. This means that every civil claim involving an amount in excess of that sum has to be filed, heard and disposed of in the Superior Courts. Can you imagine the costs of the delay?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Have they no county court or district court?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: No. I am told the Quebec Civil Code is being revised and that this situation might be taken care of, but their problem now is that the provincial judges are paid and appointed by the provincial courts.

In Ontario we have our county court judges, and this is also the situation in many other provinces. These judges are empowered to hear cases involving amounts up to but not exceeding $2,000, and can hear cases involving amounts up to $15,000 or $20,000 on consent of both parties. This is a situation, honourable senators, which comes to our attention every year and, the time has arrived when we must face the fact that this is not a solution to the problem.

Let me conclude this article by reading the last paragraph:

> While noting the need for space for court rooms, Mr. Justice Challies recalled that of the 36 Superior Court judges in the district, only about 20 are available at any one time to hear cases, "and this is not really enough." To this we can only most heartily agree.

For many years as a practising lawyer in Ottawa I have been considered as a voice crying in the wilderness. I have advocated for many years what I said here last year, and I was told by my good friend and classmate, Senator Walker, that it was a matter for the Attorney General of Ontario.

Some years ago in the City of Hull my good friend Judge Ste. Marie was appointed as a resident judge for the judicial District of Hull. Since then they have appointed a second judge, who is also a resident judge. These two judges are available at all times and can deal with cases. They do not have to wait until a judge residing in Quebec City comes there, as is the case in our Province of Ontario where we have to wait until a judge resident in Toronto comes to Ottawa. As I have said, in the City of Ottawa at the present time there are 350 cases that have been on the list for two years.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: In Ottawa there are 350 cases on the list that have not yet been heard.

We have three Assizes: September, January, and April, and they take care of the criminal cases. The civil cases, as we know, are just set aside, and sometimes not one civil case is heard before a jury. We have also non-jury sittings in November, March and May, and sometimes 20 out of 350 or 400 cases are disposed of. People have to wait.

The Canadian Bar Association at their last meeting discussed this situation, and said it was an acute problem. Perhaps 50 per cent of the cases on the lists are automobile accident cases. Some day—and I know that many law firms do not look favourably upon this suggestion—a commission will have to be appointed to hear automobile accident cases in order that they may be disposed of instead of being adjourned time after time. I am not responsible for what happens in our local Bar, but the members know that I have advocated this for years.
