House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Monday, April 14, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

HOUSING—VETERANS LAND ACT—WELCOME, ONT.

Mr. STEPHENSON:

1. What date was land purchased at Welcome, Ontario, to build houses under the V.L.A.?

2. When were these houses started?

3. When will these houses be completed?

4. Were any night watchmen or guards employed on this project?

5. If so, for what length of time and what has been the remuneration paid up to date or expected to be paid by the time houses are completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. June 20, 1945.

2. November 12, 1945.

3. During the week commencing March 30.

4. Yes.

5. November 12, 1945 to March 31, 1947; $2,637.39. Watchman service is employed at prevailing rates; in this locality, $36 per week. Prolonged delays in well drilling at this project contributed to the relatively high cost.

HOUSING—VETERANS LAND ACT—BOWMANVILLE AREA

Mr. STEPHENSON:

1. How much land was bought in connection with building veterans' houses under V.L.A. east of Bowmanville on No. 2 highway?

2. How many are under construction?

3. How many have been completed?

4. If any have been completed, are they occupied as yet? If so, on what terms were they sold or rented?

5. What will be the cost to the government of each house when completed?

6. What will be the cost of the whole project, land and houses, when completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. 12 acres.

2. None.

3. Four.

4. Two occupied. One applied for. Sale terms: $600 down; balance less conditional grant of $1,400 amortized over a period of not more than 25 years, with interest at 3½ per cent.

5. Cost to the government for house construction only: Humphrys 1, $5,550; Humphrys 2, $5,432; Humphrys 3, $5,290; Humphrys 4, $5,144.

6. Total cost of project including houses, land, water, roads, driveways, landscaping, and a contingency of $100 per house: $27,685.75.

CANDIDATES FOR PUBLIC SERVICE—INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE TESTING LOYALTY

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. Is there an interdepartmental government committee studying methods for the testing of national loyalty of prospective candidates for dominion public service?

2. If not, is there a committee which has as its objective or part of an objective a purpose similar to the above?

3. Who are the members of this committee?

4. What are the criteria for testing loyalty?

5. Has this committee made any report or reports?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As was indicated to the House of Commons by the Prime Minister on February 10 last, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Wellington North (Hansard, page 247), interdepartmental committees are established by the government from time to time as a means of facilitating the despatch of public business. The reports which they make to the government from time to time are confidential and the government itself accepts full responsibility for whatever action may be taken as a result of advice received from such committees.

Among these, at the present time, is a standing interdepartmental panel on security, composed of officials from the departments and agencies of government from time to time concerned. The function of this panel is to advise on the coordination of the planning, organization and execution of security measures generally which affect government departments. These measures necessarily include the devising of the best methods of carrying out investigations of applicants for government employment to determine their suitability from a security point of view, but the committee does not deal with individual cases.

Under the terms of the Civil Service Act (sections 4 (a) and 26 (3)) and regulations (Sec. 7) the civil service commission is required to satisfy itself as to the character and habits of persons appointed by it to government employment. These provisions do not however apply to all employees of government departments or agencies nor do they relieve departments of their responsibility for satisfying themselves as to the suitability of individual employees from the security standpoint. "National loyalty" is an aspect of security and it is not considered possible or desirable to establish any rigid criteria for testing loyalty in this sense. As indicated above, ultimate responsibility in this respect rests with the department concerned in each case.

ARMED FORCES—CIVILIAN HOCKEY TEAMS

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Was request made by Halifax parties for permission for certain members of the armed forces to take part, as players, in civilian hockey teams during the season of 1946-47?

2. Was permission granted? If not, what reason was given for refusal?

3. Has permission been granted for members of the armed forces to play with Shawinigan Falls or Quebec Aces?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. No. The members of the forces concerned could not be spared from their official duties for the time required to train and play with civilian hockey teams.

3. Yes. One member of the forces was granted permission to play with the Quebec Aces on condition that any time required from duty would be deducted from his annual leave.

Note: Final decision in these cases, based on the exigencies of the service, rested with the G.O.C. command concerned.

WAR ASSETS—SALE OF TRUCKS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. CASE:

1. Since the cessation of hostilities, have any new or used trucks that were in Canada at the time of sale been sold to individuals, corporations or governments of foreign countries?

2. If so, in what months and years were these sales made?

3. What was the name of the manufacturer of the trucks and tonnage?

4. At the time of these sales were there any demands from any individuals or corporations to purchase equipment of a like type or near the type on hand in any government department?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The following is a list of surplus trucks that were located in Canada and sold direct to foreign governments and to exporters for export to countries as declared by the exporter showing the months and years in which the sales were made, together with the type of truck and tonnage thereof:

FEDERAL GRANTS TO MANITOBA AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

1. How many agricultural societies in the province of Manitoba received federal government grants during the years 1945 to 1946?
2. What are the names of such societies?
3. What amount did each society receive in each of the years mentioned above?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. None.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

DAUPHIN, MAN., AIRPORT

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

1. Has the franchise been granted to any firm or individual to operate an air service which includes either airport at Dauphin, Manitoba?
2. If so, what is the name of such firm or individual?
3. On what date and for what period of time was such franchise granted?
4. What other firms or individuals, if any, made application for such franchise?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Frank M. Hurley

Applied for licence to operate a scheduled commercial air service between the following points: Winnipeg—Dauphin—The Pas—Flin Flon.

Application was rejected because the applicant failed to complete all necessary documentation.

Prairie Cities Airlines Limited

Applied for licence to operate a scheduled commercial air service between the following points: Winnipeg — Portage la Prairie — Brandon — Dauphin — Yorkton — Regina — Weyburn—Estevan.

Application withdrawn by applicant.

Canadian Pacific Airlines Limited

Applied for licence to operate a scheduled commercial air service between the following points: Winnipeg—Dauphin—The Pas—Flin Flon.

Air transport board decision pending.

DOMINION COUNCIL OF HEALTH

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. To what extent are the recommendations of the dominion council of health carried out?
2. In what manner are the recommendations of the said council carried out?
3. Apart from dealing with specific problems relating to public health, has the said council performed other useful functions?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Aside from making recommendations and proposals and furnishing advice, the council has no authority conferred upon it, and there is nothing obligatory upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare or any other authority to accept its advice or recommendations. However, in the years since its inception, the council has been recognized for the important part it has played in fostering and initiating much useful and progressive health legislation, and its advice and recommendations have come to be regarded as worthy of careful consideration by all concerned.

2. The Department of National Health and Welfare employs a full-time secretary to the council, who is responsible, under direction of the chairman, for bringing recommendations of the council to the attention of the appropriate authorities, and to report back to the council any action taken in respect thereto.

3. Yes. The extent to which uniformity has been attained in the provision of public health services by the various provinces is credited largely to the exchange of information and ideas made possible through the getting together of the senior health officials at meetings of the council.

HOUSING—VETERANS LAND ACT—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. What was the amount paid the contractor for each house constructed under the Veterans' Land Act, and what allowance was made for cost plus or management fee at (a) Chilliwack; (b) Mission; (c) Haney?
2. Was temporary heating used during the construction of these houses at Chilliwack, Mission and Haney? If so, for what reason; what was the cost of same to each house and to whom was the money paid?
3. How many feet of drains were constructed at the Chilliwack housing project and (a) what was the size of each drain; (b) number of feet of tile purchased; (c) size and price of same; (d) name of firm receiving payment for this work?
4. What months were the houses under construction in each project and who were the inspectors in charge?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. House costs not yet finally determined by cost inspection and audit division of treasury. Management fee per unit: $180 plus $65 for plant rental.

2. Yes, to dry out plaster etc. so that work could proceed without undue delay. The average cost per unit was $7.61 at Chilliwack; $6.56 at Mission; and $28.05 at Haney. Payment was made to the contractors Bennett & White.

3. 5,000 feet of tile used for drainage purposes plus effluent lines for septic tanks. (a)

Four inches in diameter; (b) 7036; (c) Four inches in diameter costing approximately 6½ cents per foot; (d) Bennett & White.

Mission, July 30, 1945 to July 15, 1946, E. A. Bennett.

Haney, June 12, 1945 to Aug. 15, 1946, A. R. Johnson.

PASSPORTS

Mr. POULIOT:

Is an application for passport a public or a confidential document?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: An application for passport is a confidential document.

*AIRCRAFT "NORTH STAR"

Mr. CASE:

1. By whom was the aircraft North Star designed?
2. What, to date, has the government spent on building this aircraft?
3. Has the government ceased to construct these aeroplanes? If so, for what reason?

Mr. McILRAITH: In answer to the first part of this question, I may say that the North Star is a Douglas type of aircraft designed by Douglas Aircraft Company Incorporated, and modified for Rolls Royce Merlin engines by Douglas Aircraft Company Incorporated, Rolls Royce and Canadair in collaboration with Trans-Canada Air Lines and the R.C.A.F.

As to parts 2 and 3 of the question, a statement was made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply on March 20 last, which will be found at pages 1540 to 1544 of Hansard; and in addition to that, a parliamentary return was tabled earlier this afternoon giving additional information in answer to the question.

EXPORTS OF BUTTER

Mr. DENIS:

1. Did Canada export any butter during 1944, 1945 and 1946?
2. If so, what quantity was exported and to what countries?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Yes.
2. Canadian exports by countries of butter during the calendar years 1944, 1945 and 1946:

2. (a) 12; (b) none.

3. (a) 1 at $3,600; 2 at $2,880; 2 at $2,580; 1 at $2,400; 4 at $2,280; 2 at $2,124; (b) answered by 2 (b).

4 and 5. Answered by 2 (b).

LINDSAY ARSENAL

Mr. LENNARD:

1. What is the personnel in charge of the arsenal at Lindsay, Ontario?
2. How many of this personnel have had overseas service?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. One hundred and ninety four, all employees of Canadian Arsenals Limited. The special work on which most of these employees are engaged will be completed within two months. At that time the staff will be reduced to approximately 60.

2. Forty-six.

PERMITS FOR EXPORT OF LEAD

Mr. CASE:

How many permits were issued in 1946 for export of lead and to whom were these permits issued and for what reason?

Mr. MacKINNON: One hundred and seventeen export permits were issued during 1946 covering the export of lead in bars, lead sheets, lead concentrates, antimonial lead, virgin pig lead, corrosive lead, refined lead, caulking lead, re-run lead, barium lead, and silver lead crude ore.

The name of firms applying for export permits is confidential information.

Canada normally produces more lead and lead products than we can consume in this country. Export controls are continued to assure adequate and reasonable supplies on the domestic market.

6. What quantity is at present on hand, and stored in this building?
7. Who operated this plant for the two years prior to March 31, 1947?
8. Is there an investigation being conducted at the present time regarding material taken from this building?

INCOME TAX—MARRIED WOMEN

Mr. TIMMINS:

How many married women in the Ottawa taxation area paid income tax in 1945 in respect to salaries alone (as contrasted from those who paid income tax on investments), and what was the aggregate of the income tax so paid?

UNITED NATIONS

SPECIAL SESSION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY TO CONSIDER PALESTINE QUESTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is based on a press dispatch issued from the united nations headquarters at Lake Success yesterday. According to this dispatch a special session of the general assembly of the united nations is to be called for April 28 next to take up the Palestine problem. My questions are two in number: (1) Has Canada been invited to attend this meeting? (2) Will the minister now advise the house of the government's plans with respect to this special united nations meeting, and, so far as it can do so, indicate its policy with respect to the Palestine question?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): To the first question the answer is in the affirmative. The department this morning received a dispatch from Lake Success dated yesterday notifying us that a majority of the members had yesterday concurred in the request of the United Kingdom to summon a special session of the general assembly, and that in accordance with rules 3 and 8 of the provisional rules of procedure of the general assembly the secretary general was notifying us that this special session will open on Monday, April 28, 1947, at eleven a.m. in the general asembly hall, Flushing Meadows, New York City. The provisional agenda of the special session is to be as follows:

1. Opening of the session by the chairman of the Belgian delegation.
2. Election and report of credentials committee.
3. Election of president for the duration of the special session.
4. Organization of session.
5. Adoption of agenda.

All these are, of course, just preliminaries. Then the only real item on the agenda is the following: Constituting and instructing special committee to prepare for consideration of the question of Palestine at second regular session. The Canadian government had previously expressed its acquiescence in the application of the United Kingdom for a special session of the assembly for the limited purpose mentioned in this article of the agenda.

As to the second part of the question asked by the leader of the opposition, the government feel that this special session will not require a delegation comprising cabinet representation, but that it will suffice to have a delegation of officials of the Department of External Affairs. The present plans are to have that small official delegation headed by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As to the remainder of the question, asking for an indication of the government's policy with respect to the Palestine question, the government's policy at present is to concur in this application that there be set up a committee to prepare for consideration the question of Palestine at the next general session of the assembly.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would it be correct to say that this meeting which is called for April 28 is more in the nature of a preliminary meeting for the study of this question, the same to be eventually decided at a fuller and larger regular meeting of the general assembly?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Our understanding is that it is to constitute a committee which will gather information which will be available for the purpose of dealing intelligently with the problem at the next regular session of the assembly.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF—GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have another question which I should like to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is with respect to the trade discussions now taking place at Geneva. I am raising this question simply because of the conflicting reports which have gone out from Britain, from here and from the headquarters of the united nations at New York. For instance, Sir Stafford Cripps is reported to the effect that the British are standing by empire preferences. Our own representative, Mr. Wilgress, is reported to the effect that Canada is giving its whole-hearted backing to freer multilateral trade; and there was a press dispatch yesterday of another character. My question is this: Will the government now inform us what decision was arrived at by the preliminary conference in London; and, secondly, what instruction has our delegation received from the government with respect to the attitude it should take on trade matters at Geneva?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not think that these reports must necessarily be regarded as conflicting. The statement that Canada is giving its whole-hearted backing to freer multilateral trade is a correct statement, but it is not the whole statement in itself. Canada does not intend to give up what it holds for anything less than something better that it would hold after the arrangement is made. My understanding of the attitude of Sir Stafford Cripps is that it is quite in accord with that general policy. The whole attitude would not be correctly summarized in stating that the United Kingdom was standing by the empire preferences. I think we all regard the empire preferences as something quite precious which we do not intend to give up unless we get something which together we consider to be better than what we already have.

As to whether it will be possible for me to make or table a report on the discussions of the preliminary conference in London, that is something I would have to consider, because, being only one of the members of the conference, we shall have to see to it that we do not publicize anything which it might not be agreeable to the other conferees to have publicized before the line of conduct decided upon at that conference has been implemented in the negotiations at Geneva. I shall endeavour to give to the house as complete information as possible in that regard.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Some days ago the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) asked me a question along this line. I was preparing an answer, but I believe the answer just given by my colleague pretty well covers the question. If so I should be glad if the hon. member would accept that statement as an answer to his inquiry.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce stick to his guns in regard to the speech he made in the Ottawa valley, and not pay too much attention to what has been said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. MacKINNON: I think the statement to which my hon. friend refers, made by me, is exactly in line with the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

CATTLE

INQUIRY AS TO RAIL GRADING BY PACKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is there any truth in the report that all cattle sold at stock yards across Canada will be rail graded by the packers and that the farmer will have to accept these returns as he does for hogs? If this is done the sale of cattle will be controlled by the packers, since, when the grading is done, the animals will be beyond the control of the farmers, the legitimate owners.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): No arrangements have been made by the federal Department of Agriculture to rail grade cattle. I have no information as to what is being done provincially.

INDIAN ACT

CONVICTION OF BRITISH WAR BRIDE UNDER LIQUOR REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I do not know to whom I should direct this question, whether to the Minister of Mines and Resources, the Secretary of State or the Minister of Justice. It has to do with the conviction a few days ago of a British war bride for an offence contrary to the Indian Act, in the matter of an infraction of the liquor regulations. The question I wish to ask is this. In view of this anomaly having arisen and this woman having been declared to have the nationality of her husband by reason of marriage, is consideration being given to the amendment of the Citizenship Act to remove this anomaly, or in any event to grant this woman a free pardon?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): I do not know whether the question is addressed to me, but I believe it should be placed on the order paper. At all events I shall take this as notice, and perhaps the proper minister will give an answer later.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN SITTING HOURS

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the acting leader of the government having to do with matters closer to home. Has the government given consideration to the point raised before the Easter recess in regard to changing the sitting hours of the house?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): The government has given the matter some consideration and has decided to postpone further consideration until the dean of the house has returned to his duties here.

HOUSING

CURTAILMENT OF UNESSENTIAL CONSTRUCTION TO PERMIT COMPLETION OF VETERANS' HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply whether consideration has been given to curtailing unessential building so that hundreds of partly completed veterans' houses across Canada may be finished without further delay in regard to such materials as nails, lath and lumber.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to be brief and to the point when putting questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. FRASER: May I have an answer? I am referring to the hundreds of houses partly constructed.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I can easily answer part of the question, but it is difficult to find just what portion of the hon. member's fairly lengthy statement forms the question. It has to do with the shortage of building materials which does exist at present. Continuous consideration has been given this problem, and to enable veterans to complete their houses a system of priorities has been worked out for housing materials for veterans, which has been announced regularly from time to time. That system is in operation at present. I do not know what more I can say at this time by way of answer to the question. It would require a long statement to cover the matter fully.

Mr. FRASER: My question is whether consideration is being given to the curtailment of unessential building.

SUPPLY

FLOOD CONTROL—FEED GRAIN SUBSIDIES—VACANCY IN HALIFAX CONSTITUENCY—STATEMENT OF MR. BRACKEN

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): A few days ago the acting leader of the government (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated that each Monday, by a motion to go into committee of supply, hon. members would be given an opportunity to raise questions they might consider to be important and which had not been dealt with or finally decided. I am aware that a number of hon. gentlemen propose to bring up different matters. I want to mention only three, and I shall deal with them very briefly.

The first matter I wish to bring up is one which has been presented to us every day recently from different parts of Canada. I refer to the damage arising from floods in various sections of the country. It is the question of flood control and conservation. As hon. members know, we have on the statute book the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, a measure which has gone a very long way toward the rehabilitation of some of the drier sections of western Canada. I believe it is generally accepted throughout the nation that this is a wise and constructive policy. Events of the last few days in different parts of Canada indicate that legislation of this kind should be extended, and that this sort of policy should be provided for other places. Today one reads that almost in the centre of the dry belt of the prairies floods are doing serious damage not only to farms but also to farm buildings and to urban centres. I am referring particularly to the valley of the Saskatchewan near the city of Saskatoon. The newspapers are full of reports of the flood damage in western Ontario. For two or three days last week I had the opportunity to see something of the damage done by floods along the Grand river, the Thames, the Sydenham, and other rivers in that district. As I witnessed that damage it occurred to me that one of the greatest opportunities to do a permanent job of reconstruction is before the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada, in the immediate initiation of a well-rounded out policy of conservation for that area.

Within a mile of this building we can see some of the damage that has been done in the valley of the Rideau, right in the suburbs of this city. It will be said that a problem of this kind falls primarily upon the provinces. By a measure that is correct. But in respect of a problem of this magnitude I say we cannot rest on our oars by taking any such attitude. The problem of the conservation and development of the natural resources of the nation is a major responsibility of the central government as well as of the provinces.

Canada has been profligate in respect of her resources, with the result that in many instances our forests have been overcut. Our soils have been wasted—not only on the plains of western Canada but on the slopes throughout the east. Our streams have become sedimented and the flow of our rivers altered to the point where in the spring we suffer from floods in the same areas where in midsummer the rivers are dry or relatively so.

The dominion government has not been without plans in respect of this particular kind of problem. Its plans were set out in the proposals of the dominion as they were presented to the dominion-provincial conference in August 1945. They looked toward meeting conditions such as these which this year have caused so much waste and damage throughout the nation.

At pages 24 and 25 of this document the approach of the dominion government is indicated as follows:

Activities for which the provincial governments are responsible, and which the dominion is prepared to consider assisting, provided specific agreement can be reached—

And it goes on in these words:

Assistance to raise provincial standards, in the general national interest, in respect to the conservation, protection and development of provincial natural resources.

And then, under the heading "Agriculture"—

Extension of conservation activities to all provinces. For example, water conservation, land drainage, marsh lands rehabilitation, land clearing, soil erosion control.

Here we have a problem right on our doorstep. The need of action is emphasized by the tremendous loss we see on all sides. In this outline by the government there is an indication that it has given some thought to the matter. But nothing is being done—for the reason, I take it, that the dominion and the provinces have not been called together to discuss this very kind of thing.

What I wish to do today is to point out the problem, and to indicate that in large measure it is the responsibility of the central government—a matter to which it has already given some thought, but about which nothing is being done because the dominion and the provinces have not been called together. With all respect I suggest this is an added argument for their being called at once to meet in another conference.

The second question I wish to raise has to do with agricultural subsidies, or a certain phase of that subject. On March 17 last the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) announced a policy of feed grain drawbacks amounting to 25 cents a bushel on barley and 10 cents on oats. This announcement was made while parliament was in session, and it is reported in detail at page 1408 of Hansard. At the moment I shall not take time to read it, but I have no doubt hon. members will recall the announcement made on that occasion. The effect of that policy was to reduce the cost of feed grain to certain users of those products. Two weeks later, on April 2, when the house was not in session, a report appeared in the press indicating that another statement had been made by the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: The same statement.

Mr. BRACKEN: I shall read from the Free Press of April 2, which contains a report of a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture at a banquet held in the Prince Edward hotel at Brandon, Manitoba. The report states:

He also announced that the refund of 25 cents per bushel on barley and 10 cents on oats offered to purchasers of feed grain for live stock will be discontinued on August 1, 1947.

On March 17 it was announced that the subsidy would be continued; and then, according to this report, on April 2 it was announced it would be taken off on August 1. I believe the house is entitled to know what the situation is, so that there may be no confusion or misunderstanding. We should be told whether this second statement is a statement of government policy; and if so, whether the minister or someone else in the government will elaborate upon it. A bald statement of that kind, with no announcement of modified policy in related matters, leads to misunderstanding and confusion in the minds of those who are directly interested in such change of policy.

For example, when the policy was announced on March 17 there can be no doubt that feeders throughout the country planned their work having in mind that the policy first announced would be carried out. Two weeks later they read in the press—whether it is correct or not—that on August 1 the policy is to be discontinued. If it is not continued it will mean that those who are in or are going into that business—the feeding business—will at that time find their costs of production increased, with the result that either the prices of their products must be increased or their production must drop. I am asking that the government's policy in this respect be made clear, and I do so chiefly because there is a great deal of confusion and considerable misunderstanding with respect to it.

The other point I wish to raise at this time is one which affects all hon. members. It has to do with the vacancy in the constituency of Halifax. This vacancy has continued now much longer than vacancies in other constituencies which have occurred in the last few months. For instance, the constituency of Pontiac remained vacant only 137 days from the time of the death of the late member, Mr. McDonald, to the time of the election. The constituency of Parkdale was vacant 203 days from the time of the resignation of Doctor Bruce to the election on October 21, 1946. The vacancy in Portage la Prairie existed for 172 days from the death of Mr. Harry Leader to the election on that same date. In Richelieu-Vercheres the vacancy existed only 63 days from the time of the death of Hon. Mr. Cardin to the time of the election on December 23 of last year.

The Cartier vacancy existed for only 60 days from the time of the unseating of Fred Rose to the election on March 31 of this year.

If an election were called tomorrow in Halifax the lapse of time between the vacancy occurring and the election would be 206 days, longer than the vacancy in any of these other seats. In this connection I am going to quote the opinion given—I was going to say of another authority, but I will say, of an authority. It was given when the present Prime Minister sat where I am now sitting. He had this to say about a similar situation that existed at that time. I am quoting from Hansard of January 29, 1934, page 18, where the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is reported as having said:

> However, if still further evidence is required to show not only the manner in which the public has lost confidence in this administration but the manner in which the government has lost confidence in itself, it will be found in the fact that at the present time, and since May last, there has been a vacancy in the representation in the constituency of South Oxford. I ask the administration this question: When the writs were issued for the constituencies of Yamaska, Restigouche-Madawaska and Mackenize, why was not a writ issued for the constituency of South Oxford?

I ask the same question, substituting only the names of the other constituencies I have mentioned. When the writs were issued for the constituencies of Cartier, Richelieu-Vercheres, Portage la Prairie, Parkdale and others, why was not a writ issued for the constituency of Halifax?

I submit, sir, that on these three matters the government should have something to say at this time, particularly with respect to the first two. One is a matter of national importance, and one a matter which needs to be cleared up in the interests of the producers. The other concerns us all, but chiefly the electors of Halifax. I submit that the government should make a statement now as to when it intends to see that that constituency is represented in this house.

COST OF LIVING—AMENDMENT, MR. COLDWELL, TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in substantial agreement with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has just said. Like the leader of the opposition, last week I had an opportunity of seeing the flood conditions in the Chatham-Windsor-London area. I saw many thousands of acres of good land under several feet of water. I agree with him that this is a serious matter from the point of view of the economy of Canada because of the soil erosion which occurs under such conditions. The washing away of the top soil in this part of the province of Ontario, one of its most productive parts, is analogous to the wind-blown soil of western Canada during the drought period; in Saskatchewan during that drought period the government was compelled to consider what could be done to prevent erosion and to bring about better conditions. So we got the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which, may I say, I think has done in a limited way an exceedingly good job.

I agree also with what the leader of the opposition has said with regard to the prices of barley and oats. The producers should be in a position to know definitely what the government intends to do. I must say that my impression was not that apparently conveyed by the article from the Winnipeg Free Press to which the leader of the opposition referred.

With regard to the Halifax by-election, we are anxious to see the various constituencies properly represented in this house.

But I did not rise particularly to speak about these matters. We have all come back fresh from the country. Some hon. members have been to their constituencies, and others have moved around in different parts of Canada. What we have found over the last several weeks should cause this house a good deal of concern. The people of Canada are worried as perhaps they have not been worried for a very long time. I met a good many who were worried about how they are going to make ends meet during the next few months or the next year. I am not dealing specifically with the question of controls; I am dealing with the cost of living. The sharp increases in the cost of living to the people of Canada are causing misgivings in the minds of those who are responsible for the family budgets.

Unfortunately, from the point of view of the government and those who have not given sufficient attention to meeting this increased cost of living, there are the articles which are to be found in the Financial Post or on the financial pages of the Globe and Mail and other papers showing the profits which have been made during the past year or so by various industries. Various items which enter largely into the cost of living have gone up sharply since the beginning of the year. For example, shortening has gone up ten cents per pound. Soap has gone up one cent per bar. Biscuits have increased by ten per cent. Soap flakes have gone up from one to five cents a package. Shirts and underwear have gone up twenty-five per cent. Leather gloves and mitts, which the workers have to buy and which are so necessary in our climate, have gone up from eleven to sixteen per cent since January 31.

As I said a few moments ago, the people read these articles and see what the industries are making. I have before me an extract from the Financial Post which shows that the Monarch Knitting Company, for example, shows an increase of profits for 1946 over 1945 of 309 per cent. The Acme Glove Works shows an increase of 289 per cent. Bruck Silk Mills Limited shows an increase of 255 per cent. York Knitting Mills show an increase of 70 per cent, while Riverside Silk Mills show an increase of 69·2 per cent. Wool Combing Corporation show an increase of 57 per cent. I am just giving round figures, omitting the decimal points. Robinson Cotton Mills shows an increase of 39 per cent. Biltmore Hats Limited show an increase of 23 per cent, and Belding Corticelli 12 per cent. The average increase in profits in 1946 over 1945 was 107 per cent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: After taxes.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is after taxes, as one of my hon. friends reminds me. When the people see these profits, when they see the policy that has been put into effect, they are not only filled with misgiving and concern; they are filled with a good deal of indignation, and rightly so. The same thing applies to other major articles of household necessity for which the people of this country have been waiting for a long time. I refer to things such as washing machines. In this connection we find that Beatty Brothers show an increase of 23 per cent in profits over the previous year, and the same thing applies to the Easy Washing Machine Company. The same with mattresses. One could enumerate a whole list of commodities, some little irritating things. We know how the prices of soft drinks and chocolate bars have increased over the years. The price of soft drinks has not gone up very recently, but we are deluged with letters from various organizations in our constituencies asking, and I think quite properly, that the price of soft drinks should be restored to a nickel so that the youngsters can buy them; and I am all in sympathy with that. But the inference is that price increases are entirely due to the taxation policies of the government. Orange Crush showed an increase in net profits last year of 448·3 per cent over the previous year. You can hardly square that with the requests for tax reduction that are coming to us.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't drink it.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is probably better to take soft drinks than hard ones, which sometimes have disastrous results.

Look at the increase that has taken place in the rentals of hotel rooms. Permission was given to hotels to increase their room rents at the same time that the ten per cent rent increase was announced. The Windsor hotel in Montreal showed an increase in profits last year of 70·3 per cent over 1945.

The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) a few moments ago spoke of the difficulty of getting materials for the building of veterans' houses. That of course involves the question of controls, but at the moment I am not particularly looking at it from that point of view. I am thinking of several good reasons why houses, veterans' and others, are costing more. Again I go to the Financial Post for my data. In its issue of February 22, it shows that the net profits of Building Products, after taxes, jumped from $335,000 odd in 1945 to $1,295,000 in 1946. If hon. gentlemen will do a little figuring they will see that this works out at an increase of 286 per cent in profits last year over the previous year.

Mr. ABBOTT: How did their sales compare?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am speaking of their profits at the moment.

Mr. ISNOR: Which profits?

Mr. COLDWELL: Net profits after taxes, and the figures I am using I am taking not from some socialist paper, or some publication which is ultra-radical or believes in what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) now calls a compensated economy, whatever that may mean—

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a good name for you to learn about.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am going to ask the hon. member to define it one of these days. It has puzzled me to know what he really means.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps he is starting a new party.

Mr. COLDWELL: An hon. member suggests that the member for Vancouver Centre may be starting a new party. He has started a discussion at least. I could cite other examples of increased profits: Canadian Western Lumber Company, up 121 per cent; Canada Cement, up 101·6 per cent; and so it goes. Take the increase that was recently put into effect in the price of one of the few remaining luxuries our children enjoy, chocolate bars, which for so long sold at a nickel. I was in Windsor a few days ago—

Mr. MARTIN: A good city.

Mr. COLDWELL: A very good city, yes. The children there are better situated for buying chocolate bars, as the hon. member who interjected perhaps knows, because when a youngster on the street was asked how he liked to pay eight cents for a chocolate bar he gave some good advice. He said, "I did not pay eight cents; I bought mine in Detroit." Perhaps that is why my hon. friend says Windsor is a very good city.

Mr. MARTIN: No; because of the people there.

Mr. COLDWELL: The price of chocolate bars went up to eight cents on the same day in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa. That looks as if there was not much competition in that branch of the industry. It seems to have such a closely knit organization as to be able to put into effect almost immediately an increase in price in all three cities.

Look at the profits of these companies. Moir's, I suppose, is one of the largest chocolate manufacturing companies. Its profits last year were up 153 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL: Over what?

Mr. COLDWELL: Over 1945.

Mr. GARDINER: What were the figures for those years?

Mr. COLDWELL: The figures were $81,543 in 1945 and $206,067 in 1946. That is a pretty big increase.

Mr. ABBOTT: What were their total sales?

Mr. COLDWELL: After all, their capitalization is the same, and if their capitalization remains about the same and their total sales increase, they should be able to bring down their price.

Mr. ABBOTT: My only reason for asking the question is this. After you had the figure of the total sales you could see what the extra $150,000 would have meant in a reduction of price. That is relevant. It might have amounted to only a fraction of a cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: One company in Canada, International Nickel, had increased profits last year on lower sales.

An hon. MEMBER: Good management.

Mr. COLDWELL: Good management, yes. But may I say to my hon. friend that I agree with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) who in a speech before the Canadian Importers and Traders Association in Toronto last Friday gave that organization some pretty good advice. He said:

> It is not always easy to be as confident about the benefits of private enterprise as we would like to be.

He added:

> And if we should run into a minor recession, who is going to benefit by it? The Progressive Conservatives? No. The C.C.F.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Mr. COLDWELL: Does my hon. friend deny it?

Mr. MACDONNELL: No, not a word; but I might say that anything of mine that is printed by the Toronto Star is always carefully hand-picked to prove their point, and leaves out the rest.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not unusual with all kinds of newspapers, as I myself have discovered.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But the Star is easily first.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am leaving out some of the things my hon. friend said, but I am giving the exact idea he had in mind, and I do not think he will say that the statement I have put before the house does not convey the idea he expressed at that meeting. He went on to say:

> There are price agreements to-day. There are a lot of people trying to charge what the traffic will bear. If the business men really believed in freedom, they would not do that.

That is my whole point today. He went on:

This whole free system of ours is on trial. Socialists say prices are going up.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if all the people who say that prices are going up are socialists, there will be no one but socialists in this House of Commons after the next election.

An hon. MEMBER: What a hope!

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say it was a hope. I said that would happen if the assumption was correct. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario went on to say:

Socialists say prices are going up. I say we are going to cure that by production. If we don't, then it is going to be too bad.

That is true. Cure it by production, but remember that if we are to cure it by production we must see that consumption is able to take what production can produce, and if we allow the present trend to go on and prices to keep rising, as they have been rising lately, there will be plenty of production but the purchasing power of the people will be drained off and they will not be able to buy the goods that are available.

I thought there was a very neat comment in the Ottawa Citizen upon the little matter of chocolate bars, and I should like to quote it, if I may. It appears in the issue of April 11:

Chocolate bars are up to eight cents. But some of the bars are shorter than when they sold for a nickel, necessitating the use of more cardboard to make them look longer. So considering the increased cost of paper, maybe the new price is about right.

I thought that was quite a neat comment by the Ottawa Citizen. I would like to ask my hon. friends to my right exactly where they stand on this matter. I am not going into the question of controls, but it is involved to some extent in this connection. I read, not in the Toronto Star but in the Globe and Mail of March 28, this little story about their recent national meeting.

A resolution on government controls, for instance, is said to have engendered a wide difference of opinion. The old line Conservatives want a resolution which would put the party on record as demanding that all controls be dropped forthwith. The Progressive element favoured a resolution favouring controls on rent, foreign exchange and essential goods.

I looked carefully through the resolutions that were passed by my hon. friends at the meeting over that week-end, and I could not find any resolution dealing with controls. I came to the conclusion therefore that they could not have agreed very well. But may I say to the government that this business of an increased price level is something that we cannot laugh off. The people are looking to this House of Commons to do something and, through the house, to bring pressure to bear upon the government to do something to reverse the trend. If we do not, we shall be faced with serious difficulties.

We supported the wheat agreement, for example; we supported it both in the house and in the country. When we supported it we thought that the price level would remain about where it was, but the cost of production has gone up, and at the time the Minister of Agriculture referred to the fund of $200 million, the inference was that it might be used to compensate for increases in production costs, though it cannot be used for that purpose. But there is the principle we have to keep in mind, that if the cost of living is going up and the cost of production is also rising, then of necessity the Minister of Finance will have to find ways and means, in the words of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, of producing a compensating economy in wheat at least, and that is a matter which this house will not be permitted to overlook, if it would.

Higher wages in industry will be demanded, and we shall find ourselves in a difficult position indeed. I shall not go into a long discussion of that question this afternoon, but I do want to raise the whole question of increasing prices because I think this house has to face it. It is all very well to say that we have to increase production. I agree with that. But we have to bear in mind that if the money in the pockets of the people buys less, then of course the products of industry will begin to pile up and we shall reach that stage of recession which has been talked about particularly on the other side of the line.

As I believe I said on another occasion in this house, the productivity of the worker during the war years increased tremendously. I notice that lately in a report the acting commissioner of labour for the United States government, A. F. Hinrichs, said:

We anticipated an extraordinarily rapid increase in the output per man-hour in most industries, and did experience a similar rapid increase in productivity in the years immediately following the first world war. It seems to us that an increase of as much as 30 per cent by 1950 may reasonably be expected.

That is, all across American industry.

I saw a report by another writer in one of the United States papers to the effect that already in some industries productivity per man hour has increased by 40 per cent. That will be reflected, of course, in consumption; if we fail to consume the products of industry, then it will be reflected in unemployment; and one of the ways of preventing consumption of goods is to keep prices too high, thus reducing the amount of goods which the dollar of the consumer will buy.

Just to confirm my point, according to Doctor Julius Hirsch, Barron's Weekly, November 19, 1945:

> The United States in 1945 needed only thirty-six million people to produce the quantity of goods produced by forty-five million in 1939; thus, to employ the same numbers of people as in 1939, output would have to be 25 per cent higher, and 25 per cent more effective purchasing power would be needed to assure a market for the additional goods.

The tragedy is that in the hands of the people of Canada at the present time there is a good deal of purchasing power, accumulated during the war, which is being drained off by the high prices to which I have referred. The Minister of Finance the other day took a good deal of credit, and I give the minister and the department credit, for the enormous savings that had been made during the war by the institution of wartime controls. He said that the annual savings amounted to $2,500 million, and he gave the annual cost of making these savings—expenses of wartime prices and trade board subsidies and so on—as $200 million. If it was true for the whole five years—probably it was not—the total saving would be $12,500 million, at a cost of $1 billion, and that would be a little less than $1,000 per head saved for every man, woman and child in Canada. This is a remarkable confirmation of the effectiveness of what was done in that field to prevent undue profits and undue prices during the war.

It should be interesting, may I say, to the members of the government to note how some of the financial newspapers are changing their tune. Take the Financial Post. I shall not quote at length, but if hon. members will read the editorial in that journal of July 13, 1946, at page 1, they will find that they demand that we do pretty much what the United States did—remove controls. Then you find that a little later, on November 9, 1946—also at page 1—they were complaining that we had not done what the United States had done, that we were shilly-shallying and not acting rapidly enough. Take the most recent one, April 12, 1947, and what do we find? This appears in the same newspaper:

> Caught between high taxes and sharply-rising prices, consumers are not going to be any more complacent when they learn that company profits have been mounting. A survey on page 5—

That is where some of my figures came from.

> —of the combined results of sixty Canadian companies, shows 1946 earnings almost 30 per cent higher than for 1945.
> The same trend is abundantly apparent in the United States, where President Earl Bunting, of the National Association of Manufacturers, bluntly warns: "If the constant upward winding of the spiral continues, you will see one of the most terrible busts this country ever had."
> If that does happen, few indeed can plead lack of warning.
> Exactly the same thing happened two years after the first world war. Prices went up, quality went down, and finally buyers rebelled. Already there are signs that there is a limit as to what the consumer will pay. The first scramble for high priced luxuries and durable goods has slackened. Instead of waiting until organized buyers resistance compels drastic price cutting, business would be far smarter, and in the end more prosperous, if it voluntarily lowered prices now.

That is the advice that the Financial Post gives now.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): See what wise advisers we have.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, it was a very wise speech which my hon. friend for Muskoka-Ontario made. I only wish that all his speeches were equally wise. But if we look away from these goods again to other lines, we have the pulp and paper industry, a big industry in Canada. It is true that output has gone up, but look at the increase in the company's profits—and the increase, incidentally, in the price of newsprint. The price of newsprint rose by $29 a ton on January 21, 1946, an increase of fifty-one per cent in that period up to April 1, 1947. The source of that statement is the Montreal Gazette of April 3.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where did they sell the newsprint?

Mr. COLDWELL: That does not matter. It is profits that I am talking about. It does not matter whether they hold up Canadians or whether they hold up somebody else. Let us take it that they send it to Britain and that they hold up Britain. What are they doing?

Mr. JACKMAN: Who held them down in the thirties?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: What are they doing as far as Britain is concerned? Britain obtained a loan from this country. If the price increase is great on any commodity that we sell to Britain, we restrict the amount of goods we can send to assist in her recovery, upon which our own recovery largely depends. That is one of the arguments we have used in connection with foodstuffs going to Britain. Let us try to give as much food as we can for the dollars which Britain got from us. If it applies to wheat, my hon. friends should remember that it applies equally to newsprint. But that is beside the point.

The profits of International Paper are up 265 per cent over the previous year.

Mr. JACKMAN: A United States concern.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, take Abitibi.

Mr. KNOWLES: Shipping out Canadian paper which our people cannot get.

Mr. COLDWELL: Their profits are up 205 per cent; St. Lawrence up 107 per cent.

Mr. JACKMAN: How much did they lose in 1932?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am talking about 1947, not 1932.

Mr. JACKMAN: They did not pay any dividends in the depression years.

Mr. COLDWELL: Maybe they did not. But many of the people of Canada, when my hon. friends were in power, were compelled to live on two cents a meal or were given twenty cents a day in unemployment camps. Let us remember that I am talking about consumers and profits in 1947 and we will not go back to 1932 unless my hon. friends desire it. If they wish it, I shall be glad to put a large number of figures on the record showing what they did to the country in 1932.

Mr. JACKMAN: You cannot have producers without consumers.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend never objects unless it is some big business whose toes are being trodden upon. If somebody happens to tread on the toes of big business, my hon. friend from Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) is on his feet immediately.

Mr. JACKMAN: They could build some more houses in Rosedale. Perhaps you should listen to me there too.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. Rosedale is a very desirable section of Toronto. My hon. friend spends some time there and I imagine the rest is spent in Bay street. Probably that is why we get these interruptions.

Mr. JACKMAN: Come down and I will show you Rosedale.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: The interesting thing about these interruptions is that while I am complaining of the government's neglect in allowing these increased prices, the government is defended most vociferously by some hon. members to my right. That is one of the amazing things we find in the House of Commons at the present time.

I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I would refer my hon. friends to a press conference of the President of the United States held in Washington about a month ago, at which President Truman pleaded with business for lower prices in order to avoid recession. He gave some of the history of the last period, and he urged that business pay some attention to it. Again on April 11, last week, he said in a press conference, if I may quote from a report of it:

> He bluntly reprimanded business for running prices higher and higher and reminded it of its responsibility to bring them down . . . Business men asked for free enterprise. They got it. Now it is up to them to make good, to manage it for the best welfare of the nation . . .
> There was the distinct impression of inner conflict, resentment boiling up from disappointment over the attitude of business and, over all, a spirit of futility as he discovered that he had lost most of the implements by which the economy might be managed more effectively. Plainly he was discouraged . . .

He went on to indicate that his administration had been kind to business, had abolished controls, had repealed excess profits tax, and the result was that there were fine profits for the business interests of the country.

I wish to express the point of view we hold by moving the following amendment to the motion, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> This house desires to record its opinion that the government should give consideration to the immediate restoration of price control on and lower prices for the necessaries of life, particularly articles of food and clothing, shelter, household appliances, and supplies and machinery needed by the farmers in connection with their work;
> Further, this house is of the opinion that the harmful and dangerous effects of the rising cost of living demand immediate and effective action.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) raised a certain question which I think should be dealt with immediately. His remarks were agreed with by the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell). I am sorry that hon. members do not read very carefully the statements which I make to the house, as is evident when they contend that no announcement was made to the effect that the 10 and 15 cent payments—10 cents on oats and 15 cents on barley—had been done away with. The very first sentence in paragraph 1 of that statement of policy was:

> Effective tomorrow, March 18, the system of advance equalization payments will be discontinued . . .

The advance equalization payments were 10 cents on oats and 15 cents on barley, and they were made for a certain reason, to accomplish a certain purpose. Back in 1942 the grain growing provinces of Canada, the provinces that grow the surpluses which are distributed to the other provinces to be fed —the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta —had the lowest gross cash returns to agriculture on an index basis, taking 1926-29 as 100, of any of the provinces. Saskatchewan, for example, had an index figure of 81 whereas all the provinces other than the prairie provinces had index figures running from 135 to 180, if I remember correctly. So in 1943 it was decided to give equalization payments to the farmers who grew the grain. Ten cents was the equalization payment on oats and 15 cents on barley. The very first statement in the announcement made on March 17 was that these equalization payments would no longer be made. I know that in press reports which have appeared here and there across Canada the phrase "feeder subsidy" has appeared continually. There has been no feeder subsidy paid on oats and barley in Canada at any time from 1943 down to March 18, 1947. There have been equalization payments to the grain growers of the western provinces, and on March 17 we announced that those equalization payments would be no longer made. Further we announced that we wanted more barley, and that in order to get it we were not going to pay a producer subsidy but were going to increase the return to the producer. So we raised the floor price from 56 cents a bushel for No. 1 feed at Fort William, which I think is the figure appearing in the statement, to 90 cents a bushel. The only inducement now to a farmer in western Canada to produce barley is the provision of a price which will be based on a floor of 90 cents a bushel for No. 1 feed from August 1, 1947, to July 31, 1948. Then in the announcement we went on to state the relationship between those prices and the prices at present in force. The relationship is 90 cents as against 56 cents on barley and 61½ cents as against 40 cents on oats. We said that was the floor, that we guaranteed it as such. That conforms to the policy of the government, as announced in 1944, that during the transitional period we would establish floor prices below which the prices of farm products would not be allowed to fall. So we have established a floor price of 90 cents on No. 1 feed barley and 61½ cents on No. 1 feed oats, and the prices can run up from that level on the higher grades. Then we went on to say:

> At the same time, price ceilings for all grades will be raised, in the case of barley to 93 cents and in the case of oats to 65 cents . . .

That was in order to cover the point I have just made. Then in section 3 we went on to say:

> In order to avoid discrimination against producers who have already delivered barley during present crop year, an adjustment payment will be made of 10 cents per bushel in respect of deliveries between August 1, 1946, and March 17, 1947, inclusive, thus raising overall returns to about 90 cents per bushel. As there is a loss in the barley equalization account for the 1946-47 crop year, no further payments are to be expected in respect of barley delivered during the present crop year. The oats equalization account for the crop year 1946-47 will, however, remain open, and net profits in that account, if any, will be distributed later to producers who delivered oats during the period August 1, 1946, to July 31, 1947.

In other words we announced that this whole policy of making equalization payments was to come to an end, and that the final payments in connection with oats would be made on oats delivered up to July 31, 1947. Because there is no profit on the barley that has been delivered up to date, and no possibility of any profits being made from now on because the wheat board is taking over the barley, therefore any money paid out to cover the total amount will have to be taken from the treasury, and there will be no participation paid as far as barley is concerned. In other words the whole announcement is to the effect that a policy was announced, prior to the opening of the 1946-47 season, of making equalization payments, and that the payments to be made between August 1, 1946, and July 31, 1947, are to wind up the policy followed from 1943 to the latter date. Then section 5 of the announcement had this to say:

> For the time being, because of the continuation of price ceilings on animal products, payments of 10 cents per bushel for oats and 25 cents per bushel for barley will be made within the same conditions as the 25 cent payment on wheat purchased for feeding purposes.

In other words a payment or drawback of 25 cents was made in connection with wheat, which to all intents and purposes could be termed a feeder subsidy, and it is stated that during this period there will be a temporary feeder subsidy on these particular grains in the same way there had been a subsidy on wheat, again in order to bring the producers of live stock products who use feed grain into the position where all will be treated fairly and in accordance with the previously announced policy down to August 1, 1947. The only reference made to any period beyond August 1, 1947, is the fact that the ceilings may not be off all agricultural products that are affected by grain. Up to the moment we have taken the ceiling off eggs, and there have been suggestions that the ceilings will come off other farm products, but no one will know exactly what the relationship between live stock and feed grain prices will be until we get close to August 1. As far as equalization payments on oats and barley are concerned, however, these with their implications are discontinued as of August 1, 1947. I think everyone in western Canada who is concerned with these matters understands the situation fully. I quite agree that statements were made in the press some time ago which did not bear out the facts contained in the announcement itself.

I have just returned from having spent two weeks in western Canada. I believe I saw representatives of most newspapers, and also had occasion to address farm meetings while I was there. I am sure that the farmers of western Canada understand the position as it was announced on March 17. I suggest that if the leader of the opposition would read my statements a little more carefully, analyse them, and then explain them to the public, they probably would be better informed.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I had better say a word in answer to some of the points raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), in respect of increases in prices. I do not know of any way of popularizing increases in prices, and I have no intention of trying to do so.

I am sure the government shares the concern of everyone in Canada in increasing prices. Nevertheless the fact remains that prices have not remained constant throughout the war and since. There has been a gradual but controlled increase in prices. It was never contemplated that a rigid price control could be maintained for long after the cessation of hostilities; and the government has always contemplated a policy whereby, when it was felt that supply was in reasonable conformity with demand, the proper thing to do was to allow the law of supply and demand to operate and to remove price ceilings.

The specific instances of increases in prices which have been cited by my hon. friend were, in particular, shortening, soap and textiles. Those were the principal ones, although he did refer also to household necessities such as washing machines and the like. But, to speak first about shortening and soaps, one of the greatest shortages in the world today is that of oils and fats; that is one of the most acute. The greater part of our supplies comes from outside Canada. For some considerable time past they have been bulk purchased by the government through the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. And that, in effect, in so far as those products were sold under a ceiling which represented less than cost, involved a trading loss to the corporation; or, in other words, a subsidy.

As has been clearly stated on a number of occasions, it was never the policy of the government to continue subsidies indefinitely in the post-war period. Once conditions of supply were reasonably stabilized, and once prices abroad were established at levels from which there was no immediate possibility of early reduction, it was felt that subsidies should be discontinued, and the added cost reflected in the price of the goods.

That is exactly what has happened in respect of such increases as there have been in shortening and soap. The same applies with respect to cotton textiles; and I assume that is what the hon. member was referring to, and in particular to shirts and underwear. For some time past we have been paying a fairly substantial subsidy on raw cotton. It was felt that the time had now come when we must discontinue paying that subsidy, and a policy has been initiated of gradually working out of it. So far as one can see, while the price of raw cotton may not be stabilized, it shows no indication of any early reduction. Consequently the government felt that in matters of that kind we must face up to post-war realities, and the added cost of the raw cotton would have to be reflected in the cost of the finished product.

As hon. members know, a considerable number of items have been removed from price control. There remains also a considerable number under price control, and, may I say, those include the greater part of foodstuffs and the greater part of the necessities of life. Of those which have been removed from price control, I think it is fairly significant that there has not been any appreciable increase in price. In some instances there have been no increases, while in some others there have even been decreases. There have been increases where subsidies entered into the cost of the goods, either by way of direct subsidies or by way of bulk purchasing through the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation.

For instance, motor cars were removed from the ceiling recently. There has been no increase in price, nor do I anticipate that there will be any. Again, in respect of footwear there has been no increase. I have talked to a number of people in that line of business, and they tell me they do not contemplate there will be any important increase in the price of that particular commodity, one which, of course, constitutes an important item in the cost of living.

I think, if hon. members will look over the list of goods which have been removed from control, they will find that in the vast majority of cases prices have not increased. Undoubtedly they have in other cases. We knew they would; we expected they would. We could see no alternative to allowing them to rise.

My hon. friend referred to chocolate bars. Well, I hold no brief for the manufacturers of chocolate bars; but when he points out that children in Detroit can buy them cheaper than they can be bought by children in Canada, let me say to him that, while that may apply to chocolate bars, if he had spent any time in the United States in recent months he would appreciate the fact that that does not apply generally; and I know he would readily agree with that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Nevertheless I think hon. members must appreciate that we cannot entirely escape the effect of increased price levels in the United States, because we import tremendous quantities of goods from that country, whether in a partly finished state or as raw materials. We simply cannot escape it.

As I said a minute ago, we must face up to the realities of post-war conditions. I am satisfied that some increase in prices is inevitable. We have been attempting to follow a policy of orderly decontrol, and I believe we have achieved a reasonable measure of success in that policy. Like my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar, I have been interested in the changed tone indicated in some of the newspapers in this country, which not long ago were urging us—yes, not as long ago as July, 1946—to throw off controls, pretty much as they did in the United States, and in the last two or three weeks I have been interested to note how the tone of those newspapers has changed, and that they are now urging greater caution upon businessmen, merchants and industrialists to restrain themselves in increasing prices. I think that is desirable. In my view it is important that businessmen and others who are merchandising products should exercise restraint, and I am glad that business in this country is taking that line.

In the matter of profits, I would be the last one to rise in my place and attempt to justify excessive profits on the part of anyone in Canada. My hon. friend has cited a number of examples. I have seen him use before the method of selecting special companies and giving illustrations of striking percentage increases.

Mr. COLDWELL: I could have given many more.

Mr. ABBOTT: He gave one figure which I believe he said he had taken from the Financial Post, where it was indicated, if I remember correctly, that the average profits of the companies the Financial Post had listed were some thirty per cent up.

Mr. COLDWELL: Sixty companies.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, in some sixty companies. That is an appreciable increase. But I should not think that would be considered an increase too much out of line if, as I believe to be the case, there was a substantial increase in the volume of sales during that period. I put to him the question as to whether he had any figures showing sales of those various companies, rather than the percentage increase in profits. He did not have those figures, and of course I would not have expected him to. But the sales figures would be significant, particularly if he is using the argument with respect to higher profits being the reason for higher prices. I do not believe that is the case. It would, perhaps, have some effect, but I am certain that if you took all the added profits over 1945 and added them to the volume it would not account for any appreciable percentage of increase in the price of goods.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not attempt to restrict that to newsprint.

Mr. ABBOTT: You can restrict it to newsprint if you want to.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the minister not think it would be in the interests of our economy generally if, as production and distribution increased, if, as the volume increased, prices were reduced?

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree 100 per cent with that. I think the wise industrialist of this country, as his volume increases and presumably as he is able to increase his efficiency, should reduce his prices rather than increase them. I am the last one who believes that it is either proper or, to put it on its lowest level, good business to try to charge all that the traffic will bear. I agree with the hon. member on that.

While the balance sheets of a good many concerns have shown striking increases in profits over those of the past year. I believe that the greater portion of that is due to increased volume. I have no doubt that in some cases it is due perhaps to a particular concern attempting to take advantage of a demand which is so great that it will pay any price. I am not prepared to adopt the method adopted by the hon. member and select a few companies with large percentages of increase and say that that is the general picture, and I am certainly not prepared to agree with him that that is one of the main reasons why there has been some increase in the cost of living.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether there are any other points that I wish to make. As the hon. member knows, in the legislation that is still before the house there is the power to reimpose ceilings in cases where it is considered to be in the public interest to do so. I would hope that that will not be necessary; I would hope that the common sense of the people of this country and the operation of the law of supply and demand, which has never been proved to be wrong, will show that it is not necessary to do that. In the case of some abnormal situation where the government felt that the public were being exploited, speaking for myself at any rate, I can say, as the minister responsible for the administration of the act, that we would not have any hesitation in asking for powers which I feel sure the house would give us.

I have nothing more to add to what I have said, but I wish to repeat what I said at the outset. Most of the cases in which there has been an increase in price have been due to an inevitable increase in cost, particularly in those cases where previously controlled prices included subsidies.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am assuming that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is in order and will eventually be voted upon by this house. I make that statement because I think, if hon. members read the amendment, they will see that it places the entire matter of controls squarely before hon. members to be voted upon at this time. When that vote is taken it will largely determine the final disposition of the omnibus bill now before this house, because it happens that hon. members are being asked to vote upon the principles contained in that bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: If that is the case, it is out of order.

Mr. GILLIS: I am just asking the Speaker if this question is before the house for that purpose. I am going to read the amendment again in order to refresh the memories of those who are listening. You cannot discuss controls piecemeal; you cannot take up only one phase because they are all inclusive. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) cannot get up and say airily, "We know for a fact that prices are rising, but we are not responsible; the law of supply and demand is going to regulate things in the future because it has always done so in the past". I am not accepting that statement as being correct. The law of supply and demand has not regulated anything in the past and it is not going to do so in the future.

Then the minister makes the statement, "We are removing subsidies and price ceilings". When you take that action you give the green light to anyone in this country who wants to exploit the people; you give them the opportunity of doing so without any regulation by the government. Apparently that is the government policy as indicated by the statement of the Minister of Finance. I am assuming that, when the amendment is voted upon, the members of this house are going to record their individual opinions as to whether price ceilings should be reimposed in this country as they were during the war and if as far as possible the standard of living established during the war for the Canadian worker should be reset. Some people have suggested that prices should be rolled back to June, 1946, in order to reestablish the standards that existed at that time.

If you make an analysis of how things are today as compared with how they were in June, 1946, you will find that the average wage-earner and salaried worker in this country has lost a large percentage of his income in increased prices, particularly on the essentials of life.

As I said a moment ago, I am going to read this amendment again. The members of this group do not think that when they place an amendment before this house it is done for political shadow-boxing. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar moved this amendment he did so deliberately for the purpose of giving each and every member of this house an opportunity to rise in his place and record his opinion. The amendment reads:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house desires to record its opinion that the government should give consideration to the immediate restoration of price control on and lower prices for the necessaries of life, particularly articles of food and clothing, shelter, household appliances, and supplies and machinery needed by the farmers in connection with their work;

Further, this house is of the opinion that the harmful and dangerous effects of the rising cost of living demand immediate and effective action."

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member permit me to interrupt him since he is speaking on the amendment? I would call the attention of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to citation 488 of "Beauchesne's second edition," which reads:

Whenever an order of the day has been read for the house to resolve itself into the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means, the motion "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair" must be proposed, except in cases provided by standing order 28. When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the power of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance, and it is not necessary to move an amendment for that purpose; provided that the discussion and the amendment, if one is moved, shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, not to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

If the hon. member will look at page 12 of today's order paper, item No. 12, he will find that it reads:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Justice for the second reading of Bill No. 104, an act to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Fleming.

The amendment of the hon. member reads as follows:

This house desires to record its opinion that the government should give consideration to the immediate restoration of price control on and lower prices for the necessaries of life, particularly articles of food and clothing, shelter, household appliances, and supplies and machinery needed by the farmers in connection with their work.

We have on the order paper, as the house knows, Bill No. 104, which, if hon. gentlemen will look at page 3 of the bill, they will see contains the schedule of orders and regulations of the governor in council, and in that schedule order in council 8528 appears, dealing with the wartime prices and trade board and its regulations as amended by orders in council. The hon. member knows that the object of the wartime prices and trade board is to regulate prices, and when this bill comes before the house the hon. member will have an opportunity to make any representations he cares to make to the house that prices should be increased or decreased or maintained. So, in accordance with the citation I have just given, 488, I am of the opinion that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I say one word before you give your ruling. I did consider most of the matters which you have raised in discussing the ruling you propose to make but, if Your Honour will look at citation 345, page 137, of "Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition," you will find this:

The ancient doctrine that the redress of grievances should be considered before the grant of supplies is maintained in the House of Commons of Canada by the provision of standing order 49 that the motion for the Speaker to leave the Chair can be amended; and the amendments need not be relevant but may relate to every question connected with public administration.

To be perfectly fair, I will read the concluding sentences as well because I do not think it would be fair for me to stop there. The part I have read says that the amendments may relate to every question connected with public administration, and I suggest that the amendment which I have moved does not fall within the category to which Your Honour has referred in quoting this citation, nor is it covered by the concluding words of citation 345, which goes on to say:

Only one amendment and one subamendment may be made to this motion, but if the amendment is negatived, a discussion on other questions may be raised but no other amendment can be proposed. If, however, it is withdrawn, another can be at once submitted to the House. Matters of detail which should be discussed in committee cannot be debated on these occasions—

Matters of detail.

—nor can debate be permitted relating to grants already agreed to, or to resolutions which will be proposed in the committee—

That is the committee of supply.

—or to items in the estimates.

Again, that would be in committee of supply. It goes on:

Members may discuss various matters on the motion for the Speaker to leave the Chair without any amendment being proposed; but once debate is stopped on one matter and another matter intervenes, members cannot again discuss the former.

My amendment, I submit, deals with a matter of principle, not a matter of detail. I would further submit that Bill No. 104, to which Your Honour has referred, dealing with powers which it is proposed to extend beyond May 15 for a limited period, does not cover nearly all the matters included in my amendment. It may be that by inference some of them are covered, but the amendment as a whole deals with matters that are not dealt with in the bill before the house. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that on these grounds the amendment is in order.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is more concerned with the proper application of the rules of the house than with any temporary advantage to be gained by motions which he puts before the house, and it is in that spirit that I venture to offer a few remarks in answer to the argument he has submitted to Your Honour.

There is this citation which the hon. member has read, but it is qualified by the general rule that matters are not to be dealt with twice in the same session, and that is the reason for the citation which Your Honour brought to the attention of members of the house. There is no doubt that the matter of what commodities should remain under control, what commodities should perhaps again be placed under control and what commodities should be taken out of control will be fully discussed on Bill No. 104. That is the substantive measure which is before the house and upon which parliament will make its decision. Parliament will be required to make a decision with respect to the classification of commodities in these three groups: (1) those to come out of control; (2) those to stay under control, and (3) those, if any, to be replaced under control. Parliament will not merely be asking the government to give consideration to something. Parliament will be making a positive decision that is to be effective upon the population of Canada. I submit that that is the place where consideration should be given to the matters which are raised by the amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply.

There is another objection to which Your Honour did not call the attention of the house, and that arises out of the terms of the amendment to the motion for an address to His Excellency at the beginning of the session on February 3. The hon. member then moved that there be censure on His Excellency's advisers because their conduct indicated a tendency to move into headlong decontrol. That matter was debated in its general aspect on the address. It was voted on, and the amendment was defeated. So that the occasion for a general debate on the general principles was taken advantage of on that occasion and the matter was disposed of. There will be another opportunity for the specific determination of articles to which the hon. member and perhaps some other hon. members will refer when dealing with Bill No. 104, as being those where controls should be restored. But my point is that the general matter has been disposed of by a vote of the house. The specific instances where there should be a restoration of control will be disposed of, not in the form of pious hopes, but in the form of binding decisions by this house when we come to Bill No. 104. I think the hon. member will agree that that will be a more propitious occasion to take action that will be effective when dealing with specific commodities than at this time when there is just merely language very similar to that used in the amendment of February 3.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word on the point of order. I would ask Your Honour to consider, despite what the leader of the government has just said, that there is a distinct difference between the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and Bill No. 104 on the one hand, and the amendment of February 3 on the other. With respect to the amendment of February 3, I would point out that it expressed regret at what the government was doing. It was not a positive motion asking for specific action such as the amendment now moved calls for. On the other hand, with respect to Bill No. 104, I would point out that it is a bill giving the government power, amongst other things, to retain price control if they wish. This amendment is much stronger than that.

Mr. HOMUTH: No. It just asks for consideration.

Mr. KNOWLES: This amendment asks that consideration be given to the restoration of price control and that immediate effective action be taken in connection with these matters.

Mr. HOMUTH: There is nothing specific about it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The bill would simply give permission. This asks that it be definitely and positively done.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have considered the amendment carefully and have noted the observations made by hon. members on both sides of the house, and I am obliged to rule that the amendment is out of order. As has been pointed out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss the matter or to propose an amendment to the house on the second reading of Bill No. 104. I therefore declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): The amendment having been disposed of, I would like to speak briefly on one of the references made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), namely, the question of flood control. I am impelled to do this at the moment because I have a very fair knowledge of the disasters that are overtaking western Ontario and some parts of the province of Quebec through the overflowing of rivers in these two central provinces. Other provinces have experienced similar conditions on former occasions.

In the province of Quebec two rivers, Portneuf and Chaudiere, frequently overflow their banks. Two years ago I made a fairly substantial investigation into the possibility of flood-proofing the Chaudiere river, but it is a problem which will call for the work of eminent engineers to find out the best and easiest methods of preventing the overflowing of the Chaudiere in Quebec. On the other hand, I am convinced that it can be done. It should be done, and it can be done, but not by ordinary methods. The same applies to the Portneuf. Both rivers, down through the years, have frequently overflowed their banks, bringing disaster in their wake.

In Ontario, however, there are other rivers with which I am more familiar and I will speak of them for a moment or two. Yesterday I took note of the flow in the Moira river at Belleville. There was no possibility of disaster there this year, the water escaping freely. Going west, one comes to two or three small rivers, one of which is in the town of my hon. friend the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I refer to the Etobicoke river. That is a small watershed, but in flood times it can cause a considerable amount of damage. It can bring disaster to my hon. friend's fine and beautiful town of Brampton.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has on previous occasions.

Mr. MacNICOL: The river flows through the middle of the town and there is no present means of taking care of any large rush of water. I endorse what the leader of the opposition said in submitting his suggestion to the government, and I am sure that every member of the government is equally seized of the importance of doing something.

What can we do? It has been suggested that we use the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in connection with a problem of this kind, but I do not know that the P.F.R.A. lends itself to flood control in those rivers in the old settled parts of Canada. I suggest that the time has come when an over-all federal authority should be set up charged with the responsibility of carrying out flood prevention and directing the work of flood prevention on rivers generally throughout the country.

Reference has been made to a river flowing through the constituency of Your Honour, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the constituency of Brantford. I refer here to the river Grand. I believe it was just prior to or after the federal election of 1935, I have forgotten which year, that the matter came before this house. I brought it up myself. At that time I had made an exhaustive survey into what had been done in the Ohio valley, the Muskingum valley, Ohio, and in the Miami valley, Ohio, and I suggested to the government of the day that they adopt the same plans that had been followed in the United States. I suggested that the federal government put up 37½ per cent of the cost of flood-proofing rivers, the provincial government to contribute 37½ per cent and the municipalities 25 per cent. I believe that was the ratio adopted in your own area, Your Honour. In due course the present Shand dam on the Grand, three miles north of the town of Fergus, was erected. I had recommended that two dams be built, one on the Grand itself, north of Fergus, and one on the Conestogo, which flows into the Grand river south of the town of Fergus. At that time the engineers seemed to think one dam would be sufficient, and that dam has already saved its cost several times over in preventing the flooding of Grand river communities during the last few years.

As you know, Your Honour, two or three years ago your own city was threatened, but the flood did not occur because of the existence of the Shand dam, north of which water was stored. The Shand dam has a water conservation volume equivalent to 46,800 acre-feet of water. That is a vast body of water, when one considers that in each acre there are 43,560 square feet. When that is multiplied by the total area of the lake, it means that the present Shand dam north of Fergus conserves approximately two billion cubic feet of water. If the dam had not been there and that two billion feet had all run down the river we would have had real flood conditions recently. A few days ago the engineers found it necessary to open the Shand dam sufficiently to allow 12,500 cubic feet of water per second to go out of the reservoir into the river. Had that not been done, the dam would have overflowed. I do not believe there is any danger from overflowing, as some people apparently think, and I make that statement because of the existence of the overflow in the centre of the dam, which is of concrete and is perfectly designed to control the overflow of water.

I suggest, therefore, that the question which the leader of the opposition has brought up is an important one, and I rise to endorse what he said to the government and, through the government, to that department, whichever it may be, which has the controlling of floods under its supervision. I suggest that the government consider setting up an over-all authority to deal with the question of assisting in preventing floods on all the rivers in Canada, such as the Portneuf, the Chaudiere and other rivers in Quebec and the many rivers in Ontario which are known to overflow. Even in Manitoba, in very early years, the Red river has overflowed to such an extent that the land for many miles around Winnipeg was flooded. There is no telling when that might happen again. It all depends on the amount of water that falls in a given length of time. For instance, if three inches fell on the 1,360 square miles of the Grand river watershed above Galt, that would be a fall of approximately nine billion cubic feet of water, and would be enough to wipe the whole valley out, unless there were some control over it. I believe it was only last year that there was a disastrous flood around Edmonton. So I would suggest to the leader of the government that, as the occasion presents itself, he bring before his ministers the question of establishing an over-all authority throughout Canada to cooperate with all the provinces on the same basis as the United States government cooperated with the state of Ohio in the matter of conservation and flood prevention. It will save the country millions and perhaps billions of dollars and thousands of lives. There is no reason why it should not be done. I merely rise to endorse what the leader of the opposition said, and make that suggestion to the government.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, no one can take issue with the objective remarks just made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). Of course, as he is aware, in the proposals made by the federal government to the provinces the kind of arrangement which he suggests is envisaged. What I have risen to deal with particularly is another phase of the problem. As one would gather from what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) said with regard to this unfortunate situation at the moment in western Ontario, the responsibility for dealing with the matter resides in this parliament and on this government. Because he has left that impression, I think one should make a reference or two to the problem. The situation in western Ontario is one which is now causing a great deal of concern to the people in the whole of the western Ontario peninsula. This is not the first time these flood conditions have occurred, but they have occurred again and the loss to that particular area is tremendous. What are the facts in so far as responsibility is concerned?

On April 9, the mayor of London is reported as having said:

> All the money the Ontario government has spent on surveys and enabling legislation in connection with flood control has been "wasted money."

I do not subscribe to that view, but I do state that the mayor of London quite properly looks upon this matter as one that comes within the authority of the government of Ontario.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend what paper he is quoting from?

Mr. MARTIN: From the Toronto Star. My hon. friend will find the same observations made in his own paper, the Toronto Telegram.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have you it there?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, I have it in my desk.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps you might quote from it.

Mr. MARTIN: I will in a few minutes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He prefers to use the best.

Mr. MARTIN: On the same date the mayor of London made it known—and the hon. member for London (Mr. Manross) will, I am sure, corroborate this—that the city of London and the town of St. Mary's had applied to the Ontario minister of public works to have a meeting at which all municipalities concerned would decide if they wanted a conservation authority set up for the Thames. We find the minister of planning, Hon. Dana Porter, quite properly, as indeed several members on this side of the house, including myself did, visiting those areas. The minister of planning, who visited those areas, is reported as having said as follows—

Mr. GRAYDON: What paper is this?

Mr. MARTIN: This is from the Toronto Star. He is reported to have said that he was shocked by what he had seen and the damage which had occurred. The minister goes on to say:

> The disaster will have a profound effect in moving municipalities to some decision on a thorough flood control programme under the Conservation Authorities Act of 1946.

But apparently that is not the situation in the eyes of the mayor of Chatham. The mayor of Chatham, Mayor Ralph Steele, president of the West Kent Progressive Conservative Association, is quoted as having said as follows:

> Thousands of acres of valuable agricultural lands have been inundated. Chatham has suffered only slight damage in comparison. Yet nothing is being done about the seventy-five miles of the Thames between London and Lake St. Clair . . . I am glad that Mr. Porter was down through here yesterday, said Reeve C. V. Skinner of Thamesville. The provincial government has been absolutely too slow in handling this flood problem. They have not been paying any attention to Chatham and Thamesville.

One could go on quoting the heads of municipalities throughout that area. I do not rise to say whether or not their observations are true, but I do rise to point them out to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend if he would mind sending over the copy of the last paper he quoted from?

Mr. MARTIN: As soon as Hansard has had it, I shall be glad to.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want to see that everything is on the record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, we have successfully distributed the blame for flood conditions but have not followed my leader's suggestion that steps be taken now to benefit by the lesson and have these various authorities get together for the future. May we now turn to the other grievances, the redress of which my leader asked, and see if we can hear something from the government with regard to the grievance of the people of Halifax, namely the fact that five months have already passed since the vacancy in a seat there but no writ of election yet issued. I was about to say that I was surprised that no attention was paid by any member of the government to this grievance. I waited until Your Honour stood up to put the motion to the house before I rose to call any further attention to it, because I would have thought that somebody in the government would make a reference to it and give us some idea when we might expect a by-election in Halifax.

Mr. GRAYDON: They have not got things fixed up down there yet.

Mr. MERRITT: They might not have things fixed up.

Mr. GRAYDON: How is the weather down there?

Mr. McCANN: Smith is down getting the weather fixed.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who is Smith?

Mr. McCANN: The hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do you follow him carefully?

Mr. McCANN: Well, we watch him.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is good business.

Mr. McCANN: The papers report it.

Mr. MacINNIS: What paper?

Mr. MERRITT: Perhaps now, Mr. Speaker, I can continue. I am not a bit surprised because I have been here for a little over two sessions, and this is the third time that I, myself, can remember getting to my feet in these circumstances, when something that needs an answer has been mentioned from the opposition benches and the government just try to pass it off, not even saying anything about it, or giving us any idea of what their intentions are. This is a matter that cannot be passed off any longer. It is a matter as to which I do not ask when a writ of election is to be issued. I demand that it be issued and issued at once. I am going to give my reasons for that demand. Already we have had five months in which the opportunity was there to issue the writ. The writ has not been issued, and the people of the dual constituency of Halifax have been half disfranchised.

Mr. ISNOR: Which half?

An hon. MEMBER: The better half.

Mr. MERRITT: As some hon. member says, the better half. Think what that means, Mr. Speaker. That is the capital city of the province in which responsible government first appeared on this continent, the cradle of responsible government in Canada. We on this side of the house have asked in a kindly way all during this session that some statement be made and that a writ be issued, but we have had no word from the government as to why they have not taken the step which they took so quickly in connection with by-elections they thought they could win, but which they held off taking in connection with by-elections they knew they were going to lose, a course which did them no good at all in the end. I have here the issue of the Halifax Chronicle of December 10, 1946, in which the surviving member for the dual member constituency is quoted as follows:

Mr. Isnor made this statement after he held a long distance telephone conversation with party officials in Ottawa. He said that winter conditions in Nova Scotia were not suitable for holding an election.

Mr. ISNOR: Is that not right? What would you say to that?

Mr. MERRITT: That is just the point I am coming to; I do not know anything about it, and I do not suppose officials of the Liberal party in Ottawa would know anything more about it than I do, because they are no closer to Halifax than I am. So I do not see why the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) has to defer to the opinions of his party officials in Ottawa as to whether weather conditions in his own home town are suitable for a by-election.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have you people over there ever been in Grey North?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We used to win it before you ever did.

Mr. GRAYDON: But we won it the last two times; that is the important point.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where were you in Cartier?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has the floor.

Mr. MERRITT: The hon. member for Halifax went on to give two other reasons why it was not necessary for the people of Halifax to be properly represented in this house. For instance, he said:

> As for the riding itself, it was one of the two dual member constituencies in Canada and was therefore represented at Ottawa. Mr. Isnor was willing to shoulder the added responsibility for an interim period.

I wonder if he realized that the interim period would be a minimum of seven months, and I wonder when the new constitutional procedure was introduced under which the surviving member for a dual member constituency could appoint himself to the vacant seat and consider that constituency properly represented in this house. Then the hon. member went on to give the people of Halifax this reassurance:

> In the meantime, he said, his party still had a majority and was not afraid of a snap vote in the Commons turning out the government.

That is not a very good reason for not holding a by-election. Once more, as we have done so often from this side of the house, I should like to repeat something the cabinet seems to have forgotten. This parliament is not run for the benefit of the cabinet. We do not elect members here only to ensure that the government retains a slim majority; in fact the people of Canada sometimes elect members to reduce still further a slim majority, and there is every reason for us to suspect that this would be the result if the government decided to hold this by-election. Those are the only three reasons given by any responsible person in the government party, officials or otherwise, as to why we should not hold the Halifax by-election now. Sixty days from now it is hardly likely there will be winter conditions in Halifax. I know that even though I have been there only once in my life, so that reason will not help the government any longer.

I should like to refer also to what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he was leader of the opposition, in 1920 and 1934. As reported at pages 29 and 30 of Hansard for March 1, 1920, speaking of the East Elgin by-election, he said:

> So I say, Mr. Speaker, that having regard for parliamentary government in the matter of representation, if you look at the laws under which this parliament has been returned, for if you look at the way in which those laws have been administered, you will find that there has been a complete demoralization of the whole business of parliamentary representation as contrasted with what it should have been were we anxious to preserve intact our political institutions.

I agree with every word the right hon. gentleman said on that occasion. I have just quoted what was said by the hon. member for Halifax, which shows that he is committing the very sin against which his leader warned so long ago, namely, advocating a course which does not enhance our parliamentary institutions but rather tends to destroy them. My leader made reference to the actual time lags in connection with the by-elections we have had during the last six months. I do not think anyone in the house could have failed to notice that where the government thought they had a chance they jumped in very quickly, but where they thought they were likely to fail and where in fact they did fail they waited as long as possible before bringing on the by-election. In most cases, in the constituencies in which they failed, four to six months elapsed between the time the vacancy occurred and the time the election was held, while in the constituencies where they succeeded the time was never more than two months. That speaks for itself, and I should have thought the government would realize that this delay in itself is an admission that they are unlikely to hold the seat, so that the longer the delay, the worse it will be for them. Of course that is entirely up to the government, but here again I should like to quote what was said by the Prime Minister on January 29, 1934, as reported at page 18 of Hansard for that year:

> The Prime Minister has power to say that representation should be given, but up to this time, the constituency of South Oxford has been denied that representation. So the evidence from every side goes to prove that not only has the government lost the confidence of the country but it has lost confidence in itself.

I would not be at all surprised if it turned out that the Prime Minister was a good prophet, and that in the case of Halifax he is practising what he preached on that occasion, that the considerations now in his mind and the mind of the government are those to which he referred in his remarks in 1934. I ask the house, on what grounds could a government candidate in Halifax claim the confidence of the electors today? I ask, in the two years since the end of the war what have the government accomplished upon which they could base any claim to the confidence of the people of Halifax?

Mr. BRUNELLE: What about the by-election in Cartier?

Mr. KNOWLES: They have taken off more controls since then.

Mr. MERRITT: I wish to refer only to a few points. For instance, could any government candidate, or any member of the government supporting him, go to Halifax tomorrow and promise houses at $13.82 a month, as they did in 1945. Could they go to that province, knowing conditions down there, and say that, while they had the power to do so, they made any notable contribution to the betterment of labour-management relations, so that management and labour might come to agreements without these crippling strikes? Could they go there in the hope that their taxation policy in the past two years would lead the people of Halifax to place confidence in them; or are they waiting until this new budget comes in, under which we may not have deferred taxation relief of the nature we had last year?

The most important reason, I suggest, for their failure to place the confidence of the people of Halifax to the test, is this, that they will not be able to go to Halifax in the coming by-election and offer to the people of that constituency any constructive policy for the future, a policy which would lead the people of Canada to have any confidence in the Liberal party, or any hope of the people's chances of getting through the next few years in a condition of stability. That, I believe, is the real reason why the government need not expect any success at the next election. Now that they are taking off controls, they do not seem to be able to produce any alternative for the future, which would give us a good run at the fence.

However that may be, I would not have risen at all if we had heard one word from any member of the government as to when the by-election is to take place, or some good excuse setting out why it can be longer deferred. I do not believe they can give a good excuse; and certainly I am not going to sit silent in the House of Commons, and not bring to Your Honour's attention as forcibly as I can not only the government's neglect to issue a writ, but also their apparent inability any longer to account for the delay.

I shall now take my seat, not with a request but with a demand that the writ be issued at once, because there is no longer any reason why it should be withheld. I see one of the ministers laughing when I use the word "demand." I am not a bit surprised to see a smile on the faces of some hon. members opposite when I use that word, because it is not more than three weeks ago that I heard the hon. member from Middlesex-West (Mr. McCubbin) say, "We must trust this government." Then, hon. members in the C.C.F., sitting to my left, rise in their places and say, "We plead with this government." Well, I don't trust this government, and I don't plead with it. I say again: I demand an answer to this question.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) referred to the three points I was wondering which of those he considered most important from a political point of view. Was he speaking chiefly to the first and second, which were really worth bringing before the government, or was he directing his attention chiefly to the third point, one which seemed to give him some satisfaction? After listening to the last hon. member, I am satisfied that perhaps it was the third point the leader of the opposition had in mind, when he opened the discussion this afternoon.

May I say that I still believe definitely and sincerely that the winter is no time to hold an election in the city and county of Halifax.

An hon. MEMBER: Is this not spring?

Mr. GRAYDON: What about 1940?

Mr. ISNOR: I had a handsome majority in 1940, and also in 1945.

Mr. GRAYDON: It was in the winter, too.

Mr. ISNOR: I sat here quietly and listened to the political speeches of at least two hon. members, with interjections from time to time undoubtedly by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I want to say to the hon. member who comes from the extreme west of Canada, and who saw Halifax only once in his life—

Mr. MERRITT: To my regret.

Mr. ISNOR: —it is unfortunate that he did not happen to see our province to a greater extent. If he had, perhaps he would have appreciated it. He would have appreciated what we have down there, what we fight for, and what we in that part of the country endeavour to represent.

In regard to the hon. member's observations I can only say that I know a great deal more than he does about the views of the people of Halifax. I am satisfied that the very great majority are satisfied with the course I suggested, and that they believe it was the proper course to pursue. I do not hesitate to say that, and I shall repeat it when the time comes.

I am glad to note that the Progressive Conservatives have finally found a man whom they will nominate this evening. He is a big man, I might say—so far as size goes—and, I believe, a very good man. He will be nominated tonight to contest the election when it is called. But after their long search they stand in exactly the same position as they did two months ago. And when the election is called, when election day rolls past, they will remain as they were in the past.

Mr. MERRITT: You have not a candidate yet.

Mr. ISNOR: You worry about your own; don't worry about ours.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is what Angus L. says about him.

Mr. ISNOR: We will look after ourselves down there, so far as the Liberal party is concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: And Angus L.

Mr. ISNOR: Oh, we have done very well since 1935. Apparently this is developing into a political discussion. May I remind my Conservative friends sitting opposite that in 1935 I was returned by a comfortable majority, and again in 1940.

In order to refresh the memories of hon. members opposite I would refer to the election of 1945. In that election let me say that they had two exceptionally fine candidates, in the persons of Major—now Colonel—MacKeen, who was recently appointed director of one of the trust companies. But he does not feel that he can re-offer himself, although he is a very fine type. Then there was Major Dwyer, also a fine man. Perhaps under ordinary circumstances he should have been available at this time. With all due respect to the president of the dominion Progressive Conservative association, let me say that he went there, but he could not get Major Dwyer—and a great many others—to stand up. I hope they will get a man this evening at their convention.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We will; don't you worry.

Mr. ISNOR: He was selected. Why? Because he said something like this, "We must not allow this by-election to go by default. Even if I must be sacrificed, I am willing."

Let us look over the vote in the 1945 election.

Mr. MERRITT: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MERRITT: I am most apprehensive about this. Is the hon. member going to tell us, before he finishes, when the writ will be issued?

Mr. ISNOR: If that is a question which another hon. member has passed to my hon. friend to ask, then I do not think it amounts to much.

I was about to mention the vote in the 1945 election. In that campaign there were two fine candidates supporting the C.C.F. party; both were good types of citizens. One of them was one of our brightest young men, and it was not to his discredit that he did not poll a bigger vote. It was the policies he was advocating. Those were the policies he was standing for. He was a fine type of young fellow. He had as his running mate the assistant solicitor for the city of Halifax, Mr. Rooney.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am enjoying the hon. member's speech, but I want to ask him if it has any relation to the question which has been asked?

Mr. ISNOR: It has a definite connection. Mr. Shaw polled 8,941 votes, and Mr. MacKeen, who was the leading Conservative vote getter, polled 18,182 votes. I hate to mention myself, but I polled 26,407 votes, or a majority of 8,225 over the leading Conservative, and 17,466 over the leading C.C.F. candidate.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You cannot run again; you cannot be both members.

Mr. ISNOR: That is the situation as it is at the present time. May I say to my Conservative friends that I have every reason to believe that a great majority of their supporters are quite satisfied with the way I am representing them. I do not want to appear conceited or anything, but that is the case.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are just as good a Tory as they are.

Mr. ISNOR: I really do not understand the observation made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about my being a Tory. I think for myself, and that is more than can be said for members of some other groups. The hon. member who has just taken his seat referred to the promises that we would make, the promises we would not be able to make, and so on. I have contested five elections and have won them all. I have yet to make a promise that I did not carry out. More than that, I do not think it is necessary in the city and county of Halifax to make promises in order to win this election. It is on the record of the government that we shall return a representative from Halifax city and county who will help to carry on the work I am endeavouring to do.

The hon. member referred to strikes in Nova Scotia just in a casual way, but I would remind him that there are strikes elsewhere. At the present time strikes are occurring in Vancouver.

Mr. MERRITT: There is no by-election there.

Mr. ISNOR: That does not matter; it is not because of by-elections that strikes have taken place. May I tell hon. members how we are going to win this election? May I remind the house of the size of this constituency. It is not like many of the constituencies in Ontario or elsewhere which you can almost hold in the palm of your hand.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are doing that with Halifax.

Mr. ISNOR: The record speaks for itself. The constituency of Halifax runs for 147 miles east and west. There is considerable rural mileage to cover in the winter time and many fishing villages have to be visited. These things may not be important to hon. members who sit in easy urban comfortable seats.

Mr. ABBOTT: Like Vancouver-Burrard.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not want to refer to any particular constituency. I have been complimented time and time again upon holding off this election and not having it held in the winter. I told the leader of the C.C.F. a short time ago that he should thank me for not having forced this election in the winter time. He did not say a word; he just looked at me and I said, "You know, your transportation is not quite as good as that of the Liberals or Conservatives and we would have you at a disadvantage". I want to be just as fair as I can about this matter. My hon. friends have never been particularly strong on organization. While they have done a fairly good job in trying to get organized at the present time they can thank me for having held off this by-election, if I were the one responsible. Our own organization is ready to go and we certainly will go.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When?

Mr. ISNOR: The people of Halifax will certainly send a good type of representative here when the time comes. I would remind the house that the government is still within its rights because the time limit of six months has not elapsed. The leader of the opposition said that if an election were called tomorrow it would be 206 days, but that is just three days more than the previous by-election he mentioned when there was a period of 203 days. What difference does it make whether it is three or six months?

I still think I am doing a good job for the people of Halifax. I want a colleague who will work with me instead of one who will be bucking us at every turn. If we are going to row tandem I want a man who will keep stroke with me instead of one who will be pulling against me and upsetting the boat.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is what they wanted in Portage la Prairie.

Mr. ISNOR: We are going to have that in Halifax the same as we got it in Cartier. There is no reason why an election should be held in the winter. I trust the people of Halifax city and county, and I know they will send back a Liberal to help me in the good work which I am endeavouring to do.

Mr. PARK MANROSS (London): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should rise in my place for a minute because London and the Thames river and floods have been mentioned this afternoon by people who are not from London. They read the Toronto Telegram and the Toronto Star, but they fail to read the London Free Press where they would really get the right story. I imagine they buy their papers on the outside when they are a day old and they can get them cheaper. There are two or three matters I should like to bring up at this particular time.

Great alarm was expressed by the trades and labour congress in London over the closing of CMD-1. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) were there recently, and after their visit they said that there was no likelihood of the place being closed. During the last week 300 men have been laid off and the people are quite concerned whether or not these ministers have decided to close up this establishment since their visit. I just wanted to bring this matter to their attention so that it will be on record. We shall probably hear something about it in the near future.

Another thing I ran into in London this week was a matter that concerns veterans. Trade schools for veterans have been set up and the men receive gratuities and allowances from the government to pay for their courses. When they finish their courses they want to get sets of mechanics' tools with which to carry on the trade they have learned. These men find that they cannot purchase these tools out of their gratuities until the accounting department has had time to figure out how much of their gratuity has been used up in the course. It takes from three to six weeks to do this accounting and these men graduate and are walking around for that length of time without any tools. This is merely a matter of mechanical detail which could be hustled along, and I have no further criticism to make.

Another matter in London that was brought forcibly to our attention this week had to do with veterans who have purchased homes since July 1, 1945, and who find they cannot get possession. It is quite true that some of those who purchased through trust companies or real estate dealers were advised that they would have to abide by the terms of the order regarding evictions; they bought homes subject to the present tenancy, but other veterans —I have several cases which I shall not go into—apparently purchased homes without knowing anything about these orders. For instance, the first man on my list was in Holland when the order was published. The department wrote him and said, "We cannot understand how you do not know about this order because it was widely publicized." But at that time this man was serving in Holland and he did not hear much about it. There are quite a few of these cases, and I trust that when the minister brings in any relaxation of the rental controls one of the first things to which he will give consideration will be to make it possible for veterans who have purchased homes in good faith to get possession of them. I know that an order to that effect might be abused if safeguards were not taken, because a lot of people would be urging veterans to buy homes so that they could purchase them from the veterans. But a deadline could be set to prevent that. These veterans are at a great disadvantage. They cannot get into their own homes and are living in single rooms with their families. The tenants will not get out of the veterans' homes because they say they do not have to get out and are not going to get out. The government should indicate to such tenants of veterans' homes that they should be looking for another spot, because it is likely that the controls will be released.

Another matter I want to bring up is consideration with respect to the Veterans Land Act homes in London. That matter has already been discussed in the house and I shall not go into it in detail today. The veterans held a meeting with a view to having the construction defects remedied, but they could not pin the contractors down to responsibility. In the first place, the contractors are not from London but moved in there from a distance, because the scope of the work was thought by the government to be beyond some of the local contractors, there being twenty-eight houses erected in one district and seventy-two in another. The veterans held a meeting of protest, and the Veterans Land Act officials were criticized—of course all officials are criticized—for having a take-it-or-leave-it attitude; if you do not like this, you can do that. A contractor would be ordered to paint a door and he would paint one side and not another. So the veterans called a meeting to protest. Two men attended that meeting, and I want to bring this to the attention of the government. They explained that they represented the London Liberal association to hear what the veterans had to say. They said this:

> I don't know what the answer may be but if the Liberal association can give you an answer would you be willing to meet again to hear it?

I do not think any political association, mine, yours or anybody else's, should try to make political capital out of getting for the veterans the help to which they are really entitled. These veterans are entitled to good homes and to having construction defects remedied. I do not think it was proper for two officials of the Liberal association to go there and speak as they did. Of course I know the government can dismiss that by saying that the government cannot be responsible for irresponsible people. But these are not irresponsible people. They are responsible people; they are leading citizens of the town and officials of the Liberal association, and they went there as its representatives. At the same time they are circulating membership slips requesting anyone to join the Liberal association for the year 1947 for one dollar or more. Naturally they did not take these slips and pass them out at the veterans' meeting. But these canvassers are going around, and many veterans get the idea, "Perhaps I had better join the Liberal association if I want any attention paid to my complaint". The officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs are the ones to see that the necessary repairs are made to these homes. I bring this matter up now, because a lot of Liberal ministers and members from western Ontario are coming to London on April 19.

Mr. MARTIN: I hope you will come to the meeting.

Mr. MANROSS: I might be there but I will not join the association. I hope that those who come to London that day will come early so that they can see these homes for themselves and get first-hand information —because it is something that we shall have to discuss some day—and also see the flood stricken areas.

PRIVILEGE, MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN", APRIL 14

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in an otherwise excellent report of a meeting that was held yesterday of the Ottawa Holy Name Societies in St. Brigid's Church, I am reported as having said:

Communism is union and thus, in my opinion, not harmful.

I said that the name of communism is not harmful but that its doctrine is. A line must have been dropped.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO RUSSIA—RUSSIAN AMBASSADOR TO CANADA

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, might I ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs? I had intended to do so earlier today, but I thought this would perhaps give him a better opportunity to reply. Apparently the senior diplomatic representatives of Canada and the Soviet Republic are no longer functioning as ambassadors. Russia's ambassador to Canada left this country I think a year ago last December and has not been replaced. Our own ambassador to Russia has recently been withdrawn from Moscow for other service. It is important from the public point of view that the people of Canada should be fully informed of the exact position at the present time with respect to the two embassies.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the exact position is as the hon. member has outlined it. There was an ambassador who was accredited to the Canadian government from the Soviet Republic. His letters have not been withdrawn, but he himself has not been here for several months. There was a Canadian ambassador accredited to the Russian government. His letters have not been withdrawn, but within the last two weeks he left Moscow and proceeded to Geneva. Before he left he had a satisfactory interview with the minister of foreign affairs of the Soviet Republic, and there the question of the intentions of the Soviet government was raised and was discussed. I am not in a position to give a report of the discussion. It was a friendly interview, and the result was communicated to the Canadian government, confidentially of course, by the ambassador. The whole tone of the discussion was on a cordial basis. I will not say that the tone of discussions on a cordial basis means very much. It is very much like the situation we have in the meetings of the assembly of the united nations. Unfortunately there is still mistrust between the western democracies and those who control the destinies of the Soviet Republic, and the thing we are patiently, industriously striving to accomplish is to break down that mistrust and to have them realize that we only wish them well and that we only desire to have them wish us well. The hon. member has attended some of these meetings. He knows we are making some slow progress in accomplishing that result. I would be delighted to see it make more rapid progress. But, just as it takes two to make a bargain, it takes two to determine the exact atmosphere of diplomatic negotiations. The present situation is not discouraging, though it is disappointing.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will my hon. friend permit a question for information? He said that the letters of the Canadian ambassador to Moscow had not been withdrawn. Do I understand that technically Mr. Wilgress is now ambassador to both the U.S.S.R. and Switzerland?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should not like to say he is technically ambassador to both the U.S.S.R. and Switzerland. The diplomatic practice is that the letters of one ambassador are not withdrawn until those of his successor are presented, unless one wishes to break off diplomatic relations. Since there is no desire on our part or on the part of the Russians to break off diplomatic relations there has been no tendering of letters of recall by either government to the other. So that the technical situation is that there is still a Russian embassy accredited to Canada and a Canadian embassy accredited to Moscow, but that the principal officer in charge in both places at the present time is a chargé d'affaires and not an ambassador.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there a possibility that shortly that will be remedied?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: All I can say is that we were told that the matter was under consideration by the foreign minister of the Soviet republic. We have his assurance that the matter is under consideration.

Motion (Mr. Abbott) agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: As announced by the Prime Minister about two weeks ago, it is the intention to call two departments just for the purpose of getting them into supply, not for the purpose of discussion. I suggest that we call the Department of Agriculture, item 1, departmental administration, and that the vote stand; and External Affairs, item 41, departmental administration, and that the vote stand. If that meets with the consent of committee, I would then move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $163,190.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

41. Departmental administration, $767,480.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MILITIA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO FACILITATE CANADIAN ARMY REORGANIZATION—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

The house resumed, from March 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie for the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 14, to amend the Militia Act.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF FLAX FIBRES

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs, for Mr. Gardiner) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 8, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act, 1938.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY

EMERGENCY POWERS—DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY, ETC.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, to continue the revised regulations respecting trading with the enemy (1943).

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the resolution preceding this bill was under consideration we had a considerable amount of discussion on the duties and responsibilities of the office of custodian, and at that time I made a statement as to the need for the proposed legislation. Since the bill was not in the hands of hon. members, it could not be considered at the resolution stage; but, as I pointed out, the bill itself contains regulations which it is considered necessary to continue, and those regulations which were passed during the war but could be dispensed with have been dropped.

During the discussion on the resolution, hon. members felt that they should have a report from the custodian of enemy property. That report has been tabled, together with the reports of the auditors who have examined the custodian's accounts. After the bill has received its second reading, it is proposed to refer it to the public accounts committee for consideration so that the fullest possible information can be supplied to hon. members as to the work that has been carried on in the custodian's office. At one time it was proposed that we should refer the bill to a smaller committee. However it has been felt that the public accounts committee is the one to which it should be referred; and whether it is desired to appoint a smaller subcommittee to deal with the matter is within their discretion.

On the resolution stage I referred to the provisions of the bill and the necessity for it, and I do not think there is any need for me to go into a long discussion on it at this time.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the indication on the part of the government that the bill, after second reading, is to be referred to the standing committee on public accounts will, I think, make it possible to curtail one's observations on the bill on second reading. Nevertheless there are some things with respect to it which I think ought to be said at this particular stage. I do not propose to repeat the things that have had to be said in this house concerning other legislation of the government under the general category of legislation arising out of the expiry of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. I should like to point out some of the things which this bill contains and some of the things which it does not contain.

In the first place, this bill continues certain orders in council. At a later stage I shall have something to say with reference to the fact that this bill, while its operative sections do not occupy more than a page, nevertheless has this lengthy schedule which is legislative in character, and the bulk of the legislation is in the schedule to the bill. In the second place, the legislation purports to empower the governor in council, under certain circumstances, to amend these regulations which are part of the bill. In the third place, it purports to empower the governor in council to make additional regulations without any reference to this house.

What the bill does not do is, in the first place, to place any time limit on its existence or on the powers conferred on the governor in council by the bill. In the second place, it does not require that any report be tabled in this house. In the third place, it does not require that any additional regulations passed under the powers conferred on the governor in council by this act, be tabled in this house. Those, I think, are important features of the bill well deserving of the attention of the house. If one compares this with another bill which is occupying the attention of the house, Bill No. 104, one is led immediately to ask why it is that there is no limitation in point of time contained in this bill; and, second, why there is this power to make additional orders, and why there is power to extend. In Bill No. 104, power is given to revoke but not to extend. Because there is no time limit provided in this bill for its own existence, I suggest that the house must be more than usually careful in scrutinizing its provisions.

I am sure it is unnecessary to review the history of the office of the custodian of enemy property. The house is aware of the fact that this office was set up in 1920, after the close of the first great war; and the administration of the assets which came into the hands of the custodian of enemy property arising out of the first world war had not been completed at the time of the outbreak of the second world war. In 1939, if I remember correctly, the staff had been reduced to four persons, but there were a few tag ends remaining in the course of administration.

During the recent conflict, over a billion dollars worth of assets came into the hands of the custodian of enemy property, and at December 31, 1946, about $320,000,000 of assets remained in his hands for administration. This might suggest to the house that the task of administration is substantially complete. I do not think that is a fair inference, particularly having regard to the fact that the $320,000,000 of assets represent no less than 53,488 individual accounts, which are contained in 524 ledgers and 121 auxiliary books. This is big business in which the custodian of enemy property has been engaged.

Broadly speaking, three categories of assets came into his hands for administration. First, there were those assets belonging to nationals of enemy countries or countries that had been overrun by the enemy. Second, there were the assets in Canada of organizations declared by the governor in council, under wartime powers, to be illegal. Third, there were the assets of persons of the Japanese race resident in Canada. Where was the supervision by parliament of the administration of this vast amount of money, this great quantity of assets? If we were not already enured to shocks, Mr. Speaker, surely it would seem to us a shocking thing that in this entire period from 1939 up to the present year no report was ever given to parliament of the administration by the custodian of enemy property of these vast amounts of assets. When the resolution preceding the present bill was occupying the attention of hon. members the house was informed for the first time that an annual report was made to the government or the Secretary of State by the custodian of enemy property, or the official in his department charged with the responsibility. The house was then also informed for the first time that the accounts of the custodian of enemy property had been subject to annual audit, and I should like to say a word about the audit.

Actually the audit of accounts of the custodian of enemy property did not begin in 1939, with the outbreak of the recent war. The present firm of auditors, Price, Waterhouse and Company, were actually appointed back in 1930, and during all that period they have made an annual audit. But these annual reports of the auditors were not tabled in this house during the war years, and I think this house is entitled to know why they were not tabled. Here were annual auditors' reports coming into the hands of the Secretary of State. Not one of them was tabled in this house during all those war years, and those annual reports of the auditors have not as yet been tabled. The Secretary of State mentioned the fact that he tabled the auditors' reports before second reading of this bill was called. Actually those auditors' reports he tabled were only three in number. There was one by P. S. Ross and Sons, dated October 20, 1943, an audit of the accounts of the custodian's office in Vancouver. There was an audit report by Price, Waterhouse and Company covering the period from December 11, 1941, to December 31, 1946, on the enemy section of the Vancouver office. The third report is by Price, Waterhouse and Company on the audit of the accounts at December 31, 1945. The annual reports, however, have not as yet been brought before the house.

During the debate on the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill, the present Secretary of State also mentioned that, since assuming his portfolio, he had arranged for the audit of these accounts by the auditor general. That is another striking fact, that in all these years these accounts, which were of very great importance, involving vast sums of money, have not been submitted for audit by the auditor general, parliament's own auditor. It is only within recent weeks that the auditor general has been asked to conduct an audit of these accounts.

As to the report, it came as news to this house from the Secretary of State that annual reports have been made in his department on the administration of enemy property. I ask why those annual reports were never tabled in this house during the war years. Here is a very important section of the public business which was withheld from parliament during the war, and I ask why. What justification can there be for having withheld from parliament, the elected representatives of the people, these annual reports by the custodian of enemy property on the administration of these assets confided to his custody? I trust that now the house is going to assume the responsibility of seeing that these accounts are properly reviewed in committee; but it should not have been left to 1947, to this present session, to undertake a review of reports and audits that have been proceeding annually all these years. I submit that the government is deserving of censure for having withheld from parliament during all those years any report whatever on this important section of the public business. The government got the power, and immediately they rang down the iron curtain. What has been going on in the office of custodian of enemy property during the past seven and a half years has gone on behind the iron curtain.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If my hon. friend will permit a question, would he have advocated the filing of a report making public enemy assets in this country, or assets in this country belonging to aliens who were under the control of the enemy while the war was proceeding?

Mr. FLEMING: No; for it was not necessary at all to put the reports in such form that the accounts of individuals or the property of individuals would have been made public.

Mr. MITCHELL Your iron curtain looks like a lace curtain after that statement.

Mr. FLEMING: Nonsense. There was no occasion whatever for ringing down that iron curtain on any report whatever in connection with these audits, on the administration of this vast section of the public business.

The Secretary of State also mentioned the fact that he had tabled a report. It is true that he tabled a report, and I think the house is obliged to the hon. gentleman for having done so. That report is dated January 15, 1947. This did not comprise the annual reports written by the officials of the department during all those years; it was a single report written in January of this year by an official of the department, Mr. Mathieu, the assistant deputy custodian. This report at least was dated prior to the introduction of the resolution. But it was not tabled until after the bill had been introduced.

I submit that this report is of considerable importance. It ought to occupy the study of the public accounts committee, and I believe there are some sections of the report about which the house should know, even now. When mention is made of the fact that the accounts were audited, the house should know as well that there are limitations as to the extent of the audit that was undertaken. Those limitations will appear from several extracts which I should like to read from the reports of the auditors. These extracts will be brief, because I do not purpose detaining the house at length in the reading of them. There are some, however, which, as I say, I believe the house should know. These will deal with several different aspects of the administration.

From the report of Price, Waterhouse and Company on the enemy section, Vancouver office, for the period of December 11, 1941, to December 31, 1946, I quote these extracts; first, the following, from pages 6 and 7:

Personal effects and chattels of enemy persons, including the balance of fishing boats and gear turned over by the fishing vessel disposal committee, have not generally been recorded on the books of the Vancouver office except in the files of the individuals. We did not examine these files in detail but we are informed that, with a few minor exceptions, all personal effects and chattels have been disposed of and the proceeds accounted for in the financial records of the Vancouver office.

And again, another limitation is pointed out at page 11 of the same report, in connection with controlled companies, where it states:

Fees of the controller and liquidator have been paid out of the funds of the Vancouver office against collections of a corresponding amount received from the controller and liquidator out of the controlled companies' funds. We are informed that there are about thirty companies not yet liquidated, still under the control of Messrs. P. S. Ross & Sons. Our examination did not extend to the accounts of the controlled companies nor did we endeavour to obtain direct confirmation from the controller and liquidator, of amounts remitted to the Vancouver office of the custodian. . . In submitting this report we would point out that our work was mainly concerned with an examination of the books of the enemy section of the Vancouver office of the custodian and a general review of the accounting methods employed. We did not examine all of the numerous files maintained for individuals, and, therefore, we are unable to state definitely that all assets vested in the custodian have been entered on the books.

Then, Mr. Speaker, in the audit of Price, Waterhouse and Company of December 31, 1945, there are also several extracts which indicate the limitations on the extent of the audit undertaken. I am not suggesting that these are unusual limitations, but I point them out in case unwarranted inferences should be drawn from the fact that these accounts were, as we are told, audited. At page 10 of the report we have the following extract:

We would advise you that no attempt was made to verify the securities listed as shareholders' securities. This matter was discussed with the assistant deputy custodian who stated that he was satisfied that reasonable control was being maintained over these securities through close checking at the times that dividends are received. This, of course, does not apply to non-dividend paying stocks, which actually are small in number and value as compared to the whole.

And then at page 19:

We made a physical test of the personal effects which are held in safekeeping in the vault. We would again suggest that these effects be held under joint custody. At present there are two custodians, either one of which has access to the compartment containing the effects, and we feel that for the protection of these individuals, two persons, one of which is from another department altogether, should be present when any of the effects are placed in the vault or removed therefrom, both persons initialling the record for each transaction.

And at page 23, in concluding the report the auditors say this:

In submitting this report we would point out that our work was mainly concerned with an examination of the books of the custodian and a general review of the accounting methods employed. We did not examine all the files (of which we understand there are now approximately forty thousand) and, therefore, we are unable to state definitely that all assets vested in the custodian have been entered on the books.

The matter of the administration of the property of persons of the Japanese race situated in Canada is an important and vexed one. Again there are problems presented by the reports. First, I would quote a short extract from the report of P. S. Ross and Sons, dated October 20, 1943. This is a report on the examination of the Japanese evacuation section of the custodian's office at Vancouver. This is what these auditors say at page 9 concerning the administration of the chattels seized in British Columbia from these persons:

The household and personal effects of evacuees which they could not take with them to their new abode, were in a large number of instances, removed to central storage places or stored by the evacuees themselves, in most cases in some part of the dwelling being vacated. We noticed from some of the files examined by us that the evacuees recorded on the registration form only a general description of the items turned over to the custodian.

An inventory record was made by the clerks charged with the responsibility of taking into custody the chattels stored in one or other of the several buildings used as warehouses, and in the cases where chattels were left in the custody of the tenant of the property vacated by the evacuee, a receipt signed by the tenant for such articles was obtained, except in those cases where the chattels were stored in a room which was locked or by other means made inaccessible to the tenant.

We visited some of the places in Vancouver and Steveston used for storing chattels and we noticed that in numerous instances the evacuees had packed belongings in cartons which were not covered or tied, and also that many other articles were in a damaged and much used condition, consequently the inventory of the articles made by the person taking them into storage is, of necessity, of a very indefinite nature.

We understand that many requests have been received from evacuees to have shipped to them at their present address certain articles which, in some cases, have necessitated the unpacking of a carton or other container in order to locate the particular thing or things requested. We were also informed that the storage places have on a number of occasions been broken into and containers ransacked, and as a result the belongings of one evacuee mixed with those of another, thus destroying means of identification of ownership with the office records.

A number of sales of articles such as refrigerators, washing machines, etc., have been made by the custodian's office with the consent of the owners upon their requests, and with the approval of the British Columbia security commission at the expense of the person making the request.

We were informed that in the near future the chattels then on hand will be sold by public auction. This would appear to be desirable so as to relieve the custodian's office of the responsibility of maintaining safe custody of numerous articles of little value, many of which, it could be seen by inspection, would rapidly deteriorate and probably become worthless if kept for a protracted period of time.

The report of Mr. Mathieu, assistant deputy custodian has a section in it dealing with the custody of property of these persons of the Japanese race which was seized in British Columbia, and held there. At page 39 and following of the report I read these extracts:

It must be remembered that the custodian became responsible for the whole household economy of over 22,000 persons who were moved out of their homes from communities such as Powell street, known as "Little Tokyo" and fishing centres such as Steveston, 20 miles from Vancouver, from farming districts of more than 50 miles in extent in the Fraser valley and also segregated locations throughout the whole coastal and protected area of British Columbia.

It is also true that a certain type of citizen considered the abandoned homes of evacuees an opportunity to engage in theft and vandalism which were in evidence in many cases before our fieldmen or our agents had an opportunity of taking charge.

Even in the better class districts this was in evidence and perhaps an outstanding example may be given in connection with the property owned by the former Japanese consul in the Shaughnessy district of Vancouver. This house was under the control of the protective powers until the capitulation of Japan.

At the time the property was handed over to us in December, 1945, Mr. K. W. Wright, counsel to the custodian, and Mr. F. G. Shears, director of our Vancouver office, inspected these premises with Mr. Baeschlin, representing the Swiss government. Every piece of plumbing had been removed, light fixtures and switches had been disconnected and taken away and even leaded glass doors and windows had been taken from their frames and were missing. This had occurred in one of the best districts of Vancouver, and according to representatives of both the Spanish and Swiss authorities, the house had been broken into time after time even although it was boarded up after each depredation.

Our own experience in regard to buildings which had been used for storage was somewhat similar to that of the Japanese consuls house. Breakings-in were frequent, entrance being made in some cases by the use of fire escapes, through windows which were boarded up or covered with a grill or through basement doors.

It may be of interest to record that a building on East Hastings street, registered in the name of a Japanese association and which certain Japanese had filled with chattels, was left by them in the care of Messrs. Norris and MacLennan. Upon request for the shipment, through the security commission, of some of the contents of the building, we requested Mr. MacLennan to accompany one of our staff to the building for the purpose of selecting the goods required for shipment. Finding it impossible to open the front door, access was made through a rear entrance when it was discovered that thieves had entered by the front door and had then barred it from the inside with planks. The place had been ransacked, lids of boxes torn off and the entire contents scattered over the floor. Both Mr. MacLennan and the representatives of the British Columbia security commission realized the futility of attempting to identify to whom the chattels belonged.

The assistant commissioner of police wrote to the Vancouver office on July 28, 1942, in regard to the Richmond district, stating that it was impossible for their police in that area to do more than keep as eye on Japanese property although he assured us that they would do their utmost to prevent breakings and enterings. He suggested that we might consider employing a watchman in that district. As a result, we asked the commissioner to recommend a suitable person . . .

It then goes on to state that a watchman was appointed after all this extensive damage had been done to the properties of these people. Regardless of whether these people were under suspicion because of their being persons of Japanese origin, I think it should have been expected that, in justice to them as individuals, steps would be taken to safeguard their property so that it would be kept in proper custody. That obviously was not done. After requesting the police for cooperation, the report continues:

The police, however, seemed powerless to deal with the situation and apart from property in which the custodian was interested, the public press at this time contained many reports of a general crime wave of breaking and entering and safe cracking. Frequent reports were made by us to the police and were acknowledged as receiving their attention.

Of the three classes of goods under administration, I think one extract concerning the property of illegal organizations is worth referring to. Again it is not a question of whether these people were guilty or innocent; it is a question of whether adequate steps were taken under the circumstances to safeguard their property. We are told in this report that steps were taken to obtain a proper valuation of property and to make sure that sales were made based upon those valuations. The extract which I intend now to read deals with a striking case. I wonder how many hon. members feel that they can justify the claim made by the government that proper valuations of such property were made at the time of seizure as well as at the time of disposal. I read from page 65 of this report the following extract which appears under the heading, "The Workers' and Farmers' Publishing Association Limited":

At the time this company was declared illegal, an inventory was prepared of all machinery and tools.

The valuators employed by the agents for the custodian appraised these at $9,811. The equipment so valued was advertised for sale by tender, and sold, for $9,696.46.

Let me interject there to say that they realized nearly the amount of the valuation placed on the machinery and tools at the time of seizure. The report continues:

Later, representations were made to the custodian, as a result of which the Honourable Paul Martin, in January, 1946, directed Mr. K. W. Wright to make an investigation, resulting in an additional compensation of $20,000 being allowed.

You have the original valuation of $9,811; you have the sale at $9,696, and then, later on, as the result of an investigation, another $20,000 being handed out by way of additional compensation. If that is a typical case I wonder if the public accounts committee should not go into these cases very carefully. Does not a report of that kind disturb the confidence of the house in the claim made that adequate and proper valuations were made of the property, both at the time of seizure and at the time of sale?

I think we should have had long ago some report concerning the amounts realized and the amounts turned over within the office of the custodian on the administration account itself. The minister told the house, when the resolution was before us, that a flat commission of two per cent was charged on all amounts realized. Does the house realize what that amounts to in terms of dollars and cents where a billion dollars—

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I did not say that it was charged; I said that it was limited to two per cent, but that rate, of course, was not always charged.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not think I was the only one who got the impression that the two per cent was a flat charge, but I am glad to have the explanation of the Secretary of State on that point. However that does not reflect on the fact that the amounts passing into the hands of the custodian by way of his rake-off on the realizations amounted to millions of dollars. In turn, the custodian was expending amounts totalling millions of dollars without those accounts ever coming before parliament to be reviewed, without any report in relation thereto being laid on the table of this house and without their being reviewed by the auditor general so that he might make his usual salutary comments on the administration.

In conclusion, I wish to submit to the house that this bill is not in proper form. It is all very well to have substantive provisions with a schedule attached thereto where the schedule is a complete document in itself and not of a legislative nature but I submit that this bill has simply two or three substantive sections followed by some twenty pages of straight legislative provisions. That is not in the form in which legislation should be submitted to the house.

We had an example of this in the bill introduced last year by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), having to do with the reinstatement of veterans in civil employment. A number of orders in council were simply tagged on to the short provisions of that bill which purported to give statutory effect to the orders in council. The house took the course of referring the bill, even before second reading, to a committee of the house in order that the bill might be properly framed without having a lot of orders in council tagged on to it.

We are going to need legislation with reference to the administration of alien enemy property for some considerable time, and I submit that the house ought not now to be legislating, simply by way of giving effect to whatever is needed out of the existing regulations respecting trading with the enemy. This legislation should be in the form of a bill and not simply tagged on as a schedule to the bill.

I have referred to the fact that the bill has no provision with reference to the extent of its life. There is no provision requiring that new regulations passed under the powers in the bill, or any reports shall be tabled in the house. I submit that the bill is sorely lacking in these respects. Surely, after seven and a half years of this kind of administration, the time has come when the house must insist that complete annual reports should be submitted to it.

This is no time for maintaining the secrecy mentality which dominated this government in time of war. I entirely approve the proposal which the Secretary of State has made that the bill be referred to the public accounts committee, and I hope that committee will see to it, not only that the legislation itself is adequately reviewed, but that the reports, including the auditors' reports and all information to date on the administration by the custodian of enemy alien property, are carefully reviewed.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, since this bill is to be referred to a committee, it is not my intention to take up the time of the house with any extended remarks. I must say, however, that I do not believe that the public accounts committee is the proper body to which to refer a bill of this kind. If I have heard the statements of the member for Eglinton aright there have been no accounts submitted in connection with this matter. What is ordinarily referred to the public accounts committee is the public accounts arising out of the estimates; but in this case there are no accounts, so how can this bill be referred to the public accounts committee?

Mr. FRASER: Dig up the accounts.

Mr. MacINNIS: But the committee does not have the authority to dig them up. I am satisfied that the public accounts committee is also too large a committee to deal with this matter, which on the statements made by the hon. member for Eglinton certainly needs investigating. I am not taking issue at all with anything he said, because I understand he was reading from documents which are authentic; therefore I am not disputing anything that he has said. But I do not believe that the public accounts committee is the proper committee to which to refer this matter. I have seen various matters referred to the public accounts committee on other occasions, but never in my experience in this house can I remember a complete report coming from that committee to this house on what it investigated.

I understand that it was the intention of the minister at one time to refer the bill to a smaller, special committee, and I am satisfied that that is the proper course to follow. Such a committee could get accountants of its own to investigate the custodian's accounts.

The hon. member for Eglinton mentioned that auditors who had gone over the custodian's accounts had stated that they had not examined each account separately and consequently could not say whether all the accounts were entered in the books of the custodian or not. He mentioned that there were approximately 40,000 separate accounts. Obviously it is impossible for the public accounts committee to examine that number of accounts. Consequently I still suggest that the matter should be referred to a smaller special committee with full power of investigation.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Eglinton refer to the property of persons of the Japanese race. I think it is regrettable that the government of Canada, composed of men for whom I have great respect should have dealt with the property of these people in the way in which it has dealt with it. These persons of the Japanese race in Canada were not enemy aliens. If there is anything definitely on record in regard to these people, it is that. Indeed from the statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this house, there was never any question of their loyalty. Yet they have been treated all along as enemy aliens and even worse than enemy aliens. Every effort was, in my opinion, made to despoil them of their property, so that they would never have an opportunity to come back and find any of their property to which they could lay claim. I regret that. It will be a stain on the record of the Canadian government for all time. However, that is not what I rose to say.

I suggest again that this bill be referred to a smaller committee. If it goes to the public accounts committee I am satisfied that it will be made a political football and that we shall never get anywhere with it.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I support heartily the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) in suggesting that the bill should go to a smaller special committee to be carefully studied.

I enjoyed very much the analysis of the present situation given by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). I agree with the great majority of his arguments and I am not going to repeat them. I was amazed when first I heard that this huge business carried on by the custodian of enemy alien property was not reported on annually to parliament. I had taken it for granted in years past that that was done.

I do not know very much about the custodian's administration of enemy alien property generally except what I have heard discussed in the house, but I do know something about the administration of the property of the Japanese who were evacuated from British Columbia. Thousands of them came into my constituency, and great numbers of them came to me with statements from the custodian which showed what their property had sold for, the cost, and the balance left. I am sure that when this matter is referred to the committee they will find plenty of evidence as to the sale and disposition of houses, boats, farms, cars and general effects formerly belonging to Japanese evacuees, which will make any honest Britisher and any honest Canadian hang his head in shame. I do hope that when the committee undertakes its task it will do it thoroughly, because I am sure that plenty of evidence can be presented to the committee to establish that, under the exigencies of war and possibly some maladministration, a great injustice was done to people whose supposed disloyalty to this country was never proven.

In conclusion, I am very glad that the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson) has proposed that this bill be referred to a committee, but again I would support the hon. member for Vancouver East in suggesting that a smaller select committee be appointed to deal with the matter more effectively.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that this matter should be sent to a small committee, rather than to the public accounts committee, and I may say that that had been my idea in the first place. I realized, however, that there was a certain amount of criticism of that procedure and a feeling amongst the members that it should go to the public accounts committee. If it is felt that that is too large a body the public accounts committee could appoint a subcommittee of itself to go into all the details of the work of the custodian's office. I was very glad to have it go to a committee where it would receive the fullest attention, because I know that the custodian has nothing to hide, although we have heard so much tonight about the iron curtain. Anyone who reflects for a moment will realize that it would have been perfectly absurd during the war to provide the enemy with a list of enemy assets in this country, or assets in this country belonging to residents of occupied countries overseas. It would have put those people in an embarrassing position, when they were prisoners of the Germans, to have the Germans know that they had assets outside the country. Consequently, during war time, no publicity was given, no reports were made as to the activities of the custodian's office or of the assets in his hands. I am very happy to have the public accounts committee go into the business of the custodian's office at the present time. I quite agree that there is no reason why annual reports should not now be filed, and I am quite sure they will be from now on.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) suggested that there should be a time limit to the granting of the powers provided by this bill. I may say that the powers will automatically expire when the assets in the hands of the custodian have finally been distributed.

One other point he made was in regard to the amendments provided under section 3 of the act. The only amendments to the regulations that can be made by order in council are those for the purpose of implementing the provisions in any peace treaty executed on behalf of Canada and ratified by parliament. So that the amendments he referred to are not amendments to regulations that would change the character of the act, but amendments that are necessary to comply with any peace treaty approved by this parliament.

Motion (Mr. Gibson, Hamilton West) agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on public accounts.

PATENT ACT

PROVISIONS FOR EXTENSIONS OF TIME—SECRECY—ADJUSTMENT OF TARIFF FEES

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 16, to amend the Patent Act, 1935.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the minister give the committee some idea of the surpluses which the patent office has each year out of the fees collected from applicants after administrative costs are deducted? My recollection is that each year the patent office of Canada has had a substantial surplus. This being so, I submit that the committee should be given some information, and we should impress upon the minister that now in this time of expanding research, patents which Canadians may secure in the future should be protected. Patenting of inventions should be encouraged and assisted. The minister might very well urge upon the government to give greater attention to the expansion of patent work, the security of patents, and the question of modernizing the whole system of granting patents. Will he give us some information in that regard so that we may know what the government's policy is?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I gave that information to the committee some time ago. The patent office has had a surplus, beginning with the year 1936-37 up to 1945-46, from $233,000 in 1936-37, and always over $125,000. In 1945-46 it was $199,000 odd. It is expected that if we can secure the increase in the fees which are provided for in this bill we shall be able to undertake the printing of patents, which would be of great benefit to those who require to make searches in the patent office.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the minister not say, in view of the substantial surplus that we have had for a great number of years, and seeing that that surplus has accumulated primarily from the collection of fees on patent applications, that the government at this time particularly will expand the services provided in return for those fees and give much more adequate service to patent holders in connection with the issuance of patents? This could be done in many ways that have not been attempted in the past. We in Canada are now embarking upon what we hope is an industrial era, and we could afford to extend inducements to inventors who have produced inventions that will be of advantage to the nation. Surely he can provide patent facilities, particularly in view of the fact that the government has made a substantial profit each year out of those who apply for patents and who pay for what is ordinarily regarded as a service but is actually a profit to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Last year, when we discussed the estimates of the Secretary of State's department I suggested that we should have a special committee to deal with the revision of the Patent Act. This suggestion was not adopted. Instead, the Secretary of State has submitted to the house a bill with certain amendments to the Patent Act. That is all very well, but I still think much will have to be done at a future date, because the scope of the committee's work was limited, although, mind you, they did deal with a great number of matters which were not already within the scope of the amendment suggested by the Secretary of State.

Generally speaking, the difficulties in the patent office at present relate to accommodation and staff. I trust that the Secretary of State and the Minister of Public Works will find some way to secure decent accommodation for this highly technical department, which renders such good service to the public.

I had heard that it was the intention to move the patent office out to the experimental farm. That is absolutely absurd. The patent office renders a service which should be within the reach of those who practise before the office, and within the reach of the public who come to this city. To move the patent office such a distance from the city would be a great disadvantage to the public and to the people who are concerned with patents.

Another matter which is of great concern in connection with the administration of the Patent Act is that of securing competent personnel. I have the greatest admiration for the men and women who work in the patent office. I have been dealing with them for the past twenty years, and I should have a fond recollection of that office because my own father was commissioner of patents at one time. But these technical men have been working under circumstances which are not befitting that type of personnel. Down by the Ottawa river similar personnel are to be found in the national research council which is housed in a beautiful, well-lighted edifice, with all the facilities that technicians should have at hand. The personnel of the patent office is, as I said before, competent. There is no blame for any delays or lack of service to be attached to the competency of the officials and officers of the patent office. But if we wish to secure more technicians in the patent office we must also pay them wages which should be paid to technicians. It is hard to believe that we ask engineers to become examiners on the staff of the patent office, with salaries under $3,000, to examine and pass upon inventions of technicians who earn ten times as much. It is also much harder to ask them to remain for a great length of time in the patent office at such salaries. I hope that the Secretary of State will see to it that decent salaries are paid in the future to the examiners and the staff of the patent office. I have particularly in mind now the salary of the assistant commissioner of patents and the principal examiner. These men's salaries range around $4,200, if I remember rightly. You cannot expect in the future to attract the best brains in the engineering class to continue to occupy the post of assistant commissioner, after twenty or twenty-five years of service, at a salary of $4,500.

I wish to make only these remarks at the present time, Mr. Chairman, I will come back to the sections when they are called, but I thought this might be the only opportunity I would have to speak about accommodation, staff and wages, which are really the essentials. I think that once the commissioner of patents, who is an efficient man, is given the tools, he will give the public the service for which we all are asking.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I think it is indeed time that we went into this business of patents and I am very glad that something has been done at the present session. I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat that if we wish to have efficiency in any of these government departments we must get qualified people, and we must pay them salaries commensurate with the responsibilities which they carry. But there is an aspect of patents which I think has not been gone into sufficiently.

It has always seemed to me that the patent situation in Canada is one which, from time to time, has enabled powerful corporations and interests to exact from the people of Canada dues to which such corporations and interests were not entitled. I am thinking at the moment particularly of the radio business. Why should a Canadian who buys a small radio in the United States, declares it at the point of entry and brings it into Canada, sometimes receive after having imported it properly a letter cautioning him that he cannot use that radio unless he pays an additional exaction to an organization in the city of Toronto? Shortly before the war, I referred in this house to the case of a local schoolteacher in the city of Ottawa who bought both a small radio and a radio for the automobile and declared them at the port of entry. By some means which I have never been quite able to understand, the radio people who held the Canadian patents wrote this teacher a letter warning him that since these two instruments had been imported and no royalty had been paid in Canada, they could not be used in this country. I may say that subsequently, after some correspondence, permission was given to use one of these radios, and if my memory serves me correctly it was the radio in the automobile. But the point I am making is this. If there were patents on radio tubes or on the parts of the radios that were imported, then a royalty had been collected on them where they were made, in the United States; and for the life of me I cannot see why another exaction should be made in Canada by substantially the same people who have an office, I think, in the city of Toronto. Toronto always seems to be coming in for this sort of thing. Perhaps that is why it is such a well-to-do city, as the hon. member for Rosedale frequently reminds me. But I think this is a matter that should be gone into carefully by the commissioner of patents and by the government. There are powers under the Patents Act which would give the governor general in council authority to deal with situations of that sort, and I think they should be dealt with effectively. Indeed, patents as they are used today, are often used merely to reap a reward from the public to which the corporation which is using the patents is not entitled. I think many hon. members know of cases of quite useful inventions which have been made by workers in industries and for which they have received some small amount from the company and the patents pass over to the corporation. The person whose brains invented the improvement or the new device does not reap the profit. The invention passes from him to someone else, often for a mere trifle.

I have often thought that, after patents are examined and when they are going to be used, they should become the property of the public, that a reward should be given to the actual inventor for patents that are used in industry, and that the patents should then become public property and not be used merely to assist in the formation of a monopoly or the restriction of trade. If we live in a competitive system, then let us have competition. If we live in an economy largely of monopolies, let us not help to build them up any more than we can help by adopting legislation in their interests.

Another thing that has always struck me is this. Under the act the patent runs out in seventeen years; but even a modification at the end of that period of time, or an improvement, will enable the patent to be carried along for a further period of time, and so on; so that you eliminate competition for a very long time.

I do not want to delay consideration of this amending bill clause by clause, but some features of the patent legislation require careful consideration by this house. I have no doubt the committee have given this bill careful consideration, and I know they have encountered difficulties in getting anything better than we have before us. But I believe the whole basis of the Patent Act is wrong when it allows abuses of the kind to which I have referred. I am particularly interested in articles such as radios, because on occasions when I have heard of the exactions that have been made I have felt them to be wrong and grossly unfair. I know, of course, that a person who invents something useful should be rewarded for his invention, but I do not think any group of people should have the right to say we cannot use something upon which a royalty has been paid in another country, when it is legally imported into this country.

On section 4—Secret patents.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to make one or two observations on this section, in part of a general nature and in part of a specific nature in reference to this provision. First, I should like to say a word by way of commendation of the work done by the banking and commerce committee in connection with this bill. That commendation does not apply only to this section, which is perhaps the most important and most difficult section in the bill; it applies to the bill in general.

In my submission, Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the committee of the whole, containing the amendments proposed by the banking and commerce committee, is a great improvement over the bill which was before the house on second reading. I also think it well to observe that in drafting and adding amendments to this bill the committee was not confined to the sections which were proposed to be amended by the original amending bill. I think that was a distinct advance, because it gave the committee an opportunity to deal with matters which have been the subject of complaint from time to time by those practising patent law or those having dealings with the patent office.

I should like also to say a word of commendation of certain members of the committee. It seemed to me that in its deliberations on this bill that committee had only one object in view. There were no partisan considerations in the work of that committee. I believe members of all parties worked together with a view to making improvements in the bill. We did not see eye to eye on all sections, but at any rate we worked together to make this a better bill and to draft amendments to the Patent Act which would make it more workable. After all, as far as the act itself is concerned, in the twelve years it has been on the statute books it has shown itself to be pretty satisfactory; not in all respects, but on the whole the statute has proved to be sound. Unfortunately, this could not be said of the administration, because of the fact that the staff was inadequate in numbers and the space was insufficient, as has been pointed out, but I do not intend to go into that question again. I wish to commend the committee for having proposed to the house that it should appoint from its own number a subcommittee to go farther into this question of accommodation and increased staff for the patent office in order that the public may be given a more efficient service. After all, in this case the public pays for a service through fees, and it is entitled to that service. So that I trust the report of that subcommittee will be forthcoming in due course.

I should like also to commend the chairman of the committee for his fairness and the businesslike way in which he conducted the proceedings. While the minister in charge of this bill, the Secretary of State, to judge from his remarks during a speech he made in Toronto last week, likes opposition, nevertheless I wish to say here that I commend him for the willingness with which he accepted amendments to this bill.

That all adds up to this, Mr. Chairman. I have not been in this house so very long, but I have been here long enough to appreciate the fact that some of the best work done by this House of Commons is done in its committees. I should like to see more bills, particularly those dealing with more or less technical matters, go to the standing committees of the house. The work done in amending this bill could not possibly have been done in committee of the whole. In the banking and commerce committee we had before us officials of the department. We were able to question them; we were able to make drafts and redrafts right in the committee, without the formality which so often precludes work of that kind being done when the house is in committee of the whole. These improvements could not have been made if this bill had not gone to a standing committee; and I think that practice has proved to be absolutely sound. Some members of that committee made an outstanding contribution. I do not want to single out any hon. members in particular, but I would pay special tribute to such hon. gentlemen as the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet, the hon. member for Kamouraska and others, who obviously devoted much study to this bill and contributed suggestions which were of great value.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to deal particularly with the section now before us, this introduces into the act entirely new provisions which had their antecedents in an order in council passed during time of war. Some of the provisions did not have to be used to any great extent during the war, such as the provision having to do with patents being taken over in the name of the Minister of National Defence, though, of course, the right was used to preserve secrecy in regard to any patents and inventions which had to do with the national security. This kind of legislation we accept, as I am sure all parties in the house accept it, because occasion may arise when in the public interest, and particularly having regard to the relations existing between this country, the United States and Great Britain, it is absolutely necessary that we have legislation of the kind provided in section 4. However I wish to say that the original section brought before the house was open to strong criticism in many respects, and not least in regard to the concluding clause. Section 19A conferred upon the governor in council power to make rules for the purpose of ensuring secrecy with respect to the patents to which the section applied; then in subsection 13 it added these words:

> . . . and such rules may modify any of the provisions of this section in their application to such patents as aforesaid so far as may appear necessary for the purpose aforesaid.

That is the sort of legislation no government should introduce in time of peace. What was proposed in that subsection was that power be reserved to the governor in council to change the terms of the legislation itself by means of rules. In my submission, there can be no excuse for any government asking for that power in time of peace, and I am happy to say that was one of the sections which went by the board in the committee. Again I say of the Secretary of State that he conceded the point and accepted the amendments proposed in that connection by the committee.

This section gave the committee a great deal of difficulty, and I wish to say further that the Secretary of State did not get very much cooperation in that committee from his colleague the Minister of National Defence. I do not say that in a personal way. I say it by way of urging on the government that before it brings in legislation of this kind, legislation sponsored by one minister for the purpose of conferring power upon another, there should at least be close consultation and cooperation between the ministers before the legislation is introduced.

What happened was this. This section proposes to vest very wide powers in the Minister of National Defence. A strong case for the giving of those powers was made out before the committee by Brigadier Morrison, an official of the Department of National Defence. He made out a very strong case, so much so that, after his evidence was taken, I think the committee felt that broader powers still would be needed, in the light of the information he had given.

But we later on had a visit from the Minister of National Defence. He fell far short of supporting the very strong case made out in committee by Brigadier Morrison. I think it was a matter of great surprise to the committee that the Minister of National Defence, when invited to address the committee, had this to say to it concerning that most important section in the bill which confers upon him in his capacity as Minister of National Defence very broad powers. Concerning this section he said, "It was only after it appeared that my attention was drawn to it." This appears at page 187 of the proceedings of the committee.

That was the reason the Minister of National Defence gave for confining his remarks to generalities, saying he would have to consult officials of his department again in regard to it. Think of that, Mr. Chairman! Here is a bill designed to give very broad powers to the Minister of National Defence. It gets to the stage of second reading and goes before the committee. The Minister of National Defence comes before the committee at a late stage of its sittings, about the fifth of its meetings on this particular bill, and says in effect, "I did not see this until it was printed and put before the house. And while the officials of my department have been here making out the case for the provisions in the bill, before I make comment upon it in detail I shall have to confer with the officials of my department." I submit that more is to be expected of the government than that, in the way of cooperation.

I am not making it a personal matter as between minister and minister. But I submit that in fairness to the house and in fairness to members a situation of that kind should not be permitted to recur.

I submit to the committee that the bill in its present form is a satisfactory legislative provision for dealing with the situation disclosed to the committee.

Sections 5 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On section 19—Tariff of fees.

Mr. FLEMING: I have one comment to make on this section. It proposes to increase the fees charged by the patent office. There is no blanket rate of increase. I think it is fair to say the increase averages about twenty-five per cent. So far as the committee was concerned, it was quite prepared to approve increasing the fees, provided that the public is given better service. It would not be fair for the house now to approve the proposed increase in these fees, and then at a later stage to refuse to devote some of the increase in fees to giving the public better service. If the public is to have that better service it means that there must be an increase in staff, and it means also that there must be an increase in space available. There is not space for the staff to work in at the present time, nor is there adequate space for the storage of records. I think the committee should regard it as a matter of honour, in approving this increase in fees, to see to it at the appropriate later stage, that adequate amounts of these fees are turned back to improve facilities for the service of the public.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I should like to reply to what the hon. member has said, and to go farther and express my appreciation to the committee for the work it did, not only in amending this bill but also in taking upon itself the responsibility of looking about for better accommodation, for more extensive accommodation, and for making a thorough investigation so that it can bring in a report to the house with respect to what additional facilities the patent office should be provided with.

I wish also to agree with what the hon. member for Eglinton said about the splendid work done by the banking and commerce committee, and I should also like to refer to the great help given by Mr. Robinson of the Patent Institute of Canada. He attended many of the meetings of the committee, and was of great assistance in revising the act.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): I have only one criticism to make. I think the fees have not been raised sufficiently. I am sure we cannot expect the service mentioned by the hon. member for Eglinton with only this increase in fees. These are still the lowest fees in the world. No South American or other country charges such low fees as are mentioned in this tariff.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS

PROVISION FOR REGULATIONS, PROCEDURE, ETC.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 11, respecting export and import permits.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet, but I think you did not see me. However I should like to make a few remarks before the bill goes into committee. I thought, as a matter of fact, that the minister would make a statement on it, or that the chairman of the banking and commerce committee would make a statement, the bill having been reported from the committee with a few amendments. I should like to make a few observations on it.

The committee had the advantage of hearing senior officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and also Mr. Donald Gordon of the wartime prices and trade board; and I think the committee was satisfied that for the temporary period proposed it was certainly necessary to have certain export and import controls. And further—speaking for myself, and I think probably the other members of the committee—we thought it was wise to leave a certain flexibility. We thought it was not wise to insist that the full list of commodities be set out, and that they be not allowed to be changed; because we felt that, if that were so, the tendency would be to refrain from decontrolling certain commodities because they would not be able to be brought back in.

We felt that the officials, and particularly—well, I should not say "particularly" Mr. Gordon—we felt that all the officials were working toward the restoration of freedom, to the extent that their judgment carried. And for that reason, subject to the amendment which will be proposed, it seemed to us that this was a reasonable measure.

I should like to make two comments before taking my seat. I think there is no question that the present restrictions are being felt keenly in certain quarters of the business community. I think we must face the fact, those of us who believe in the maximum of freedom, that every time you impose a restriction it leads to other restrictions; and it is almost impossible to tell how the ramifications and effects of one restriction—because, as I say, it will lead to others—may affect the community. The greatest argument of all for freedom is that if you do not have the maximum of freedom, then you have to go in for more and more restriction. And, quite frankly, I do not think there is the capacity to make these over-all decisions which some of our friends want to make.

I think, highly as we regard the officials who came before us, we found the very natural human tendency on their part to believe that they could set out to correct certain inequalities as between one person in the trade and another person in the trade. In certain cases which came to our attention they set out by regulation to control and adjust these inequalities.

We would all like to have equality. We would all like to believe that we have the wisdom to set up equality. But it did become clear; it became clear in the committee, certainly to myself, that these controls which set out to be, and, I think, genuinely purported to be, controls for the purpose of dealing with commodities which were in short supply, almost imperceptibly went beyond that, to a point where these same powers were used for further, and quite ancillary purposes, namely to create what was considered by the officials to be justice as between man and man.

I wish to add just one further word. Something will be said in committee as to the duration of the bill; a minor amendment will be proposed. But, broadly speaking, it will last about a year. There is nothing in the world to prevent the government from coming back at the end of the year and telling us that they need a further extension. But I would submit this, very earnestly, that the members of the government who are responsible should press on with the task of getting rid of these things; because while something may be said for controlled economy and while I believe a great deal may be said for a free economy, I think there is less and less to be said for trying to make the best of both worlds, trying to keep one foot on each side of the fence. In this way we can easily make the worst of both worlds.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Coming into force.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is proposed that this act shall expire sixty days from the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year 1948, or the 31st of March, 1948, whichever shall be the earlier date.

That was before the banking and commerce committee, and I understand that it was negatived by that committee. I should like to move that amendment now, for the judgment of the committee.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to say a word on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; could I have the hon. member's amendment in writing?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have not the amendment written out, but the purpose of it is simply to add certain words at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN: Then perhaps the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario would write out his amendment while the hon. member for Eglinton makes his remarks.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Very well.

Mr. FLEMING: The banking and commerce committee should be commended for the work it has done on this bill, and I think that at least the members of that committee will agree with my statement.

In connection with the matter to which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has made reference, I think this committee should be aware of the fact that when this bill was introduced it did not provide for reports being tabled in the house. That serious defect was cured by an amendment introduced in the committee. A further amendment was introduced dealing with the timing of the effect of regulations in relation to their tabling, and publication in the Canada Gazette. There was also a substantial improvement made by the committee to the bill. But there still remains the question of the effective date of expiry of this bill. Section 14 of the original bill provides:

> This act shall come into force upon the expiration of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, and shall expire sixty days from the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-eight.

That would suffice if we could be positive that parliament would be called together before the end of January, 1948. The footing upon which this bill was introduced, the footing upon which it was discussed on second reading and sent to the committee was that the bill would not have a life beyond March 31, 1948, under any circumstances unless specifically extended by the house. If parliament should not be called together until late in 1948 the effect of that section as it now stands might be to extend the effective life of this bill beyond March 31, 1948. Suppose parliament were not called together until the middle of March next, as was the case in 1946; it would mean that the effect of this bill might go on until nearly the end of May. It seems to me that that was not intended. The course which ought to be followed now, the course which I urged unsuccessfully in the committee, is that we should have in this section a provision analogous to that which was inserted in the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act in 1946, when the life of that measure was extended either to March 31, 1947 or to a date sixty days after the opening of the session of parliament in 1947, whichever was the earlier date. If that were done now we would be assured that this bill would not have a life beyond the date proposed originally by the government, namely, March 31, 1948.

That is a simple safeguard which I urge, and I would hope the government would readily agree to it. That is the footing upon which they brought the bill before us; the limitation on the life of the bill was emphasized by the government on the introduction of the bill. I think the suggestion now made to curb the life of the measure unless extended by addresses of both houses is a proper suggestion. Bill No. 104 is a kindred bill in the sense that it is designed to extend emergency legislation for a limited period. It will be seen that the expediency followed there by the government in introducing the bill is contained in section 7, which reads:

> Subject as hereinafter provided, this act shall expire on the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven, if parliament meets during November or December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven, but if parliament does not so meet it shall expire on the sixtieth day after parliament first meets during the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-eight or on the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-eight, whichever date is the earlier: provided that, if at any time while this act is in force, addresses are presented to the Governor General by the Senate and House of Commons respectively, praying that this act should be continued in force for a further period, not in any case exceeding one year, from the time at which it would otherwise expire and the governor in council so orders, this act shall contnue in force for that further period.

When the government in its own omnibus measure, Bill No. 104, proposes a limitation on the life of the measure in these terms, surely there should not be any hesitation on the part of the government in accepting the suggestion now offered that the life of this bill should be confined to a date either sixty days after the opening of the 1948 session of the house or March 31, 1948, whichever is the earlier. That is a fair proposal and is in line with what the government has already said, and it is certainly in keeping with the section from Bill No. 104 which I have just read. The amendment now proposed does not even go as far as Bill No. 104 in limiting the life of the measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Eglinton refers to the provisions of Bill No. 104. There is one difference between the provisions of this bill and Bill No. 104. While Bill No. 104 does expire on the sixtieth day after the opening of parliament or on March 31, 1948, whichever is the earlier date, it may be extended by addresses, one by the House of Commons and one by the Senate. That is a much more expeditious procedure than extension by act of parliament. If extension is to be by act of parliament I think the government ought to have sixty days after the session begins. They should not be so crowded by the insertion of the March 31 date that they would virtually be obliged to open the session in January, though presumably that would be the government's intention. It may very well be that certain export and perhaps import controls would have to be extended beyond the expiration of this bill, in which event another bill would have to be introduced.

Perhaps I should say to the committee that it was our first plan with regard to this bill to make the period longer than a year, because we anticipate that the contracts with Great Britain will run for longer than a year. They will not expire on March 31, 1948, or within sixty days after the opening of the next session. I assume that the government will get power in some way or other to carry out these contracts. They have power to discharge their obligations for one year under the Agricultural Products Act. I assume that parliament will in some way or another enable the government to carry out the contracts they have made with Great Britain. I should think it would be highly probable that some export controls and perhaps some import controls might be required beyond the period of this bill.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When the minister says contracts with Great Britain, is he referring in a general way to all contracts or to certain special contracts?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am referring to the ones referred to time after time in this house, such as bacon, beef and cheese and that type of contract. I would anticipate that some export and perhaps import controls would be required beyond the period covered by this bill, but we purposely made the bill for just one year so that we would be obliged to come back to parliament to present the situation as it then existed at the opening of the next session. We thought that was a reasonable thing to do when we would in all probability be requiring an act of parliament, not merely an extension of the present act by addresses of both houses, such as might be possible with regard to some of these other acts. With regard to this act, if there is any extension, it will in all probability be by a new act, and it may be a very much restricted measure, with a very much limited list and so on. If we are to have an act of parliament it is reasonable, I think, to ask for sixty days after the opening of the session.

I rose merely to point out that there is a difference between this bill and the act dealing with the continuation of transitional measures, in that if that act is continued it will be by addresses of both houses, a procedure which requires a very much shorter time. Therefore the effect of putting in March 31, 1948, as a date is much less confining, much less serious so far as the house is concerned in that case than it would be in this measure.

Mr. FLEMING: May I remind the Minister of Justice that when the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act was extended in the 1946 session that was the form of the amendment accepted. The government had originally proposed that the life of that measure should be extended to a date sixty days after the opening of the 1947 session. An amendment was introduced in the house to confine the life of the measure to the earlier of two dates, that date or March 31, 1947, and the amendment was accepted. If that amendment was acceptable I fail to understand why the same amendment to this bill should not be equally acceptable. It will not make any difference in the life of the measure, but it is a safeguard to the house, in being asked to give these extraordinary powers to the government, that they will not be extended indefinitely but will expire on a fixed date.

The minister may say he expects the house to meet in early January, in 1948. He may quite sincerely expect that now. But there is no commitment on that. Even at the time when the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act was under discussion the Prime Minister, while he indicated it was the intention of the government to summon parliament to meet in January, would not give a binding commitment to that effect to the house. The government nevertheless accepted an amendment to the same effect as that now proposed by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. Surely it would be reasonable to accept it.

The minister says that if an extension is to be made by act of parliament the government should have more time. But surely we are not going to have a great volume of emergency measures of this kind facing parliament at the opening of the 1948 session. The whole tenor of the remarks made by the government on that theme is that they are aiming at doing away with many of these measures before that time comes. Surely there will be no difficulty in taking whatever measures are necessary on the part of the government to extend the life of this bill, if parliament thinks it necessary to extend it, if the bill runs until March 31, 1948. It seems so perfectly reasonable.

Mr. ILSLEY: It seems reasonable also to say that sixty days is not required to get legislation through this house, but it must always be borne in mind that many members feel that other legislation has priority and is more important. It is to be remembered also that there is a speech from the throne, and just at this very time there are members who have differing views as to what legislation should be brought forward first. I repeat what I said before, that I think the government ought to have sixty days at the opening of the session within which to get legislation through. The situation might be different if it were a matter of addresses, because legislation has to go through three stages in this house and three in the other, and addresses may be passed in an hour in this house and in an hour in the other, as was the case this year.

I do not see what my hon. friend is so alarmed about. We have always called parliament together early in the year and I expect, and I think that hon. members who were on that committee expect, that probably some export and import controls will be required beyond this period. Certainly some of the contracts with Great Britain run beyond that period. Perhaps some will be required beyond the period, and there will have to be some legislation, and it ought to be legislation. It should not be addresses, because the bill will in all probability be a very different kind of bill, and it seems to me that sixty days is a reasonable time.

What is feared here is that we are going to carry on export and import controls a few weeks longer than we otherwise would, and that we must be cut back rigidly for fear that something terrible will happen. That is not the way we operate at all. It is not the way we have operated in the past or plan to operate in the future. All we ask for is a reasonable time after parliament meets to get legislation through if we need it, and we think we need it.

Mr. FLEMING: The government has control over the date on which parliament is called together, and therefore the government controls the life of the measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is far-fetched to think that our worry about this measure will control the period at which we call parliament together.

Amendment (Mr. Macdonnell, Muskoka-Ontario) negatived on division.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Fleming.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order on the amendment. The amendment was moved the day before the house adjourned, and it is found in Hansard of April 1, at page 1937. It reads:

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"While recognizing that the said bill deals with some matters such as old age pensions and veterans in the civil service which do not depend for constitutional validity on the existence of an emergency and some other matters which can only be dealt with by this parliament on the basis of an existing or apprehended emergency; and while willing to support properly drafted legislation dealing with such matters;

This house is unalterably opposed to the enactment of a measure to continue indiscriminately the sweeping powers of the presently existing boards outside the control of parliament."

I find in the third edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 229, citation 659, the following:

An amendment purporting to approve the principle of a bill and at the same time enunciating a declaration of policy cannot be moved to the second reading. It must oppose the principle of the bill. When the natural products marketing bill was up for second reading, on the 24th April, 1934, a member moved in amendment, that "this house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measures which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation, etc." The Speaker ruled this amendment out of order because it did not challenge the principle of the bill and it anticipated the committee stage. On an appeal, the house sustained this decision by a vote of 103 to 52.

This amendment recognizes, or undertakes to place the house on record as recognizing the necessity of many of the provisions of the bill. It states that the house is unalterably opposed to the enactment of a measure to continue indiscriminately the sweeping powers of the presently existing boards outside the control of parliament. That is, there are some provisions of some of the orders in council to which the amendment takes exception. That, I submit, is a matter for amendment in the committee stage, and the amendment does not enunciate a principle contrary to or at variance with the principle of the bill at all. If anything, it approves the principle of the bill, but simply states that the house is opposed to the enactment of a measure to continue indiscriminately the sweeping powers of the existing boards outside the control of parliament.

If the amendment does not mean what I construe it to mean, if it means that the bill is bad, then it may be merely an expanded negative and bad on that ground. But I think that the first ground I state is the proper ground. I do not think there is any precedent for an amendment such as this. If the debate is to continue tonight I do not care whether the point is decided tonight, but I do not think I should allow the matter to be proceeded with without raising a point of order and having Your Honour's ruling upon it.

Mr. FLEMING: It is interesting to hear the Minister of Justice raise a point of order on this bill two weeks after the amendment was introduced, and certainly on the third day that the house has been in session after the amendment was introduced. After two and a half sessions in this house, I do not profess at all to be an authority on the rules of the house, but I contend that it is a fundamental rule that, if a measure or an amendment is objectionable on the ground of procedure, objection to it must be taken promptly.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where is that rule?

Mr. FLEMING: That principle has been enunciated frequently in this house.

Mr. ILSLEY: The rule is that it must be taken before the question is put.

Mr. FLEMING: And I am making the point that this objection has not been taken promptly and that it should have been.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not taken promptly, but it was taken before the question is put, and that is the rule.

Mr. FLEMING: I am making the point that the objection should have been taken promptly and that has not been done. That is my first point.

The next point is this. It is interesting to hear the Minister of Justice take objection on the ground that his leader must have been wrong in 1934. If the minister says that the amendment I have introduced is out of order, then he must say that the point on the amendment taken by his leader in 1934, if it is a proper precedent, is not well taken.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was decided that it was out of order.

Mr. FLEMING: It happened to be his leader's point.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was frequently ruled out of order.

Mr. FLEMING: All right. In my submission this amendment is in order. The rule laid down in Beauchesne, third edition, at page 229, citation 659, is that an amendment on second reading, to be in order must oppose the principle of the bill. In my submission, the amendment that was introduced on April 1 clearly comes within that category. I do not wish to burden you again, Mr. Speaker, with what I had to say at that time about the difficulty of finding a principle in the bill; but the principle of the bill as held forth by the government was that it is a measure to extend or to give the force of statute to certain orders in council which would otherwise come to an end on May 15. The effect of the amendment is to say this: there are some of these fifty-seven measures that may be unobjectionable, but there are others that are objectionable, and the house is not prepared at this stage, in an unprecedented bill, to accept sweeping measures of that kind, covering such a tremendous variety of subjects and to pass over to boards outside parliament these sweeping powers that have been vested in them by these orders in council. Clearly, Mr. Speaker, the amendment is couched in terms of opposition to the principle of the bill within the terms stated in Beauchesne.

As to the other point taken by the minister, he has drawn attention to some similarity in the amendment introduced by his leader, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1934, on this other measure. I wish to urge upon you, Mr. Speaker, that the measure on the amendments to which you are being called upon to pass your judgment, is a measure that is without precedent in this house. Hon. members opposite referred to the measure that has come closest to it, in the legislation of 1931 and 1932, resolutions bulking two measures together—just two—unemployment relief and certain forms of agricultural assistance. I submit that is quite a different kind of situation from the bill now before the house, a bill that would give blanket extension, with statutory effect, to no less than fifty-seven orders in council, all dealing with different subject matters. If that argument is correct—and I urge that it is—then the citation given to you now by the Minister of Justice is not a precedent against the amendment which I introduced on April 1. I submit that the amendment is clearly within the rules stated in Beauchesne, third edition.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this too. I wish to read again what this amendment says, so that the house may have it in mind. It reads:

> That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "While recognizing that the said bill deals with some matters such as old age pensions and veterans in the civil service which do not depend for constitutional validity on the existence of an emergency and some other matters which can only be dealt with by this parliament on the basis of an existing or apprehended emergency; and while willing to support properly drafted legislation dealing with such matters;
> This house is unalterably opposed to the enactment of a measure to continue indiscriminately the sweeping powers of the presently existing boards outside the control of parliament."

Following what the hon. member for Eglinton has said, I submit that surely there is a principle at stake here. The whole thing we object to—and I think the objection was made originally in the house by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power)—is this indiscriminate putting together of fifty-seven varieties, as they have been called, and then forcing us to deal with this whole situation in this omnibus way. We have surely, on this bill, stated what is a firm principle on our part, that we object to this matter being dealt with in this way where we are now asked to take the bitter with the sweet, and where all these things have been jumbled together, as the hon. member for Quebec South pointed out, in this unprecedented manner. I submit to Your Honour that the hon. member for Eglinton is right in saying that there is a principle involved here and that, on the contrary, the citation read by the Minister of Justice, referring to an amendment purporting to approve the principle of a bill, is not applicable. We certainly did not purport to do that. This amendment purports to do exactly the opposite. If it by any chance fell into approving the principle of the bill, it certainly was not what it purported to do. What it purported to do was exactly the opposite. I maintain, therefore, that the hon. member for Eglinton is right, and that this is not approving the principle of the bill and, consequently, is a proper amendment.

Mr. BOUCHER: Referring to what the Minister of Justice has said is a precedent for declaring this amendment out of order, may I point out that in the Natural Products Marketing Act in which the decision was given which he speaks of, there was one clear principle, namely, the orderly marketing of natural products. In this bill, if there is any one principle that we have clear it is the principle of administration of controls and, according to the amendment, it was objected to by virtue of the boards administering that control. The result is that you would have a broad system of control, and if the minister's analogous proposition were presented to this parliament we might just as well be asked whether or not we are in favour of control of anything or of everything. Consequently, when the amendment, worded as it is, refers to some part of the economy of Canada where some controls are necessary but raises objection to the principle of the fifty-seven coupled in one and the principle of administration of them in a certain way, I would say it definitely is against one of the fundamental principles, one of the only principles that this bill before the house could involve. That would not be so with the Natural Products Marketing Act. Consequently, when Your Honour decides the point, will you bear in mind that we must first decide what is the principle of this bill? The principle of the bill does not mean the details of how it is to be carried out, but it does mean the principle of giving a certain power. The power in this bill, covering as broad a field as it does, is an extensive one; and we can hardly see where limitation can be easily put or where the bill can be divided, and it can be said that because we approve one fifty-seventh of it we must approve the principle, or because we disapprove one fifty-seventh of the bill we disapprove the principle. For that reason, I think if the contention of the Minister of Justice is right we should put ourselves and parliament in the position of saying that we must be 100 per cent in favour of all or we cannot amend it, and we must amend it in the one material point in it or the amendment is not in order.

A short time ago the Minister of Justice himself said this bill embodied so many principles of control, and it is unique in that respect. So I suggest that it is incapable of being interpreted by Your Honour by virtue of any decision given on such a narrow, restricted measure as the Natural Products Marketing Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I should like to say a brief word on the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice. I think he explained the situation to Your Honour from the authorities so clearly that there can be no question whatever on two main principles, if any hon. gentleman cares to read citations 658 and 659 of Beauchesne. My memory goes back to my good friend's former leader, now Lord Bennett, who was a brilliant parliamentarian with a thorough knowledge of the rules of procedure, and who always laid down the principle that an amendment cannot approbate and reprobate at the same time. That is exactly what this amendment seeks to do. My hon. friends are approving some of the features of this bill, in regard to protection for civil servants, veterans, and old age pensions. At the same time another definite principle is involved, which was referred to by my right hon. colleague, in regard to the last part of the amendment, which is an expanded negative not dealing with any measure at all, charging discrimination. That is a perfect case of an expanded negative. This is a complete example of approbating and reprobating at the same time, and if my hon. friends will look up the precedents of parliament they will find that no amendment of this kind has ever been approved by this house.

Mr. BRACKEN: The Minister of Justice having raised a point of order in connection with the amendment, I presume Your Honour will have to make a decision. If that decision is to be given tonight I wish to make a brief comment before that is done. The acting leader of the house just said something about approbating some sections of this bill and reprobating others. I want to say there are some sections of this bill that practically every member of this house approbates, and some sections practically every member reprobates. The Minister of Justice has referred to certain precedents. I ask him if there was ever a precedent for a bill such as we have before us tonight.

What has the amendment sought to do? Here is a bill with not one but fifty-seven principles, and this house is asked to support them all or oppose them all. No matter how we vote, we are going to be misinterpreted. There are sections of this bill supported by every member of the house. There are sections I think every hon. member would oppose. How can we express our opinions on a measure such as this unless some amendment such as has been moved can be brought forward?

Mr. MACKENZIE: In committee.

Mr. BRACKEN: If we support the bill we shall be represented as supporting everything in it, which practically no one does. If we oppose it we shall be represented as opposing everything in it, which I am quite sure everyone does not wish to do. Whatever may be the technical answer of Your Honour to the point of order which has been raised, if this amendment is ruled out of order we are denied the opportunity of saying there are some things in this bill we support and some things we do not. I suggest that we ought not to be deprived of that right, because this bill is unlike anything ever before introduced into this parliament. It is fifty-seven bills in one.

I am saying nothing whatever with respect to the narrow, technical point raised by the Minister of Justice. I am only saying that, on the broad question of dealing with this bill as it is, if we are denied the right to vote on the amendment we are denied the right to express what we feel about a measure which contains not one but fifty-seven different principles.

Mr. SPEAKER: On account of the importance of the ruling I have to give, and on account also of the representations—

Mr. HACKETT: I crave the privilege of saying a few words, Mr. Speaker, somewhat along the line of what has just been said; but I shall take my text from the Minister of Justice. He told the house that nothing comparable to the present bill had ever been introduced before, and it was not likely that anything like it would ever be introduced again. That being the case, it seems to me that rules made to apply to cases which ordinarily come before the house should not be applied to a case which has not come before the house previously and is not likely to come before the house in the future. To submit that because a person may hold certain views on pelagic sealing he is therefore bound to a system of controls dealing with clothing, or food, points clearly to the difficulties which arise in dealing with this matter. Why were these items concerning which there was no dispute and concerning which there was no emergency included in this bill? Was it for the purpose of embarrassing the house? Was it for the purpose of forcing people who had no objection to the provision with respect to pelagic sealing, for example—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I regret that I must rise to another point of order. The hon. gentleman is not arguing the point of order; he is arguing the merits or demerits of the legislation.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not arguing the merits of the bill; I am arguing the point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HACKETT: I am endeavouring to point out that because so many principles are involved in the bill it is not proper parliamentary procedure to hold or say or suggest that any person or group in the house supports all the bills or all the principles—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to resume his discussion of the point of order.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker, I may not be deft, but I am endeavouring to direct my remarks to the point of order. The point of order is that, there being not one principle involved in the bill but fifty odd—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand that the hon. gentleman desires to have the Speaker give a certain ruling. The point he is discussing now was discussed just a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher). If the hon. gentleman has no new representations or suggestions to make to the Speaker, the Speaker will decide whether or not his ruling will be given immediately, and what the ruling will be.

Mr. HACKETT: Possibly Mr. Speaker would be in a better position to determine whether or not my argument is identical to that of the hon. member for Carleton if he heard my argument.

An hon. MEMBER: They are equally confusing.

Mr. HACKETT: There are bright wits on the other side of the house who, I admit, have some difficulty in following anything that is logical, but I know you are not of that number, Mr. Speaker. I invite your attention for a few minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I suggest to the house that, in view of the importance of the different representations which I have received from both sides of the house, I should like to study this situation most carefully before giving a ruling. Therefore I would ask the house to proceed with the debate.

Mr. HACKETT: I shall be grateful if you will consider the things I would have said had an opportunity been afforded.

Mr. H. W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was first brought down in the house I had the temerity to ask why it was necessary to include in it sections having to do with veterans preference, and the house was advised at the time that the government proposed to bring down a separate bill having to do with veterans preference. Having regard to the magnitude of this bill and the fact that never before has parliament had before it a similar bill, I would have thought that during the Easter recess the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) would have laid upon the table such a bill having to do with veterans preference, so that in due course we could have discussed that matter in its proper place. It seems to me to be a waste of time, and I think the people of Canada will feel we are wasting time in parliament if we deal specifically with each of these orders and then, when the specific bill is brought down, which the minister says will be brought down, deal with the matter all over again and probably not achieve any better results.

An hon. member in the party to my left asked a similar question with respect to old age pensions, and he was told by the minister that a bill would be brought down to deal with old age pensions. We are all agreed that old age pensions is a matter that has to be discussed in this parliament. We may not all agree upon the method to be adopted or what is to be achieved in respect to a bill, but I think we are all agreed that we are going to deal with the matter to the best of our judgment and ability. I see no reason why in dealing with Bill No. 104 we should now go through the business of old age pensions. Why should we not save steps? Why should we not deal with the matter specifically when the specific bill is brought down?

Mr. MARTIN: Does the hon. member realize that, if the course suggested were followed, 214,000 old age pensioners will not be receiving the full amount of pension to which they are entitled under the existing law?

Mr. HACKETT: That just is not so.

Mr. TIMMINS: I am suggesting that there is some civility in this house between hon. members. We have the undertaking of the minister that a bill dealing with old age pensions will be brought down this session, and I think we should absolve ourselves from discussion of the matter on Bill No. 104. Let the minister bring down his bill and then we can discuss the matter at the proper time. I am not suggesting for one minute that we obviate the necessity of dealing with this matter at considerable length and in the detail to which it is entitled.

Then we have the labour sections of this bill. There are quite a number of sections dealing with labour legislation which was passed during the days of the war. As a matter of fact, some of the provinces did not pass coordinating labour legislation during the war. Just the other day one of the legislatures passed its own labour law. I am not suggesting that we should in any way obviate the necessity of dealing with a national labour code when it is brought before us, but I do think that some civility should be shown by one party to the other with respect to the magnitude of this bill and that we should take the minister's undertaking in regard to bringing in of a separate bill. I am suggesting that the bill should be brought down as soon as possible so that we may obviate the necessity of discussion at the present time.

One of the items to be dealt with under this bill is leaseholds. This is the first time since October 11, 1941, that we in this parliament have had a chance to deal with these leasehold measures. While we have sat here day after day prepared to deal with these measures, new orders dealing with matters which parliament should be dealing with have been passed. I do not think we have any right to delegate these powers to the minister because they are matters with which we ourselves are concerned. Some people say that the emergency is over, while others say that it is not over, but the fact of the matter is that these wartime leasehold regulations are the responsibility of parliament. No matter what we may be told, I do not think we can swallow all the regulations and orders which have been passed with respect to commercial and residential leaseholds.

Perhaps some hon. members have had some experience with leasehold matters and realize the difficulties that have arisen in respect thereto. Commercial leaseholds are covered by order 315 of the wartime prices and trade board. This order permits a landlord, who finds that his premises are being leased at less than similar premises in the same or a similar district are being leased at, to make application to have his rentals increased to that level. As a matter of fact, in the city of Toronto from which I come, not only has there been a levelling here or there, but what has happened in the last few years is that the whole floor level has been raised. Almost every commercial building in the city has found ways and means of getting a higher rental from one tenant, and then lifting up one by one the rents of all the other tenants in the building. Then that would spread across the street to another building; it would spread down the street and then into the next street until the whole downtown district was affected. That was the case not only with light manufacturing buildings but also with our office buildings.

I do not suppose that there is an office building of any size in the city of Toronto which has not had its rentals increased during the war by ten, fifteen or twenty-five per cent. Then what happened? While we were sitting in parliament, new regulations were passed under date of March 1, 1947, to increase commercial rentals by another twenty-five per cent. It may be all very well, but I do not think there was any necessity for increasing commercial rentals in that city by fifteen per cent and then allowing another increase of twenty-five per cent to be made.

However, even supposing it was proper, what about the other order, No. 294, having to do with residential leases? The fact of the matter is that there is no similar clause in the residential order. As to residential properties there has been no provision for levelling up of rents in accordance with natural justice even in cases of extreme hardship.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that on second reading there should be only a discussion of the general principle of the bill, not a discussion of any specific orders in council. The hon. member is discussing certain orders in council. That would be permissible when the house is in committee; but at the present time he should discuss just the principle of the bill.

Mr. TIMMINS: Mr. Speaker, I shall accept your ruling in the matter. But I wish to point out that the leasehold orders before us, comprise nine or ten different amending orders with which we are asked to deal here. I have dealt with these matters in some particularity in order to place before the house difficulties which may arise in connection with the passing of this bill, and I have done it for a purpose.

The purpose is this. I think the passage of the patent bill tonight, and the ease with which the export-import bill passed the house must indicate to hon. members the fact that these leasehold regulations should be brought to the house in the form of a separate bill, in the same fashion as these other three matters, namely pensions, soldiers preference and labour matters. They should be brought down in separate bills. I suggest in all sincerity that they should be referred, probably to the committee on banking and commerce in order that they might be worked out, and the incongruities in the bill dealt with.

As I said, this is the first time since October 11, 1941, that this matter has really been before the House of Commons, so far as leaseholds are concerned. The people of Canada, whom we all represent, are entitled to know that members of parliament have had some say and have put themselves on record in some way or another in respect of these rental orders and regulations. I do not think we shall be through here until the end of August, if we are to deal with this bill of fifty-seven varieties in any kind of detail, and I say that in all sincerity. If we as business people were dealing with this matter, we would not do it in the way we are doing it here.

That brings me to the matter of regulations in the bill which have to do with building materials. From time to time statements have been made in the house by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), having to do with building in Canada. We were told by him in the early days of the session that in 1946 some 60,000 housing units were built. When we analyse the minister's figures we find that in that time only 6,812 wartime housing units were built, 566 integrated housing units, 28 units under Housing Enterprises Limited, and about 2,599 veterans houses. In addition, there were a thousand or so emergency housing units; 1,643, to be exact.

I received a return from the minister this afternoon and, although I have not it before me at the present time, it shows that the Department of Reconstruction and Supply had to do with some 11,000 housing units in 1946. I say to the house that those 11,000 housing units with which the government was concerned in 1946 in no sense constitute a housing programme for the Dominion of Canada. When we are going to deal with controls as they are set out in this omnibus bill, No. 104, which have to do with building materials, it seems to me that, having regard for the sanity of the house—and I use the word advisedly—a separate bill should be brought down having to do with building materials. That bill, too, ought to go to the banking and commerce committee in order that it might be dealt with, with some degree of orderliness; for as a matter of fact, if under its system of priorities the government has succeeded in providing only 11,648 housing units in 1946, then I suggest that the priority system we have been working under should be discarded.

Not only have these orders been made in previous years, but on February 1, after the opening of this session, another order was made in respect of building materials. It seems to me that this is a matter to be dealt with by parliament, and not by the minister of any department. We are going to put this whole matter in statute form, and I say that now is the time for all of us here in parliament to take some part in seeing either that an extensive housing programme is worked out, or that this system of priorities is ended.

Many questions have been asked in the house in respect of nails. Indeed this has become a subject of laughter among hon. members. But in the district from which I come it is not the subject of laughter. Rather it is a matter of whether we shall have houses in 1947, or whether we shall not have them.

I take it that the matter of housing is probably the most important one that has come before the house this year, and if we do not make some progress in respect of housing in 1947 we shall hear about it from people all across Canada.

I have before me a series of telegrams, perhaps twenty-five of them, and also some letters from builders in my community, advising me that they are in a desperate dilemma in respect of completing houses started in 1946, and that they cannot continue until they get nails. I also have a return from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in respect of the output of nails for 1947. So far as I can make out, the output in this year will not amount to as much as twenty per cent increase over the output in 1946.

I should like to place on record my questions in this connection, and the answers thereto. My question was:

1. How many firms manufactured nails in Canada in 1946, and what was the output of each firm in that period?
2. What is the estimated output for each firm in 1947?

The answer is that there were seven firms which manufactured nails in 1946, and their output was 58,843 net tons. It is indicated that in 1947 the estimate is that 70,170 tons will be produced. I am saying to the house that that is not good enough; it is not half good enough.

If, as a matter of fact, when the minister found that the output of soil pipe was not sufficient to keep the building industry going, he considered it wise to offer an incentive bonus—to ensure that sufficient soil pipe was produced, then I say to him that in respect of nails we are in the midst of a serious blockade in this year 1947, and I suggest that either he should devise some incentive bonus so that nails will be produced this year in much greater supply, or he should tell the house frankly that the government cannot carry on the building programme it adopted for 1947, and should get out of the business.

As a matter of fact, if only 11,648 homes were built in 1946 under government priorities, out of some 59,000 or 60,000, then I say to the house that the ordinary private builder, building homes over and above the 11,648, units—namely upwards of 48,000 homes—did so, not with the help of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, but in spite of him. You say, what has this to do with Bill No. 104?

An hon. MEMBER: I am wondering.

Mr. TIMMINS: And you will be wondering perhaps at the end of August when we are still talking about it. I suggest that these detailed matters we have before us are not the kind of matters we should debate in the house day after day. As a newcomer to the house, I suggest in all sincerity that the Minister of Justice, with his ingenuity, should find some way to help us, help him get this bill through so that we can each take our part, for what we know, in respect of this bill, and let us not debate it here day after day when a number of these matters could be settled quickly in committee. I am suggesting to the minister that the best thing which could be done in respect of this bill would be to dissect it. We have already dissected it into four or five sections. There are at least sixteen measures in this bill which should not be there and which could be taken out. I am suggesting that the minister find ways and means of accepting some of the suggestions which have been made by other members of the house and by myself with respect to the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, since a number of members have been on the train for a few nights and only got into Ottawa this morning, perhaps as I have some extended remarks to make on this measure I might be permitted now to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Gillis the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ST. LAURENT moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the minister indicate the programme for tomorrow?

[Mr. Timmins.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We shall continue with the debate on the second reading of this bill and then go into committee. I hope that progress can be made. I think all the members will realize that they are not committing themselves to anything by the adoption of the second reading of the bill. There is a schedule upon which their individual opinions can be expressed with respect to each item, and I would hope that we would get to the consideration of these separate items where the divergences of opinion can be fully recorded and each one's position made clear.

Mr. FLEMING: Might I ask the Acting Prime Minister a question as to the method the house might pursue in committee with reference to the schedule? The schedule itself simply refers to these fifty-seven orders by date, number and subject. Are we to be permitted in committee of the whole to use that volume called the consolidation of these measures as the basis not only for discussion but for any amendments hon. members might wish to introduce.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendments would have to be to the orders in council tabled, but the consolidation could be used as the basis. If any amendment were proposed it could be properly drafted to apply to the orders in council which have been tabled.

Mr. FLEMING: I am thinking of the technical difficulty, reference to page and line. It is going to be difficult with some of these long orders. I am sure that members want to be helpful and that there is no thought of trying to delay progress. We wish to find a way of making progress.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not going to be difficult. This whole thing was done before in Great Britain and Australia. No provision is made in the bill now for amendments, but if amendments are made to any of these orders in council a section has to be added to the bill giving effect to the amendment and a statement is put in the column of the section and order that is amended. That is the order in council on the table, not the order in the consolidation, but the consolidation had better be used as a basis for the amendment.

Mr. TIMMINS: The orders and regulations of the wartime prices and trade board are voluminous. Will those orders and regulations be tabled, or have we to swallow them holus-bolus? I am thinking of the leasehold orders. As hon. members know, there were two orders, one dealing with commercial property and the other with residential, and they are just as much a part of the law as orders in council themselves. Are those to be tabled, or are we to be asked to swallow them holus-bolus, or what?

Mr. ILSLEY: If any member wants any particular order I will certainly produce it, but to produce all the orders of the wartime prices and trade board would mean the production of a very large number of orders. I will not hazard a guess as to how many, but there are a great many thousands of them dealing with prices.

Mr. TIMMINS: In all sincerity I say that these orders are going to become the law of the land.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are now the law of the land.

Mr. TIMMINS: Are they not to be put into a statute?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; they are the law of the land now. They are changing all the time and being repealed all the time. It is quite impracticable to put them in a statute.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Tuesday, April 15, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificate of the election and return of the following member:

Of Maurice Hartt, Esquire, for the electoral district of Cartier.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT—RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the name of Mr. Richard (Ottawa East) be substituted for that of Mr. Ross (Hamilton East) on the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act.

That the name of Mr. Lapointe be substituted for that of Mr. Picard on the sessional committee on railways and shipping.

Motions agreed to.

SOAP

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It is based on a telegram which I received this morning, to the effect that there is such a serious shortage of soap in parts of Canada that it is likely to make necessary the closing of commercial and hospital laundries, particularly in the prairie provinces. Has the government been advised of this situation, and if so, will the minister inform the house what action, if any, has been taken to meet it?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I received a similar telegram, as I think every other hon. member of the house has. I believe the telegrams must have been prompted by some fear of a curtailment in the supply of soap. As the house knows, oils and fats are in very short supply. I mentioned this yesterday. The administrator of oils and fats has issued a directive requiring soap manufacturers to maintain their present quotas of soap to industrial users, which would include laundries and hospitals. So in the event of a shortage of soap it will not interfere with those institutions, though it may affect the ability of members of the house to have their usual morning bath.

CATTLE

REPORT AS TO QUOTA ON SLAUGHTERING FOR DOMESTIC DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of a wire which I do not think has been widely distributed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am afraid I cannot give hearing to my hon. friends over there. The telegram states that the placing of quotas by the government on live stock slaughtering for domestic distribution was protested at a mass meeting of wholesalers, processors and retail distributors held in Winnipeg on Sunday, and then it goes on to set out the protest. Is the minister about to introduce a quota system on cattle slaughtered for consumption in Canada, and if so, before this is done will an opportunity be given both producers and consumers to make their protests to the minister?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I have heard no discussion anywhere of any such policy being followed. I rather expect this has to do with controls already on, rather than any to be put on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; it has to do with another control that may be put on.

Mr. GARDINER: I know nothing of any such control.

EMERGENCY POWERS

COTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Monday, April 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Fleming.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to give my ruling on the point of order raised last night by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

There is before the house a motion for the second reading of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war. To this Mr. Fleming, member for Eglinton, moved in amendment:

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"While recognizing that the said bill deals with some matters such as old age pensions and veterans in the civil service which do not depend for constitutional validity on the existence of an emergency and some other matters which can only be dealt with by this parliament on the basis of an existing or apprehended emergency; and while willing to support properly drafted legislation dealing with such matters;

This house is unalterably opposed to the enactment of a measure to continue indiscriminately the sweeping powers of the presently existing boards outside the control of parliament."

The first paragraph of this amendment is only a recognition in general terms of some matters dealt with in the bill; it purposes to place the house on record as recognizing that the bill deals with some matters and being prepared to support properly drafted legislation respecting such matters. The house can only make such recognition by voting partly for and partly against the bill, which is a meaningless proposition.

As to the house's readiness to support properly drafted legislation dealing with these matters, this is a question which will have to be submitted to the committee on the bill. Questions of drafting provisions are dealt with at that place and not with the Speaker in the chair.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

As to the last paragraph of the amendment which declares that "the house is unalterably opposed to the enactment of a measure to continue indiscriminately the sweeping powers of the presently existing boards outside the control of parliament", it is merely asking that the house either approve or disapprove questions in indefinite terms. There is no doubt in my mind that proposals submitted for approval or disapproval must be set forth in expressed words, which can only be done in committee on the bill.

It happens that there are many orders and regulations included in this measure. There is a principle to each of them. Which of them the house should approve or disapprove is a mater which certainly is not covered by the amendment.

On the 24th of April, 1934, the Speaker of the house rejected an amendment proposed by the then leader of the opposition, which read as follows:

. . . this house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation, and which confers upon a minister of the crown and upon the governor in council unprecedented authority and unusual powers to restrict production, and interprovincial, interimperial and foreign trade as regards both exports and imports, as well as other autocratic powers.

In giving his decision against this amendment the Hon. George Black, then Speaker of the house, made the following statement:

The Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King in moving the amendment quoted paragraph 755 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which paragraph is published as a quotation from May, 13th edition, at page 390, which is repeated by Bourinot at page 509:

"It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill."

This rule is subject to certain limitations. If the right hon. member had continued to quote from May, he would have found the following reference to an amendment to a motion for second reading of a bill:

"Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto, which may be moved in committee—"

May, 13th edition, page 391. The precedent cited in May in support of this is found in 188 Parliamentary Debates, 4th series, column 76, The Education (Scotland) bill.

Mr. Speaker: I have to rule that the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Glasgow and Aberdeen universities to the effect that the house while welcoming educational legislation for Scotland regrets that the present measure does not propose change in the educational areas, which is urgently required in the interests of efficient administration—is not technically in order, because it does not challenge the principle of the bill. The question raised can be decided by an amendment to the bill itself. If the hon. member wants to object to the second reading, he should move that the bill be read this day six months.

An appeal was taken and the decision sustained by a vote of 103 to 52. This is a decision of the house itself which is equivalent to a standing order and must be adhered to. I therefore rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, you have just ruled out of order the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). I am aware that we cannot debate your ruling, but in view of the unusual character of the measure before us I am forced to say that I must challenge that ruling. I do not ask for an opportunity now to defend that position, although I should be glad to do so if the rules permitted. However in view of the unusual nature of the bill I must protest your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from the Speaker's ruling. The Speaker having decided that an amendment to the motion for the second reading of Bill No. 104 was out of order on the ground that it both approved and disapproved the bill, and also that it dealt with matters that should only be considered in committee on the bill, the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken) appealed from that decision.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Last evening when I moved the adjournment of the debate I noticed that there were quite a few on the front benches on the other side who were not desirous of carrying on the debate. They did not take very kindly to adjourning the house fifteen minutes early. Evidently there is a hurry to get—

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, we consented immediately to the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

An hon. MEMBER: But not with good grace.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. ABBOTT: You did it so you could get your speech all in the one Hansard.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not concerned with getting it in Hansard; I am concerned about checking the memories of hon. members opposite in connection with a lot of the promises they made during the six years this country was at war. I think the time that I will take this afternoon will be well spent because I still believe that some of them have consciences even though they have bad memories.

The matter now before the house is the principle of the bill we are now considering. That question is whether controls should be maintained in this country. I am going to take up some time this afternoon for the purpose of dealing with the principle of this bill; the mechanical details can be discussed when we are in committee, but the broad principles upon which the bill is or should be based cannot be discussed at that time. I consider, Mr. Speaker, that any time spent by this house, no matter how long it may be, in clarifying the subject matter of this bill will be time well spent, because the very principles are involved for which we fought through six years of war and sacrificed a great many of the boys of this country.

Although there are several different groups in this house debate on the bill now before us divides the house into two. The Progressive Conservative party, the Liberal party and the Social Credit party all through this debate have stated in no uncertain terms that they believe in the system of free enterprise. The group to which I belong say that they do not, but rather that they believe in a planned order of society. That places the question squarely before the house. On this subject there are only two opinions.

Let me remind some of my free enterprisers in this house that the system of free enterprise has failed us twice in one lifetime and brought about armed conflict throughout the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GILLIS: I knew I would get under somebody's skin. Throw a stone into a pack of wolves and you will hit one and it will howl. I said that I was going to try to reawaken the conscience of the members of this house, because I still believe that they have a conscience. The fact that interruptions are coming so freely shows that I was not wrong in my surmise that they still have a conscience, and it is beginning to prick them.

I have said that that order of society brought on two wars in our lifetime, and it did. You cannot deny it.

An hon. MEMBER: I certainly do.

Mr. GILLIS: History proves it. I want to remind hon. gentlemen to my left who still believe in the free enterprise system, and who in the province of Alberta at the present time are administering a kind of economy that is evidently quite satisfactory to the Tory party—

Mr. REID: Was there not a planned economy in Germany?

Mr. GILLIS: The Tory party in Alberta decided that they would not contest the province, that they had a government that was satisfactory to them.

The lessons, Mr. Speaker, that we have to learn from the last war are, first, that the system of free enterprise did not measure up. Dictators were born and bred out of selfishness and jungle law. That is the system of free enterprise. We aim to replace that kind of society by planning. There is not a member of this house who does not plan his own life, or at least he should. You plan your home.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that they should not interrupt the hon. member who has the floor. A question may be asked with his permission.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind the interruptions. It shows that I am beginning to hurt someone; I am saying something that is effective. If hon. members were reading their newspapers and paying no attention to me I would think that perhaps I was wasting my time, but I thank you, just the same, Mr. Speaker, for your assistance

I am surprised that prominent lawyers in this house who believe in the rule of law, just as we all do, and emphasize it earnestly at all times, will stand up in this house and oppose a bill which simply aims at bringing the rule of law into our economic life to replace gangsterism—and I use the word advisedly. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) yesterday placed clearly on the record of this house the fact that large corporations and companies in this country are running rampant in extracting from the people profits which no legal mind in this house could justify under present economic conditions. That is the first point I want to drive home—that we want to replace in our economic life tooth-and-claw law of the jungle with the rule of law as it exists in every other section of our society. We want a regulated order of society in which every person may have the opportunity to protect himself and his means of livelihood against unscrupulous people who want to exploit him and anyone who opposes this bill opposes that very principle.

I would remind my hon. friend who upholds the Social Credit-Tory coalition in Alberta that there were no controls in the thirties. We fought the 1914-18 war on the same slogans as those that were used in the last war. They were written by the same people. They were freedom, democracy, the right to live, homes for everyone. We came back after the 1914-18 war, and what did we find? There were no controls in the thirties except section 98 of the criminal code to control the worker, the fellow who died for you on the battlefields. When his fellow workers came back and asked you to live up to some of the promises you had made at that time, that was the kind of control they got. It was a form of control that was satisfactory to the wrong people. From 1930 to 1939 there was no government regulation of our economic affairs, and in that period we had a million and a half people unemployed and slave camps established in this country. That was a form of control that relegated to slave camps at 20 cents a day, where they were regulated and regimented, hundreds of thousands of people who had offered their lives to maintain democracy. Tear gas and the mounted police were used against them. That was a form of control in the wrong direction. Was there any freedom there? Freedom to go barefoot when you had no shoes; freedom to go hungry when you had nothing to eat; freedom to march from Vancouver to Ottawa to plead with those who sit in these great legislative chambers. No one objected to these controls except a few people like ourselves who were fighting them.

We have finished another war. I have listened in this house to many members who have expressed a fear of communism, but as I have said, the system of free enterprise has failed us twice in one lifetime, and the same seeds are being sown in this country today to defeat the ends for which we fought the last war. Again we promised the boys, the sons of the fathers to whom we made promises from 1914 to 1918, that they would come back to homes, to a new order of society; that the government would see to it that they were protected; that they would not go through the misery and degradation they experienced in the thirties. Twice in a lifetime we have given free enterprise all the rope it wanted, when it hanged and strangled the world, and we have signs enough on the North American continent to induce us to try to avert the conditions that may ensue; otherwise what happened in Europe and elsewhere will happen to us. Do not let us forget for a minute, when the country expresses fears of communism, that Karl Marx said a long time ago that capitalism had within itself the seeds of its own destruction. It will destroy itself if you leave it alone, if you give it enough rope and let it go.

We have done that twice in a lifetime, and capitalism has been destroyed in every part of the world except on the North American continent. Revolution, fascism and all the other isms about which we express fears are not common to any particular people. They are the product of a system, and we shall travel the same road if we allow that system unchanged, to prevail in the same way. Surely we have had enough lessons to take the abuses out of the system, the abuses that have destroyed the system throughout the world. This can be done only by removing fear, insecurity and all the other factors that contribute to the destruction of confidence in the minds of the people.

We cannot do much about it so far as the United States is concerned. The picture there is not so bright. We can do something about it, however, in Canada. If free enterprise is capable of doing the job, why is it that the system functions and establishes standards of living for the workers of the world only when there is a war on, when most of the young and productive people are in the armed services? Then we can pay them wages and allowances, provide pensions, provide hospitals and the best of medical services and all that kind of thing. We can do that during a war, but when these people come back to the country they come back to a different set of conditions. Notwithstanding that there are plenty of resources, plant and machinery, we relegate them once more to the street.

Why is this? It is because of lack of planning. The Conservative party does not believe in planning, except from Bay street in Toronto and Jesse James street in Montreal. They are on record as being favourable to that, and we know what to expect from it. As soon as the war was over, up went the not-wanted signs again.

I am really ashamed to say in this house what the conditions are in the maritime provinces. Listening to a newscast this morning we heard that there were over 30,000 unemployed in the maritimes. On that little island that I come from there are 2,200 ex-servicemen, most of whom never had a job in their lives before they went into the services. They were unemployed under free enterprise. They donned the uniform and offered their lives for the institutions of the country, and they came back after all these promises that were made them. But, as I say, on that little island alone there are 2,200 of these men who today are unemployed, and they write pathetic letters, as the Minister of Veterans Affairs knows.

There is no work. Everything that was functioning during the war has been closed up. Back to the streets they go. I want to say for the benefit of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) that there is a strike on there at the present time, and I want to put a question to my hon. friends over here, and over there too, because I think there are a lot of Tories over there. I want to ask if they can tell me that the coal industry in the maritime provinces is better off because of the removal of controls.

[Mr. Gillis.]

For thirty years I worked in and around that industry and witnessed the most terrible conditions, socially, underground, and from every other point of view, and the most terrible relations with the employer, because we have the toughest octopus to grapple with in Canada in Dosco—tougher than any other organization in the country. There are no human values whatsoever so far as the management or the directorate of that organization is concerned.

During this war, with the establishment of national control in that industry, there was a different condition. I say without fear of contradiction, that the establishment of a national labour relations board, which took the whole industry and centralized it in Ottawa meant that, for the first time in my life or in my experience in that industry, we got away from Dosco's machine. Demands were made, the national board met with the Minister of Reconstruction, who handled the industry practically all through the war, and there were no strikes, no difficulties; wages were stepped up to some extent; vacations with pay was established, and people in that part of the country were beginning to want to live.

In December, 1946, the federal government removed these controls and passed them back to the provincial government, and when you pass them back to the provincial government you pass complete control back to an agency of that corporation. That is all they are, an agency of the corporation. The executive board of the mine workers' union tried to work out an agreement, but there was no agreement—you cannot come into Ottawa; the controls are off. No more subsidies; we have to get back to free enterprise and give them the right to run the show themselves.

Well, they have run that show for a long time. The price of coal in this province has gone up approximately $3 a ton because of the removal of subsidies. That industry cannot pay wages in Nova Scotia because of the removal of production subsidies and the assistance the corporation was getting. I am not saying they were entitled to all the assistance they extracted from the government, but I say that was because this government lacked the machinery to scrutinize and check reports and balance sheets of the twenty-six subsidiary organizations by which that company can juggle costs around. It is pretty hard to chase them unless you are there all the time. Unless the federal government steps into the picture and takes that strike out of the hands of the provincial and local authorities, and reestablishes some kind of machinery in Ottawa to settle it, the province of Nova Scotia will be depleted in a very short time. Hundreds of men who were in that industry during this war are leaving Nova Scotia and seeking work in other parts of Canada, because apparently no one is trying to do anything in the way of settling that strike.

I mention this merely because I want to drive home the point of controls. It all adds up to public responsibility. When a member is elected to the House of Commons, or a government is formed, the people who send that member here or delegate power to the government expect that government to give them leadership and to supervise the economy of the country and see that everyone is guaranteed the right to live in the country, that someone does not make a million dollars while another is on relief. That is their job, and when I hear some of our provincial people who believe in retaining provincial autonomy talking, they have been overseers of the poor for thirty years. That is all they are. There has been no government in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island. They want to hang on to something that exalts themselves. It is that vanity of man again, wanting to hang on to a little bit of power for himself.

I would never try to defend our provincial premier about the bickering and squabbling that he goes on with in this matter of provincial rights. This is where the power rests. There must be some central direction, and the people of Nova Scotia under the federal proposals would have been a hundred per cent better off than they could be in dealing with that little ox-cart government down there. I strongly urge what I suggested before to the Minister of Reconstruction—and I have a great deal of respect for him, too. There must be a great many Tories over there who keep him back, because I think that as an engineer and a practical man he knows the problem and wants to get things done, never mind the money. That is the proper attitude. There is something over there holding him back or he would have settled that strike, provided the necessary subsidies or got some kind of machinery in action. I suggest to him that he try to get together with the Minister of Labour and come to some understanding. It looks bad to see this situation: the Minister of Reconstruction makes a statement in the house to the effect—I think this was on April 1—that he was prepared to sit down with the industry and the union and work out some kind of subsidy arrangement by which that matter might be settled.

Mr. HOMUTH: That was April Fool's day.

Mr. KNOWLES: The date of your amendment.

Mr. GILLIS: Regardless of what date it was, the statement was made publicly and officially by a member of the cabinet. Then a few days later there is a statement from the Department of Labour—not from the minister but from some of his officials—to the effect that no subsidies will be provided to clean up that problem in Nova Scotia. I suggest that they get together.

I am not sure that my friends to my right or their coalition on our extreme left can stand up in this house and tell me that the coal industry, the steel industry, the shipping industry, the fishing industry, or the textile industry—all basic industries in this country—are better off today than they were during this war when the government were planning production, allocating materials, and supervising the general income of the country. There is no comparison. If it could be done in time of war, there is no reason why it should not be a hundred per cent easier to do it in time of peace. I cannot understand it. I would advise my Conservative friends over there to do a little checking up. They are venomous on this matter of controls and free enterprise. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—I am sorry he is not here now—is a man for whom I have a great deal of respect. He is a lawyer, a good reasoner, and logical in practically everything except where he sits. On this matter of controls he gave the Conservative party some very good advice back in 1942. Speaking at the business men's club in Toronto, he said this:

> No one can successfully argue that principles of the Victorian era can cope with the conditions in times that produce Sir Stafford Cripps, (a socialist) as deputy prime minister (of Britain), and William Temple as Archbishop of Canterbury.

He goes on to tell about that kind of thing, but the meat of his remarks is farther down, where he says, "Bureaucracy is danger". The article reads:

> Mr. Diefenbaker said the danger exists of government by bureaucracy after the war.
> "The Liberal party today stands for reaction, the C.C.F. for complete nationalization, which will destroy private enterprise," he said. "The Conservative party must meet this challenge that comes to it and show the people that our economic system shall continue to be one of free enterprise under stringent control . . ."

The caption of the article was "Advises Tories to Modernize".

Mr. MacINNIS: How could the Tories modernize?

Mr. GILLIS: That was in 1942. They did modernize to this extent: the word "progressive" is a modern term, and they adopted it on that advice.

Mrs. STRUM: Twenty years too late.

Mr. GILLIS: If you listen to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) or the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) or any member of this group, you may say: Those fellows are just propagating for their own cause—the socialist cause. But this advice was not given by a socialist, and it should be seriously taken.

Mr. LOW: Propagation, you mean?

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly. That is the only way you can create things. Let me read a short statement by another person who is not a socialist. I heard the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) one evening quoting the Pope's encyclical. I do not believe in bringing religion into a discussion of this kind, because a man's religion is a matter between himself and his God. But I do say this. For nineteen hundred years we have been preaching Christianity and it is nearly time we began to put it into practice. We certainly have not been practising it, judging by conditions in the world for the last fifty years at least. I am going to quote Monsignor J. A. Ryan, National Catholic Welfare Conference. This is a statement he made in 1943 and I would advise the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) to listen carefully:

> Unless the middle classes—that is, the comfortable farmers, the members of the professions, the small business men, the holders of executive and directive positions in the great corporations, and indeed the majority of the "white collar" classes—cease to get their opinions from the daily papers and strive to acquire a greater amount of realistic economic intelligence, they (the middle classes) may exercise sufficient voting power to place the champions of "free enterprise" in control of economic reconstruction after the war. From such a calamity, may the Good Lord deliver us.

That is not from a socialist. That is from a person who is realistic, and who learned a lesson from the last two wars.

While we know where the Conservatives stand in this matter of controls and the planned economy, we are doubtful about where the present government stands, because since the termination of the war they have paid lip service to controls, have spoken of trying to avoid exploitation, and all that kind of stuff; and I think most of the people who make those statements really mean them at the time. But we have been watching. The cost of living is going up. No public works programme of any kind has been instituted. Practically all the war assets built up by the people during the war have been scrapped without being put to productive use. The ranks of the unemployed are beginning to swell. There are rumblings from the farmer, the industrial worker and the white collar worker, who I think perhaps has suffered a worse squeeze than either the farmer or the worker, from the standpoint of taxes, because he is in between, on a fixed salary, and has had to take the squeeze from both sides. That cannot continue for very long without a smash-up of some kind. I want to say in all sincerity that perhaps in 1939 Hitler saved us from a revolution on this continent. If any serious minded person will look back at the conditions which existed in 1938 and 1939 right across Canada and throughout the United States he will realize that had they lasted for another six months without a bust-up of some kind we would have had serious internal disturbances in this country. We do not want a set-back now which would allow that sort of thing to develop again.

There is only one way to avoid that. We have two alternatives, either to go to war or to create employment. The people of this country do not expect too much. They want jobs; they want houses. They are quite prepared to work for them and produce. They do not want charity; they do not want handouts. They want to live as decent citizens, and they have that right. Those were the promises we made them while we were fighting the war. Personally I am ashamed of the conditions that exist in the part of the country from which I come. They should not exist, and they could have been avoided if the government had accepted its responsibility. Only yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) definitely stated that all the subsidies were coming off. When you knock off the subsidies under this form of society you destroy price ceilings. You cannot hold down prices without subsidies unless you have in the field an army of policemen checking everything that is sold. But you can hold down prices and redistribute income by means of subsidies. They are not appreciable to every industry; in many cases they are not necessary, but they are necessary in some of the basic industries, and should be continued. When the Minister of Finance, speaking for the government, makes the statement that they have officially decided to discontinue the subsidy arrangements, then he tells us there is no longer any desire on the part of the government to manage the economy of the country, because it can only be done in that way under this form of society.

I am coming to the end of my time, Mr. Speaker. I could inject many matters into this discussion. I hope some member of the cabinet will speak before this debate is concluded, and I should like him to answer two or three questions; I think it is necessary at this time. In its issue of April 12, 1947, the Montreal Gazette carried a story from Ottawa that the government is carefully scrutinizing price increases arising out of the recent release from control of thousands of goods and services, and will move without delay to reimpose price ceilings in any case where the increase appears to be unreasonable or exorbitant. I should like some member of the cabinet, if and when he speaks, to tell us if that is really government policy. If so, what checks are they maintaining on the situation? Why has no action been taken so far in connection with such items as newsprint? These are three questions on which I think the Canadian people, and particularly members of this house, want some reassurance.

In conclusion I want to repeat what I said when I started, that as far as I can see there are only two opinions in this house on this question of free enterprise as opposed to a managed economy. As I see it, the attitude in all corners of the house is opposed to the attitude taken by this party. Our policy is clear-cut. There is no equivocation when we say that if we were in power we would establish a managed or planned economy in this country. We would go to the mat with anyone extracting more than his share of the national income, and would see to it that everyone was provided with a means of life. Is it not startling to realize that in a country such as this a large section of the population cannot get enough to eat?

Mr. McCANN: Nonsense.

Mr. GILLIS: The Minister of National Revenue says that is nonsense. It is not. In 1945 I travelled through sections of the province of New Brunswick where soldiers back from this war were existing on parish relief of $6 a week. Can you look after a family on that? I can take you to section after section in any part of Canada today and show you hundreds of unemployed ex-service men whose credits have run out, who cannot get relief of any kind, who cannot get jobs, and who are existing with no income at all.

Mr. MARIER: They refuse jobs.

Mr. GILLIS: No, they do not refuse jobs at all. If the government will pay their transportation I will send 2,200 ex-service men tomorrow to any part of Canada where jobs are available.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will take you up on that.

Mr. GILLIS: All right; you get the jobs for me. If the government will provide transportation and employment—I am not quibbling now—I will send a wire tonight and have a mobilization of these people. They will take the work.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Maybe you talk too much.

Mr. GILLIS: No, I am not talking too much. According to a newscast this morning selective service officers in that part of the country—that is your own officials of the regional employment service—meeting in Moncton yesterday said there were 30,000 registered unemployed in the maritimes who cannot be placed. If the Minister of Labour has issued any directives as to where there is employment for these men in Canada, and there is any machinery by means of which they can be shipped to those places, the director of employment services in the maritimes does not know anything about it. I heard that statement myself on the nine o'clock news broadcast this morning, arising from a meeting held yesterday to deal with the question of employment in the maritimes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. GILLIS: I shall conclude; I will follow up the matter later with the Minister of Labour.

After listening to this debate for a number of days I am reminded of a story. You see, sometimes the Conservatives want controls and sometimes they do not want them. On the other side over there they are strong for them, but they are taking them all off. The Social Crediters want nothing except the right to print money.

Mr. LOW: And that is more socialistic drivel.

Mr. GILLIS: It reminds me of the story about the chap who was going down the street one day with one foot on the curb and the other in the gutter. He walked some distance that way, until a police officer came along, stopped him, and said, "What is the matter with you? I think you are drunk". "Gosh" he said, "I'm glad to find that out. I thought I was crippled". And that is about the way the house is—one leg up and one leg down. And we suggest it is pretty nearly time they made up their minds where they are going.

Mr. DAVID A. CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Easter vacation and the decontrol measures taken before and during that time gave all of us an unusual opportunity not only to feel the pulse of our constituencies but actually to take stock. The people I met during that time were greatly disturbed about our decontrol measures. I met people in all walks of life, and found the same complaint on every side. Somehow or other they got the impression that we in this house do not realize that laissez-faire is dead and buried. There are still some who believe there are hon. members in the house who feel that the good old days ought to be brought back—the good old days of no government intervention, the good old days of the thirties, when we had the complete freedom of action which brought false booms and real depressions.

Many people have a different understanding of free enterprise and laissez-faire. To me it means that if business is left alone it will work in such a manner as to bring about ideal economic conditions for the average man. Yet it overlooks one important truism, that industry is based upon the profit motive. While I have nothing against the profit motive as such, there are times when there is a clash between the justifiable interests of the business man and those of the consumer. Under those conditions the function of government is to act as a brake, when industry, so to speak, tries to run away with itself. In other words there will be times when controls are not only desirable but essential; and, so far we in this country have no complaint. Controls have not failed us, nor have they been the cause of shortages. During the war the government used successfully the device of controls to divert the tremendous output of industry to the interests of the state—which at that time was the fullest prosecution of the war. Now in these critical and emergent years of peace we must take these same forces and use them, but not, as some political thinkers would suggest, to bring industry back to normal. To my mind that is a label only, and one which hides a multitude of iniquities. As we saw in the thirties, in the titanic struggle of economic forces the small man was crushed.

The outstanding economic factor in our economy today is scarcity. So long as economic scarcity is with us, industry can use it to achieve its own gains. After all, it is not the function of either the landlord or the mill owner to run his business for the benefit of the public. The true function, as they see it, is to produce profits; and it would be naive for us to assume otherwise, or to ask them to run their business in an altruistic manner. The good business man is not operating for the sake of charity; and if scarcity presents him with an opportunity, he takes advantage of it. If for instance, there is greater promise of gain from building glamorous moving picture theatres or elaborate night clubs rather than houses, how many business men would forgo the greater profit for the greater need? But it is only by the will of the people as expressed through parliament that we can force industry to work for the common good as well as for its own good.

As I see it therefore, so long as the element of scarcity prevails—and none of us can predict how long that will be—we dare not decontrol too fast. And that we are doing at the present time. In normal times there was always a check of monopolistic tendencies within a healthy business organism by what economists call the marginal producer, the man who was ready to compete at a small rate of profit. But today, when goods are scarce, there is no incentive for such marginal production. We have on the one hand a great shortage of commodities at home and abroad, and on the other hand a comparative abundance of money, although the situation at the present time is tighter than it was a year ago, as many businessmen will agree. In an uncontrolled economy what is the result? Demand forces prices up. Previous wage scales become obsolete with the rising cost of living, and you have the whole inflationary spiral of skyrocketing prices and costs which can only end in disaster.

There is a remedy; there is an alternative, and that alternative is controls. If the situation is not too far gone—and it is not in this instance—and if business men are prepared to work together for the good of the country and their own good, then we can rely on industry to control itself without any need for government intervention. So far it must be admitted that industry has not done a good job of self-control. I have only to ask the house to refer to the speech delivered yesterday by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) in which he quoted figures giving some indication of the abnormal profits of corporations. I picked up the Globe and Mail of April 12 and on the financial page I found the following headlines:

Zeller's sales and profits hit a fifteen year peak.
St. Regis Paper sets new record.
Hiram Walker profits up 58·7 per cent
Consolidated Bakeries lifts profit 22 cents share.
Gurney Foundry profit is $6.46 against $2.08.
Atlas Steels earns 96 cents against 61.

And on and on, all in the one day. Then I recall reading a report on the same page that a movie corporation had had the highest earnings in the history of the company, yet admission prices were raised throughout the length and breadth of this country. Are these indications that the Canadian business man is waking up to his responsibilities? Frankly I do not think he is. Despite what I have said about the profit motive and private enterprise I think the average business man has enough common sense and enough patriotism to impose his own controls once he becomes fully aware of the dangers inherent in a runaway situation. The words uttered yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are reported in the Montreal Gazette of this morning, and he is reported as saying that the government would reimpose controls in any case where it was felt that the public was being exploited.

It is well for the house to know that some time ago jute bags were decontrolled. There were none on the market; they were not available, but within forty-eight hours after the order came into effect they were available at double the previous price. The government immediately reimposed the control, and today they can be bought at a reasonable price.

In referring to the business man I am not talking about the fly-by-nighters who come up from nowhere on the strength of a few quick killings. I am thinking of the firms who were here ten and twenty years ago and who will still be here ten and twenty years from now when the quick-profit boys are dead and gone. They are the ones who have everything to gain from a policy of control and self-control until such time as we level out our economy and the normal checks and balances of a free economic society can come into play.

I conceive then of decontrol as neither a quick process of throwing the book out the window and going back to business as usual, nor a long-drawn-out process of hanging on to a horde of irksome regulations until that elusive will-o'-the-wisp called normalcy returns. Precipitous decontrol will start us down the primrose path of higher prices with consequent consumer resistance, wage demands and the inevitable strikes and unemployment with ultimate frustration. By our haste I believe that we will defeat the very purpose we are setting out to achieve. The time has come for the government to stop decontrolling and to reexamine the position of the articles or commodities that have been decontrolled.

During the war years we took away, in whole or in part, some of the most cherished prerogatives of private industry. We told industry what to produce, how much to produce and how much profit to make. If we had not, perhaps industry would have made a great deal more money than it actually did; although I would say in passing that when you recall that last year Canadian corporations realized net profits after taxation of half a billion dollars one is forced to the conclusion that industry has not done badly under controls. By its present conduct capital, which has the most to gain from the free enterprise system, is fouling its own nest by exacting the large and abnormal profits that have been referred to in this house during the last few days.

I view decontrol as a process of letting controls go as quickly as is compatible with the welfare of the little man, to the point where government can hand the whole thing back to private enterprise and say, "You take it from here." A realization by business men of the heavy responsibilities that are theirs today will speed up this reconversion. The sooner they are prepared to exercise self-control, the sooner will we be able to dispense with government control.

In the meantime, for the protection of everyone, a large measure of official control must remain. Our affirmative decision on this point will be met with approval by the little man throughout Canada. As for the comparatively few who will object—they are really a small minority, but they make a noise like a majority—I would say that they are guilty of selfish or illogical thinking. Let us give them the benefit of the doubt by saying that they are only illogical, and let us point out to them that those who oppose controls in principle or in fact are blindly evoking the attitudes of bygone years when planning and controls were linked with the totalitarianism of Germany and Italy.

Many of these people reason that Hitler and Mussolini imposed a controlled economy on their countries and that all kinds of evils followed as a natural result—loss of liberty, persecution, regimentation, mass murder, and war. They are convinced that if we hold on to the few controls that remain we shall be selling the freedom of this country down the river—quite overlooking the fact that Britain, probably the most largely controlled English speaking country in the world today, is also the one in which the flame of freedom burns the brightest. Only persons who have little faith in democracy should live in fear of democratic controls. People have come to take for granted the exercise of economic controls which prior to the war they would have called totalitarian. We must not forget that the little people of this country do not merely accept controls; they actually want them, and they do not want to go back to the days of false booms and real depressions.

Something has been said about planning. Corporations do not grow up like Topsy. They are planned, they are blue-printed. The better the plans, the better the corporation; the better the corporation, usually the better the plans. If it is a good thing for a corporation to plan, why is it not a good thing for the individual to plan? Why should not many individuals plan? Why not have the government plan for individuals? After all, planning is not the exclusive property of socialist or totalitarian countries; it is also a healthy ingredient of the new democracy. The little people are weak; they lack buying resistance. Their needs are immediate—food clothing, rent—and their bargaining capacity is weak. They know this and they look to parliament to plan for them. They remember well how we planned during the war and what a good job we did, and they look to us for a continuation of planning in the post-war period.

I believe that the people have always been in favour of controls and they call for the retention of essential controls. The uncertainty of life in an unbalanced economy makes this a "must" for the little man. The recently announced increase of ten per cent in rentals means an immediate rise in the cost of living, which is placing an unbearable burden on the shoulders of people who cannot take it. The low income group, the people on fixed incomes, the white-collar workers, are finding times in this country hard in the midst of the greatest corporation profits in our history. How do we justify it? How do we explain it? How do we reconcile it?

Labour made certain gains across the board last year in an attempt to bring their earnings into line with the then high cost of living. The gains they achieved did not put them ahead of the game—they only compensated for the years when wages were frozen and the cost of living got ahead of them. Last year's wage gains were not prospective—they were retroactive. They took up some of the slack between wages and prices as they were last summer, but they were not a cushion against rising prices in the future. In other words it was not a question of their gains being wiped out by the increased cost of living in the past year, they have actually lost ground, and once more the prices-wages equation is being tipped dangerously to their disadvantage.

I ask the members of this house to look to the south and take note of what is happening in the United States on the labour front. Let it not happen here. I know that the question uppermost in the minds of the members of this house and the people of Canada is this: How long will our economy need the controlling hand of government? How quickly can that hand be relaxed? I confess, Mr. Speaker, I do not know the answer. I know that we cannot bring about decontrol on a fixed time-table. Conditions and events, not only in Canada but all over the world, have a direct bearing on the problem. If there is a strike in the motor industry in the United States it will be only a matter of three weeks before our factories are closed. If we are unfortunate enough to have a coal strike in the United States it will probably be only a month before our factories will feel it. Any large strike in the United States affects us economically almost as much as it does the state of Texas. And so we have to keep our eyes open. We cannot remove control on a fixed time-table. We must face the issue and see it clearly. The issue is not whether we should have controls or no controls. The problem for Canada is whether we should have more or fewer controls. Apart from the real need there is to hang on to some essential controls until we have levelled off our economy, the fact remains that people have tasted the benefits of a Canadian planned economy and are not going to give it up lightly. They like it.

The last decontrol order has had a disturbing effect. Today decontrol is unrealistic. With savings down from last year, with production and inventories up, with profits never higher in the history of this country, despite the ruin that was to come to us from last year's strikes with prices escalating, but up, and with labour straining but acting restrained, the time has come for a decision.

This debate on controls has been going on for weeks, and while we have been talking the government has been whittling away at the subject matter of our debate. The recent increase in rentals is a case in point. I should have liked to see the ten per cent increase in rentals made conditional on the landlord's renovating and repairing the premises, but there it is. Time is running out and I urge most strongly that we make up our minds now, while there is still something left to make up our minds about.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly encouraged by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) who has just spoken. Someone on this side of the house said that all the Tories were not on this side of the chamber, meaning of course that there were some Tories over there. I am sure that the hon. member for Spadina is not one of them.

I had not intended to take any part in this debate, because I thought that most of the things that could be said had already been said. I rise today not altogether because of of the fact that I am fresh from an Easter vacation but because from the contacts with my own constituents in the city of Saskatoon I have become convinced that if I have any mandate here at all it is a mandate from the housewives, the workers, the pensioners, the civil servants and the salaried people, ninety per cent of the ordinary people of this country, to give voice to their universal demand that this government halt the release of price controls, and that it reimpose those which have been released and have resulted in a rise in the price of the commodities of life.

I was interested to hear the unanimity with which my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has just now been attacked from all sides of the house. I might tell a little story about my recent trip to Saskatoon. Everyone in the house in the last day or two has been a little political, and I was amused at the shadow-boxing—I will explain my reason for calling it that in a moment—that took place in the house yesterday between the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt). Out where I come from there is a hurrying and a scurrying to and fro and a wondering about what is to be done about the next provincial election. We have fights in this house between Liberal and Tory, and I characterized them a few moments ago as shadow-boxing. On the surface they look tremendously genuine, and yet I cannot conceive how parties who are at each other's throats almost literally in this house should be such good friends in other parts of the country. I find, for instance, that the Liberal executive in my own constituency met some time ago and decided that one candidate and only one should run in the forthcoming provincial election, although we have a two-candidate constituency so far as provincial matters are concerned. But it was decided on Monday to run only one candidate.

I have another clipping here from the Star-Phoenix, which says that Rupert Ramsay, provincial leader of the Progressive Conservative party, said that he would not oppose a plan whereby Conservatives and Liberals cooperate in certain constituencies to fight the C.C.F. in the next election. Then let us come to the supreme authority, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), provincial Liberal leader. He said:

> If Saskatoon Liberals feel they can elect only one candidate, and decide to put all their weight into that election—

The rest of the clipping is to the effect that they will have his blessing. It is quite apparent that they do not think they can elect more than one candidate, because another prominent Liberal said a day or so later, "We cannot win here with two candidates as I see it." And so the thing goes on. My Social Credit friends may seem a little neglected and they will coalesce with anyone where they think they can get a little support.

Mr. FAIR: In the interests of the common people.

Mr. KNIGHT: If my hon. friend wishes me to answer that question, perhaps he would like me to read this clipping, which comes from Saskatoon—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon. member that we are considering Bill No. 104, the second reading, and he must discuss the principle of the bill. He is referring to a debate which took place on a motion yesterday to go into supply. I would ask him to discuss the present bill.

Mr. KNIGHT: Mr. Speaker, I admit some guilt in the matter, but I do feel, since this matter has been introduced, that perhaps I should do something about it. Perhaps I would be permitted to answer the hon. member's question—it practically amounted to a question—and that done, I promise that I shall return to the business before the house. This is a report of a Social Credit convention and it states: "Social Credit convention attracts only three persons". Apparently Doctor Haldeman was there, and there were two others. They did not admit the press, or there would have been four. As regards my hon. friend's question, it says that social crediters may cooperate with other parties. Doctor Haldeman says they can do so if they desire—with, I presume, the qualification which my hon. friend has stated—provided that it is in the interests of the country. And after all, when three good men and true believe that, there must be something in it.

To come back to the question, or rather to initiate the question of controls, I am a believer in controls so long as I think the controls are, as my hon. friend has suggested, for the good of the country at large. There was a protest by certain women in this country not very long ago, a delegation of western women. I followed with some interest the eastern press comments on that delegation. The eastern press was practically unanimous in saying that the movement was communist-inspired. Perhaps it was to some extent, but I know for a fact that they were not all communists. However I would advise the government, whether there be some truth in the suggestion or not, that they had better not take comfort from that fact or try to get behind it, because I think that, irrespective of what people had given the delegation their blessing, their cause was supported by all the women of the country, if not vocally, at least in their hearts and minds.

The government's idea would seem to be that the release of controls does not necessarily mean an increase in prices. The theory which we have heard expounded time and again by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) is that the throwing off of controls will so stimulate production that supply will quickly equate demand and prices will level off. I do not think that assumption has proved to be valid in the experience of the United States, nor do I think it is valid in the light of our experience here. The minister himself, I believe, pointed out what had happened in the United States in the matter of an increase in prices when he was defending the idea of continued control, even if that continued control were only for a short period.

I would ask him whether, in his opinion, the removal of these ceilings has not been to some degree contributory to that result. I think the government's policy is most inconsistent in the matter. The Minister of Justice, when he rose in his place to introduce this legislation in its various stages, knew that he had to defend the policy of controls, a control which, it is true, he was asking only for the period of one year. But it had to be defended, and in defending it he gave some interesting information.

He said that during the war—I believe it was from 1942 to 1946—in each year of that period these controls had saved the consumers of the country a billion and a half dollars. I believe, although I did not check this, that someone said these controls had saved us about fifty-five dollars for each dollar they had cost us for their operation. We were told by the Minister of Justice and by other members on that side of the house that the too hasty abandonment of controls would produce chaos, and the minister warned us—this time the Minister of Justice himself, I believe —about the plight of the salaried worker, the white-collar man, the wage-earner, the pensioned person and so forth. And then, having traced the tremendous benefits that these controls had brought during the war, he said almost in the same breath, "Of course, it is our policy to get rid of the thing as soon as possible." I will admit there was a qualification. I am not quoting him, but he made the qualification, "as quickly as conditions permit". I say that in justice to him.

[Mr. Knight.]

My point is that the conditions do not yet permit, and that is evidenced by the steadily increasing prices of commodities in this country. Members of the cabinet have talked of orderly decontrol. I think it has ceased to be that, and has become decontrol in unholy haste. On the very day that the right hon. gentleman was advancing such eloquent arguments for the maintenance of certain price ceilings, and introducing price legislation which would preserve that maintenance, we find his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) cutting the ground from under the feet of such legislation by releasing numerous items from under these ceilings.

Going to my home at Easter time, I found that we were paying higher prices for simple little things, the things that aggravate the cost of living. I would bring this to the attention of the government, which is usually politically conscious. I do not see why it should be so freely butting its head against the wall of public opinion. We are paying eight cents for chocolate bars, and an increase of one cent a pound for sugar; we are threatened with a ten per cent increase in rents under certain conditions; there are increases in the price of tea, coffee, soap, fuel, shirts if you can get one, and all the rest of it; jams, shortening and practically everything else.

May I remind this usually astute government that everybody—rich or poor—is taking note of these things, and, in particular, of the cost of the things which I have mentioned, which comprise a great part of the purchases of those in the lower income brackets. The man in the higher salary brackets, who spends a lesser proportion of his income on living, is not much affected by the prices of these simple things, but to a great many other people they mean the difference between decent living and a stringent economy.

The government is, of course, aware of these things. I have here something put out by the government, by a publications bureau of some sort. The series is "Wartime Controls" by the wartime information board of Ottawa, September 12, 1944, in which this statement appears:

> Uncontrolled inflation is a severe and unfair form of taxation. Under conditions of inflation, while some wages and salaries may keep pace with increases in prices, wages and salaries in general can never keep abreast of increases in the cost of living.

I think that is true. Wages are now lagging behind. The logical thing now is for another increase in wages to keep up with increased prices, and there we go in that famous old merry-go-round to which a lack of planning apparently always leads. I continue the quotation:

> For that section of the population living on pensions, annuities and other forms of small savings bringing in a fixed income, inflation spells disaster, poverty and hardship.

To continue with another clause in the same document:

> Economic stabilization is necessary to protect the savings of the Canadian people. Most Canadians have saved something for the proverbial rainy day. They have put money into savings accounts, purchased insurance policies, annuities and other types of fixed dollar investments (those which bring in the same number of dollars regardless of what they will buy).

Might I say that those dollars do not buy as much now as they did when those people invested them? I know, from experience with my own friends, that they are, little by little, step by step, withdrawing their savings from the bank, withdrawing their bonds and selling them in order to eke out their wages and salaries in an attempt—a temporary and perhaps foolish one—to preserve the standard of living which they had been accustomed to during the war.

I speak here in what I conceive to be the interests of the people of my constituency, and I fancy they are very much like the people in other constituencies. This is a burning question in my own city. It is the thing about which people are talking most. I noticed the other day in the report of the Gallup poll that right up at the top of the list of things about which the people are now concerned—I mean regarding government matters and legislation—is the item of the rising costs of the necessities of life. I found there was practically no disagreement among the people of all shades of opinion whom I represent, with the argument that I am advancing here today. I know that argument would not be advanced by everyone in this country. It would not be advanced by those who ordinarily get their excellent standard of living from selling goods to the Canadian people. I would not fancy, for instance, that the manufacturers would advocate such a policy. They tell us that increased prices are necessary to meet increased wages, expenses and so forth. If we were to examine that statement, aided by certain statistics, we would find what was advanced by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) yesterday, and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) advanced the same argument today, so I shall not weary the house with a recital of the tremendously increased profits and dividends of these great companies and corporations for the year 1946 as compared with the year 1945. But the figures are reliable. They were quoted, I think yesterday, from the Financial Post. I do not think these companies need any particular relief. They are doing quite nicely. And so this government—and I must say it, though reluctantly—by deliberate action, has increased the cost of living in such degree as it has abandoned the price ceiling. The government has, in so doing, ignored the protests of the people of this country, protests which have been expressed in many places and notably in this house, when one remembers the result of the vote at the last session on the question of the milk subsidy. It has flouted the will of the people as expressed by parliament.

The fact is that wages and small salaries, even those which have been increased, cannot be stretched any farther to cover any increased cost of living. Yesterday, when the Minister of Finance made a statement I noticed that he said, "Let the law of supply and demand operate; we are going to get back to the position where the law of supply and demand will operate." Well, the truth is that the law of supply and demand is being more and more interfered with. One has only to read the report on cartels to prove that to his own satisfaction. Control is constantly and generally exercised; and this party would rather that it be exercised by a government composed of representatives of the people of the country than that it be exercised by those interests which are opposed to the interests of the great masses of the people and are interested, first of all—I shall not say altogether, but first of all—in their own gain. The Minister of Finance said that a wise industrialist would moderate his own profits voluntarily. Might I for a moment use the vernacular and say, "What a hope!" The days of benevolent despotism are over. I do not think a modern industrialist has the same ideas of benevolence as had the feudal barons. I think it is too much to hope. In the state of things as they are, is it sensible, since success is so generally measured in terms of money and power, that we can expect that from the modern industrialist? Nowadays the modern industrialist, when a concern does not pay, shuts it down and would like to throw his workers into the lap of a benevolent government. Those things have not been always so.

If I may digress here for a moment, I shall recall the case of a linen manufacturer who lived in the country I came from. That man was benevolent. He was not even a despot. He was the great man in that little country place, and there were linen mills there. This was in the north of Ireland, and those hon. members who know the history of that country will know what the linen industry meant to that land for many years. Then the day came when the linen business began to go down. Women ceased to wear linen clothes. People ceased to use heavy linen tablecloths and the business began to deteriorate. This man had accumulated a certain amount of money and he had a very fine estate. He looked after two or three villages, and he had one or two mills. Things began to go bad. That man did not dismiss an employee. That was most uneconomic, our modern industrialist would say. Certain industrialists even then said that, but he refused to change his method. This had been his father's business before him. These were his people and he felt a certain responsibility for them. To make a long story short, I shall merely say that he kept that business running until he had mortgaged every stick of his own and until he himself was in the same condition, as far as wealth or the lack of it was concerned, as the people who worked for him. That type of benevolence is not very evident in the industrial world today, nor would I reasonably expect that it should be. We think, of course, there is something that we could substitute for feudalism.

To conclude these few remarks, I would say simply that I am in favour of any scheme or any control which will preserve for the people of this country in time of peace at least the standard of living they attained during the war. While I am on my feet I should like in a word or two to express my ideas about this business of regulation, this business of freedom, this business of individual liberty. No man in his senses in this house would say that I or those around me believe in enslaving anybody, least of all ourselves. I believe men of good will have the same objects in view. I do not know of anyone in this group who does not value his personal liberty and freedom. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) rides this subject on almost every occasion, and if I might say so without being rude, rides it to death.

In my opinion a certain amount of regulation is necessary. To me freedom is not licence. To me some regulation is necessary, with the sole object that we may attain that freedom which all men desire. That is how I look at this subject, and I shall leave it at that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I thought perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) would be closing the debate. If he is not going to speak I should like to direct a question to him before the motion is put; and before sitting down I should like to outline the position in which the members of this house find themselves because of the unprecedented nature of this bill and the fact that our amendment has been ruled out of order.

The question I wish to direct to the Minister of Justice is this. The measure before us is described as an act to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war. It is popularly known as the omnibus bill. It consists of eight sections, of which I take it the important one is section 2, and it includes a long schedule outlining the names and numbers of some fifty-seven orders in council. Perhaps the minister would say, if not before the vote, then as soon as we go into committee, just what procedure he suggests should be followed in the discussion, most of which I imagine will take place on section 2.

With respect to the measure itself, as I have said it seeks to put into one statute some fifty-seven orders in council which were passed in time of war. The motion now before us is that the bill be given second reading. As hon. members know, an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), which amendment was declared by His Honour the Speaker to be out of order, so that we are now dealing with the main motion. In that situation we have no choice but to either vote for all these fifty-seven orders in council or to vote against them all. That is the position in which we on this side of the house object to being placed. We think it is a position in which the members of this house should not have been placed, a position where we have to support all these measures or to oppose them all. As a matter of fact we do not oppose some of them, but we do oppose others. And we oppose certain of the wide powers which, under this legislation, are left with officials. It is clear, therefore that, no matter how members vote, they are likely to be misrepresented with respect to certain sections of the bill.

In order to protest against that procedure and the position in which members are placed by the government including some fifty-seven different subjects in one bill, we moved the amendment to which I have referred and which was ruled out of order. In his decision Mr. Speaker was supported by the members of the government and the C.C.F. party.

I have no doubt this measure will pass, because it is supported by government members as well as by some members on this side of the house. Let me repeat; some aspects of the bill we can support; some we must oppose, and some of the wide powers it contains we must also oppose. In the circumstances in which we find ourselves; in view of the fact that the measure will go forward; and since we can support some of it and are opposed to other portions, we in this section of the house will vote against the bill at this stage.

That is all I wish to say at the moment, other than to ask the Minister of Justice to indicate, either now or later, the procedure he intends to follow when the bill reaches the committee stage.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the right hon. Minister of Justice speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has endeavoured to place before the house the position in which the members of his party find themselves with respect to this bill. I should like to say a few words about the position in which we of this group find ourselves. Unlike the leader of the opposition and his followers, it has been our intention right from the start to support the second reading of this bill, and from time to time we have so indicated. However I may say that we support the measure because we would not be satisfied with anything less at this stage in our country, but we are by no means satisfied with the extent to which it goes. In saying that, I have in mind the limitation placed in the bill upon the principle of price control, and also the fact that the bill gives the government power to revoke price control at any time in whole or in part, which is now happening from day to day. I also have in mind the views I have expressed repeatedly with regard to other matters covered in the bill, such as old age pensions. We are by no means satisfied with a bill that simply extends the present $25 for a period of time. We believe that long before this the government should have given us an opportunity to vote on its proposed amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act itself, and boost the pension to some reasonable amount. However though we are not satisfied with the extent to which the bill goes, we state quite clearly that this country could not get along with anything less, could not run the risk of the chaos that would ensue if this bill were not passed, and for that reason we intend to support it.

I want to say further, though, that we do not feel the house has yet had an opportunity to express itself clearly, by means of a vote, on the basic principle that is before us, so far as controls are concerned. There has been a good deal of arguing between hon. members on the government side and those in the official opposition; but in principle there is very little difference between them. Spokesmen for the Progressive Conservative party contend that controls should be brought to an end immediately. The position taken by most speakers on the Liberal side of the house is that controls should be brought to an end, but more slowly, and through what is called a programme of orderly decontrol. The only difference between those two positions is one of timing. Both agree that controls should come to an end, and that we should get back to what is called a free economy.

When we in this group refer sincerely to this talk of getting back to a free economy as a process of returning to what we had in the thirties, we are met with some rude interjections. We are told sometimes that we do not believe it ourselves, and that we are resorting to soap-box oratory, and that sort of thing. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is quite clearly what we are heading for, if we go back to what is called a free economy. To call it free does not make it free.

Freedom is one of the things in which, in principle, members on all sides of the house are united. We all believe in it firmly; we strive for it, and would do anything we could to protect the freedom of our citizens. But it does seem to me there is too little realization in the house of the fact that, if we are going to hold on to our political freedom and to the civil liberties we prize so much, we must move on and achieve a much wider measure of economic freedom—and not just for the few, but for all the people of this country. And that, to use a phrase the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) so frequently employs, means the rule of law. The contention of those of us in this group is that the rule of law must begin to take effect in the economic sphere. We contend that democracy is control by the people of the things that affect the people. Two or three generations ago economic processes did not greatly affect the individual lives of the people in the country. My grandfather, and his father and grandfather before him, eked out an existence in Shelburne county, Nova Scotia, planting potatoes among the rocks and doing a bit of fishing. Economic processes did not play a large part in their freedom. In that day freedom consisted in protection from inroads by the state or the government.

But times have greatly changed. Peoples' lives today, from the cradle to the grave, are affected by the economic processes which surround us. The most immediate evidence of that statement is the effect that the rising cost of living is having on the lives of our people at the present time. And I suggest that if we are to carry out the full meaning of democracy, the people who are elected to represent the interests of about 12,000,000 Canadians must see to it that in the name of the people they have control over the economic processes which affect those 12,000,00 people.

The point at which this is most evident is in the rising cost of living. As members of parliament, members of a democratic representative body, I submit we are negligent in our duty if we sit idly by and let the cost of living sky-rocket, and our people suffer as they will as a consequence.

That is the reason we have been contending, from the time this debate opened, that instead of presenting us with a measure which merely provides for the continuance of controls on a skeleton basis, just long enough to get rid of them, the government should be introducing a system of orderly and democratic controls so as to combat any inflationary tendencies, combat the rising cost of living, and make possible the achieving of greater justice and greater equality among our people.

The very fact that the leader of the opposition has indicated that he and his followers intend to vote against this measure, and that it is known that we intend to vote for it, shows what a confused situation confronts us.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You will be consistent in that.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member, coming as he does from Saskatchewan, has perhaps less ground than any other member in the house for talking about cooperation with the government. He knows what is going on back in his own province, where members of his party and the party opposite are certainly climbing into the same bed.

Mr. JACKMAN: The forces of good against evil.

Mr. KNOWLES: I had begun to point out the unreality of the vote now before us. Hon. members to my right want to get rid of controls. The measure before us is one which will have the effect of getting rid of controls in something less than a year. maybe very quickly, but they are going to vote against it.

We in this group want controls. We have before us a measure which will get rid of them, but we are put into the position of having to vote for it, so as to retain some controls for even a little while. That is just how confused and unreal is the issue placed before the house.

Because of this confusion and unreality, from the beginning of the debate we have tried to present at some stage an amendment which would be in order and which would give the house a chance to vote on the real issue. I suggest that the real issue is not as to whether controls should come off today or next week, or even at some time within a year. The real issue is whether or not the parliament and government of this country, in the name of the people, are going to pursue a policy of orderly and democratic controls, in the belief that it is our democratic duty to protect the Canadian people by having something to say in their name about the economic processes which affect their lives.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I rise now to present another amendment. This amendment is one that we have thought out carefully in the light of the experiences that we have had thus far in this debate. I mean, by that, that we have done our best to word it in such a way as to make sure that it will be in order. My hon. friends to my right moved an amendment on April 1, which, I grant, stated the issue as they see it. However, this afternoon that amendment was ruled out of order, in which ruling we of this group concurred. Yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved an amendment to the motion to go into supply, which was ruled out of order on the ground that it anticipated doing things which could be done in committee on Bill No. 104.

We hope that the amendment we now propose to move will avoid that supposed error for it suggests something different that we feel should be done than what is now placed before us. In other words, it will suggest to the house that there should be introduced a system of orderly and democratic controls. I submit that that is quite different from a measure which provides merely for the continuation of certain skeleton powers until such time as they are revoked. Therefore I submit that the amendment which I shall offer in a moment cannot be ruled out of order as was the case with the one proposed yesterday.

Further, on March 20 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar moved an amendment to the motion that Your Honour leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the resolution that preceded this bill. Your Honour ruled that amendment out of order, not on the basis of its substance, but on the ground that no amendment could be moved at that stage. Your Honour quoted the citation of Beauchesne which had to do with referring matters to a committee, and Your Honour took the position that that particular citation covered that amendment. This is a different stage, and that citation does not now apply.

The amendment which I am about to propose is in exactly the same form as others which have been moved during this session and which have been allowed by Your Honour and voted upon.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will permit me to interrupt, he is trying to explain to the house why his amendment is in order, but neither the Speaker nor hon. members know what his amendment is.

Mr. KNOWLES: All right; I shall read the amendment and then afterwards indicate the references in Hansard and the citations in Beauchesne which I think provide a basis for the propriety of the amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden):

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the headlong decontrol policy of the government has depressed the standard of living of the people, threatens the country with economic chaos, and is surrendering the future of Canada to profiteering and monopoly;
> And be it further resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the introduction of a system of orderly and democratic controls and the restoration of lower prices for the necessities of life, particularly articles of food and clothing, soap and shortening, shelter, household appliances, and supplies and machinery needed in agriculture, in order to eliminate the injustices which now exist and to arrest the rapidly rising cost of living.

In drafting this amendment, we took into consideration citation 657 to be found on page 228 of Beauchesne, third edition, which says in part:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution . . .

And so on.

Then on page 337 of Beauchesne, third edition, will be found form No. 93, which gives the form for an amendment to the motion for the second reading of a bill. As I was about to indicate a few moments ago when Your Honour asked me to read my amendment, there have been two amendments in exactly this form moved this session. One was moved on February 21 and is recorded on page 697 of Hansard. That was an amendment which I made to the motion for the second reading of the redistribution bill; it asked that the bill be not given second reading at that time but that the house resolve a certain proposition. The other occasion was on March 31, as recorded on page 1910 of Hansard, when the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) moved an amendment to the second reading of the bill providing for the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways. Again the amendment proposed that the bill be not then read a second time but that the house by resolution declare an alternative principle.

I have taken this much time to deal with the technical points in order to make clear how perfectly in order this kind of amendment is. As I indicated earlier, this kind of amendment has been moved twice this session, has been accepted by Your Honour and voted upon by this house. I submit that that is what this house wants, namely, an amendment which states the issue clearly so that we can vote upon it and let the country know where we stand. This amendment does not simply make decontrol a matter of time, which is the issue between the government and the opposition; it calls for a definite policy of orderly and democratic control; it calls for a permanent policy looking toward the exercise by parliament of its democratic responsibility to have something to say about the economic conditions that affect the lives of our people.

I submit that a great deal more is at stake than just the cost of living, important as that is at the present time. Involved in this whole question is the future of democracy itself. Democracy cannot go backward; it cannot stand still. It must move forward. Democracy involves freedom and the control by the people of the country, through their elected representatives, of the things that affect them all. If we are to maintain our political freedom and civil liberties we must move on to economic freedom and economic democracy, and if the house passes this motion it will be taking a step in that very necessary direction.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If I may ask my hon. friend a question, are he and his party in support of this bill or against it?

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my hon. friend was in when I started.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was here all the time.

Mr. KNOWLES: I made it clear at the outset that we are supporting this measure on the ground that Canada could not at the present time have anything less than is contained in it, and could not run the risk of the economic chaos that would ensue if the will of my hon. friends to my right prevailed and the measure were thrown out. But the point we are making is that it contains far too little. We are supporting it but we demand a great deal more for the Canadian people.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And you are trying to kill it at the same time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say to the house that I will study the amendment and give a ruling on whether it is in order or not after the dinner recess.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, if I did not rise to express my views on this measure I should feel that I were remiss in my duty and negligent of the welfare of the constituents whom I have the honour to represent.

During the years of the war the government took to itself pride and credit for the initiation of a policy of subsidies and price control, and speeches which have been made in this house quite recently indicate quite clearly that, as a result of this policy, great savings have accrued to the Canadian people. When we compare the results of price control in Canada and the United States we feel that we have great cause for pride, and I for one like to give credit where credit is due, whether it be to this government or to any other. If price control has been good for the Canadian people—and again I say that it has been shown that controls have been good—then why this unseemly haste to abolish them? I know, as every member of the house knows, that great pressure has been brought to bear on the government to remove price controls, but I am very sure that that pressure has not come from the housewives and the families of Canada. They are viewing with alarm the threat to their well-being which is contained in the rising cost of living. Personally I cannot understand the attitude of the government in thus yielding weakly to the pressure of big business to remove controls in the face of the rising resentment on the part of the electorate. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the time is fast approaching when the government should have its ear to the ground so as to know and understand the temper and attitude of the people preparatory to a general election, but on the contrary the government seems to be riding high and very handsome disregarding entirely the resentment and the expressed wishes of the people. The people today expect of a government that held prices steady during the war that it will hold prices steady during this recurring time of peace.

During the war I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking over the radio, make a statement to this effect, that the people of Canada now have more money than they ever had before, presumably because of the high wages received from war work. Personally I think the Prime Minister's statement was unwise, because there were at that time many thousands of Canadian people whose wages had not been increased because of war work and who certainly had no more money in their pockets at that time than they had before. Necessary spending in many families was restricted during the war time by compulsory savings and, by the way, the people today are very anxious to connect again with those compulsory savings which were withheld from them.

But my deepest concern today is for the people in the low income brackets, the men and the women who are feeling very keenly indeed the rising cost of living—the old age pensioners, our sick and infirm people, our unemployed, for we do have them. It may interest hon. members to know that the provincial government of British Columbia has dismissed, in the city of Fernie, which I represent, all its employees over the age of sixty-five. No provision whatsoever is being made for the way in which these people shall live. They are not eligible at the present time for the old age pension, and they are finding that the cost of living is soaring day by day and hurting them considerably. I wonder if this government expects that these dismissed employees will vote at a coming election for the Liberal party, for a party that has failed to hold prices at a time when they need to be held very strictly indeed.

Mr. MARTIN: No other country in the world did as well as Canada in holding prices.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I am not concerned with what other countries are doing but I am concerned with what Canada is doing. We have prided ourselves—I have taken pride in it and have supported the government for it in my speeches—on what the government did during the war in holding prices. My concern today is why the government has weakly yielded to the high pressure coming from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and such like bodies to remove price controls.

Only yesterday the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), speaking in the debate, used the word "demand". He was demanding that the government set a date in the very near future for the Halifax by-election. I am not much concerned in demanding that the government should do that, but others can use the word "demand" as well as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and today I demand that the government be very watchful indeed. It is all very well for the papers to say that the government warns business against too rapid increases in the prices of goods. That may sound all right in the press, but let the people sit in this house and see the actions of the government, how they pay lip service to controls and then get rid of them as rapidly as they can, regardless of consequences. My demand is that the government shall watch more carefully the rising cost of living and reestablish controls where necessary before irreparable harm is done to the Canadian economy. Then, when these things have been done, the government can look with a degree of certainty to receiving the support and the votes of the people of the country, but not on the basis of the policies they are following at the present time.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I think what the Canadian people will have to face up to in the near future is the fact that, under the modern organization of industrial economy such as we have in Canada today, price controls are an absolute necessity. It sometimes surprises me to hear Social Credit members voice their opposition to any kind of control boards or price control. The very foundation on which their party was built in the early days was a fair price established by boards which would estimate and determine what that fair price was.

Mr. QUELCH: We have never taken a stand against any form of price control.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But if there must be price control how is it to be established except by means of boards?

Mr. QUELCH: Agriculture has always taken that stand.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If you have to have price control you must recognize that, if you have it in agriculture, you must have it in other fields for exactly the same reason. The price that will be paid by Canada for relinquishing these controls is one that we might do well to consider. I would ask the house to think over the position in which the wage-earner finds himself at the present time. He is squeezed between two pressures. When he goes to sell his labour he finds his wages set, and that fixes his income. With his set wages and income he is compelled to purchase the necessities of life, and he cannot possibly make both ends meet.

What does he do? As prices go up he has to go without commodities he needs. His children have to go without the milk that is necessary for their health. He faces the necessity of using up his savings. That leads to the mortgaging of his home and ultimately to the position where the wage-earner simply cannot carry on any longer. It lowers his standard of living and leaves his family in the position where he cannot provide for them. It makes it impossible for him to provide for his old age. The position of the pensioner becomes a tragic one. The cost of living goes up, but his pension stays where it is and there is only one end for him. He is the hopeless victim and he is unable to do anything about the matter.

We are not ending controls in Canada by such legislation as this. We are turning the control over to organizations in this country who control commodities and set prices according to what the traffic will bear. The people who have those commodities can make them scarce, and as they become scarcer the market demand will go up and the price keeps on climbing. It is not an economy in which they will supply a large quantity of goods and then see that the people can buy them. The commodity is kept scarce and those who have commodities make large profits on a small turnover.

I would ask the house to consider the position of the farmer. He says to me: Will you kindly tell me what is wrong with our economy, or rather what is right about an economy in which a situation like this exists? I have to go to town to buy the commodities which are necessary if I am to produce. I am then the purchaser. I go to the implement agent. I am the buyer and he is the seller, because he has the goods. I say to him, "How much is this?" And he tells me the price because he has the commodity. That is, he has the control. When he sets the price I have to pay it or go without. Now if that kind of thing works, if that is the way it works, I am willing to abide by it. So I take these commodities home and spend my summer working; my wife and family work at the same time. and we all do this for a certain period. After slaving away, I bring my commodities in to sell them. Now I have the goods to sell. I am the one who is selling and he is the one who is buying. But I find that the whole situation has changed. I have to go to him and say, "Please, mister, how much will you pay me for my goods?" There is something wrong with an economy which tells me what price I shall pay for the goods I want to buy, while the same economy tells me what prices others will pay me for the commodities I have to sell."

Consequently the farmer is squeezed, as I have said, between two pressures. The economy tells him what others will pay him for the goods he has to sell, while it tells him at the same time what prices he will have to pay for the things he has to buy. The result is that he is soon squeezed out. There will have to be some control if we are to prevent complete chaos.

The farmer saw that in the days prior to the war. Now he sees prices set on farm commodities. He has accepted a set price for farm commodities. He believes it is a good thing. I think the majority of the farmers of the country have supported the wheat agreement with the United Kingdom, because it gives a guarantee of an initial price of $1.35 for a period of years. The farmer has forgone the present world price. He says that is better than the fluctuations we have had. At any rate he knows he is going to get that, and that has been set. But, may I point out, all the advantages that may accrue from that, can be wiped out overnight if there is no control over the prices of the commodities he has to buy. If you turn the implement companies and the monopolies loose and let them put up prices as they wish; if you take the ceilings off gasoline, distillates, binder twine, clothing, sugar, the things he has to buy, then this set price that he has agreed to will mean absolutely nothing to him.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY—INCREASE OF AUTHORIZED CAPITAL

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 59, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at this stage on second reading and before the bill is forwarded to the committee on railways and telegraph lines, there are a few remarks I should like to make. Briefly, the purpose of this bill is to obtain parliamentary authority for an increase of capital from $11,000,000 to $25,000,000. The increased capital asked for is necessary for capital expenditures required by the company, to provide facilities adequate for the telephone requirements in British Columbia, and for the purpose of the company carrying out its post-war programme of service expansion and modernization of facilities. Perhaps the purpose of the increased capitalization can be summed up briefly in this way. It is required for extensive additions to replace obsolete equipment for present and future demands and to take care of the large building programme. The increased capitalization from $11,000,000 to $25,000,000 is estimated to be required for the next five years' expenditures.

Perhaps a word or two regarding the development that has taken place in the province and the need for this increased capital might also be appropriate at this time. The 1941 census gave the population as 817,861. According to the ration books issued—and this was only a short time ago—the population of British Columbia is now 1,019,745. I doubt if there is any other part of the country which has increased its population so greatly in such a short space of time. The building permits issued last year totalled $42,717,250 in value. I should like to say just a word or two regarding industrial expansion and give some figures showing a comparison of production in the year before the war with that in 1946:

Production in British Columbia

Lumber	$67,122,000	$150,000,000
Agriculture	47,782,000	112,000,000
Mining	64,486,000	70,250,000
Fishing	18,673,000	41,500,000

These figures show the rapid growth and expansion of industry and also, as I mentioned a moment ago, the great growth that has taken place in the population of British Columbia. The telephone company have estimated from their books and from the actual records that they have on hand at least twenty thousand applications for telephones. I do not know of any part of Canada which has such an expanding and increasing population and which has greater need for telephones than the districts of British Columbia. I know in the district in which I live—and I am only some eight miles from the city of New Westminster—there is one telephone line, and if you wish to get on it in a hurry, it is just too bad because there happen to be twenty-six parties on the one line. That is just a sample of the inadequacy of the telephone facilities throughout British Columbia; and I think one could find districts where requirements are equally as great as they are in the district I have mentioned.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the union of British Columbia municipalities which, in its membership, comprises all the cities and municipalities of British Columbia, has been notified as to the intentions of the company to ask for the increased capitalization from $11,000,000 to $25,000,000 and it has raised no objection whatsoever. Then the city of Vancouver which, as everyone from British Columbia knows, has almost fifty per cent of the population of the province, if one considers the Greater Vancouver area, was notified by letter —and I think it might be advisable to place it on the record—regarding the application of the company. The letter is from the clerk and it reads as follows:

Application of B.C. Telephone Company to increase its capital stock

Dear Sir:

I wish to notify you of the following recommendation of the harbours, utilities and airport committee, dated February 10, 1947, which was adopted by council on February 17, 1947:

"Recommended that the following report, dated February 3, 1947, from the special committee comprising the chairman (Ald. Thompson), Aldermen Miller and Gervin and the corporation counsel, with regard to the subject matter, be approved and the company be so notified:

The application of this company to increase its capital stock from $11,000,000 to $25,000,000 and to effect the repeal of subsection (3) of section 6 of its Incorporation Act, was referred by council on the 27th ultimo to the undersigned as a special committee with instructions to report to your committee at its next meeting.

We have had an interview with Mr. Gordon Farrell, president, Mr. C. B. Diplock, general manager, and Brigadier Sherwood Lett, counsel for the company.

We are impressed with the fact that the company requires fresh capital in substantial amounts to meet the backlog of deferred instalments during the war as well as the normal expansion of its business. Under its charter the company even if authority of parliament is given to increase its capitalization, cannot make any issue, sale or other disposition of the new capital without first obtaining the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. No question of rates is directly involved in such increased capitalization because rates are specifically under the control of the board of transport commissioners and the company agrees to give to the city notice of any application for a change in rates that might affect its subscribers in Vancouver.

We have also considered the company's application to repeal subsection (3) of section 6 added to the company's charter in 1941. Having regard to modern principles of rate making, we think the section is of little importance either to the city or to the company. As, however, it was apparently added to the act with the intention of serving as a measure of protection to the company's subscribers, we make no recommendation on the application with respect to it.

Our recommendation is that the company be notified that the city has no objection to the amendment by which it seeks to increase its authorized capital from $11,000,000 to $25,000,000, subject always to the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to the issue, sale or other disposition of such stock or any part thereof."

I think that is all I need say at this time. I am asking the house to be good enough to give this bill second reading and let it go to the committee on railways and canals.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

CONFERENCE OF MENNONITES IN CANADA

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern) moved the second reading of Bill No. 72, to incorporate Conference of Mennonites in Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

INMATES OF INSTITUTIONS FOR THE POOR

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

He said: I am glad to have on opportunity tonight to bring up a matter of injustice to our old age pensioners and others who, through circumstances entirely beyond their control, are compelled to seek shelter in institutions maintained by provincial or municipal authorities of certain provinces. When I first brought this matter to the attention of the house I was compelled to name four provinces which treated their poor people in this way. Tonight I am glad to be able to say one of those provinces has removed that disqualification from its statute books. The section to which I take objection is paragraph (k) of section 14 of the Dominion Elections Act, which provides that certain persons are disqualified from voting at an election and are incapable of being registered as electors. Among those disqualified are:

(k) in any province, every person who is an inmate of an institution which is maintained by any government or municipality for the housing and maintenance of the poor. . .

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I should not have called his bill. I understand that the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, which the hon. gentleman is discussing, has been referred to a committee of this house, so that the hon. gentleman is discussing a matter which is actually before a committee.

Mr. FAIR: I have brought up this matter on two different occasions. Last year the then Secretary of State asked me to let the bill stand, because no committee was being set up to deal with it, and I did so on the understanding that I might discuss it on another occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry again to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I would not have called the bill if I had remembered that a committee had been set up to study this act. Just as the hon. gentleman started to discuss the matter, I realized that it had been referred to a committee, and it is a well known rule that we should not in the house discuss a matter which is before a committee.

Mr. FAIR: I am a member of that committee, and I shall discuss it when the committee meets.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman knows the rulings of the Speaker may not be discussed. The motion stands.

CRIMINAL CODE

ORGANIZATIONS ADVOCATING OVERTHROW OF CONSTITUTED AUTHORITY

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved the second reading of Bill No. 133, to amend the Criminal Code (illegal organizations).

He said: The bill I am submitting this evening for the approval of this house, the object of which is the suppression of any kind of communistic party in Canada, is self-explanatory and should not require very much debate in order to justify it. As all hon. members know, Mr. Igor Gouzenko recently exposed the Soviet spy rings in Canada. To the following question, "What attitude should Canada adopt towards the Canadian communist party?" Mr. Gouzenko replied:

The communist party in Canada is not just a political party like other major political parties in this country. It is an agency of the Soviet Union, which aims to overthrow our system of government. Canadians must never lose sight of that fact.

The free existence of the communist party here astounds, more than anything else, every soviet person who arrives in a democratic country from the Soviet Union. They know perfectly well whose interests that party is serving. Taught from their experience in the Soviet Union, where the democratic elements were mercilessly destroyed long ago, and where only the communist party has the right to exist, these soviet people expect to see the same picture in the democratic countries. They expect to see the communist party banned, and the leaders of that party in jails, or liquidated.

Their surprise is, therefore, equally great when they see that the communist party functions openly and propagates anti-democratic ideas, the while it takes advantage of a constitution which ensures its right to print and issue its newspapers, to broadcast on the radio, to hold meetings, and all this with the aim of overthrowing the same constitution which gives it this right.

Allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that I was bewildered to find that in one constituency alone, six thousand Canadians have, during a recent by-election, clearly shown their adherence to the communist party. According to Mr. Gouzenko, the most important factor of the communistic programme is absolute allegiance to Moscow.

I would request that hon. members adopt the second reading of the bill, since it involves its principle. This bill has been in the hands of members of the house since before the Easter recess, and they should by now have found the time to read it in its entirety. Should hon. members wish to suggest amendments, they will be afforded the opportunity to do so in committee when the sections of the bill will be examined in detail.

For instance, section 1 stipulates the following:

The communist party of Canada, the Labour Progressive party of Canada and any association, society, group or organization having similar aims or purposes are declared to be, and shall be deemed to be illegal organizations: Provided that no association, society, group or organization, except the communist party of Canada, and the Labour Progressive party shall be deemed to be an illegal organization unless the governor in council has, by notice published in the Canada Gazette declared the said association, society, group or organization to be an illegal association within the meaning of this section.

The reason behind this wording is that no one is in a better position than the government, with the assistance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to have the necessary information which would allow it to make a decision in the matter.

However, should certain members of the house ascribe to this section powers which are too arbitrary to be placed in the hands of a government, nothing should prevent an amendment from being tabled in committee, which would force the government to submit this information, documentation and evidence to the Supreme Court of Canada, which would decide without appeal.

Since no amendment may be made on second reading, it is vital that the principle itself be decided upon by allowing the bill to be passed on second reading. I therefore count on the good will of the members of this house in this matter.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I had not anticipated that the bill would be reached tonight, and I should be very much obliged if the hon. member would agree to let it stand. I should like to read in Hansard the remarks he has just made to the house, and on another occasion state the attitude of myself or of the government, as the case may be. I therefore beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LaCROIX: Following the remarks of the minister, I have no objection to letting the motion for second reading stand.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the debate was adjourned.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to give a ruling on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), which reads as follows:

of the people, threatens the country with economic chaos, and is surrendering the future of Canada to profiteering and monopoly;

And be it further resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the introduction of a system of orderly and democratic controls and the restoration of lower prices for the necessities of life, particularly articles of food and clothing, soap and shortening, shelter, household appliances, and supplies and machinery needed in agriculture, in order to eliminate the injustices which now exist and to arrest the rapidly rising cost of living.

I wish to call the attention of the hon. member to citation 357 at page 139 of Beauchesne, third edition, which reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker Sproule on the 13th February, 1913, decided that a proposed amendment which was substantially the same motion as the member had moved on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, was not in order because "a motion must not raise a question substantially identical with one on which the house has given a decision in the same session."

I would also direct attention to the ruling given by the Hon. George Black, Speaker, on March 14, 1934, which is found at page 714 of the same edition, in these words:

A motion dealing with a question moved and rejected as an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne is out of order.

The hon. member will recall that on March 7, during this session, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved the following amendment:

We respectfully submit, however, that in the opinion of this house Your Excellency's advisers have shown a readiness to return to the policies of uncontrolled and unplanned private enterprise which resulted in the depression and unemployment in prewar years . . .

The first part of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre being substantially the same as the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I have no hesitation in saying that the amendment is out of order. As far as the second part of the amendment moved by the hon. member is concerned, I would call his attention to May, 13th edition, page 391, where he will find the following:

Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee . . .

I therefore rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear your ruling with regard to this amendment, but we are going to abide by your decision without challenging it at this time.

Before the dinner recess, in dealing with the principle of this bill I was discussing the various effects of price control and trying to point out to the house that the time has come when in an economy such as we have in Canada it is essential to protect the people against the ravages of monopolistic enterprises and to have some democratic control that will say to these people, "This is a fair price, this is a just price, this is the price to which you are entitled and over and above that there is not to be exploitation; we intend to stop it."

I was pointing out that by the removal of controls over prices by a government body we are not thereby removing controls. The controls are still there. Prices will then be dictated by the people who control the commodities. One monopolistic organization or another has the supplies completely within its hands and it says to those who come to buy them, "You pay this price or you go without." It seems to me that in days such as these, with industry organized as it is in this country today, this country or any other country similarly organized cannot be without some measure of price control to protect its people.

I ask the house to consider the position of the working man, the position of the farmer and the position of the pensioner who are squeezed between the cost of living and the wages that they earn. The farmer is squeezed between the cost of the things he must buy in order to produce and the prices which he receives for the commodities he sells. He finds that the prices of these things are dictated to him. We have little right to say that there is no dictatorship in Canada. Prices are dictated to him when he goes to buy the commodities he needs and when he goes to sell his products he is told the price he will get.

I think we are coming to the dividing of the ways. Are we to remove all control by the government and let private and monopolistic enterprise go unbridled, allow prices to go higher and higher with no redress, no board to appeal to, with reduced production, lower living standards, unemployment; back again to the old routine that we have gone through for the past forty years, depression, war, a period of prosperity, depression again and then war coming on as the only release? We have a continuous procession in which the common man finds himself hopeless and helpless to fight against the tide of those who control.

The common man, the farmer in particular, finds that in order to fight he must organize himself into groups. The cooperative movement is nothing more or less than a sign of the times on the part of the common people, an effort to protect themselves against the ravages of monopolistic enterprises. They must have some control over the commodities which they are selling in order that they may have some say as to the prices at which those commodities shall be sold. The organization of a trade union is nothing more than a group of people getting together to say, "The wages we are receiving are too low in order to pay rising costs of living; we have nothing to sell but the sweat of our brow, and therefore we must have some say as to what we are going to sell our commodity for."

I noticed that as soon as the government released these controls it turned around and pleaded with big business to be careful and to be sensible. I would point out the fact that a similar appeal was made by the President of the United States and I would refer hon. members to what happened in the United States after the removal last year of controls under the OPA. The financial editor of the Globe and Mail on April 12 lists the United States weekly commodity prices. Taking 1926 as 100, he shows that in August, 1939, the index was 63·7; in March, 1946, it was 114·7; on January 3 of this year, 150·2; on March of this year, 166. Those are the index levels as compared with 1926. What is to be the outcome? How far is this to continue? The President is certainly disappointed in the effects of the removal of price controls.

If there is no check on the operations of competition evening things up, but where is these enterprises, what will they do? They will have complete control. We talk about your competition? Monopolistic enterprise does not recognize competition. What it says is this: "We will cut the throat of any small competitor, but we will cooperate with the big boys who compete in the same field." If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) wants to start taxing cooperators he should start at the top and tax those who are really cooperating in the way of fixing prices.

We all know the hue and cry that is raised as soon as anybody says anything about controlling the prices which big business wants to charge. Many people seem to consider organizations such as International Nickel as being the real essence of democracy; but as soon as any cooperative enterprise, like our great wheat pools in western Canada, get started they are charged with being communistic and socialistic. Some people seem to think that is communism. They consider the operations of a monopoly to exploit the people as they wish as being real democracy. As soon as any one challenges their right to exploit the people there is the cry that we are establishing a dictatorship; that this is socialism. They are ready to tie it up with communism, Russian spies and espionage. They want to start a holy crusade to save our families and homes.

When the common man organizes into a cooperative organization in an endeavour to fight against the forces which he finds are turned loose in this land and when such an organization endorses the maintenance of price control it is contended that they are setting up a dictatorship. What we are fighting is a form of dictatorship which is abroad in this country and which at times makes it impossible for a man to make a living. It is impossible for the common people to establish the kind of homes they should have if we are to make this Canada of ours a great country.

The whole set-up has failed, and failed dismally. Actually the control exercised by monopoly in this country is one of the worst forms of exploitation I can think of. Jesse James was a piker compared with these fellows. He went out with a gun and a blind over his eyes to rob people, but today it is legalized. These fellows go around with the law on their side and with lawyers and the sheriff to protect them.

Mr. FERGUSON: If the hon. member will permit a question, would he prefer to live in this awful country of Canada or in either of the two countries where controls existed prior to the war, in Italy or Germany?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Of course I would prefer to live in a country where there is democracy and democratic control. I would not want to live under any kind of dictatorship. Here, Mr. Speaker, is a repetition of the cry to which I was referring a few moments ago. But I say that Canada is not yet half the country she might be. Here we are located on the northern half of the North American continent, a country of great natural resources but with only 12,000,000 people where we might well have 20,000,000. Our population drifted across the United States border, and a million of our people were on relief. We are heading into unemployment again. It is to prevent just such a thing that we require controls. Those controls have to be exercised by a democratic government. In a resolution which the Progressive Conservative party introduced on April 1 they declared they were unalterably opposed to the enactment of any measure which would give sweeping powers to boards outside the control of parliament. Of course we would not want powers to be given to boards that are outside the control of parliament. The government in operating the wartime prices and trade board operates it under a department of this government. The board exercises control over prices and the minister is responsible to parliament for the actions of the board. He can be questioned in the house and called upon by the democratic representatives duly elected by the Canadian people to answer for the policies which the board is carrying out. That is responsible, democratic control. No one believes that we should give powers to boards that are not answerable to anyone. Large corporations have to answer to no one today, but parliament can and does exercise democratic control over boards set up by parliament. Such parliamentary control is the essence of democracy. To assume that because you support a board that is under democratic control by parliament you are in favour of establishing a dictatorship is utter nonsense.

The Canadian people require a shield to protect the masses of our people against the ravages of unbridled private enterprise. It is because of the failure of the system that controls have become necessary. I believe it is an established fact that the development of industry in the direction it has taken necessitates this very thing, and I doubt that any government could continue long in Canada without such controls. When you relax these controls and give free rein to private enterprise you are quickening the downward march of the Canadian people into unemployment, to lower standards of living, higher costs, lack of production, lack of ability to maintain a proper income level to enable the Canadian people to meet the costs of government and the costs of the war. The costs of the war to the Canadian people have not yet been met. The national debt of this country has mounted to over $15 billion, which means that we must maintain a high income level for the masses of the Canadian people, not just those at the top, but the great masses of our people. It means that we must establish an economy under which the masses of our people may have decent homes where they will be free from fear and free from want.

Surveys made recently show that in Canada, the United States, Great Britain and even Sweden the population is not being maintained because people will not raise children to live in poverty and in want. Fathers and mothers will not be responsible for bringing children into a world where they will suffer from want, poverty, hunger, and the fear of war. In Canada we are not maintaining our natural increase in population. Already there are signs of a declining birthrate. To counteract that, we must see that conditions are established where people will not live within the shadow of unemployment but will have some measure of security and a decent standard of living.

We are deciding today what Canada of the future shall be, and I take a chance on prophesying that if controls are completely lifted Canada will be headed into another period of unemployment. Already there are signs of it in the eastern maritime provinces. We find higher costs and a lower standard of living, unemployment, and a demand from the people for redress and that parliament shall exercise some measure of control to protect them from the ravages of monopolistic enterprise. It is those who sit in responsible positions on the benches in this house who will be held responsible by the people if these controls are let go, and the people will repudiate those who say of private enterprise: Leave it free to go all the way and the situation will correct itself. For the sake of the Canada of the future, and of the near future, I plead with the members of this house to think seriously of the consequences of removing controls completely. Think of what kind of Canada we would have under those circumstances! The question before us is more than simply a matter of political necessity at the present time, of giving what people here and there may be clamouring for or what the press may be demanding. The press is finding that it has made its mistakes. Let us learn from the mistakes that have been made by our great neighbour to the south and lay the foundations now for a Canada which can be truly great.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I had a friend sitting in the gallery while the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking, and during the dinner recess my friend said to me, "What a fine speech the leader of the C.C.F. party made." I agree with him. The hon. member spoke of controls and decontrols and discussed the merits and demerits of the bill, indicating why he felt that controls should continue. I was in accord with many of the thoughts he expressed. But today that very fine presentation by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was completely changed by members of his group, and particularly by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden), who spoke in the manner in which he did. As usual the hon. gentleman dragged into the discussion something foreign to the principle of the bill, and once again he spoke on a subject in regard to which I think he showed to all members his lack of experience, as he has so often done on previous occasions.

I do not wish to refer to the terms he used with reference to free enterprise. I speak this evening as one of those who stand for free enterprise. I am one of those 137,331 retailers doing business in Canada, employing some 300,000 persons whose wages represent $289,379,500 a year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You are not the monopoly to which I was referring.

Mr. ISNOR: Thank you. There are always exceptions in all classes, and I made reference a moment ago to the definite difference between the types of representative we find in the C.C.F. group, one very kindly and experienced man who presents his views temperately to the house, while the other, in extravagant language, condemns and creates distrust and fear in the mind of the average person. He does not help the situation in Canada with such speeches as he has just made.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. ISNOR: I am pleased to permit a question. The hon. member always interrupts me.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I assure the hon. member it is only in a kindly way. Will he point to any particular instance in which I differed from my leader?

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member is so far different from his leader that I would not attempt to span the vast space between them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are there any instances in which I differed from him?

Mr. ISNOR: Dealing with the observations of the hon. member for Yorkton, who has just interrupted me, may I point out to him the situation with regard to farmers, who, he complains, are not enabled to enjoy a proper standard of living. I point out that the farmers are getting prices today which are higher than they received at any other time during the hon. member's lifetime. They are enjoying higher prices for their products than at any other time in the history of Canada.

The hon. member says that those doing business with private enterprise have no redress. Why, the consumer holds the controlling hand in any market. That is recognized both in this country and in the United States. If the merchant, the manufacturer or the wholesaler runs wild the consumer can bring him back to a proper sense of values because of that buying control which the consumer exercises, and because of that control we shall not have the sky-rocketing of prices in Canada which was experienced in the United States for a short time.

With regard to the principle of controls and decontrols, if there is one country in the world whose government should be complimented on the policy it is carrying out in this regard it is Canada, and that government is the government which is in power here. I might differ with my hon. friends of the Conservative party who advocate complete decontrol and I say that it is not a proper time for a complete decontrol policy. I advocate, and right along have stated that controls during war time are absolutely necessary. Further, I do not hesitate to say that controls should continue until Canada has gone through the transition period and properly rearranged production so as to supply the market in a reasonable and safe manner. That, I think, is the policy that has been pursued up to the present time.

Whether the government will in the future decontrol too quickly remains to be seen, but I would point out that this bill is for the purpose of providing proper controls. If we find that the manufacturers are allowing things to get out of hand the government can recontrol certain items of luxuries or other commodities as they see fit There is a reason why Canada should look forward to great expansion, and as a free enterpriser I believe that expansion must be carried on, not alone by the twenty-six firms cited by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I am thinking of the thousands of small manufacturing concerns throughout the country who throw into their efforts the very best they have. I am thinking of the large number of individual owners who have a small number of employees, not of the twenty-six large firms which are so often referred to by the leader of the C.C.F. and members of that group.

My hon. friends, it seems to me, wish to draw a red herring over the trail in regard to the fine effort being made by the great majority of the smaller manufacturers. and for that reason I do not think they are fair in their criticisms. As I have said on more than one occasion, I always enjoy listening to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Perhaps some of my hon. friends on this side, the Liberal side, will say, "Why pay so many compliments to the leader of the CCF and build him up?" Well, I like to be honest. At the same time I warn the hon. gentleman that he is doing Canada a discredit by allowing his followers to go from one end of the country to the other creating fear by reminding people of the period from 1930 to 1935.

I do not refer to this period for any political purpose but because I do not think we want to see a return of those conditions. We do not want a depression, and I do not think we shall see a return of those conditions if we follow the policy laid down by this government, which provided such wonderful leadership during the war, and which has made such plans for the post-war period as will bring industry back to a safe and sane way of producing the necessities to supply the need that exists so definitely today.

There is scarcity; we all know that. How will you overcome that scarcity? You can overcome it only by production, and production means employment. My hon. friend has referred to people like myself as Jesse Jameses. Why, Jesse James was a piker alongside the member who has the floor at the present time, he would lead you to believe. Jesse James was a piker alongside those fellows. What fellows does he refer to? The fellows who in the war tried, and in the future will still try, to build a better, brighter and more prosperous Canada. Those are the fellows referred to as Jesse Jameses.

The hon. member refers to certain types of businessmen as cutting the throat of the small fellow. That sounds good from a public platform in certain districts but not on the floor of the house when it is sent broadcast throughout the country. I am not trying to lecture the hon. member; I would not dare to do so; but why should we have a constant repetition of this hackneyed phrase about the common man? I am just a common man myself, and so are we all. I do not think that does a bit of good. The common people are the people I depend upon for a living in my business. It is not being up here. It is my business that gives me a living, and I am going to look after that business. How am I going to look after it? By doing what I consider to be fair to the men who are dealing with me. I think the remarks of the hon. member about ravishes of private enterprise are very much uncalled for.

I think Canada is a wonderful country. No other one has greater supplies of basic materials. Our natural resources fall into five main classes: farm, lands, mineral areas, forests, waterpower and fisheries. These contribute in varying degrees to the whole national income. Not only or even mainly by the sale of raw materials but by the use of the products shall we be successful in building a bigger Canada with a greater opportunity for export business and domestic business. I believe if the people of Canada understood this bill and the purpose of it, which is to control in such a way as to carry on for the period named in the bill until such a time as we resume along natural lines and are able to produce and supply those articles that are scarce at the present time, they would appreciate it; I believe that the sooner the people realize the purposes of this bill, the sooner they will know what a fine job this government is doing in bringing into effect a bill of this type.

I had no thought, Mr. Speaker, of speaking at any length; but, since I am a firm believer that the progress and future development of this country rest to a very large extent on the men known as free enterprisers, I could not sit here and allow such remarks as have been made to go unchallenged. I should like to have dealt with some of the points raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) this afternoon. In the main I agree with him, but I question the wisdom—and I am sincere in this—of decontrolling at too rapid a pace. I wish to throw out a suggestion to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) and others who have studied this matter of controls and decontrols. I compliment them upon their policy up to the present time and suggest, because of the effect that it might have on the so-called organized labour forces of this country that if decontrol comes too quickly it might possibly force them to continue to make requests to industry for higher wages and thus slow up what we hope will be continued progress in regard to production.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I spoke a little too warmly on this subject. Free enterprise is, of course, to me a subject to which I am very close. I began life on my own hook, so to speak, and I have competed with these big fellows, these so-called giants that some people think are after the little fellow all the time. I never had very much unfair criticism; in fact, I would criticize the so-called big fellow as quickly as the C.C.F. criticize all the rest of Canada who do not fall in line with them. But on the whole I think the big fellow wants to do what is right. He has his own ideas as to what will be best for Canada. I feel that we are all working in the same way to bring about better times or continuing good times for Canada.

In connection with the decontrols which have already gone into effect, it is only fair that I should point out that a very large number of the retail stores have already advertised through the press and made it known that they did not propose to increase in price any stock which they have on hand. There are always exceptions to the rule. Yesterday someone cited—I think it was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—the example of chocolate bars, that chocolate bars had been raised from six to eight cents. It is unfortunate that the manufacturers of that particular article saw fit to do that. That is one case. They raised the price of their chocolates. Of course that is the same industry. But when you think of the very large number of wholesalers and retailers who have publicly announced that there will be no change in regard to their price lists, then I say they far outweigh the few who have adopted the other course.

In closing, I just wish to repeat what I have said on more than one occasion, that I believe free enterprise is doing a good job for Canada and that without this unfair criticism it will continue to do a good job and bring Canada back to a normal state and will continue the prosperity we have enjoyed and the high standard of living we have had in this fine country.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit members have been listening with considerable interest to the discussion which has been in progress for a good many days now. It seems that we might be welcome with a contribution to this debate. We believe that the members on the various sides of the house have pretty well talked themselves into a state of mind in which they realize that something must be done different from what has been advocated by any of the three, shall we say, major parties in this house. All hon. members I think have indicated a good sense of the problem facing us. I was particularly pleased with the speech made by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) this afternoon. A good many others have given fine speeches, showing the difficulties before the house, but not realizing to any great extent what can be done about the difficulty. May I make a brief contribution on the subject?

Before going forward, I should like to refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) this afternoon. I think he gave a rather brilliant and witty speech, although he was considerably under par this afternoon because, instead of clarifying the situation, he added confusion. If there is any one thing that the members of this house ought to do when they rise to speak—if hon. members will pardon me for making the suggestion—it is this: Let us clarify the issue. Let us not confuse it. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) so well said this afternoon in an excellent speech, I thought, every man in this house is trying to find out how to solve the difficulties; and, make no mistake about it, every member of this house and every group in this house has a distinct contribution to make, and no group in this house can afford to treat slightingly the contribution of any other group. To make remarks such as the hon. member for Cape Breton South made to the effect that social crediters do not believe in anything except just printing a lot of money, is simply to show either profound misinformation concerning the matter or a levity which is hardly to be excused.

Mr. GILLIS: Except for the information I got here in the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I thank the hon. member for making that remark. There is no time for the members in this house to make a detailed exposition of what they stand for, but if the hon. member for Cape Breton South had listened to my speeches alone since he came here, and had read them through carefully, he never would have made the unwise remark which he made this afternoon, because the statements are clear to anyone who desires to understand.

Mr. GILLIS: But then somebody else behind you gets up and confuses me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We will grant that, but we must allow people time to mature. You cannot expect people to come full-fledged into this house and speak freely without making little blunders occasionally. They will get their feet on the ground after a while, and you will not find any confusion at all. Recently we have had a number of people speaking from among our party who have not spoken to any great extent during the ten or eleven years we have been here; but there have been certain members of this group who have spoken for the group, and those people have never wavered or deviated one jot or tittle since the first day they came into this house. They have preached a straightforward doctrine, logical and consistent all the time, and are still preaching it.

That having been said, may I now turn to some other matters? As I have just said, the Social Credit group has always spoken consistently in favour of certain principles. The first of those is that they have favoured inducement controls. When we first came into the house a number of hon. members were alarmed. They said that we believed in regimentation, that we would simply build up a dictatorship, and all that sort of thing. The only kind of thing we were advocating was controls by inducement. That goes right to the heart of the problem today. What we need in this country is controls by inducement. In the discussion recently a number of our C.C.F. friends have shown that they desire controls by inducement. They talk about desiring freedom, and of their wish to increase their freedom. They will increase their freedom by introducing controls by inducement rather than controls by regulation or coercion. I shall say a few words about that later on, but I wish to emphasize that particular point because it goes right to the heart of the problem confronting Canada and the world today: controls by inducement rather than controls by coercion. Just as soon as you begin to pass laws demanding that people do such and such, fixing prices, fixing wages and so on, then you begin to build up dictatorial concepts which are likely to result in a totalitarian state. On the other hand, if you can bring in measures which will induce people to do the right thing, then you are on the way to a greater measure of democracy and freedom. The social credit movement has consistently advocated controls by inducement right from the very beginning. As the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) well said, and I should like to give him credit for it, ever since he has known the social crediters they have spoken of fair prices. That is quite right. It is impossible to have fair prices without inducement controls; and the mere fact that social credit advocates have consistently spoken in favour of fair prices and just prices has implied as clearly as possibly could be implied that they favour inducement controls. And we still favour inducement controls. I would challenge any member of the C.C.F. group or any other member of the house to point to a single occasion, in Hansard or anywhere else, when responsible members of this group, speaking for the group, have said anything to the contrary.

An hon. MEMBER: Who are the responsible members?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If you do not know I will tell you off the record. Of course you are a new member.

An hon. MEMBER: You are too kind.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, I know you can say a lot of smart things. I can say them too, if I have to. I challenge any member of the C.C.F. or any other party to show where responsible members of this group, speaking for the group throughout the years, have advocated anything but controls by inducement to bring about fair prices, fair wages and a regular, ordered economy.

The Social Credit group has always favoured private enterprise, responsible private enterprise. There have been members who have tried to convey—and the hon. member for Cape Breton South was one of them this time—the idea that social crediters are in favour of unlimited free enterprise, that they agree with the Conservatives and Liberals in this respect. No one who knows anything about social credit will make that blunder, unless he just wants to play politics. We have always, as a group, favoured private enterprise because we believe, when business is conducted by private people who are concerned about the success of their own business, they will produce more efficiently both as to quantity and as to quality than will government-owned enterprise. We point to the simple fact that the free enterprise of the private enterprise nations has simply overwhelmed and swamped the nations that depended on government ownership whenever they have come into conflict with those nations. The last war was the finest possible illustration of that, when the United States utterly overwhelmed all opposition with the production from private enterprise, and Canada did simply marvellously in production, because she was following the private enterprise system.

No one can say that private enterprise has failed. As I pointed out in my speech in this house on March 7, why be foolish enough to say private enterprise has failed in the light of the marvellous achievements which can be chalked up to the credit of private enterprise? It is not private enterprise that has failed. We do not need to change from private enterprise to public enterprise. What we need to do is introduce some device whereby we can allow private enterprise to produce to the fullest desirable degree under the circumstances, and then enable the people to purchase and consume the goods private enterprise is able to produce, thereby raising the standard of living, the standard of employment, the standard of prosperity and everything else that is good in the nation. That is the thing we want.

Let us see the line we must follow in order to find that thing we wish to secure. I believe I have made it quite clear that social credit is not in favour of free enterprise that results in monopolies or cartels. It is in favour of private enterprise regulated in such a way as to avoid the abuses and monstrosities which result from unrestricted, unregulated free enterprise. Now may I submit to the house in all seriousness that the time has come right now for the members of the government and the members of this house to consider with the most earnest care the introduction of social credit. This means that the time has come to change the Canadian financial system in one or two important respects, to enable that system to distribute goods as it now so magnificently produces goods. The cost of living simply must not be permitted to rise; I think every hon. member has advocated this idea. There is not a member anywhere in this house who wants to see the cost of living continue to rise. The trouble is they do not know how to stop it. What can we do about finding out how to stop it? Prices simply must be controlled. Just prices for both primary and secondary producers and for consumers must be maintained. That is a problem the solution of which requires much care and much skill. Just wages must be maintained. I was quite well pleased with the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Cape Breton South this afternoon with respect to the Nova Scotia coal workers. Those workers in Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces absolutely must receive the means of a higher standard of living. If they do not this nation is going to rue the day. As long as those people are kept in poverty or semi-poverty, that fact stands as a disgrace to every person in public life in this dominion; and the nearer he is to the Prime Minister of this country, the greater the disgrace. The problem simply must be solved, and it must not be solved by being turned over blithely to the provincial administration. It is a coward's trick to turn the problem over to provincial administration: after we have allowed it to grow to such dimensions that even the dominion is unable to deal with it, then to have the dominion government go down and hide behind the skirts of the provinces! Yet we have to listen to that sort of thing from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and from other people in the house from time to time.

Now that problem must be solved How? That is the question. It can be solved. Two methods of control have been employed by the government in power during this war. I am astonished that they have not learned the lesson which was so obviously taught during the war. First of all, they used the method of coercion, or prohibition by law. If any person sold an article above the celing price, and the offence was discovered, that person paid a penalty, and it was a pretty severe one. That was the law. It was control by law, or coercion. It worked fairly well during the war, while the people were under the stress of many different kinds of emotions. But it does not work very well in peace time. It is not the device which is desirable, because it leads to totalitarianism.

The other method the government used was that of control by inducement—by subsidy, or bonus. I do not suppose any government in the British commonwealth, or perhaps in the whole world, went farther than our government did in the matter of subsidizing prices in one way or another, by direct and indirect means, so as to keep prices down. Hon. members will recall how the price of oranges was kept down and how the price of milk was kept down, and the prices of a great many other commodities.

At this point I wish to commend the then Minister of Finance, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), who was in charge during those years, for the superb success which attended his efforts. The important thing I would suggest is that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who has succeeded the Minister of Justice, shall go forward with that device in peace time, and that he shall not imagine that the principle of subsidies is unsound. The principle of subsidies was a completely sound principle. It was used in Great Britain, the United States and Canada, with signal success. Then why should anyone suppose that it is not a sound principle? It is a principle of control by inducement.

I have mentioned the two methods of control which have been used with success in this country, and which we can examine at the present time as possibilities for greater use in the future. Social crediters favour the deep and broad application of the principle of control of prices, through subsidies, the control of wages through bonuses, it having been agreed upon, after careful study by representatives of all groups concerned just what ought to be accepted as a fair price for any given commodity, allowing for a fair profit and just what ought to be accepted as a fair wage for any given service.

To illustrate: Let us keep in mind, so far as wages are concerned, the wage scale schedule which prevailed, say, in the railroad systems. Wage rates have been determined by careful study and agreement. The various relations of all people who are working throughout the whole system are all set down and agreed upon as being fair. That sort of thing should prevail throughout the whole nation, in respect of the wages of the nation; and once that has been agreed upon, then the next problem is to take steps to see that the financial support which is necessary is provided to maintain that wage structure.

A similar thing can be done with respect to prices. We have already gone a long way in determining what ought to be the price of wheat, for example, and various other commodities. To my mind, it is not beyond the ability of the brilliant minds which are so numerous in Canada to get together and to agree on what ought to be the fair prices for wheat, oats, barley, meat, eggs and all those various other things we produce in a primary way, for all the various commodities we produce in a secondary way such as shoes, hats, furniture and all those other things we produce. We ought to be able to determine what is a fair price. Having determined that price, let us find the financial means of supporting that price, and maintaining it throughout the country .

Such having been done, such agreement having been attained, and the price structure and wage structure ascertained, it ought to be supported, sustained and maintained by means of subsidies and bonuses. Under such circumstances there would be no fixing of prices, no fixing of wages by any arbitrary body. This is where I believe the tendency of social crediters is to go off at a tangent from the C.C.F. Whether our good C.C.F. friends really mean to set up an arbitrary body which will fix prices and wages, I am not sure. But a great many of the things they say lead me to believe that they envisage having the representatives of the various elements concerned in the production of a commodity meeting together to agree on the price and the wage. That is a perfectly democratic way of doing it. It is a process of arriving at a price and agreeing on a wage without fixing it by an arbitrary body.

Social crediters are opposed to the idea of fixing. They are all in favour of the idea of agreeing or arriving at it by compromise and study. There are people who have gone off at a tangent, I think, in respect of social credit. I am speaking particularly for social crediters across the country, and for those who wish to know what the great social credit authorities favour. In this connection I should like to quote some passages from great social credit authorities. I shall quote so as to show that what I have said here tonight is perfectly sound in respect of the social credit attitude with respect to controls.

I turn first of all to "Social Credit" by Major C. H. Douglas, published in 1937 in revised form, and I quote from the appendix at page 208, which deals with a draft social credit scheme for Scotland. It states:

Simultaneously with the publication of the foregoing notice—

And the foregoing notice refers to the dividend which, although we are not saying very much about it, is still a very living thing.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

—a figure to be published known as the discount rate to replace the existing bank discount rate, a suitable value of this for initial purposes being 25 per cent.

That amounts, I might say, for those who wish to know, to a subsidy. It brings down the price of the goods. Then he continues:

It is important that the figure should not be less than 25 per cent, and it might reasonably be higher.

Simultaneously, an announcement to be published that any or all business undertakings will be accepted for registration under an assisted price scheme.

I interpolate to point out that they are not going to be registered. They are not going to be listed. They will be accepted for registration upon their own volition. I proceed to read:

The conditions of such registration will be that their accounts, as at present required under the Companies Acts, should contain an additional item showing the average profit on turnover, and that their prices shall, as far as practicable, be maintained at a figure to include such average profit, where this is agreed as equitable for the type of business concerned (the suitable profit being of course, largely dependent on the velocity of turnover).

I pause to comment there that it will be noted by those who have followed these words that social credit is not opposed to profit. It favours the profit motive as being perhaps the finest incentive ever discovered by man to encourage people to produce. But it does not agree with allowing the profit to be determined at will, or through the whims of the people who are making the profits. This profit is agreed upon, after study, as being the proper profit, having in mind the possible turnover; and having been agreed upon, it is held to by all concerned.

May I quote from one other authority, this time from the "A.B.C. of Social Credit" by E. S. Holter, published in 1944. Before I commence reading, may I point out that this book is accepted by Major Douglas as being authentic. He has said of it that it is a straightforward, honest and simple outline of social credit; and of course members in this group accept it. There has been no deviation by members of this group from the ideas and opinions, both economic and financial, of the great founder of the movement, Major C. H. Douglas. I read from page 49 as follows:

To put the foregoing proposal into effect would not imply the elimination of competition in industry—there would be no fixing of prices. Taking a fair price level as a basis (not a level conditioned by a period of either inflation or deflation) prices would vary as today according to the variety of commodity being sold. The retailer availing himself of the discount would obviously be able to undersell those who preferred not to make use of it.

May I interpolate there for the sake of those who are following so closely. It is quite obvious that there is no desire to force people to use the discount. We will say a large company selling coal is able, by coming under the scheme, to sell its coal twenty-five per cent lower than it could under ordinary circumstances. If the company does not choose to come under the scheme and accept that privilege of selling under the discount, that is entirely a matter for the company to decide. But that company will soon find itself in competition with other companies which are selling under the discount and will feel the pinch and be induced to fall in line. Our C.C.F. friends and a good many others throughout the house are quite disturbed over monopolies, but they will find no monopoly in the country which cannot be brought under control by inducement. I proceed to quote:

> The question of profits might conceivably ruin all the benefits to be derived from the application of the "just price." What is to prevent producers from raising their prices sky high and then using the discount purely to their own advantage? The answer is simply this—that producers wishing to avail themselves of the right to dispense the discount would have to agree to a fair but fixed profit on turnover. To put it another way, using a hypothetical illustration—a producer will be offered a proposition such as the following: "If you will agree to continue to sell an article at $20 instead of raising the price to $25, by being eligible to dispense the discount you can offer that article to the consumer for $15, the sum of $5 being reimbursed to you through the national credit account." Now though in some instances profits on individual sales would be less than they are today, the fact that the producer is enabled to sell his articles below cost, assures him of a far greater number of sales. In this way his increased turnover would more than compensate for any decrease of profit on individual sales. If he rejects this offer and sells a portion of his goods at whatever price they will fetch, he runs the risk of having a large portion of his goods remaining for they will be in competition with goods benefiting by the discount. Here it must be observed that there is no compulsion involved. The producer makes his own choice.

Just a word or two further and I will close this technical discussion, technical because technicalities are necessary because of the difficulties which confront us. The question will arise, "Where is the money coming from?" This is the question the Liberals will be asking constantly. The Minister of Finance will be asking constantly, "Where is the money to come from?" Let me say once more, even at the risk of having people, as did the hon. member for Cape Breton South this afternoon, superficially sneer at the idea, that the money can be created under certain circumstances by the state, debt free. It will be sound money and just as desirable and as free from every kind of inflationary tendency as the finest money that can be borrowed from the strongest bank on the face of the earth.

The question will be raised now as to how the money can be created. All that it is necessary to remember is that it will simply be a ticket to goods. Where goods are, tickets can be created. Where you have seats in a theatre, tickets to the seats can be created. Where there are seats in a train, tickets to those seats can be created. Where there are goods and services not being purchased by the purchasing power at present in circulation in the country, the government can create tickets representing those goods and services. Those tickets will be sound money and will not cause any rise in price, and consequently they will not cause any kind or degree of inflation.

An hon. MEMBER: Can they be cancelled?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Under certain circumstances they could be cancelled. I do not want to go into details, but that is a very good question that has been asked. I simply ask hon. members to bear in mind that in a talk of this kind it is not desirable to go into too great detail, not because I cannot do it but because, as I pointed out on March 7, in a talk of this kind it would make too long and complicated a speech if I went into too great detail.

In certain circumstances these tickets could be cancelled just as tickets to seats can be cancelled out of circulation. Under certain circumstances the banks lend great quantities of money. Under other circumstances they withdraw their loans and cancel the money out of circulation. The objection to the present system is that the money lent is not always lent upon sound principles nor is the cancellation of money out of existence always sound. That is why in the depression in the United States it was found that that country which had started with $23 billion found itself $8 billion short inside of four years, because $8 billion out of $23 billion of the purchasing power had been cancelled out of circulation. The United States was trying to carry on with too little money, and consequently it suffered just as much as an animal would suffer that had lost one-third of its blood.

Money can be cancelled out of circulation and would be under certain circumstances and in accordance with certain definite rules. I feel that I have said enough on this occasion to put before the house and before those in the country who are interested the social credit attitude on controls. Once more let me sum up. The Social Credit party is absolutely in favour of control by inducement, but it is unalterably opposed to control by coercion, unless by some chance you had to deal with some pugnacious company and I doubt whether any such company would continue to carry on very long in the country. Social credit is opposed to autocratic and totalitarian control, but it is in favour of control that will control prices and wages by inducement, mainly by subsidies and bonuses.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a very interesting exposition tonight on the theories of social credit, one which has been a little clearer than others I have heard and yet one which I think is based upon a false premise. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) state that he and his party agree that the cost of living must not be permitted to rise, but I cannot see how the cost of living can be kept down by inducement. I think it can be kept down only by the sanction of law or by the force of the state.

An hon. MEMBER: How about subsidies?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I intended to deal with subsidies. I know in the province from which I come the price of milk was kept down by the provincial authorities, by the state if you like, despite the subsidy which was being paid. What intrigued me was the reference made by the hon. member to the United States, one which has been repeated in other parts of this house. I have heard the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) use it. The United States has been held up to us as an example of private enterprise. I think those who hold up the United States as an example of private enterprise have not delved deeply into the recent economic history of that country.

I would suggest to those who believe that the United States is the last hope of private enterprise that they read the minutes of the temporary national economic committee which was set up by the late President Roosevelt in 1938 and which made its report in 1942. The best statement I have seen about the last island of private enterprise appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 31 of this year. That paper said:

> Private enterprise, then, in its most complete form is to be found in a small island upon this continent.

Of course the largest part of that island is the United States. I should like to examine the private enterprise which prevails in that country. All the figures I am using are those which have been submitted to that government committee, T.N.E.C. and all can be verified from the reports of that committee.

We find, for instance, that private enterprise may exist in the United States, but it is a private enterprise which is leading to a still greater concentration of economic power, a private enterprise which is leading increasingly to monopoly, and that, of course, belies the very meaning of private enterprise. Between 1938 and 1942, in 95 per cent of American industries, and those the smallest, employment declined by 23 per cent, whereas in the other five per cent, and those the largest corporations, employment increased by 22 per cent, showing a concentration of employment in the larger companies. From that we can deduce that the relative importance of small business is steadily declining, while domination by big business is becoming much more pronounced. Those figures are pointed by this interesting fact, that 50 per cent, or the smaller half of employers in the United States employed only four per cent of the labour in that country, while nine-tenths of one per cent of the largest employers employed 50 per cent of the wage-earners of the United States. These figures are startling in their implications, but I have checked them and rechecked them to make certain they are correct.

Some twelve years ago, in 1935, there was a study produced by the Brookings institution, one which involved the publication of four volumes, and those who were engaged in that study were not men who were notoriously sympathetic to the left in their outlook. One of the conclusions they came to was that in that land of free private enterprise the distribution of incomes amongst consumers was startlingly unequal and, to add point to that, we find from the T.N.E.C. report that one-tenth of one per cent of the richest families in the United States received as much income as did the lowest 42 per cent of the families in that country; surely another indication of the fact that wealth is becoming more and more concentrated in this last island of free and private enterprise.

Furthermore, those who were responsible for the Brookings study stated, what I hope we already know, that money savings did not automatically become new investments. As a result of that, there was a deficiency of purchasing power on the part of consumers. Those who had the money were unwilling either to spend it all in consumer goods or to risk it in new investment, so that there appeared on the economic scene in the United States an actual deficiency of purchasing power, which, of course, resulted in the depression.

What was the cost of that depression brought on by private enterprise? Between the years 1929 and 1939, 43 million man-years were lost through unemployment. This was private enterprise, perhaps not at its best, but private enterprise as it is expected to function again in the near future in the United States. Along with that loss in labour there was a loss, it has been calculated, of $120 billion in wages and in salaries, and during those eleven years when 43 million man-years were lost through unemployment the federal government had to spend between two and six billion dollars each year to alleviate hunger and suffering.

The hon. member who has just spoken has just told us that private enterprise has not failed. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that private enterprise has failed and for this reason if for none other, that private enterprise has never been able to give full employment to the people except in time of war. That is too expensive a way to provide full employment.

Another fact which that committee pointed out was that during the time it was sitting less than three per cent of United States families received incomes of $5,000 or more, while 54 per cent of the families received incomes of $1,250 or less.

Mr. JAQUES: That is more than they get in Russia.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I have no doubt about that. It is also more than many get in Canada.

In 1935, based on reports of 400,000 corporations which filed balance sheets with the bureau of internal revenue, 55 per cent of these corporations held only 1·4 per cent of the total recorded assets, while two-tenths of one per cent, or, in number, 780 corporations, held 52 per cent of the recorded assets; thus showing once again the truth of what we have been saying, that private enterprise leads inevitably to the concentration of economic power and to monopoly. Indeed in 1941 one-half of one per cent of all manufacturing establishments were awarded 75 per cent of all war contracts. Thus, when we hear the United States praised as the home of private enterprise we should be careful how we accept those words, because private enterprise there is becoming more and more monopolistic enterprise. The odd thing is that most defenders of private enterprise assume without much reason, that the existing system is competitive and that competition in itself leads of necessity to efficiency. That was a theory which was held by Liberal economists and Liberal philosophers over a hundred years ago. They believed that if there were many small units manufacturing, producing and distributing, the consumer would inevitably get the benefit. But the small manufacturing concerns found that competition was expensive and extravagant, and so we saw the more powerful ones gobbling up or driving into bankruptcy or absorbing their competitors until we have come to the system of free enterprise as it exists today.

Walter Lippmann, who is becoming more conservative as days go by, has this definition:

> Competition is something of which producers have only as much as they cannot eliminate.

That, I think, is true. We find that same lack of competition in this country. We find that the people are being subjected not to the control of government but to the control of private enterprise. As a result of the price spreads commission, certain facts were brought to light, and we found this situation in Canada. I have here a table which I have taken from "The Control of Competition in Canada" by Lloyd G. Reynolds. The table is headed, "Control of output in selected manufacturing industries," and it shows that 89 per cent of the output of automobiles is controlled by three firms; 100 per cent of the output of ammunition, explosives, ammonia and chlorine is controlled by one firm; 75 per cent of the output of agricultural implements is controlled by four firms; 90 per cent of the output of cement is controlled by one firm; 93 per cent of the output of copper is controlled by four firms; 83 per cent of the output of canning (fruit and vegetable) is controlled by two firms; 79 per cent of the output of cotton yarn and cloth is controlled by three firms; 100 per cent of the output of electrical equipment is controlled by three firms; 91 per cent of the output of lead is controlled by one firm; 85 per cent of the meat packing is controlled by two firms; 100 per cent of the output of artificial silk is controlled by two firms, and so on all down the line. Private enterprise as it exists in the imagination of many members of this house does not exist in fact.

At this stage I should like to read from Hansard of 1932-33 certain remarks made by the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). At page 2510 he said:

> Price fixing by agreements restrict and hamper trade internally.
> The internal trade of our country has become honeycombed and enmeshed by secret understandings and agreements. The protective tariffs, as they obtain in Canada today, have fostered the formation of combines, monopolies and trusts, and under these combines, monopolies and trusts there are no end of secret agreements by which prices are being held at artificial figures.

The right hon. gentleman who made that statement is now Prime Minister of Canada, but we are still enmeshed and honeycombed with secret understandings and agreements, and many of them have been exposed on the floor of this house. And protective tariffs as they then obtained in Canada obtain in Canada today. The Prime Minister went on to say:

The system of distribution of products needs overhauling. Distribution should be on a service-at-cost basis. The spread in prices is too great, as any comparison of prices paid to producers with prices consumers have to pay will make self-evident.

That was true in 1933 and it is equally true today. The spread in prices today is too great; the spread in profits is too great. But lest I be accused of unfairness in quoting from only one section of the house, I will also quote from a radio address given on January 11, 1935, by one who was then leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Bennett. The title of this part of the address is the "Duty of the State". Here are Mr. Bennett's words, and we realize, after hearing them, why he had to find sanctuary in England:

In some ways, though only in some ways, conditions have improved since early times. Who made them better? Why, the state. In the past, even Liberal governments, now and then, in times of crises, had to swallow their economic principles and come to the rescue of the people. Laissez-faire had worked such frightful hardships in the circumstances that even the apostles of laissez-faire had to take note of that. But what a feeble, halting intervention. Now today, the accumulated inequalities of capitalism demand independent and courageous action by government. Is the party of laissez-faire ready to take it? The tragedy of these times has put that question straight up to it. Why has it not answered? I will tell you. Because it cannot say "Yes." Because it dare not say "No!" That is why it is dumb.

That is why the party of laissez-faire apparently finds itself in the same predicament today when on the subject of controls it cannot say "yes" and it dare not say "no."

The unfortunate thing about decontrol is that every step the government has taken has merely hastened the next step, and what a few months ago was called by this government orderly decontrol has now most obviously become a disorderly rout. We know what the effects of rising prices are. One would think the government especially would know. For their edification, I should like to read some more remarks by one who was then Minister of Labour and who is now Prime Minister of Canada, remarks made as long ago as 1909 about the evils of rising prices:

This increase in the cost of living has not been confined to any one class. Rich and poor alike have had some experience of it, but it has had a very serious effect upon men of limited incomes, upon the wage-earning classes, upon those whose salaries are fixed and those who do not receive much in the way of remuneration.

What was true in 1909 is just as true today. To continue:

To one family after another it has meant curtailment of enjoyment, the forgoing of opportunities of education or recreation, a neglect of future needs, and the claims of others for future support, the giving up of insurance policies; to many it has meant a mode of living less congenial or beneficial to that previously enjoyed to some, downright privation and hardship; to all sacrifices of one kind or another.

These words were uttered thirty-seven years ago. They are equally true today, and I hope the government will pay some attention to the views of its present leader in this respect.

We have pointed out several times the experience of the United States. Last year, in June, OPA was killed. Immediately prices rose. Then there was a temporary recession, only to be followed by what has since turned out to be a constant increase in prices, as those who have been in the United States can well realize. In November of last year Mr. Donald Gordon, a man who has served Canada well and who has been frequently maligned, had this to say:

Canada now had an excellent opportunity to study the effects of general control removal in the United States before following a similar path.

We had an excellent opportunity to see the way, and we could have watched; we could have studied; but we refused to do so. The argument has been made that decontrol will lead eventually to increases in all sorts of goods on the market, but what do we find in the report of the wartime prices and trade board of last year at page 45? I am taking these two statements out of their context, but not unfairly. Dealing with furniture:

During the year, significant price adjustments were authorized on all the main types of furniture.

Later, on the same page:

By the end of the year, the total supply of household furniture had improved substantially. There was, however, a lack of balance in the supply since higher-priced lines were quite plentiful and lower-priced lines were often scarce or unobtainable.

That is what happened when control was taken off there. Naturally the manufacturers went into more profitable lines, and the people not able to buy furniture are those who need it most.

There has been a general rise in prices all across the board and one which must have as its inevitable effect the lowering of the standard of living of Canadian workers; and, just as obviously, the trade union organizations of Canada are not going to permit that lowered standard of living to continue. Therefore they will demand, and I think rightly so, higher wages to maintain their standard of living, and so once again Canada is faced with the possibility if not the probability of severe labour troubles this year. But the government has continued its course of decontrol, having had some knowledge of what the people of Canada want.

I think we can place a certain amount of faith in the Gallup poll, and the last Gallup poll I saw concerning the maintenance of controls led me to believe, properly, that two-thirds of the Canadian people wish to see these controls maintained. Had the government listened to the people more than to certain other advisers, I think these controls would have been maintained in better order than they have.

It has been argued frequently that by the imposition of controls our freedom in Canada is threatened. It all depends, of course, upon the definition of "freedom". Lincoln said that the sheep and the wolf were not agreed upon the definition of the word "freedom". I am quite sure that the hon. member for Stanstead and I, or the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and I are not agreed on the definition of that word. It appears to me that the freedom that they want is freedom for the economically powerful to continue to exploit the people. The freedom I should like to see is the freedom of the people maintained to continue a standard of living which will keep them in some measure of decency. But we are faced with the odd situation where those who are asking for freedom in Canada today are the top dogs and not the under dogs. There are the two conceptions of freedom: that, I think perhaps not unfairly, which is held by the hon. member for Stanstead of "Leave me alone; let me do as I want to do," that concept of freedom which gives all the power in the world to the powerful—

Mr. HACKETT: All subject to the law.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Granted it is all subject to the law, but even subject to the law the powerful have been able to wreak their will against the poor. On the other hand, there is the other concept of freedom which is, I think, that of the majority of the people of this country: "Give me a chance; give me a chance to live in decency; give me a chance to live with some security; give me a chance to live so that I shall be able to buy the necessities of life for my family and so that I can feed them properly." That chance is demonstrably not being given to them. If this headlong haste in decontrol continues we in this country shall be faced with economic chaos. There is the distinct possibility that we shall face inflation, and inflation is just another method of taxing the people. Inflation is just another method of taxing the poor, those who can least afford taxation. That is why I say that the government, if it feels any responsibility at all to the people, ought immediately to stop this process of decontrol and to reimpose some of the controls it has taken off.

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the debate which has been going on in this house has brought forth a number of opinions on what controls will do for the country. I should like to be realistic and practical in what I have to say on the subject. I know that controls remedied the very bad conditions that we had between 1930 and 1940 and brought us through one of the tightest crises Canada ever was in during the war days. The motive behind the wartime controls was our united effort to win the war or everything would have been lost; and controls made a good job of it. With the same motivation in the interest of peace and humanity, controls can do an equally good job.

In my lifetime, the capitalist democratic freedom and liberty that I knew about brought two of the worst depressions and two of the most disastrous wars in history. Selfishness and greed, wholly out of control. were the cause. The fact of the matter is that right up to the day we declared war we were supplying the countries that we fought against with thousands of tons of nickel and scrap-iron with which they built up their fighting machines. This was done through the channels of free enterprise, free national enterprise, free international monopolistic enterprise. I think hon. members will agree with that. These are the very same people and institutions who are today hollering for decontrol. The motive and spirit behind this hollering is selfishness, greed for power, domination and money, which is totally devoid of the Christian spirit of humility and service to mankind; and, Mr. Speaker, this is reaching out far beyond American shores today.

There was no quarrel in the world of international finance before the war. St. James street, Wall street, the Bank of England, the Reichsbank of Germany, the banks of Italy and France, international finance—they were all of the same kit. One hon. member to the right of us spoke about those countries as dictatorships. If I remember aright, we had said nothing about dictatorship in Germany and those other countries before the war. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) went over to Germany in 1937 Hitler was not such a bad fellow. As a token of our high appreciation when he came back to Canada he sent Hitler a pair of buffaloes for his wild animal park. Mussolini had world recognition. If Hitler had not kicked over the traces after Canada, the United States and England had fed him up and made a big fellow of him, if he had played ball, I do not think there would have been a war with Germany. It was the "master race" idea that we fought against. It was not a quarrel with international finance or monopolies or things of that kind. It was the "master race" idea of Hitler, Mussolini and Tojo and their world domination idea that we fought against. Did we call them nazis and fascists in 1937? No. They were good international capitalists, with world-wide monopoly control, along with the rest of us.

So far as Canada is concerned, we are on the way back to everything we had before the war, with additional billions of debt on which to pay interest. Has there been any fundamental change in the national economy of Canada that will give us anything different from what we had before the war? If there is, the controls have done it and will continue to do it. Any government that has any power today will have to accept the responsibility for the welfare of all the people. The official opposition has made much ado about the constitutional rights of the provinces. I say that the three western provinces are only enlarged municipalities and, under our economic and financial system, they have not the power or the scope to look after themselves. The federal government must have the coordinating power to look after the social welfare of all the people of Canada. There must be one national government for all the people of Canada, not the Tory idea of nine little governments, or nine little Balkan states. In the ten years before the war the population of the three western provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—shrank by 104,000. It should have gained twice that much, in the midst of the greatest abundance of food ever accumulated in one place on earth.

Both old parties were equally helpless under the financial and distribution system of that day. The war taught the Liberal party a lesson, because they had a great responsibility.

[Mr. McCuaig.]

The Tories had no responsibility, and they learned nothing. They are still a horse and buggy party. I have a feeling of great sympathy and loyalty for a government which makes a conscientious endeavour to solve the economic and social chaos in which we find ourselves today. We cannot hope to go scot-free from all our sins of the past. We may yet have to atone severely for them.

In addition to the economic conditions facing us at the present time, we have to deal with this situation. From 1930 to 1940, or one might say to 1945, we had a new generation growing up in Canada. In that space of time they did not learn how to do anything. They did not learn any trades; they had no responsibilities, and that is something from which we are suffering today. They could have learned a great many things by way of trades and skills that would have come in very handy today.

I contend that the economic and social chaos of today cannot be solved under the capitalist system, as we learned in pre-war days. The government knows that. This bill, providing for the continuation of controls and other emergency measures, now contained in fifty-seven orders in council, is proof of that. It will depend wholly upon the motivation behind these controls whether or not they fill the bill. If the motivation is to serve humanity all the way, then the new order has taken its first step on the way to a better economy in Canada. I should like to quote from a pamphlet I hold in my hand entitled "God—Man—Work", and I wish to add two more words, "Science—Resources." This is a statement on human relations in industry and commerce by the Montreal council on Christian social order, subscribed to by thirty-nine representatives of the following churches: Anglican, Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, Russian Orthodox, Salvation Army and United. I quote:

> Our present economic and industrial order is built largely upon false notions of self-interest and competition, which have resulted in confusion and division; its methods of unbridled competition and self-seeking are causes of friction and warfare, fore-dooming the industrial world where they prevail to anarchy and strife (such as we are now experiencing) . . .

And further:

> It is necessary, for example, that irresponsible ownership be curbed and that the primacy of human rights over property rights be fully recognized in positive law. It is also necessary that labour realize that its gifts and arts are, like property, a trust to be used for the benefit and service of all. Moreover, we declare that the resources of the earth are God's gifts in trust to the whole human race, to be used with due consideration for the needs of future generations as well as of the present. These resources should be regarded in a spirit of reverence which will be a safeguard against the selfish exploitation of the bounties of nature and the treatment of material things as mere commodities.

In the light of these Christian principles which we have mentioned, and as conducive to the attainment of true democracy and brotherhood in industrial relations, we for the present advocate:

1. The recognition in our laws and in our practice of—

(a) the right of association;

(b) the right of collective negotiation;

(c) the full partnership of labour with capital in industrial management, economic planning and governmental regulations;

(d) the responsibility of both capital and labour to the general public;

(e) the participation of the public in industrial negotiation, planning and regulations, along with capital and labour.

2. A wage that will ensure a decent standard of living for the family; that is to say, an income sufficient to provide adequate food, clothing and shelter, educational opportunities, medical and dental care, and holiday with pay. (An immediate need is better housing at low rent for the strengthening and safeguarding of family life, and in the interests of moral and physical well-being.)

3. A system of social security that will meet the economic needs arising from such contingencies as unemployment, accident, illness, old age, or the death of the breadwinner; and will guarantee freedom from want.

4. That such family income, adequate housing and social security be provided by the cooperative effort of individuals and industrial groups, encouraged and, where necessary, aided by state action.

The Tories are clearly out of this picture, by their own admission. They do not subscribe to this logic. I honestly believe we have seen the last of Tory government in Canada. They have just had a convention; perhaps they have new ideas. I have just read a book called "Ideas Have Legs," and I would recommend it to hon. gentlemen to my right. Perhaps the ideas of the C.C.F. are moving in their direction; I hope so. Purely for information I would ask the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, who opposes these controls and who would have no scruples about taking over the reins of government in Canada: What have the Progressive Conservatives now in 1947 to bring about a better economy in Canada that the Liberal Progressive Conservatives did not have in 1935? What fundamental difference is there between the Bracken policy of 1945 and the Bennett policy of 1935? Further, I should like to know their domestic and international policy. Is it to have a high tariff wall around Canada, like Mr. Bennett had, and to blast our way through the high tariff walls other countries would put up against us? Many times this house and the country at large have been told by hon. gentlemen to my right terrible things about socialism which I, as a socialist, know nothing about.

Mr. FRASER: The socialists are keeping you in the dark.

Mr. McCUAIG: And here is a man who never went to the socialist school telling socialists all about their own system. I can tell my hon. friend that the roots of socialism are deep in the minds of the producers and workers. That is what socialism sprang from, not from the institutions for which hon. members to my right stand. And it is gaining ground in every country in the world. The day is coming when it will be recognized in the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God throughout the world.

I do not want to live under a more autocratic dictatorship than that of the Bennett government between 1930 and 1935. It was an economic dictatorship, if there ever was one. It stood solidly behind big business and monopolistic enterprise which controlled our natural resources, industry, transportation and finance.

A government's job is to administer those things in the interests of all the people of the country it governs. In substantiation of this, one need only refer to those 3,000 boys from western Canada who in 1935 formed a delegation to come to Ottawa. But the bureaucrats in Ottawa at that time had them stopped at Regina, by police and machine guns. They were put in five-dollar-a-month camps, and if they left those camps they were treated as criminals. And that happened in a free Canada, under a good Tory government, and at a time when there was another Tory government in Regina.

Mr. MacNICOL: "Good" is right.

Mr. McCUAIG: That was at a time when there was a free exchange of commodities with all the world. Those were the days when prices of foodstuffs reached their lowest point in 400 years. Mr. Bennett's policy at that time was that he was going to blast his way into the markets of the world. Hitler used the same logic, and they both got their just deserts. We won our struggle during the war because our whole motivation was to do it. By the same token we can bring about the same results in peace time, if we use the same endeavours to put man on the pedestal and to serve him with all the resources given us. If we follow that method, it can be done.

Let me say, further, that agriculture in Canada will not continue to elect governments which have repeatedly turned down their just requests. Labour people and those in the public service will not continue to elect governments under which they have to organize strikes so as to fight for a fair share of the fruits of their labours.

The common people have learned that they can have cooperatives, that they may join collectively in cooperatives and in trade unions or other organizations. But in the final analysis the political economy we have in Canada has control of the national economy. That national economy can listen to the voice of the common people or listen to the voice of their masters and starve the common people into slavery.

Mr. HOMUTH: Who are the common people?

Mr. McCUAIG: The hon. member has lived in Canada, the same as I have, but apparently he does not realize that eighty-five per cent of the people in Canada work for $2,000 or less a year.

Mr. HOMUTH: The fact that they work does not make them common.

Mr. McCUAIG: I have referred to them as the common people. I would close by saying that these controls are at least an experiment in peace time, in the interests of all Canadians, and I am going to support them. I do so because they are a step in the right direction.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to become technical. For a few moments I should like to discuss the philosophy of controls as contrasted with freedom of enterprise. First of all, however, I should like to pay tribute to Mr. Donald Gordon. I do this for two reasons. I have heard, and I suppose we have all heard, in our conversations with others, people who have cursed and damned Donald Gordon for all the shortages and inconveniences of the controls. I say that is a mistake, and for two reasons. In the first place, I am quite sure that Donald Gordon does not deserve that treatment. In my personal experiences with him, limited as they were, I always found him a most obliging public servant, and one who was always willing to do what he could to help out.

The other reason is that it leads to confusion in the minds of many people who mistake controls for the controller. They do not like the results of the policy of control; but, instead of blaming the controls, they were apt to blame the controller. I believe that is a mistake, and it is for that reason I have mentioned the matter this evening.

One eminent Liberal member has said that he was fed up with certain Liberal policies. Let me say that I am fed up with certain policies today. I am fed up with any Liberal who is jilting Liberalism for socialism and trading freedom for control. I am fed up with the C.C.F. double-talk about democratic socialism and their promises to control everybody but the farmer. I am fed up with our socialists opposing communism and at the same time consistently supporting Soviet policies and never mentioning the fact that Karl Marx, the socialist prophet and Messiah, was the author of the communist manifesto. I am fed up with the self-appointed defenders of our civil liberties who instead defend disloyal and dishonest public servants, while advocating the surrender of our national control of our national freedom. Finally, I am fed up with the controls and subversive propaganda of the Red networks of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, of the national film board and of the wartime information board. At another time I intend to go farther into that subject.

The fact is that socialists are waging a sham fight with communism. England today proves that socialism and free enterprise do not mix, that they are mutually destructive. Socialism means the total destruction of private enterprise and of individual freedom. That was Marx, and that is Marx today. Let me quote from the communist manifesto of Karl Marx of 1848, just 100 years ago.

1. Abolition of property in land.
2. Heavy, increasing, graduated income tax.
3. Abolition of all rights of inheritance.
4. Centralization of credit in state by national bank (and international bank).
5. Centralization of means of transport in hands of state.
6. Extension of ownership of means of production by state.
7. Equal obligation of all to work.
8. All children educated in state schools.

That was and is the Marxian policy. Is that not exactly where we are headed today? I should like to put on record some notes which I have made from time to time of the social credit conception of democracy, its philosophy. I do not intend to speak technically at all, and I want to be just as brief as possible. Democracy is not so much a form or policy as it is an abiding faith in man's individual right to be himself as himself. That faith is natural. It is only the man with self-respect who has any respect for others and so is capable of governing. Lacking this sound human foundation, government and controls must become a dictatorship; collective security, a delusion, and internationalism, world tyranny.

Today democracy, so-called, is by code. Our whole way of life, therefore, is no longer a free or living inspiration. To be free, a man's life must flow from within. Democracy must aid and not prevent that flow. We call ourselves a democracy when we are doing our best to kill the truth, the truth that all inspiration has its source within the individual. Socialists and "fellow travellers" have one idea, to smother all such inspiration and to bury all responsibility under government controls.

True democracy must come from within, from the inner man, as our Lord saw it; not the masses, but the living individual soul. This organic living organization can grow only from the independence of the individual. Individual independence means freedom to be true to oneself, and that freedom cannot be enforced or planned by the state. As with certain wild creatures, our inspirations cannot breed in captivity.

Force is useless; force can organize nothing. Nor can science solve the problem. Science has given us the tools, but science cannot guide us in the proper and humane use of those tools. It is only from organic growth and interior individual philosophy and a living religion that our national life can be recreated, that people can attain security with freedom and government can be made and kept tolerable. So much for the philosophy of social credit.

In dealing with the problems of a depression, it may be necessary to be a little more technical. I—and I think most social crediters will agree with me, so that perhaps I can say "we"—believe that controls hamper production. Controls encourage black markets and the evasion of the law. What did the government do to prevent deflation before the war? What did the C.C.F. propose to do about deflation before the war? We hold that profits will encourage production and that increased production will decrease prices. I know that is being denied today, but I would suggest that there are two explanations. One is that production has not yet got into its full stride, and the other is the most determined policy on the part of all governments to export as much as possible of retail goods production.

It is obvious that exports, or foreign trade, were the remedy for deflation during the depression. How then can it be given as a proper remedy in these times when, according to the authorities, we are threatened with inflation? If it was necessary, as it was, to decrease purchasing power in time of war, then certainly it will be necessary after a bit to increase purchasing power in time of peace in order to prevent deflation. If inflation in a country is due to the diversion of production from retail goods to munitions, resulting in an excess of purchasing power, therefore deflation in peace time is due to the diversion of production from munitions to retail goods, which results in a deficiency of purchasing power. To prevent inflation, necessity would control, that is limit, consumption in war time. But how can we successfully control, that is limit, retail production in time of peace?

That leads me to the question whether there can be such a thing as a shortage of purchasing power. I remember that in 1939, I think it was, in the committee on banking and commerce when the present governor of the bank of Canada was a witness before the committee we debated this very question, and I put a hypothetical question to him. I quoted Mills' statement as to the impossibility of there being such a thing as a shortage of purchasing power. I forget the exact words but the statement runs something like this.

It is sometimes asked whether there can be such a thing as a shortage of purchasing power. Those who ask that question cannot understand what constitutes purchasing power. Every seller is, in the end, a buyer. Could we suddenly double the production of goods we should double the supply of goods on every market, but by the same stroke we should double demand. So that there cannot be such a thing as a shortage of purchasing power.

I put that statement to Mr. Towers and asked him if he agreed with it. He said it was a long time since he was at school but he still thought it was sound. I said, "May I put it a little differently?" I said that Mills said that every seller is, in the end, a buyer and could we suddenly double the production of goods in the country we should double the supply of goods on every market. I went on to say that every birth ends in a death. Mr. Towers said, "I beg your pardon?" I repeated, every birth ends in a death. Could we suddenly double the number of births in the country we should double the supply of babies in every nursery, but by the same stroke we should double the deaths. How then does a population increase?

Mr. Towers is most astute. He saw where the question was leading; so he turned it aside by saying, "My modesty forbids me to answer that question." I said, seriously, that is exactly what Mills said, that if you double the number of births you double the number of babies, but you would also double the number of deaths since we all must die. How then does the population increase? Hon. H. H. Stevens was sitting in the committee, and he said "That is simple. It is obvious. The birthrate is greater than the deathrate." I said, "Thank you; that is the answer." That is the social credit analysis of the shortage of purchasing power in normal times. It is that the birthrate of prices is greater than the deathrate of prices or, if you like, that prices are generated more quickly than purchasing power is distributed with which to meet those prices. That has been denied, I know, but no one has yet denied it successfully, and if anyone would like to try to I should be interested to hear him.

Our socialist friends talk about the freedom and brotherhood of man, but what do they offer for the freedom of man except to put him to work? And what is their quarrel with the leaders of the old-line parties to which they are so much opposed? Their only quarrel is as to who shall do the bossing; that is all.

Social credit has a totally different philosophy. We offer and the very soul of social credit is the national dividend. It is the recognition of the right of all people to live or to at least exist as free men because the good God or nature or science, whichever you like to call it, no longer imposes the necessity of compulsory work on all people in order that we can have at least the means of existence. And so we say right out, not only is there no longer the necessity for full employment, but there is no longer the possibility of it unless work is created for its own sake. There is our challenge to the socialists when they speak of freedom and of the common man or of the submerged tenth. There is our offer, the right to live or at least to exist for every man, woman and child, and not at the price of being compelled to work. That does not mean to say, as we are sometimes told, that we should bonus idleness. We do not believe that it is human nature to be idle if men are healthy and if they have an opportunity of working at a worth-while job. We believe that people will be only too glad to put themselves to work when they are relieved from the drudgery of work for the sake of work.

In conclusion, I should like to quote from a radio address on the Catholic Hour by Right Reverend Monsignor Fulton J. Sheen. I quote it because he puts, in language better than I could hope to use, ideas which I hold and, I think, all other social crediters hold as well. He is speaking of the coming of the anti-Christ, and he says:

> How will he come in this new age to win followers to his religion? He will come disguised as the Great Humanitarian; he will talk peace, prosperity and plenty, not as means to lead us to God, but as ends in themselves. He will write books on the new idea of God to suit the way people live; induce faith in astrology so as to make not the will but the stars responsible for sins; he will explain guilt away psychologically as inhibited eroticism, make men shrink in shame if their fellowmen say they are not broadminded and liberal; he will be so broadminded as to identify tolerance with indifference to right and wrong, truth and error; he will spread the lie that men will never be better until they make society better and thus have selfishness to provide fuel for the next revolution . . .
> He will tempt Christians with the same three temptations with which he tempted Christ: The temptation to turn stones into bread as an earthly Messiah will become the temptation to sell freedom for security, as bread became a political weapon, and only those who think his way may eat; the temptation to work a miracle by recklessly throwing Himself from a steeple will become a plea to desert the lofty pinnacles of truth where faith and reason reign, for those lower depths where the masses live on slogans and propaganda. He wants no proclamation of immutable principles from the lofty heights of a church, but mass organization through propaganda where only a common man directs the idiosyncracies of common men. Opinions not truths, commentators not teachers. Gallup polls not principles, nature not grace—and to these golden calves will men toss themselves from their Christ . . .
> No man, the 19th century claimed, could be a good American, a good Frenchman or a good German if he accepted shepherding, albeit spiritual, from a spiritual head. But in the new era, what the modern lost soul will take particularly about the counter-church, is that it is catholic or international. It breaks down all national boundaries, laughs down patriotism, dispenses men from piety to country which the Christ enjoined, makes men proud that they are not Americans, not French or British, but members of a revolutionary class under the rule of its vicar who rules not from the Vatican, but the Kremlin . . .
> . . . millions today are embracing the counter-church for these very reasons; they love its infallibly defined dogmas of dialectical materialism, economic determination and its labour theory of value; they like its hierarchy, or approved party leaders, who, as bishops of the new counter-church who derive authority from the apostles, Marx and Lenin, and who in their role of secret police keep the errant in the party line, even indeed to the consummation of the world.

I could say more, Mr. Speaker, but I see that it is eleven o'clock.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to make a few remarks in regard to the bill now before the house, particularly by reason of the fact that throughout the day those to our left have devoted themselves, not to a discussion of the bill in question, but rather to an attack against ourselves in the official opposition in respect of the stand taken by the leader of this party.

May I say this? I think that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) ought to have introduced separate bills to cover these various orders in council; for we are placed in the position that, while we accept certain of these orders in council, some of them we cannot accept because we believe the time has come in this country to restore the right of the individual to recourse to the courts. I mention in that connection that there can be no justice for the individual when he is placed in the position in which the individual in this country is placed under various orders in council, whereby he is denied recourse to the courts and is also denied any right of action against those who administer the tremendous powers that are granted under different orders in council.

There is, as I see it, no justification for endeavouring to carry into the days of peace the tyranny of a bureaucracy that is permitted to make discriminatory orders, while the individual is denied the right of appeal to the courts. I cannot understand why, when amendments were being made to these various orders in council, something was not done to repeal the sections that grant to those administering the orders in council absolutely arbitrary power over the individual, denying to the individual the sacred right, which everyone should enjoy, of appeal to the courts against the tyranny of the acts of an administrator.

I have only a few moments at my disposal but I will mention this. Under the wartime prices and trade board regulations, is there any reason why the individual should be in the position of being subject to acts of unfairness on the part of a board, and is denied the right of appeal to the courts? I think we in this parliament should once more return to the principle of trusting the courts, instead of denying to the individual the right to appeal against unfair and tyrannical action. I cannot see why the Minister of Justice did not see fit to remove the powers contained in section 15—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is discussing a section of the bill on second reading.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am speaking on the principle and referring to the order in council referred to in the bill which we are asked to approve by a blanket vote on second reading. We are asked to approve the principle contained in paragraph 15 of the wartime prices and trade board regulations. We are also asked to approve other regulations at page 23. I have already dealt with page 28. We are asked to place in the hands of boards certain powers—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that we have before us Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war. We have not before us the actual orders in council.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I take a stand against you in that, if I may be permitted, with deference. The order in council to which I refer is appended to this bill that is before the house, and I am referring to the principle contained therein.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is for discussion in committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the subterfuge the government is operating under.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is experienced, and he knows that on second reading only the principle of the bill may be discussed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: Continue your speech tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 16, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADAIR LIMITED

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): On March 26 last, in reply to an inquiry by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), as reported at page 1758 of Hansard, I indicated that I would table certain documents with regard to the sale of Canadair Limited. I now table those documents. I think everything is here for which my hon. friend asked.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MOVEMENT OF UNEMPLOYED PERSONS TO EMPLOYMENT OUTSIDE NOVA SCOTIA

On the order for motions:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) stated there were 2,200 unemployed veterans of world war II in Cape Breton, and that these men would be prepared to move to employment found for them in other parts of Canada if transportation were provided. As this point now has been raised perhaps it would be helpful if I gave the house the facts regarding a programme, such as that now suggested, which has been in progress since early this year. That is why I made the statement I did yesterday.

The national employment service of the department initiated a programme some months ago in Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia to encourage the movement of unemployed persons to steady employment outside Nova Scotia. Unemployed persons registered in the employment offices in these areas, with particular emphasis on Cape Breton, were interviewed weeks ago to find out whether they were prepared to take employment offered elsewhere. They were advised that transportation would be provided to the place of employment. Unemployed workers not then registered were invited to do so through wide publicity. The type of work offered was in construction and mining operations in Ontario. It is to be understood that no pressure was placed upon the applicants; they were invited to go voluntarily. Those who refused were not later denied unemployment benefit payments by reason of their refusal.

The interviews were first undertaken at Cape Breton, but as the number in that area who were interested in and capable of taking employment was limited the programme was extended to other parts of the province. Of a total of 2,000 men interviewed in Nova Scotia, including 1,200 in Cape Breton, about 700 were found willing to take employment elsewhere, and were apparently qualified for the work offering. Of those 700 about 500 passed the first medical examination, but only 266 passed the X-ray tests which were necessary for mining employment. As my hon. friend knows, in hard rock mining the medical examination is somewhat severe. Nearly 170 failed to complete their medical examinations. Of those medically examined, between 250 and 300 have been dispatched to other employment in central Canada, the majority of the men coming from the Sydney area. At the present time orders are being secured in other lines for unemployed persons in the Cape Breton area who are unable to qualify for jobs in the hard rock mines but who are willing to take work outside Nova Scotia.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

The employment service advise that there are now 350 steady positions in Ontario available to the unemployed in the area referred to, with additional orders being received daily. The prospect is that there will be a substantial number of employment vacancies in central Canada which cannot be filled locally. The department has been paying transportation expenses in all cases, as well as the cost of medical examinations. I would think that in the circumstances many of the men to whom my hon. friend referred may have been interviewed already, but where men are not registered but are willing to take jobs elsewhere the first requisite is to register with the nearest employment office.

I think it will be recognized that one of the practical difficulties has been a disinclination on the part of many men—perhaps a natural one—to leave their present place of residence. Housing, of course, is a problem in regard to these movements. In consequence of housing difficulties, employment opportunities available at the moment are for single men, or for men willing to take the jobs and to await the removal of their families until accommodation can be found at their new location.

I need only add that in transferring men from Nova Scotia we are not overlooking the interest of workers in the locality where the labour demands to which I have referred exist. These are employment opportunities for which we have not been able to locate men in the vicinity of the work.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can the minister tell the house how many of the persons interviewed in Nova Scotia for movement to central Canada were single, and how many were married or had dependents?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sure my hon. friend would not expect me to carry in my mind a breakdown like that. My hon. friend is a married man like myself. I do not know the martial status of every individual I meet on Sparks street.

An hon. MEMBER: Martial?

Mr. MITCHELL: I mean what I said, martial status.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour for some information with reference to the statement he has just made? We started this thing and I would like to have it clarified. Am I correct—

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. GILLIS: —in my understanding—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Answered.

Mr. GILLIS: There are too many chipmunks over there.

An hon. MEMBER: Somebody is nuts over there.

Mr. GILLIS: I have lots of time; you fellows should be in a hurry.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. GILLIS: You are conducting the business of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.

Mr. GILLIS: We are only the policemen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to permit the hon. member who has the floor to ask his question.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry there is not more respect for you on that side. Am I correct in my understanding of the statement the minister made a moment ago that in finding a solution for the problem which we started to discuss last night, it is the responsibility of the local employment agencies to conduct a registration, and the responsibility also of the personnel affected, the men out of employment, to make application in the regular way? That has been the effect of the regulations up to March 31 of this year, when the selective service regulations which provided for that machinery went out of commission.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I am giving the minister some information.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member has a question to put to the minister he should be brief and to the point and not make a statement.

Mr. GILLIS: I would like an answer to that question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is the question?

Mr. GILLIS: I asked the minister if the selective service regulations that provided the machinery he has just described did not go out of date on March 31 of this year?

Mr. MITCHELL: My understanding is that they did not. I would say this to my hon. friend, and it covers a lot of territory: I think we have the finest employment service in any country on God's green earth.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

COAL-DISTILLED GAS

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Has the Department of Mines and Resources experimented in respect to obtaining coal-distilled gas?

2. If so, what is the estimated cost production per gallon on coal mined in Nova Scotia?

3. What is the estimated average cost to produce one ton of Nova Scotia coal?

4. What is the estimated number of gallons of gasoline which could be produced from one ton of Nova Scotia coal?

5. What action has been taken, if any, with respect to the setting up of a pilot-plant or scientific centre of research in Nova Scotia to study the question of producing coal-distilled gas and the use of coal by-products?

Mr. GLEN:

1. The offices of the Department of Mines and Resources have conducted small scale laboratory investigations on the direct hydrogenation of Nova Scotia coals for the production of gasoline. No work has been done to date on the alternative modified Fischer Tropsch process by which the coal is first gasified and the gas synthesized into gasoline and heavier oils.

2. Experimental work has been on a small laboratory scale and sufficient data are not available to make reliable estimates of commercial costs.

3. A comprehensive answer to this question is given in the "Report of the Royal Commission on Coal" 1946, chapter 4, pages 113-170. There are so many variable factors that it is difficult to give an average estimate of the cost, which could be used safely, of producing one ton of Nova Scotia coal.

4. It is estimated that about 60 gallons of gasoline could be produced per ton of coal. (This includes the coal required for power and hydrogen generation.)

5. The Nova Scotia government established recently the Nova Scotia research foundation to study in a general way all problems in research in Nova Scotia. It has not yet undertaken any specific investigation of the production of gasoline from coal or the use of coal by-products. Coal experts of this department are cooperating with that foundation.

NATIONAL HEALTH DEPARTMENT—OTTAWA BUILDINGS

Mr. FRASER:

1. Is the Department of National Health taking over a building on Parkdale avenue in the city of Ottawa?

2. If so, from what firm or individual, is this building being bought, or rented?

3. What is the cost, or rent, of this building?

4. What is the total floor space of this building?

5. Is the Department of Public Works renovating this building?

6. If not, by what firm, or individuals, are the alterations being done?

7. What is the estimated cost of this work?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. Rented from Ontario Hughes Owens Co., Ltd.

3. Rental $18,000 per annum.

4. Gross area 24,933 square feet. Net area 22,000 square feet.

5. It is the intention of the Department of Public Works to have this building fitted up with special plumbing, sinks, partitions, etc., to meet the requirements of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

6. No contract has yet been awarded.

7. Estimated cost cannot be made until definite requirements are known.

FISHERIES

SHIPPING OF CANADIAN CREWS ON FOREIGN VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that an American halibut schooner now in Lunenburg is most anxious to ship a Canadian crew, will the Minister of Fisheries state whether Canadians can ship on foreign vessels? If not, will the minister state what prevents such action and whether or not steps can and will be taken to permit a limited number of Canadian fishermen to ship on American vessels under these circumstances?

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): This matter was brought to my attention yesterday by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). I would ask that the hon. member allow his question to stand as a notice, and I will make a statement concerning the matter tomorrow.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

IGOR GOUZENKO—GRANTING OF LETTERS PATENT OF DENIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I should ask this question of the Secretary of State or the Minister of Justice. Has Mr. Igor Gouzenko been granted Canadian citizenship, and if so what procedure is being taken in connection with the matter?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Igor Gouzenko has not been issued a certificate of Canadian citizenship. He has been made a British subject by grant of letters patent of denization, which are issued under the prerogative powers of the sovereign—that is, in practice, by the governor in council.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did the Canadian government confer British citizenship apart from Canadian citizenship? What is the idea of granting British citizenship but not Canadian citizenship?

Mr. ILSLEY: A British subject may apply for Canadian citizenship if certain residence qualifications are complied with. Those are set out in the citizenship act.

Mr. HACKETT: He is an offshore citizen.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is application now being made by this person for Canadian citizenship?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure whether application has yet been made, because I do not know whether the residence qualifications have been complied with. But I believe it is the intention of Mr. Gouzenko to apply for Canadian citizenship.

Mr. KNIGHT: Can that citizenship be taken away by the same authority as grants it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. Is the hon. member referring to Canadian citizenship?

Mr. KNIGHT: No, British citizenship.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot answer that question. I know that the right to issue letters patent of denization is an ancient one, and it was by that procedure that Mr. Gouzenko was made a British subject.

BUTTER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY FOLLOWING REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. The dairy farmers in this country are anxious to know what their position will be with the removal of subsidies at the end of this month. Will the ceiling price of butter be raised to take the place of the subsidy of ten cents per pound on butter fat now being paid?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe I was asked much the same question before the Easter recess by three or four hon. members, including the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), and the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand). I can add nothing to what I said then, namely, that any changes which may be made with regard to prices of dairy products would be announced shortly before the 1st of May. I think I did assure those members at that time that the government had no intention of reducing the return which farmers would be receiving from the 1st of May on, as compared with what they had received just prior to the 1st of May. As to what form the payment will take, I am not in a position to say at the present time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EMERGENCY POWERS BILL—OLD AGE PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, based on a promise he made before the recess to consult his cabinet colleagues as to the possibility of placing certain legislation on the order paper at this time. The question had to do with old age pensions, and other legislative matters. Is this legislation now ready?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, it is ready.

Mr. KNOWLES: And can it be placed on the order paper now so that we shall have it while this debate is in progress?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the old age pensions bill must be preceded by a resolution, and it would be impossible to circulate the bill until the resolution is dealt with. So it was our conclusion that the best course to pursue was to finish the legislation we have before the house now. Then the resolution will be put on the order paper.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could not the resolution be put on the order paper now?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I make a supplementary reply? The legislation has been ready for some time—and the hon. member knows it, because I told him so in private.

Mr. COLDWELL: Surely it does not matter what an hon. member is told privately. It is the answer he gets on the floor of the house that counts.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I must rise to a question of privilege. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has made a statement as to information which he claims he gave me privately. I contend that things that are given privately should not be stated publicly, but as a matter of fact what the minister told me privately was that this matter would be proceeded with this session without fail. He did not at any time tell me that the legislation was already prepared.

Mr. MARTIN: I may have been in error in disclosing what I told the hon. member privately; I do not admit I was, but if I was, the fact is that the hon. gentleman knew before he put his question today that the legislation was ready.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the house and the country did not know it, and the house and the country have a right to know it.

Mr. MARTIN: The intentions of the government were made known in the speech from the throne; they were revealed to this house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on two occasions, twice by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), and to a public audience in this country by myself.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the meantime the old age pensioners are still waiting and suffering. There is nothing but delay.

Mr. MANROSS: I should like to suggest to the minister of health and welfare that in the future if he has any private information he would like to get to the public he should give it to two unofficial scorekeepers so it can be published in the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: I would have thought that the hon. gentleman knew of the London Free Press and would suggest that I give it to that very good newspaper.

IMMIGRATION

CARTIER BY-ELECTION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. When may we expect the major announcement as to the new government immigration policy which was so broadly hinted at in the recent Cartier by-election campaign?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the government will announce its policy in due course.

UNITED NATIONS

EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION—CANADIAN COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the gerat public interest in UNESCO and the activity in the United States in the national phase of that organization, can the minister inform the house what stage the Canadian government's plans have reached for the setting up of a purely Canadian commission as recommended by the preparatory commission?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I could not do that in the time that it would be appropriate to take at this moment.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister do it later? I think this is a matter of some interest.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will have no objection to disclosing everything in that connection at the proper time, but I do not think I could do it in a short answer to a question on the orders of the day.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister take it as a notice of question?

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, last evening at the time of adjournment I was dealing with some of the powers to be granted to the executive under the orders in council to which reference is made in the appendix. I emphasized particularly the necessity of restoring to the courts the determination of the rights of individuals. Since last evening I have had occasion to look up one of the most important judgments handed down in Britain in the last two years. It deals specifically with the rights of the individual as against executive authority exercised under legislation passed since the end of the war and arising indirectly therefrom.

This matter came before the court of criminal appeal in England, in the case of Leachinsky v. Christie. The judgment was reported in the 1946 Law Reports at page 124. The court was dealing with the very question I was endeavouring to place before the house last evening, namely, the necessity of restoring to the individual his right to take action against wrongdoers occupying administrative positions. Lord Justice Scott summed up the rights of the individual, and this was pointed out a little later on by one of the judges. It was stated that the appellant's breach of the clothing rationing regulations did not affect his right to personal liberty, that a transgressor of the law can still rely on the law and assert the law's supremacy.

This man took proceedings against certain police officials. I do not intend to go into the details, but the judgment is most significant. It has particular reference to the suggestion I made to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) last night that the untrammelled exercise of absolute power by administrative officials responsible only to the executive ought now to be removed from the orders in council that will continue to be the law if this bill is passed. Lord Justice Scott used these words at page 137:

> Subject only to the sovereignty of parliament, which under our constitution can make any law, English liberty is absolutely dependent on our courts of justice. To keep clear the distinction between the functions of the executive and those of justice is vital. The English nation has been wont in the past to speak of autocracy in any form as the enemy of personal freedom, but it is equally true that the good working of democracy (in the true sense of that much abused word) depends upon the rule of law.

He goes on to say:

> Arrest by the executive, uncontrolled by the courts, has happened in past times in English history, and it needed the intervention of the courts to curb the executive.

He refers to various authorities in that connection, and then goes on:

> The lettres de chachet of eighteenth century France afford another illustration; the Gestapo in Germany in recent years affords a third; and finally it is the fear of a repetition of that vast, insidious, and progressive evil of encroachment by the executive on the proper sphere of the judiciary which is paramount in men's minds when they say they fear and therefore hate bureaucracy.

In that judgment the British courts once more made the declaration, so necessary from time to time if liberty is to be preserved, that the individual must have the right of recourse to the courts against the executive or those appointed by the executive.

This bill consists of a skeleton to which is attached a schedule. Under that schedule parliament is asked on the second reading of the bill to approve the principle of the orders in council which are annexed by description. The orders in council reveal a hodge-podge of deletions, expurgations and substitutions. The C.C.F. party support this type of control. They are frank about it; they say it does not go far enough along the road of interfering with the rights of the individual.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is not true.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. member says that is not their view? That is the impression one would get.

Mr. KNOWLES: It does not go far enough in the direction of democracy.

Mr. ROWE: What is democracy?

Mr. KNOWLES: Control by the people of the things that affect their interests.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Now we have the definition. I do not object to interruptions, and that is a very helpful one. There cannot be democracy where there are controls which deny the right of the individual to recourse to the courts. Even in 1946 the high court of justice in Britain defended the individual from the very thing that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says is in his mind as democracy. Sir, democracy consists first and foremost in the right of the individual to freedom. It extends above all to his right, as the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has said on a number of occasions, to go to the foot of the throne, to appear before the king's judges, to be judged according to law and not according to administrative caprice.

What are we asked to do by this bill? After six or seven years of war are honest merchants and business men to be saddled with a continuation of powers which make men guilty unless they prove their innocence? Are we to be asked to give to officials the power to interrogate an individual without his having common law rights of protection? Are we to be asked to give boards power, exclusive, uncontrolled and untrammelled, to say that certain of these regulations shall apply to the masses of the Canadian people, and that some shall be exempt from their application? Is every man's business to be subject to examination, and is he to be denied the right, when found to be innocent, to take proceedings against those who did him wrong? I ask the Minister of Justice when he replies to say whether he will not remove these powers which have no right to exist, outside a period of war, if you will, and which only exist—and they certainly do exist—where there is a police state, something we do not want in this country.

Not only is a person liable to an offence under these regulations and orders, but, sir, if we approve these orders in council we approve the granting of these powers to a board or official not only to have a person incarcerated because of an infraction of the regulations or orders, but also to make him liable for failure to carry out what is known as a requirement directed by an administrative official. What happens if he is convicted—not of an offence against the regulations or against the order, but of an offence against the requirement? He is liable to a penalty of $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Are we to be asked under this blanket bill to approve the principle of these orders in council whereby the courts shall be circumvented, whereby the individual shall be denied his time-honoured rights, whereby investigators shall continue to exercise overwhelming powers of investigation, interrogation and inquisition? Sir, the Minister of Justice should give consideration to removing the unjustifiable immunity of bureaucrats and their staffs from liability to action where they are wrong. Those things, sir, are the stuff upon which a socialist government must depend to carry out its policies of coercion, and we have that situation today in Saskatchewan. Why were these portions of the orders in council not removed? Why were they continued? Why is this absolutism still permitted under order in council?

Speaking the other day in Toronto my right hon. friend said that the time had come to restore the freedom of the people, and that the government were trying to do that very thing. Apparently the government are now concerned over the fact that the freedoms of the people have been interfered with. I ask the minister, then: Is it not a fact that parliament cannot be too scrupulously regardful of the liberties of the people? Is it scrupulously regardful of these liberties by continuing to grant unnecessary and extraordinary powers to government officials to be exercised at their will and without regard to the consequences to the individual? As a matter of fact, if you commit no crime, and if they cannot convict you, under the powers of these orders in council which parliament is asked to make law, they still can cancel the licences of the individual who, standing for his rights, has refused to be coerced. Whether that power is generally used or not, it still remains in the law which exercises the power of subtle intimidation against every business man in this dominion.

I ask too, sir, that the sections granting those extraordinary powers be removed. These matters have nothing to do with the continuance of controls. They strike at the principle of the orders in council which parliament is being asked to give blanket support. As I see the situation, by voting for this bill as a whole, parliament is asked to approve a principle to which I am opposed—and I think there are members on all sides of the house who are opposed to it—namely, the right of the government by order in council to amend statutes. Two of these orders in council were passed to amend statutes, and parliament is asked to approve the extraordinary procedure which was followed all too often during the war, whereby after parliament passed a law the governor in council by order in council amended, suspended or abrogated it.

I was interested today to hear of the step taken in connection with Mr. Gouzenko. It was a magnificent step for him to take. There is one instance in which I do not raise objection to the government using that extraordinary and ancient remedy to give recognition to services rendered. But, sir, that extraordinary right, vested as I recall it in the crown, one of the prerogatives and rights exercised by the crown beyond parliament and in some cases without the advice of his advisers under the theoretical background and its ancient operation and procedure, was properly exercised in a case such as that of Mr. Gouzenko.

What else are we asked to do? How many hon. members realize that under this bill parliament is asked to approve the power of the wartime prices and trade board to grant to the sugar corporation larger powers than that corporation has under the charter granted by the department of the Secretary of State? In other words a corporation is set up under statute; the government sets up the wartime prices and trade board and grants it power to give to that corporation set up under statute greater powers than those provided for in its charter. This most extraordinary thing we are asked to approve. The reference may be found on page 45 of the summary of the orders in council comprising the appendix of this bill which has been handed to us.

Why were these extraordinary powers not deleted? If the minister says they are not to be used, why have them? If freedom is to be restored in this country—and the minister has said that the government intends to restore it—then start by removing powers which have harassed business men from one end of the country to the other. I hold no brief for the man who has done wrong, but I do hold a brief for the man who in endeavouring to uphold the law has been harassed and coerced by operatives during the last three or four years.

We are asked to approve fifty-seven orders in council. Some are good; some are bad. For the purpose of this bill the government asks the house to accept them holus-bolus, so that an hon. member who votes for the bill will be upholding things that are wrong, whereas if he votes against the bill because his conscience demands that he do so in order that these things shall not continue, that vote will be misrepresented and he will be held up as voting against certain of the orders in council which he would be prepared to support if given the opportunity in separate bills. As for me, I cannot approve the perpetuation of principles in these orders in council which characterize a police state. I realize that it will be said that these are strong words. Where in a police state was the foundation laid that did not first deny the individual the right of recourse to the courts?—and I once more use the words of Lord Justice Scott in Great Britain.

I cannot approve of orders in council which still continue to give the governor in council the right to amend statutes passed by parliament. Finally I cannot approve of a body such as the wartime prices and trade board being granted the extraordinary power to delegate to a corporation set up under dominion charter greater rights than that charter provides.

Freedom is indivisible. Freedom cannot be diminished and still remain freedom. There can be no freedom where the executive appoints administrative officers and says: Whatever you do, right or wrong, it is always right and we shall stand behind you; the courts will not protect those against whom you do wrong.

I shall deal with the other elements in this bill when the matter is before the committee. Today I have dealt with one thing, and it simply amounts to an appeal to the Minister of Justice, who is the custodian of the king's conscience and of justice, to remove these unfairnesses and to restore to the Canadian people their rights, the individual right of every citizen, rich or poor, of recourse to the courts; for only thus can be assured to the people the full meaning of the citizenship which was granted today to Mr. Gouzenko and which, as indicated by the statements he has made regarding these rights and responsibilities, he so highly prizes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the hon. member permit one question before he takes his seat? Does he favour or disapprove the principle of price control?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I favour anything that will be good for this dominion, provided the rights of the individual are protected.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes or no?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not think it is necessary to answer specifically many of the statements of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) about the tyranny of the bureaucrats, the destruction of the sacred rights of the individual, the disregard of the liberties of the people, the tearing down of the pillars of the constitution, and all those other lofty phrases that we have heard in so many thunderous accents on previous occasions when dealing with the kind of legislation that it was necessary to have to coordinate the efforts of the people of this country towards the result we were all so happy to see achieved about two years ago.

We do not forget, in spite of the impression that these phrases make upon us, that the hon. member is talking about our country, the country we have lived in for the last five years and the country for which these coordinated efforts were put forth during that period. It is the kind of tyranny we have had in this country that he is talking about, and he is talking about that to people who have lived here, not to those who do not know what has been going on but to those who have seen what was the result of the enactment and the operation of those measures, which I will admit are distasteful to any liberal-minded man and which are resorted to only when the circumstances make it necessary to do that for the safety, security and preservation of our institutions.

These measures have been criticized. We ourselves have felt that they were a proper subject of criticism, because they are not the kind of things to which we are accustomed or the kind of things toward which we are moving back at a pace which so many of our hon. friends in the house feel is too rapid. Nevertheless our critics, some of them—not all, but some of them who are concerned more perhaps with historical accuracy than with immediate political advantage—have had to admit, as Professor Lower did in a recent very interesting book, which he has entitled "From Colony to Nation", that these measures have not interfered with the freedom of the people. On page 534 I was amused at the way in which Professor Lower expressed his judgment upon that:

> The kindliest thing the historian can say about the King war administration—

That is after a pretty severe criticism of the machinery that had existed for the coordination of the joint efforts of the people.

> —is that it consisted of men most of whom were too thoroughly saturated in Liberal principles to take advantage of the arbitrary powers they had assumed. Despite defence of Canada regulations, despite neglect of parliament, Canada remained a free country, her press remained free, her citizens substantially retained their freedom of speech, and their representative institutions.

Mr. JACKMAN: What about George Drew?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

> The men charged with government had not within their breasts—

He was not talking about George Drew when he said this.

> —the men charged with government had not within their breasts the spirit of the despot, and although they erected a machine for war which, along with the other qualities of fine mechanism, had all the powers of the despotic state, they could not bring themselves to harness it to the ways of despotism.

Now what is this bill that is before the house, the principle of which is now being discussed? It is a bill to provide that for a period of twelve months the administration will have time, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) suggested before the last general election, to unwind gradually and in a progressive way the coils that had to be tightened for the purpose of coordinating our war effort.

The bill does not ask for the enactment of any new legislation. It refers to a body of wartime regulations, a body of regulations that we want to get rid of just as soon as we can without bringing about chaotic conditions; and we ask that, for a period of twelve months, such portions of it as may be necessary to avoid chaos be retained and be used in the manner described by Professor Lower, without impairment of the freedom of the individual, or without the destruction of the liberties of the people. When I hear hon. gentlemen say that the principle they are asked to approve on second reading is the text, the effect and the language of these 57 orders, I can hardly believe that they mean it.

If we look at the bill, what is it? The preamble states:

> And whereas provision is made for the expiry of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945; and whereas it is necessary by reason of the existing national emergency that certain orders and regulations of the governor in council made under the War Measures Act and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, be continued in force temporarily, notwithstanding the expiry of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, in order to ensure an orderly transition from war to peace.

That is the whole principle of the bill. Everything else is a matter of detail that will have to be considered in committee; and against any line, any word, any comma, objection can be raised. The only principle that the house is asked to pass upon at this time is that certain orders in council, certain regulations that were necessary during the war and are considered to be still necessary to provide for an orderly transition from war to peace, be continued for a limited period.

When hon. members say that by approving the second reading of the bill they are approving everything that is in the 57 orders in council, I am sure they do not mean that when these 57 orders in council are being considered in committee they will not have anything to say about them. I am quite sure of my ground there, and I will trust to the next few days in this house to prove that my confidence in that regard is not mistaken.

What hon. members are asked to do at the present time is to allow this bill to go to the committee so that parliament can determine which, if any, and how many of these orders and regulations should continue for a period—that and nothing more. It is on that and on nothing more that they are to vote.

I was surprised to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) say they were going to vote against the bill and then were going to discuss it in committee. What is the vote for? The leader of the opposition gave it clearly to be understood that he would not vote against it if his vote was going to prevent its going to committee. It is only because he is convinced that in spite of his vote it will go to committee—

Mr. ROWE: No, he did not say that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, I find his statement in Hansard, and I leave it to any fair-minded reader of Hansard to say if any other conclusion can be drawn from his statement. If hon. members say that when they vote, if a division is called—and I suppose there will be a division—it is because they hope and trust this bill will never get to committee, let them say so, because if they say that, they say there is nothing in the bill that should be continued. Let them go to the country and say the view of their party is that there is nothing in the bill which should be continued but that everything should be dropped immediately. Let them go to the country and take that attitude.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are whistling past the cemetery.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not split the bill?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Why not split the bill? Why not let the hon. member or some of his colleagues determine just what the government is going to do, how the business of the country is going to be transacted? The reason why not is that the country has no confidence in them. We on this side have the responsibility of determining that these measures will not be allowed to fall by the wayside, and that we shall not have the chaotic conditions that would arise if they did fall; and we are going to discharge that responsibility. On previous occasions when I was before the house with measures for the extension of the powers granted by the War Measures Act the question then was, "Why don't you enumerate the orders in council you want continued?" This time when we do that they say, "Well, why don't you do something else?" We have been sitting here since January 30, and how much have we accomplished? If we had fifty-seven bills about which they could organize the kind of thing which their own newspapers call filibusters, would we be discharging our responsibility to the Canadian public? We intend to discharge it, and we have brought this bill before parliament so that parliament may take the responsibility of determining which of these measures should or should not be considered. But if hon. members wish to take the stand by their vote that none of them should be considered, let them take that stand.

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): I must say I very much enjoyed the speeches of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), though I disagreed to some extent with them. This bill has been before parliament now for almost a month; I know most hon. members are getting a little sick of it, so I am going to detain the house for only a few minutes.

The chief purpose of the bill is to permit the government to retain for another year certain controls which it deems necessary. This group believes the government needs those powers, and we are going to support the bill. But at the same time we are concerned over the fact that, while the house has been debating the bill, one control after another has been dropped. It was only on April 1 last that the government, in a decontrol statement, removed about one-third of Canada's remaining price ceilings. As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) aptly put it, some of us are beginning to wonder whether, when this bill is finally passed, there will be any controls left.

In any event, whether there are or not, I believe the government, particularly in the last few weeks, has yielded to pressure. I do not know whether it is to pressure from my hon. friends to the right, whether it is to pressure from within the Liberal party itself, or whether it is to pressure from industrial interests, but I do think the government has yielded to pressure, in too rapidly taking off certain vital controls. As a result, the cost of living has recently gone up quite considerably.

I believe there is concern over that fact from one coast to the other. Most people will agree that throughout the war the government did a creditable job of price control; but if they continue their present decontrol policy they may in a few months undo the good work of many years. Today government members are advocating what they are pleased to call orderly decontrol; but in actual fact, whether or not the minister will admit it, instead of orderly decontrol, today the people of Canada are being given haphazard, hasty removal of essential controls. The latest announcement about a week ago on rental and price decontrol, I think virtually sounded the death-knell of any hope we might have had of controlling inflation in the near future. Ceilings have been taken off many articles which are still in very short supply. I refer only to one or two, such as washing machines, refrigerators, stoves, and other articles made from iron and steel. The government must realize that many articles are still in short supply in Canada, and that with the removal of ceilings many manufacturers are taking advantage of the demand, taking advantage of the short supply and raising prices unduly.

Canadians are greatly concerned with the sharp increase in the cost of living. It seems that each year finds the dollar of the farmer and worker worth a little less. Back in 1939 the United Steel Workers of America set up a special consumers' committee whose duty it was once a month to make certain purchases of essential foodstuffs. That has been done ever since 1939, and today they find that the prices of those essential foodstuffs have gone up almost sixty per cent, according to a statement they made not long ago. Everyone knows that recently the price of milk went up, together with the prices of sugar, coffee, tea, canned goods and almost everything the housewife has to buy. Prices are fast reaching the point where the average Canadian is finding he cannot pay them.

One other step recently taken by the government will I believe, adversely affect the cost of living. I refer to the revoking of all orders in council under the War Measures Act having to do with customs tariffs. I understand that action has resulted in twenty actual tariff increases. It has resulted in the imposition of an excise tax on certain imports from the United States and elsewhere, and in the reimposition of dumping duties which were suspended during the war years. As I see it, there can be only one result from these tariff increases, namely, to increase the cost of the goods concerned. Then we are told that on June 1 the government intends to reimpose tariffs on all British goods. Think how many more articles will be affected by those tariff increases. This can only mean that the cost of those goods will go up also if the government carries out its stated intention. Surely, for the time being at least, when Canada is facing this crisis and trying to stop inflation, the government should not impose any tariff increases.

One other very unfair result of government decontrol is the effect on the farmers of this country. The farmer sees prices of his own produce for the most part kept rigid, with wheat frozen at $1.55 f.o.b. Fort William, while the world market price is at about $2.75; with beef and live stock prices frozen at perhaps forty to fifty per cent under the United States level. At the same time the farmer sees the prices of pretty nearly everything he has to buy going up. It seems that the government tells the farmer one thing, "We have to keep your prices rigid to fight inflation," but it tells the manufacturer something entirely different. Labour is also finding itself in a particularly difficult position. Prices are rising steadily, while wages remain more or less fixed. Many labour unions across the country have passed resolutions protesting this situation. They have written their members of parliament and have paid for newspaper advertisements protesting the increase in the cost of living. Let the government make no mistake: Labour is becoming angry at these continued increases, and rightly so. If price rises are not soon stopped, this country is likely to face labour unrest and strikes within a few months. If wage increases are given generally across the country, probably that will lead to further price increases which, in turn, will give impetus to the spiral of inflation we are facing today. This continent discovered after the first world war what can happen if that takes place.

If the government does not halt the headlong scrapping of controls, then I believe Canada is facing inflation, labour unrest and depression.

This party is supporting the bill, but we support it, believing that it is inadequate. We support it with the feeling that it is only a skeleton of the bill it should be. We believe that the government should reimpose price controls, particularly on those articles which vitally affect the cost of living. We believe that the government should also try to roll back some of the prices which have recently sky-rocketed to such a degree.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, this debate, which recently caused a considerable display of histrionics, has developed into an ideological discussion as to the value of state planned economy as compared with free economy.

I believe that a comparison of what has taken place in the rest of the world, some of which has maintained controls, and some of which has abandoned them, would be of interest at this point. There are two sides to this whole matter of controls. The first side is that, with the abandonment of controls, we allow our prices to rise, and that included in those prices are prices of raw materials and wages paid to industrial workers.

There has been a great deal of discussion, and there was a great deal of talk yesterday in the house by members of the socialist party with regard to planned economy. The evils of free enterprise were loudly proclaimed, almost to the entire exclusion of any other discussion.

Let us accept the fact that in the United States, where controls have been almost completely done away with, prices have risen. In a moment or two I shall discuss the matter of the consumer resistance point, and inventory saturation. First of all, however, I should like to deal briefly with basic wages of industrial workers, and in this connection I would place on record certain figures which have just been published by the bureau of labour statistics in Washington. These figures set out the basic wage rates throughout a great portion of the world. These wage rates are given for a 40-hour week, in United States dollars and at the official rate of exchange. The figures are as follows:

Country	Rate of Wage per 40-hour week
United States	$46 40
Canada	29 20
Sweden	18 40
Great Britain (46-hour week)	17 60
France	16 40
Netherlands	12 80
Czechoslovakia	8 40
Russia	7 00

The figure for Russia is approximate. I shall not go into the statement made here respecting the Russian scale of wages, because I believe it is not entirely accurate. The authority I quote states, however, that the basic Russian wage rate is considerably lower in the weighted index than the wages in Czechoslovakia.

Let us see what this leads to. On this continent we have the United States, which has been the first to abandon controls. We see that the wages paid industrial workers in that country are considerably higher than they are in any other country in the world. We see that Canada, which has gone far along the line of abandoning controls, comes next. We see also that the greater the control of the economy, the less are industrial wages.

I suggest that those figures speak for themselves. If we want a high level of industrial wages—and we do—then the facts speak for themselves. Where you have a minimum of controls, and a condition under which the worker and industry may bargain freely together, you have a high wage rate. But where you have wages controlled by the government you find persistently and continuously decreasing wages. Wage rates decrease in direct ratio with the amount of control imposed by the government. Those are official figures.

I should like to say one word about the abandonment of controls in the United States. True, prices have risen. But something else has happened. Consumer goods, and capital goods production have tremendously increased. Today the warehouses in that country are becoming filled. Today there is a resistance to further increases in prices brought about by the operation of the basic law of supply and demand. And it is expected or estimated by bureaux in Washington that a recession in prices to the extent of about sixteen per cent can be expected. Different lines have different expectations, since some are in shorter supply than others.

The United States allowed the law of supply and demand to operate. As was expected, prices increased. But what else happened? Production went to work. Never has production in the United States been as great as it is at the present time. Production of automobiles, steel and even of coal exceeds the greatest production in any previous year in the history of that country. I suggest that this tremendous increase in production is one of the safest and greatest safeguards against a continuously rising price structure. It is, in fact, the only safeguard which eventually will be worth anything.

Government regulations are constantly being broken. Otherwise there would be no reason for having a legal or enforcement service. But the law of supply and demand cannot be broken. It is inevitable, like the law of gravity. Despite the fact that there has been a price increase in the United States, we see in that country an abundance of goods, whereas in Canada we are still suffering from considerable and acute shortages in many lines of essential products. In this abundance of goods we see where the law of supply and demand has begun to take effect. Not only are the people of the United States getting supplies, but because of that abundance of supplies there is expected and, in fact, there has already occurred a recession in the prices of many articles.

I spoke today simply to show that the planned economy throughout the world has done two things. It has created scarcities and it has created low real and cash wages. In Canada we must take one of two ways. North America is an island in the world where individual freedom and the freedom of the group to bargain still remains sacrosanct. We have been urged to accept some other economic way of life, but I suggest that the indisputable facts show that we are not only better off on this continent as far as freedom goes, but also infinitely better off in every way economically. The abandonment of the freedom of the individual and of private enterprise would be the most retrogressive step economically that this country could take.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate but, because one or two things have happened, I feel I should say something. I have received many letters from constituents in Selkirk in connection with the taking off of controls. I assure the government that I am entirely in support of the bill, although I do not think it goes far enough. I believe controls should have been kept on much longer. This is going to have a bad effect on the country at large. The cost of living index has risen from 119·9 on January 2, 1946, to 128·9 on April 1, 1947, an increase of 7·5 per cent. In the same period the index of agricultural prices rose from 178·9 to 184·8, an increase of only 3·2 per cent. In other words, the cost of living has risen more than twice the increase in farm prices during the last fifteen months.

What gets me on edge more than anything else is the rise in the price of oatmeal.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about haggis?

Mr. BRYCE: At these prices we shall have to get a substitute for haggis. I need only look across at the opposite benches to see what oatmeal will do. The muscle and brawn of hon. members opposite has been produced by the use of oatmeal in their early years. I would remind the house that oatmeal is one of the best balanced foods in the world.

Mr. LOW: All of us Scotsmen think so.

Mr. BRYCE: I wish some of those who claim to be Scotsmen would fight for it. A forty-eight ounce package of rolled oats cost only seventeen cents in January of this year, but today the price is twenty-two cents, an increase of five cents for forty-eight ounces. The farmer is receiving only three and a half cents more for thirty-four pounds of oats. I know that is all I get, and I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will agree that that is all anybody is getting. The man who rolls the oats is getting 56-2/3 cents more a bushel. That is excessive, and I do not think it is fair that such an increase should be received over what the farmer gets. I should like to have some minister tell me how that is justified. Mark you, both rolled oats and oats in other forms are under price control at the present time.

I thought I would try to find out whether the milling companies were in financial difficulties, whether they were making ends meet. I have here the net profits made by the Ogilvie Flour Mills Company Limited, after payment of expenses, taxes and everything else. They are:

1942	812,000
1943	1,003,000
1944	1,055,000
1945	1,111,000

According to the company's own statement, the capital stock is made up of 20,000 preferred shares valued at $2,000,000, and 600,000 shares of common stock valued at $2,500,000. It will be seen that that company is in good financial condition. Why should they have that increase in the price of oatmeal? The net profits for the Maple Leaf Milling Company Limited were as follows:

1945	541,000

The net profits of the St. Lawrence Milling Company were:

1944	$127,000
1945	131,000

And Lake of the Woods:

1944	$387,000

I think these figures show that the increase of 56⅔ cents a bushel is not justified. Then take hogs and bacon. The price being paid for hogs today varies according to the distance you are from seaboard, but it averages from $20.40 up to $21 and something. Not long ago we were able to buy bacon for fifty cents a pound, but today the same brand of bacon costs the housewife seventy cents a pound. There is no justification for that increase. The people who process the bacon when it comes from the farm are making good profits. In the fourteen years of its operation as a single company Canada Packers have made a net profit of $19,841,000, and those profits were made on an investment by shareholders of not more than $1,438,000. Those profits have all been made from live stock and live stock products produced by the farmers of Canada. I think there should be some check on that sort of thing. If you continue to take off price controls you can imagine where it is all going to end. Once these controls are off and business men are free, they do not seem to have any conscience; they cannot get enough. I heard somebody say that big business should take stock of itself and give the consumer a square deal and I hope that whoever heard that advice will take it to heart.

Look at the price increases in jams, jellies and marmalades. A ten per cent increase was authorized by the wartime prices and trade board on April 7, about a week ago. This ten per cent increase on 24-ounce containers amounts to six cents for No. 1 strawberry or raspberry and Nos. 1 and 2 cherry; five cents for No. 2 strawberry and raspberry; four cents for No. 1 peach; three cents for No. 2 peach and Nos. 1 and 2 plum. I hope that the government realize whom they are hitting when they permit this sort of thing. They are striking at the old age pensioner, the old man or the old lady who has provided himself or herself with an annuity, the blind people, the widowed mothers who are receiving mother's allowance and who have received practically no increase in income. With their income remaining the same, the increased prices mean a tremendous hardship for them.

I supported the wheat agreement with Britain both in the house and out of it. I never considered that the wheat price was a parity price; far from it. But I supported it because it guaranteed to the farmer a set price over a number of years, something that he had long been wanting—security. But I never thought the government would immediately start to raise the prices of the things the farmer has to buy. You have raised the price of binder twine, gasoline, tractor distillate, and the overalls which the farmer has to buy. He could get overalls for $2.50 when prices were under control by the wartime prices and trade board, but today the same overalls cost him $3.75.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the same with everything he has to buy.

Mr. BRYCE: You leave me alone and make your own speech.

Mr. LOW: He is trying to help you.

Mr. BRYCE: I am sorry; I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. My hon. friends to my right are as much entitled to their view as I am to mine, but if the government takes their advice it will cause a whole lot of trouble in this country which could be avoided. See what is happening with shoes. The ceiling has been retained on leather, but the shoe manufacturer was granted an open market. You control everything the farmer has to sell, but you do not control prices of the things he must buy. It is going to cost the farmer eight and nine cents more than he paid last year for the binder twine he uses on his farm. You have raised the price on gasoline. Talk about controlling prices—the government might as well have held the control as to give control to the oil companies. They are the ones who are now going to control and set the price.

There is one other point I wish to make in connection with overalls, and this is perhaps more in favour of the government. When the price of overalls was under control every little town in my constituency could always get a supply of overalls to sell. If twenty farmers came in there was a pair of overalls available for each of them to buy. But today that is not the case. It is the man with the big purse who gets the overalls. That is another reason why I should like to see some of these controls retained longer.

Speaking on April 1, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) estimated that for every one dollar spent by the government on price control during the war and subsequently the Canadian consumer and the government saved $12.50.

He estimated the annual savings at $2,500,000,000 and the annual cost at $200,000,000, and said that for the total five years since price control has been in effect this means an approximate saving of $12,500,000,000, at a cost of $1,000,000,000, or a net saving of $11,500,000,000, or slightly less than $1,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. That in itself should be sufficient justification for maintaining controls longer until conditions throughout the world or at least in Canada become more normal.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I was not going to take up much time, and I do not intend to. In the choice between control of prices left in the hands of profit-seeking monopolists and democratic control of prices by the people's government, we choose proper democratic government control.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, when this legislation was in the resolution stage I had thought it would be unnecessary for me to take any part in the debate. I was quite pleased with the government's intention as announced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), to carry out what he called an orderly process of decontrol in order to avoid what he called booms and busts. But all through this debate I have been becoming a little sad, and I am now somewhat sorrowful because I find it necessary to take part in the debate.

The group with which I sit have been the target of constant attack during the debate on the resolution and on the second reading of the bill by the Progressive Conservative party which claims that we desire at all times to introduce measures of control and regimentation for the sake of control and regimentation. I am one of those who lived through the period from 1930 to 1935 when, during four of those years there was a Tory government in Saskatchewan and, in five of those years, a Tory government here in Ottawa, exhibiting the kind of conduct to the people of that part of the country that I was subject to along with the other citizens, permitting the machine-gunning of the miners in Estevan because they were demanding a decent standard of living, permitting the machine-gunning and clubbing of the relief camp marchers when they were stopped in Regina, and warning people like myself and others that we were breaking the law if we gave so much as a piece of bread and butter or sanctuary to any of those relief camp strikers who would not go into relief camps at twenty cents a day. After all that, I find it amazing to have people like that directing the kind of attack they have been directing against us. I grant them that it is their right. I would be the first to rise and fight for their right to do it if anybody proposed to take it from them, but I am amazed when I hear the kind of criticism they have been directing toward us. However, they are not the responsible party in this house and my criticism is not going to be directed entirely toward them. I suggest, more in sadness than anything else, that one or two of our Social Credit friends also take the same attitude as the Progressive Conservative party. I was sorry for that.

I was pleased with the attitude taken last night by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). He does not agree with us. That is his right. He gave us the reasons why he did not and he tried to convert us to his way of thinking. That is his right, but he has not convinced me. I believe he agrees that that is my right. But I was a little sad over the attitude of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques). He said that he was sick and tired of us. I shall grant that he has the right to be sick and tired of us, but to be sick and tired of anybody almost indicates to me that one has reached the point where he is ready to sing hymns of hate. I have no hymns of hate to sing with regard to that member or any other. I think hon. members should avoid singing hymns of hate against us or anybody else. He should have given us a constructive idea of what he wanted done, and the house could then decide whether it felt like accepting his advice or not.

Early in the debate the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) read a letter from a women's group in his constituency. I believe that letter expressed clearly the attitude of a great many housewives' groups across the country. I can support him by quoting similar letters from women's groups in my own constituency; from the home makers club; from the local council of women; from the fortnightly club, a local organization, and also from the wartime prices and trade board subdivision, consumer branch of the liaison officers, composed of women in our little city of Swift Current. All these women have the same thing to say. The letters are all the same, but I shall quote only one. I have the other letters here; if anybody thinks they are not the same he is at liberty to examine them. No object would be served by putting them all on the record. I shall take the one from the subdivision of the wartime prices and trade board, consumer branch, the ladies who are endeavouring to carry out the suggestions of the government and the wartime prices and trade board who asked the housewives to see that prices were kept in line according to the price control order. This letter reads as follows:

> . . . the liaison officers passed a motion that in the interests of the families of low income brackets, which families predominate in our part of the country, the wartime prices and trade board at Ottawa be asked to continue paying subsidies on milk, butter, bread, oils, coal, vegetables and other necessities, and also that price ceilings be maintained indefinitely.

As I have said, the other letters are along similar lines, although couched in different terms according to the individual writers, but they mean exactly the same thing. I support what these ladies have to say.

Another thing has made me a little sorrowful and has put me almost in the position that another hon. member got into here but for a different reason. It was announced by the leader of our group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that we intended to support this bill. I believe that all those who have spoken from this group have announced that we still intend to support it. I intend to support it, Mr. Speaker, if there is anything left to support. But ever since the resolution stage of this legislation, the things that have been asked for by the consumers of this country, the things that this bill is supposed to do, are gradually disappearing.

Just recently a delegation of women from western Canada came to Ottawa. I know that some will say—the newspapers have already said it—that they were inspired by the communist party. I have no proof that they were or were not. To me they were housewives. In my hearing they cited the names of the different organizations in their provinces which have given support to their coming here to place their brief before the government and before any members of parliament who would listen to them. They comprised church groups, auxiliary branches of the Canadian legion, the Canadian legion itself, which many of us are members of, and organizations of that kind. They supported these women regardless of whether they were communists or not. As I say, I do not know; I have no proof of who is or who is not a communist. Nobody ever shows me his card as to whether he is a member of the party or not. I myself was never a member of the organization or had a card and I do not expect ever to have one. I do not even know what one looks like; therefore I do not know a communist from anybody else unless he tells me himself.

This women's organization had nine points, every single one of which I can agree with and I believe most hon. members of this group and most hon. members across the floor should agree with regardless of its source, because it comes from the housewives of this country. I have been led to believe that the housewives do about eighty or eighty-five per cent of the buying in this country. They asked first for the reestablishment of price levels at the 1945 figure and the reimposition of price controls. I will not go all the way with them in the 1945 figure, but I believe that they are asking for a roll-back to some practical time. That is a worth-while request on their part and I can support it wholeheartedly. They asked for the immediate restoration of milk subsidies to protect the farmer and make milk available to the public at the price prevalent before June 1, 1946. At the last session of parliament, right up to the last day, we of this group tried to have that done. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) moved a resolution in the house, which was carried, asking that the government give reconsideration to the continuance of milk subsidies. We have supported that measure and have not yet changed our minds. These women asked for the retention of subsidies on butter, cheese and other foodstuffs of basic importance to the consumer. They asked for measures to prohibit the placing of new brands of food and clothing on the market to sell at prices above ceiling prices of similar goods of comparable quality.

In my humble way, I and the members of my family, our friends and the supporters of this party, supported the principle of price control in the interests of the war effort which we were undertaking at that time. We did not always agree that the wartime prices and trade board or its parent, the government, always operated as fairly and as well as they should. I say we supported the principle, but on more than one occasion we criticized its operation. The first instance, of course, was the original price-fixing dates on which they chose to do it. There is no object in anyone denying this because, when you buy clothes and wear them, you know, after you have worn them out, whether you have received value or not. This is one of the things that has happened. Manufacturers have manufactured goods that were not on the market before, given an article a new brand name to take the place of something on which they were compelled to hold the price down. On this new article there was no price ceiling, and they were able to demand their own price for it. Frequently we got an inferior quality of goods. I remember well the complaint about shirts was so great in the country that somebody from the wartime prices and trade board issued a pamphlet. I remember we carried it on the victory loan campaign sometimes. It tried to convince us that the shirts we were getting at that time were as good as the pre-war shirts. Well, I had to wear the shirts and was wearing them out faster than I did before, although I was not working any harder, because the older I get, the slower and the lazier I get, and therefore I should not have worn them out so quickly.

Mr. MITCHELL: Open confession is good for the soul.

Mr. BENTLEY: I think there are a lot of us in that position. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I have often felt that the government itself, through the strenuous days of the war, has now got itself into a state of decrepit desuetude or something of that kind, morally or intellectually anyway.

The fifth point that the women asked for was the introduction of a system of standardization of labelling of all kinds of materials and manufactured goods. I do not think there is anything very much wrong with that. Someone might say that is imposing on private enterprise. Well, the great bulk of the people are not trained to examine an article and understand thoroughly the value of the textile in it. When I was a boy and we wore homespuns, or when we got English tweeds from reputable manufacturers, we knew we were getting the goods. Recently I was in Halifax, Nova Scotia, talking to a clothing man there who had been a friend of my father, and I asked him if he could get any English goods. He said, "Sure I can, Tommy, but don't think for one minute that they are as good now as the old English manufactured goods used to be". When I looked at them they did look as good, because I cannot distinguish between a poor and a good piece of textile. We have a grading system to grade Canadian grain going on the foreign market, going out on the Canada grain certificate final, which assures the buyer in foreign countries that he is getting the grade of grain defined in the Canada Grain Act. Why cannot the public be assured of a similar type of grading in the textiles and other goods they buy for their families?

The sixth point that the women asked for was a sharp curtailment in the manufacture of luxury items of all kinds, coupled with measures to ensure the manufacture and release of adequate utility goods and clothing, particularly children's wear.

Every once in a while someone gets up in this house—and this includes the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)—and outside the house, mostly on his part. and says that we need a bigger population here, an immigration policy to bring people in. Good heavens, we cannot even provide didies for the babies born in Canada. How will you have diapers for all the babies born to new immigrants until our own local manufacturers can manufacture diapers so that our babies can be properly clothed; or are we going to go back to the moss bag and straight board and pack them on our backs? I agree with that item, that the manufacture of luxury goods should be curtailed, the same as luxury building, until the necessary requirements of the ordinary people, whom the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) so eloquently called the little people of the country, are provided with necessities. Incidentally, I want to congratulate that hon. member on the speech he made yesterday, an excellent speech coming from that side of the house.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Some of you boys have nice automobiles over there.

Mr. KNOWLES: Have you seen mine?

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not think I will allow hon. gentlemen here and there to take up my time talking about the value of their automobiles.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Your automobiles, not ours.

Mr. BENTLEY: They will be getting back to the relative usefulness of the old grey mare which they each used to own at one time.

7. The retention of rent controls and the continuation of local rent control boards. Granted there have been some terrible errors, some of them justifiable errors, in the operation of rent control; granted there are not only veterans but others who did put their savings into housing with the best intentions of occupying the buildings they bought with that money, and were unable to get into the houses—a serious error on the part of the regulations or the operations—I think the difficulty could have been overcome without entirely removing. or even removing to the extent that we have seen, the system of rent controls. While it may be granted that owners of buildings which are rented to people as apartments, and sometimes very poor apartments, may have had a little less profit in their hands, I doubt if any landlord of an apartment building has actually had to go hungry in this country because he was subject to rent controls during the war or recently.

8. The inauguration by the government of a national programme of low-rental housing, to eliminate present slum and overcrowding conditions. Immediate diversion of building materials from non-essential construction to the building of homes.

Why, in the name of goodness, cannot the government realize that that is important, is possible, is practical and should be done? It is possible to do it and I support this delegation of housewives wholeheartedly in that demand.

The ninth and last of their points is this: The reorganization of the wartime prices and trade board to a peacetime prices and trade board, with representation from national, provincial, and local labour, farmer and women's groups.

I believe there is a lot of good common sense in that request. I believe the government should give it serious consideration.

I said at the outset that I rose more in sadness than in anger at this time, and that is so. Last fall, when I went home I saw something happen that I had hoped would never happen in this country. I do not want anyone to think I am opposed to the right of the people to strike. I am not opposed to strikes, but I am very much opposed to the conditions that make strikes necessary. This being the only weapon the little people have to use, they have to use it at times; and always when it is used nearly everyone concerned gets hurt. It is like a war. While one side may gain their point, while it was necessary that great sacrifices should be made by Canada and the united nations to protect their freedoms against the rise of those nations that threatened those freedoms, nevertheless we suffered severely, and the other nations more so. The same applies to industrial conflicts, and yet last fall I saw a farmers' strike, the first widespread strike of the kind I have seen in Canada. I had worked among farmers and in farm organizations and farmed for a long time in that part of the country. We have often had great grievances, and we have always tried to deal with them on the basis of debate, on the basis of compromise, on the basis of proper representation, so much so that a little more than five years ago I came to Ottawa with a delegation of 400 people, mostly from Saskatchewan, to present our case, rather than carry out what was asked for by some at that time, a positive delivery strike among the farmers.

Last fall it took place, and it took place not because any one out there loves a strike. Bear that in mind. No farmer wants to go on strike. We are peaceful and good-natured and we do not want to have a conflict if we can avoid it. But the people there will fight if they are required to fight, and they will fight with every means at their disposal if they find that their living is going to be threatened and driven back to where it was some time before. The same holds good with labour.

The reason I made these few remarks about strikes was this. I saw an editorial recently in the Canadian Register. They were dealing with representation by Mr. C. H. Millard of the steelworkers union who asked for a roll-back of ten per cent in the prices of consumer goods. This is what the editorial says with regard to Mr. Millard's request:

> Employers ought to grasp at the opportunity for discussion offered by labour leaders such as Mr. Millard. . . other big corporations should do what Ford of Canada has done or else explain why they cannot reduce prices. Big business is now too big to be allowed to claim the privileges of privacy.

This is not a C.C.F. paper; it is not a socialist paper; it is the Canadian Register. I will repeat that sentence:

> Big business is now too big to be allowed to claim the privileges of privacy. There is a reasonable demand that the public, and especially labour, should know the facts about prices and profits. If big business is making no more than reasonable profits it should not be afraid of publicity; and unless it takes labour into its confidence—

I would add "farmers" also.

> —it will provoke a fresh series of strikes that will have disastrous consequences.

There is a lot in that. Hon. members will note they say big business is now too big to claim privacy.

Quite often we are criticized from different quarters of the house because of our stand on private enterprise or free enterprise or whatever you want to call it. I do not know whether any words of mine can clarify our position, but for a moment or two I am going to try. We believe in private enterprise. Every single member of this group believes in private enterprise. We believe in the private individual on a farm having the right to own that farm. If there were a monopoly of land in this country we would not believe in that type of private enterprise, and I want my Tory friends to realize that. The minute there is a monopoly of land in this country we shall be against the farmer who has that monopoly, but we believe in private enterprise. We believe in the right of the private storekeeper to run his store and the right of the private blacksmith to run his blacksmith shop; we want more of that in this country. But there is very little free enterprise left in Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: How about the doctors?

Mr. BENTLEY: We believe in the freedom of the individual, and I come from the only place in Canada where they have a health region with almost universal health services. That is health region No. 1, Swift Current, Saskatchewan. There we do not coerce any doctors. Every doctor is free to enter into a contract with the health region or not, as he sees fit. No doctor there is compelled or coerced into taking part. I do not know what my hon. friend's information may be, but I am telling the truth. No doctor has to sign a contract; nobody can make him put his name to it. He is asked to do so; we try to get him to see the public service he can render by doing so.

Mr. HACKETT: What happens if he does not?

Mr. BENTLEY: If he does not he can continue his private practice. He can carry on private practice or regional practice, as he prefers. I want it to be remembered also that this was done under democracy. The question was submitted to the people of the eighty municipalities comprising that region and seventy-one per cent voted in favour of it.

I was pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that there is very little free enterprise in connection with private enterprise today. The little storekeeper cannot set his own figure. Nearly all the places he has to buy from are coordinated in selling monopoly enterprises, in the wholesale, jobbing and manufacturing fields.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Or in cooperatives.

Mr. BENTLEY: Possibly in cooperatives, but no cooperative sets the prices. The private merchant who happens to be behind in his accounts may even be subjected to the rule of the wholesale house with which he is behind, by having his mark-up made for him in his own store. That is not private enterprise or free enterprise; that is controlled enterprise, controlled by people who are not responsible to the people being controlled. I would much rather be controlled by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) whom I can vote out at the next election if I wish, than by some guy whom I cannot vote either for or against whether he should be on the board of directors or president of Canadian Industries Limited or some other firm. To prove my statement, only recently we were told that by submissions—not by demand but by submissions—the government finally convinced the explosives division of Canadian Industries limited to sell small arms ammunition to the retailers of our part of the country who are members of the Falcon Hardware and Merchants Consolidated, thus ending a fight that had been going on for a good many years, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) knows. Canadian Industries made us pay through the nose for small arms ammunition if we wanted to take our shotguns and shoot a prairie chicken, a duck or a goose.

Free enterprise, then, is something in which we do not believe if the individual is going to have complete freedom to do as he likes. There are two kinds of private enterprise; one kind is free and illegal. The private enterprisers I have been speaking of, the farmers, the small merchants, the professional men and so on, are law-abiding citizens, but there is another kind of free enterpriser, perhaps the sportiest of them all. He puts a blackjack in his pocket or a gun under his arm, puts something over his face so that he will not be recognized, and robs a bank or clunks somebody on the head in a dark alley; and as long as the police do not catch him he is a free enterpriser. When they do catch him he ceases to be free, but he is a private enterpriser, and that is how he operates. The other fellows, making up the great majority of the small enterprises of this country, are subject to control by some monopoly enterprise every way they turn. As was said here yesterday, the farmer is subject to their control. When he sells his goods they tell him what they will pay for them; when he buys his supplies they tell him what he must pay for them. I need not go farther into that; the facts are well known.

I just want to repeat that we do believe in private enterprise, and we do not believe in the little private enterpriser being controlled by the freebooting monopoly enterprisers who control and own so much in this country. How much freedom has the labourer? He has freedom to take off his hat and say, "Please, mister, can I have a job?" He cannot start a nickel mine of his own; he cannot start a boot and shoe factory of his own. He has to go to some guy who, through the years, has accumulated enough money to operate a business; he has to say to that fellow, "Please, mister, can I work in your factory or mine?" Where is his freedom of enterprise? So he is going to strike, unless the sort of enterprise under which he has to work, which some people call free enterprise but which we call monopoly enterprise, will give him enough for the work he does to buy the things he needs; and as I have just pointed out, the Register holds the same view.

The farmer will do the same thing. This house, as a parliament, has agreed to certain conditions to cover the sale of a large part of our Canadian wheat. We in this group supported this honestly and sincerely, but as we were doing it we asked the government to hold the price line as far as the farmers were concerned. The government has continually neglected to hold the price line so that every day now the stabilized prices farmers are getting under these regulations are being threatened. As I have said before, our farmers are not hard people to deal with. They do not kick unless they have something to kick about, but I am receiving constant representations from them saying, "What is going on at Ottawa? Just when we think we have a price that might be some good to us we find we have to pay 4½ cents more for gasoline and 12½ per cent more for machinery, while the prices of all our household goods are going up." The united farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, took an active part in the farm strike last fall, along with the farmers' union of Alberta. They have regular meetings together, and I believe there is a delegation here in Ottawa at the present time. The united farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, issue a monthly bulletin called "Information", in which there is an editorial dealing with these very matters, part of which I should like to quote:

> The farmers' strike last fall was an indication of how the farmer is thinking about this question.

He is thinking about it even more today than he was at that time, because the situation is getting more acute.

> It was in one sense the first concerted effort at using the strike weapon. There is no question about it that this action also brought the farmers and labour closer together.

In the occupational group council of the people out in that country we find that farmers and labour are getting closer together all the time. This bulletin also contains addresses by some of these people which I should like to put on record, but I have not time this afternoon and in any event I do not think it would be of any particular value. The people in the country will read them, and those here who do not want to be convinced would not be convinced anyway.

We are going to support this bill. As I said, I am beginning to wonder what I am supporting. I am beginning to wonder, too, what is wrong with the Tories. I look at this bill and I look at the newspapers; I hear announcements of price controls that are being taken off. My wife tells me every day that she is paying a little more, here and there. She asks me, "When did the price control go off?" I say "My dear, read the newspapers. Go up and sit in the gallery in the House of Commons, and listen to ministers of the government, and you will know more than I do"—or as much, anyway. She always says she knows more.

Then, I wonder what the Tories do want. I read the amendment offered by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). They agree on some things. For instance, they agree with old age pensions.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more unanimous in the House of Commons than that. I doubt if there is a single member in the house who would dare raise his voice against the increase in old age pension at the present time. The government can be assured of that; indeed, they are so thoroughly assured in their own minds that that is so, that they are going to make the old age pensioners wait until we have passed this kind of bill.

But for the Tories to stand behind and say they would be willing to vote for that does not mean very much.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member is one of the fairest members in the house. Upon reflection I do not think he will agree that his statement about the government's making old pensioners wait is an accurate one, in the light of the agenda of this session. I am sure that, on reflection, he would want to correct that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Two and a half months from the speech from the throne.

Mr. BENTLEY: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do love to be courteous to the minister who has just spoken, because he is such a courteous gentleman himself. I will accept his correction, if he makes it in good faith.

Mr. KNOWLES: Old age pensioners cannot live on courtesy.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is right; they cannot.

Mr. PROBE: The government is likely going to make the payment retroactive.

Mr. BENTLEY: We hope so. I feel sure that the increase in old age pensions payments will receive the unanimous approval of the house. But I should like to say this to the government, that I doubt very much if the government's idea of an adequate increase will meet with unanimous approval in the house. We shall have an opportunity then to see just how many there are in the House of Commons, including those in the three groups on this side, and the solid group over there, and one or two partial dissenters, who are willing to deal fairly in the matter of the amount of the increase in old age pensions.

To expect that we shall ever have a bill in the House of Commons at any time which every hon. member could support wholeheartedly would be expecting too much. Therefore, as I have said, this group will support the bill as it is. We do so with a great deal of sadness, and with the wish that much that has been taken out had been left in, and that much more had been put in before it was introduced.

At the outset I said I did not intend to take up much of the time of the house, but I felt my constituents should be represented in the debate, in view of things which have taken place since the measure was presented to parliament, and also in view of statements which have been made about us, particularly by the Tory party, who do not like what they call our type of dictatorship, but who loved the iron heel dictatorship of R. B. Bennett, and the machine-guns of the thirties.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the minster speaks he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is unnecessary for me to speak for more than a few moments in closing this debate. I may say that it comes as a relief to me to have the opportunity to close the debate, because it has taken a long time.

The discussion has covered a wide range, and has been a valuable one. But it must be remembered that time is running on, and that before we get this emergency legislation through we have to consider a wide range of matters. I am in hopes that the house will make as rapid progress as possible in the days and weeks to come.

I am not at all sure that it is necessary for me to say anything about the position of the various parties with respect to the measure now before us. The principle of the measure was clearly expressed this afternoon by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). It is, I submit, summed up in the last recital in the preamble of the bill, which is as follows:

> And whereas it is necessary by reason of the existing national emergency that certain orders and regulations of the governor in council made under the War Measures Act and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945 be continued in force temporarily notwithstanding the expiry of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, in order to ensure an orderly transition from war to peace.

That is the principle of the bill; and I am surprised that any party in the house, any member in the house, should have found it necessary to take a position in opposition to the measure. I am surprised that that should be the case. It seems to me it is a measure which should pass unanimously, which should pass promptly. It seems to me the house should devote itself to considering, in as much detail as it wishes, orders in council which are appended to the bill. I should hope that that consideration would not be too detailed because, as has been pointed out, these orders in council are now the law of the land, have been for many years the law of the land, and are all destined to expire before very long. And so the degree of care required in legislation which is to be permanent is not required in legislation of this type.

Inevitably discussion has centred around certain of the orders in council which are appended to the bill. Those are the orders in council relating to controls. The positions of the three parties in this house with reference to controls has been carefully and repeatedly stated.

I have a feeling that those hon. members who took such an adamant and uncompromising position against the continuation of controls—I have an idea, I say, that those members have weakened very much in the last few weeks.

The Progressive Conservative opposition apparently came to the house determined to agitate for the removal of controls and the reduction of taxation, thinking those were the two things that the people of the country—or at least a great many of them—wanted. I am not saying anything about the reduction of taxation, because, of course, that is not within my province or department. But the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), in his first speech in the session, stated definitely and positively the position of the Progressive Conservative party on controls. I venture to say that today the leader of the Progressive Conservative party would not state that position in those terms. He would not take that position now.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has stated positively he is for the abolition of all controls. And we can go throughout that party, here and there, and remember the speeches which have reverberated through this chamber, talking about the cancellation of controls, condemning the government for holding on to controls, stating that we must do away with them—and at once—and that we cannot retreat gradually, stating that an orderly or gradual retreat is inevitably disorderly, and that the only way to get rid of controls is to get rid of them.

That has been the position taken by prominent and official members of the Progressive Conservative party throughout all this session—until recently; until they went home during the Easter recess, and found out something. They found out what was the sentiment of the people in their constituencies.

Nothing is more humourous, it seems to me, than the report of the deliberations of the convention or the annual meeting—or whatever it is called—of the Progressive Conservative party. According to the reports, the party divided into two elements. One was for doing away with controls and the other was for perpetuating some controls. Finally they decided, as I read in the Globe and Mail, to compromise by recommending that all controls be abolished which would retard the production of building materials. That was the momentous decision on the subject of controls arrived at by the Progressive Conservative convention.

The position I have stated on behalf of the government is a clear one. It is that we must get out of this field as soon as it is safe to do so, and I mean safe from the point of view of the people of this country. I have stated repeatedly that I cannot go along with the C.C.F. position, which apparently contemplates the indefinite continuation of controls. We cannot possibly contemplate a position like that, because we have no constitutional power to do so. We cannot have price controls by dominion authority permanently in this country.

The dominion government has to get out of price controls sooner or later. The dominion government must lay its plans so as to get out of price controls on an orderly, gradual and safe basis. That is the position of the Liberal party today; that is the position of the government, and I think it is the only common sense position that any party can take in this house. Recently a big smoke-screen was thrown up in connection with this whole matter of controls, and we have had such speeches as that delivered by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) about the courts and about certain powers which the wartime prices and trade board has the right to confer upon the sugar corporation and so on. Some of his points may be very good. I do not know whether those are or not.

As I said in my opening speech with regard to these controls, the powers are extensive. They had to be extensive. We pared down some of them and perhaps some of them should be taken out in committee, but to elevate individual sections in long orders to the level of the principle of the bill and present them as the reason why the Conservative party is going to vote against this bill is to show a lamentable and shocking lack of proportion and confuses the issue entirely.

I am not going to say very much more about this. Nearly everybody has expressed himself and I have expressed myself already on two or three occasions. This attitude of handing everything back to business, which the Conservative party started out to put before this house as their attitude and their policy is impracticable, is dangerous and is wrong in the light of present conditions. It has been modified since by sheer opportunism. Reaction tempered by opportunism is the principle that underlies the attitude taken by the Progressive Conservative party in this debate and in this vote.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are getting pretty desperate over there.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I would like to have a recorded division on this motion.

(Text):

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, three times within the past few weeks we of this group have tried to give the house an opportunity, by placing certain amendments before it, to make clear to the government how the house and the country feel about the way in which certain price controls have been taken off or price ceilings lifted. These amendments were all ruled out of order, and we were told each time that the place for us to try to make that point was when we got into committee on the bill. Frankly I have found it difficult, in studying the bill, to see just how we are going to achieve that purpose by means of any amendment, but I should like to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and I would appreciate his considering it and letting us know whether there is any way in which we can amend the bill so as to express the feelings of the committee which, I think, are the feelings of the country.

The Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State for External Affairs both administered some severe tongue lashings to the members of the Progressive Conservative party today. We enjoyed them and think these tongue lashings were well deserved, but I should like to point out to these two ministers the significance of one of the things that they said about the Progressive Conservatives.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I call the attention of the committee to standing order 58 (2) which reads as follows:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

We are now entering upon a discussion of Bill No. 104, the principle of which has been considered carefully by the house and approved. I presume that the committee would want me to direct its deliberations in accordance with the standing order.

Mr. HACKETT: Do you rule, Mr. Chairman, that the tongue lashing was irrelevant?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I felt that I should rise at this time and bring this rule to the attention of the committee. It has been my experience that, if one or two members speak generally on the first clause, then we are almost bound to have a full debate on the principle and allow all hon. members to do so. The rule is that the discussion in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. At the present time we are discussing the short title.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I know the rule is there and I agree with you that it should be followed. But I think you will also realize that it has been the general practice to allow such general discussion as one cannot get in in other places, on the first clause of the bill. I must also point out the position that hon. members are being put in if we are told, when the Speaker is in the chair, to wait until we get into committee to deal with certain matters and then, when we get into committee, are told we cannot raise them there.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I did not intend to convey any such impression. I think there will be ample opportunity under the clauses to discuss all questions which came up during the discussion in the house. There are eight clauses and a very long schedule, and I suppose the committee can decide to consider each item in the schedule. That, of course, will be for the committee to decide, but I feel that we should decide now that the rules of the house are going to be observed and discussion should take place only on the clause under consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I think I should say something to the committee about the government's plan with regard to considering this measure. It is proposed to take up section 1 first, the section we are on. My submission would be that the rules of order, whatever the practice has been, should be applied in the consideration of that section, and I hope that the discussion of it would be short. With regard to section 2, section 2 must be amended if amendments are to be made to any of the orders in council in the schedule, and so I will propose that section 2 stand until the schedule is dealt with. If amendments to any of the orders in council, or sections of the orders in council, are passed by the house, then it will be necessary to go back to section 2, which would have stood, and amend it so as to give effect to these amendments to the orders in council. Then I think that, before we deal with the orders in council in the schedule, we might as well deal with the remaining sections of the bill. And so the course of procedure I propose is to take section 1, let section 2 stand, take sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, then the schedule, and then go back to section 2 and amend it as may be required by any amendments to the schedule.

With regard to the hon. gentleman's problem, I presume he would like to propose some amendments somewhere which would put a brake upon what he might consider headlong action—

Mr. KNOWLES: You are reading my mind exactly.

Mr. ILSLEY: —by the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is about as headlong as molasses in February.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is experienced and he would select his own opportunity without assistance from me, but I would suggest that the proper place for that is upon consideration of P.C. 8528, which is the order in council setting up the wartime prices and trade board. If it is desired to move an amendment by adding some section to that order in council by legislation, the hon. gentleman has every right to propose it. If he moves the kind of amendment I think he will propose, I am afraid I shall not be able to accept it, but that is his opportunity.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is exactly the point, and it is a continuation of the experience we are now having; my fear is that if we wait until we get to the order in council to which the minister has referred, and then seek to move an amendment to put a brake upon this headlong decontrol, in other words, the kind of amendment that would ask the wartime prices and trade board to reimpose some of the ceilings that have been taken off, we shall then be told by the Chairman, and perhaps rightly, that such mandatory amendments would be out of keeping, out of order, with the permissive nature of that particular order in council. That is my reason for raising the point now.

As a matter of fact, we felt in this group that it was not so much a matter of amending the order in council that was necessary as it was that expression should be given of the opinion of this house to the government, which they in turn could pass on to the war-time prices and trade board, and that is why we tried to move the three amendments we have moved during the past few weeks. That opportunity was denied, and we seem to be in the position where it is utterly impossible to get a vote of the house, to tell the government that we want price controls reimposed on certain items. What I was starting to say, in defence of my hon. friend to the right, was this, that the reason—

Mr. GRAYDON: Be careful.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will be awfully careful when I start to do that. But the reason they have come back from the Easter recess not quite so sure that controls should be taken off is that in the meantime controls have been removed, as, for example, on the first of April by the Minister of Finance, with the result that there have been increases in the cost of living, and the people back home in some of my hon. friends' constituencies who, a few months ago, may have thought a good song to sing was, "Take off controls now", now know the effect of it and are protesting to their members, even in those Tory constituencies. In other words, the blame for their change of tune is not to be placed on our Tory friends, but on the government for what the minister rightly described a few minutes ago as headlong decontrol.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is your language, not mine.

Mr. KNOWLES: Weren't those your words?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, Mr. Chairman. I must see what Hansard says but, as I remember, I said "what my hon. friend describes as headlong".

The CHAIRMAN: I think the committee should decide now whether or not it will observe the rules.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to come to the aid of the government and recommend that the Chair declare it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 17, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

First and second reports of the standing committee on external affairs—Mr. Bradette.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North) presented the first report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the chairman of this committee whether it is the custom to consider in secret a bill which has been sent to the committee after second reading, as was done this morning in considering an important railway bill? What is the policy of the committee in regard to procedure?

Mr. BREITHAUPT: The committee does not meet in private. There was a quorum this morning of the twenty members as required by law, and all discussion was perfectly in order.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MARTIN—STATEMENT OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION RESPECTING OLD AGE PENSIONS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the house a matter concerning the privileges of the house. Last night the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) made a speech to the nation, in which among other things he used these words, as reported in the morning press:

> Mr. Bracken said nearly everyone agreed that old age pension payments should be increased. Yet the government refused to do this in open parliament and sought power by order in council so it could decide behind parliament's back what increase—if any—was to be made.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Speaker, that statement is absolutely untrue. In the speech from the throne, as I said yesterday, and as the hon. gentleman I am sure upon reflection will note, the government made known its intention to introduce, not by orders in council but by a bill in open parliament, amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. MARTIN: That statement—

Mr. MACKENZIE: During this session.

Mr. MARTIN: That statement was repeated twice by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), twice by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) and yesterday afternoon by myself,—

An hon. MEMBER: Where is the bill?

Mr. MARTIN: —seven hours before the hon. gentleman spoke.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is the bill?

Mr. MARTIN: So that, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. MACKENZIE: If you stop your delaying tactics you will get it sooner.

Mr. MARTIN: So that there can be no question that the remarks of the leader of the opposition last night were not in accordance with the facts, which he knew very well, and which were related to him only yesterday afternoon.

The government has stated repeatedly its intention to introduce at this session the amendments which were referred to yesterday. I ask the hon. gentleman to note that, and to make a correction in the house at this time.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have no correction to make.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. BRACKEN: We have been here now for two or three months—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRACKEN: —and there is no old age pensions bill before us.

Mr. GARDINER: Putting out Tory propaganda.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think hon. members will admit that I cannot permit a debate at this time.

MR. ABBOTT—STATEMENT OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION AS TO TAXES ON BREAD

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I rise also on a question of privilege. In the report of the same speech—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Is the minister rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In the same report the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) is referred to as follows:

> Mr. Bracken was critical also of taxation policy, restrictions on Canadian exports, rates of old age pension payments and controls.
> "Everything in Canada," he said, "was loaded down with indirect taxes. A loaf of bread, for instance, carried thirty-six tax levies, making up about one-third of its price. That was an example of the source of the high cost of living."

That too is completely inaccurate. A loaf of bread is heavily subsidized.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. minister rose on a question of privilege and I would ask hon. members to allow him to state his question of privilege.

Mr. ABBOTT: My question of privilege is this: I am the minister of the crown specially responsible for the imposition of taxes and the administration of subsidies. I say that if there is any article of commerce in Canada which is not taxed, it is bread; on the contrary, the main content of bread, wheat flour, is probably the most heavily subsidized of any commodity at the present time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to consider this point: Is it proper to raise questions of privilege on speeches made outside this house?

Mr. MACKENZIE: On the point of order may I say that it is perfectly proper as long as the statement made outside reflects upon the accuracy of a declaration by a minister of the crown with reference to policy expressed in this house.

FISHERIES

SHIPPING OF CANADIAN CREWS ON FOREIGN VESSELS

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): Yesterday the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) asked me a certain question relating to the possibility of shipping Canadian crews on United States fishing vessels on the Atlantic coast and I promised I would give a statement today.

The shipping of Canadian crews to American fishing vessels on the Atlantic coast is governed by an act of parliament, the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act. Section 10 of that act provides for the forfeiture of every foreign fishing vessel which has entered Canadian territorial waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or by any law of Great Britain or of Canada. So far as United States fishing vessels are concerned there is a law of Canada, namely, an order in council under the authority of section 3 of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, chapter 43, R.S.C., under which a licence may be issued to a United States fishing vessel enabling it to enter any port on the Atlantic coast of Canada for the purpose of purchasing bait, ice, seines, lines and all other supplies and outfits. The present order in council, P.C. 3955, September 24, 1946, does not permit the shipping of crews on foreign vessels.

Since the United States vessel in question the Gertrude de Costa is now in the port of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, with bait and ice on board, the governor in council, under section 3 of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, is issuing a licence to this vessel to permit it to ship necessary complement of crew at the port of Lunenburg. While granting a licence in this special case it should be understood that this concession is in no way to be considered as a precedent.

CANADAIR LIMITED

REQUEST FOR BALANCE SHEET

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): In a return tabled in my name yesterday by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in connection with Canadair Limited the balance sheet asked for on page 1758 of Hansard was not included. This balance sheet is also mentioned in one of the letters tabled as being attached thereto, but the balance sheet was not attached. Will the minister see that this balance sheet is tabled tomorrow?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I looked over the documents briefly and I thought the balance sheet was attached. If it was not, I shall certainly see that it is supplied.

[Later:]

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I would refer the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) to page 299 of Votes and Proceedings of Monday last, the second paragraph; also to a return to an order of the house of March 26, 1947, for a copy of balance sheet of the Canadair Limited. as mentioned in section C, page 1542, Hansard of March 20, 1947. In other words the balance sheet was tabled last Monday.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

HOUSING—VETERANS' LAND ACT—DRAINAGE, REPAIRS AND ADJUSTMENTS

Mr. MERRITT:

1. How many houses constructed under the Veterans' Land Act small holdings project have been found to contain (a) defective workmanship; (b) defective materials; (c) a combination of (a) and (b), and (d) unsatisfactory drainage?

2. How many contracts or arrangements have been entered into for repairs and/or redrainage of the defective houses or properties?

3. In how many cases have the repairs or redrainage been undertaken by (a) the original contractor; (b) other contractors?

4. In how many cases have the repairs or redrainage been undertaken (a) at the expense of the contractor; (b) at the expense of the taxpayer; (c) at the joint expense of the contractor and taxpayers?

5. (a) In how many cases has the veteran been required to bear any part of the cost of repairs; (b) in how many cases in which the original contractor is being employed to do the repairs, or redrainage, and the cost thereof is being borne by the taxpayers, is any profit, management fee or allowance over cost being made to such contractor?

6. If there are any cases in which the cost of repairs or redrainage is not being charged to the contractor, what is the reason for failure so to do?

7. In how many accepted cases of bad workmanship, materials or drainage have the necessary repairs or redrainage not yet been arranged or contracted for?

8. (a) What is the total estimated cost of repairs and redrainage necessary to date; (b) what is the division of such cost between the veteran, the taxpayers and the contractors concerned?

9. (a) How many inspectors or other officers employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs for the purpose have passed or approved work, materials or land subsequently found to be below standard; (b) how many such persons are still in the employ of the department; (c) how many such persons have been discharged for cause; (d) if any such persons are still in the employ of the department, why have their services been retained?

10. (a) Are any prosecutions or actions for damages pending against any persons for bad workmanship, for the supplying of bad materials or for breach of contract in respect of any of these houses or projects; (b) if the answer to (a) is yes, how many prosecutions or actions are pending, and in what locality or localities are such proceedings being brought?

POSTAL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRICT INSPECTOR FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General having to do with the changes that have been made in the postal service of Canada. Why was Prince Edward Island ignored and not granted a district postal director at Charlottetown as was done in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I will take this question as a notice.

RATES ON PARCELS TO BRITIAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to ask the Postmaster General a question, of which I have sent him notice. Why is it that a parcel of goods destined for Great Britain, the value of which is $2.09, costs $10.20? How are those charges broken up as between Canada and Great Britain?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): It would be impossible for me to answer the hon. gentleman's question without knowing the contents of the parcel. I might say that on a twenty pound gift parcel, which is the maximum allowed for such a parcel, the rate to England is $2.50, made up as follows: England gets a credit of 51 cents on each of these parcels which the British postal authorities deliver anywhere in England. We have to pay them that 51 cents. The shipping companies charge us $1.50 per two cubic feet, which is about the space of a gift parcel of 20 pounds takes up. Those two charges amount to $2.01, leaving 49 cents remuneration to the Canadian Post Office for picking up the parcel anywhere in Canada—Vancouver if necessary —and delivering it to the shipping companies. We are losing money on every such parcel.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If I may ask a supplementary question, I happen to know that this parcel was shipped by air, and the value of the goods was $2.09.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question seems to be pretty long, and as I see no urgency in it I would suggest that it be put on the order paper.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the Postmaster General give consideration to allowing these food parcels to be sent to Britain free of postage, the necessary amount to cover the postage to be provided for in an item in the main estimates?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am sorry I have to say that the answer is in the negative.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF MINERS IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of either the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply or the Minister of Labour. It is this: In connection with the strike in Nova Scotia, in view of the fact that this government has been spending $8,000,000 a year by way of coal subsidies, and in view of the fact that the men say the management is wrong and the management say the men are wrong, will the government not consider appointing a board of mining men to go down there and find out who is wrong and what is causing the small production of coal per man in that area?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): First of all I want to welcome my hon. friend back to this house. I am glad to see his smiling face once more.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) welcomed my going away. I am glad the minister welcomes me back.

Mr. MITCHELL: Frankly I do not think it is necessary to accept my hon. friend's suggestion. A royal commission on coal recently handed down a report which covers the situation in a broad and adequate way.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What did they say? Which way are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Read the report.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have read it, and what have they found on this question, I ask you?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIAN WIVES OF CANADIANS—QUESTION OF GRANTING OF PERMISSION TO LEAVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Russian government given the Canadian government an official reason why it will not give the wife of George Power, former private secretary to the Canadian Ambassador to Russia, a visa or permission to leave Russia to join her husband?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My impression is that we have received no official answer. The matter has been under discussion and I will have the file looked into. When I saw it only a few days ago the matter then was still under discussion. There had been no official answer.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night it was considering clause 1—short title. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, just a sentence or two to add to what I was saying yesterday on clause 1, which reads:

This act may be cited as the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947.

The inference from the title is that the measure before us is one to enable a continuation of certain policies that have been in effect. Our whole quarrel with the government, which we have been trying to state on behalf of the Canadian people, is that they are not continuing for a sufficiently long enough period the policies in relation to the cost of living which the Canadian people want continued.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Orders and regulations continued in force.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that this clause is to stand?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): In asking that this clause stand, the minister said there might be some amendments after the schedule had been adopted. But on the actual clause itself, aside from any amendments to the schedule, I should like to make a few comments and also to move an amendment in regard to ministerial control over these control powers. I have not wasted any of the time of the house in speaking on controls because the people I represent are completely in favour of the present policy. I have received a large number of communications from both the working people and white collar people that I represent, and without exception they have advocated the continuation of these controls over the essentials of life, therefore I say I am for these controls, but for controls in which there is the essence of parliamentary control.

The member for Kootenay West last week spoke very well in answer to some of the arguments that had been put up by the Progressive Conservative party who had called these controls tyranny and despotism. He said that they could not be considered tyranny or despotism so long as in the end the government had to return to parliament, as the government is doing now, for power to continue the controls. Charges of bureaucracy have been made by the opposition, and civil servants who have done a difficult job exceedingly well have been loosely slandered by such charges. Some of these men in public office may have got swelled heads and found a little authority too much for them to handle. But in the life of this great dominion do we not find similar characters in every field? You find them here in the House of Commons. For example, we have all seen men who because they happen to be sitting on the front benches opposite think they have the privileges and prerogatives of ministers of the crown. Therefore I see no reason why this whole programme should be scathingly denounced as bureaucracy because of a few failings of officials administering them.

There is, however, I think a great difference between the attitude of the Liberal party to these controls and the attitude of our friends of the C.C.F. party. The charge is made that we are one on this. I think that charge is wrong, because the very essential of controls by this government, as pointed out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his apt quotation of Professor Lower, is that there should be in the end parliamentary control and responsibility by the ministers to the people who are sent here to represent them.

I may be wrong in this, and if I am wrong I shall accept immediate correction by the C.C.F. My feeling is that if they were in power they would be quite content to set up these super planning boards and experts of the type of Professor Laski and leave them to do the job remote from any parliamentary control.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I am going to accept that correction and I am also going to explain why I made this apparent error. As hon. members know, at times I am labelled as being almost too close to the C.C.F. party. Whenever a member of that party speaks I move down near them so that I can catch every word in order to understand what he is driving at. As British Columbia members know, I am in considerable sympathy with many of their objectives. I do the same thing when any member of the Social Credit party is speaking. Being a keen student I have, however, been bewildered at times by some of the things said by apparently responsible people of the C.C.F. party.

Last week the members of the C.C.F. party in British Columbia held a convention in Vancouver. I read in the Vancouver Sun a report of that convention, and I found the following on the front page of the issue of Friday, April 11:

> First task of a C.C.F. administration would be the swift removal of the major sources of wealth production from private hands. This was the declaration today of Colin Cameron, provincial president of the C.C.F. in his report prepared for delivery to the party's annual convention in Hotel Vancouver.
> "It must be made clear," Mr. Cameron continued, "that our whole programme of social services and economic extension rests on that first bold revolutionary bid."

This is not a misquotation, because it is taken from a prepared report which he turned over to the press beforehand. I understand that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Read it all.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): We have heard so much of that in British Columbia; I have heard so much of it that I understand it. Then we heard the excellent speech made in the house yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I heard the excellent speech made here by the hon. member for Swift Current, and how far apart they are from the speech of Mr. Cameron! Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Swift Current said, as reported at page 2109 of Hansard.

> We do believe in private enterprise, and we do not believe in the little private enterpriser being controlled by the freebooting monopoly enterprisers who control and own so much in this country.

The hon. member said: "We do believe in private enterprise", as did the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I also listened to the hon. member for Halifax, and these two speeches by the members for Halifax and Moose Jaw could have been made by the same man. The hon. member for Yorkton charged that all business men were Jesse Jameses, a lovely phrase which he cribbed from the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I could not tell the difference between the speech of the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Moose Jaw, both good business men; for when the member for Moose Jaw spoke to the people of Saskatchewan, according to the Regina Leader-Post, he was for private enterprise. His speech was carried last Friday in the Regina Leader-Post in one column, and slam-bang against it was an account of Colin Cameron's revolutionary speech at Vancouver. If I made a little mistake in listening to everything that hon. members of the C.C.F. party said about planners they must forgive me for this confusion. Colin Cameron is the provincial president of the C.C.F. party in British Columbia, and was formerly a member of the legislature. In a kindly way I am going to make a suggestion, because as I listened to the Social Credit party's most excellent suggestion the other night—I sat close to them and I think the members of the Social Credit party will do me the justice of saying that I listened to them—

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Take your medicine.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order. I deliberately waited until the hon. member had finished with the C.C.F., so that he would not say I was interrupting him on that—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I have not finished. I was going to give good advice to the C.C.F. party.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, my point of order is this. I have no objection to the hon. member talking about us; we enjoyed it, but yesterday you interrupted me on section 1 because I began to talk about the Progressive Conservatives. We are now on section 2, and I submit it has nothing to do with the matter that the hon. member is discussing.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Section 2 is a wide one; it refers to all the orders in council; whereas section 1 referred only to the title.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Thank you very much. This is my first speech on controls. Second, the C.C.F. quickly rose to my bait by saying that I was wrong. I was explaining why I was wrong. I was wrong because I was misinformed by their several attitudes. I wish to say that I hope the attitude they may take in the future will not mislead us who are seekers after truth and who are confused when one responsible man of the C.C.F. party says one thing and another says another thing about the same thing.

A few nights ago the hon. member for Lethbridge was speaking. I was down in that corner trying to find out all I could about the Social Credit philosophy, and at times I find it difficult, although he is a lucid and clear speaker. He was challenged by the hon. member for Cape Breton South; and in return he said: "I challenge any member of the C.C.F. party or any other party to say whether any responsible members of this group", speaking of his own group, had advocated such and such a course. The hon. member for Cape Breton South wanted to know who were the responsible and who were the irresponsible members of that group so that we would know who are the prophets and teachers of the true gospel, and who were the prophets teaching heresy. I would suggest to the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties that henceforth in the Parliamentary Guide they put a little asterisk before the names of those who are responsible and who speak with responsibility, and leave the asterisk off those who are irresponsible—

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Yes.

Mr. IRVINE: Would it not take a fair-sized revolution to give us free private enterprise in this country?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The hon. member had best direct his question to the hon. member for Swift Current who is sitting behind him, because he said he believes in it. Let him read it again.

Mr. IRVINE: He knows it is not here.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): He says he believes in it. Ask him for a full explanation of it, since he has such a deep and implicit belief in it.

Mr. BENTLEY: I shall be glad to give it some time.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): However, I turn to the C.C.F. bible, to know whether to believe Colin Cameron, the president of the C.C.F. in British Columbia, or those C.C.F. gentlemen who speak as I do in the house, the hon. member for Swift Current and the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I turn to "Make This Your Canada". There are no asterisks in it; therefore I take it it is responsible so far as the C.C.F. party is concerned. At the end of the Regina manifesto we find the following:

> No C.C.F. government will rest content until it has eradicated capitalism.

Tie that in with private enterprise and with the speeches made in the House of Commons by the two members to whom I have referred. In the House of Commons, members of the C.C.F. party say they believe in private enterprise. They are in the same class as the hon. member for Stanstead who can vote both ways.

I apologize for being so wrong in misunderstanding the C.C.F. position, but let me get back to section 2 of the bill. I believe positively in parliamentary control, in responsibility of the ministers not only for acts committed in their department but for acts committed by any agency of the crown under them. In the consolidation of the orders in council there are some orders in council which have explicit definitions of the powers and responsibilities of the ministers, those of the Minister of Finance and those of the Minister of Fisheries for example. In other orders in council the powers of the ministers—I put it kindly—are but implicit; and there is no mention at all of the powers of the minister in a few of the orders. I say that somewhere we as a parliament, the court of last resort in this country, must have a man who is responsible for acts by these various boards and bureaux. The fact that it appears in some of the orders in council in the schedule is not sufficient; it should appear right in the bill itself.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Which bill?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Bill 104. I have known the hon. member for Lake Centre for a long time. I admire and respect him greatly. He made an impassioned speech yesterday and mentioned the denial of the right of individuals to appeal to the courts of the land against rulings of the various boards. I was swayed by that. I listened to him attentively and I can see why he has made such great success at the bar, because if you put twelve Saskatchewan farmers in the box and let the hon. member for Lake Centre at them he will win his case. The difference between parliament and a jury box is that the next morning we can read Hansard. I read Hansard, and when I read his remarks to the effect that we are tyrants who have removed that last liberty, the right of appeal to the highest court of the land, I thought of some reading that I did last winter with regard to the early days of workmen's compensation in my province. That legislation was introduced by a Liberal government and bitterly opposed by the Tories, especially by lawyers and insurance companies. Oh, the lawyers waxed indignant about that removal from the poor, humble injured working man of the precious right to appeal from a dictatorial workmen's compensation board in respect of unjust awards. How they bled for the workingman! Well, workmen's compensation has rolled on all these years, and the workmen of British Columbia have been well protected and have saved many needless legal fees. There is ministerial responsibility to the act because the minister of labour in the provincial legislature is held responsible for any injustice which may have been done by the workmen's compensation board.

The same can be said of the Canadian pension board, again described as a body from which there is no appeal to the courts of the land. But who is the man that must carry the responsibility in this House of Commons, the greatest and highest court of appeal, for seeing that justice is done in all the rulings of the board? Who is that man but the Minister of Veterans Affairs? For that reason I say that we are not denying to those who may feel that they are unfairly dealt with by the boards the right to appeal to the highest court in the land, just so long as it is clearly understood by the people that here in parliament there is one man responsible for each of these boards, one man who must justify before a gathering of his peers the actions of the board.

The second reason concerns the public outlook. There is an old saying—I need hardly repeat it, though it is important—that not only must justice be done but it must be known that justice is done; and certainly if it is known by an amendment written into the bill, known to the people of Canada, that these are not bureaucrats surrounded with absolute power but still servants of the people, that there is still one man, in this house, of the servants of the people, who must answer for the actions of the board, then the people can be assured that justice will be done.

The third reason comes closer perhaps to members of parliament. There is, I will not say a tendency but at least a temptation, for some ministers, when you go to them—not in the House of Commons but in their offices—and protest against actions of boards, to say, "Oh, well, the boards have been set up to run their own affairs, and we cannot do anything". To remove that temptation from ministers I would like to see clearly in the bill an amendment stating that the minister shall not only have control but shall be responsible. With that in mind I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), the following amendment to section 2, a new subsection 2(1):

> Wherever the word minister is used in the schedule to this act, the rights, powers, duties, liabilities and functions of that minister shall extend and apply to such boards, and other public bodies, officers, subjects, services and properties of the crown as may be designated or assigned to the minister by the governor in council over which the minister shall have the control, regulation, management and supervision.

The wording of that, as you will realize, is not my own. It is taken directly from the powers of the minister in the most recent departmental act, that of reconstruction and supply.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to compliment the hon. member on his contribution to the debate and would ask that his suggestion stand for consideration by the officers of my department and by the government. I would point out that in one of the orders in the schedule at page 23, is found a clause which reads:

> In the exercise of its powers conferred by these regulations or otherwise, the board shall be responsible to the minister and, whenever any directions are given by the minister, all action taken by the board shall be in accordance with such directions.

Generally speaking when I was Minister of Finance I tried to see that clauses of that kind were inserted in the orders which set up the boards that operated under my jurisdiction, and I am in accord with the general principle of my hon. friend's observations. I should point out, however, that the language of his amendment may be too sweeping, and it is for that reason that I should like to have the proposal stand. There is a class of organization which should not, I submit, be subject to the direction of the minister and that is any organization which is in the nature of a court. For instance, in some of these orders courts of rental appeal and the like are set up. These probably should not be subject to the direction of the minister; they should have independent jurisdiction. The same may be true of certain organizations connected with labour relations It may be they should not be subject to interference by the minister. But with regard to organizations of the type of the wartime prices and trade board, it is perfectly proper that they should be subject to direction from the minister, and that probably is recognized by the clause which I have read, which appears in the wartime prices regulations.

With regard to this section, I suggest that at some stage it should be allowed to stand. I do not think the section can be passed, either with or without this amendment, at the present time, but should stand until we get through the schedule, as I explained yesterday. If however hon. members have any suggestions to make as to the proposal itself, this may be as good a time as any to make them. If they are made now it will give the government an opportunity to consider them before we return to the section.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have no suggestions at the moment with regard to the section, but I do wish to reply to some of the remarks made by the member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). First may I say that I have admired the independent stand that he has taken in this house on numerous occasions, although perhaps there is a reason for that show of independence. He did not, however, deal fairly in this case with the quotation he gave from the Canadian Press report of Mr. Cameron's speech. He read a sentence and stopped there, whereas the sentence he read was only a part, really only half of what Mr. Cameron said.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): It was the end of a paragraph.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was not the end of a paragraph either.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): In the Vancouver Sun it was the end of the paragraph.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have it, and it is the same Canadian Press article.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mine was in the Vancouver Sun, Friday, April 11, front page, not by the Canadian Press but by the Vancouver Sun, and the remarks ended at the end of the paragraph. I am not here to read the entire speech. A paragraph is one coherent thought.

An hon. MEMBER: Whose paragraph?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The paragraph in the press release that was given by Mr. Cameron.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Vancouver Sun is not above distorting news any more than any other capitalist paper in Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The old cry of the C.C.F., "We were misquoted".

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not a misquotation, but the hon. gentlemen did not finish the quotation. Let me read it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Give us the whole speech.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. I will give you what is in the press, and I will not stop just where you stopped for your own convenience to make your own case.

Mr. TUCKER: What paper is it?

Mr. MacINNIS: The Leader-Post, Regina, Saskatchewan, April 12, 1947—a good Liberal paper.

Mr. TUCKER: It is a good paper.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is a good paper of the kind.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Who said so?

Mr. MacINNIS: Let me quote it.

"Our whole programme of social services and economic extension rests on that first bold revolutionary bid," he said. "If we present effectively the case for sane and intelligent revolutionary progress through use of democratic procedure and institutions, we can hope in Canada to lay foundations of that free classless society which is the goal of all socialist aspirations.

Through our democratic institutions. The C.C.F. has never at any time gone beyond the use of democratic institutions, or as is the phrase they use in Great Britain, revolution by consent. If there is confusion in C.C.F. speeches, the same confusion results from listening to speeches from the other side of the house. For instance, the Minister of Justice in presenting this bill made the statement that the policy of the government was to get back as quickly as possible to a free economy. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said that the policy of the government was to get back as quickly as possible to a free economy. But let us get the opinion of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) on a free economy. He does not think a great deal of a free economy; indeed he does not think it is anything worth while getting back to.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): He is not a minister.

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps the reason he is not a minister is that he holds these ideas. The reason that the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) is not closer to the ministerial seats is because he holds similar ideas. The front benches are not very keen on ideas.

On page 2056 of Hansard we find the hon. member for Spadina saying:

During the war the government used successfully the device of controls to divert the tremendous output of industry to the interests of the state—which at that time was the fullest prosecution of the war. Now in these critical and emergent years of peace we must take the same forces and use them, but not, as some political thinkers would suggest, to bring industry back to normal.

The political thinkers he possibly had in mind were the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who wish to get back as quickly as possible to a free economy. The hon. member for Spadina continues:

To my mind that is a label only, and one which hides a multitude of iniquities. As we saw in the thirties, in the titanic struggle of economic forces, the small man was crushed.

That is, under a free economy in Canada prior to the war the small man was crushed.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right; I am quoting the hon. member for Spadina.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): We do not know whether they are your words or his.

An hon. MEMBER: The lawyers would starve to death.

Mr. MacINNIS: No lawyer will ever starve to death under capitalism. There are too many crooks to defend. The hon. member for Spadina said further:

> After all, it is not the function of either the landlord or the millowner to run his business for the benefit of the public. The true function, as they see it, is to produce profits; and it would be naive for us to assume otherwise, or to ask them to run their business in an altruistic manner. The good business man is not operating for the sake of charity; and if scarcity presents him with an opportunity, he takes advantage of it.

That is the system under which we are living, where the need of one individual is used to the advantage of another. That is what the C.C.F. wants to get away from.

Then on page 2057 the hon. member for Spadina has this to say—and I should like to know how many on that side of the house agree with him. I should like to see the hon. member for Vancouver North get up and take issue with him in this matter. I quote:

> Many of these people reason that Hitler and Mussolini imposed a controlled economy on their countries and that all kinds of evils followed as a natural result—loss of liberty, persecution, regimentation, mass murder and war. They are convinced that if we hold on to the few controls that remain we shall be selling the freedom of this country down the river—quite overlooking the fact that Britain, probably the most largely controlled English speaking country in the world today, is also the one in which the flame of freedom burns the brightest. Only persons who have little faith in democracy should live in fear of democratic controls. People have come to take for granted the exercise of economic controls which prior to the war they would have called totalitarian. We must not forget that the little people of this country do not merely accept controls; they actually want them, and they do not want to go back to the days of false booms and real depressions.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I will answer. The hon. member invited my comments.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, I did not invite them but I have no objection to the hon. member making them at the proper time.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, let us get on with the work.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let my hon. friends be fair in this matter. Yesterday when the discussion began, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) started a discussion something like this on section 1, but was ruled out of order by the Chairman. I am not now disagreeing with the Chairman's ruling, but my impression was that if there was any section in the bill on which there could be general discussion, it was on section 1, the title. But this section deals with this specific point, and the hon. member for Vancouver North was allowed to proceed. My hon. friends did not object. They were enjoying it very much.

An hon. MEMBER: Because he moved an amendment.

Mr. MacINNIS: I know the hon. member moved an amendment, but what he said in moving the amendment was not related to what he said in the first part of his speech.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The hon. member's party were very kind to me. They said "explain", and I explained.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, the party did not say anything of the kind. The purpose was to create a false impression of what was said by a member of the C.C.F., and we are not going to allow the hon. member to get away with that sort of thing.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I might say to the hon. member for Vancouver East that I was asked for a ruling with regard to section 2. I made a ruling that in my opinion it allowed very wide latitude—it deals with all the orders in council—and I did not see how I could rule the hon. member out of order. I thought I was right and still think I was right.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to speak on section 2. I have not taken up much time in connection with this bill, and I speak now because I must be at a meeting of the committee on railways at four o'clock.

I wish to refer to two or three principles in connection with controls. I wish to speak about three items which, if continued in new form will afford no relief so far as I see. The other day I referred to what has been done in the United States regarding production. That was the key to the solution of control and decontrol in that great country. Sooner or later we in Canada would have to follow suit, in view of the fact that our economy is closely interlocked with that of the United States. In the United States figures show that they are now having their greatest volume of production in all their history of all classes of goods. The result has been that that production has had a great deal to do with maintaining and aiding consumer goods business, and in some instances in lowering prices. This has been the effect, either directly or indirectly, of their decontrol policy.

This whole matter gets back very largely to the law of supply and demand, the principle which applied long before the war and which made the United States the great country it is. In some respects let me say that the public holds relief in this respect in its own hands. It need not buy manufactured goods offered in the stores at higher prices if it does not want to. That is shown in the large departmental stores throughout the country today. Clothing for men and women is being offered at fabulous prices—and in this I include men's ties, shirts and all sorts of things. The same applies to women's clothes. Some of these articles will not be bought at higher prices, and in many instances the result has been that the goods have remained on the counters, with few if any people buying them.

The Minister of Finance dealt with two or three controls the other day. I believe some reference was made by him to re-control where necessary. It was pointed out by me that in the coming winter it may be necessary to give some relief in order to make fuel available. This winter we still have snow in April, and when the warmer weather does come we shall have had about nine months of winter weather, when some fuel must be provided. The minister said that they might find it necessary to reestablish, if urgent and necessary, some forms of control.

Then I think something further should be done in connection with milk, because any neglect in this respect might have a severe effect on the health of our younger population. I should hope that next winter the minister might see fit to reestablish some system of a moderate milk subsidy for the winter months at least.

In connection with section 2 of the bill I should like to see some amendment in respect of the orders and regulations affecting houses. The present system of controls has retarded the building of houses, so that no one now wants to invest in real estate. In the city from which I come, sixty-five per cent of the people used to own their own homes. Many have lost them to the mortgagees. Some of the owners have had undesirable tenants under this system of controls, tenants who have misused the properties and left them in such a rack and ruin state that insurance companies would not pay a dollar in the event of fire. I know of one instance where the mortgagee wanted to foreclose. He asked for a further payment of principal because of the way undesirable tenants ruined his investment.

I do not favour a form of control under which an owner cannot get into his own house, even after years of waiting; it is nothing but state confiscation. Where the tenant had no lease he could be put out. The rental regulations are ridiculous and have worked great hardships on returned soldiers who have not been able to get into their own houses on which they had spent their gratuities and credits.

I suggest that the minister should have some form of federal inspection. I know that in my city the offices are filled with rental administrators. They have had to move to a larger building at 32 Adelaide street. It may be that only five or ten per cent of these undesirable cases would require further investigation by federal authority. Why could not a check be made on undesirable tenants so that the landlord would have a little encouragement and a chance to put them out, and would be prepared to invest more money in real estate?

How can this be administered from Ottawa? I say it should be turned over to the provinces and municipalities for rent control regulation, if necessary. The municipalities regulate the building of houses and have control of fire and building by-laws. Why should the dominion attempt to operate a system like this, away down here in Ottawa, and discourage the building of houses for all time to come?

I do urge upon the government that some further regulation be applied to housing along the lines I have suggested, and that they be made to apply to those undesirable tenants who came in, destroyed property, ruined it to the point where it has to be rebuilt from the ground up by a landlord who may lose it. Why should this be allowed? It is nothing but confiscation.

As I have said, only five or ten per cent of the tenants could be considered as undesirable. Inspection could be made of them under civic by-law. If the federal power cannot do it, then let the property inspector, the building inspector or the fire chief visit these places and take note of the inflammable material which has been collected.

Why should not the municipal and city police continue this process of housing control, if there is to be any control? It would be far better to put an end to control altogether, and apply the system I have suggested.

Mr. IRVINE: I want to be sure I am in order, and so I refer to the section under discussion; it is section 2, having to do with orders and regulations continued in force.

I rise to make a few brief comments, and to make reference to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). I know he has been well answered already, but there are one or two further comments in that connection which I feel ought to be made. The hon. member began by referring to the view expressed by some that there was no difference between the C.C.F. and the Liberal party in the matter of controls. But he proceeded to dissociate himself from that idea, and to show that there is a difference. He said his understanding was that the C.C.F. party would deliberately appoint bodies to take charge of public functions, which bodies would have no contact with governmental control through representation in parliament.

Of course the hon. member knew we would deny that immediately. Then he proceeded to quote. In the first place, let me say to him he may find there are many people in the ranks of the C.C.F. who are no more proud of being associated with the Liberal party than he is of being associated with us. I would point out further to him that the quotation he made had nothing whatever to do with the principle of control. Neither of the gentlemen he quoted was making any reference to controls or to the appointment of bodies to carry out certain important functions, or to the mechanism by which democratic control might be mainatined. Neither was discussing that.

I suggest the reason for the first quotation, that from the presidential address of Mr. Cameron in Vancouver, was that Mr. Cameron had used the word "revolution." That is the reason it was used.

I believe that perhaps the best thing any man or woman in the house can contribute to the public life of Canada is a point of view, whether that point of view be individually expressed or be expressed as the view of an organized body. Because I believe that I do not desire to have the views I hold either misrepresented or distorted. I want my views to be considered for what they are and not have somebody's distortion of them.

The word "revolution" is a perfectly good word and I do not propose to give it up just because somebody misinterprets it. If it stands for blood and horror to my hon. friends on the government side of the house or in any part of the house, then they do not understand their English, that is all. If I had the time I could give the committee numerous examples of revolutionaries in art, science, religion and, in fact, in every walk of human life. I could show how Watt himself, the man who discovered the power which originated the industrial revolution, was a revolutionist in industry. There have been revolutionists in music and in art. Jesus Christ was a revolutionist in religion and of course they crucified him. I have no doubt that the Liberal party would crucify him today if he came back, and maybe a lot on this side would help them.

Revolution means a fundamental change in human affairs, and that is all it means. We happen to stand for revolution by the consent of the people through our democratic institutions.

An hon. MEMBER: You will never get it.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend says we will never get it. He is a real revolutionist of the bloody sort, but I am revolutionist of the democratic kind. If we do not get it in that way, I do not want it and I am not interested in it. I am interested in the revolution that is brought about with the consent of the Canadian people at the ballot box and without any of the misrepresentation that we had this afternoon.

There is no contradiction between the man who believes in free private enterprise and the man who believes in the necessity for a great revolutionary change in this country's way of doing business and in this country's way of life. As I suggested in my question to my hon. friend a moment ago, there could be no greater revolution possible in this country than the one that would leave every individual free to express his own being and his own personality and to do the kind of work he wants to do and to make his contribution to society. That would be revolution. There are few individuals that have any such freedom today.

To believe in that is to have a very idealistic concept indeed. As the hon. member for Swift Current said, an ideal of that sort is pretty much like the ideal of those who hope to get to heaven. It is an ideal but it is far from being the fact in Canadian life today. So thus goes the argument of my hon. friend. I do not know why he brought it up. He may have had some idea in his own mind. I do not think he inteded to misrepresent the viewpoint of this group, but I conclude by saying: Let those in this house oppose the C.C.F. all they want to, provided that they oppose us for what we really are, for what we stand for. I resent being opposed because of something in which I never believed or advocated.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I suggest that the section stand and that we go on to another section.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have something to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I will speak a little louder. After listening to the hon. member for Vancouver North, I begin to wonder why he is not sitting on the front benches. I have a few notes here somewhere and I will try to find them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is all right, I will get them in a minute. From the way the hon. member for Vancouver North talked I thought he would probably be in the cabinet tomorrow. I am not so sure that he would not be a better man in the cabinet than a whole lot of our friends who are sitting on the front benches over there right now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Start anywhere.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You are going to get something in a minute that is worth while. This government is not so good that it can laugh at everything. I think a lot of the fellows over there really do not know where they are going. There are a lot of others on that side, on the back benches, who have more in them than those on the front benches, and there are a lot on this side who have more in them than those who are on the front benches.

I asked for a return last year giving the number of people in the employ of the government of Canada. That is very important, is it not?—the people who are in our employ. I just want to tell those fellows who are sitting on the government benches that there are too many people trying to look after too few in this country right now. You just cannot get away from that. We have to get down to brass tacks; and I am going to give a few figures.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You fellows over there can laugh if you want to. A member of the cabinet the other day referred to the amount of income tax he had to pay. Let us get down to something here; let us get busy and get something done. Let us have on the front benches more fellows like that bright young boy in the back seat over there, who is not as incompetent and inept as many of the leading lights on the front benches, who are probably there for political purposes and for nothing else. I have some good friends—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why?

The CHAIRMAN: I ruled that we would allow wide latitude in the discussion of section 2, but it must be discussion with respect to the bill under consideration and with respect to the orders in council which are set forth in the schedule. I do not think it allows discussion of the income tax or some other legislation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I bow to your ruling and I will keep as close as I can to the text of my sermon. A lot of people have talked about this bill as being the bill of fifty-seven varieties, copying Heinz. It is not that at all; it is Canada's greatest fruit salad. Without exception, it is the silliest, the most foolish bill that has ever been brought into this House of Commons. If you want me to quote my authority, it is my friend the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). If anybody knows anything about bills, he does.

I have a few figures to put on Hansard, and I think they will surprise hon. members. I wonder if each individual minister would like to know the increased numbers on the payroll of his department today. I have a return here showing what a great increase there has been in the number of government employees, and while on the subject of returns I put this to the committee: Can we get a return that is reliable brought down in this House of Commons? This affects the whole people of Canada and it affects everything that is in this bill. I had a return brought down last year to show the number of people in the employ of Canada and how much we are paying them; and what do you think, Mr. Chairman? — four departments, employing 8,600 people, were left out of that return! On March 31, 1946, we had in round figures 155,000 persons in the employ of the government of Canada. The return was short by about 7,000 employees, but what is 7,000 or 10,000 to an administration so incompetent and inept as I see sitting in front of me at the present time? It makes no difference to them at all. But I am Scotch and a lot of other fellows in this country are Scotch and they like to bite a nickel a couple of times before they spend it.

On March 31, 1946, we had 155,000 employees of the Dominion of Canada. On December 31, 1946, we had 174,000 employees, and instead of paying them $229,000,000 a year, as we did in 1946, we paid them $317,544,045.85—and don't forget the cents. I am bringing this up because I believe there are many people on the other side of the house with more brains than those sitting on the front benches.

So far as these controls are concerned this consolidation, Canada's fruit salad—for that is what it is—is all nonsense. Of course there has to be a certain measure of proper control. But why was not this consolidation printed in French for the benefit of the French members? I should be very sore if I spoke good French and a copy of it were not available in French. How can the government expect to keep down the cost of living when it increases the number of its employees to the point where we are now paying them $317,000,000 a year? It is the same old story; the higher she rises the harder she falls.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest again that this section stand. It is necessary that it stand anyway until we finish the schedule. I do not think we shall make very much progress if we make general speeches in perpetuity on this section.

Mr. FULTON: If the section is to stand, may I suggest that we be allowed to consider the schedule before we consider the other sections of the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Why?

Mr. FULTON: Because there may be comments on other sections which would be influenced by the schedule. In any event it would assist us. There are amendments to make to the schedule. Many members have amendments to suggest, and if we knew where we stood with regard to the schedule it might speed up discussion on the remaining sections of the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: If that is the wish of the committee it is satisfactory to me. I thought we should go through the other sections first, but if anyone thinks there is any advantage in dealing with the schedule first, perhaps they should express themselves.

Mr. KNOWLES: Any of us who have done any preparation had in mind that we would be proceeding with the other sections first before dealing with the schedule, as the minister indicated last night.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. I stated explicitly last night the order which would be followed, that we would take section 1, let section 2 stand, and then take sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8. I think we might as well do it in that way.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister not consider the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Kamloops? It is true that the schedule is more directly related to section 2 than to the later sections, but in these later sections there are provisions which may require amendment in the light of amendments that may be made to the schedule. I would urge on the minister that the reasons why it is more convenient to consider the schedule before dealing finally with section 2 apply in greater or less degree to the other sections. I think we would have a more orderly consideration of the whole measure if the minister would permit the committee to proceed with the schedule next, because what is done with respect to that will affect not only section 2 but the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a matter of indifference to me. I am prepared to meet the wishes of the committee. I do not know just what my hon. friend has in mind though. I do not see any way in which the other sections would be affected by what is done with the schedule itself. I can see how section 2 would be. I would really prefer to take it up in the order announced. Perhaps the only member who objects to what the hon. member for Kamloops suggests is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am also making objection on behalf of other members who are not here but are attending committees at this moment. It was specifically stated last night that we would consider the other sections before the schedule. Many members who are interested in the first orders in the schedule are not able to be here at this time. I would be in the position of having to ask for certain orders to stand for their convenience.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think we had better take the sections. There has been no suggestion as to how they could be affected by any changes in the order.

Mr. FULTON: I can give the minister one now. Section 7 provides that the act shall expire on the 31st day of December, 1947. I am not going to anticipate it, but some of us have misgivings as to whether some of them should not expire sooner. We may be suggesting an amendment to this section if these orders in council are to remain in their present form in the schedule. If they are amended a great deal or perhaps dropped in the schedule that question will not arise. Therefore it would be a much more orderly method of procedure to consider first whether we shall—

Mr. ILSLEY: If there is application to let section 7 stand let us take it up when we come to it. Let us deal with section 3 now.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 and the amendment stands.

Section stands.

On section 3—Employment of necessary persons.

Mr. FLEMING: On section 3, with respect, it seems to me that the time has arrived when some steps should be taken to have the civil service commission deal with the employees and staffs of the various boards operating under the authority of the orders enumerated in the schedule. Although there has previously been some discussion on some phases of this matter, there has been no comprehensive statement of the reason why it has been necessary over a lengthy period of time, in some cases going back to 1939 and in other cases to 1941, to have a body of employees outside the scope of the civil service commission in their manner of appointment, in their remuneration and in other provisions which are dealt with on a different basis from that of the civil service. I do not know what the minister is going to say with respect to the temporary features of the bill, but it seems to me that, if some demobilization is in contemplation with respect to the staffs, the time has come when a statement should be made by the ministry as to its intention with respect to the continuation outside the scope of the civil service of staffs of government boards.

Mr. ILSLEY: The staffs of these boards were selected by the boards themselves, subject to the approval of the governor in council, because that seemed the only way in which they could be staffed. I remember the fall of 1941 when price ceilings were imposed and when it was thought it might be necessary to staff the wartime prices and trade board with some thousands of employees. About that time Mr. Gordon was appointed chairman of the board; he surrounded himself with some trusted associates, and they in turn got together a staff for the board as best they could. They had to move with great rapidity; they had to be in a position to give assurance to the people whom they took on. Many of these were taken on without remuneration, some of them with remuneration and so on. If the selection of these officials had been made by the civil service commission it would have been found that the rules established for the manning of the permanent service of Canada would have been entirely inappropriate. Therefore, after careful discussion, it was decided that the only practicable way of dealing with the matter was by authorizing the appointment of officials and staffs by the board itself, subject to the approval of the governor in council. The same thing was done in several other departments. I am satisfied that that was the proper method to pursue.

At the present time, to try to bring the remaining employees of the wartime prices and trade board under the civil service commission, to have them selected by the civil service commission, appointed pursuant to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, would, in my opinion, be a most unwise thing to do. There would be a great deal of wasted effort, a great deal of confusion, and all unnecessary because it is anticipated that the staff of an organization such as the wartime prices and trade board will from now on be diminishing; perhaps in a few months from now it will be diminishing fairly rapidly. The system under which we are now operating should be allowed to run its course instead of a new system being instituted at this time in a late stage of the board's existence. The same question came up with regard to employees of the wheat board where the same arguments did not apply, but I think the house was convinced after a while that it was desirable that the employees of the wheat board be selected in accordance with the present system instead of by the civil service commission. But there is a much stronger reason why they should be continued under the present system in the case of the wartime prices and trade board and similar organizations, and it is this: these organizations before too long will be passing out of existence.

Mr. BROOKS: Does the minister expect that there will be an additional large number of employees taken on?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is some turnover. Some go and some are taken on to replace those who leave, but there has been considerable reduction in the number of employees of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. BROOKS: Is there any soldiers preference at the present time in taking on new employees?

Mr. ILSLEY: The rules of the soldiers preference are observed. Whether there is any law under which they have to be observed I do not know.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Orders and regulations may be revoked.

Mr. KNOWLES: This section reads:

The governor in council may revoke in whole or in part any order or regulation continued in force by or made under this act.

There is no doubt that this provision is necessary in certain instances. It will be required particularly where orders in council continued by this bill are, in turn, replaced by legislation. In such a circumstance it will be necessary to revoke the existing orders in council; and there may be other instances where power such as this would also be necessary. But I rise to attempt once again to do what the minister referred to last night, namely, to try in some way to persuade the government that the country would like the administration to put the brakes on its programme of decontrol, particularly with respect to prices. That case has been made effectively by a number of hon. members who have spoken. Particular reference has already been made to the remarks made the other day by the hon. member for Spadina. I feel strongly that the government should pay attention to what the people across the country are thinking in connection with this matter.

I recognize that there is a difference of philosophy and point of view between us and the government with respect to the long-range question but may I for the moment argue on the basis of the government's own terms? I have in mind certain promises that were made in the speech from the throne in the first session after the war was over, namely, that price control would be kept in effect as long as it was necessary, and also the remarks made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in the white paper which he tabled in the spring of 1945 before the war was over, when he made it clear that the most difficult period would be after the war was over; that it was during that period that controls on our economy needed to be maintained in order to effect a proper transition from war to peace.

I am arguing now not on our basis but on the government's own terms, and my contention is that on the basis of their own premises, and even accepting their idea that in due course they have to get out of this field, nevertheless they have gone too fast. I would suggest that, if the government is able to ignore some of the things we are saying on this side, it ought to pay attention to the hon. member for Spadina and the round dozen Liberals who have been referred to as supporting the viewpoint he has expressed. As an attempt to let the government know of the desire of the country for the brakes to be put on its too rapid decontrol, I will move an amendment and then say a few words about it. I move:

That section 4 be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"Provided, however, that none of the orders listed in the schedule to this act under the section headed wartime prices and trade board may be revoked without the consent of parliament."

I would point out immediately to the member for Vancouver North, who seems to find amusement in this—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I am getting no amusement at all out of it. It is a serious matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to hear my hon. friend make that comment and I hope he will support the amendment. May I point out that it does not refer to board orders and regulations made by the wartime prices and trade board and associated boards; it refers only to the actual orders in council listed in the schedule that is appended to the bill. There are about nine of them, I believe, under the general heading "wartime prices and trade board," and the effect of this amendment would be to deny the government the power, without getting the consent of parliament, to toss the wartime prices and trade board completely out of existence. My fear is that that is what is likely to happen before many months.

The other day the Minister of Finance, in reply to remarks made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, made the suggestion that if industrialists were not wise in this matter of prices the government might have to consider the reimposition of certain price controls. I suggest that if the process of gradually getting rid of the wartime prices and trade board continues much longer the government will not be in a position to reimpose any price controls. They will not have the staff.

I realize that even if this amendment carries, and even if by the terms of the amendment the government is prohibited from revoking certain orders in council altogether, they can still whittle them away, and the board itself can whittle away price controls under board orders and regulations. But at least it would indicate to the government the feeling of a section of the house at any rate—and I hope we have that round dozen of Liberals with us—the desire that they go a little more slowly in the matter of price decontrol.

That is my reason for moving this amendment, and I submit that those in the house who have had so much to say about keeping control over these matters in the hands of parliament will also want to support the amendment because of its insistence that in this respect the government shall not act without the consent of parliament.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member means the orders and regulations of the governor in council. His remarks indicated that was what he meant.

Mr. KNOWLES: Precisely, because, if I may call the attention of the minister once more to the wording of the amendment, it is "none of the orders listed in the schedule to this act under the section headed wartime prices and trade board." That makes it quite clearly refer to orders in council 8528, 9029, 9870, 7475, 5518, 6497, 34/4433, 3122 and 328.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is quite a serious matter; it affects the whole principle of the bill. I certainly would not be able to accept the amendment at the moment, and I do not think I would accept it at all, it is so serious. It means, for example—and I realize that this is desirable from the point of view of my hon. friend—that certain sections of the wartime prices and trade regulations will remain as law for a year, when perhaps they cannot be enforced, when perhaps they should not be enforced. It seems to me that the matter of revocation should be left to the government. It may be necessary to get rid of some sections, or perhaps all these orders, before the expiration of the year.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, may I say that during the Easter recess the people in my constituency who spoke to me were greatly concerned about the rising cost of living and the possibility of finding themselves with their dollar buying a great deal less as the months go by. Again and again people said to me, "Why is it that, now that the war is over and our people are home, we have to accept a situation where we have less milk, less butter, less foodstuffs?" Unless the minister and the government give some guarantee that the wartime prices and trade board will continue for at least another year, there will be no way of preventing the cost of living from rising a good deal higher. People are naturally concerned when, after parliament takes a recess, those who live in rented quarters find that their rents have gone up without members of parliament having had an opportunity to have all the evidence placed before them. We were asked by our people, "Are the landlords in the position where they face bankruptcy unless they have such increases?" We have to say frankly that the matter has not had full and frank discussion in parliament. I think the amendment moved by my deskmate places the matter in the hands of parliament. If an emergency should arise later in the year and the administration felt that our reconversion programme was being handicapped because of the operations of the wartime prices and trade board, it would be an easy matter to call parliament together, outline the problem and ask for permission to do, through parliament, what it is proposed to do by order in council. I feel that those on this side of the house who have spoken about the supremacy of parliament will want to support this amendment, and that would give a great deal of confidence to the people, who have no way of protecting themselves as their dollar buys less from day to day and week to week.

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot see the difficulty envisioned by the Minister of Justice in this matter. The amendment provides that the orders in council under the heading "wartime prices and trade board" shall not be revoked except by parliament. The purpose of these orders in council was to provide that prices should not rise beyond a certain level or get out of hand. If there is no pressure for the raising of prices, no emergency can exist and the orders themselves provide for keeping prices stable. Therefore I cannot see that the minister, if he accepts this amendment, is accepting anything which might result in a dangerous situation. It is perfectly democratic. The leader of this government has told this house time without number, that parliament will decide. We are merely asking that, in this important matter which affects the lives of so many of the people of Canada, parliament should decide.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister one other question which, I admit, may be fairly pointed; but, after all, we are supposed to get down to brass tacks in this chamber. The minister said that he understood the amendment and recognized it as desirable from my point of view. I appreciate the interest he shows and the attention he pays to some of the efforts that we make. Does he not also realize that it is desirable, from the viewpoint of the majority of the Canadian people, at the present time to continue the policy of price control at least for a longer period than seems to be envisioned by the government? Is he not aware, for example, of the Gallup poll on this matter and of the concern of housewives, consumers, workers, farmers, pensioners and others across the country, that the excellent job the government did during the war years be continued for a further period?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the public does not want to see prices go up. I agree with that. I myself do not want to see prices go up. I must say when I hear some of the speeches warning against the rapidity of decontrol—

Mr. KNOWLES: Headlong decontrol is the phrase.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, against headlong decontrol, I can understand clearly that type of speech. After all, for a great many years I threw myself into trying to keep prices from going up, and I naturally look at that side of it. On the other hand, it must be borne in mind that it becomes more difficult every day to keep in force an effective price control system. I am not talking now about the constitutional objections, but the time will come some time when it will not be within the power of this parliament or any agency of this parliament—that is, the constitutional power—to control prices, because we shall be in the field of property and civil rights, in which field we do not belong.

Mr. MacINNIS: If we have the constitutional right for controls now to pass this bill, the constitutional validity shall maintain as long as the act remains. Is that not correct?

Mr. MARTIN: Not necessarily.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: As long as the emergency arising out of the war exists.

Mr. MARTIN: That is it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should think there might come a time when an order in council under this act would not be valid.

Mr. MacINNIS: We are assuming that it will be valid for the period mentioned in this act.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is all the time covered by this amendment. If it is valid now and during the life of this act, it will be valid as long as this amendment remains in effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: I went off on a tangent. It was an aside. I said I was not then talking about constitutional validity, and then I proceeded to talk about it, foolishly. What I was saying was that it becomes harder and harder every day to maintain an effective price control system in Canada. I want my hon. friends in the C.C.F. to understand that. Some of them have not had executive or business experience. I do not say this unkindly at all, but some of them have not had that experience. The thing here is that a high type of executive experience and ability is required to operate a price control system. We had a great many able people on the staff of the wartime prices and trade board during the war years. Now a great number of those people have gone home. It must be borne in mind that they are pounded by the opposition every day in this house for being bureaucrats, and so on.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do not pay any attention to that.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are subjected to that tirade of abuse in this house. Many people do not enjoy that. They get tired of it after a while; they say, "Why should I have to take that sort of thing?" and they go home. They also feel that the war emergency is passing and that they must go back and make provision for their own futures. For one reason and another we are losing and keep losing our good men all the time. That makes it very difficult to do these things. If you have a badly enforced price control system; if you have a system that you simply cannot enforce because the patriotic urge of the people is not as great as it was, because the selfishness of a good many people is a little more assertive than it is in time of war, there comes a time when it is better to have no control at all, apart altogether from the constitutional objection. Then of course, as conditions of supply and demand change, as scarcities disappear, it may be apparent that prices will move to higher levels and stay there for quite a while, if not indefinitely. Then a stage is arrived at when the dominion government should get out of price control. It may possibly be that we are decontrolling too rapidly. The Progressive Conservatives accuse us of decontrolling too slowly and urge us to be more rapid about it. The C.C.F. say that we are decontrolling too rapidly and that we should be slower about it. We are in a difficult position. Of course we cannot suit opposition parties. There is no use in trying to do that. We should be foolish to try it. We are taking a middle course, what we think is the sensible course; and we can discount quite a lot of what is said by opposition parties, I suppose, as being said for political purposes. Nevertheless, I think the original idea of this bill was the correct one, and that was to maintain the power to control in the agencies that are set up, and to continue it for a time and to leave it with the government to revoke these orders when the time comes that they think these orders should be revoked. It would alter our plans very much if we froze a control system on the country for a year; and I do not think we should do so at the present time.

Mr. BURTON: I do not rise to take issue with the Minister of Justice as to the constitutionality of the procedure, because I realize I am not learned in that respect. I believe, however, that the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East, have covered the subject fully. He has pointed out that if it is constitutional for us to have these controls at the present time, then surely under the measure before us it would be all right to have them for the remainder of the year or until parliament is called to attend another session.

Nor do I rise at this time to take part in the debate in answer to the remark of the right hon. gentleman to the effect that some of us in this group do not have the so-called necessary business experience properly to realize what is involved. I would say to him, however, that while some of us may not have had the opportunity to sit in control of big business, nevertheless we have all had the experience of running our own business. And let me say that if we had not paid more attention to the running of our own business than have some people I know of, then we would not have got very far with it.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to my reference to business experience, I never ran a business, myself; and I do not think I am reflecting adversely on any person when I say he has not had business experience. Indeed I believe some of the best people in the country are those who have not had business experience. But what I have said is that one requires business experience in this kind of thing, and a lot of it.

Mr. BURTON: Possibly on this occasion the right hon. gentleman and I are on an equal footing. The right hon. gentleman need not take a back seat to anyone, when it comes to a matter of applying common sense. I believe that during wartime, while he was in charge of an important department of government, he rendered a distinct service to the nation. Yet he did not have what some people would call the necessary business experience.

However, as I said, I did not rise to give advice which some people believe can come properly only from certain people. But I would say to the right hon. gentleman that when at times we speak emphatically, we are endeavouring to convey to him and to his colleagues the voice of the people back home, and we believe that is something which requires more attention than it sometimes receives. When the right hon. gentleman suggested that during the course of debate some may at times be influenced by political reasons, let me point out to him that in this instance, if he does not heed with alarm the voice of the people with respect to the situation which is developing—and not gradually, but rapidly—in this country, then there will be more people who will have to pay attention to their political fences. Otherwise it will be bad for them. And let me say it will not happen to those in this part of the house. In my view this question has split right across party lines of every party in the house, with the exception of the C.C.F. This group has consistently pointed out to the government that the people are alarmed by the development of this situation.

However, when I rose it was my intention to state to the minister that I have been amazed to note his hesitancy—and I could have used a stronger word—in connection with the amendment offered, and to note that without very much consideration he was not prepared to accept the amendment offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As was pointed out by the hon. member, the adoption of the amendment would not prevent the wartime prices and trade board from easing off or, as he put it, from chiseling off some of the controls. Nevertheless the people of the country would be assured that the entire system of controls would not be done away with at least until parliament had been consulted in another session.

The minister appears before the committee with a bill which has within it more than fifty orders in council which, as he has said—and we all know—were in operation during past years. He says the time has now come when he wishes no longer to carry on these rules and regulations by orders in council, but wants to do it by statutory means.

I submit to him that the parliament which puts the stamp of approval on the bill should be the only body properly qualified to take that stamp of approval away. I submit that the amendment is a perfectly good one and is worthy of the minister's consideration, on that aspect alone. If we do place our stamp of approval on the bill, then surely no order in council should have the effect of wiping out a statute.

Mrs. STRUM: Mr. Chairman, this is a matter deserving of serious consideration by all members in the house. I believe what the minister has said is true, that the members of the wartime prices and trade board are weary.

However I do not think they have ever taken seriously criticism such as that which has been registered by the Tories. I do not think anyone takes it seriously. Sometimes I think not only are they something out of this world, but they are something out of this century. They are living in the world of a hundred years ago.

Mr. FRASER: You are out of your head.

Mrs. STRUM: There have been some on the government's side of the house who apparently have been awake in the past fifty years, and who have realized that at least to some extent we have to protect the consumer. That right has been given under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act.

In spite of what my hon. friends say, we should consider the needs of the consumer. I believe the government's policy is based on the assumption that if we institute decontrol as consumer goods become more plentiful, prices will automatically adjust themselves. Since we began the process of decontrol we have not received enough literature on the subject to know just what the situation is. However, in the United States, where they have had a longer time in which to test the process of decontrol, they have found that this is not true. I would refer hon. members to Time magazine of April 7, and particularly to the page dealing with business and finance, to show what their experience has been. On page 43, under "Prices", there is a paragraph entitled, "Highest climb", which reads:

The magazine Mill & Factory polled business men, found that forty-four per cent thought prices were too high. But only fifteen per cent expected to reduce them by summer. In a nationwide survey, the Wall Street Journal found that virtually no one is going to reduce them now.

Everybody wants the other fellow to reduce them but the individual manufacturer is not going to do anything about his own profits.

Profits in many industries were so fat, despite slackening sales, that few were being scared into price cutting.

And the last paragraph reads:

But out of fear, or the reluctance of most business men to charge less than the traffic would bear, there seemed to be small hope of general price reductions until a drastic drop in buying power forced them. Everyone was content to let George do it. And the longer prices remained unreasonably high, the farther—and faster—they would fall when the inevitable drop came.

I think that is a fairly good summary of the experience under decontrol in the United States. Here is another quotable quote from the issue of April 14. This article refers to Quebec in our own country. This reads:

In a special dispatch from Quebec the Times talked about the "enormous profits" Canadian paper companies were making, showed that net profits of New York's International Paper Company had risen 270 per cent since 1943, that profits of another company had risen 500 per cent. But the price of newsprint was boosted again last fortnight.

Greatly perturbed by all this, Macy's president, Jack Straus warned in full-page ads last week: "Unless prices were lowered, we believe that a business recession is probable." But Macy's itself made no broad price cuts in cost of living items. Ironically, retailers and manufacturers were clinging to high profits as a hedge against the recession which they feared high prices would bring.

Are we to sit here and allow the manufacturers to drag us into a depression because we do not like to go to the trouble of controlling prices? Are we going to permit this thing to go on until consumer resistance and the lack of purchasing power bring on strikes and another depression? Sometimes when I read the opinions of some of our economists I think it is time that we started a new school of economics. They regard what they call the law of supply and demand as being something like the law of gravity, something over which they have no control. In this issue of Time someone has charted business booms and depressions, and to me it just looks like the records of smallpox which we used to consider were an act of God and that we could do nothing to prevent that disease. We used to think that all we could do was to record the death rate. Then some revolutionary in the field of medicine decided that we should not just record the death rate, that we should do something about the matter. If this parliament sits here like a bunch of nitwits and does nothing, then they are crazy.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think we all appreciate the point made by the minister about the difficulties of administering price control. We know he spoke with pretty deep feeling on the matter because he was responsible for it all during the war. Revolutionaries have been referred to several times this afternoon; I suggest that the Minister of Justice during the time he was Minister of Finance was something of a revolutionary in this field, and he did an awfully good job. However, we do not want him to be responsible now for a counter-revolution.

The thing we would like the government to do is to weigh one set of difficulties against another. Yes, the administration of price control is difficult, but one must consider the difficulties that the consumers face with rising prices; one must consider the difficulties that the old age pensioners are facing today. I am glad to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his seat. I was saying that one has to consider the difficulties that old age pensioners face.

Mr. MARTIN: May I point out to the hon. gentleman with great respect, and I am sure that he will agree, that there is no one in this house who does not share great concern for that problem. He has no monopoly in this matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: I agree thoroughly that every member in this house shares that concern. What some of us are anxious for is to have that concern translated into the passing of amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act, so that the old people of Canada will get whatever increases are to be given to them.

Mr. MARTIN: May I point out to the hon. gentleman that if he and others will facilitate the passage of this bill we can do that very thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: The government cannot claim that as a reason for not putting the old age pension legislation on the order paper right away. We have been told that priorities had to be established and that we had to get on with this omnibus bill first. However, there was placed in Votes and Proceedings of yesterday a notice of motion which will appear on the order paper tomorrow to provide pension legislation with respect to senior appointees in the diplomatic service. We contend that if that can be done for a selected group, it can be done for the old people of Canada. I am calling on the Minister of National Health and Welfare to try to get the legislation, which he says is prepared and which he has in his pocket, placed on the order paper as soon as possible.

Mr. MARTIN: The old age pension legislation will be introduced in this house before that particular legislation. Just as soon as we are given an opportunity to deal with amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act, we will do so.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is nothing to stop you—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I suggest to hon. members that we should deal with the matter now before the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: I just want to say to the minister that there is nothing to prevent him giving notice before six o'clock tonight, and we could have his old age pensions amendments on the order paper tomorrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Are you running the government?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am telling you what the people of Canada want. The minister raised the question of difficulties and some people are going to be faced with some real difficulties before long. What I am asking the minister and the government to do is to weigh the comparative difficulty of administering price controls and the difficulty faced by the housewife, the worker, the consumer and the pensioner because of rising prices. We now have a rumour that there is to be an increase of ten or fifteen cents in the price of butter. Those are the two kinds of difficulties to be weighed against each other, and we contend that it is the government's responsibility to lessen the difficulties of the Canadian people in this regard.

The minister said that the government found itself in a difficult position because of the difference between the views expressed by the Tories and by the C.C.F. It was pointed out that the Tories are saying that controls should go off quickly and that we wanted them continued.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that that created any difficulty for us.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister said that the government was being hammered by both sides.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right; so we are.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the minister has any doubt as to which view expressed over here indicates the feeling of the Canadian people, I suggest that he pay attention to the remarks of the only members on his side of the house, on the back benches, who have really discussed this issue. I see the hon. member for Fraser Valley sitting there. He has told us what the women in his constituency want. The hon. member for Spadina made a tremendously effective speech the other day in which he asked the government to halt its policy of headlong decontrol and to consider the welfare of the people of Canada, and I suggest that the few Liberals who have spoken specifically on price control have expressed the views of the Canadian people generally. The minister himself the other day, in speaking about the Tories, pointed out that they had moderated their views on price control since they had been home at Easter.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what they think now, to tell the truth.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, he gave them credit for recognizing where public opinion stands on this matter. All that we in this group and the member for Fraser Valley, the member for Spadina, the member for Vancouver North and others are asking is that the government also recognize to some extent the opinion of the people of this country. This amendment is not at all revolutionary. I am not very proud of it because it does not go very far, but it seems to go as far as we can in a legislative way. It merely prevents the government from revoking and tossing out of the window the whole price control machinery without getting the consent of parliament.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is the hon. member anxious for this amendment to go through?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, and I am glad to know you support it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then stop talking.

Mr. KNOWLES: If my hon. friend will vote for it I will sit down and not say another word this afternoon.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The Minister of Justice did not press the constitutional question, but I gathered that he had in mind the problem of public opinion. I realize that we could not maintain the wartime prices and trade board indefinitely in Canada if public opinion were against it. If we had had a corrupt administration of the wartime prices and trade board during the war it would not be feasible to advocating such controls now, but the minister deserves a good deal of credit for maintaining the high standards that did exist throughout this country during the war in preventing black markets and runaway prices. At the moment the minister is, I think, misjudging public opinion. He mentioned, when speaking earlier in the debate, that if we had not had the wartime prices and trade board during the war we would not have had an equitable system of distribution. One of the Tory members questioned that. Since he comes from the city of Toronto he may be able to look after his constituents in that area; but, coming from a rural constituency as I do, I realize the problems we would have been up against with no control over distribution. My people are up against a problem of distribution now. At Easter I was in a home where there are twin girls for whom the doctor had prescribed corn syrup as part of a formula. But now that controls have been lifted from corn syrup, the people there are not able to get corn syrup.

An hon. MEMBER: There are carloads of it available.

Mr. NICHOLSON: They did not have any corn syrup when I was there. I am talking of a rural riding, not of metropolitan Toronto where you may have friends in the business of manufacturing corn syrup. During the war there were storekeepers in frontier towns who were not able to get overalls and, if it had not been for the operation of the wartime prices and trade board or some similar organization, it would not have been possible to maintain the supply of these necessities. I am satisfied that the minister will have no fundamental problem in finding the necessary public support to continue the wartime prices and trade board for the duration of this act, provided that in an emergency parliament can be assembled and taken into his confidence and provision be made to rescind this portion of the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I am willing to give consideration to the amendment and not press for a vote rejecting it this afternoon. I do not think we will accept it but I want to see just how serious its effects would be; so I will ask that the amendment stands. I want to thank hon. gentlemen for their tributes to the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. NICHOLSON: And to yourself.

Mr. ILSLEY: Thank you.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) stands.

Mr. HAZEN: Section 2 provides for orderly decontrol. It says:

> . . . the orders and regulations of the governor in council specified in the schedule to this act shall . . . continue and be in force.

But when we turn to section 4 we find:

> The governor in council may revoke in whole or in part any order or regulation continued in force by or made under this act.

Is it proposed to make any orders in council under this act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under section 3, yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Which are the words in section 3 that give power to make orders in council?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are these:

> The governor in council may appoint such persons in connection with the administration of any order or regulation . . .

Mr. HAZEN: That is done by order in council?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section stands.

On section 5—Publication of orders.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under the terms of this section will all orders and regulations made, for instance, by the wartime prices and trade board under the terms of the basic order in council be published in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the orders of the governor in council. The hon. member wants to know whether the orders of the board must be published?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; they do not have to be published in the Canada Gazette.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

Section 7 stands.

Section 8 agreed to.

On the schedule:

Mr. FULTON: Will the minister elaborate on how he intends to deal with the schedule? Does he intend to have each item called or may we call them as we wish?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the only thing to do is to call each item in order. If a minister cannot be present for his orders I may ask that we postpone consideration of those orders to meet his convenience and that of the committee. Otherwise we should take them in their order. Therefore I would suggest that we take P.C. 5424 as the first one.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We shall deal with P.C. 5424. Shall P.C. 5424 carry?

P.C. 5424 agreed to.

On P.C. 6759.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask a question on this schedule. I have not taken much time so far but I am going to take a little time now. I am all for controlling prices. I do not think the C.C.F., with all the imaginary powers they have, believe that the farmers are getting enough now. There has been a report in the press that the price of butter is to go up. I am all for controlling the price of butter, but at the same time I am not in favour of the subsidy being taken off on May 1. I want some assurance from the minister that that is not to be the fact, provided that the controls are kept on butter. Neither this parliament nor anybody else was consulted when the Massey-Harris people increased their prices twelve per cent. Therefore parliament is entitled to know whether the price of butter is to be held at the ridiculous figure of forty-three or forty-five cents and whether the subsidy is to be continued. So far as I am concerned, this bill will not go through in two months until we know that.

Mr. GARDINER: The first two orders in council which are dealt with in the bill do touch agriculture, and were based on the recommendation of myself as Minister of Agriculture. They have to do with the subsidies which are paid on agricultural products. Some of these subsidies which are paid on products such as butter and others which are sold from time to time to ships that come into our ports, and which go out as ships stores, are collected by the person who supplies the commodities to those who are to utilize them. That is done for the purpose of making certain that the subsidies which are paid on those products are not provided by the treasury. In some cases it corresponds with the subsidies paid by the British, for example, on cheese. The British now pay the subsidy on cheese but we pay the subsidy on the milk which entered into the cheese. The British agreed to pay the subsidy on cheese which goes to Britain, but the Canadian government pays the subsidy on the cheese which is consumed in Canada. It was thought advisable to collect a subsidy on any commodities which were sold to ships which were supplied in Canadian ports from those who provided the commodity to the ships. These orders in council are to deal only with comparatively small quantities of the total product which is sold.

With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, I would say that I hope he will not insist on carrying into effect the last remark which he made. I am sure he will not when I explain. As I said yesterday, the announcement with regard to what is to be done about butter, cheese and other dairy products will be made before May 1. I am sorry I cannot be any more specific than that. It may be made within the next week or some time shortly, certainly before May 1. My understanding is that it will be made to apply as of May 1. The advisory committee which is composed of representatives from each of the departments of agriculture of the nine provinces and seven representatives from the federation of agriculture is meeting in Ottawa at the present time. They met yesterday, the day before, and they are meeting today. They are making recommendations as to what they think these price levels ought to be. I am sorry that I am not able to go farther than I did yesterday. I know I have the support of all members of the government in what I am about to say now. Whatever that price level is, it will be a price level which covers the present price plus any subsidy. It is not definitely decided that there will be no subsidy whatsoever; but there is a possibility that it will be a price alone and not a subsidy plus a price. But if it is a price alone it will be sufficient to cover the subsidy and the present floor price. I am speaking of the different dairy products. I hope that the hon. member will not insist upon having anything more definite than that while this legislation is before the house. The recommendations have not yet been finally made by the advisory committee which represents agriculture right across Canada.

We shall give consideration to these recommendations and make our decision within the next few days and announce it in the house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I am correct in my interpretation, the minister said that the price to be set ultimately will be equal to the present rate plus the subsidy. Is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it will be the same or—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It will not be less?

Mr. GARDINER: It will not be less.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: So far as I am concerned, the minister is running agriculture and I am asking for an assurance, no matter who these boards are, that it will not be less. I do not want it to work the same way as it worked with poultry. About three weeks ago the poultrymen of British Columbia took a trimming. When the new rates were set, the Massey-Harris people immediately put up the price of wheat and mash. I do not know any better way of describing them than by calling them "Massey-Harris" people. The price went up immediately and the poultrymen took a trimming. We are not maintaining the price to the consumer when we take the ceiling off. So far as the poultrymen are concerned, the Department of Agriculture should have known that and should have protected the poultrymen from these dealers who increased their prices to the extent that every poultryman in British Columbia producing eggs had to produce them at a cost of from two to four and a half cents more than—

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask a question? Is the hon. member speaking of wheat or of all coarse grains?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Coarse grains, laying mash and growing mash. If my memory is correct the price of oats went up $2 a ton; the price of wheat, $1 a ton, and the price of laying and growing mash, $2 a ton immediately when the announcement was made in the house and no increase was given to the producers' contracts with England. The only increase which was permitted was that the ceiling was lifted on eggs. In 1945 eggs reached the ceiling price in only two weeks; in 1946 eggs reached the ceiling price in only four weeks, which was something like forty cents a dozen. There was absolutely no material benefit to the farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position either to verify or to deny the statement which has just been made, but I am in a position to say that no dealer in feed anywhere in Canada had any justification, from anything that was done here, to increase the price of grain other than the increase which was made possible because of what was done on wheat at the time when we did make a change in relation to the cost of wheat that was entering into consumption in this country. The position is that oats and barley, which are the two grains that were dealt with, are sold until August 1 at the old ceiling price. There is no increase whatsoever in the price to the feeder of barley and oats until August 1. If someone, on the basis of a report which has gone out, has taken it for granted that there was an increase all around and therefore did increase his price we shall have to look into it and see that it is corrected. The present position is that there is a drawback of twenty-five cents on barley and of ten cents on oats, which makes it unnecessary for anyone to raise the price of the feed to the feeders until August 1. From August 1 on, there is an increase in the price of grain.

Mr. WRIGHT: According to the information given me by the department, that is hardly correct. They informed me that the price of coarse grains had gone up approximately 3½ cents a bushel to the miller or producer of feeds for poultry and the dairy industry in Canada, and that the increase of that amount in the manufacturer's price to the consumer was justified. That would not amount to very much. I do not know personally how much they did increase their price to the consumer; but, according to the hon. member for Fraser Valley, it was apparently more than that. That was the information which the minister's department gave me with regard to the increased cost of feed to the manufacturers.

Mr. GARDINER: There is an increase of thirty cents on wheat that enters into feed. On the other grains there is not supposed to be an increase.

Mrs. STRUM: I spent my Easter holiday rambling around Ontario and I should like to talk about the Ontario farmers for a moment. I find that what the hon. member for Fraser Valley said is true not only of British Columbia but of Ontario. I found the farmers in Ontario cancelling orders for baby chicks, and they told me that the hatcheries were gassing baby chicks because of cancelled orders as a result of increases in feed prices. I have no way of knowing whether the dealers know about the minister's ruling, but private enterprise is going ahead and raising the cost of feed all over Ontario. That is what the men on the farms tell me. Anyway, this is a serious matter because it will be reflected in the egg contracts with Great Britain. If we put the egg producer out of business, and if the cost of feed is sneaked up by the dealer and we pay no attention to it, we know what the result will be. If the hon. member for Vancouver North has anything to say about double-talk, I can assure him that others than the C.C.F. indulge in double-talk. Here we have a dual system of control, namely, price control on long-term contracts, price control of wheat, beef, pork, cheese and eggs, and at the same time decontrol of all costs that go into production. This double-talk will be reflected in the farmers not being able to deliver eggs, cheese and meat, and it will result in a very bad condition and all kinds of dislocation.

You cannot control the price which the farmer receives and then decontrol all costs, and yet that is the sort of double dealing the government is carrying on at the moment. Whether it intends to or not, that is the effect.

Not only should we review the whole question of subsidies, but we should go over all the subsidies and pay particular attention to those that have to do with production and the health of the nation. I do not care whether it comes under agriculture or public health, the subsidies that have to deal with the whole field of milk need overhauling. We should begin to reimpose these subsidies. Whether it is done in the name of public health or under agriculture I do not care, but the health of the Canadian people demands that we keep milk plentiful and reasonably cheap.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to support the contention of the hon. member for Fraser Valley. We do not raise as many chicks in the district I come from but they lay more eggs per bird. I am getting letters from dozens of poultrymen and they tell me that the prices of the things that go into production have been raised, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley says. Only a few days ago I received a letter from one man informing me that an order for 2,000 baby chicks had been cancelled because he cannot produce eggs at the present price. It is something the minister should investigate immediately. May I ask whether the advisory committee and the officials of the department have given consideration to the price of eggs?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I spent an hour with them this morning, and we talked about egg prices.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. GARDINER: I want to say a word or two now with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. There is no double dealing or misunderstanding on the question of feed costs for chickens. One of the ingredients of feed for chickens is wheat, and a month or so ago we had a discussion in which everyone acknowledged that the price of feed for chickens had gone up because thirty cents a bushel had been added to wheat costs as a result of the action we took in order to change a condition, which everyone had previously criticized, of allowing wheat to be supplied at cost to the consumers over Canada at 77⅞ cents for certain purposes. It was acknowledged by everyone that, as a consequence of that change, the cost of feed into which wheat entered for chickens and live stock of all kinds would go up by thirty cents.

There has been no double-talk about that at all. Everyone understood that, and two or three members in this house raised considerable criticism of it. We had discussions of the question and finally agreed that certain things should be done. One thing that was done was the very thing it is now suggested ought to be done, if we are to do it for others. We took the ceiling price off eggs. There is no control now on the height to which eggs can rise in Canada. They can go to any price. It is true they have not gone up much, probably not at all, but this is the season of the year in which they do not go up. They may go up later in the season; I am not in a position to say whether they will. At any rate, there is no ceiling on them. There is a ceiling on the grain that is fed. How long we are going to maintain that may be another question, but at the moment there is a ceiling. There has been no misunderstanding about that and some people have said that they will quit raising chickens because of that increase.

On the other question, I do not think this is the time at which we can discuss it and get anywhere by discussion. When the proposals are being made to change the position in relation to the whole situation we can discuss it, but this has to do with only one question: Are we to collect subsidies from the agencies that supply the farm commodity to those who are supplied, or ships and others, or are we to take it out of the treasury and pay it? Our practice has been to collect it.

Mr. FULTON: Are any conversations going on now to increase the price under the contract, which would apparently have the greatest effect of all in assisting the poultry grower and egg producer? It seems that the domestic market is either flooded or else cannot stand a rise, and the greatest help that could be given the producer would be to increase prices under the contract. That is what those who have corresponded with me have intimated, and I am wondering whether such discussions have proceeded and whether any indication can be given as to whether a result can be expected soon, and what that result will be.

Mr. GARDINER: Discussions are proceeding continuously, but with a little more pressure being put on to get decisions at the present time than at other times, because we are considering the raising of, and have already raised, the price of grain being fed. Discussions are going on daily, and we hope that by the time we reach the point where we can make an announcement we shall be able to say something about that. At the moment we are not in a position to make that statement. I do not know whether the letters that have been mentioned are the same as those that I have received. I have at present at least a dozen on my desk, which were written either in the same place or by the same person. They are not written in the same hand, but there must have been instructions because they are all along the same line, though they come from different places. However they were based on understandings that are not correct. These misunderstandings have been cleared away since and I do not think the same kind of letter will come from now on. Most of those I have received are dated around the end of March or the beginning of this month. They have not been coming within the last day or two.

Mr. REID: Whatever policy the government adopts, it should be announced as soon as possible.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. The situation as outlined in Ontario is exactly similar to that in British Columbia. The poultrymen in British Columbia are doing away with their flocks. They tell me that they do not know what is going to happen. Many of them are cutting down their flocks. That might not mean much to some people, but to those who have built up flocks and put their money into the business, it is serious indeed. When wheat went up to $10 a ton it meant a drop of three cents a dozen in eggs to the poultryman, and he has no redress. As pointed out by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, the ceiling was not worth anything at all to the poultryman. Eggs did not go up. I would ask the minister to give every consideration to having the policy announced quickly in order that the industry may not any longer be left in doubt as to what the government's intentions are, and subsidies maintained.

Mrs. STRUM: What proportion of the whole egg output is exported and how much is consumed in Canada? What percentage does our export contract represent?

Mr. REID: About fifteen per cent.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Might I answer that? Apparently the Minister of Agriculture has not the figures here. Fraser Valley produced over 600,000 cases of eggs.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not all Canada.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Eighty-five per cent of the total production in British Columbia comes from Fraser Valley, including New Westminster riding. We shipped 173,887 cases to Britain in 1946, out of a total of 1,896,834 cases, or nine per cent. I have the exact figures.

Mr. ROWE: Will the minister tell the committee how much we fell down last year on our egg contract with Britain?

Mr. GARDINER: I think we had better leave this all over, if we are to have it after six o'clock, until I bring down my speech too. I should like to suggest to those who are going to make speeches that they get in contact with the officials of the poultry association and find out just what they really think about this question of eggs, because they have much greater fears than I have about increasing the production of eggs in Canada. Hon. members had better consult with them before making speeches, because I shall have to make one here indicating what they tell me.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I can speak for Fraser Valley, which elected me twice running by a big majority.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not particularly familiar with eggs, but the hon. member for New Westminster mentioned that the increase of thirty cents a bushel in the price of wheat caused a corresponding drop of three cents a dozen, I think he said, in eggs. I presume that is a correct statement.

Mr. GARDINER: An increase in the cost of production.

Mr. BENTLEY: There would be a corresponding drop in the revenue. That is a correct statement?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes, approximately.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, there is just one remark I should like to make before the discussion proceeds, and it is to make reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley with regard to the price of feed.

The announcement made with regard to oats and barley, which I have checked since the discussion which took place before recess, did make this change in the price levels, that the new price levels are not the ceiling prices but the floor prices. There is a floor price guaranteed on barley of ninety cents and a floor price guaranteed on oats of 61½ cents, basis No. 1 feed. The old guarantee was on the basis of No. 3 CW barley and No. 2 CW oats.

The result of that is that the new ceiling, which can be three cents higher than the floor on barley, and 3½ cents on oats, is brought about by the fact that the basis now is No. 1 feed barley and the variation between No. 1 feed and No. 3 CW is about three cents, and on oats about 3½ cents. So that there could be an increase, and there actually is an increase as a result of what is happening on the market. All the feed barley is selling at the ceiling. All grades of barley are selling at ninety-three cents, and they are entering into the production of the new feed mix, which would mean that if there were nothing else but the barley entering into the increase in price there might be an increase of about $1.20. There may be some other costs along the way which would be increased by the same percentage.

On oats there was an increase from a ceiling of 61½ cents to a ceiling of possibly sixty-five cents. That allows for some increase on any oats that are in. The increase I referred to with regard to wheat applies. So that there could be an increase of somewhere between $1.20 and probably the $2 that was mentioned. We would have to know what the entire mix is before being able to estimate what that increase might be. That is due to the fact that the basis is now No. 1 feed instead of No. 2 CW, which allows a margin of three cents, or a margin of between ninety and ninety-three cents, within which the trade can carry on, and buy and sell barley. So that there is a possibility of an increase there.

I wanted to give that explanation before the discussion continued.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: First of all, I wish to make very clear where I got my information from. It came from last year's president of the Pacific Coast Poultry Producers' Association. And just so that there may be no misunderstanding, I want to state the names of the officers this year. As I said before, eighty-five per cent of the eggs produced in British Columbia are produced in the ridings of New Westminster and Fraser Valley.

This year's president is J. O. Bowles. The past president was Gordon Billingsley. The vice-president is Francis Parker, and the secretary is Mr. Headey. I want to have those names on record, just to show that the figures came from responsible people, people who represent eighty-five per cent of the poultry producers of British Columbia. That is an important point.

Another point I wish to make clear to my hon. friends from Saskatchewan particularly is that the people of Fraser Valley are in no way objecting to an increase in the price of grain. That is perfectly clear. But what we do object to is an increase in the cost of feed to our farmers. However we do not object to the people in Saskatchewan getting more.

Second, and most important, the people of Fraser Valley are not opposed to controls. I made myself clear on that the other day. The only action of the government so far to which we object is that they have taken controls off too rapidly, and have taken them off some things from which they should not have taken them. I believe that before we are through, if we are to prevent inflation we shall put back many of the controls we have taken off. I believe the people I represent are in favour of that. I have had absolutely no objection from anyone in my riding to the fact that we have had controls; but I have had a lot of objections from a few prominent individuals—and they do not bother me much, because they know they are well represented—to any controls being taken off. I want that point made clear.

When I came first to the House of Commons I told the people of my riding that I was not going to be a back-bencher. And in this connection I pay my respects to the new member. When I first arrived in the House of Commons, I returned after the session to my people and said I was not a back-bencher. I had the seat that the hon. member now occupies, and I told them I might as well have been in a chicken-house in Chilliwack, because I could neither hear nor see from my seat. I hope the hon. member will be moved up to a better seat before long. It is no good down there, I can assure him.

I shall quote some figures, to show the minister's department that if they would come to the proper source for information they would get correct figures, and have them available. In 1946, in the province of British Columbia, from 1,800 members we produced about 375,000 cases from about 750,000 hens. This year we expect an increase of about twenty per cent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want those figures to be correct in Hansard. I do not want to be misquoted. My source of information is the past president of the poultry producers' association. Last year we sent 173,887 cases for export, or about nine per cent of the total export, to Great Britain. The prices we received for them were: from February to August, 34½ cents a dozen and from September to January, 41½ cents a dozen. The average price to the end of October—and this is of vital importance to the producer—was thirty-one cents a dozen. I know that some farmers, whose farming activities are either financial, or are to the extent of a big garden, do not know that all graded eggs are not grade A. Unfortunately some of our officials in Ottawa have the idea that all our eggs are grade A. Only a small percentage will grade to grade A, with the result that the over-all price is not the top figure. Last year at the end of October we averaged 31½ cents a dozen. I am going to quote actual figures in Chilliwack, and any departmental official can check them up. The price increase, at March 24, is 25 per cent on mash, barley and oats. I want you to mark this: We deal in tons out there, not in bushels. The increases were: $11 for wheat, $2 for oats, $1 for barley, $2 for breeding mash, and $1 for laying mash. These figures were obtained from an actual farmer who is past president of the poultry producers' association, as at March 14. He had 1,000 layers with 2,000 chicks as replacement. Assuming that he worked on the average scale that they do out there and sold 800 fryers at nine weeks, the average production would be twelve dozen per hen; we may not have the per hen production that they have in Ontario, but we have them in thousands not just three or four around the barnyard.

I want you to note the increases in the cost of food on that farm: for thirty tons of mash, $30; for 22½ tons of wheat, $247.50; for 6½ tons of oats, $13, or a total of $290.50. These increases amount to two and a half cents a dozen, or twenty-nine cents per bird put in the laying pen. No official can talk that off. Let me repeat that Fraser Valley does not want the controls taken off; we want controls made effective throughout and, if necessary, some of them put on.

We are also faced with further increases which I understand I cannot refer to at the present time. However anyone with any imagination will know what I am referring to, the little group sitting on the plush carpets down in the C.P.R. station at present. If that increase is granted it will amount to thirty-four cents per case, or two cents per dozen, as an additional cost to the farmers of Fraser Valley. I know that that corporation which runs one way and back the other way across Canada—

An hon. MEMBER: Is that the C.P.R.?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not allowed to refer to them, but I imagine they will get their increase. We were told about the ceiling having been taken off eggs, but in 1944 eggs only reached the ceiling in British Columbia for two weeks. In 1945 they were high for a few weeks, but the highest price paid was forty-one cents. In 1946 the ceiling was 44½ cents, but the highest reached was forty-one cents. I think any farmer here will admit there has been no particular value in taking off the ceiling.

This is only the chance I shall have, so that I am going to cover a few other things I represent a dairying district as well as a poultry producing district. This is the only opportunity that the dairy producers will have to put their case before the house. Again I want to give the authority for the figures I am using. They came from Dean Clement, who is known, I think, even to the federal Department of Agriculture. He is one of the best known dairymen from a technical point of view in the entire Dominion of Canada; he is the dean of agriculture in the university of British Columbia. He made a survey at the request of the provincial government. I am not claiming any particular value for that government at the present time and we may change that set-up shortly.

He found that it cost 58·7 cents last year to produce a pound of butter fat, with nothing allowed for labour. The reason I want these figures on the record is that if the subsidies are taken off and ceiling prices are set, or floor prices as referred to tonight, they may be of value. According to Dean Clement, to receive $100 a month, with $60 cash going to the farmer, it would require 72·22 cents a pound for butter fat. If you are including wages, then the $60 cash that the farmer takes out of it for himself would require 94·61 cents a pound for butter fat. I should like to know how these officials here arrived at the ceiling price they put on butter when we have these cost figures to surmount in British Columbia. I know nothing about costs in Ontario and I am not particularly interested, but surely there are enough farmer members who are sufficiently interested to speak for Ontario.

These farms are based on an average value of $21,269; the average value per acre being $179 and ranging from $215 to $143. The average cost of producing a pound of butter fat on these farms was 58·79 cents, with nothing for the farmer. The minister gave me assurance a little while ago that the new price was going to look after the farmer. That was my understanding of what he said. He said it would be not less than it was before, but that is still one-third short of being high enough for the farmers of Fraser Valley.

I am going to pass on because I want to cover berries. Everything goes into the production cost in Fraser Valley. I have just come back from that district. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is not in his seat at the moment but I hope his parliamentary assistant can tell us something about these tons and tons and carloads of nails that are going to British Columbia. I made it a point to go to every store in my riding. One store had a full keg of something that would be very handy for putting on shiplap to repair an old building, a keg of three and a half inch spikes. Another store had some boot nails—I have one here—at sixty cents a pound, which could be used to repair a building. Another rather big store had some copper nails two and a half inches in size at sixty cents a pound. I have never seen copper nails before. If you weigh them you find that it comes to exactly one-half cent per nail. That may be all right for the farmers in Ontario where you have all the millionaires and where they do not care about the cost of producing farm products. The Ontario federation of agriculture did not make any complaint anyway. Maybe they can afford to pay sixty cents a pound for nails to repair a coop, but we cannot afford to pay it in Fraser Valley or in any other part of British Columbia.

Mr. FRASER: We cannot even get copper nails in Ontario.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I forgot that the hon. member's speciality in Peterborough was nails or I would have left this matter to him.

Mr. FRASER: I am glad the hon. member has backed me up in my statement.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will back you up? The hon. member for Qu'Appelle paid me a little compliment this afternoon. I will put it another way. I will be glad to have the hon. member cooperate with me in any way possible. I do not know what you need nails for in Peterborough anyway with all the manufacturers you have there.

I want to deal now with berries. I come from a wonderful riding. I am very proud of the riding I represent. We produce about half the berries that are used in the entire Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FRASER: It is the berries.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I just want to give certain figures of the berries we produced last year. I am naturally modest about Fraser Valley and I hesitate to mention it at any time, but last year we produced 4,863,683 pounds of strawberries and 11,475,428 pounds of raspberries.

Mr. FULTON: That is your major product —raspberries!

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I knew if I waited long enough Kamloops would ask for it and he will get it in a minute. In the meantime I have other more important matters to speak of. I wish to point out to the prairie farmers that we were able to ship only 90,000 crates of strawberries last year to the prairie provinces, our great market. We want to ship there at a fair price, but unfortunately last year we could ship only 90,000 crates. I will come to Kamloops in a minute. I am no socialist by any manner or means; I am a capitalist. Two other fellows and I own a farm; they own the most part and I own the rest. I do not believe in socialism; I believe in free enterprise. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he said that this government and no other government dare take off these controls, but they are taking them off bit by bit and we see the profits that are being made as quoted by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar yesterday and as quoted in the Star today. The United States is admitting that they cannot control prices at the present time.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is under the free enterprise you believe in.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We can improve free enterprise but never socialism. I have been trying to improve the hon. member for Kamloops but have not succeeded yet; you cannot improve the impossible. I will tell you why we shipped only 90,000 crates to the prairies last year. I was successful in moving the adjournment of the house to discuss the shortage of containers. One of these downtrodden lumber operators in British Columbia could not pay fifteen cents an hour wage increase, but they can make a profit in their business in spite of strikes. One gentleman who did not know one end of a board from another came from Toronto and took over a sawmill with watered stock that showed a profit of over $400,000 in a few months. In my opinion, that same group of operators from Toronto, headed by this notorious brewer who has now moved into British Columbia's lumber business, are doing everything they can to prevent us from getting crates this year by fomenting trouble with the honest loggers in British Columbia. If something is not done about the matter, I shall be moving more adjournments of the house and I hope to have the support of my hon. friends opposite.

The Minister of Agriculture has given me one assurance. I do not want to put words into his mouth, but I understood him to say that when the subsidy is taken off butter the price will not be less than it is now. I should like him to repeat that. That is correct?

I want these controls to be more effective. I want some controls to be restored. I do not think you can ask the dairy producers to go on producing forever at present prices when you permit other industries to make the profits which have been quoted in this house and never denied, and when you permit the lumbermen of my own province of British Columbia to amass fortunes they have never had before. It will be pretty poor pickings for Cruickshank with the lumbermen at the next election, but that is all right with me. When they can make these profits our dairymen are not going to be satisfied with the present price of butter in British Columbia.

I turn to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, then next to the Minister of Labour, and I shall finish off with the hon. member for Kamloops. I did not take part in the debate on the address, but I believe that every member for British Columbia is dissatisfied with the deal made so far as veterans homes are concerned. I find that the minister's own officials have given him two different lists of figures. One sets out that it costs $169.50 to heat a house till the plaster is dry in a home in the sunny Fraser valley, and then a week later the minister brings down a return saying that it costs $28.05. It is time that we put to work in the Department of Veterans Affairs some unemployed who can add and substract. The veterans of Fraser Valley are not asking for homes for nothing, but they are asking for a fair deal, and when any official at Ottawa tells me that it costs $184.95 to drain a veteran's home in the Chilliwack district I say that he does not know what he is talking about—$184.95 to drain an acre and a half of land in the Chilliwack district. This is in order, Mr. Chairman, because it all comes under these fifty-seven varieties.

I am not satisfied with the deal the Minister of Labour has given in the Tashme camp for Japs. If the truth were known it would make us blush.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us have the blushing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You give me the facts and figures and you will do the blushing, or bring the figures before the public accounts committee and you will find who will do the blushing. I am a little bitter about Tashme when a farm, which never made a profit of $500 a year, in twenty years gets $500 a month rental over a period of years and can get waterworks and all the buildings when hospitals and schools cannot get these things and, in addition, get a cash settlement. I would ask the government to have inquiries made about Tashme camp.

So far as my riding is concerned, we will support this government's efforts to maintain controls 100 per cent and, if necessary, restore some of the controls that have been taken off, which we believe should not have been taken off. We believe that it is in the best interests of our district and of Canada as a whole that controls be maintained. I believe that everyone in British Columbia has that opinion. I have never heard one request that controls be removed other than from Toronto and Kamloops. Kamloops is not a bad town to get out of.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I shall support the C.C.F. amendment. I believe it is the fairest one to date in connection with controls, unless the government brings down something better.

Mr. MITCHELL: In reply to my hon. friend's remarks about Tashme camp, let me say that it is all very well for one who has no responsibility as an administrator to bandy these things about, but if my hon. friend has anything he has a duty to perform. Let him bring the facts before the public accounts committee and he will not need to worry about the labour department coming out in the clear. It is the easiest thing in the world to make statements of the kind he has made. If he thinks there is anything wrong let him bring the matter before the public accounts committee and let us get the truth.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nobody should know better than the present minister how easy it is to get up and bandy something around without any responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the discussion continues, may I remind the committee that we are dealing with order in council 6759. This afternoon there was considerable discussion on eggs, the cost of producing eggs and the return the farmer received for producing them, but upon reading order in council 6759 I find no mention of eggs. If hon. members will look at the second and third preambles they will see that they read as follows:

And whereas the subsidy in respect of creamery butter, cheddar cheese, concentrated whole milk products, white beans and yellow eye beans is now being paid through the Department of Agriculture;

And whereas it is deemed necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada to provide for the repayment of subsidy involved in such goods . . .

That is to say, the goods mentioned in the second preamble. It will be noticed that section 2 of the regulations reads as follows:

(b) "subsidized goods" means creamery butter, cheddar cheese, concentrated whole milk products, white beans or yellow eye beans, or such other goods as may be designated by order of the Deputy Minister ot Agriculture by notice in Canadian war orders and regulations.

I mention these things to remind hon. members that this order in council does not refer to eggs in any way; it refers only to the subsidy on dairy products and certain beans, which subsidy must be repaid to the government when these goods are exported. I do not wish to curtail discussion, but I believe that the committee would like to deal with the contents of the order in council and not have too wide discussion.

Mr. HERRIDGE: In connection with eggs, I should like to quote two or three sentences from a letter which I have received. I think I am in order because some of these people also produce milk and butter, and depend very much on the price of eggs—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think it would be fair to interrupt the hon. member for Kootenay West at this time; but would it be agreeable to the committee that, afer he makes his statement in regard to eggs, we discuss the contents of the present order in council?

Mr. HERRIDGE: For the information of the committee, I shall quote from a letter written by Mr. Godfredsen, president of the Kootenay Cooperative Poultry Association, and dated March 18, 1947. He is one of the largest poultrymen in the district and is a responsible and practical man. He writes as follows:

Dear Mr. Herridge

I am very much surprised of the announcement over the radio that the ceiling price was taken of eggs, if that is to compensate the poultry farmer for the increase in feed price, it is absolutely inadequate as we can only get ceiling price three month of year.

Toward the end of his letter he says:

Coming back to feed prices wheat is eleven dollars more a ton and laying mash is five dollars more a ton and it was announced over the radio that barley and oats would go up too if that is the case laying mash will be still higher.

In addition to that, I have a letter from Mr. Charles E. Tutt, secretary of the same association, who is a poultryman and a responsible person. In this letter he says:

We heartily endorse a greater return to the Canadian wheat producers, but we strongly resent the fact that a rise in the price of feed wheat directly discriminates against the poultrymen.

In his letter he mentions the fact that at the present time there is a surplus of eggs which cannot be sold on the local market. These are No. 1 eggs and they were sold to the Swift Canadian Company at Nelson for twenty-three cents a dozen. He also mentions that the cost of feed and so forth nullifies the floor price which has been placed under eggs in the British contract. I urge the minister to have this situation investigated.

Mr. WRIGHT: What subsidies are now being paid on goods classified as subsidized goods, namely, creamery butter, cheddar cheese, concentrated whole milk products, white and yellow beans? How many of these subsidies have the government already announced will be withdrawn, and on what dates will they be withdrawn?

Mr. GARDINER: As I said before recess, the government has under consideration the whole matter of returns on dairy products which is largely the items covered in the order in council that we are now discussing. There are smaller items such as beans which enter into it, but most of it is dairy products. The position with regard to these is pretty generally understood in the committee. We did pay and are still paying a ten-cent subsidy on butter fat; we are also paying a subsidy of thirty cents on milk which enters into cheese, and we are paying a subsidy on milk which enters into the production of canned milk of different kinds.

The question which is now under consideration is as to whether these subsidies should be taken into the price. If they are they will probably be taken into the price very shortly, within a few days time. This particular order in council gives the government authority to deal only with subsidies on exports such as ships' supplies, until that time is reached. In other words, we are spending a lot of time in talking about something that may last for only ten days. After that, it will be necessary to have the order because of these other items, provided that subsidies on dairy products are done away with and the whole matter is put into the price. It will probably be only a short time until the announcement is made. I have said on two or three occasion that any changes which do take place will take place on May 1. The whole matter is under consideration. The matter that has been discussed during the greater part of the time that we have had these orders before the committee is the question of increased cost of feed. That question is being fully considered by the advisory committee which is now sitting, and it will be fully considered by the government when the recommendations are made by that committee to the government. In other words, the government will not reach a decision on what should be done with regard to butter, cheese, milk and even eggs, which do not come under this at all, without having before them all the implications of the increases in feed costs. They will also have under consideration all the implications of the increases which have already been made since there was any previous increase in the cost of grain, increases which have already been made in the returns for farm products, and within a few days time with regard to almost everything that is covered by this order in council an announcement will be made which will probably do away with the greater part of the necessity for it.

I would suggest that I think we can discuss most of the questions which are being asked better when my estimates are before the house, which may be coming up on Friday evening and the following Friday evening as usual. At least by the second Friday evening we shall probably have all the facts in front of us and we shall be able to discuss the matter to much better advantage then than we can now.

Mr. ROWE: From what the minister says one could almost draw the inference that subsidies are to disappear. Would the committee be right in understanding that?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I have come as close to saying that as I could. I rather think so.

Mr. ROWE: Probably a hint is as good as a nod to a blind farmer. Will the minister give consideration to lifting the ceiling price also on dairy products and on bacon products? I was interested in what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said this afternoon, indicating that there is something wrong. The planned economy which those to the left would like and the planned economy which we have had on the right has caused confusion such as agriculture has never known before in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On that side of the house.

Mr. ROWE: The minister is not a farmer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was on a farm.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, but the minister left it pretty early. Had he stayed there he would have realized the position the farmers are in today.

Mr. GARDINER: They are in the best position they ever were.

Mr. ROWE: Why is it you are falling down on the egg contract to Britain; why on the cheese contract; why on the butter contract? Why have you fallen down on the bacon contract, and why have you made the most nonsensical wheat contract the world has ever known? So that agriculture has not a great deal of confidence and does not know where we are going.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did you vote for it?

Mr. ROWE: No, I did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You were not in the house.

Mr. ROWE: Surely the time has come, in view of the political confusion that has been caused by this type of state panic, when the minister should give some consideration to removing the ceilings, and admit that, so far as agriculture is concerned, they have been a deterrent. I say to the ex-minister of finance as well that, so far as the wartime prices and trade board and fixed prices are concerned, the farmer has been the guinea pig in the whole picture. He has been the guinea pig of this new economic experiment. My hon. friends may laugh, but let them go up and down the side lines of the dominion and the people will tell them, and more vociferously than I am doing, and not in parliamentary language either.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have seen ten times as much of the dominion and of every province as my hon. friend has seen. I have been through every province. He lives in Toronto and Ontario only. Let him go and see the great west.

Mr. ROWE: I have been west too, but if my hon. friend has gone all over the map in the short time that he has done I can understand why he has seen so little of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You have a localized viewpoint; that is all.

Mr. ROWE: I remember when members of the present cabinet were on this side. They did not see as much of the back concessions as they thought they did.

Mr. GARDINER: What did the farmer get then?

Mr. ROWE: He got a fairer share of the world market than you have given him. He got a fairer share of it than you are giving him now. It is all very well to talk about 1930 and 1931, but I have sat here longer than the Minister of Agriculture and I say to him that no one can tell me that the farmer did not get a fairer share of world markets than he gets today.

An hon. MEMBER: At what prices?

Mr. ROWE: If the hon. gentleman expects to be big enough to run all the industries of Canada he should know more than he does.

Mr. KNOWLES: You should know more about it.

Mr. ROWE: I do, and I know this—

Mr. KNOWLES: Nothing whatever.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Bring on the cheering section when you can't take it.

Mr. ROWE: I am not disturbed by little Chicago over here, or over there either.

Mr. GRANT: When the hon. gentleman was in power they were not getting any prices at all.

Mr. ROWE: What did you sell your products at?

Mr. GRANT: Starvation prices; that is all.

Mr. ROWE: That is the most antiquated sort of defence that anyone can put up. I am not going to go back—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: There are those, especially to my right, who would like to suggest that the depression came about because the Conservative party came into power at a time when we faced the greatest crisis in the history of the world. If my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. party has made a study of the situation; if he is big enough to take over all the industries of Canada, he ought to know more about what caused the depression in 1929 than he appears to know.

I say to my hon. friends from western Canada, and to some on my own side too perhaps—

Mr. GRANT: Perhaps?

Mr. ROWE: —what caused the depression in 1929 was—

An hon. MEMBER: Bennett.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member says "Bennett."

An hon. MEMBER: R. B.

Mr. ROWE: Well, "R. B." was a great fellow, but the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett was not in power from 1921 to 1930.

Mr. GRANT: We had good times then.

Mr. ROWE: You had good times, but more Canadians left this country than were brought in or were born in Canada, and the natural increase was lost. We lost a million people during those years, people who found better employment and a better opportunity in foreign countries than they could find at home.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why did he leave Canada?

Mr. ROWE: I beg your pardon?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why did R. B. leave it?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): He was sick of you.

Mr. ROWE: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, but knowing what happened between 1921 and 1930, I presume the people who went away thought that some day again they would have to endure another Liberal government. In any event, Mr. Bennett has been accepted with good grace in another country and I do not think he is any discredit to Canada. He is a distinguished citizen where he is.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No one ever suggested otherwise.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROWE: My right hon. friend is a distinguished man, but I say to him I have no apologies to offer for Mr. Bennett.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Neither have I. I am a great friend of his.

Mr. ROWE: He never recognized it very much, but I suppose you are. I can only say that, so far as agriculture in Canada is concerned, never in the history of this dominion has it been in the confusion it is in at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend always says more sitting down than he can say standing up. He is always chiming in.

Mr. GRANT: The farmers were never so well off as they are today.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friends may twit and make these empty gibes—

Mr. GRANT: No gibe at all.

Mr. ROWE: —but history will prove what I say to those who, running, may read. Those who run may read, but my hon. friend perhaps would rather sit than either run or read. May I say this to the committee, Mr. Chairman, and you need not take my word for it. The Minister of Agriculture and the right hon. gentleman who is leading the house have no doubt read the records of the Geneva conference on world economic affairs, and they no doubt know—it is now common history which every student of economics understands—that in this dominion the greatest contributing factor to the depression of 1929 was a clumsy effort to plan agriculture. I remember stepping out into the corridor on one occasion when I stated that Canada should have a balanced economy in which we would pay more attention to mixed farming instead of putting all our eggs in one basket—one wheat basket. I remember that at that time my hon. friends from the province of Quebec who were on the opposite side of the house used to refer to the fact that we were listening to nothing but wheat; and finally, as I remember well, one gentleman said to me, "You don't understand. We have the wheat market of the world in the palm of our hands. We are the bread-basket of the world and we can dictate prices."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: I can quite understand why my hon. friend does not understand this. He does not listen long enough to learn anything.

An hon. MEMBER: What was the price of wheat then?

Mr. ROWE: If you do not know that much, why enter into this discussion at all? We know that during 1925 and 1926 Italy and Czechoslovakia, France and Germany, every country in the world, all raised their tariffs, yes, higher than the price of our wheat. Why? Because, as reported at the world conference, they were fearful of the wheat pools of western Canada fixing a price and demanding that price, and were afraid of the monopoly. We have seen the results. We sold wheat at thirty-five cents a bushel.

The world did not suffer a depression because Bennett was elected in Canada and wheat was forty cents. The world did not say, "Because of that, we will put 29,000,000 men out of jobs". Anyone who talks that sort of thing is just talking stupid political nonsense. That worked all right for an election or two, but it is not according to the facts and the records of history. Let us look the facts square in the face. The Minister of Agriculture knows now what the facts are. He says to my hon. friends to the left, "Leave your amendment; we are not sure whether we will adopt it or reject it. It may be all right. Let us look it over". The minister is the same as he has been for the last four years; he does not know whether he is going or coming.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are certainly going; that is one sure thing.

Mr. ROWE: The Minister of Agriculture cannot tell me tonight why we have seen the greatest reduction in dairy production that we have had in the last twenty-five years.

Mr. GARDINER: I can tell you what the reduction is, but you will not believe me.

Mr. ROWE: I can tell you what it is and why. I asked you this afternoon but you would not tell me. We have reduced our bacon production. You have not told the country that before your party came into power we sent more bacon to Britain than you sent this year. You have not told the people that. You have not told them that you made a contract with Britain for 350,000,000 pounds three years ago and fell down by 100,000,000 pounds, and revised the contract and made another for two hundred and fifty—and by the signs of the times and the brood sows that are going to market you have not filled that.

The handwriting is on the wall, Mr. Chairman. The farmers of Canada today have lost confidence in the present government. They do not know what to sow. They are waiting for the Natural Products Marketing Act. They have read the Wheat Board Act. They do not know whether the Minister of Agriculture will tell them what they have to sow, where they are going to sell, how much they are going to get for their product, but they do know that they pay about three times as much today for a binder as they paid in the last great war which my hon. friends hark back to with regard to high prices. They know they pay about twice as much for farm labour as they paid then and that they get about half as much for their wheat. As to price ceilings, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said this afternoon that she believes they will be good things for all. But even a kindergarten class knows they are no good on one side unless they are operative on the other side. Personally I do not think they are any good on either side. I hope I do not embarrass the cabinet ministers, because I understand there has been division on this in the last five years. I do not believe that a farmer like the Minister of Agriculture could sit in a cabinet like this without having embarrassed the ex-minister of finance; and I do not believe any old Scotch Presbyterian free economist like him could sit there and not feel that the whole show was being put out of commission. We have carried controls to the limit. We have carried controls to the point of detriment to our supply of products overseas. We have carried controls to the point that the peoples in Europe, hungry for food, are deprived of wheat which would have been produced in Canada. My right hon. friend tonight says. "What about the price of feeds to produce this bacon and meat products? Where does the feed come from?"

Mr. GARDINER: Off the farm.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, off the farm. I hope that some day in the cabinet you will tell the rest of your colleagues, the new found economists, why it is that for Britain, that we feel we want to help, the farmers of Canada are asked to send their wheat over at $200 million less than they can get at the world price for a year, and yet you make the British pay more for lumber than the people of Canada have to pay. Do you think it is fair for the farmers of Canada to lose $200 million on their product which they are exporting overseas and yet at the same time tell the lumbermen of British Columbia that they can charge the Britisher what they want to, even if he needs a house as badly as he needs bread. What type of economy is this?

We are not surprised at the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, in view of the fact that she is a member of the fairer sex. I think she is more sympathetic than any member of the cabinet when she says it is a planned economy, but it is only half-planned. It is a mixture, and so it is. It must be a mixture when the western farmer and wheat producer of Canada surrenders $200 million a year, but the lumberman of British Columbia can charge $123 a thousand for rough lumber for Britain.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How much do you get for pulp in Ontario?

Mr. BRADETTE: Tell us about the price of lumber.

Mr. ROWE: What is that?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How much do you get for pulp in Ontario?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Oh, you are usually fair.

Mr. ROWE: We get as much and more for pulp than you would take to produce it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You raised it $8 a ton.

Mr. ROWE: Yes; and freight rates rose $3 a ton, and we raised wages in Montreal last week $3 a ton. May I inform you--and I think you are a great defender of the British Columbia lumberman; I have no brief for them—that if you want to talk about the pulp and paper industry, we in the pulp and paper industry have no apologies to make, despite the snipes that have been coming from various sides of this house.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You have been doing very well.

Mr. ROWE: Yes; just as well as under your management.

Mr. COLDWELL: Apparently a whole lot better.

Mr. ROWE: If you could run them all together better than we can run them separately, you are a better wizard than you have ever indicated here in Ottawa. I will say this, in any event, for the benefit of my hon. friend from British Columbia because he is a free enterpriser—and I say it for the benefit of the leader of the C.C.F. party because he interrupted me: the great pulp and paper industry of Canada has been the greatest stabilizer, as the ex-minister of finance knows, of any industry in Canada. Half of that industry has been in bankruptcy for the last fifteen years. No industry in Canada pays its employees as high wages, and no industry in Canada has paid its shareholders less dividends. Those are facts which are irrefutable, and I challenge anyone to rise in the house tonight and say they are not right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Watered stock.

Mr. ROWE: Watered stock, you say. I could tell you about some of your companies but I might get too personal if I did. But those are the facts and they are undeniable; and today we are paying to labour the highest base rate paid by any industry in Canada. It is true that some will say, "You have had an increase in your commodity." So we have. Where is this venture capital to come from? Where is the capital to come from with which you are to take over all these industries? Will you get it for less than two per cent? The pulp and paper industry in Canada in the last fifteen years have not paid an average of two per cent on the venture capital which made it possible in Canada. I challenge my friends to say where they are going to get the money to take over all this industry at any less. Let us throw the cards down and see where we come in this new economy of yours. Do you think you can run them all better than anybody runs them separately?

Mr. COLDWELL: Address the chair.

Mr. ROWE: I apologize to you, Mr. Chairman. I would much rather address you than address my hon. friend. I think you are both very fine, but if I were going to trust my estate to either, I would entrust it to you, Mr. Chairman.

I urge upon the Minister of Agriculture, and urge it upon him before it is too late—

Mr. GRANT: What did you do under Bennett?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROWE: I do not know what my hon. friend said. However, if you think you are contributing something to the debate, then you serve a purpose.

Mr. GRANT: I am sure you are not, anyway.

Mr. ROWE: I cannot tell what my hon. friend's interruptions are. If he would make them audible and make them clear, I might be able to deal with them, but I do not know what he said. I know he is saying something and I think he understands it probably as well as the rest of the house does.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, following what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said, I am not supporting her theory that we should have a planned economy, but I support her to this extent: If you are going to have a half planned economy you must have it all. You on the left and you on the right had better get together. You have a half planned economy now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You have got none.

Mr. ROWE: You have a bureaucracy built up on a planned economy. You do not want to go out and say you will leave it to the law of supply and demand. But I ask you now, do you think there is any other way of establishing agricultural production in Canada unless you give an incentive to the farmers?

Mr. GARDINER: I am going to talk after you are through. Go right on.

Mr. ROWE: I know pretty well what the Minister of Agriculture will say, too. I realize that he will tell us about the low prices in 1932. I realize that he will tell about the Tory reactionaries. I know about the line he will take. If I gave it, he would be glib enough to find another one, probably, in another speech; so I am not going to relate it all. But I know very well that at least fifteen times I have heard the Minister of Agriculture tell about the low prices in 1932 and what the farmers went through. That is an old, tottering and dusty argument.

Mr. GARDINER: You don't like to hear about it, do you?

Mr. ROWE: I don't like to hear about it from a man who is a right honourable, who should know better, and does know better. I don't like him to use it for political purposes, when he knows it is not true. And after some years of activities we expect people to stick to the truth of things. You can't stand up tonight and tell us that the prices we received in 1932 were due to the fact that it happened we changed governments in Canada in 1930.

Mr. GARDINER: You have a bad conscience.

Mr. ROWE: No, but I have to recall the type of argument you have put up for the last ten years in this house.

Mr. GARDINER: You really think it is true.

Mr. ROWE: I know it is not true, just as you know it is not true. Will you tell me if that is not true—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Chair, chair.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, I am reminded that you are in the chair.

I say to the right hon. gentleman: When you rise tonight will you tell us why it was that when your party came into power in 1921—and, that is history—we had more live stock production, and sold more live stock products to Great Britain than we did grain? Will you tell us why it was that we were eating more bacon at that time than we are today. Will you tell us why it was that when you went out of power in 1930, before the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett and his party took office, we were importing New Zealand butter and Danish bacon? My hon. friend knows it. I have heard him use it in the house. We were eating Danish bacon in Canada; we were eating New Zealand butter in Canada in 1930 than we were exporting from Canada. We were importing more live stock production into Canada. But in 1921, about thirty years ago, we were selling, at those lower prices, $77 million worth of live stock products more than we are buying.

What happened in those years? The Danish farmers were taking grain from western Canada, feeding hogs and sending bacon back to sell in the butcher shops at Regina. Eighteen thousand head of cattle were imported in tin cans in 1930. We were eating canned beef in 1930, beef canned in the Argentine.

True, during the war, the bacon people had some exports; but it is rapidly falling off again. It has fallen from 350,000,000 pounds two or three years ago to 250,000,000 pounds now. And if you keep the price ceilings on those things we have to sell and take the price ceilings off those things we have to buy, then I shudder to think how much more we shall be falling down in our supplying of the British market. And if we cannot supply it in a time of stress and strain, then we have no right to claim it in a time of peace and prosperity.

I urge the minister and ask him to urge the government to let go of these bureaucratic controls. You cannot control them all unless you are going to do it with machine-guns. The farmers are paying today double the amount in wages they were paying back in 1921—and I know whereof I speak. We are selling our wheat and losing hundreds of millions of dollars a year on your fixed ceiling price. And your exports of other products are falling down. Even the British people are laughing at the mess you have made of Canadian agriculture.

I leave it to you: If you do not listen tonight to what I have said you will hear from the farmers in the next election.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, when we opened the discussion this evening on two orders in council which have been in effect for some four years, and which will probably be in effect for some few weeks more at the most, I did not expect that for the third or fourth time during this session we were to have a full-dress debate on agriculture. Nor did I expect that it would carry on into all the activities of the government, or of all governments we have had during the century. But we have just listened to a speech which covers all that.

My hon. friend has just been making statements which are not borne out by the facts. He has tried to leave the impression that in years gone by there was at some time higher production and that there have been higher exports of products than we have had recently As a matter of fact we still have high production and exports. But I just wish to leave a few figures with him and with the committee in order to indicate how far from the facts he really is.

In 1930, a year which was spoken of, the production of cheese in Canada was 119,000,000 pounds. The production of cheese in 1942 was 208,000,000 pounds; in 1943 it was 167,000,000 pounds; in 1944 it was 182,000,000 pounds, and in 1945 it was 189,000,000 pounds. In 1946 it is true that it was down, as compared with these last few years, to 148,000,000 pounds. But that is still much higher than 119,000,000 pounds.

But that is not the most important figure. When we talk about parties going out of power, another party has gone out of power since that. That was the party led by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, which went out of power in 1935. The production of cheese in that year was 101,000,000 pounds. And from the time they came into office in 1930, when it was quite low—119,000,000 pounds—it still went on down. It went down during all the time they were in office, until it reached 101,000,000 pounds.

An hon. MEMBER: He kept it up well in those hard times.

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact, hard times do not have so much effect upon production of food as is suggested by my hon. friend. But what happened immediately after—

Mr. ROWE: Will the hon. member permit a question? He did not interrupt me, but I know he does not wish to be unfair and to mislead the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I will not mislead the committee either.

Mr. ROWE: And you are certainly not going to mislead me because I know what took place very well.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROWE: The minister says he wishes to show the difference. I never mentioned one figure about production in 1930. Go back to 1921, and see if what I said was not true. You are dealing with a different set of figures entirely. At least let the committee know that my integrity in these matters is as good as yours.

Mr. GARDINER: We imported 1,788,000 pounds, produced 119,000,000 pounds and exported 80,000,000 pounds in that year. That was in 1930.

Mr. ROWE: Certainly.

Mr. GARDINER: And the domestic disappearance, if you wish to have all the figures, amounted to 37,000,000 pounds.

Now, coming back to 1934, which was the lowest year—and 1935 was about the same. There was 100,000,000 pounds in 1934 and 101,000,000 pounds in 1935. The government changed in that year, in the fall of 1935. In

Now, one might go on and deal with other products which have been spoken about. Let us take concentrated milk products. In 1930 it was 110,000,000 pounds. In 1935, the year the government of Mr. Bennett went out, it was 105,000,000 pounds. It was down. It had been down much lower in the intervening period, but it was down 5,000,000 pounds that year. It went up next year to 109,000,000 pounds; the next year to 137,000,000 pounds; next year to 157,000,000 pounds; the next year to 166,000,000 pounds; the next year to 193,000,000 pounds; the next year to 236,000,000 pounds. To save reading a lot of figures, by 1946 it had got up to 302,000,000 pounds. There has not been any reduction in production over a period in connection with that.

The same kind of figures could be produced with regard to other items. Let us look at eggs for a moment. In 1930 our production was 250,000,000, but by 1935 the preceding government had succeeded in getting it down to 244,000,000. Since this government has been in, it has gone up from the first year of the war when it was 250,000,000 to 1945 when we got it up to 393,900,000. It has dropped down slightly in 1946.

Mr. ROWE: What are you paying in subsidies?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member wants to know what we are paying in subsidies. I have heard nothing from the other side of the house but the suggestion that we ought to get rid of all these controls and special considerations we have in connection with these matters and let trade take its free course. That is a rather peculiar policy to hear from my hon. friends on the other side; nevertheless it is the kind of policy which has been spoken of. What was the position taken by our hon. friends back in 1929 when they were contesting an election back and forth across this country? It was that there was protection in every other country in the world. They said that they had protection in Germany, in France and in Italy; they said that there was no unemployment in those countries, that the only countries where there was unemployment were countries like Britain, Canada and other countries which followed the same policy as this country. They said, "Put us in power and we will blast our way into the markets of the world". They were blasting for five years, and by the end of that time they had created the situation indicated by these figures, not only with regard to agriculture but with regard to every other industry in the Dominion of Canada.

Now my hon. friend comes back and says that we have been in power for some time and that there is a certain situation existing with regard to agriculture. What is the situation? In 1946, in spite of the fact that production of hogs is down; in spite of the fact that production is down on some dairy products; in spite of the fact that production is down slightly on eggs as compared with the previous year, the highest net return the farmers of this country ever received was received in 1946. That means only one thing. If the production was down, then the return per unit must be very high as compared with the previous year. There is only one year in the history of this country when even the gross income from farm operations was higher than 1946, and that was in 1944.

The products which were sold in 1944 and which brought about the high gross income of that year were not products produced in 1944. One of the products which brought about a greater increase in gross farm cash returns in 1944 than any other was grain, and that grain which was sold in 1944 in such great quantities was not all grown in 1944. That grain was grown in 1942 and the years preceding, and in 1943. It was stored in our elevators and sold in 1944 and thus brought a considerable amount of cash into the pockets of the farmers of this country.

In spite of that, the cash income in 1944 was $1,849 million, whereas in 1946 the gross cash income was only $90 million less in spite of the fact that we were selling only the production of the year 1946 in the main. The net income of our farmers was the highest, whereas the gross income was only $90 million less than it was in the highest sales year that agriculture ever had in this country. We have increased the price of grain. My hon. friend wants to know why it was done. If he looks at the record he will find that there are only three provinces that had a lower gross return in 1946 as compared with 1944, and those were Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Why were those provinces down in gross return while the other provinces were not? The reason is obvious. Year by year we have been increasing the returns that can be obtained from every farm production that can be produced by the feeding of grain, but we have not increased the prices of feed grain since 1943 until this year. This year, in justice to the farmers who have been growing the feed that is being fed to live stock in surplus all over the Dominion of Canada, we have suggested that the prices ought to go up. If that increase does result in a slight increase per ton in the cost of the feed that is being fed to live stock, it will be found by the end of the first year for which statistics are available that it did not do anything more than give justice to the people who produce the grain that is being fed in surplus elsewhere.

What I want to suggest with regard to that is this: The discussions which we have had tonight clearly indicate that there are some men who claim to be farmers but who have not followed the records in relation to agricultural production, more particularly in relation to agricultural returns. There has been a constant upward levelling of prices over the returns from those products which are produced from the feeding of grain. There has not been a comparable increase in the price of grain itself to those farmers who grow the grain and who sell it to those who are going to feed it. The reason for the announcement that has been made is partly to adjust that situation. When it is adjusted, when we get our returns, if we have anything like an average crop year in 1947 it will be found once more that the three prairie provinces which produce grain occupy a position in relation to both gross and net returns from farms in Canada which is comparable to that in the other provinces. The government has nothing more in mind to produce from the results of its policies than that result.

To come back to the position of the farmer, there is not a farmer from one end of Canada to the other but will say that his position is better under this government at the present time than it has ever been under any other government in the dominion. When I have said that I am not saying that the farmer has yet got all that is coming to him. That is the reason why we are saying tonight that we are not going to lower the return the farmer will receive as of the 1st of May or the first of any other month throughout the coming year. We have said to this house that we are going to establish prices for dairy products which will put the farmer in at least as good a position after the first of May as he had before the first of May.

This necessitates taking under consideration any increases that have been made in grain prices; it necessitates taking into consideration at the same time the fact that we have already increased the financial position of agriculture in all the provinces that produce live stock products as related to the provinces that produce grain. Not only have we done that as relating to the provinces that produce live stock to be fed grain, we have done that as relating to the provinces that produce grain in so far as they feed their grain to live stock.

Our province of Saskatchewan is not entirely a grain producing area. If one draws a line from the southeast corner of our province to Lloydminster he will find that the line runs about twenty miles north of Regina and twenty miles south of Saskatoon. It will be found that the area north of that line is a live stock producing area, just as important a live stock producing area as can be found anywhere in Canada. The hon. member for Melfort knows this. As was said earlier in this house during a debate, when he came back from the first war he made a trip across our country and searched for an area in which to establish farming operations. He chose the Melfort district in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan. If he has not very good judgment in his politics he certainly had good judgment in his choice of a farming area. He has a good farm in that area and he has done very well. He is in the centre of the live stock producing area of our province. I want to say again that that area is just as much a mixed farming area, a live stock producing area and a dairy producing area as any section of the Dominion of Canada. It can stand comparison with any other part of Canada both with regard to production and with regard to net returns.

The southwestern part of the province is a grain-growing area, and we can sit in this house and belittle the discussions that have taken place on wheat, as I have heard them belittled by the previous speaker; but, after we have belittled them as much as we can, we come back to the fact that there is no other product produced in Canada that is shipped out in quantities to bring in as much outside money into Canada as wheat. Since that is the case, a considerable part of the business of this country is dependent upon the production of that area. It is not a wheat growing area by accident. It is the only product they can produce there to advantage and remain there and maintain their families on a reasonable standard of living. In other words, it is a natural grain growing area, not only for wheat but other grains. It is not an accident that they are producing grain there. They were able to go into that section of the country, stick a plough into the land and plough a whole quarter-section the first year and the second year have it under crop. Of course people who would go into an area of that kind would start growing grain.

The other sections went into mixed farming for the same reason that Ontario went into mixed farming. The northeastern part of the province was covered by trees, much of it not by trees big enough to call forests. We call them scrub, scrub poplar, scrub willow and trees of different kinds which had to be cleared. People who go into an area of that kind would naturally go in for mixed farming, because they are not able to make enough money in any other way on the small acreage they have to maintain them while clearing. They went into mixed farming and they remained in mixed farming. But neither the farmers in that section nor the farmers in the remainder of Canada could produce anything like the live stock they are producing today were it not for the fact that farmers did go into the grain growing area and did produce and ship large quantities of grain, the surplusses which made production possible. So I would say to any member of this house, farmer or no farmer, who lives in eastern Canada, that he is not doing credit to himself or to the farmers in his area when he decries the discussion of grain or wheat on the floor of this house; for it is a product which brings more wealth into this country than any other product, a product which makes it possible for live stock to be fed on farms right across Canada in the quantities in which is fed, a product which makes it possible for every province, except the three provinces that grow the grain, to have a higher gross income from farming last year that they ever had in any other year in their history.

Having said that, I come back to the chief criticism made by the hon. member who just took his seat. His chief criticism is that our production was down in 1946 as compared with 1944. I have given a partial explanation, namely that much that was sold in 1944 was not produced that year. But there is another thing I should like to say. My hon. friend speaks of what has been going on, the lack of planning, the lack of organization, the lack of leadership to the farmers of this country. I listened to that kind of speech during the first four years I was here prior to the war, and yet farm production went up and up year after year in spite of the fact that my hon. friend was making the same kind of speech that he did tonight. Then the war came. You can go back and check the record in the debates of this house, and you will find that every year he predicted that our production would go down and down. Yet from 1939 to 1944 it soared from one height to another, until it reached a record height in 1944 which probably no other farm group in Canada under any kind of organization or leadership will be able to match over a long period of years.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There was a war.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not speaking now of the prices they obtained for their crop but of their production.

Mr. HACKETT: There was a demand for it.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend said there was a demand. All I will say is that we made a much better job in getting that demand when half the world was shut out from us than my hon. friend and his government did in the five years they were in power when the whole world was open to them to blast their way into. The situation from 1939 to 1944 was that we had only one market where we could market our products to advantage, and that market was the British isles. My hon. friend has been saying tonight: Yes, we are willing that the United Kingdom should be fed. But, Mr. Chairman, fortunately those who are administering affairs in the United Kingdom know a great deal more about agriculture in this country than the hon. member himself does, and because they do they are not misled by the kind of argument he was making a few moments ago, when he said that a few years ago we were selling 700,000,000 pounds of bacon to Britain.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. GARDINER: The only reason you did not say it was because you could not remember the figures.

Mr. ROWE: The minister may be the crown prince of Saskatchewan, but he is not going to bull-doze me in the House of Commons. He may do that in the little country schoolhouse, but I say that he has never heard me in twenty-five years state that we ever sold 700,000,000 pounds of bacon to Britain, and he knows that I know we never did. That was just a straight political statement of his, or it indicated senility or a misunderstanding of the facts. The minister cannot put that over. The minister knows better than anyone else; everyone in his department knows, and the leader of the C.C.F. party knows that I never at any time made the statement that we ever sold Britain 700,000,000 pounds of bacon, because I know we never had that much to sell. But in 1921 we sold 255,000,000 pounds. That is the statement I made.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend has not been listening very closely. I did not give credit to the party of which he is a member for every having sold 700,000,000 pounds of bacon to anybody.

Mr. ROWE: You said I said that.

Mr. GARDINER: I said we sold 700,000,000 pounds, and the actual figure here is 717,000,000 pounds.

Mr. ROWE: In what year did you sell 717,000,000 pounds?

Mr. GARDINER: I will give you the whole record. In 1944—

Mr. HARKNESS: What is the minister quoting from?

Mr. GARDINER: From the official records of the statistics bureau of the dominion government.

Mr. ROWE: How much are you selling them this year?

Mr. GARDINER: We shall get around to that in a minute. I am making this speech, and not you.

Mr. ROWE: You are making your own, but do not make mine.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: In 1944 we sold 717,000,000 pounds of bacon to Britain. And after that experience we had sold or fed the enormous amounts of feed grain which were produced in 1942 and the amount we added to it in 1943 and also what we had grown in 1944. By the end of July, 1945, we had only one month's feed stored in the Dominion of Canada on our farms and elsewhere, with a new crop coming up. In these circumstances this government was wise enough to know that it was absolutely impossible for the farmers of this country to feed 717,000,000 pounds of bacon to go to Britain any time again until we had gone through the first three or four years of another war, or preparation for it, which would compel us to keep our grain stored in our bins year after year until we could open up a way for it into the natural markets of the world on the European continent. Therefore we began to plan for that. What did we do? We signed a contract with Britain not to deliver 600,000,000 pounds as we did the preceding year, when we actually delivered 717,000,000 pounds, but 450,000,000 pounds a year. For the reason that we knew there were men in this country like the hon. member who has just spoken who would go out and say that was an indication that we wanted the farmers to decrease the production, we made a two-year contract for 900,000,000 pounds over the two years in order that we might have two years in which to make the shift. True to form, my hon. friends in this house and all through this country went out and said that the government of this country is deliberately cutting down on supplies of bacon to Great Britain. My hon. friends said that we could never build it up. We did build it up from the unreasonably low levels at which it was in 1935 to the enormous quantity of 717,000,000 pounds sent in 1944. Then, when we reduce it to a figure that they never dreamed of being able to reach in their day, 450,000,000 pounds, they thought that was a ridiculous thing to do. Now, when they find that there is not enough feed in Canada with which to feed the live stock we now have they are still trying to maintain that somebody somehow could have been able to feed more hogs and more cattle in Canada. The only way in which we can feed hogs and cattle is to produce grain with which to feed them. Every bushel of feed grain that we have in this country is being fed in this year, which is an indication that we could not have produced more.

My hon. friend tries to lead us to believe that that reduction is due to some kind of policy which the present government has been following; but when anybody suggests that the reductions that came about from 1929 when they were going to blast their way into the markets of the world down to 1932 had anything to do with the Conservative policy in the country they say it is all bosh. I am prepared to accept his suggestion that the fact that we had a Conservative government here then was not the only reason for our bad times, provided that he will just say that the fact that our farmers have such good times now is partly because we have a Liberal government. I am quite sure that whether he will say that or not—

Mr. ROWE: You hit a war, too.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, we had a war. We had a war before when my hon. friend's friends were in power. When that war ended what happened?

Mr. ROWE: We had higher prices than we have today.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, you had higher prices for a few days. Wheat sold at $3.05 for one day, and during that time the government sold some millions of bushels of wheat and wheat went down like a rock and never came back.

Mr. ROWE: Yes—

Mr. GARDINER: I know, because I was selling wheat then off my own farm.

Mr. ROWE: So was I.

Mr. GARDINER: And it kept on going down, and we had a new government in power—

Mr. ROWE: It went up, did it?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, wheat went up and kept on going up, until from 1926 to 1929 we had the best conditions in this country that agriculture had ever experienced prior to that time and the best conditions we have ever had since until the last four years. Both of these good financial conditions for the farmer were created, not under a Conservative government, not under these ideas that we have listened to for the last two months, but under the policies that were put into effect by this government.

My hon. friend says that his hon. friends to the left of him are talking socialism. I quite agree that they believe in socialism, but more than half the time they are talking liberalism. The only way in which a government can really benefit the people of this country, no matter what they talk in order to get elected, is to put truly Liberal policies into effect while they are in office. When they do that the position of agriculture improves. Unfortunately for other parties in this country the only party that has ever done that is the Liberal party. Our position has always been improved under Liberalism.

I do not know whether this is going to develop into an old-time political campaign. It has been going on now for some months. I have sat here for two months, and during the greater part of that time I have been reprimanded both in the house and outside of it when I rose on a point of order in order to try to keep things in order. I have now come to the conclusion that the best thing I could do is to make a few political speeches myself, and that probably in making them we shall finally convince hon. members opposite of what I think is the truth. They are standing here day after day making speeches for no other purpose than to get free propaganda before the people of this country. I would suggest to my hon. friends that if they really do want an election, if they really do want to get political propaganda out to the country, just get together against the policies that this government is putting into effect, make a clear statement of their position in relation to them, say why they are opposing it and vote that way; if as they think they can find some support from this side of the house they may get an election, and they will probably find out what the people really think about these matters. But may I say this to them—

Mr. ROWE: Call one in Halifax now.

Mr. GARDINER: We who sit on this side know hon. members on this side well enough to know that they believe in Liberal policies. They believe in liberalism. They know that there is no other party in this country which would ever give them Liberalism in this country except the Liberal party. They are going to keep this party in power for some considerable time in spite of the talk of my hon. friends. I would suggest to them that, instead of putting on full-dress debates on the matter of paying subsidies for two or three weeks on a small quantity of butter and cheese that is put on boats when they come into port, we get down to discussing what is before us and continue to do that for a while.

Mr. FULTON: One of your own members started it.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but I tried to stop him, and I am trying to stop everybody now. Let us get down to discussing what is before the committee and put these items through. Someone has been saying that they want to know what we are going to do about old age pensions. They want to know what we are going to do about other important matters. We have been trying to tell the house for two months that, just as soon as this bill is put through, it will know all about what we are going to do about these matters. The bills will be brought down and placed before the house and we shall have an opportunity of discussing them. If everybody is interested in these matters, then let us get on with this bill; pass it, get it through the house, get it out of the way, go on with the administration of it. Then we shall bring down the legislation which everybody seems to be worrying about and have it discussed, and let us get home some time this summer.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture does not need any assistance in meeting the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. In view of the fact that hon. members on this side of the house directed a good deal of heat in this direction, to keep the record straight a word should be said about the so-called wonderful days which existed when these hon. members sat over on the other side of the house. I was living in a part of Canada that took seriously the propaganda of a well-known Canadian who promised that he would blast his way into the markets of the world; that he would cure unemployment or perish in the attempt. That constituency elected a supporter of that well-known Canadian and he became a member of the cabinet, but the blasting did not seem to click and the unemployment situation grew worse. Our young men left home to go east to look for work, and everywhere the situation was the same—no men wanted. The farmers took their butter to town, and I remember farmers taking that product home again, unable to sell it at ten cents a pound. One farmer brought thirty dozen eggs to town one day and received ninety cents—three cents a dozen, in the good old days when the Tories were in office. I am sure the farmers in all parts of Canada have sufficiently vivid memories to recall those days and they certainly do not want a repetition of those incidents.

An hon. MEMBER: A Labour government was in office in Britain at the same time.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Not very long. They never had a majority. The Minister of Agriculture said, quite correctly, that the Canadian farmers during the war period were in a more favourable position than ever before; they were in that favourable position when all our markets were gone with the exception of the British market, and for a very large portion of the war we were supplying agriculutral products to Great Britain, as part of the mutual aid programme, which meant in reality that Canadian farmers were enjoying prosperity, while they were participating in giving agricultural products away. I want to make it clear that we were in complete agreement with the government policy that made agricultural products available in Great Britain. Indeed, I am not very proud of the fact that some Canadians have come through the war in such a favourable financial position. While we made substantial gifts in man-power and materials, when we consider the position which other countries of the world are in, we cannot take a great deal of satisfaction in the financial position of Canadians in many walks of life at the present time.

The situation is still unsatisfactory. I have in my hand the Canadian agricultural programme for 1947, which is published under the authority of the Minister of Agriculture. It refers to the fourteen agricultural conferences which were convened here during the war. At the last meeting the deputy minister of agriculture gave a report of a conference he had recently attended at Copenhagen and mentioned that the world grain deficit was given as 8,000,000 tons, while there was a potential shortage of rice of about 6,000,000 pounds. Fats and oils were fifteen per cent below the pre-war average, and meat production dropped in the war to seventy per cent of pre-war levels in Europe and sixty per cent in the United Kingdom.

I find in this report that, while we reached enviable heights in the field of dairy production, hogs and cattle, during the war, our production is now falling off. On page 21, I find that the hog production in 1946 had dropped to 4,350,000 as compared with 5,861,000 for the previous year. It indicates that the government wants an increase of nineteen per cent in 1947 over the 1946 production, and the statistics for the past two years would indicate that we are not likely to reach this objective.

I mentioned before the dinner recess that I visited my constituency in the Easter recess. I was told at several points that hog production is decreasing rapidly and that the farmers in that part of the country are not likely to go into hog production again. They say they are not getting a satisfactory deal.

Mr. GARDINER: May I be permitted an interruption? On that point I must admit that I was taken away by some of the interruptions we had from something I was going to say and should have said. What I started to say at one stage of my remarks was that the figures which appear in our contracts are fully understood by the British and have been all the way through ever since we made the reduction to 450,000,000 pounds. We have discussed the matter with them and have also discussed the question whether we should reduce the figure to what we expect to be able to supply, or hold it at what we are trying to get the farmer to produce, and we have written into the contract what we have been trying to get the farmers to produce. It is necessary for me to make that statement because, if the matter is looked at from any other point of view, one gets a mistaken idea.

The British knew, for example, last year that, while we wrote 125,000,000 pounds of cheese into the contract they did not expect to get 100,000,000 pounds. They knew that beforehand.

Mr. HACKETT: The British house did not know it.

Mr. GARDINER: Their officials know it, and they can use their judgment whether they tell householders. But the objective put before them was that. If we had said to the farmers, "All that the British want is 100,000,000 pounds," they might not have tried to produce 140,000,000 or 150,000,000 pounds. They might slip down, fearing that they would not have a market. So we put up the figure, and we said that in that way we would try to encourage the farmers to come up to the standard the British desired. But the British always knew whether we were coming up to it or falling down, and they knew it weeks in advance.

Mr. NICHOLSON: During the war years, with over three-quarters of a million of the youngest and strongest men in the armed services and with a similar group producing armaments, Canadians did increase production of hogs, beef and milk. Now that the war is over, we are no longer engaged in the manufacture of munitions and our service personnel are back home. There must, therefore, be something radically wrong with the Canadian economy when the production of milk, butter and eggs declines. It is a reflection on our Canadian set-up that we cannot get our Canadian youth to take on the job of milking cows, feeding pigs and making butter. I think the only thing wrong is that the young people of Canada feel that those engaged in agriculture are not getting a fair share of the national income.

I agree with what the minister said earlier, that Canadian farmers are in a better position today than before. I think the debt position of the farmer in 1947 is better than it was at the end of the last war. But I was in British Columbia the other day at the C.C.F. convention, and when the agricultural policy was discussed I was amazed to hear delegate after delegate, as he rose, say, "I spent the first twenty, or thirty or forty years of my life on a farm and here I am now in Vancouver. I am not going to go back to the farm and I do not want my children to live on the farm". In Ontario the same situation prevails, certainly in that part of the province where I lived, in Bruce county. Very few young people plan on taking over the family farm and continuing the production of agricultural commodities.

I submit that the minister has now sufficient evidence to know that the policy of getting rid of controls and subsidies will not enable Canada to meet her commitments to the hungry people of the world, with the very serious deficit of grain products, of meat products, of fats. I think we should be following the policy in agriculture which the minister of reconstruction followed during the war. He was not held up by lack of gold or lack of foreign markets. His programme was carried out on the theory that whatever is physically possible somehow or another must be made financially possible. I submit that the minister will not be able to supply adequate stocks of butter for Canada and abroad by leaving it to free enterprise or to supply and demand.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

The farmers are the victims of huge monopolies which control the price of everything the farmer buys, and which in the past have controlled the price of things the farmers sold. Some of my hon. friends who sit to my right were here when the Stevens mass buying commission investigated price spreads, the operation of the tobacco industry, the canning industry and the packing industry. All down the line it was the same story. I remember that when you bought a can of peas or corn you actually got about three-quarters of a cent's worth of vegetables, about three-quarters of a cent's worth of labour, and the rest went for the tin can which was thrown out, and profits that made huge fortunes for a very small group of people who operated on a monopolistic basis.

I submit that if Canada is to fulfil her commitments to feed the hungry people in the world the minister must use the weapons that he has to tax these corporations which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned the other day and see that subsidies, if necessary, are paid to producers so that we shall maintain our production and supply the home and foreign markets. I think the minister should make some statement before we take his advice and go on, as to his opinion regarding the possibilities of Canadian children being able to have enough milk to drink in the next few years if you leave it to the law of supply and demand, to see that they get enough wages in the pay cheques so that they can buy milk at the greatly increased price. If the minister has the statistics, I think he would be able to tell us that our local consumption of milk is going down markedly in the cities and towns across the country. Again there is something seriously wrong when our own children have to consume less milk in 1947 than they did in 1945 when the enemy threatened our commerce and our people were risking their lives all over the country. Before we leave this item, I should like the minister to give some indication that the consumer in Canada will be able to maintain his consumption of dairy products, meat and pork products on a level similar to that which prevailed during the war.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I intend to occupy but a very small portion of your time and to be as speedy as usual I do that in order to answer some of the things said by the Minister of Agriculture, and I take what he said in reverse order. The last thing that he said was that we on this side of the house were using this opportunity to put propaganda before the people of Canada. We may have some who are capable of doing that, but since this is the first time that I have risen in this debate, either on the resolution, second reading or now in committee, I think I might be forgiven any such dastardly charge as trying to be political, particularly in view of the fact that the minister himself has made three political speeches on this very measure.

Mr. GARDINER: And I am going to keep right on as long as you make them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I give you my word that no one else can compare with the minister. He will keep on longer than anyone else; even though he does not say anything, he can still keep on going.

The next point he raised was this. He said my friends to my left, the state socialists, were talking liberalism.

Mr. GARDINER: Half the time.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You did not say half the time.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I did.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will accept that.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: The better half.

Mr. HACKETT: He meant that they talk in their sleep.

Mr. GARDINER: About half the time.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish the Minister of Agriculture would make up his mind as to what he did say and I will accept it, whatever it is.

Mr. GARDINER: About half the time.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That about half the time the hon. gentlemen to my left were preaching liberalism. You know, Mr. Chairman, words change. There is a simple word called "planning", and I shall have something to say about that, too. A few years ago it was a very respectable word until it was grabbed completely by my hon. friends to my left. They seemed to think they had made a great discovery in grasping that old word and altering its meaning.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: You should talk about grabbing any word.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, what about the word, "progressive"?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say that I shall answer both of you and all of you. One man mentioned "grafting", and if you mean what I think you did I will take you on now or any other time. With respect to the word "progressive", I will take that on before I have finished. It does seem to me that the thing has become a bit threadbare and my hon. friends either need a new needle or a new record, because all they are doing is playing the old one again and again and it has become very scratchy.

So I come back to what I started to say, with the kindly interjections and help of my hon. friends over here, and that was that the minister said they were speaking liberalism—I am using his last explanation of what he said—about half the time. Let me accept that, if I know the meaning of the word liberalism. But I know another word a great deal better, and the minister and his government are not talking but are preaching socialism more than half the time, and they are acting it and practising it.

The next note I made with respect to what he said was on the position of the farmer today under this government, and he spoke of a levelling up of prices. I know about the farmer in the area in which I was born, where my grandparents farmed at a place called Foxley, twelve miles north of Regina where I spent all my boyhood holidays. I am certainly a blue-blooded fellow. My father was a tinsmith; he progressed and became a hardware merchant. My mother was a schoolteacher. I do know a little about the history of the country which these young fellows over here have now claimed to discover and all that sort of thing. It was there long before they knew about it. It was Assiniboia then. It is now the province of Saskatchewan. What I have in mind is this. All through the minister's speech he said "we" did this, "we" did that. I got lost in the millions. The most things I ever saw together—and I know nothing of dollars—was in a round-up where there were 30,000 head of cattle. To me that is a tremendous number of things. It is the most I ever saw in one place, but I have not been to a football match in England, for example, so that is the farthest I can go. But what struck me as amusing and with a little bit of resentment, was that the Minister of Agriculture through this war took full credit for what the farmers in this country did; and in my judgment the farmers did it in spite of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. KNOWLES: Once he even told them to grow less wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: And they did.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes; I am not going to take the time to point out all his mistakes. The only thing I am capable of doing at the moment is not to go into detail but to throw a blanket of obscurity over him because I think he would be much happier in that position.

The next thing he dealt with was the levelling of prices, and then he also carried on with respect to something said by the hon. member for Melfort. I am sorry I have forgotten what he did say about the hon. member for Melfort, so I am going to leave that.

Mr. GARDINER: They were all nice things.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There is one thing I like about that. When one begins to court a girl he calls her nice things. I think it is infinitely better than that; the marriage is almost consummated between you and these people over here. So we are really making progress.

Mr. GARDINER: He really used to be a Tory, and you used to be a Liberal. You had better get together.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, there is one thing I can say to the Minister of Agriculture. At least the minds of the hon. member for Melfort and myself are active. We change. We are not dead, as the minister is, because he has never been anything but a propagandizing Grit.

Mr. GARDINER: But you just got through accusing me of being a socialist.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then I am going to accept that, entirely. In my judgment you should be sitting over here; that is where you belong. Your speech in Regina and your speech in Vancouver put you over here. But there are some delightful people around you, many of whom do not like you. But I cannot help that. There is nothing I can really do about it.

I want to go back a little. I have been here only—well, this is my third session. There is a man by the name of Bennett. We are not and have not been personal friends. But if it were not for this man Bennett people opposite and people to my immediate left would be absolutely naked in their arguments in ninety-nine per cent of the subjects which come up in this House of Commons. There is not any doubt about that. They all say, "We hit it in 1930, at the top of the depression." I am a little afraid we might hit it again, if some of these comments are right, and under rather similar circumstances. If so, we probably shall not last much longer than the Bennett government lasted at that time.

I want to say a word or two about this man. What did he do?

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Where did he stand in the world economy? I was in Ottawa in 1932, and I was very well paid for it. At that time I was acting in the Beauharnois inquiry before the senate committee. I do not hear any cheers from the opposite side of the house when I mention the Beauharnois inquiry, either. But I was here, and I had quite a time of it. Really it was my banner year. At that time we did not have the income tax that the minister over there is collecting.

Mr. McCANN: It may be retroactive.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is the only thing the income tax people have failed to do—to make it retroactive from the cradle to the grave. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. McCANN: Keep your eye on Calgary.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish I could hear better. What did the minister say?

The CHAIRMAN: I might say that there should not be so many interruptions.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I thank you very much, but I do not object to the interruptions. The only thing I was suggesting was that when the minister interrupts he should throw his chewing gum away so that I can hear him properly.

Mr. McCANN: Perhaps if you would clean out your ears it would do just as well.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have an appointment with a physician tomorrow to blow out the right one; but my left one is still pretty good.

Mr. McCANN: Well, blow the whole thing off while you are at it, so that you will do a good job.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, I do not want to interrupt, except when the balance is even. But I do think hon. members should address the chair.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I agree with that. The only reason the minister will not have his ears blown out is that the few brains he has now will go with it.

Mr. McCANN: That is just where you would lose out, because there would be nothing to go with it.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the score now?

Mr. McCANN: Come again. We will beat you every time.

The CHAIRMAN: May I act in the capacity of referee and say that the balance is now even?

Mr. McCANN: Stick to agriculture.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I could not hear, but I gathered the result of your ruling was that I still have the floor.

Mr. KNOWLES: And the score is 3 to 0 for Montreal.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am going to take care of this, in a much broader sense. There is no question that between 1929 and 1939 we had a depression. The expression "the terrible thirties" is one which, in my judgment, was wisely used, and I admit that frankly.

But what was the situation at that time in this House of Commons among right honourable and honourable members opposite—and I use those words in the same collation? We have been speaking of a man named Bennett, who is now a viscount. Someone asked a minute ago: Why did he leave this country? I think that came from over here to my left. Let us be fair about it. Let me say to hon. members on my immediate left, who believe in socialism, that I think they have an arguable position. I have never denied that. They have an economic theory under which they believe we can economically and socially better the position of our people. I accept that from them. I am sure the suggestion is made in all honesty; I have no doubt about that at all. So surely we can have our bits of difference with respect to economic and social theories without going back and saying that so-and-so did this in eighteen slixty-slix, or eighteen seventy-six or eighteen eighty-six.

An hon. MEMBER: Eighteen slixty-slix?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The Minister of Agriculture does not know that I do that deliberately. That used to make a hit in the schoolhouse.

Is there anyone here who will deny that that was the first world-wide depression this world ever knew?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I deny it. We went through one in the early nineties which was just as bad.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): World-wide?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, world-wide.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry, but you must have read about that a lot later. You were not born at that time.

Mr. GARDINER: I went through it, like a lot of other people.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I repeat what I said, and I have support to my left, although the Minister of Agriculture has a different view and a different memory.

Mr. GARDINER: You are more socialist than I am; that is all.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I think I am. And may I put it to you this way, that I am more honestly socialistic in my thought and in my heart than you will ever be. But you are a politician first and a socialist after.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say "socialistic"; I said "socialist"; there is quite a difference.

Mr. KNOWLES: He complimented you on your intelligence.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, I suppose there is a great difference between a noun and an adjective; but I always thought that socialist and socialistic persons were rather the same thing. However I appreciate the distinction the minister makes. What he means is this, by using the word "socialistic", that he loves all human kind, particularly if they are Grits. That is about it.

Mr. GARDINER: They are really better then.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is about his socialistic position.

So I return again, Mr. Chairman, with respect to you and with your kindly permission, to this so-called depression. The depression then was a political one. It arose because every country in the world went completely nationalistic. It arose because countries like Great Britain, France, Italy and all the rest. after the first war decided that never again would they, if they could avoid it, be placed in a position where they had to import the greater proportion of their food. That is what happened at that time. And so we had bad prices for farm products and so on.

I am not an economist and, in fact, I do not recognize anybody any more under that name except the Minister of Labour. I do not think those people really exist or are entitled to that appellation. What happened was that we all put up tariff barriers and walls and endeavoured to live within ourselves. The result was that world trade languished and almost died. Then we came to 1932, I think it was. I remember that expression which everybody now thinks was so funny, about blasting our way into the markets of the world. But I think hon. members will remember one thing about it; it won an election in any event and it is entitled to that much credit. The Ottawa agreements were formed at that time and those are the Ottawa agreements having regard to this commonwealth.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, they were coming in here and taking out our gold, and this man Bennett had the courage to stop it on his own order and do more to save the economy of this country than any man sitting over there at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: Pretty wide powers.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): He took the power and it was confirmed later. Let us be frank. I do not think I can be accused of going very far from the truth even though perhaps it may hurt me, or perhaps "hurt" is the wrong word to use. These things flow like water from a duck's back, although there are no duck shooters here.

I close by saying I appreciate very much the fact that the Minister of Agriculture had a terrible loss during the war; I am not overlooking that in what I am going to say. I close with this: In the figures which he gave tonight covering from 1939 until the present day he did not give credit to the fact that we were at war, with respect to either production or prices. It is easy to say that we produced more then. We did. He asked the farmers to do it and they did it. Production of similar products was stopped in half the countries of the world.

I do not think we in this House of Commons can get any straight line. There is bound to be a complexity on one side and a complexity on the other side. As I said when I spoke first in this house, times have changed so much. I like the expression used the other day by the hon. member for New Westminster. He said that there were many who did not recognize that we had had a war which blew our country to pieces, that the lid had been blown off our economic life. I go with him in that. This is a time of changing economies. I have not any doubt of that whatever. I close by just saying: It seems to me to be bad business and bad faith to break with all the good that is in our past and try to have a new broom which will sweep clean, as the expression is. When you have done that there is nothing more to sweep. You will not have a broom left to sweep with.

The CHAIRMAN: May I again remind the committee that we are dealing with order in council P.C. 6759, which relates to the repayment of subsidy (agricultural products) regulations. That order in council states:

(b) "subsidized goods" means creamery butter, cheddar cheese, concentrated whole milk products, white beans or yellow eye beans, or such other goods as may be designated by order of the deputy minister of agriculture by notice in Canadian War Orders and Regulations.

We have discussed a great many things tonight, such as eggs, lumber and pulpwood. I cannot see where lumber and pulpwood would come within the definition of dairy products. Possibly eggs might, because I have often read that hens are milk fed, but I do not see how lumber could come within that category. It occurred to me that it is time now, after this wide discussion, to consider this order in council. I do not want to curtail the debate because I think it was with unanimous consent that the general discussion has taken place, but I submit that it is now time that we should deal with the order in council.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Chairman, you have suggested that we have been going around a large circle, but the circle has not been completed. I hope you will let me complete it.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. mem- is correct. No member of the Social Credit group has taken part in the debate tonight. Would it meet with the wishes of all members of the committee that, after he completes his speech, we shall then deal with the order in council?

Mr. QUELCH: I am not going to speak at any length, but there are one or two things that have been said to which I should like to refer. The Minister of Agriculture has emphasized the fact that agriculture is better off today than it was before the war, and I agree with him. On the other hand, that it not saying very much, because agriculture was in a state of bankruptcy when the war came. As the minister said, the condition of agriculture could still be very much better than it is now. You have only to refer to the fact that agriculturists make up thirty per cent of the population, but today they receive only nineteen per cent of the national income. We still have a long way to go.

At the start of the war, farmers as a whole were heavily in debt; their buildings were depreciated and their machinery was mostly worn out. During the war, it was practically impossible to replace their machinery and now that they are trying to buy machinery they find that prices have gone up considerably. We all know that the cost of building materials is very high at the present time.

During the 1930's we were constantly being told that we would have to be willing to produce at world prices, that we could not expect to get special prices in Canada. Shortly after the war started, when prices began to rise ceilings were placed upon the prices of agricultural products. We were forced to receive world market prices before the war when world prices were low, but during the war when world prices went up we had to take lower prices. After a while the ceilings were raised slightly, but just at that time the income tax was increased greatly and the farmers were compelled to pay heavy taxes upon the repayment of their debts which had been incurred prior to the war. The result was that their debt charges were increased anywhere from thirty to forty per cent, and that places agriculture under a serious disability today.

I would say that what agriculture needs today from the government more than anything else is a declaration of policy to the effect that in the future the government will do all in their power to see that agriculture receives parity prices. When I refer to parity prices I am not talking about the wishy-washy prices to which some hon. members refer; I am referring to prices that will return to the farmer his fair share of the national income, so that the income of the farmer will bear the same relationship to the national income as farm population bears to the national population.

The situation referred to this evening by the hon. member for Fraser Valley can be dealt with in only one way, by subsidy. I think that is the greatest mistake the government have made in their decontrol policy. They started off by taking off the subsidies, and then they took off the price controls. They should have left on the price controls and subsidies and then taken off the price controls before the subsidies were taken away, instead of reversing the procedure as they have done. As a result, the cost of living for the people has gone up. I suggest to the minister that it is still not too late to reverse the policy and reimpose subsidies where they are found to be necessary, in order to maintain the purchasing power of the people.

I have been very much puzzled by the attitude of the Progressive Conservative party which emphasizes the need for the removal of all controls. If the party are sincere in that stand, when they suggest that all controls should be lifted they should also advocate that all tariffs be taken off because tariffs are controls. We all know, for example, that the seasonal tariff on fruits is a direct control. I quite agree that there are certain industries in this country which could not carry on without some form of protection. If any industry can show the government that it cannot continue without a tariff, let that industry apply for a subsidy and, if it is shown that the industry cannot produce in competition with imported goods, a subsidy could be paid. If that were done we would find that our eastern manufacturers would in future be a little more sympathetic toward subsidizing agriculture in western Canada. The eastern manufacturers have always been subsidized in the past by the tariff. We have heard a lot about the spoon-feeding of western Canada, but the manufacturers in the east have been spoon-fed right along.

An hon. MEMBER: By the shovelful.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, by the shovelful. I know it will be said that a policy of that kind would cost a lot of money. I remember that this question of money was quite a serious one in this house before the war, but never once during the whole war were we told that we could not do this or could not do that because we had not the money. We produced the money, and by the shovelful, as someone remarked just now. But now we are hearing the same old cry: it will cost too much to do this or to do that.

The hon. member for Stanstead the other day seemed to deplore the fact that our money had been diluted in relation to certain securities. I do not know just what he meant, but apparently he thought we were still on a gold basis. We are not on a gold basis, and have not been since the start of the war. After all, what is the value of money? It depends upon one thing alone, and that is its purchasing power. Personally I am far more interested in maintaining the purchasing power of the people than I am in maintaining the purchasing power of the dollar. The hon. member for Stanstead thought the value of the dollar had gone down too low. Would he suggest that we should reduce prices of agricultural products to increase the value of money? On what commodities does he think prices should be reduced in order to increase the value of money, because the only way we can increase the value of money is to bring prices down? When the Conservative party was in power in 1930 the dollar had a far greater value than it has today. Then it would buy four bushels of wheat or twelve dozen eggs. Surely the hon. member is not suggesting that we should increase the value of money today to what it was when the Conservatives were in power in the 1930's. I think it is far better to have the purchasing power of the dollar reduced and the purchasing power of the people increased to the point where they can buy what they want. So I would say that the only way in which we can decontrol in an orderly manner is to introduce subsidies in this country in order to maintain the purchasing power of the people at the point where they are able to buy the total production of the country.

Mr. LOW: Let him answer that.

On P.C. 8541½.

Mr. TIMMINS: This takes us back to the year 1927. I can see no reason in the world why the veterans preference could not be dealt with now. The Secretary of State told us some little time ago that he was going to bring down a separate bill with respect to the veterans preference. After all, it seems to me that one of the most important things in this country, now that the war is over, is that we should decide definitely and as soon as possible what these preferences amount to, without having to look through eight or ten orders in council and amendments. This particular order in council takes us back to the statutes of 1927, chapter 22, section 29, which deals with the preferences which are to be given in the civil service to the soldiers who served in the first great war. If hon. members will look through the order in council which we are now dealing with and those that follow they will find, as I found this afternoon in checking through them that they simply amount to adding some definitions and making some exceptions. I would ask the minister, is there any reason why this particular matter should not be dealt with now by a bill? Should not a bill be brought down now instead of later?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): A bill is to be brought down dealing with the veterans preference in the civil service and with other matters connected with the civil service which is not emergency legislation. The extension before us is to protect the veterans preference in case the other bill should not be passed by May 15. The preferences already have the approval of the veterans committee which sat last year; we also have letters from the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans' Association of Canada in which they recommend that the Dominion of Canada is requested to maintain the preference as it now stands in the statutes of this dominion. So that in passing this legislation today we shall be continuing the veterans preference that already exists, and it will be included in the civil service bill which will be brought down at a later stage of the session.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister says that the veterans committee agreed to leave the veterans preference as it is. Was there not an understanding that a committee would be appointed this year on the Civil Service Act when the question of extending the veterans preference to men of the merchant marine and to others would be considered? We understood, at the beginning of the session, that it was the intention of the government to set up a civil service committee, but for some reason nothing was done about it.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I will quote from the report of the veterans affairs committee, 1946 volume 2, 23rd report:

> Your committee recommends that the present civil service preference for disabled veterans and veterans who served overseas be extended to cover all employment, both temporary and permanent, by dominion government agencies, inclusive of crown companies.

That was the recommendation of the committee of last year, that the present preference be continued.

Mr. TIMMINS: Will the bill be brought down this session without fail?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes; it is in course of preparation at the present time, but there are other matters affecting the civil service commission and the civil service generally to be included in the bill.

Mr. TIMMINS: Does the minister undertake that the bill will be brought down this session?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I quite undertake that.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it the intention to set up a committee to study the veterans preference before the bill is brought down, or is the bill being brought down without any further study of extending the veterans preference to the merchant marine and others mentioned in our report last year?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No. The intention is to bring down a bill to provide the same preference as exists at the present time.

Mr. BROOKS: There will be no enlargement.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No.

Mr. PROBE: On February 4 the Prime Minister intimated that there would be a committee set up to go into the matter of veterans preference in connection with civil service appointments, with the idea, I presume, of examining what preference should be given to veterans of the late war comparable to that given following the first war under sections 29 and 30 of the Civil Service Act, chapter 22 of the revised statutes of Canada. I regret I was not in the house when this item was called, and I may be asking for a repetition of information, because the hon. member for Royal was asking for information along that line. Can the minister inform the committee as to whether or not a special committee on civil service preference is to be set up and at what time that committee is to function?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There is no present intention to set up a special committee to deal with civil service preference. The matter was considered by the veterans committee last year and the report of the committee was that the present preference should be continued. It had been the intention of the government to continue the preference that already existed. It has been extended from the first war to the veterans of the late war. Certain extensions were made to provide for those who had served on ships that were not ships of war but had been on active service, and for airmen who had been flying over the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans. Beyond those extensions as they exist at the present time, there is no intention of extending the preference farther.

Mr. PROBE: It was not with the purpose necessarily of extending the preference or limiting it for veterans of the late war beyond what is now contemplated in the orders in council. In his statement of February 4, the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 82 of Hansard:

A certain number of the orders which will be specified in the schedule—

Which we are now studying, by the way.

—will be the subject of additional specific bills later in the session. This would apply, for example, in the case of labour relations, which will be covered in a bill to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, orders regarding old age pensions which will be covered in a later bill to amend the Old Age Pensions Act and orders regarding veterans' preference in the civil service which will remain in the schedule pending examination of this subject by a parliamentary committee with a view to later introduction of legislation.

That is the language of the Prime Minister on February 4. It seems to me that that was a definite statement which was followed on the following day by another reply in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Royal as follows, as reported at page 130 of Hansard:

Mr. Mackenzie King: On the matter of the preference only.

Has the government now decided not to set up this committee?

Mr. TUCKER: Since I was the chairman of the committee in question, I might be permitted to say a word about this. This matter came up from time to time before the committee. So far as I remember, there was pretty unanimous feeling that the preference as it then existed should be continued, and we so reported, as has been read by the minister. That was brought to the attention of the minister, and in view of the fact that there were a large number of committees and that hon. members were going to be very busy with other matters which had not been as carefully considered as this had been, the suggestion was made by several members of the house who were veteran members of that committee that a further study of the matter would not and could not carry us any farther than we had gone when we made our recommendation last year. I must say I was under the impression that all the members of the committee felt that they had gone as far as they could go in making that recommendation, and that no good purpose would be served by setting up a further committee on the matter. That is the state of affairs. I doubt very much whether any returned soldier members of the house really feel that a further committee could usefully be set up on this matter.

Mr. PROBE: What did the Prime Minister refer to in the two quotations which I have read to the committee? I feel that there may be representations to enlarge the scope of preference perhaps to cover merchant seamen. I know I have had requests with respect to certain personnel in the women's service who are not covered by veterans' preference at the present time. I think that at least that should be studied by some committee. I am not prepared to say what stand they should take, but I believe that a committee might have served a useful purpose. How would the parliamentary assistant explain the statements made by the Prime Minister? I believe it was the Prime Minister's intention to proceed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Before the opening of the session, it was the intention of the government to ask for the setting up of a special committee to study this matter. After the house met, it was found that many committees were to be set up, and it was also found that this would be a very controversial subject. It was thought that it would be in the best interests of the veterans to extend the preference as it existed rather than to reopen the whole matter. There were representations made to the government that the extent of this preference to a certain extent affected its value for individual veterans. There were also representations made that there were many who had wished to go overseas and who had been prevented by those in command of the forces here from getting overseas, and that, if the whole matter were reopened, it would be a very controversial subject because there were many cases where strong representations were made to the government that the exclusion of the preference of such and such individuals whose cases were brought to our attention was working an unfair hardship upon them. It was felt that there would not be advantage to the veterans generally to reopen the question and that this extent to which the preference had been granted after the last war had brought about some difficulties, but that on the whole it worked reasonably well and that it was perhaps well at this time to attempt to continue it in that form rather than to break new ground.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it the intention to bring down legislation to put this into effect?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Just as soon as the time of parliament can be found to do it. As matters now stand, this emergency legislation requires to be dealt with before May 15. The public is anxious to have the budget announced. The budget is ready to be announced. After the Minister of Finance presents his budget, it is usual to take a certain short adjournment for the debate on the budget. All that time will be utilized. The legislation is ready to be put before the house just as soon as the house can find the proper time for considering it.

Mr. QUELCH: It will be brought down this session?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. The legislation dealing with this preference, the legislation dealing with old age pensions and the legislation dealing with labour relations will be brought down this session just as soon as parliament has disposed of these more urgent matters.

Mr. IRVINE: Let us get at it.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not wish to labour this point. I agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the matter would have been controversial, and possibly that is the reason the government changed its mind. However, when the matter was discussed by the veterans committee last year, I do not think we came to any definite decision on it. There was an understanding that a committee would be appointed and that the matter of the civil service would be discussed later on, and for that reason the veterans committee did not deal with it conclusively. I would ask the minister this question. If a bill is brought down extending the civil service, will it include men like those of merchant marine and some others. I do not think it is necessary perhaps to have a committee to discuss this matter, but I would ask the minister if there is any intention of extending or enlarging the preference, or whether it will be left absolutely as it is at the present time.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is intended to bring down a bill granting the same preference to veterans as included in the orders in council which extend the preference to veterans of this war. It is not intended to go farther than the order in council.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I support the remarks made by the hon. member for Royal, as a member of the veterans affairs committee of last year. The committee was very busy and rushed. When this question was discussed I am quite sure I am safe in saying that the members of that committee were under the impression that a special committee would be set up this year to deal with veterans affairs, and on that basis the recommendations were passed that were quoted by the hon. member for Rosthern. It is a question that should be referred to a committee. Representations have no doubt been made to the government. It is a question of making a second group for veterans who could not leave Canada, through no fault of their own, and there is the question of merchant seamen. I believe that women who joined the armed forces should receive preference in the government service, and I should like to see the government appoint a committee to study the matter.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We are discussing the procedure to be adopted when the bill is introduced later on in the session. That is a matter that can be discussed when the bill is introduced, but it need not be discussed now.

Mr. MERRITT: We are trying to indicate to the minister, that whether or not a committee is set up, we should like him to consider, when he brings down the bill to replace the order in council, the extension of the preference in certain quarters as suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I had occasion recently, when in Vancouver, to speak to a spokesman for the merchant seamen, a student of the university of British Columbia. Although I know the department concerned has already ruled against their being put on all fours with veterans who served in the forces. I was quite unable, after talking to that man, to satisfy myself that the department was right in that decision. I could not find a proper distinction between a man who had served in a convoy, in the Atlantic, or going to Russia, and one who had served in the forces, and I believe there are many members who feel the same way on the subject.

I would urge the minister to consider a more extended bill than the one here. I am not talking about classifications but about those who would qualify as veterans under the new bill, and merchant seamen and the women's services, and one other class that has been mentioned. They are all classes that will get the support of many members.

Mr. LENNARD: I might mention the fire-fighters. I know of several instances where these men served overseas with the overseas fire-fighters and applied for positions with the federal fire-fighting services, and they were denied any right to the position because they had not had service in the armed forces overseas, although they had served with the overseas fire-fighting forces. That is one case where some consideration should be given.

Mr. PROBE: The members in this group are prepared to let these orders in council get through as they now stand, but we still have not had an explanation which appeals to me as adequate, and it looks as if this discussion might be enlarged considerably because there are groups who have made representations for inclusion in the veterans preference. We have not been satisfied by the government as to why the selection of a parliamentary committee has been decided against. I have another quotation from the Minister of Justice. It seems to me that it was a definite undertaking on the part of the government as late as February 10. The Minister of Justice said that veterans preference legislation would be introduced this session, but only after the matter had been fully discussed by a committee of this house. We are prepared to let this go through tonight as it stands, but we have not had an explanation as to why we shall not be able to discuss the matter in committee.

Mr. WRIGHT: May I ask the minister whether the legion or other veterans organizations have made representations to the government to have the matter discussed? There must be other organizations who have made representations asking to be included in the veterans preference, and I should like the minister to give a statement as to what organizations have asked.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I read a resolution that came in a few days ago dated March 27, 1947, from the army, navy and air force veterans in Canada. Among other resolutions there appears this one:

Whereas the commission on civil service salaries has recommended that veterans' appointment be modified,

Therefore be it resolved that the dominion government be requested to maintain this preference as it now stands in the statutes of this dominion.

That is the latest recommendation we have had.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is that the only resolution with regard to veterans preference? Have any other organizations made representations?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I would not say whether there have been any recommendations in previous years, but I have not had any within the last six months.

Mr. TUCKER: The Canadian Legion suggested that there be a third preference for those who saw service only in Canada, and, as the hon. member will recall, our committee considered these other suggestions and decided that further extension of the preference would whittle down the value of it for those who already had it. After careful consideration, therefore, we made our report and when we considered the final report, as the hon. member will recall, we again considered this matter and decided that we would recommend that the preference as it exists at present be continued. Immediately I heard there was a suggestion that a committee be set up again this session, I pointed out to the government that our committee had considered this matter and made a definite recommendation. I presume it was in the light of that it was thought, since there were so many committees, and since our committee had considered it and recommended the continuation of the existing preference, that perhaps it was not the desire of the members to have a further committee on the subject. I spoke to several members of the veterans committee and they suggested that a further committee would not get us any farther than we got last year. That, I think, may have had some effect on the decision of the government to continue the existing preference, because our committee did consider the matter. I remember very well saying that, unless we had some desire to go farther than the existing preference, it would be taken that that was our final recommendation in the matter, and we so reported in the final report.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I merely want to ask one question with reference to these five orders in council, which I have not examined with the care that perhaps I should have given them. Do they apply only to the civil service, or do they apply to crown companies and other kindred organizations?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Only to the civil service.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is there a veterans preference with respect to these other organizations?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Not under the Civil Service Act. I do not know whether there is under any other act, I do not think so though.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do you not think it is worthy of consideration by the proper minister?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Not when we are amending the Civil Service Act.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It seems to me that would be a very proper place to have it. Perhaps you might include in the Civil Service Act that these other persons are civil servants. In any event, may I make it merely as a suggestion to the proper minister of the government, that it might be worth while considering as to whether—it may be a fact; I am sure I do not know—the preference should not be given to other persons who are civil servants except in name only.

Mr. QUELCH: I want to admit that we were consulted at the start of the session as to whether or not we wanted a committee set up, but we felt at that time that nothing would be gained by it. As the hon. member for Rosthern has stated I think the reason is that we had representatives from the legion before us last year and they did make a recommendation regarding the second preference; but they were not at all sure whether or not they wanted that preference put into force, because they were afraid it might weaken the first preference. I felt that to have a committee at this time, without any certainty on the part of the legion whether they wanted the second preference put into force, would not get us anywhere. I think, before the government brings down new legislation, they should again consult the members of the former committee and see whether or not there has been any change in that opinion. I may say at this time that we are quite prepared to let these measures go through as they are.

Mr. WRIGHT: Speaking on behalf of this group, may I say that I know of no one in it who was on the veterans affairs committee and who was consulted by the parliamentary assistant in this matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: On the contrary. we were asked for names.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, we were asked for names of members for the committee. I am not saying, as far as we are concerned, whether we want the veterans' preference extended or not. But certainly we were given to understand that the committee was to be set up; we were asked for names of members for the committee and turned them in to the official government whip. Certainly there has been some change if the parliamentary assistant is to go around and consult those who he thinks will agree with him and not consult those who were on the committee who he thinks might disagree with him. I do not think that is a fair way of arriving at a conclusion.

Mr. TUCKER: As a matter of fact, I really did not consult anybody. Several members of the committee came to me and said, "We discussed this last year at great length, and we came to a certain conclusion. What is this idea that we are going to thresh it all over again?" I said, "Well, I will bring it to the attention of the government that we did discuss it last year and that we did make a recommendation in the matter; then, of course, they will decide what they want to do." I was not under any commission to go around and consult people. Several members of the different parties came to me and made these representations to me; then I conveyed them to the government. If I had happened to run into my hon. friend at that time, I would certainly have asked him, because I got representations from practically every party, but perhaps I did not talk to him. They came to me rather than my going to them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry to confess my ignorance, but may I ask the parliamentary assistant who has just spoken if there is any statute or order in council giving to veterans the preference in these various subsidiaries of the government, such as these crown companies, the C.B.C. and so on?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know of none. Will you correct me if I am wrong?

Mr. TUCKER: I myself do not know of any, and that is one of the reasons why our committee made the recommendation which it did make, namely that the preference be applied to employment in the crown companies under the control of the dominion government and in regard to employment in this house as well as in the civil service; the recommendation was that the preference be applied throughout in regard to all people working for the government of Canada. We made that recommendation in our committee. So far as I know, up to this date I do not think there has been any change in the law in that regard.

Mr. LENNARD: That is all the more reason why this matter should be considered. If the crown companies being operated by this government are not giving any preference to the overseas men, then it is about time they did so.

Mr. ABBOTT: They are. They always have done.

Mr. LENNARD: I know of several cases where they did not.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not say that they were not giving the preference. I said that, as far as I know, by law they were not required to give it; but I am sure that they all do give the preference in that regard.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that it should be obligatory by law, should it not?

Mr. TUCKER: That is what we recommended.

Mr. BROOKS: I wish to correct an impression which I think the hon. member for Rosthern is trying to make in the house, namely, that the members of the veterans affairs committee are responsible for this civil service committee being dropped. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave the correct reason, namely, that it was a very controversial subject and that, as far as the members of the committee were concerned, they recognized that fact. It is not because we came to any agreement at all on the civil service. I am satisfied that most members of the veterans affairs committee expected that there would be some extension, though not the extension perhaps that a good many asked for; that is, that those in Canada receive the preference. I do not think there was any great demand in the committee for that. But they did feel that there were certain branches of the service, such as the ones I mentioned before, the merchant seamen and others, which should be included in the civil service. When we were told that there would be amendments to the Civil Service Act and that there a new act would come in, we fully expected that consideration would be given to these different branches of the service. I think the hon. member for Rosthern is trying to impress on the committee that we are responsible for the matter being dropped.

Mr. MUTCH: I do not think it necessary to come to the defence of the hon. member for Rosthern. I attended as many meetings of the veterans affairs committee last year as anyone else who was a member of it, but I cannot either argue with the remarks of the last speaker or expand them, because that particular thorny question was considered in camera in that committee last year, and I shall not be the first to disclose those proceedings in it. But I am quite sure that I speak for a considerable number of the members of that committee when I differ in this respect only with the hon. member for Royal: I do not think the members of that committee expected that something would be done against their own recommendation. Probably the majority of the members of the committee were of the opinion that this particular problem, presenting the difficulties it did and having before them the diversity of opinion from the organized legion and other sources, were hopeful that the question would have a little time to resolve itself before they would be forced to come to a decision on it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall these items carry about the civil service?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

An hon. MEMBER: Call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: Which ones are carried?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I should like to make this appeal to the members of the committee. Practically all the discussion that has been taking place on the item that we called has to do with a bill which is to be brought in and should be dealt with at that time. I would suggest that the members of the committee take this book; then, when we go into committee again they will have it before them and will see exactly what the item deals with. I believe we can save a good deal of time and conduct our business much more efficiently if each member knows exactly what we are dealing with and will try to stick to those items. I make that appeal because I believe that every hon. member wishes to make some progress in getting the business through the house.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Chairman, it was necessary that we know whether this committee is to be set up before we undertook to go into the details of five orders in council. It was for that reason I believe that most of us spoke as we did.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is understood, is it, that the five orders in council headed "Civil Service Commission" are carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Orders in council P.C. 8541½; P.C. 15/1647; P.C. 16/1647; P.C. 20/6173 and P.C. 30/7500 agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 18, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADA—UNITED STATES AGREEMENT—EXCHANGE OF NOTES

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I desire to lay on the table copies of an exchange of notes between the governments of Canada and the United States regarding the modification of the Canada-United States air transport agreement of 1945.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

INCREASE OF RATIO OF LOAN TO LENDING VALUE UNDER PART I, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and more particularly; to increase the ratio of loan to lending value under part I of the act, to include under part I houses having two family housing units, of which one is to be occupied by the owner, to extend the period of amortization of home ownership and rental housing project loans to thirty years, to empower life insurance, trust and loan companies to purchase, improve and sell land to be used for residential housing developments, and to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to guarantee to such companies the return of the principal invested in such land and improvements, together with interest thereon at a rate not to exceed two per centum per annum.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PEACE TREATIES

MEETING OF FOREIGN MINISTERS AT MOSCOW—CANADA'S PART IN SETTLEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the council of foreign ministers at Moscow are about to abandon their present proceedings, perhaps, as reports indicate, to meet again in London in the summer, can the minister indicate whether there is any change in the Russian opposition to Canada's fuller participation in the peace settlements, and what are the prospects of Canada's playing a larger part at future meetings of the kind?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There has been nothing determined yet by the council of foreign ministers as to what will be the participation of the other allies in the preparation of the peace settlements for Germany and Austria. There has been some indication of willingness to have the belligerent allies, and even those who merely declared war against Germany, associated in some manner with the preparation of these settlements. The extent to which the Russian foreign minister or his deputy has been willing to go in the meetings has not yet been regarded as satisfactory by the others attending the meetings and for that reason no agreement has been reached. There is the prospect of Canada and the other belligerent allies, even the others who took no active part in the fighting but who declared war against the axis powers, being associated in some degree in the work to be done. But that degree has not been regarded by the other three foreign ministers as sufficient to justify them in accepting it.

UNITED NATIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The appointment of a select committee to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms is forecast in the speech from the throne. Can the right hon. gentleman inform the house when this committee is likely to be appointed and start functioning?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The notice of motion for the setting up of this committee, together with the terms of reference, has been ready since quite some time ago but has been withheld only because it was felt that that motion would be the occasion of lengthy debate in the house and that it would not be proper to ask the house to take up that time before we have disposed of the emergency legislation. The notice of motion is ready and will be placed on the order paper just as soon as it appears that it may be dealt with without interfering with the work of the house on the emergency legislation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MOVEMENT OF UNEMPLOYED PERSONS TO EMPLOYMENT IN OTHER AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask a question of the Minister of Labour? It arises out of a telegram I received from the president of the United Mine Workers of America in Nova Scotia. Has the minister been advised that 1,600 coal miners and their families are prepared to go to central Canada to take other employment if suitable arrangements can be made? If the minister has received that information, does his department contemplate taking any action with respect to it?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have not only received the wire but I have replied to it. The wire I received read as follows:

Phalen Local in regular session today prepared to transfer 1,600 men and their families to central in accordance with proposition—

What proposition I do not know.

Mr. KNOWLES: The one you made in the house.

Mr. MITCHELL: The telegram continues:

Advise if transportation will be paid for families.

This is the text of my reply:

In Cape Breton the programme upon which the employment service has been engaged has been to register unemployed persons for whom employment is not available in the province and who are willing and capable of taking steady employment offered in central Canada. In such instances when employment is secured and accepted the transportation of the worker to the job is being paid by the employment service. In consequence of housing difficulties employment opportunities available at the present time are for single men or in the cases with dependents, for men willing to take jobs and await removal of families until they can secure accommodation at their new location.

I should point out that it is not the policy to pay travelling expenses of families. That should be clearly understood. My reply continues:

Transportation costs will not be paid for persons who are temporarily unemployed by reason of a current strike or other work stoppage of a similar nature as there is work available for them in the local area. I want to make this clear because, as I understand, the number of 1,600 men mentioned in your wire includes men whose employment is affected by the current mining strike. The local employment officers at Glace Bay and Sydney will register unemployed persons wishing to secure employment outside the maritimes and who are eligible for transportation to the places of employment.

I would advise that each application from an unemployed person in the area for employment outside the area will be dealt with by the employment officers in the light of the policy which was outlined in the house by me on Wednesday.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the minister given consideration to the advisability of providing employment within the province rather than facilitating this drain on the population in that part of Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say to my hon. friend that in the last five years I have moved tens of thousands of people from different parts of Canada. I think it can be truthfully said that many members of this house have also moved to other locations during the war in search of employment—or seats, as my colleague suggests—because it was to their advantage. The same thing happened in Great Britain, the United States and other countries which had built up an enormous war machine during the war years. Just as we provided for the movement of population during those years it will be necessary to provide for the movement of population under present conditions. I think that is elementary; it is simple common sense. But my hon. friend can rest assured that the employment service in the maritimes will use every effort to secure employment in that area for those who are unemployed.

Mr. HAZEN: Will transportation be provided by the government to the place of employment for persons in New Brunswick who are unemployed and who are prepared to accept employment that is offered elsewhere? The minister has referred to people employed in Nova Scotia, but does the statement he made on April 16 apply only to that province? Does it include unemployed in New Brunswick?

Mr. MITCHELL: As my hon. friend is well aware, my department is not in the business of providing Cook's tours for everybody in Canada. There must be a measure of control over the situation. The policy up to the present has been to restrict the provision of transportation to areas in which the employment conditions are acute, such for instance as Vancouver a little over a year ago, and recently in the city of Windsor; also in Cape Breton. I think my hon. friend will agree that there must be some control and common sense exercised in the application of the policy.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour arising out of the answer he gave a moment ago. Does this effort to move large numbers of Nova Scotia miners mean that the government has abandoned its effort of trying to deal on the spot with this Nova Scotia coal problem? If it does not mean that, just what does it mean? The implications to me are very far reaching.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend had listened to what I said he would have had a clear understanding of what I implied, and if he will take the trouble to read Hansard tomorrow he will get the answer.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think I understood perfectly well; I repeat the question.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Does the minister propose to extend across Canada the policy of providing work for those out of work as is done in Nova Scotia?

Mr. MITCHELL: Because of the noise I did not get my hon. friend's question.

Mr. CHURCH: Does the minister propose to extend the policy across Canada which has been extended to those unemployed in Nova Scotia, or is it limited to Nova Scotia and the mines?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think anyone can accuse me of not speaking loudly enough. I think I answered that question previously. There has to be common sense in this thing. Before I came to the government I had experience in moving people at the expense of the government, particularly in the pre-war days. We picked out certain areas where the situation was difficult, such as the Cape Breton area, and Halifax, and Vancouver fifteen months ago, as I said. By the very nature of things I do not think it is financially possible for any government to bear the expense of everybody who wants to move from one place to another, and I am sure my hon. friend will see the difficulties and complications that would arise if it were made a universal policy.

Mr. CHURCH: You still have the ambassador cure for unemployment.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

NAILS

PRIORITY FOR CONSTRUCTION UNDER VETERANS LAND ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HAROLD W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): Will the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply see that builders of houses under the Veterans Land Act in the Toronto district who are unable to get nails are given priority? The act provides for priority for construction under the Veterans Land Act and for integrated building. I have a communication here on the subject which I shall be glad to submit to the minister.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): A builder under the Veterans Land Act or under integrated housing is entitled in every case to priority on nails. If he is not getting it he needs only go to the proper official in the area to have the priority implemented.

Mr. FRASER: Who is the proper authority in that area?

Mr. HOWE: It is the Toronto representative of the priorities branch of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. His name is Mr. E. K. Smith, and his office is at 371 Bay Street.

INDIAN ACT

CONVICTION OF BRITISH WAR BRIDE UNDER LIQUOR REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, last Monday I asked a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources regarding the British war bride of an Indian service man who had been convicted of an offence under the Indian Act. Is the minister now in a position to say what the government proposes to do in regard thereto?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): I promised I would give an answer to the hon. gentleman to the question he raised on April 14 regarding the status of a British war bride who was convicted of an offence under the Indian Act. This is a case in which a white woman married an Indian and consequently acquired Indian status under the provisions of the Indian Act, section 2(d)(iii). This section is the one dealing with the status of an Indian. It is clear from this definition that any woman who marries an Indian thereby assumes the status of her husband. Under section 128 of the Indian Act it is an offence for an Indian to be in possession of liquor. This woman was prosecuted for having liquor illegally in her possession and the provincial magistrate who tried the case had no option but to convict her. A minimum fine was imposed.

The Citizenship Act does not apply to this case. I have no doubt that when the special joint committee now inquiring into Indian affairs directs its attention to a revision of the act, consideration will be given to recommending amendments to deal with cases of the kind. I may add that the question of the remission of the fine in this particular case will receive consideration.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On P.C. 394.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GILLIS: No, it is not carried. I presume we are dealing with the Department of Finance, P.C. 394, anthracite coal—importation exempted from customs duty, et cetera. As I understand this order in council, it makes provision for the importation of anthracite coal duty free if it is carried by boat from the United States and deposited in any port in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. It is hard to understand why this order in council should be carried forward in view of the announcement made by the Minister of Finance in the house a few days ago that all subsidies on imported coal were discontinued. That announcement meant that in Ontario and Quebec the price of coal imported from the United States, which they largely use, has increased from $3 to $4 a ton. Coal imported into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick duty free is taken there in direct competition with the basic industry of Nova Scotia and to some extent with the basic industry of New Brunswick.

With the situation as it is at the present time in all the coal fields of the maritimes, as a maritime representative I strenuously object to retaining this order in council. In view of the struggle which is taking place there at the present time my assumption is that this order in council is retained specifically for the purpose of helping to defeat the workers who are engaged in a struggle to attain a decent standard of living. That is my assumption, and I object strenuously to it.

Without going into the merits or demerits of the strike I wish to say that yesterday in the house the Minister of Labour announced that the unemployed war veterans in the coal mining area from which I come, to the number of some 2,600, can be moved to central Canada under certain arrangements. I am questioning whether those arrangements are still in existence. I saw a statement in the Ottawa Journal of April 17 by Mr. MacLaren, of the minister's department, who administered the selective service regulations, to the effect that the machinery described yesterday in the house by the minister for removing personnel from one province to another expired on March 31 of this year.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we decided last night to try to stick to these orders in council. If the hon. member will look at the bill he will see what is before the committee.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue with you, sir, but I claim it definitely comes under this order in council, which provides for the importation of coal into those coal mining areas, and I am dealing with the question of unemployed coal miners or potential coal miners. So long as the government is ready and willing to bring in duty free and indiscriminately United States fuels which hold back the development of our own industry in that section, the question is relevant to this particular order in council.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That is, but not the question the hon. member was discussing before I intervened.

Mr. GILLIS: I am discussing unemployed miners in the coal mining areas where this coal is coming into direct competition—

Mr. MICHAUD: Is the hon. member not a free trader?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I am, but unfortunately the government is not. It has pretty well isolated the maritimes so far as trade is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. GILLIS: We never had trade in that part of the country. As I was pointing out a moment ago, my objection to the order is that it will retard that industry. The suggestion that the unemployed of Nova Scotia should be taken to other parts of Canada is not the solution. Last evening when the Minister of Labour and I got into a discussion on the question I merely stated that there were 2,200—I underestimated the number; I always do—unemployed ex-servicemen in that part of the country. Someone over here said, "Well, they won't work" and the Minister of National Revenue said "Nonsense". I told the minister I could find men if he could find the jobs. As I say, that suggestion is not a solution. The solution is the development of our own resources in that province, but that has been the solution for the last twenty-five or thirty years.

Pious people in Nova Scotia will stand up and say that a public works project should be developed, that moving people out is not the answer. I have been listening to that story by men who had responsibility in that province. I have heard it now for twenty-five or thirty years and I have come to the conclusion that it is desirable, instead of having men, women and children on the streets starving without any income, to take them to any part of the world where they may be able to establish citizenship and a standard of living for themselves. It is time for people with responsibility in the maritimes either to develop the resources of that province and put our people to work, or at least to be big enough to try to shift people to places where they will be able to get an income for themselves.

I seriously suggest that the Minister of Labour reexamine the regulations, because on that question of moving people out of the maritime provinces I do not think he has any regulations today. As I pointed out when the chairman suggested that I was out of order, I saw a statement only yesterday by Mr. MacLaren, who administered the regulations, in reference to this very question, pointing out that these regulations had expired on March 31st of this year.

Even if we did decide tomorrow to shift 2,500 people from the maritime provinces into some other part of Canada where there was employment, I do not think we have machinery to do it, and I am objecting that that machinery was not carried forward under these controls, because I think the selective service machinery during the war did a very desirable and a very good job. The people of this country were rooted, they knew where employment was, and they were assisted greatly from one part of the country to another. We have dropped these controls and are back in the hands of the boss, where he can cow, where he can pick and choose, and unless you are four feet between the eyes you cannot get a job. It militates against the ex-servicemen in the mine districts particularly.

The minister's statement yesterday was a startling one. Of some 1,200 who had volunteered to go from Cape Breton Island to the gold mines in Ontario only 260 odd could pass the necessary examination to take employment underground. What does that mean? Suppose there was plenty of employment underground in Nova Scotia, the men are still not eligible for employment, and that definitely brings them back into the realm of government responsibility, because if they went into the forces fit for war service and came back unfit for industrial service they must certainly have some pension claim.

That is about all I have to say. I would like the Minister of Justice, who is himself a Nova Scotian, to tell the house why this order in council has been carried forward, which merely means the free entry of American coal borne by water into Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, in the light of the fact that every other subsidy and regulation that was assisting American coal has been discontinued.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I should say a word on the subject, since the Department of Reconstruction and Supply has been responsible for the movement of coal over the past several years. The subsidies on coal ended on April 15 and the result has been a very sharp rise in the price of anthracite in all parts of Canada, but particularly in the maritime provinces. Ordinarily no great tonnage of anthracite is used in the maritime provinces. In Nova Scotia last year it was, I believe, about 80,000 tons. That province has depended to some extent on coke for fuel in the ordinary house furnace. The demand for steel and pig iron has increased so greatly that a new blast furnace has been opened in Cape Breton which will take the entire coke output from the steel plant for the rest of this year. Therefore the alternative fuel, coke, will not be in supply from domestic sources to the same extent as last winter. Under the circumstances, and after careful consideration, it is believed that the duty on imported anthracite which was suspended during the war years should not be reimposed at this time. We believe that the present fuel situation is abnormal, and that relief should be extended in the maritime provinces to the extent indicated in this order in council.

My hon. friend has suggested that this is a detriment to the production of coal in that province. I suggest to him that the two are not competitive. Furnaces that ordinarily use anthracite coal or coke are not suitable for bituminous coal. Therefore he is talking about a class of fuel which is not produced in the maritime provinces, except in the form of coke, and which will not be produced as coke for domestic purposes next year, because of the abnormal industrial demand for coke.

Referring to his remarks about the movement of labour from Cape Breton, the Minister of Labour is here, and he will speak for himself, but it is my understanding that it is the policy of that department to move labour from a distress area to areas where there is a shortage of labour. I am quite sure that provision for the movement of men from Cape Breton did not lapse on April 1 and that if men who are unemployed, for reasons other than being on strike, wish to take advantage of the movement, their applications will be considered in future as in the past.

Mr. GILLIS: Under what regulations can they be moved? All the orders in council you are carrying forward are here. Will the minister answer this question? The Ottawa Journal of yesterday, discussing this very question, carried a statement from Mr. MacLaren, who administered the regulations, to the effect that these regulations had expired on March 31. Is Mr. MacLaren correct?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I want the minister to answer the question. It is very pertinent.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend does not need to worry about this.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would appeal again to hon. members to deal with the items as we reach them. We may reach an item which will cover the questions the hon. member is now asking, but I would ask hon. members to discuss these items as they appear. That is necessary if we wish to make any progress.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no item in this under which I can ask the question.

Mr. HAZEN: For many years I have had a furnace in my home going during the spring, the autumn and the winter, and I cannot agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he says that the anthracite coal which comes to this country is in competition with bituminous coal from the maritimes. The bituminous coal can never take the place of anthracite coal for the heating of houses. Nor can coke ever take the place of anthracite coal. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has referred to coke taking the place of anthracite coal, but coke can never do that in the furnaces in homes and apartment houses in the maritimes, particularly in the smaller places.

Mr. BAKER: I wish to explain a situation in regard to the maritimes. As I see it, P.C. 394 is not a subsidy. It is merely taking off a tariff and continuing it off. That is what we have been asking for for years in the maritimes. For many years in southwest Nova Scotia we have been importing American anthracite coal. If we are to ship out lumber and laths we cannot have the hulls returning empty; we must bring something back. So we used to bring back anthracite. It is just a straight trade. We have built up a certain demand for anthracite. I should not think it will increase, because as a matter of fact oil is coming in. Nevertheless customers of the coal merchants who are buying anthracite today will need anthracite in the future to meet their requirements, because their heating equipment is of such a type that it must have anthracite. Naturally we use a great deal of Nova Scotia coal all over Nova Scotia. But all I can say is that P.C. 394 is helping Nova Scotians and not hindering them. I hope it will continue for all time and that some other tariffs will come off too.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did I understand the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to say that in ordinary heating boilers such as those we use in Toronto, Nova Scotia coal cannot be used?

Mr. HOWE: I should not like to generalize. It depends on the heating unit. But in a small heating unit in a small house I should presume that Nova Scotia coal would not be suitable. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South will support me in that.

Mr. GILLIS: Why not coke it?

Mr. HOWE: Coke would be all right if it is available, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is correct perhaps to a certain extent when he says that ordinary bituminous coal does not give the greatest satisfaction in the ordinary house heating boiler. But I use a good deal of Nova Scotia coal in ordinary heating boilers by putting blowers on them. As the house well knows, I have been advocating for many years that we build up a big exchange trade between Nova Scotia and Ontario, that we send them a large quantity of our goods and that they send us back coal. In years past we did buy a good deal of coal from Nova Scotia. I have forgotten what the maximum was, but I believe it was one and a half million or two million or more tons. It is some years ago now. I should not like the impression to go abroad that we cannot use Nova Scotia coal in ordinary heating boilers, because by the use of blowers we can do so, although it is not a hundred per cent satisfactory. However, we must have something to burn, and we are glad to get Nova Scotia coal when we can get it.

Mr. CHURCH: This order in council as extended shows the need for the government doing something further every year regarding coal supplies for Canada, so that it will not be necessary for us to send $58 million a year down to the Pennsylvania coal barons in order to aid and assist them. We should be expending that amount of money for coal and coke produced under the British flag, in Nova Scotia, Alberta and Wales, if necessary. That is what I proposed away back in March, 1923. The government of the day opposed it when I urged a national fuel policy, then adopted it by paying a bonus, subvention or subsidy five years later as I proposed. It was the only way to solve the problem of a national fuel supply to make provision for the extended winters, as they seem to be growing every year by two or three weeks. The people in this country have been nearly frozen this past winter, and they have been clamouring for a new policy. After the C.C.F. and their predecessors from 1923 to 1928 opposed a national policy for coal for five years, the government of the day after 1928 adopted all kinds of methods of protection by bonuses, subventions and subsidies.

I agree with P.C. 394. I hope that the small man will get some relief in his coal bills. There should be some regulation by the government; they should have this exemption from customs duties for coal, which is only a right and proper one. I hope that it will be extended not only to the small man who uses a few tons of coal but also to the retail coal merchant who has suffered a great deal during the war by not having some proper allowance—50 cents, 75 cents or $1.25 for delivering the coal, sometimes half a ton at a time. It is the poor man that needs protection under this measure.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): I think the point raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is worthy of attention from another angle. Like other Nova Scotia members, I am deeply concerned about the employment situation. As I have sat here in the house day after day and listened to the wheat question being discussed, and then on other occasions have listened to discussions about fish and coal, I wondered why a practical miner like the hon. member for Cape Breton South did not advance some constructive thought which would help to solve our coal production problem. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the reasons why the strike is going on in Cape Breton at the present time; I might be accused of favouring one side or the other. But I think I can say this without fear of getting into trouble, that it is generally recognized that the problem as it appears to the average man in the street is one of production. An industry cannot continue to produce less and less and expect to show signs of improvement; and that is the situation which has existed in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, and the maritimes in general for a long period of years. I think I can safely say, although I am trusting to my memory now, that the average unit of production per man per day has steadily declined during the past forty years, certainly back to 1901. In all lines of business—I am not talking about coal alone—you must produce in order to create employment; and it is that steady decline in the production of coal which has made employment a very difficult problem so far as our mining industries are concerned. I support the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and I am hopeful some inquiry will be made in order to find a solution to this dispute between the operators and miners of Nova Scotia, so that operations may be resumed. While the Minister of Labour is here I want to bring to the attention of the committee—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I should like to read the item: "Anthracite coal —importation exempted from customs duty." That is the item with which we are dealing, and I hope hon. members are not going to get into a discussion of the coal strike, labour relations and everything else. The question is simply whether or not we are in favour of the importations of anthracite being exempted from the payment of customs duty.

Mr. ISNOR: I quite appreciate that point, Mr. Chairman, and my next sentence will show that I am strictly in order. If a solution could be found, naturally it would affect the importation of foreign coal. My suggestion is that a study be made and possibly a scientific research centre set up in some part of Nova Scotia, with a pilot plant, to look into the possibilities of developing the by-products of our coal industry. If that were done I believe it would have a marked effect on the future of our coal operations. I am throwing out that suggestion to the cabinet, at the same time hoping the hon. member for Cape Breton South, with his knowledge of the coal industry of his own native province, will cooperate and offer some constructive suggestion which will help solve the difficulty which now exists, and which we do not want to develop to such a point that our population will have to move to other parts of Canada. We need those 1,300 men, heads of families, in our province, and I want to see them stay there.

Mr. GILLIS: May I just say this to the senior and only member for Halifax. I am surprised to hear him say I have not offered any constructive suggestions in regard to the question of employment and this matter of fuel. If he will check the records back to 1940 with the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and the fuel control board he will find that at least two small briefs have been filed, and in addition many times in this house I have made recommendations with respect to the development of that industry. I am reasonably sure that if they had been carried out we would not have the mess that exists today. As to employment, the hon. member was himself a member of the reconstruction committee—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I am answering the suggestion made by the hon. member. If the strait of Canso project had been developed, as we recommended in 1942, it would have absorbed the unemployed in that end of the country. Then you should not have closed that plate mill at Sydney, which was established during the war. These are things I suggested in the house by way of a solution to the problem, but they were not carried out.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Chairman—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ISNOR: Am I not permitted to reply to the hon. member.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I do hope hon. members will cooperate in regard to these items. The committee is now considering only the matter of the importation of anthracite coal into Canada and a continuation of its exemption from customs duty. We can get through these items in an orderly fashion if we deal with them one at a time.

Mr. BROOKS: I do not think this is a very serious item as far as the situation in the maritime provinces is concerned. Frankly I had hoped that this afternoon there might be a discussion of the coal situation in the maritime provinces, and that we might hear something from the government as to the action it intended to take to solve that serious difficulty. This item is only a matter of reducing the cost of a ton of coal by about 50 cents, and as I say, I do not think that is very serious. But we have a very serious situation in the maritimes.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, now, Mr. Chairman, so far this afternoon everyone has discussed this question to some extent.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. It is a well known rule that speeches in committee must be relevant to the item under discussion. Anything the hon. member has to say in connection with this particular item is quite in order, but it is not in order to discuss other matters.

Mr. BROOKS: I have listened to those who have spoken so far this afternoon, and I do not think one hon. member has made a speech strictly relevant to this particular item. I am simply claiming the right other hon. members have exercised.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Then I want to appeal to the hon. member to set a good example and keep his remarks relevant to the item.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have something to say on this which I can reserve until another occasion.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to ask a question on a different matter, since I think this question is bound to arouse discussion every time it comes up. Would it not be more appropriate if this item were made an amendment to the customs tariff rather than left under an emergency order in council? Is that not the proper way to deal with a question of this kind; and is it contemplated that an amendment will be made in this year's budget to take care of the situation?

Mr. HOWE: We are discussing emergency legislation; it is not the purpose to determine permanent policy. The proper place to deal with that—

Mr. FULTON: But this has been the policy since 1942. If it is to be continued in future, as would appear to be likely, I am only asking whether it would not be necessary to continue it by way of amendment to the customs tariff.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so. If any permanent change is contemplated in the duty, it should be made by an item in the tariff. This policy has been in operation for the past several years, and it is not intended to remove this exemption at the moment. I should not like anyone to infer that it will be continued throughout the full year; it may be taken off at any time, like any other emergency legislation. It is being continued as emergency legislation because no decision has been reached as to its permanency.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am sorry this discussion has been unduly curtailed, Mr. Chairman, but as far as I can I want to comply with your ruling on this very important subject. In the main I am in agreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I am in favour of the retention of this order in council, which is applicable to a limited importation of anthracite coal, at least until the termination of the strike. In any case it is not a very important item. The question of a fuel policy for this country was raised some years ago, and at that time a duty was placed upon imported anthracite. Under this order in council that duty has been cancelled, and I presume that policy will remain operative until this order in council is terminated. There is also the question of subventions, and the matter of subsidies on coke. In that connection I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South and to some extent disagree with the hon. member for St. John-Albert. I believe our native fuel and the coke made therefrom to some extent is in competition with anthracite coal imported into this country. Some years ago the federal government gave assistance by way of subsidy on the production of coke containing a percentage of Nova Scotia coal, and to a certain extent that coke replaced anthracite coal imported into this country. I am going to agree to the retention of this order in council on behalf of the consumers, householders and industries, who are the forgotten factors, in the maritime provinces, though it affects them to only a limited extent.

There are three parties concerned in the production and use of coal, and one of these is the miner. I am in sympathy with the desire of the miners to obtain the wage recommended by the Carroll report but I regret that they did not take my advice, go back to work and sit around a table to see whether production could not be increased. I am in disagreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South because he advocated that they do not go back to work.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I think the hon. member for Royal appreciated the fact that he did not keep to the point at issue, and I would appeal to the hon. member who now has the floor to follow the lead set by the hon. member for Royal and deal with the specific item before the committee.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member just stated that I recommended in the present dispute that the men do not go back to work.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: That statement is absolutely incorrect, and I have the right to correct it. There is no place, either on or off the record, where I made any recommendation either for or against that. That is not my business.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. member speaking on a question of privilege?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I am speaking on a question of privilege with respect to the statement that has been made. That is not my business; that is the business of the union and the industry. I spoke merely on the merits or demerits of the dispute, and I stated my opinion. I never have believed in strikes and I did everything I could to solve this one, but what they do is entirely their business.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): On a question of privilege and replying to the hon. member, I should like to quote a few lines from his speech.

Mr. GILLIS: Quote at least a sentence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Surely I have the right to answer the hon. member. Here is what the hon. member said on February 19, as reported on page 581 of Hansard:

> I am convinced that the $1.40 a day will have to be provided by subsidy from the federal government. I say that because I believe the mine workers were well advised to refuse to accept $1 a day contingent upon increased production.

That is where I disagree with the hon. member, and I wish to go on record as a matter of privilege. This matter of coal production and the stoppage of work in the maritime provinces is of such importance that a discussion regarding it should not be curtailed as it is being curtailed.

Mr. GILLIS: Should the men work for nothing?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am in favour of their getting an increase and I believe they would have got an increase if they had gone back to work and showed a sense of responsibility with regard to production. I was in Springhill, the second largest coal mining field over the week-end and every man I met and their leaders said that they believe that they could give the desired production to warrant the increase. They would send representatives for the men in to confer—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would remind hon. members of the committee that Monday is set apart for the discussion of such matters. Let us deal with this item.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On a point of order, is this discussion not perfectly proper? The reason for amending the statute in question, the customs tariff, is the existence of an emergency. Otherwise this legislation could not be justified. The discussion has to do with the question of the emergency, and as such I suggest that the widest possible latitude should be allowed under this section. In order to justify the continuance of this order in council the government relies upon that portion of the preamble which states that there is an emergency which necessitates the continuance of this order in council. The discussion that has taken place has to do with that emergency, as to whether or not there is in fact an emergency and as to what course should be followed as an alternative to the order in council. Such a discussion, particularly at a time when apparently it is of very great moment because it affects the people not only the maritimes but of Canada in general, should not be unnecessarily curtailed.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: In answer to the hon. member I would say that I would much rather be fair to every member of the committee than rigidly to enforce the rule. I think every member of this committee expects the Chair to give direction and to try to enforce the rules of the house. After that the chairman is in the hands of the committee. I believe if you want to make progress with these items, and there are a great number of them, if you want to get on with the other business of this session we should try to deal specifically with the items.

Mr. HACKETT: Just a word. It has been contended that there is an emergency. The government has held that view throughout and has put the house into that position by a majority vote of its followers. It is either one of two things: if there be an emergency, it would seem to me that the discussion is eminently relevant ; if there be no emergency, and that is our contention, then the order in council should not endure further.

Mr. MICHAUD: From the remarks that have just been made it would appear that the question we have to decide here is whether or not there is an emergency to warrant the retention of this order in council. There are only two things to do. Either we should approve this order in council and agree to continue it, or, as an alternative, an amendment should be moved to have it deleted.

Mr. FLEMING: It would not be in order.

Mr. HACKETT: You would lose your bill if you did that.

Mr. MICHAUD: If any hon. gentlemen are opposed to it, I submit that they should move an amendment, and then we can proceed to deal with another one.

P.C. 394 agreed to on division.

P.C. 8042 and P.C. 9058 agreed to.

On P.C. 9781.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am wholly in accord with the purpose of this order in council, which is to retain on the free tariff list certain well drilling machinery and pipe. My only regret is that this provision is not included in the regular tariff schedule. I should like to ask the minister if there is any reason why it should not be included in the regular tariff schedule and whether that might be done when we are considering the budget this year, rather than continuing it on a temporary basis with the result that the people engaged in oil well drilling are never sure of where they stand.

The second question I should like to ask the minister is whether the definition of machinery, apparatus and so forth is wide enough to include a piece of apparatus known as a heater treater. This piece of apparatus is used in the plains area of Alberta and Saskatchewan to treat low gravity oils secured from the wells in that area. When these oils come from the wells they are mixed with water and sand and in order to ship the oil, particularly in the winter time, it is necessary to run it through this heater treater which removes the water and sand. This piece of apparatus is essential to the profitable operation of the plains area oil wells.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member's first question was whether there is any reason why this should not go into the general tariff. I am not able to answer that question. All I can say is that I shall draw his representations to the attention of the Minister of Finance. Unless it is affected by this bill it will lapse. I presume the Minister of Finance would have no objection to giving consideration at the appropriate time to its inclusion in the tariff. Further than that I can give the hon. gentleman no information. His second question is one which can only be answered by the appropriate officials of the Department of National Revenue. The matter is one of interpretation. Whether the language used includes heater treaters I am unable to say.

Mr. HARKNESS: I think we should get that interpretation from the officials before we dispose of this item. If this particular piece of apparatus is not included in this provision I should like to move an amendment to add the words "heater treater" after "drilling mud". I see that the order in council has been amended by adding "drilling mud" after "All machinery and apparatus" and so forth. Apparently under the interpretation which had been placed on this paragraph, drilling mud was not included and it was recognized that it should be included, therefore those words were added. If heater treater is not included in the interpretation we should specifically put it in. I would therefore ask that this order in council stand until we get that interpretation.

Mr. JAENICKE: My observations will be somewhat different from those made by the hon. member for Calgary East. I note that the order in council when first issued in February, 1943, provided for the entry duty free of this machinery and apparatus to be used exclusively in exploratory or discovery work in connection with the production of oil and oil wells or water wells; also that we could import duty free pipes, piping, casing and tubing in connection with such wells including water wells. In December, 1943, the order in council was amended and the provision for the importation of duty free apparatus used in connection with water wells was taken out. The apparatus and piping and tubing used for water wells is as important as that used for oil wells, specially in my constituency where there is a large area of excellent grain growing land but without water, which can only be got by digging wells hundreds of feet down into the ground. As the order stands it discriminates against water wells. I would ask the minister who made the representations resulting in the change. The order in council says:

> The Minister of Finance reports that it has been represented to him that the words "or water wells" and the words "with water" should be deleted.

How much was imported duty free under this order? I should like both the quantities and the values. By whom were the importations made, and is the material imported duty free available in Canada from Canadian manufacturers. What methods are followed by the department officials to make sure that machinery and apparatus for exploratory or discovery work is used for exploratory or discovery work alone? I suggest that as this order seems to discriminate against water wells, the order in council as promulgated in February, 1943, be restored.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The item will stand, and I will get as much of the information asked for as I can and give it to the hon. gentleman and the committee later.

Item stands.

On P.C. 8528.

Mr. SINNOTT: I have here a form headed "Retail Licence Investigation" which has to be filled out and returned to the wartime prices and trade board. It is the application form that a man has to fill out who wants to go into business, but the form is so complicated that many men who want to go into business do not know whether they are coming or going or whether they will ever get into business. I tried to get a dozen of these forms to pass around among the leaders of the different parties so they would know what I was talking about, but the board sent me only one copy. I guess paper must be short there. Here are some of the questions asked on this form:

> Will you kindly forward this report to the local office of the W.P.T.B. under whose jurisdiction the above firm is located . . .

And so forth. The first thing they want to know is whether the applicant has been issued a wartime prices and trade board number. This man's answer to that would be no. Then the questionnaire goes on:

> Is retail lumber business to be carried on at above address?

His answer to that would be yes. Next:

> Is property where the retail lumber business is to be carried on owned outright or leased?

His answer to that would be, owned.

> If leased state number of years property is leased for?

His answer would be no. Next:

> State size of property.

Then it goes on with a lot of other questions.

> Have storage sheds for dry lumber been erected? If so, state floor space in number of square feet.
>
> Has office space properly equipped been provided for?
> Is there a sales staff and telephone service available to the public during all business hours?
> Is the office and sales service outlined under No. 6 located at the above address?
> How many employees will be on the company payroll?
>
> Is the following machinery to be operated, and has it been purchased? Indicate under proper heading: Ripsaw, resaw, planer, edger, sticker.
> How many trucks to be used in giving delivery service to the public?
> Have arrangements been made with suppliers for stocks as follows: Dressed lumber, finishing lumber, kiln dried lumber, hardwood flooring, mouldings, cedar shingles.

And so on. This man's application had been turned down because he did not have a licence. He thought the proper way to get into business was to write to Ottawa to get his licence. The information I got today was that he did not have the proper equipment to start up in business. If a man starting in business has to have all these things before he can start up I imagine that the small fellow will never be able to get into business. It is time that the little fellow who wants to start up in business should be given consideration and given it right away, because as I see it these restrictions are curtailing production and curtailing services which could be rendered to the people. I would ask the minister in charge of this department to take this matter into consideration and make the restrictions much less stringent than they now are.

Mr. MICHAUD: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SINNOTT: Yes.

Mr. MICHAUD: What particular clause or section is the hon. member objecting to?

Mr. SINNOTT: I am not objecting to the order; I am objecting to the retail licence investigation; I am objecting to the reason why this man's application was turned down, which was that in the first place he did not have four or five acres of land on which to store lumber, did not have a planing shop and a truck, did not have all these things. But he could get all these things provided he received a licence. It is like a man building a hotel. If he did not get a licence to build a hotel he could not build it; he would just have to sit around. This man wanted a licence, and he went about to try to get a licence to put his business in shape. I might also say that this man was not competing with any other business. He is in the little town of Whitemouth, about sixty miles from Winnipeg. He is within thirty miles of Beauséjour. His stock of lumber would not come from British Columbia but mostly from the eastern part of Manitoba, where supplies of lumber are plentiful at the present time. I cannot see any reason why he should not have his licence right away.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will see that this case is looked into by the wartime prices and trade board. Perhaps I might say a word about the necessity for what appears to be extensive requirements. As hon. members of the committee know, the price of lumber is under ceilings. There is a wholesale price ceiling and a retail price ceiling. It is important that wholesalers do not operate as retailers, because then they would have the privilege of selling up to the retail price ceiling. Consequently it is necessary to obtain a considerable amount of information about persons who are applying for retail licences.

The hon. gentleman seemed to be under the impression that all the questions would have to be answered in the affirmative before this man would be entitled to a retailer's licence. I am informed that is not so. Ordinarily there must be at least sufficient information to give reasonable assurance that he really is in business as a retailer. I will see that the question as put before the committee is examined and given prompt consideration. I will also bring to the attention of the officials the consideration presented by the hon. gentleman, namely, that there may be instances in which the licence should precede the acquisition of the necessary equipment.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The timber controller may have something to say about that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FULTON: Order in council 8528 is perhaps one of the most important of the orders in council to be dealt with under the schedule, as upon it depends the whole machinery of price control, not only price control but also rent control.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say something before he begins the remarks he intends to make with regard to this order?

Mr. FULTON: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other day the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moved an amendment to section 4. Section 4 was allowed to stand so that consideration might be given to the amendment. I did not receive a copy of the amendment, and unfortunately I did not read Hansard to see the exact wording, but I got the sense of the amendment and I thought that probably it should be reworded to give effect to the hon. gentleman's intentions. It seemed to me that if the amendment were to be accepted the wording should be something like this:

> Provided that notwithstanding anything in this section no provision of any order or regulation of the governor in council specified in the part of the schedule to this act entitled "wartime prices and trade board" shall be revoked by the governor in council unless addresses have been presented to the governor general by the Senate and the House of Commons praying that such provision be revoked.

The hon. gentleman's language was something like this: Provided that no order listed in the schedule to this act under the section headed wartime prices and trade board shall be revoked without the consent of parliament.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a little more precise, and I am advised by the legal officers that it is preferable.

Mr. KNOWLES: It has the same effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Consent in this amendment is to be given by addresses of both houses, which is a reasonable way in which consent may be granted.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will accept that; I hope the minister will do likewise.

Mr. ILSLEY: The attitude of the government to this amendment is this: We are not asking for the amendment because we expect that the orders will remain for the time that the act is in force anyway. As the law stands now the governor in council has the power to revoke them. Possibly some of them would be revoked before very long, but we have no specific intentions with regard to them. I think the proper position for us to take—and this is the position we are taking—is for hon. members to vote freely so far as the attitude of the government is concerned on the amendment if the hon. gentleman wishes to press it, and we shall take the sense of the house on it. If hon. members of the committee want that provision put in the act we have no objections; if they want it left out we have no objections. The effect will be substantially the same, we think. I should point out what the hon. gentleman himself pointed out. Even if that provision be inserted in the act, the board, of course, must be free to make such changes in the orders as they see fit. They must be free to alter maximum prices and distribution orders, revoke them and cancel them and amend them, and so on, and the policy which has been laid down will be carried on substantially as stated to the committee. So far as the proviso is concerned, if the committee would like to have it inserted in the act I am willing, but I am not proposing it, and I am not opposing it.

Mr. FULTON: Before the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre begins his remarks may I ask if it is the intention to dispose of section 4 now and return to the discussion—

Mr. ILSLEY: No. My intention was to do what I have stated, so that the possibility of that proviso being added would be kept in mind by hon. members in anything they had to say upon the provisions of the order.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I suggest this as a matter of procedure? In view of the importance of this amendment, as I see it, and in view of the position which the minister has taken, that the government is prepared to have a free vote on it, it might be well to fix a time at which we would revert to section 4 so that hon. members generally will know.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, we cannot do that.

Mr. KNOWLES: It could be done on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I cannot make an appointment with my friend on that matter. We may be a week or two or three days getting through the orders. When we get through the schedule we shall come back to the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is satisfactory. I say now, Mr. Chairman, that if the minister does decide that he would be prepared to present the amendment I shall be glad to let him do it. If not, when the time comes, I shall withdraw the amendment that I made yesterday and move instead the one which the minister has now suggested.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not expect to put myself in the position of asking this house by legislation to keep all these boards in existence after the lifetime of the act. I am not going to ask the house to do that. If the house wants to do it, it will be a tribute to the work of the board, and it will be all right with me, but I am not going to ask the house to do it.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is not the place to continue the discussion, and I will not do so, but I thank the minister for the suggested change and will move it at the proper time.

Mr. REID: Does it mean that the amendment just read, if passed by the house, provides that no regulations at present in effect under the wartime prices and trade board shall be changed until parliament meets again? Some of us are not clear on the point and I would like to know exactly what I am voting on, because there are some regulations that I would like to see done away with. I want to know whether we are to be tied up, until parliament comes back, on every regulation whether it is obnoxious or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: If this proviso is enacted, the contents of this schedule, as it is eventually passed, will remain unchanged and unchangeable until the house decided otherwise, or until the expiration of the act, whichever takes place first. But the orders made under the orders and regulations in this appendix will be subject to change if change is authorized by the orders and regulations in the appendix; otherwise the board would not be free to raise a price ceiling or remove an article from the price ceiling—

Mr. KNOWLES: Or put one back on.

Mr. ILSLEY:—or impose a price ceiling or make any one of the thousands of orders which will be necessary for the board to make in that interval.

Mr. REID: That is clear.

Mr. KNOWLES: That was clearly the intention of my amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: This proviso relates only to the wartime prices and trade board orders, to the ones under the heading "wartime prices and trade board." It does not apply to the others and I could not consent to a similar one with respect to the others.

Mr. KNOWLES: It applies to the wartime prices and trade board and leasehold regulations, all nine in that section, but to those only.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MICHAUD: If this amendment carries it means that, with regard to P.C. 8528, the government could not delete any of the sections in this order, but if the amendment does not carry it means they may at any time delete some of these sections.

Mr. ILSLEY: They may revoke them in whole or in part.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would not the acceptance of this by the government cramp its activities?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so. That is why I asked for a delay, and I am satisfied that it does not cramp the government in its plans.

Mr. KNOWLES: It indicates the feeling of the house.

Mr. LOW: Does the minister see any advantage in having such an amendment?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a matter of indifference; I do not think I do. I do not see any advantage in it. It is an affirmation of the principle that the house is insisting really that the wartime prices and trade board and certain other organizations here be authorized to remain in existence for the lifetime of the act or until parliament decides otherwise.

Mr. IRVINE: Does it not mean that the final authority is in this parliament and not in the government?

Mr. KNOWLES: With regard to the revoking of the orders.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to revoking the orders, yes.

Mr. BROWN: Does it mean that if we wanted to remove the ration on sugar it could not be done until the next parliament was convened?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It does not mean that, because under the order in council the wartime prices and trade board has power to make orders with reference to the distribution of any commodity. They may make these orders or improve, cancel or amend these orders, and that will go on. That is not affected by this, but the government could not revoke the section which authorizes the wartime prices and trade board to take that action.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am not quite sure that I appreciate the position the minister puts us in, judging from the statement he has made today. It appears that he is reserving to the wartime prices and trade board the right to change, extend or modify any regulations in regard to price control covered by these orders in council. As a minister of the crown he states that he does not wish to accept governmental responsibility in administering the policy and he is prepared to look askance at the result if this amendment is carried, restricting the power of the government but not the power of the board. If government policy stands for anything it stands, I suggest, for the government taking a definite position with regard to price control and accepting responsibility in this house. I do not think it is very good government procedure for the minister to say that the house is free, that he will hear the sentiment of the house and will accept no responsibility, that we can move an amendment if we like and he will not oppose it but that we must leave the board under these orders in council with untrammelled power. I do not think that is the procedure we should adopt in this house. The minister should either accept responsibility for the administration of wartime control, to rescind or modify any order in council, or he should say, "We are going to go the whole way and take the responsibility of getting rid of the control."

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I had not intended to say anything at this stage but I cannot sit silent any longer in view of the statements that have been made. Members of the Progressive Conservative party have been shouting for weeks about too much power being granted the government. They have made speech after speech deploring the wide powers the government wants, and today they are asking that we hand over power to the government to wash out the board whenever it feels like it. We are trying to keep that power in parliament where it belongs. I would ask my hon. friends to preserve a sense of proportion.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are more confused than ever.

Mr. FULTON: Presumably the discussion takes place now on P.C. 8528, and with respect to what the minister has said, as to being prepared neither to accept nor to oppose an amendment but to let it go through on a free vote, I do not think it alters what I have to say touching this particular order because it does not, at the moment at any rate, detract from or add to the powers of control given the wartime prices and trade board. That is the point I wish to deal with.

I begin by saying that this is perhaps the most important order in the whole schedule. What I have in mind is that it is the one order upon which depend the powers given the wartime prices and trade board to control prices and make rental control regulations. If this order is amended substantially or is cancelled, then not only do all the price ceilings fall by the board but rent control would go too, because it is the wartime prices and trade board that administers rental control. I think therefore that in suggesting, as I intend to do shortly, an amendment to this particular order, it is important that I should indicate first the attitude which I think we should take to this question of control, and the extent to which the amendment I shall propose will go in interfering with or suspending or perhaps removing the power of control.

Briefly I propose to move an amendment to take one step in the direction of restoring freedom without, as I shall try to point out, cutting away altogether the power of control during the period of emergency. For the purpose of this argument I think we must accept the position that the house by its vote on the second reading has adopted the principle of the bill and suggested that there is an emergency and that therefore a measure of control is necessary.

I do not intend to go back and open up that whole ground again. On the other hand, in what I have to say, I should like it to be clearly understood that personally I do not accept the doctrine of emergency or the idea that we should continue these controls. My own inclination would be not to go that far. But I shall try to make my argument and my amendment in the light of the fact that the house as a whole has accepted that proposition. In rising to move this amendment and therefore to say a word or two about controls, the position which I take is that controls are and must be a restriction of freedom, that what we should do and what I hope to do by this amendment, is to restore, not only to parliament but to the individual within the country, some measure of freedom and of the basis of his freedom which, as I see it, is the rule of law; in other words, to cut down upon autocratic rule or to use a word which I do not use very often, bureaucratic rule, and to restore the rule of law, because it seems to me that not only do controls limit economic freedom but they must inevitably limit personal freedom.

Dealing with the question of economic freedom and the effect of controls on the economic life of the individual, I should like here to refer to something which was said in this house in 1945 by a member of the C.C.F. party. Speaking of the effect of controls upon, not big business, but little business—the individual man—the hon. member for Skeena in the course of a lengthy speech had this to say as reported at page 698 of Hansard on October 2, 1945:

> The process that we see will end up with the state ultimately becoming the sole capitalist . . . The government recognizes that a crisis is still with us and this crisis will continue with us as the years go by; therefore we are going to see the absolute continuation of government control within private industry.

The reason I refer to this speech is that it was significant because it was made by a member of the C.C.F., a party which advocates the continuation of controls, and yet the party which says, when we speak of the removal of controls, that we are adopting a position favourable exclusively to big business, a party which represents itself as advocating the interests of the small man as against big business. And yet this member of the party talking about the effect of controls, went on to say:

> It is interesting to me to see what is happening to the social groupings because of those price controls.

I am here omitting a portion of his speech but it can be found in Hansard, and I submit that I am not distorting his speech. He said:

> Consequently we are seeing the liquidation of the small trading class . . . Such groups as can be seen to the left, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit party, are an expression of protest from the small middle class, such as the small working class . . . From the point of view of a socialist I would say, more power to the government, because it is hoisting itself with its own petard.

What he meant there, taken from the context, is that the government by these controls is driving the little man out of operation, is oppressing him, favouring the big man, and that all these little men, in his view of the situation, come into the C.C.F., the socialist party. That is a member of the C.C.F. speaking about the effect of controls.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You are doing a lot of your own interpreting.

Mr. FULTON: I said that any members who wanted to could read the speech in Hansard. If they can get any other meaning from it they are welcome to do so and perhaps to answer; because the confusion brought into this debate by the C.C.F. perhaps does need a good deal of clearing up. In advocating the elimination of controls or now the lessening of controls, in spite of what was said about us as favouring big business—and that, of course, is not true—we are trying to do what we think will enable the small man, the man trying to get into business for himself now, better to do so. That is on the economic side. I said, when I last spoke on this subject, that I was not one who advocated going back to the economic imperialism of the pre-thirties, and we have a well reasoned policy which would prevent that economic imperialism from coming back.

An hon. MEMBER: What is it?

Mr. FULTON: We shall be glad to deal with the question later. I do not wish at the moment to deal with it because, as I said, I wish to confine myself to the picture as we have it at the moment.

Mr. MICHAUD: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. FULTON: Yes.

Mr. MICHAUD: In order to ascertain whether or not he is speaking out of turn, will the hon. member give us the substance of his amendment? That would help a great deal in the discussion. He says he is proposing an amendment. I suppose he should have considerable latitude; but the other day, under similar circumstances, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was asked to give the substance of his amendment in order to enable the other members of the house to follow the discussion more intelligently.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, I sometimes doubt whether anything one said would enable certain members to follow the discussion intelligently.

Mr. MICHAUD: Speak for yourself.

Mr. FULTON: I will give the substance of my amendment. My amendment has to do with the lessening of what I may call the bureaucratic powers at the moment possessed by the wartime prices and trade board under this order in council; and I am coming to that part of my speech immediately. I wanted to give what I felt was the economic background of the thing. I wish to speak of the political background. I shall come to that eventually and then move my amendment. The point in my mind here is that the administration of controls, the enforcement of controls, inevitably involves the cutting down of democratic freedom, the lessening of political democracy, in my submission, as well as economic democracy.

Having dealt with the economic side of it, I wish now to come to the political side, and that is the point I wish to make here. Again we find confusion. We find the C.C.F. and ourselves saying that we believe in democracy; yet one says that democracy can best be served by controls and the other says that democracy can best be served by freedom, by eliminating controls. It seems to me then that we must be in disagreement as to what we mean by democracy, because certainly we both know what we mean by controls. We find that under controls—and this is the point which the C.C.F. party I think agrees with—inevitably the right of the individual to have recourse to the courts, to assert his freedom, is denied; because if, as a part of the plan, the individual must be forced to do this or that economic or personal action, then of course he cannot be free to go to the court and say, "I should not be forced to do this or that, or to take this or that step." If your plan is to work, you must curtail the rights of the individual. It seems to me that controls cannot work otherwise. Indeed it seems to me that at the moment the trouble with the control policy of the government, or the stage at which it has arrived, is that it is only half a plan. It is half control and half decontrol and neither half is working. That is why we say the sooner you get rid of it, the better.

But to revert again to the question of political democracy and its abrogation by controls, I should like to read what they said in Great Britain on March 3, when they were dealing with the passage of two important bills over there, two important planning measures introduced by the Labour government. The government found it necessary, in order to get those measures through the house, to make a vast change in the procedure of the House of Commons in Great Britain.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. My point relates to the ruling you have quoted a good number of times, as to whether or not discussion in committee must be strictly relevant to the item before us. I want to make it perfectly clear that we of this group are not opposed to this kind of argument; we like it, but I want to make it clear also that if it is allowed by one group it will have to be permitted to others, and we shall expect to be able to reply. I have no objection to discussing the whole philosophy of controls, and the whole question of political and economic democracy; I should be glad to go into it for days on end; but if the rule is to be applied at some point and we are to be required to make our remarks relevant to the wartime prices and trade board, then it seems to me that this would be a good place to start.

Mr. FULTON: If I may speak to the point of order, the section of the order I wish to amend is paragraph 15, to be found at page 28 of the consolidated orders in council. The subsections of this paragraph restrict the right of the individual to appeal to the courts against actions taken by the board and officials thereof. At the moment I am trying to develop a case in support of my amendment, to show that, unless this section is deleted, the rights of the individual are abrogated, and that in order to restore them it is necessary to delete this section. That, I think, involves a good deal of argument as to whether or not this kind of democratic freedom should be preserved. Undoubtedly members of the C.C.F. party would say it is more important that controls be maintained and that this freedom be suspended for the time being. That would be their answer to that argument; therefore they would not support my amendment. My argument at the moment is directed toward showing that it is more important that this type of freedom be preserved than that it be taken away. In illustrating my argument, I am referring to the sort of thing that goes on in Great Britain, to show that if you make controls the thing to follow you do interfere with personal and political freedom, whereas if you put personal and political freedom first you would be willing to accept a limitation upon controls. That is what my argument is directed to.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on whether or not we are to range over the whole field of philosophy or stick to the point before us.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quite correct and proper. I rather hesitated to interrupt the hon. member; but, after all, I think he was discussing the principle of this bill, which was decided on second reading. If the hon. gentleman would state or move his amendment and then deal with it, perhaps he would be more in order; but I think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. FULTON: I suppose it is immaterial whether one moves an amendment first and deals with it afterwards or deals with it first and then moves it, but I should be glad to move the amendment now, or to read it to you. It is as follows:

That order in council No. 8528, as specified at page 3 in the schedule with amendments, be further amended by deleting therefrom sections (1) and (2) of paragraph 15.

I move that amendment because, as I have said, the house has accepted the principle that there should be controls. I do not believe this amendment in any way conflicts with that principle, though I may have my own personal reservations on that point. The amendment goes only to the methods of enforcing the controls. The hon. member for Lake Centre has dealt with that question in far more eloquent and effective terms than I could possibly use, so that I need not repeat his arguments. I should like to read the two subsections in question, however, so that the committee itself can make up its mind as to their effect. Section 15(1) reads:

No member of the board and no administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting on behalf of or under authority of the board shall be or become liable to any person for or in respect of any act or omission of himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations or any regulations for which these regulations are substituted or otherwise conferred or imposed by the governor in council.

Therefore this subsection preserves a member of the board absolutely inviolate from any action brought against him by any individual who feels himself aggrieved by some action by that member of the board in the purported exercise of his power. Then, as though the restriction of action were not sufficiently complete, subsection 2 puts it the other way around. Subsection 1 says that the member of the board shall not be liable for any wrongful conduct in the exercise of his authority. Subsection 2 goes at it the other way and says that in any event no individual shall have any right to bring an action against any member of the board. It reads:

No proceedings by way of injunction, mandatory order, mandamus, prohibition, certiorari or otherwise shall be instituted against any member of the board, administrator or other person for or in respect of any act or omission of himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations or any regulations for which these regulations are substituted or otherwise conferred or imposed by the governor in council.

There, under these two clauses, you have the most complete preservation of the officials of the board against action in the courts at the instance of a person who feels himself to be aggrieved by their actions.

Mr. HACKETT: Complete immunity.

Mr. FULTON: Complete immunity is perhaps an inadequate description. It is putting the members of this board in a position in which, as far as I know, no one except the king himself has been placed in this country, under the legal fiction that the king can do no wrong. But even the king, under the procedure in the exchequer court, usually grants his subjects permission to sue him. The wartime prices and trade board does not grant the Canadian people that right. This amendment does not take away any actual power to control or make regulations or to impose price ceilings or rental ceilings. All it does is to restore to the Canadian citizen, if he is aggrieved in his person or in his property by those ceilings or by any administrator's order made thereunder, the right to appeal to the courts to preserve his right.

It may be said that, if he is given that right, they might perhaps upset the whole effect the board is trying to get at. I do not think that necessarily follows, because if you give the board the power to impose ceilings, then the courts must interpret the regulation, which is now to have the force of a statute, as the desire of the people of Canada to give the board power to make ceilings; and provided that is all it does, the courts will not question it. But if, in the imposing of those ceilings, such imposition and the regulations thereunder by some wrongful action damage a person in his property or in his individual person, then it is only proper that he should have the right of recourse against the board, and against the official of the board. Particularly it is proper that the individual Canadian citizen should have the right to bring action against a member of the board who is abusing his power. At the moment, apart from any question of expediency or right or wrong, or whether it is right or wrong to have controls, a member of the board could abuse his power, because the section says "in the exercise or purported exercise of any power" he is immune from action. That permits a tremendous abuse and, in my view, there can be no justification for the continuation of that power two years after the war.

I think we have here an example of bureaucratic power. It may be said, and probably with justification, that the majority of the members of the wartime prices and trade board are hardworking, honest and efficient officials. Personally I have never questioned that; but, since they are bureaucratic powers, I do not see how anyone reading this section can deny that they are powers which are not necessary. They are powers which a minor official of the board, one not subject to the control or at least immediate check by the minister or by the chairman of the board, can easily abuse. It is not fair to the Canadian people to put them in the position where they have no recourse against, not only the chairman of the board and the board itself, but also local officials to whom power is delegated.

I do not want to cover the whole field, particularly in view of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I did not intend to do so at the outset. I think this is a most important question in connection with the whole general matter of control. I should like to read what the Prime Minister had to say with regard to the creation of a bureaucracy and the dangers of exercising a bureaucracy and the limitations which should be imposed on it. Speaking on April 19, 1934, as reported on page 2334 of Hansard, in connection with another control measure, the Prime Minister directed the following remarks against the members of the C.C.F. party:

> My hon. friend all the time, even in his speech this afternoon, argues for the extension of state functions. How can you have an extension of state functions, let me ask him, without the creation of a bureaucracy? That is of the very essence of it. How can you possibly extend the functions of the state without creating a bureaucracy, and how can this bureaucracy carry out its functions except by the power of might, which is force, and which is always the power behind government and authority when it attempts to administer public affairs by a large extension of state functions? That is the answer I make to my hon. friend and to the members of his party.

He went on to say:

> But the whole essence of the socialist state is founded on that, and my hon. friend knows it. No one knows it better than he does.

And again:

> . . . he knows that Cole has said that the socialistic state will have to have a bureaucracy and be maintained by force.

The decision of the house has been that we shall continue controls, and it seems to me that the only method by which they can be continued is by a bureaucracy. Call it anything you will, it is an extension of state functions or an extension of state planning and control which the Prime Minister himself has said is an undesirable thing. If we are to have it even for a period of one year would it not be desirable to limit the undesirable aspects of that state functioning, of that bureaucracy, in so far as it is possible to do so without rendering the thing ineffective? I suggest that the amendment proposed this afternoon to give the individual who is wronged by abuse of the power of the board the right of recourse to the courts cannot be objected to.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member has referred to the provisions of section 15, subsections 1 and 2, which prohibit the right of action against members of the board, administrators, et cetera, but would he state whether he believes that other government officials and civil servants should be liable for acts which they perform in the usual course of their duties?

Mr. FULTON: Not personally. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that if a member of the civil service, in the course of his bona fide administrative duty injures anyone, he is not personally liable. But what we have here is an entirely different situation. You can bring an action in court to restrain that official from proceeding with the abuse of his power or to restrain him from carrying on a proceeding, but under this section the members of the board and their officials are given immunities which ordinary civil servants do not have. The individual is prevented from going to court to ask the court to issue an injunction preventing the carrying out or the continuance of the abuse of these powers. The ordinary civil servant is not protected in the abuse of his powers, but the members of the wartime prices and trade board and the officials to whom powers are delegated are protected even though they abuse their powers.

Mr. BROWN: Where does it say that?

Mr. FULTON: I have read the sections and I am not going to read them again. The particular words are "in the exercise or purported exercise of any power."

Mr. MITCHELL: Does the hon. member not think the chairman of the board or the minister involved would correct any flagrant abuse of power?

Mr. FULTON: He might, and then again he might never find out about it. The point is that the immunity is there; it is not necessary and it is an undesirable thing to have. The other night the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us how benevolent, how almost paternalistic this government was, but not all governments may be that good. The Minister of Labour may not always be there, and I sincerely hope he will not always be there. I have reason to believe that that will be the case.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will be here longer than you will be.

Mr. FULTON: Not unless you join this party. This party is going over there in the next two or three years, so that if you want to stay there you will have to change your mind. However it is not my desire to be sidetracked. I said at the outset that I would try to present my argument in a short space of time. I have been interrupted to some extent by the points of order that have been raised, but I hope I have made my position clear. I go back once more to what the Minister of Justice said in 1934 when he was dealing with a somewhat similar matter. He said that he did not think that we as members of parliament should entrust to the government powers which were wider than were necessary to carry out a desirable purpose. If he is of the same mind today—and I hope he is—I trust he will see no reason why he should not accept this amendment.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Before the minister speaks, may I say that it would be wise for any member of the committee who is moving an amendment to have copies for the minister and for the leaders of the other groups.

Mr. ILSLEY: This section has been referred to, not only by the hon. member for Kamloops but by the hon. member for Lake Centre, during the debate on this measure. I have made some inquiry about the section, the reason for it, and what the experience has been under it, and I should like to say something to the committee. This section was written into the order in council at an early stage in the war, at a time when it was sought to get as good men as possible in the employ of the wartime prices and trade board, men who would be called upon to discharge disagreeable duties which would cause immense resentment and which would interfere with the ordinary established course of the conduct of business. Naturally they considered a situation such as this where they would be or might be exposed to a large number of vexatious actions, both because their reputations would suffer somewhat and because of the interruption there would be in their duties. So this section, against which a strong theoretical case can be made, and has been made, was written into the order. I have made inquiries whether this section has been abused and I am informed that there is no evidence of any abuse of the section. There has been no complaint from business or from persons who have seen the section in operation. Notwithstanding that fact, it is pretty hard to deny that the section goes too far, and I am going to suggest for the consideration of the committee some alterations in this section. It will undoubtedly be contended by the hon. member for Kamloops and others that the section should be deleted entirely.

Mr. FULTON: The first two sections.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 15 (1) and (2). But if the section is deleted entirely the officers of the board will be exposed to proceedings by way of injunction or other proceedings of the type mentioned in section 15 (2). That is a consequence of the deletion of the section which they fear would be serious, more serious than changes to section 15 (1). Certain actions have been brought by way of injunction, and under the practice in the common law provinces at least—I do not know what the practice is in the province of Quebec—it is not too difficult to obtain an injunction for a few days. An injunction is applied for ex parte and the plaintiff takes in an affidavit and gets a restraining order for a while; four or five days it used to be in Nova Scotia. Notice is given to the other side and the question arises whether the injunction should be continued until the trial. But that period of a few days is extremely serious in some situations with which the board has to deal. It would mean that the thing that must be done from the point of view of law enforcement cannot be done if those few days of breathing space are given. Regardless of the merits of the case, and the board may have had the very best case in the world—

Mr. FULTON: If the minister can show that that is so, I think it would be an unanswerable argument, but I cannot visualize circumstances in which some serious consequences would follow through the board's not being able to take action for four or five days. Can the minister give us an illustration of the sort of serious situation that might arise through that delay?

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me take this case, and I hope my facts will be accurate; they will be nearly so at any rate. In July, 1946, the price ceiling was suspended on jute bags, among a number of other articles. As soon as the price ceiling was suspended, hoarded supplies of jute bags emerged and were placed on the market under conditions of an acute shortage at an extremely high price, a fifty per cent increase at least over the ceiling price that had been in effect. The persons who use those bags in their business immediately descended on the board and said that this profiteering, the result of speculation and guessing that the ceiling would be removed one of these days when a condition of scarcity could be taken advantage of, must end. Jute bags, although it does not sound imposing, are an important article of commerce, so that the ceiling was reimposed and the price put back to where it was before.

Mr. HACKETT: And the source of supply dried up.

Mr. ILSLEY: The bags were out at that time. Had it been possible for the dealers to have tied up the board by an action for just a few days those bags would have disappeared in every direction at fifty per cent or more above the ceiling price. That is one instance of what might happen.

An injunction was applied for in one case in British Columbia. It was alleged that the legislation was ultra vires or something of that kind and that, notwithstanding this provision, an injunction lay. That was an injunction to prevent any interference with the disposition of used cars at prices above the ceiling price. That action failed because the validity of the legislation was upheld. I have not traced the consequences. The consequences may not have been so serious in that case, because used cars would be such a commodity that not very much might happen in that interim, but we may have to deal with not just an interim period but up to the time of trial.

The officials feel that the remedy of injunction is an inappropriate remedy because the consequences may be serious. That does not mean that there should not be an action for damages in proper cases. There is no doubt that there should not be complete immunity for the officers of the board, and I agree to that extent with hon. gentlemen who have raised this point.

The question I have to try to answer is how far we can go in this system, which is not our normal system, in applying all the normal rules without destroying the effectiveness of the system. I am going to suggest an amendment to section 15 (1) for the consideration of the committee and invite their views upon it. I am not moving it at the moment. I am just putting it before the committee for their consideration:

That section 15 (1) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"15(1) No member of the board, administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting on behalf of or under the authority of the board shall be liable for any act or omission in the exercise or performance or purported exercise or performance, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, of any power, discretion, authority or duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations."

That leaves the word "purported" in there. If we take that out entirely it means that there may be actions where these officials, in the discharge of very difficult obligations, may go over the line a little in the interpretation of the regulations. But if we provide that, so long as they do it in good faith and on reasonable grounds it would be for the court to decide whether they have a good defence. At the moment it seems to me that they are not getting more protection than the law should give them for the period of this act. Under the criminal law I understand, although I have not the section before me, that protection very similar to this is given to certain police officers who may make an arrest which they have not the right to make; but so long as they proceed on the reasonable and probable ground of good faith they are protected against action, even though they make an arrest without warrant. That is what I propose with regard to that section.

With regard to subsection 2, I do not want to give up the prohibition against injunction unless the overwhelming feeling of the committee is that we should do so, because the officials attach very much importance to it. There are certain changes which should be made in that subsection. I would suggest that it be altered to read in this way:

No proceedings by way of injunction, mandatory order, mandamus, prohibition or certiorari, shall be instituted against any member of the board, administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting on behalf of or under the authority of the board for or in respect of any act or omission of himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations or otherwise heretofore conferred or imposed by the governor in council.

Two or three changes have been made in the section. I think more by inadvertence than anything else the section was drafted in unreasonable terms. The words "or otherwise" in the second line of the subsection clearly should come out, and it should be made clear that there is no power vested in the governor in council to confer further duties upon the board; that it is solely the duties which have been heretofore imposed by the board.

Mr. HACKETT: Does that mean anything more than there have been the prerogative writs in this particular case?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it does not.

Mr. HACKETT: That is the gist of it?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what we should like to see from the point of view of enforcement. Many of these sections would not remain in any permanent legislation. I would not ask that they be put in permanent legislation, but this legislation is not going to last very long. I think that to a large extent we are entitled to rely upon the record of the wartime prices and trade board and its staff. They know very well that nothing would be more shortsighted than for them to rely upon arbitrary sections as a basis for the unwarranted exercise of authority, and they have not done so. If they have done so, it has not been brought to my attention, at any rate. I think they have been most responsible in the way in which they have discharged their duties; but this is a job which peculiarly exposes them to vexatious action by disgruntled persons unless they have some protection. I would suggest that they have the degree of protection which I have proposed here, and that it is not an unreasonable degree of protection.

Mr. JAENICKE: I shall not refer to that part of the speech of the hon. member for Kamloops which dealt with different political philosophies. After all, we of this group are not the ones who are presenting this bill to parliament. But as to the other part of his speech which was relevant, I must congratulate him. He may be surprised if I tell him that I largely agreed with him. I myself had intended to propose an amendment, not to strike out both of these sections but to amend them. I may say that my thunder has been stolen in that respect by the remarks just made by the Minister of Justice. I had intended to propose that subsection 1 be amended in a manner similar to that which the Minister of Justice has proposed by using the words "good faith". In spite of what the Minister of Justice has said, and with great respect, I still do not see where we need the words, "or purported exercise or purported performance." I think the minister might see his way clear to omit these words.

With regard to subsection 2, I could not quite understand or fully grasp the amendment proposed by the minister, but I appreciate his remark with respect to an action for injunction. I cannot see where and why the right for prerogative writs are taken away. In that respect I fully support the hon. member for Kamloops. It may be that his amendment is to the effect that the prerogative writs are restored. After all, prerogative writs are for the purpose of compelling a public servant to do his duty, or for preventing him from doing anything that is illegal. I do not think this should be in the act. It has nothing to do with controls, and the act can be enforced without taking away the right to these prerogative writs.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How times do change. The other day I dealt with this particular section and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in lachrymose tones and with much breast beating, indicated that all was well; that there was no ground whatever for the objections which I raised to this particular section. Naturally it is a matter of satisfaction to find that when the Minister of Justice spoke—and both ministers spoke in my absence since I unfortunately had to leave the house at that time—he said, referring to myself, that some of my points may be very good, but he also said that he did not know whether they were or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Apparently he has reviewed the points which I raised at that time and has concluded that, so far as this section was concerned, my objections were well founded, because the point which I was endeavouring to make the other day was that in this country the right to justice should not depend on the status of the individual; that the master should enjoy no advantage at the expense of the servant, nor should the servants of the Canadian people enjoy advantage over the people as a whole, their employers.

I am quite interested to learn of the attitude taken by the hon. member for Kindersley, because, until the amendment was suggested by the Minister of Justice, there was no suggestion on his part that he would take that attitude. This is the first time there has ever been a suggestion on the part of those to my left—

Mr. JAENICKE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member knows that I rose before the Minister of Justice rose, and I was prepared to make my statement before the minister spoke.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Deathbed repentances are acceptable and appreciated.

Mr. MARTIN: And are always good for salvation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What did the minister say?

Mr. MARTIN: They help in the matter of salvation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They do, and with the assistance of my theological friend across the way may I pass that information on to the hon. member for Kindersley?

Mr. MacINNIS: Self-congratulation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to hear of the attitude taken by the hon. member for Kindersley, because this is one of the things that the opposition in Saskatchewan has been contending for with no little difficulty.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order. Before this starts, I want to know if one will be permitted to answer—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are we discussing Saskatchewan or the wartime prices and trade board?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I suggest to the hon. member for Lake Centre that he deal with the matter before us.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I am just referring—I will not continue if you do not want me to—to the wonderful change of attitude on the part of my hon. friends to the left who, for the first time, on this occasion have stated that they would in any way support measures for the protection of the subject against the autocracy of a bureaucrat.

Mr. MacINNIS: Baloney.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend speaks with authority on that. I will not argue with him there.

Mr. MacINNIS: You are an expert on it right now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I cannot, Mr. Chairman, argue with so much garrulous gabbling going on. I am glad the minister has gone as far as he has. As regards the suggested amendment, I think it does in large measure remove the objections that I raised here the other day. No one wants to stifle or to strangle the operation of the law by placing the administrative officials in a position where they cannot act, and the addition of the words "bona fide" exercise go a long way toward removing my objections to the section in question; for, as the section stood before, the officials, the administrators and the employees could do as they pleased, could act as they chose, could exceed their authority and yet be entirely immune from being brought before the courts of law. But when my right hon. friend says, of the board's operations, "Rely upon their record", that is where I disagree.

I know that in my own province certain officials of the wartime prices and trade board —and it is a fact generally across the dominion—have harried and hounded honest business men, and have acted most unfairly in catechiz-ing and interrogating individuals honestly endeavouring to carry out the law. These officials have exceeded their authority on many occasions. It is impossible for the head officials to control these employees unless the individual has the right, where excessive authority has been taken by the sub-official, to proceed against the employee. I know in the administration of ceiling prices where agents of the wartime prices and trade board have provoked the commission of offences and, having induced and provoked them, have proceeded afterwards with prosecutions.

I might refer to one particular case though it is past now. In that case—and there are many of them—an honest man was induced, as a result of solicitation over a long period of time, to break the law. The person who solicited him to sell a car over the price ceiling went to the wartime prices and trade board and advised them of the fact that this man had a car for sale, but that he was afraid to pay over the ceiling because he did not know whether he could get the excess back. The official in Saskatoon—I refer to the Kimbley case, which is known to the minister—

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not know of it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —and the wartime prices and trade board told this investigator, self-appointed, because he was not one of the officials, that they were with him, and if the sale was effected they would see to it that if he purchased the car over the price ceiling he would get back the excess, and in order to assist him marked the purchase money in advance so that if the vendor yielded to the solicitations of the purchaser, the purchaser would get back the excess. This man was afterwards proceeded against, and the conviction was upheld in the court of appeal of Saskatchewan, the judges in that court offering the sternest objection to that type of thing, the inducing of the commission of an offence and, after having induced its commission, the punishment of the wrongdoer, but having no alternative but to find the seller guilty.

That was a case where an individual who induced the commission of the offence should have been liable in the courts of law to a charge of conspiracy for the commission of an offence against the wartime prices and trade regulations.

Under the amendment proposed, I take it that any person finding himself the victim of a conspiracy may now take proceedings against these individuals, operatives if you will, who, inducing the commission of the offence by conspiracy, finally secure their desired purposes.

There is no need, in the enforcement of law, and no justification for agents provocateurs to be appointed, whose work consists in endeavouring to secure the commission of offences. Investigators, yes. But the men in the Kimbley case who operated for the wartime prices and trade board were not investigators, and the man from whom the car was purchased had never before been suspected. He was an honourable man; but, as a result of provocation, as a result, if you will, of greed induced by continuous solicitation he finally committed an offence.

That sort of thing cannot be justified, and I am pleased to find that the minister, realizing the necessity, on the one hand, of the board having necessary powers, is prepared at the same time to go as far as he is going in placing individual citizens in this country on a footing of equality before the law with the representatives of the board. Up to the present time that equality has not existed.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs seemed the other day to be under the impression that, while the conduct of the wartime prices and trade board officials may have been harsh on occasion, and unfair, nevertheless it had been good for the Canadian people. Sir, however beneficial the results may have been, there can be no justification for wrongdoing on the part of officials and investigators. I think, too, that consideration should be given to reducing the army of investigators in this country today. The latest figures I have been able to secure show that there are 766 investigators operating with a view to ascertaining the commission of offences. I do not think there is any necessity for that army of investigators, having regard to the fact that throughout this country we have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who, in a matter of a few days, can do more effective work than any such investigators.

I think, too, while I have not the latest figures, that the numbers employed today in connection with the prices board having regard to the diminution in the work consequent on decontrol, might very well be reduced. The latest figures I have give the number as 4,418.

As far as I am concerned—I do not know what the hon. member for Kamloops thinks—the amendment of the minister fairly well covers the situation, although I join with the hon. member for Kindersley in suggesting that the word "purported" should be removed, the purported exercise of authority. I agree that no proceedings by way of injunction, mandatory order, mandamus, prohibition, certiorari should be instituted against any member of the board for or in respect of any act or omission of himself in the exercise of any power, discretion or authority under the act. The use of the word "purported" makes it unnecessarily wide. It may well grant to the individual wrongdoer a protection which I am sure the minister does not want to grant. There can be no doubt today about the exercise of powers. They are set forth in the regulations. The official is either acting under those regulations or he is not. There cannot be a halfway house, that while he was not acting under them, he was purporting so to act.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Cases are not all alike. There may be different cases.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Obviously that is so.

Mr. BRUNELLE: That would justify this word.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is obviously so. If what the minister has in mind is that when an officer goes out to investigate one type of offence and during the course of the investigation ascertains another type of offence being committed, he should be protected in a case such as that, I believe that he should; because in a recent judgment in the court of appeal in England the court held that if a police officer arrested an individual for one offence, and while he was in custody took it upon himself to charge him with another offence without formal discharge and another arrest, that policeman became open to an action for false imprisonment. Up to the present time police officers have often arrested a man on a charge of vagrancy, kept him in custody for a few days and, while he was in custody, charged him with murder. The court of appeal in England has held that that no longer can be done and that a police officer is subject to damages if he arrests a man on one charge and holds him in custody, then later on changes his mind and charges another offence. If that is what the use of the word "purported" is endeavouring to get around, I am prepared to accept that. But if the word "purported" is interpreted in its ordinary sense, I think the minister is asking for too wide powers for the officials administering the regulations.

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason for the necessity of the word "purported" or some similar word is this, and I should like to have the hon. member for Kindersley direct his attention to what I am going to submit. I submit that if the word "purported" is taken out, there is no protection; because if an officer is acting in the exercise of his authority, there is no action against him. At least, that would be argued. That may not be completely so, but I think it is, that if he is acting in the exercise of his authority there is no action against him at all. This is merely to cover cases when, honestly and on reasonable grounds, an official of the board transgresses a little, goes a little beyond his authority and a case arises against him. This section gives him protection. That is subsection 1. That is the reason why, unless some word like "purported" is in there, protection is not really given; because once he got outside the bounds of the exercise of his authority he would not get any protection at all under the section if we took the word "purported" out, and that is the very case in which it is desired to give him some protection.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would this cover the situation, "purported in good faith"?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what it does do.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It does not say that.

Mr. FULTON: Subsection 2 that is spoken of by the minister does not say "in good faith".

Mr. ILSLEY: I am talking about subsection 1. When I come to subsection 2, I shall deal with it. But not only the words "in good faith" but the words "in good faith and on reasonable grounds" are used in subsection 1.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is as far as we should be asked to go. With regard to this removal of the remedy by prerogative writs, as I think they are called, or writs of certiorari or applications for injunction—

Mr. JAENICKE: I do not mean "injunction"; just prerogative writs, mandamus, prohibition and certiorari.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to those writs, what was the hon. gentleman's submission?

Mr. JAENICKE: An injunction is an ordinary writ. The others are prerogative writs.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nothing turns on the phraseology. What this section does is say that these proceedings will not lie at all against members of the board or other persons employed or appointed by the board when they are doing or purporting to do their duties; that is all. The other remedy is the remedy of damages which is preserved by subsection 1.

Mr. FULTON: Might I ask the minister a question with regard to subsection 2, in order to help us see the way clearly if we can, if I may put it in that way? We have said that we are trying to get at the best way to go about this thing, and he was kind enough to give us an illustration of why, in his opinion, it was necessary to keep subsection 2 in something like its present form. Would this meet the type of case the minister has in mind? If a ceiling is removed and a hidden supply comes on the market, then, as I see it, there would be nothing to prevent the board from reimposing the ceiling. Then all the penal clauses for selling above the ceiling would apply. There might be an injunction against seizing the goods, which would prevent that aspect of it from being enforced. Nevertheless, if the goods were sold at a price above the reimposed ceiling price, contrary to the order, if an action is brought in the court against the board and the board is upheld, then the penalty against the sale will apply and the wrongdoer can be fined and is subject to the heavy penalties that exist. I do not think it would be worth anybody's while to sell goods above the reimposed ceiling price until the action in court was disposed of, so I think that part of the minister's objection might be met. Might I suggest this solution? Since we attach considerable importance to subsection 2 as well as subsection 1 of paragraph 15, and since subsection 1 appears to have gone a long way, if I may put it in this way, toward meeting what we have in mind, could we ask that the whole thing be allowed to stand? Perhaps that will give us more time to consider whether the minister's suggestion, with perhaps some modification, would meet what we have in mind before we continue talking?

Mr. ILSLEY: All right; we will let it stand; but when my hon. friend considers it I think he will realize that to put the words "in good faith" in subsection 2 would be inappropriate, because good faith is a defence which is raised by the defendant, and would have to be proved by the defendant. What does it mean to get an injunction only in a case where there is not good faith? Does that mean the plaintiff has to produce some evidence of lack of good faith?

Mr. FULTON: What I would rather do is cut out the word "purported", which would confine him strictly to the exercise of his power, and that is the thing we are trying to do.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think removal of the word "purported" would take away the whole effect of the subsection. Here the allegation would be, and it must be in order to obtain an injunction, that the officer is acting illegally, is not in the proper exercise of his powers, there would be room for the injunction. This is only to say that this matter will not be tried summarily by injunction, and will not be stopped by an interim injunction; but if anyone thinks anything is wrong, the officer will be responsible for it under subsection 1 unless he can prove that he did it in good faith and on reasonable grounds. So I think we have improperly. If there is an allegation that he to leave the word "purported" in this second paragraph in order to keep it operative at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I just add that these provisions are not peculiar to this order. They are of more importance, perhaps, in the emergency shelter order and in one or two others. These provisions are in three or four orders, and probably the language on which we agree here will go in the others as well, so that we have to think of the significance in reference to those others. I have in mind the importance of protection in the field of emergency housing, for example, where there is danger of actions for trespass on slight provocation, because people get very angry—at least in my province they do—when matters of land or possession are involved. That is a case where we must be careful about the language we use.

There is another point I want to offer hon. members for their consideration. That is, no action against the crown is taken away by this section. This merely removes the right of action against the individual, the member or officer of the board. The crown is not ordinarily liable in tort, except under the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. HACKETT: And there you have to have a fiat.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will recommend a fiat; I can say that right now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think there is any action against the crown if there is no right against the servant of the crown. If section 15 remains in its present form there is no right of action against the servant. He cannot do wrong; and if the servant can do no wrong, certainly the master can do no wrong. I think, on reconsideration, the minister will conclude that if the individual operating on behalf of the crown commits no offence, whether he trespasses on the rights of the individual or not then certainly there could be no right of action arising therefrom against the crown, even though the Minister of Justice might grant a fiat.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member is going too far there. This does not say the agent of the crown does no wrong. It says though he does wrong, if he does it in good faith and on probable cause, he will not be liable for damages; but the Exchequer Court Act provides that if damages are caused by an agent of the crown, the crown shall be liable for them.

Mr. JAENICKE: Would the minister consider, during the dinner recess, a suggestion to take out the words "mandatory order, mandamus, prohibition, certiorari" and leave in the word "injunction"? That would make it read, "No proceeding by way of injunction shall be instituted against any member of the board."

Mr. ILSLEY: I will consider that, but I think there is the same objection to the liability to a mandamus, for example, as there is to an injunction.

Mr. JAENICKE: It is hardly likely a writ of mandamus would ever be taken out against a member of the board. I cannot imagine a circumstance under which that would be done.

Mr. BRUNELLE: What about the issuance of licences?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

WILD LIFE

PROVISION FOR JACK MINER NATIONAL WILD LIFE WEEK

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, respecting a Jack Miner national wild life week.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as an advocate of the conservation of Canada's natural resources and an opponent of their useless and needless destruction, I look upon this wild life bill as being a step in the direction of conservation because it will promote a programme of conservation in a field which has been largely neglected, that of wild life conservation, and particularly that of wild fowl such as geese, ducks and insectivorous birds. I am convinced that when the bill is in operation, as I believe it soon will be, the same results will accrue in Canada that have accrued in the United States from a similar wild life conservation programme.

Commencing on March 16 last and continuing up to and including March 22, the United States observed a national wild life week. This was the tenth anniversary week of the national wild life programme in the United States. During that week, over the radio, through the press and on a thousand and one platforms throughout the United States the people of the United States were informed by various wild life organizations, wild fowl organizations, game and fish organizations and so on, of the tremendous and beneficial results which had accrued to the nation as a result of their wild life programme. The society in the United States which promotes and which inaugurated the programme is the United States wild life federation. I am assured that in this country the Jack Miner foundation will promote and inaugurate a similar programme.

Those who are familiar with the wild life problem will remember that toward the end of the last century and the beginning of this century both the United States and Canada were greatly alarmed over the trend toward extinction of wild life. I remember when I was a young lad I read many times that the Canada goose was on its way out, that in fact it was very rare. However, thanks to the wild life federation of the United States and the programme they have carried out, which included the sending out of literature prepared by themselves and by various United States government bodies such as the wild life bureau, the insectivorous birds bureau, the wild game and fish bureau, the downward trend toward extinction of wild life in the United States was stopped, and it began to move upward until today their wild life resources are of tremendous value. I shall not weary the house with figures. Today I received from the capital of Pennsylvania a telegram signed by Seth Gordon, executive director of the Pennsylvania game commission. It is addressed to myself and reads:

> Conservationists generally throughout the United States are greatly heartened to learn that you are sponsoring a proposal to establish a wild life week in recognition of the wonderful work done by Jack Miner. We wish you every success in this worthy recognition of one of North America's pioneer conservationists.

During the course of my travels in the United States, I inquired in the different state capitals about wild life conservation measures, and I was heartened to hear everywhere that they accorded to Canada's pioneer conservationist, the late Jack Miner, a preeminent position as the originator of the whole continental wild life conservation programme. The late Jack Miner in the early days of this century made two great announcements outlining the means of stopping the downward trend toward wild life extinction. First, he said that it would be necessary to build or create sanctuaries along the lines of flight of wild fowl from their winter habitat in the south to the breeding places in the north. Second, he said that the habitats themselves should be preserved and extended.

In connection with the first, he set up his continental example. On his own farm in the beautiful county of Essex he created in the township of Gosfield, some four miles from lake Erie, the first wild life sanctuary, I am informed, created anywhere in America, and that sanctuary has been expanded until today it covers some four hundred acres of land. People come there from all over the United States to learn how to start sanctuaries, and Jack Miner lived to see the day when a line of sanctuaries stretched along the flight of the birds from the gulf of Mexico right to the Arctic ocean.

I am happy to say, Your Honour, that one of the best wild life sanctuaries in our own north country, not the far north, but still well to the north, was built by a member of this house, the hon. member who seconds this bill, himself a great conservationist of whose work this country should be proud. I refer to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette).

Jack Miner travelled extensively, inquiring into the natural habitats of the birds in the south and to the north, and to complete his information he started tagging the wild fowl, which when he commenced that work would not amount to more than perhaps half a dozen to two dozen birds; but I venture to say that on this very night there are no fewer than thirty thousand to fifty thousand wild geese flying out from Jack Miner's sanctuary to the lake, and tomorrow they will return. It is one of the greatest spectacles the eye of man can see, forty or fifty thousand geese in the sky, flying in new formations every second, truly an entrancing spectacle. It is no wonder that the national tourist bureau here in Ottawa has said that that sanctuary attracts more tourists than any other single tourist attraction in Canada. That is a credit to Canada's great naturalist, to the man who was preeminently the greatest conservator of wild life on this continent. The information he gathered through tagging the birds, putting bands on the legs of the geese, smaller bands on the ducks and still smaller bands on the insectivorous birds is most valuable, and on many occasions the United States has sent its wild life directors to gather first-hand information from Jack Miner. That was a most valuable work he did and he did it, as we all know, at his own expense. He devoted his whole lifetime to the cause of wild life conservation. It is a wonderful thing to me to see men devote their lives to building up their country as Jack Miner did as a great conservator of wild life, and in doing what he did to develop one of Canada's great resources he did a valuable work for Canada.

The United States has had some difficulty in arriving at a date on which a national wild life week shall be observed. They have had several different dates in March and in April. I believe one of the latest ones was the 14th of April, but finally they settled on the first day of spring. I am convinced, however, that when we pass this bill the great republic in due course, because of the suitability of the 10th day of April, will fall into line with us and adopt that date, so that the whole continent will be observing the same week as wild life week. I shall do my best to promote the week in which April 10 falls, the anniversary of the birthday of Jack Miner, as the week to be celebrated by all America as national wild life week.

I have received thousands of letters supporting this bill, and occasionally some people would ask me why I did not name some other prominent man, that there were other naturalists. It is true that there were. Audubon was a great naturalist. He was born in France and lived in Louisiana. I read all about him when I was in New Orleans in Audubon park, which is one of the greatest parks in the world. But his conservation was not along the same lines as Jack Miner's. Audubon was a great painter and a great promoter of preserving birds, dead birds, stuffed by taxidermists and kept in museums. Some have asked me why I did not use the name of Ernest Thompson Seton. He too is a great man, still living, I believe, and famous as a writer of stories for children on animals and birds. But Jack Miner was a conservator and in that field he was first and preeminent and has never been surpassed.

Others have asked me why I did not choose some great surgeon or scientist or theologian. It is true that these men deserve everything that we can do to commemorate their work. Take the great work of Doctor Banting, for example, which has been of untold benefit to humanity. He has been highly honoured by his native province and his country. He was granted a large donation and pension by the province of Ontario, and his country was instrumental in bestowing knighthood upon him. These men are all entitled to the honours that have come to them. They were nearly all educated in universities, but this preeminent conservator in the county of Essex attended no university. His school was in the back woods of Gosfield township; his rifle was his pen, and his traps were his books. From his youth he was in contact with the wild life of Essex county. He was a crack shot. He could hit a half-dollar five times out of five at a much greater distance than most people. It was in Essex county that he learned to love wild life. The woods and swamps of the beautiful county of Essex inspired in him a love of wild life and to do what he has done for this country and for the rest of this continent. Today his name is known and his memory respected throughout the world, and I am happy indeed to have the honour of moving this bill in his memory and to his honour for what he has done.

I believe that the government is going to permit the bill to pass with some slight amendments with which I am quite in accord, and so in closing, Your Honour, I should just like to say that Canada must have a wild life week. The letters which I have received, and which I am sure the minister has received, from departments of government in our provinces and from the premiers of our provinces are almost unanimous in endorsing that Canada should have a wild life week. That is No. 1—almost unanimous endorsation of a wild life week. I find, secondly, almost unanimous endorsation that the week should be the one in which the 10th day of April occurs, the anniversary of Jack Miner's birthday.

I am satisfied that if we pass this bill the result will be great so far as wild life conservation in this country is concerned. I have had a stupendous number of endorsations but I shall not take up the time of the house to read them tonight. They have come from all across America, from London, England, and from every state in the American union. I shall give the names of a few of the bodies that have written me and, I presume, have also written to the department, for I have found the minister very cooperative in endorsing Canada's having a national wild life week. Contained within that week should be the birthday of Jack Miner, which is April 10. I have received endorsations from great companies like the Ford Motor Company, which is the greatest of its kind in the world; the Chrysler corporation, which is almost as great, and Detroit Street Railway Company. I have received communications from a multitude of associations. Among them are found the following: The Alberta Motor Association; the Outdoor Writers' Association of Ohio; the National Wild Life Federation of Washington, D.C.; the Maryland Fish and Game Association, U.S.A.; the Wild Life Management Institute, Washington; the Canadian National Parks Association, Calgary. At this point I should like to pay a word of tribute to the secretary of that association, Mr. W. J. Selby Walker, who is an enthusiastic naturalist and a man of whom the country may well be proud because of the work he has done toward wild life conservation.

I have had a multitude of endorsations from towns and cities throughout Canada: Montreal, Ottawa, Hamilton, London, Toronto, and from societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals. They have professed their words of endorsation. Finally, I have received endorsations from boards of education and chambers of commerce. It would take me all the rest of the evening to mention them all. As I say, I have received endorsations from chambers of commerce, or boards of trade and county councils and city councils such as Windsor and Wiarton, Kingsville, Sandwich, Waterloo, Kitchener, Brantford, Sarnia, Winnipeg, Regina, Kamloops, Edmonton. I have received endorsations from provincial authorities, to whom I referred a moment or two ago. Eight of the nine provinces endorsed this legislation and the ninth reported that they would support whatever we did here. Therefore it adds up to almost unanimous endorsation.

In moving the second reading of this bill, I have set an example in that I have taken only about fifteen minutes, and if those who follow me do not take too long, and if it does not get through by nine o'clock, perhaps the minister and the house will consent to an extension of time so that we may try to get the bill through tonight.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): I appreciate highly the privilege which was extended to me by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in permitting me to second this bill. Before I proceed with my remarks, I wish to pay a word of tribute to the hon. member for Davenport who well deserves it. He is a well qualified man to speak on this subject. He has followed a straight line so far as conservation and preservation are concerned. We have listened to him on many occasions giving lectures and talks on irrigation and conservation of soil and so forth. Therefore it is a pleasant duty for me to spend a few minutes of the time of the house on a matter which is very important and absolutely above party lines.

To some extent I am a little disappointed because it was not possible to make this national wild life bill a Jack Miner bill. Perhaps I am somewhat of a provincialist in that regard; but I am convinced that no man living in Canada has done so much for conservation and preservation of our wild life as has Jack Miner. Being a citizen of Ontario, naturally I have thought that the name "Jack Miner Week" would be acceptable, but we must also consider other sections of Canada. I presume that is one of the main reasons why the title of the bill had to be changed. But this is the occasion and the place for northern Ontario more particularly to say to Manly Miner how much we appreciate the work of his father in the newer sections of Canada, and also the work that the son is doing at the present time in old Ontario. We must realize this. We have been bountifully blessed with the great gifts of nature; yet we are great wasters; we are wasters of our soil, of some of our rural establishments, of our forests and also of our wild fowl and wild animal life. We should bring vividly and forcibly to the attention of our Canadian people that the time has surely come when every man and woman in the country should be a conservationist to the fullest extent. I speak feelingly on this matter, because only forty short years ago when we went into our new sections of northern Ontario, in the wonderful clay belt, as settlers, we knew to some extent that we had to destroy the forest. But I do not think it ever came to the minds of the pioneers that it would be necessary to slaughter the fine herds of moose that were there and the wild life which was then in the northern sections of northern Ontario. In that section, as in every other section of Canada, we have been wasteful to a very large extent indeed. Of necessity these days are gone. That should be one of the finest reminders to our Canadian people in establishing a week of this kind, so well propounded in the present bill.

If it were possible I should like every citizen of Canada to go into the southern section of Hudson bay and the James bay region in the fall of the year, the latter part of October or the first part of November, where they would see wild geese and wild ducks not by the hundreds of thousands but by the millions. Hon. members may not believe that but it is absolutely true. At the moment we feel more secure, because we know they will be well protected when they reach the southern sections of the United States by the fine organizations which have been set up there to protect these birds. We know what Ducks Unlimited has accomplished in the northern and western sections of the western provinces, and also what it has accomplished in every section of Canada. At one time we were fearful that the wild duck life would be so depleted that it might disappear as have some of the birds which our fathers knew as part of the wild life population of this country. For that reason I wish to be brief because we hope and expect that this bill will pass with as little deliberation as possible.

I wish to mention again what has been accomplished by Jack Miner. What he has done will always be to us a great lesson in what can be done, and it is being well propagated at the present time by his son. I trust that national wild life week will be taught in our schools, because at the present time there are very few schools which do not include in their curriculum something on conservationism and preservation of our wild life and also of our natural resources. Without elaborating any further, may I say that it is with the greatest pleasure that I second this bill in the hope that it will receive unanimous support from every section of the house.

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this bill, I do so not merely personally, but at the request of the mayor of the city of Windsor, and on behalf of the Essex county tourist association and the Essex county sportsmen's association and, I feel sure, on behalf of all citizens of Essex county and western Ontario.

You have heard, during the course of this debate, that the late Jack Miner was a farmer and operator of a tile yard in the county of Essex at Kingsville near the city of Windsor. In his early years, in his desire to protect the wild fowl migrating to the north and south in the spring and fall, he created a sanctuary where, at his own expense, these fowl were fed grain and provided a landing and resting place in a small secluded pond. In order to note the habits of the migrating birds, and to encourage the preservation of wild life, he employed a novel scheme which was destined, in time to come, to make him a world figure.

There are many points throughout the North and South American continents which have been set aside as game sanctuaries, none of which has attained the prominence of that maintained by the late Jack Miner. It is true that the migrating habits at such other sanctuaries have been able to determine the habits of migrating birds in a cold, impersonal, statistical manner usually by the affixing of a band on a captured bird on which a certain serial number is engraved. Jack Miner, however, had a great respect for his fellow man. He had a great love for mankind. His life expressed a love for children and flowers and nature. This desire to be of help to mankind found expression in his scheme of attaching to the leg of a captured bird a little metal band on which was impressed a short verse of scripture and the name "Jack Miner, Kingsville, Ontario, Canada."

It was not long after instituting his scheme until reports came to him from many parts of Canada, United States and South America of the capture of birds on which bands had been placed. Thus valuable information was obtained for the governments of Canada and the United States; but, in addition thereto, the good will of Canada was spread from Kingsville not only to different parts of northern Canada, but to the eastern part of the United States and to the northern part of South America, including Central America. Indians in northern Canada, upon shooting a bird with one of these bands, would take it to the missionary near them to find out what it was, and the missionary, upon explaining it, would have an opportunity in his work of expounding Christian doctrine. In Central and South America many natives learned their first English words by taking these bands to their parish priests or missionaries for translation and explanation.

Thus it was that the name "Jack Miner, Kingsville, Ontario, Canada," with the comforting and regenerating message, was spread throughout the American continents. But this was not all, for it attracted many of the leading educationalists, politicians, laymen and businessmen throughout the world. It was not uncommon for Jack Miner to have, as guests at his farm, persons from European countries, especially England, some of whom, to my personal knowledge, made the trip specially to visit him.

In time, partly through his geographical location but mostly because of the haven provided by Jack Miner, the birds came to regard the Miner sanctuary as a haven of refuge in their migration and a place where they might find food and rest. Usually the birds, during the daylight hours, remained close to the shores of lake Erie where it is not an uncommon sight, during the migrating seasons, to see tens of thousands of ducks, geese and white swans. Toward twilight the wild geese and ducks and sometimes the swans fly in from the lake to the Miner sanctuary where they receive food and then depart early in the morning. To say that Jack Miner was a local character is not correct, for he was an international figure with friends all over the world who had duplications of his sanctuary in many foreign countries.

The War Cry, the publication of the Salvation Army, in the April 5, 1947, issue says:

> Mr. Miner's life was not lived in just his home town of Kingsville, which he made famous throughout the world; but his name was so much a household word throughout the dominion that when one thinks of birds, the subject is inescapably linked up with the bird sanctuary.
> Let it be granted that other great ornithologists lived before Jack Miner, and live today; but their lives centred each around one locality, and what they left behind were, in a good many cases, dead specimens of birds, very rare bird skins for scientific study in schools, or exhibits in glass cases in museums.
> Miner's life-work, however, was very different to this. He left behind him living creatures, the actual living birds which our children and our children's children may see in their customary haunts and natural environment, and but for the famous naturalist's foresight and energy might today be extinct.
> To-day, because of the fact that Jack Miner lived, Canada possesses millions of living birds because he gave protection to their kind—a sanctuary from slaughter, a haven of rest on their long flight, and food. This heritage of bird life we owe to him, not only because of the well maintained sanctuary at Kingsville, but also because of the hundreds of bird refuges which his influence helped to create.

Jack Miner was, and is, even today probably the best advertising agent that Canada has ever had, for the advertising which he has obtained has been that which no money could buy. Practically every worth-while publication in the United States and other parts of the world has, at one time or another, carried news items and feature articles repeating the kindness, joy and gospel of conservation in the protection of wild fowl as expressed by Jack Miner.

On another occasion, I have had the privilege of referring to feature stories in the Saturday Evening Post, depicting the story of Jack Miner and telling of the attractions, people and privileges of the Dominion of Canada. I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, of the tremendous circulation of this publication and of the value in dollars and cents to the Dominion of Canada.

The Christian Science Monitor, the great international daily newspaper, has also featured the story of Jack Miner which has been of advertising value for Canada throughout the world. The Canadian Churchman, the national Church of England news review, together with radio station CKLW at Windsor and other leading stations, many leading daily newspapers, weekly publications, magazines, have publicized the work of Jack Miner and the Dominion of Canada throughout the universe.

As I came into the house tonight I received a telegram advising me that in a recent radio broadcast were carried over C.B.C. by Claire Wallace there were 500,000 listeners in Canada —it was heard in 300,000 homes in this country over twenty-nine stations. This says nothing about the millions who hear her in the United States which they have no way of estimating.

I think, however, that Jack Miner's greatest contribution to Canada from not only a social but a monetary point of view has been his assistance to and interest in the tourist industry in Canada. Last year I am informed that 20,875,701 tourists entered Canada from all ports. Of this number, 5,191,009 tourists entered by the port of Windsor, Ontario. I could quote at this point from the Windsor Daily Star, since this publication is read by the members of the house more than any other publication and is quoted more often, but I will give what others say. I will, therefore, read from a journal published some distance from Windsor and which perhaps is not as widely known. The reference is made from the November 28, 1946, issue of Watson, Sask., Witness:

Windsor, Ontario.—With the fall (November) migration of waterfowl at its peak at the world famous Jack Miner bird sanctuary twenty-five miles from here, the custom officers and immigration officers at this port of entry today said that "more people coming into Canada ask the way to Jack Miner's than any other place."

All United States and Canada has copied his bird sanctuary idea for conservation of bird life which is a national asset to this country. Although the late Jack Miner passed on two years ago it is good to know that his sons are carrying on the work more energetically than ever. Before Jack Miner died he said "What made my bird sanctuary such a success was because I took God in partnership with me." He started to put verses of scripture on his bird bands and in this way he secured the cooperation of the Jesuit priest and Anglican missionaries in Hudson and James bay, who acted as his agents in collecting them from the Indians and Eskimos. The verse of scripture on the band gave him the wholehearted cooperation of every church in North America; the banding of birds gave him the support of every sportsman, and thus the place has become so popular in attracting tourists from all over the world.

It is not an uncommon sight to see at the Miner sanctuary 500 motor cars, most of which have come from the United States; and, from a purely mercenary point of view, they leave many valuable dollars in the Dominion of Canada, and you can be sure that a dollar made in the tourist industry is worth every bit as much as a dollar made by growing wheat in western Canada.

Jack Miner passed on at his home and bird sanctuary, at Kingsville, Ontario, on November 3, 1944; but Jack Miner did not die, for the work that he accomplished has carried on and the human endeavour has been propagated in his three sons who have been doing the work instituted by the father, and Jack Miner's "Peace on earth, good will toward men" is still being spread all over the globe through the feathered friends which he made and protected.

Just recently I attended a gathering in Kingsville which was the twenty-fifth wedding anniversary of one of the sons, and there, leading businessmen of the United States, educationalists, professional people, radio commentators, editors, and the rest of us common folk, had an opportunity of again paying tribute to Jack Miner through his son. It is therefore my recommendation, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be given favourable consideration by the house.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for a few minutes, not only because of my own interest in this matter, but also because of the unavoidable absence of the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) in whose riding the Jack Miner bird sanctuary is situated. I am sure that the mover of this resolution would agree that the hon. member for Essex South has, throughout the years, displayed great interest in Jack Miner and his work. The hon. member for Essex South unfortunately found himself unable to be here tonight to add his voice in support of those who have already spoken. As the speaker preceding me has stated, Jack Miner was not only a citizen of Canada and a well known and useful citizen of the county of Essex, but by virtue of his great work in the field of conservation of wild life he may be said to have been almost a citizen of the world.

Those of us who live in Essex county look upon the Jack Miner foundation and the sanctuary as one of our most important possessions and one in which we have a great and legitimate pride, not only because of its attraction to tourists, but also because of the lesson it teaches to all of us, particularly to the children, of the importance of wild life. Not only did Jack Miner do much for the conservation of wild life; but his fine character, known particularly to those of us who live in Essex county, was such as to urge us, if for no other reason, to give our support to this bill in the form in which I understand it is to be placed later by the minister under whose department this matter comes. The government, through the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), has not failed to show its continued concern and interest in the great work of Jack Miner. Under the present Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), the grant of $2,500 was increased, and the contribution now made annually by this government, and through it, by parliament, to the Jack Miner foundation is in the amount of $5,000.

Speaking for those in our county, I may say that we are grateful to the members of this house for that grant and for their interest in this matter. So, Mr. Speaker, in order to give the minister time to speak on behalf of his department tonight, and in order that the bill may possibly be facilitated in its passage, I wish to join with those who have thus far spoken in commending to this house this commemorative week at a time to coincide with the birthday of Jack Miner, a great lover of nature; a great lover of the birds who make our life happier and more interesting; one who by his character was and is a great example, not only to those who knew him but also to those who will read about him in the years to come; the kind of man who made this world a better place in which to live.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I just say one word. I do not wish to delay the passage of this bill, because I think we all want to allow the minister to make his statement and get into committee tonight.

All I wish to say is that I am heartily in support of this bill and of the idea behind it. In these days when the wild life has been depleted in the country, one's mind goes back over the years and one regrets that there was not such a figure as Jack Miner a century ago. Had there been we might still have had the North American pigeon, and the buffalo might have been in greater numbers across the western plains of Canada. Today we have an opportunity of teaching our boys and girls, as they grow up, the value of wild life, through the example of a man who devoted his life to the conservation of the wild life of Canada. On behalf of those around me, I have great pleasure in supporting the second reading of the bill.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support the principle of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). His zeal and diligence as a member have been most gratifying to those who have known him for many years in our city. He has been a leader in many spheres of public life in our city and has continuously risen in the esteem of his fellow citizens.

The purpose of the bill which the hon. member proposes is to proclaim the week of April 10 in each and every year as the Jack Miner national wild life week, April 10 being the anniversary of the birthday of the late Jack Miner, the great Canadian naturalist who devoted a lifetime to the cause of wild life conservation. For that reason it is most commendable. However I wish to point out that I think a week is too much. Perhaps there should be a day set aside.

There are educational features to this particular bill. I wish to call the attention of the house and the country to the fact that there has been wilful destruction of our forests. I think of the old country and what has been done to preserve the countryside in many ways. When I visit the summer resorts, I am almost appalled to see the wilful destruction around the countryside of the forests that we used to have years ago in this dominion. There is an educational feature to this bill, because in all the public and high schools and, I know, in the separate schools, considerable time has been devoted to the conservation of this particular kind of life.

I am sorry that more attention has not been given by the chairman and his committee on Indian and Eskimo affairs, and some action taken long ago, instead of talk. If we devoted more of our time to the Indians and Eskimos who devoted all their lives to the conservation of wild life in the forests, rivers and streams of this country, it would be much better. Here we have wasted two years in deciding whether they are citizens or not. They are the very people who saved the wild life in the forests and streams in the days of Frobisher, Jacques Cartier and John Cabot, and of the discovery of Hudson bay, the discovery of the Mackenzie, the Fraser, and the other great rivers that lead to the oceans. While I support the principle of the bill, I believe the time has come when we should really set aside about a day or two to give consideration to these people who have conserved the wild life of the country, who were the original settlers and who were here 180 years before your great race, Mr. Speaker, came to this country, the great French people. Nothing has been done for them to make them citizens and give them the rights of citizens.

I support the principle of the bill. I believe it will have a great educational effect in this country. I wish to commend the hon. gentleman who introduced it—one of the most indefatigable and beloved members of the House of Commons—for what he has done in this country not only for forest conservation and power development but in advancing many of the features of our public life.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the time is getting on towards nine o'clock because I should like to have seen this bill go through. As the house will remember, last year we had a similar bill, and I was forced to take exception to it on the ground that a precedent would have been established in regard to the setting apart of a national holiday named for an individual in the country. What I said then I would repeat now. I do not intend in any way to detract from the stature, reputation or prestige of Jack Miner, who was a national figure throughout Canada; but I did think at that time, and I suggested to the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring the bill, that the provinces should be consulted in this matter before we took it upon ourselves to pass such a bill. At that time I promised I would communicate with the provinces to get their reaction, and that I did. I sent a letter to the provincial ministers of mines and resources, and from them I received replies in which they expressed their unanimous opinion that it would be unwise to name a bill after an individual citizen of our country and identify his name with it. They were all in favour of having a national wild life week in Canada, in order that the people of this country might come to know just what our wild life means. I am not going to read all the communications, but will ask the house to accept my word that each provincial minister indicated to me that he did not think the bill should be associated with the name of an individual but that there should be a national wild life week.

I have consulted the sponsor of the bill, who in season and out of season has expressed the point of view that this should be considered the Jack Miner bill. I have suggested to him amendments which would eliminate the name of Jack Miner; and, as he said in his address, he has agreed to this suggestion. So I have no objection to the bill passing, on the understanding that I will move these amendments deleting the name of Jack Miner from the four clauses in which it appears, and setting up a national wild life week.

Motion agreed, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. GLEN: I move that section 1 be amended by striking out the words "Jack Miner" in the first line thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Jack Miner national wild life week.

Mr. GLEN: I move that section 2 be amended by striking out the words "Jack Miner" in the fourth line thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. REID: In the first amendment the minister moved the deletion of only two words. Does that not leave in the words "the Canadian internationally recognized bird lover"?

Mr. MacNICOL: That is not in section 1.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. GLEN: I move that the following be deleted from the preamble:

Whereas the late Jack Miner, the Canadian internationally recognized bird lover and wild life conservationist, devoted a lifetime to the cause of wild life conservation; and whereas it is fitting that his outstanding service in this field can be commemorated; therefore

Amendment agreed to.

Preamble as amended agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. GLEN: I move that the title be amended by deleting therefrom the words "Jack Miner."

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PENITENTIARY ACT

INSPECTION OF PENAL INSTITUTIONS BY GRAND JURY, ETC.

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Church for the second reading of Bill No. 12, an act to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to hear from the Minister of Justice with respect to this bill, the next evening we have private and public bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand. The hour for private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will revert to the business under consideration at six o'clock.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were dealing with order in council 8528 on page 3 of the schedule.

Mr. ILSLEY: If another column is not provided we shall not be able to amend the schedule. Therefore I move that the schedule to the act be amended by inserting therein immediately after the column entitled "Amending orders in council" a column entitled "Amendments."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FULTON: Before six o'clock the minister had given notice, as I understand it, that he would be prepared to move an amendment to section 15, subsections 1 and 2, of which he was kind enough to furnish us with copies. In the discussion which followed, the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that, as they read the suggestion put forward by the minister, if a person felt himself aggrieved by any act of a member of the board which that person felt was in excess of the authority of that member, then under section 15(1) he could bring an action in damages against that member. The onus would then be upon the member of the board to prove that he acted in good faith. That is my understanding. If that is correct, I feel that it goes practically all the way to meet the point which I had in mind this afternoon when I moved the amendment which is now before the committee. I would be happier if the words "by way of injunction" could be stricken out of the proposed section 15(2) but, as the minister has made what I might call a great concession toward meeting our views, I am not going to insist on that. Therefore, if it is the will of the committee I would ask permission to withdraw my amendment provided that the minister will move his.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member permission to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) withdrawn.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 8528 of 1st November, 1941, as amended:

"15(1) No member of the board, administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting on behalf of or under the authority of the board shall be liable for any act or omission in the exercise or performance or purported exercise or performance, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, of any power, discretion, authority or duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 8528 of November 1, 1941, as amended:

"Section 15(2) is deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"15(2) No proceedings by way of injunction, mandatory order, mandamus, prohibition or certiorari, shall be instituted against any member of the board, administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting on behalf of or under the authority of the board for or in respect of any act or omission of himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations or otherwise heretofore conferred or imposed by the governor in council."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KNOWLES: I feel that the moral of this discussion should be pointed out to the minister and the government. We have been discussing for no longer than an hour the wartime prices and trade board. As the minister has said, this is a body which, through the years, has been subject to a great deal of abuse. Earlier in this session it was suggested, by my hon. friends to my right in particular, that something pretty drastic had to be done with this board, and there was even the suggestion that maybe this was one of the orders in council they were opposed to.

I hope my hon. friends to the right will realize that at this particular moment I am not picking a quarrel with them, although I am not above doing it on other occasions. At this particular moment I am drawing the moral from the fact that they have not fought the wartime prices and trade board as we expected they would to indicate that there is far more sentiment in the country against the speedy decontrol of prices than I think the government has yet realized. We were led to believe that this was a pretty awful aggregation—

An hon. MEMBER: Only by you.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no. Yet the only discussion we have had has been on the point of recourse to the courts and so on, on which we have been able to reach an agreement. I suggest earnestly to the minister and the government that they should consider seriously the result of this discussion and slow down in their policy of price decontrol. I think the members of the wartime prices and trade board who have been restive under the abuse they have received should read Hansard and be encouraged as a result of this debate and realize that, after all, perhaps there is more appreciation of what they have been doing than is generally recognized. Perhaps one of the reasons there has been so little criticism today of the wartime prices and trade board is that the afternoon paper which comes to our desks predicts sixty cent butter on May 1. One can imagine the effect that will have upon the housewives, the consumers and the working people of Canada generally.

As I said, I rose just to urge the government to reconsider its policy with respect to price decontrol and to pay some attention to remarks such as those which have been addressed to the government by the hon. member for Spadina.

Mr. MERRITT: We have just had a short lecture from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I in turn would like to point out to the minister the danger of following any conclusions the hon. member may draw from this or any other discussion.

I really rose to make a request of the minister. Later on, we shall be dealing with the order in council which has to do with timber control. That order in council cannot be discussed intelligently except in relation to prices. I should like to get the minister's consent that the passing of this particular item will not preclude the discussion of prices when we reach the timber control order.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I agree that prices can be discussed under P.C. 1997 which relates to timber regulations.

Mr. FRASER: Merchants in my riding and in other ridings have objected to the way in which inspectors of the wartime prices and trade board check up on them. One butcher said to me, "Look out there; you will see in that car a man who used to be a bus driver. He comes in here and tells me how to run my butcher business". I was in a clothing store and the merchant said, "Look at that man. He is a butcher and he comes in here and tells me how to run my clothing business, I object to that; I do not think it is right. I think the wartime prices and trade board should have inspectors who are trained in their own business". The minister and his department should check on that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Was the hon. member referring to the number of investigators?

Mr. FRASER: I was stating that in one place a butcher pointed out two men in a car. I understand that these inspectors generally go around in twos.

[Mr. Knowles.]

An hon. MEMBER: For protection.

Mr. FRASER: "For protection", somebody says. The butcher was objecting to a bus driver telling him how to run his business and the clothing merchant was objecting to a butcher coming and telling him how to run his clothing business.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think they tell them how to run their business. Perhaps they tell them what the regulations are and check up to see whether they are complying with them. For the information of the hon. member the total number of investigators is 599.

Mr. FRASER: That is about 200 fewer than there were before?

Mr. ILSLEY: The number was 750 last year.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to support what has been said by my deskmate, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Members in this section of the house protested at the sniping that went on during the war against public-spirited servants of the Canadian people who were unable to defend themselves in this parliament and who were doing, as the minister said this afternoon, a pretty thankless job in arguing with people all along the line. But it was in the public interest to have price control and some supervision over the distribution of goods in the country.

After I spoke last night, I was sent a clipping from the Toronto Globe and Mail of March 15, which reports that a survey had been made of Toronto homes in the lower income brackets, and forty-three per cent of the families interviewed intimated that there had been a decrease in their consumption of milk since the price of milk increased. I was also informed by a Canadian, who was living in Washington at the time of the disorderly retreat from price control there last summer, that he had been in the habit of lunching at one of the well-known restaurants in Washington where a meal cost $1.25, but that, after the lid had been taken off prices, the very same meal cost $2, and of course a ten per cent tip was expected on $2 instead of on $1.25. All along the line rising prices in the United States make it more difficult for people on fixed incomes to get by.

Before the Easter recess, members of the Progressive Conservative party were active in urging the government to retreat much more rapidly from price control. I notice that they were echoing the sentiments of the president of the Robert Simpson Company. I have a copy of his address to the shareholders of the company.

Mr. MERRITT: Is he public enemy No. 1 now?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not going to enter into a discussion of his shortcomings, but in this speech he recommends—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the member should speak to the item. He is now going back to the principle of the bill.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was merely saying that a well-known Canadian outside this house was recommending the very same policy that had been recommended in this house by members of the Progressive Conservative party. But the fact remains that, while this discussion has been going on this afternoon and this evening, the Progressive Conservative party has not proposed that a single item should be taken out of the field of price control or pressed the government to abandon the whole price control policy. I urge the minister who is piloting this bill through the house and the government to take into consideration the sentiments that have been expressed in so many parts of Canada that they continue to try to keep prices in line with the spending ability of the Canadian people. The Minister of Justice was able to enlist the cooperation of housewives in all parts of Canada for the common good of all during the war, and it is not too late to expect a similar response if the government will give leadership in this critical period such as was given when a large number of our citizens were in the armed forces and when such a large percentage of our production was going into war. It does not make sense that we should now have runaway prices which work a great hardship on people with fixed incomes who are compelled to decrease their consumption of food and pay fabulous prices for inferior goods, as seems to be the trend in the United States and certainly will be the trend in Canada if we have any more rapid retreat from price control.

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon. member seems to have based his entire argument that, if a few controls were taken off, prices would go to astronomical heights in this country, on the price of meals in Washington. I was there myself during the parliamentary recess, and I can assure him that the price of meals in restaurants in Washington is very little different from what you pay in the city of Ottawa in comparable places. As a matter of fact you could get breakfast at a restaurant in Washington that would compare with Murray's here for ten or fifteen cents less than you would pay in Ottawa.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Where can you do that in Washington?

Mr. HARKNESS: I deliberately went to various kinds of places to get a cross-section and see what conditions were actually like, and I was agreeably surprised to find that prices there for comparable quality of meals and service were very little different from here. So that if the hon. member is going to base his argument on such premises he had better go down to Washington and eat a few meals there and find out the facts. Further, in my opinion, his logic and method of arguing has no better basis generally than it has in this case and that applies to his party generally. Did the hon. member want to ask a question?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Name two restaurants where you ate in Washington?

Mr. HARKNESS: I ate two or three meals in places called the Hot Shoppe. It is a place very similar to Murray's.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Tell that to Murray's.

Mr. HARKNESS: As I say the prices were a little cheaper in Washington. I cannot recall the names of all the restaurants I went to, but I can assure the hon. member that what I have said is correct. He will find very little difference in the prices of meals in Washington if he cares to make the trip.

Mr. HANSELL: I followed with some interest the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and in respect of them I say that, just so long as the principle of controls is maintained by the government, somebody must have the responsibility for control. Price controls were brought into existence for the specific purpose of avoiding the inflationary spiral that would take place if prices were not controlled. I think that is the reason why the wartime prices and trade board was brought into existence. I have always said that, so far as that is concerned, the wartime prices and trade board has done a pretty good job. If there has been any criticism of a harsh nature perhaps it has been with some of the, shall I say, minor officials, inspectors, whose duty it is to go around and perhaps act as shock absorbers, and, who, in the discharge of their duties, have become extremely unpopular. But from the point of view of controlling inflation the board has done a pretty good job.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that, since there had been a recent decontrol of prices, a wave of resentment had arisen against these decontrols. Of course that is quite natural, because there will be resentment the very moment any action touches the pockets of the people. I would point out, Mr. Chairman, something that is rather significant and singular. I do not know whether this has occurred to other hon. members or not, but the lifting of recent price ceilings has been done at the time during which this bill has been under discussion in this house. Whether that was purposely designed or not I do not know. The minister will perhaps say, "No; it is just done in the interests of the country"; but it did have the effect at least of a clever and strategic political manoeuvre, because naturally people are going to resent a rise in the price of consumer goods, especially goods such as my hon. friend referred to, butter for instance, which all people need and must buy, and the recent jump of $2 a ton on coal, something that is essential to the life of our Canadian people. This was all done during the time the bill was being discussed in the house, and during the time when hon. members had to take a stand. Would the effect have been the same—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I again draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that he is discussing the principle of the bill which was decided on second reading. We should not spend our time now in dealing with the principle. The principle was accepted by the house. We are now dealing with the items. Again I ask for the support of every hon. member in this regard. If we deal with the items we shall make more progress.

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for reminding me of that. Perhaps I used the wrong language. I shall speak now in terms of the direct action which has been taken by the wartime prices and trade board and which we are now discussing. I say that action was taken during the time we have been discussing the measure in respect to decontrol. I do not know that I need to add anything further to my remarks, but I believe that the effect would perhaps have been entirely different had the action of the wartime prices and trade board in its recent decontrol measure been left until this bill had been disposed of.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Will the minister tell the committee where the authority was secured for the payment of subsidies on coal? I asked this question before the dinner recess, but he was not in a position to tell the committee at that time. He said he would make inquiries. I wish to point out that, while the subsidies on coal have lapsed, an undertaking was given by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply on April 1 as set out on page 1956 of Hansard as follows:

[Mr. Hansell.]

But I should like it understood that the government is willing to reexamine the needs of the production of coal in the Cape Breton area and to reintroduce subsidies in that area, provided that there can be a settlement of the present labour dispute on a basis that promises that the industry will ultimately be restored to a healthy condition.

Then further down:

But I do want to say that the government is ready at any time to sit down with the union and with the operators and work out a form of subsidy which will permit that section of the country to resume the production of coal on a healthy basis.

Where will the authority be secured for carrying out the undertaking given by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply when he was discussing this emergency powers bill on second reading?

Mr. HOWE: The authority is found in the Munitions and Supply Act. The funds used will be funds appropriated by parliament for that purpose. There is an item in the present appropriation to cover coal subsidies.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): From where have they been paid in recent months?

Mr. HOWE: The funds have been paid from the war appropriations.

Mr. BENTLEY: We have just finished with the section setting up the wartime prices and trade board regulations once again, continuing their authority to carry on the work which they have done and which they have been so well complimented on by others. At supper time tonight a lady who is the mother of two growing boys came to me. Her husband earns $90 a month, which is a government pay cheque. They pay $30 a month rent. It takes all their family allowances of the two children to buy milk for the children.

Mr. HACKETT: That is what they get it for.

Mr. BENTLEY: All right, but $90 a month is the pay cheque. Of that amount $30 has to go for rent. Butter will now cost them sixty cents a pound, according to the press. I am asking—

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the position which pays $90 a month?

Mr. BENTLEY: He is in the army.

Mr. HACKETT: He gets subsistence, and other things.

Mr. ILSLEY: No one in the army gets only $90 a month. Is that $90 a month in cash? That is just the start.

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not want to deal with anyone's personal affairs. I will tell the minister about the matter in private.

Mr. HACKETT: Do not make the statement that he is getting only $90 a month.

Mr. BENTLEY: He is getting $90 a month because of certain circumstances which I am not going to disclose here.

Mr. HACKETT: Do not talk about them then.

Mr. BENTLEY: I shall, because he has to keep a family. I am making my statement to the minister and not to the hon. member for Stanstead.

Mr. HACKETT: If you cannot speak about it openly do not talk about it.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am talking to the minister, and not to the hon. member for Stanstead. When he is the minister I shall talk to him.

Mr. HACKETT: Then the hon. member will have to wait a long time.

Mr. BENTLEY: Will the wartime prices and trade board, under the instructions and authority they have received from this committee tonight, be prepared to take some action to protect these people? This is not the only one. There are other families like this in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Does he get old age pension?

Mr. BENTLEY: He is not old enough to get old age pension and will not be for a little while. This is going to be a severe hardship on this man and on other people. I am asking that the government try to see that this kind of people are protected from further increases.

Mr. HACKETT: What kind of people?

Mr. BENTLEY: The kind of people that I am talking about tonight.

Mr. HACKETT: The kind of people you cannot talk about because you do not know about them or you will not tell.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, I do know about them. Why should I tell you about them? If the minister insists on my telling him I shall tell him. The hon. member for Stanstead does not know what he is talking about because he has his nose in a book. I am presenting this case to the government. My hon. friends the Tories who like to make funny remarks should read the funny papers.

P.C. 8528 as amended agreed to.

On P.C. 9029.

Mr. BENTLEY: Just a minute.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly cannot add any useful statement to the price control policy of the government. Perhaps I should not add anything at all to what I have already said. The hon. gentleman may have in mind that the government should go into a subsidy policy in order to keep down the price of food. But remember that the government is attacked from three positions: 1, by farmers who want higher prices; 2, by the consumers, who want lower prices; and 3, by the taxpayer, who wants lower taxes. A balance has to be struck between these conflicting claims.

Mr. BENTLEY: I appreciate the minister's position. He reminds me of the fellow who described the statesman as a politician held upright by equal pressure from all sides. I do not know whether that exactly describes his position but I can see his difficulty. Even his difficulty, however, is not as great as that of the families I have described, and the government should consider defying one or two sides of the pressure to make the weaker members of society a little more secure than they are at the present time.

Mr. BRACKEN: Can the minister say how many employees of the government receive $90 a month or less?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot say. I believe some grade 1 stenographers and grade 1 typists do, but there are not many of those if my recollection serves me correctly. Most of them are grade 2 now, and the pay of the grade 2 stenographer and grade 2 typist is, as I recollect, between $105 and $110.

Mr. HACKETT: What benefits does the soldier receive in excess of his pay?

Mr. ILSLEY: The private gets $95—$50 when he goes in and $45 for ration if he is not living in barracks, or alternatively, if he lives in barracks, the value placed on that is $45. That makes $95, and he gets hospitalization. He gets clothing and important pension privileges, and if he is married he gets the married allowance and so on. I cannot say what it is exactly, but I am sure I am justified in saying that the Canadian soldiers are well paid, and I would emphasize the "well paid". About a year ago there was fixed a scale which was quite satisfactory to everybody.

Mr. HACKETT: It is a fact that soldiers receive substantially more than $95.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. The private starts with $95, in addition to pension privileges, medical attention and so on.

Mr. HACKETT: Clothing and marriage allowance.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: And family allowance if he has children.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Stanstead as well as the minister are creating the impression that there are very few people who get as low as $95, but the facts given by the dominion bureau of statistics show that a great many heads of households in Canada get $95 and less, and the hon. member for Swift Current is certainly not discussing an unusual case. He is speaking for a very large number of people and he makes a point that should be considered. What is to be done in the case of those getting $95 and less when butter goes to sixty cents? What is happening when they do not get milk for their children and when shoes are out of line and they have to buy inferior clothing? Something should be done to see that people in that category are enabled to look forward to the future with greater confidence than they now can.

Mr. HOWE: Will the hon. member tell us the type of employment that pays less than $95? What would a man be doing to earn less than that?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Anyone in my constituency who is clerking in a store or looking after His Majesty's mail, for example. I venture to say that ninety-five per cent of the postmasters in my constituency are getting less than $95 a month for a full-time job.

Mr. HACKETT: That is not their sole occupation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is the only income they have, and they have to keep open from eight o'clock in the morning till six o'clock at night.

Mr. MICHAUD: The housewife does that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is not the housewife's job.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are caretakers, night watchmen and people doing manual labour at minimum wage rates. I could show my hon. friend—

Mr. HOWE: What people doing manual labour can be employed for less than $95 a month?

Mr. KNOWLES: When I was home during the Easter recess there came to see me a man and his wife who were getting less than that. The man combined the jobs of night watchman and caretaker. He was a man of sixty-seven or sixty-eight years of age, not old enough to get the pension, and he got $85 a month for that kind of work. The point which the hon. member for Mackenzie tried to make was that we are getting away from the basic fact that there are many people whose income, even if it be $125 or $150, is not sufficient to meet the rising cost of living, to say nothing of old age pensioners who are trying to get along. The issue is price control.

Mr. HOWE: I can understand my hon. friend's point when he talks about $125 and $150, but the list of people who are fully employed, able-bodied men getting less than $95, is small.

Mr. BENTLEY: But all the people employed are not able-bodied people. Let the minister consult his own bureau of statistics and council of welfare. The facts are there for him to read. They are not on tap all the time in this chamber, but he knows the answers as well as we do.

Mr. KNIGHT: About a week ago I attended one of the most depressing meetings at which I have ever been present.

An hon. MEMBER: A C.C.F. meeting?

Mr. KNIGHT: I shall tell you about it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KNIGHT: Mr. Chairman, this subject has been freely discussed and I should like to say something about it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We have called P.C. 9029, wartime leasehold regulations, and an hon. member has been trying to get up several times to discuss it.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think this question should be disposed of. Other hon. gentlemen have expressed their views and I want just five minutes to state mine. As I say, I was at a meeting in Saskatoon. It was called by officials of this government, officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs. They called together the businessmen of Saskatoon, the board of trade and other citizens and their effort was to get the Saskatoon businessmen to employ old soldiers forty-five years of age, fifty years of age plus. They wanted to get some sort of jobs for these men to keep them alive. Some people suggested various low-paid jobs, and I contrasted to myself the picture of the boys going out in 1914 and coming back, and the boys going out in 1939 and coming back. These old sweats have to face competition from twenty-one year old boys, and I thought to myself, what a hope! In this competitive world today you cannot get business firms to hire people of that kind when you can get men of twenty-one years of age with the potential ability they possess. It was suggested by one person that these men might be able to get jobs paying as much as $30 a month, but the officials of the department did not know that we have in Saskatchewan, through provincial legislation, a minimum wage amounting to something like $83. I am proud that we have that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): When was that statute passed?

Mr. FLEMING: The order that has been lately under discussion is the general order setting up the wartime prices and trade board and giving it its general powers. Order 9029 is the one which clothes the board with certain specific powers in relation to leaseholds. As the committee is aware, the regulations that have been imposed from time to time, starting in 1940, have affected two main aspects of normal leasehold contracts, namely rents and the matter of possession.

I do not propose to dwell on this subject at any great length. It seems to me that we can, with little discussion or questioning, find in this respect the emergency which must be found in order to justify the dominion occupying a field which falls within the ambit of the provinces by virtue of their jurisdiction over property and civil rights within the province. I do not propose to discuss the first aspect of control. I propose to confine myself in some very brief remarks tonight to the second aspect, namely the possession of properties which are under lease or are tenanted.

The general attitude of the government with reference to decontrol in this field was defined by the Minister of Finance on March 25 when he indicated that the policy of the government was for gradual decontrol. I asked him some questions with reference to the policy of the government in regard to decontrol on a horizontal basis, assuming that conditions might improve. They are not improving now; it may be sometime before they will improve in the housing field at the rate the government is proceeding, but let us hope that in the course of time they will improve. When that time comes I asked, what is the basis on which the government proposes to approach the problem of decontrol? The minister indicated that his remarks must be general. If you examine the answers that he gave on that occasion you will find that his remarks were very general, and there is very little indication of the line which the government proposes to follow with reference to decontrol.

The time may come—and let us hope that improvement will come soon; there is little indication of it as yet—when the conditions which constitute the emergency in the housing field will be confined to the urban centres where conditions have been most acute. It may be that in the course of time it will be possible to confine these regulations within a narrower compass. But the steps which the government has taken to date have been in a particular direction. I refer in particular to the step recently taken by the government which is, I think, the first step taken toward decontrol since the freezing order was passed on July 25, 1945. That recent step was announced by the Minister of Finance in this house on February 24. His announcement will be found at page 702 of Hansard. The order of the wartime prices and trade board which he announced at that time is No. 688, dated February 17 of this year. I do not propose to read the whole order; but in essence it has this effect, that in the case of purchases made by the owners of tenanted properties from October 31, 1944, until July 25, 1945—the date of the freezing order—application might be made by such purchasers to the court of rental appeals for an order for possession of the property and for dispossession of the tenant where it can be established that, having regard to the relative needs of the landlord and tenant for the accommodation and the relative hardship resulting from any order made by them, an order should be made granting the landlord possession of his own property. Then followed this safeguard with reference to time, to be found in section 6 of the order. It provided that any notice to vacate given to recover such possession shall be given in accordance with the law of the province but that in no event shall any such notice be shorter than three months. That was the first step in the direction of permitting owners of tenanted property to recover possession for their own occupancy.

I suggest that a second step is warranted, and the second step will fit in with the announced policy of the government with reference to gradual decontrol in this field. There is a special reason applicable in the case which I am about to propose. I am speaking of veterans who have purchased houses and who are not assisted by the first step of the government in this direction embodied in order 688, to which I have referred. Let us bear in mind that the freezing order was made between V-E day and V-J day, when the great majority of the men and women in the armed forces who were on overseas service had not returned. They were not here to protect themselves during the war up to the day when the freezing order took effect. They were not in a position to compete with other persons at that time in protecting themselves in the possession of property by purchase of it before the freezing regulations came into effect and at a time when they could, on notice, have taken possession for their personal occupancy or that of their immediate families. The notice prevailing generally prior to the period of the freezing order was a six months' notice, accompanied by an undertaking on the part of the owner to occupy the premises by himself or his immediate family for a period of not less than twelve months; and that undertaking had to be given to the rental authorities under the wartime prices and trade board.

I am suggesting that an exception ought now to be made in favour of veterans who have purchased houses in which to make their homes, regardless of date, and who require them for their personal use and occupancy in the same way as owners were permitted to do prior to the freezing order, or in a similar way, at any rate. I do not need to go into detail, I trust, on this subject. If there is any case which, without further discussion and without lengthy argument, ought to appeal to the fairness of all hon. members, it is the case of the veteran who, returning from service, finds that he has no housing accommodation adequate for the needs of his family and himself, purchases a property and is unable to obtain occupancy of it for himself and his family.

In case any hon. member should raise the question of administrative difficulties in connection with this matter, I suggest that if it was possible to overcome whatever administrative difficulties were created by the promulgation of order 688, any administrative difficulties inherent in the type of amendment that I am now proposing, can be met with equal, if not greater, facility. I would put it to the sense of fair play of all hon. members as to whether an exception ought not to be made from the present freezing regulation in favour of the man or the woman who has served this country overseas in time of war and who has returned to make a purchase after the date of the freezing order of July 25, 1945. As that order now exists, I suggest that it imposes an invidious and unjustifiable discrimination against the veteran. That is one proposal which I make and to which I propose to refer further in a moment.

There is one other suggestion that I should like to offer, though I do not make it now for the first time. As a matter of fact, I hesitate to remind you, Mr. Chairman, that I have already made this suggestion, I think, on no fewer than three previous occasions in this house. It is a suggestion which, if put into effect, would, I am sure, provide a greatly increased amount of housing accommodation on a shared basis, particularly in the urban centres. I refer to the necessity for lifting the freezing regulations in the case of tenancies of shared accommodation where such tenancies are created hereafter.

I made this suggestion first in the 1945 session. At that time I made it directly to the present Minister of Justice, who was then Minister of Finance. It will be found at page 3465 of Hansard for that session, on December 13, 1945. May I just read one or two sentences from what I said on that occasion:

> May I offer a suggestion to the minister, in the hope that he may think it constructive. On October 25, introducing certain legislation in respect of housing, the minister said something about the present freezing of tenancies. We know the freezing is necessary in the present situation, but we also know that the drastic freezing order has had the effect of discouraging many people from renting surplus accommodation. One can find many cases, some even in the city of Ottawa, where, to meet the needs of the situation, people would be prepared to rent some of their own housing space, if they did not feel that if they brought someone in they might not be able to get him out, no matter whether he proved difficult or not.

After some further discussion, the minister said:

> I will give consideration to that suggestion.

There is no subsequent record in Hansard of any indication on the part of the administration as to its attitude in reference to this suggestion. That proposal was renewed, I venture to remind the minister, on March 25 of this year, to the present Minister of Finance. He took some note of it, but nothing has as yet been done. I would urge upon the Minister of Justice, who is in charge of this bill, that he will make a substantial contribution to the provision of more shared accommodation and more rooms for rent in urban centres if he will introduce an amendment or accept the amendment I am prepared to offer, which will have the effect of providing that the present freezing order shall not apply to tenancies of shared accommodation hereafter created. I can see the difficulties in the way of applying such an order to tenancies at present existing. What I am proposing, as I did in December, 1945, is that for the present this be confined to tenancies hereafter created.

Anyone who has had experience in the administration of the present order well knows that people are not satisfied with it as far as the quite inadequate rights reserved to the landlord are concerned to evict a tenant of shared accommodation.

The minister may say that the order makes provision for the eviction of a tenant who proves obnoxious, but I repeat that anyone who has had experience in the administration of that order knows that provision is virtually a dead letter. It is not simply that it is exceedingly difficult to get orders under that section of the present regulations, though that is very difficult, to say the least. You have to prove a very strong case, such a case as is most difficult to prove, in order to get an order. It is not only that fact; it is also the fact that the very much restricted rights in that respect reserved to the landlord at the present time have the effect of creating in the minds of people who have surplus accommodation to rent, and who are willing to rent it, the fear that, if they take people into their homes and those people prove undesirable, they will not be able to evict them. That fact alone undoubtedly is having the effect of dissuading many people, particularly in the larger urban centres, from renting space they do not themselves require. I know that in many areas of my own city considerable housing accommodation is available on a shared basis which the landlords would be willing to rent if they were not faced with this bogey that, if they took in people who proved difficult, they would not be able to evict them. I make the suggestion to the minister with confidence that, if he will introduce such an amendment, not applying it under present conditions to tenancies at present existing but to tenancies hereafter created, he will take a long step toward increasing the housing accommodation available on a shared basis. By that one step alone he will increase available housing accommodation, when under present conditions he cannot increase it in any other way on anything like a comparable scale.

I do not ask the minister to take my word alone for this. I am not a voice crying in the wilderness, nor am I offering a novel idea in this respect. I would remind the committee that this proposal has been supported by labour and veterans' organizations, and I am going to recall to the minister two quotations I gave the house on March 22, 1946, which will be found at page 183 of Hansard for that day. These quotations were taken from a Toronto newspaper containing remarks by leaders of veterans' and labour organizations meeting to discuss the critical housing situation which existed in Toronto at that time and which exists today in even more critical form. The first statement was by Major Edwin Meredith, a leading official of the Canadian Corps Association, who advanced the suggestion I have advanced to the committee this evening because——he said he was seriously alarmed about the housing situation in general and the problem of veterans' families in particular.

At the same meeting a prominent Toronto labour leader is quoted as having made remarks along the same line. I refer to Mr. Russell Harvey, a leading official and organizer of the American federation of labour in Toronto and a member of the Ontario labour relations board. This is what he is quoted as having said:

"There would be many thousands of additional rooms made available if some assurance were given," contended Russell Harvey of the Toronto district labour council. "The greatest fear of home owners is that they won't be able to get rid of objectionable tenants if they rent rooms that are now vacant."

It seems to me that is a pretty clear case for amendment in order to increase the available supply of housing accommodation. I am prepared to offer separate amendments, Mr. Chairman, in the hope that it may facilitate discussion of these two questions. If the minister is not prepared to accept amendments but prefers to offer his own after consultation with his officials, I should be very happy to put my amendments aside and welcome his. This afternoon I think the minister indicated a desire to meet halfway constructive suggestions for the improvement of these orders, and I hope he will see, in the suggestions I am putting forward, proposals that he may well endeavour to meet halfway. I might just read the amendments I am suggesting as suitable, without offering them at the moment. I realize that if they are to be offered they will have to go in separately, but I suggest to the minister that these are amendments which might well be worthy of his acceptance. As to the first suggestion, namely in favour of veteran purchasers of houses requiring to obtain possession for their own personal occupancy and that of their families, I suggest this:

That P.C. 9029, as amended to date, be further amended by the addition thereto of the following clause:

"Nothing in this order in council or in any order or regulation made thereunder contained shall apply to prevent the recovery of possession of housing accommodation, in accordance with the law of the province, by the owner thereof, where required for his personal occupation and that of his family, where such owner was a member of the forces, as defined in the War Service Grants Act, 1944; provided that any notice given to recover such possession shall be given in accordance with such law, but in no event shall such notice be shorter than three months."

May I make just two comments on that proposal. The first has to do with the definition of "veteran". I have taken that from the War Service Grants Act which defines "veteran" in these terms in section 2(f):

"member" and "member of the forces" mean any person who has been on service in the forces during the war which commenced on the tenth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine.

"Service" is defined as follows in paragraph (i):

"service" means time served on active service in the forces while enlisted or obligated to serve without territorial limitations, or time served on active service in the Aleutian islands.

I am putting this proposal forward for the benefit of those who were absent from the country in the service of the country and were not here to protect themselves and their families when other people were in a position to buy homes and obtain occupancy before the freezing order came into effect.

The other proposal I have to put forward is in these terms:

That P.C. 9029, as amended to date be further amended by the addition thereto of the following clause:

"Nothing in this order in council or in any order or regulation made thereunder contained shall apply to prevent the recovery of possession of housing accommodation, in accordance with the law of the province, by the landlord thereof in the case of shared accommodation, as defined in the orders made under this order in council, where the tenancy thereof is created after the date of coming into force of this act."

I think that will give sufficient time for the necessary administrative steps to be taken. In order to put the matter on record, unless the minister desires to move an amendment himself, I will move the first of these as an amendment. I do not wish to be dogmatic about the form and I do not intend to hold to my precise wording. If the minister desires to give further consideration to these proposals in consultation with the officials administering these orders I shall be very happy if he will so indicate. I urge, with all the earnestness at my command, that these are matters that are deserving of amendment under the present structure of rent and tenancy control.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand it, the hon. member has moved only one amendment?

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, although I have circulated the other. In order to keep within the rules, I have offered simply the one for the moment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is more systematic to deal with one at a time. I have not the War Service Grants Act, 1944, before me, but do I understand that the definition of "member of the forces" in that act would include only those who served overseas?

Mr. FLEMING: The definition given in section 1 (f) of the War Service Grants Act refers to service, and "service" is defined in paragraph (i) in these words:

"service" means time served on actual service in the forces while enlisted or obligated to serve without territorial limitation, or time served on active service in the Aleutian islands.

Mr. ILSLEY: Unless my ears deceive me and my understanding is defective, that definition would include all members of the forces where they enlisted to serve without territorial limitation. It would not include members of the N.R.M.A.; but it would include everybody else; it would include the two or three hundred thousand men who did not leave Canada.

Mr. FLEMING: I want to make it clear to the minister that the suggestion I make is for the benefit of those who were absent from the country and unable to protect themselves. If the minister is prepared to take it the other way I shall be very happy to accept his view.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not prepared at all; I just wanted to permit myself the luxury of asking two or three questions. The second question I want to ask is this: Does it apply to members of the forces who purchase houses in the future?

Mr. FLEMING: No. I drafted this to mean that nothing in the present order or regulations made thereunder contained shall prevent the application of the law of the province in the case of recovery of possession by a veteran owner, provided that he complies with the law of the province in regard to giving notice of not less than three months.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer to my question is undoubtedly in the affirmative, but I just wanted to have it clear. According to that, the amendment would mean that a veteran could buy a house next week and the law of the province would apply to his recovering possession of that house. There is no limitation to purchases in the past as was suggested by one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues the other day.

Mr. FLEMING: Taking the converse luxury of answering the minister's question, may I say that if it is the view of the wartime prices and trade board, having regard to existing conditions, that they are not prepared to go that far, I would be quite content. It was my intention that the amendment should apply to purchases made hitherto in good faith. However I did purposely emphasize the fact that I am not being dogmatic about the language used. I am urging the minister to make these suggestions a matter of consultation with his officials. I do not pretend that the draft I have given to him is the last word.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not trying to embarrass my hon. friend; I am just trying to find out what he had in mind and just what was meant by the language of his amendment. It certainly means that if a veteran got possession of a house he could sell it the next day.

Mr. FLEMING: No. There is nothing here to prevent the wartime prices and trade board requiring the filing of an undertaking to occupy for twelve months, which was the term of the order prior to July 25, 1945. Under that order the purchaser of a property intending to recover possession filed with the wartime prices and trade board his signed undertaking to occupy for a period of twelve months. There is nothing in my amendment that would preclude a similar regulation being applied now by the wartime prices and trade board. I think it would be a reasonable condition, because there is no thought of opening the door to allowing veterans to make brokers of themselves. It is intended simply as a means of relief to the veterans who have made bona fide purchases of homes and cannot get into them for the occupation of themselves and their families.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if I might support what the hon. member for Eglinton is seeking to achieve, although I am not too sure about the wording of the amendment he has offered. I think he has been exceedingly fair and constructive in suggesting that the matter be considered by the minister and his officials. He has also indicated that he is prepared to accept any other way of dealing with the matter. I would suggest that it could be done by amending board order 511 or by issuing still another board order in connection with this matter. The hon. member for Eglinton made it clear that certain veterans who had purchased homes when they were overseas and did not have the opportunity to take possession of them, as was the case with civilians at home, were thereby discriminated against as compared with civilians.

If reference is made to board order 511 I think a further point of discrimination will be noticed. Order 511 of the wartime prices and trade board contains three special provisions under which a veteran may obtain possession of housing accommodation, and perhaps the hon. member for Eglinton will follow me since I am trying to support his case. I will read the first only of these provisions because the other two are ancillary. This is from board order 511 passed by the board under the provisions of the order we are discussing:

> Where he owned the accommodation at the time of his induction into one of His Majesty's services and is now a discharged member entitled to the war service gratuity under the War Grants Act.

Incidentally that is where the way of defending these people came from.

Mr. MUTCH: Anyone with over eighteen months' service.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. The point is that if a veteran owned the accommodation before he was inducted, whether he went into the service in 1939, 1944 or 1945, he can, provided that he meets the other qualifications, get possession of the house he owns. But the veteran who may have joined up in 1939 and purchased a home when he was overseas in 1942 or 1943, thinking that when he got home he would be able to do what civilians at home were then able to do, namely, get possession of his home, finds that he cannot get possession. So that there is discrimination there not only between the veteran overseas and the civilian at home but as between veteran and veteran.

While the minister has made a point regarding purchases now being made, and it is a point that will have to be considered carefully so far as the amendment is concerned, I think he will agree with the reasonableness of the case made for the veteran overseas. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg South supports that case. Perhaps the object could be achieved more easily if it were taken up by the board and a board order were issued. I imagine, if that assurance were given to the committee, the hon. member for Eglinton would be satisfied, as I know I would be so far as this point were concerned.

Mr. HOWE: I have an interest in this discussion from the fact that the department of which I am minister is responsible for providing emergency shelter. I point out that if the amendment proposed tonight were adopted the veteran would be able to take possession of the house he has acquired within the last two years as against the occupant, who might very well be a civilian, and it would be my job to provide emergency shelter accommodation for that civilian.

The veteran today has all the priorities that the state can give him. He has priorities in the rental of wartime housing and priorities in purchasing houses built under the integrated plan. Those two plans are providing the greater portion of low cost housing. He has other priorities on new construction, and he has priorities in the case of apartments that are built under certain government priority plans. Therefore the veteran has first call on low-cost government sponsored new construction. The civilian has none of these priorities.

I point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the veteran to whom he refers has been taken care of. The veteran who bought a house in 1942 or owned a house prior to the war is taken care of by an order recently issued, which entitles the veteran who had purchased a house before July, 1945, to make application to the court of rental appeals for repossession of his house and, if he has a case that will convince the court that he is entitled to the house he gains possession of it. That is causing many eviction notices to be given, and I am well aware of those evictions because it is my duty to anticipate the evictions by providing emergency shelter. I could have given the figures had I been prepared to speak on the point tonight, but I shall be glad to give them on another day. Many evictions under that order have been passed recently.

But there is a limit to the amount of emergency shelter that can be provided at this time. Buildings of the type we have been converting to emergency shelter are no longer available. For example in the city of Toronto every building that I know of that could be converted to emergency shelter has been converted and the city has extended its activities to far outside the boundaries of the city. If my memory serves me correctly, there are about 800 evictions pending in the city of Toronto as a result of the board's order to which I have referred. I believe they will be taken care of, but almost every eviction today means an equivalent amount of emergency shelter. Usually the returned soldier is living in shared quarters, and the possession of his house therefore means one less housing unit available to the population as a whole. The family formation rate at the present time is away in excess of anything this country has known before, and it is that family formation rate which is causing the lack of housing quarters at the present time. The wartime prices and trade board, which administers eviction control, and my own department, which administers emergency shelter, are working together to advance this problem of providing shelter for evicted families as rapidly as we can.

I assure the committee that eviction control must be the most difficult control of all to administer. I assure hon. gentlemen that the problem of emergency shelter is perhaps the most difficult problem that is associated with housing. We are working together. I am happy to say that at the moment we have a roof over the heads of every family in this dominion. There was a time when we could not make that assertion. There was a time, before eviction control was instituted, when we had the papers flooded with photographs of families evicted on the street with no shelter available. Fortunately, through eviction control we have prevented that from happening. That is one disaster that no government can face with equanimity, the possibility of a family, whether a veteran or a civilian having no shelter available, because, after all, human suffering is human suffering. We cannot advance the decontrol of evictions to the point where we have Canadian families evicted on the street without suitable accommodation to go to. That is the practical difficulty in carrying out the desirable proposal of my hon. friend. I can assure him that the officers of the wartime prices and trade board and all the officers having to do with housing are putting forth their best efforts to hasten the day when the step which he proposes can be taken; but I can assure him that, after the most exhaustive study of the problem and from recent discussion of it with my own officers and with the officers of the wartime prices and trade board, the step which has been taken recently is one, the full consequences of which will be felt only over the next four or five months. I can say that it is the considered opinion of everyone closely connected with this problem that that step must be absorbed before any further step can be taken which will increase the number of evictions of families in this country.

Mr. MICHAUD: I should like to say a few words very much along the same line. The remarks I intend to make are of a general nature and they will apply to civilians as well as to returned men. It is in connection with the termination of leases. I quite realize that the amendment suggested would cover cases, and perhaps an undertaking by the minister that board orders would be amended along the same line would have the same result. I have in mind civilians who have purchased houses after July 25, 1945. The necessity for these regulations is not nearly so great in the country and in small towns as in congested areas. As a matter of fact, when these regulations were first introduced they affected only the more congested areas in Canada. Eventually they were extended to the whole of the country. I live in a small town of about 7,000 population. I believe that if a certain amount of decontrol were effected along the lines which I am about to suggest it would not create a situation such as that described by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

My suggestion would be that the order passed recently—I do not remember the date of it or the number of the order—to which the minister and the two last speakers have referred, whereby people who purchased houses between the fall of 1944 and July 25, 1945, could apply to the court or to the rentals administrator to show cause why they should be given possession, should be extended to purchases made after July 25, 1945. There are a number of people who purchased houses after that date without realizing what the law was and who were unaware of the change which had taken place. Prior to that date, they could purchase a house and obtain possession after six months' notice. I have in mind the case of a young man with five or six children who has been living in the second story of a large building. He purchased his house shortly after July 25. It is a self-contained house. It just happens that the gentleman who occupies the house has two grown-up children who are in boarding school. He and his wife both have a business. They sit very comfortably in this little house. They refuse to give possession to this good neighbour who has six young children and who is occupying a second-story flat. My suggestion is that the order be extended to self-contained homes of a limited value, let us say under $5,000. It could be limited also to rural sections and to small towns. In such cases it would relieve a number of people affected such as the gentleman I have in mind, and it would not cause any serious disruption. It would not mean many evictions, but it would give a certain amount of relief to these people who bought houses in good faith, thinking that in the near future they would be in a position to obtain possession.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have a case which I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. It is an important case affecting a veteran who had a house prior to the war. On his return from the war he was unable to gain possession. I think this case is of general importance. It went through the courts in Toronto, and I have had considerable discussion with the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Finance concerning it. It shows the sort of difficulties that we are running into. Here is a veteran, I shall call him Mr. M, who rented this house, say, from the evidence I have here, prior to the war. On his return from the war in 1945 he received an agreement from the tenant to the effect that the tenant would be prepared to vacate the premises on such and such a date or after a period of so many months from the signing of the agreement. What happened? The veteran asked the tenant to vacate. The tenant said, "No, I cannot vacate because I have no other place in which to live". He took the matter to the court and the court judged that the owner had no right to evict. I shall read the judgment because I think it is important. I took the matter up with the Minister of Veterans Affairs because this man is a veteran. Incidentally I shall send the complete file to the minister when I have finished with it. The Minister of Veterans Affairs said:

> So far as this department is concerned, this is not a matter over which our officials have any jurisdiction. I attach for your information a copy of memorandum recently prepared by the director general of rehabilitation in regard to rental control regulations. As I have no information as to when Mr. M purchased the property in question, I do not know whether this order would apply in his case. However, I shall forward your letter under acknowledgment to the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance took it up and said this:

> Mr. M attached to his letter two photostatic copies of a notice his tenant had given him that he would vacate the accommodation. The latest photostatic copy reveals that on April 18, 1946, Mr. R gave notice that he would vacate on or before the 31st of May, 1946. It appears to me that Mr. M should have exercised his civil rights at that time as rental regulations provide that dispossession is under provincial law if the tenant
> "has given to the landlord, after the making of the lease for the accommodation, but not as a term of the lease or a condition of obtaining it, a written notice of his intention to vacate the accommodation on a stated date, and has failed to so vacate."

That is the end of the legal quotation. Then the minister says:

> However, there is a possibility that Mr. M may have, after May 31, 1946, again created the relationship of landlord and tenant. If so, in my opinion, he would then come under rental regulations.

They took the matter to the court in Toronto and judgment was given against the landlord in the following terms; I think it is rather interesting:

> Like most of these cases, both parties are urgently in need of the accommodation, and it will be a hardship if the case is decided against either of them, but of course, I have to decide the case according to the law.
> The tenant is a monthly tenant of the landlord and on December 7, 1945, signed a notice addressed to the landlord in these words: "I hereby submit notice to vacate and give up the premises of such and such an address, Toronto 9, Ontario on or before the thirtieth of April, 1946, A.D., signed—

That is signed by the tenant. If this is a valid notice of intention to vacate, the landlord is entitled to possession. There was, however, a considerable conversation on the occasion when this notice was signed. To begin with, the notice was prepared by the landlord at the dictation, apparently over the telephone, of his lawyer; therefore it should be construed strictly as against the landlord. It does not say he gives notice he is going to vacate, he says he submits notice to vacate, but I am inclined to think that taking the words with the meaning which is closest and most sensible that it should be construed as a notice of intention to vacate. However, it was given under the following circumstances as I find the facts. The landlord said he wanted to get married, and he intended to get married in the month of April, and he wanted possession of the premises. He said he was entitled to a veterans' allowance, through the war, and he could not obtain this allowance unless it was spent on this house, and he needed to have something to show the veterans' authorities that he owned the house and had a right to possession. The discussion was a friendly one, and in a previous discussion the tenant told the landlord that if he wanted to get married, he would try and vacate the premises for him, and I think on that occasion he meant to, and said he would get out in April, if he were able to do so. In other words, if he were able to find other accommodation. The landlord replied that he would not put him on the street, but asked if he would sign the paper, as he needed it, which the tenant did. That is the evidence, and I do not think it was ever intended or ever understood that that notice should be used as a basis of an eviction application. If the tenant had understood by signing the notice he was waiving his right and protection under the wartime rental regulations, I am quite certain he would never have signed it. Perhaps his unfamiliarity with the law does not help, but I think what does protect him is the fact the notice was given for a particular purpose, and it was not intended by either one of them that it should be used as a waiver of the tenant's rights and as the basis for an application. The situation created by the improper use of this notice was the cause of the tenant giving the second notice, and therefore I find it must not be regarded as a notice of intention to vacate. For these reasons the application will be dismissed.

That, Mr. Chairman, is an involved case but it shows, I believe, the length to which veteran owners are put in the effort to regain possession of their own houses. Here apparently was a man owning a house before he enlisted. He is unknown to me, but I give the facts as I read them on the file. He went overseas and came back and got married and wanted to get possession of his house. Apparently, from the evidence, he gets an agreement from his tenant that the tenant is willing to vacate. His tenant then refuses to vacate because he cannot find other accommodation, and the court rules that under the wartime rental regulations the signed agreement by the tenant is not a valid agreement.

I would not bring this particular case to the attention of the committee if it were not one of many that have come to my notice. In fact I have received a great many more of these cases than of any other types of complaint about housing and rental regulations, and I suggest that serious consideration be given to the amending of these regulations to allow a veteran who has had overseas service if you like—I would prefer to leave it at service overseas, men who were out of the country—to regain possession of his own premises.

I realize the difficulty of evictions. My riding is one of the most congested in the whole dominion. No one knows better than the minister of reconstruction and myself the difficulty we have had about emergency shelter along the lake shore area in the three municipalities outside the city of Toronto. I know the situation and I know what we are up against. Here is the case of a veteran—this man happens to be a fit veteran, but I have several cases of veterans who have a disability—who cannot get possession of his own house, even though the tenant is willing to vacate if he can find other accommodation.

I realize that the question is a difficult one. I realize, as the hon. member for Eglinton does, that you cannot be dogmatic about it, but I feel there should be some amendment to or alteration in these regulations whereby it may become easier for a veteran with overseas service, or a veteran suffering disability, to regain possession of his own house. I will not make any specific amendment, but I wish to put the matter up to the minister most sincerely, because in my opinion it is causing a great hardship. In judging these matters we realize that we cannot have perfection. We are bound to base our judgment on the greatest good for the greatest number, and I submit that the minister and the department should give the most serious consideration to seeing that some amendment is made in these regulations to meet the type of cases that I have brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister of reconstruction, to my regret, has indicated that he does not favour the amendment, and I want to appeal to him to change his mind. He recited the benefits available to veterans in the way of home building, but he realizes that all these things do not help the veteran who already owns a house and does not want wartime housing or integrated housing or some other house, and who, by reason of owning his house, has probably used up all his gratuities and benefits and could not buy an integrated house in any event. I think the very fact that a break has been made between November 1, 1944, and July 25, 1945, even though the situation to which he has referred with respect to evictions has arisen, is proof that this change which is proposed could be entertained. If I may say so, it really should have been entertained before the change which was made on March 1, because veterans not only in Toronto but all over the country have a real sense of grievance over this particular point.

I have a letter here which is in the words of one of these veterans and not in the words of the hon. member for Eglinton, myself or any other member, and he puts it very well. He refers to the recent relief granted to anyone who bought a home between November 1, 1944, and July 25, 1945, and he says this:

> But this in no way affords relief to the ex-serviceman who is the greater sufferer in Canada today from lack of housing. War was not over till long after that date for us. This date being set by law, does not afford us much hope of obtaining possession of our homes. We, the greater percentage of veterans were in Europe on that date, awaiting transportation back to Canada. We came back to Canada, used our credits and savings to purchase homes and many like myself have been waiting six months and more for our government to lift the controls, so we now may have possession of our homes.
> This law stipulating July 1, 1945—

He means July 25.

> —as the date, has placed us who came back from overseas in a very bad position. I do not see that the veteran was being considered at all when this law was framed.

I wish to point out another thing which adds to this sense of grievance. I know of a case in Vancouver where the veteran purchased a house but could not get into it. He is paying $40 a month for his present accommodation. He is paying $60 a month on an agreement for sale on this house that he bought; he is receiving only $30 a month rent and, into the bargain, of course, is not getting his house. Every month he has this fact recalled to his attention in a forcible way by paying out $100, getting back $30, and not having possession.

I, too, realize that it is a ticklish situation, but I am quite sure that the minister, with his resourcefulness, will be able to handle the veterans who are in this situation as well as the general public who were relieved for that period of six months. If the latter was considered advisable, then I am sure that the veterans who, I firmly state, have a prior claim for the reason given in that letter, could be handled as well. At least I would hope that the veteran cases would not make what the minister has called a bad situation very much worse, and that he will not say that it cannot be looked after with the present situation.

I want to point out, too, that this freezing order is two years old. In the middle of last summer I made this very representation to an authority of the wartime prices and trade board and suggested then that the time limit for repossession be not three months but a whole year in order to give the person in the veteran's home a long time to look around and find himself some other accommodation. I want to point out to the minister that the longer you leave it, if you are to give these people any relief, the worse it will get; because the earlier you do it, the longer period of notice you could give to relieve the situation. I hope that the government will take this into consideration further and see what they can do to relieve these people; because in this whole question of keeping people out of their own houses we are on dangerous and difficult ground, and that very difficulty is likely to make the authorities fear any change. In these cases, especially in hardship cases, I think the duty on the authorities to try to give relief is the stronger, because the difficulties influence them, if I might put it in this way, to try to leave things static.

Mr. MUTCH: I do not take second place to anyone in the house in my consideration for the problem of the veteran who seeks to reestablish himself in a home. But I think there is something inherent in this whole problem which touches the veteran and all others who seek homes at this particular time. I am one of those who consider that the continuation of the legislation protecting against evictions and controlling rents is not only advisable but is an absolute necessity at this particular time. But I have come to the conclusion that we have now reached a point where general blanket legislation covering the whole country is no longer able to meet individual conditions. Beyond question, there are in this country people who are taking advantage of the protection of the anti-eviction legislation in order to keep themselves comfortable at the expense of other Canadians and who could not under ordinary conditions do that, and do not need to do it.

I should like to suggest to the minister that now is the time to consider seriously placing in the hands of someone the authority to deal with conditions where they arise. I am aware of the difficulties of leaving the matter to the local administrator of rental controls. Perhaps it should go to the county court judge. Perhaps it should go to an independent commission. I shall not suggest to whom it should go, but I suggest to the minister and to the committee that the time has come to decentralize authority with respect to this matter and to allow someone or some body to consider the specific conditions in the locality where the situation arises. May I give one concrete instance, and then I am through.

In the city from which I come, I know of a man who owns a six-roomed house and who is now renting and living in a five-roomed bungalow; there are the man, his wife, three children and his wife's mother. He has on several occasions suggested to his tenants, who are a man and his wife with no children, that it would be possible to trade; and he has arranged with his landlord for them to move into the bungalow and permit him to move into the house which he owns where he would have adequate accommodation. The landlord of the bungalow is in agreement. The houses are both in the same district. There is no difficulty beyond this, that the house which he owns has central heating and no one has to carry out ashes; the other house has a modern furnace.

Mr. MacNICOL: Which house had the furnace?

Mr. MUTCH: The furnace is in the bungalow which he is renting; the central heating is in the house that he owns. I suggest to the minister that the individual who takes advantage of the protection which is in the legislation at the present moment is not worthy of the protection which is afforded. That legislation was not intended to take care of people of that sort. The legislation was intended to provide the maximum of accommodation, with comfort, for everybody in this country. I have cited a specific case. Those people are reputable people who are just being, perhaps I should say, intelligently selfish because the law permits it. But I suggest that we should give serious consideration at this time to some measure of decentralization which would permit the decision, as to whether or not an eviction should be permitted, to be made by a local authority that would be able to view the circumstances as they actually exist. I think we are past the state of emergency when we can simply afford to say, "Because you have been in a house for a certain length of time you may stay there, no matter who else is inconvenienced."

Mr. TIMMINS: I should like to align myself behind the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Eglinton, because in my municipality there is a great deal of difficulty on the part of returned men who want to fit themselves back into home life. I have had to do with three types of cases in which veterans have been discriminated against. The first are cases where the veterans come back and want to settle down in civilian life, and go out and buy homes without having obtained any legal advice. There are a good many cases of that kind. In the second case the veteran receives his gratuity or credit and wants to get himself a stake in the community, so he buys himself a home. In the third case the veteran, through no fault of his own, has become the owner of a home, and finds he cannot get possession. He is perhaps living with his parents or in some shared accommodation for the time being; a child comes along, or a second child, and still he cannot get possession of his home. I have taken up cases of this kind with the rental administration in Toronto, and they tell me that, while there are not too many of these cases, there are some. I personally know of four or five returned men who, by reason of the freezing order are not able to fit themselves back into civilian life with their families.

I quite appreciate what the minister of reconstruction says in regard to the problem, but I do not think that problem with respect to civilians is so severe that these veterans cannot be given some relief. The original order in council came into force on October 11, 1941. We have had it now for more than five and a half years, and it seems to me that by this time we should be able to do something for the veteran who finds himself in this position through no fault of his own.

Then the hon. member for Eglinton proposed a second amendment with respect to shared accommodation, that as of the date the amendment might become effective the law of the province should prevail in respect to shared accommodation. In other words, under that amendment a landlord would be able to take people into his home and, after a certain length of time, get rid of them if they did not fit into the surroundings of that home. If that were done I feel that it would not be very long until landlords would be making way for people in their homes, which would help meet the problem to which the minister of reconstruction referred, and I believe a start should be made in that direction.

In dealing with this order in council, we find that it has been amended nine times; but the order in council and the amendments do not contain the meat of this problem. That problem is contained in the orders which have have passed under the order in council, the residential order, No. 294 and the commercial order, No. 315. In addition, there is order No. 511, about which I had forgotten but which was referred to by another hon. member, and the further order referred to by the minister. So I suggest that something should be done to have these orders compiled in some form that would let us understand what we are talking about when dealing with them. I believe the time has come when these orders, which really form the basis of the problem before us, and which as a matter of fact are not before us at all, should be dealt with and screened, so that what is best in the orders might be retained and what has become outdated and outmoded might be discarded. I am suggesting that these orders and regulations made under the original order in council and amendments be not now passed; that they stand and be referred to some committee in order that they may be reviewed for the purpose I have indicated.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South mentioned one or two points I thought were very good. His way of going at it is a little different from mine, but this is the first time the house has ever dealt with these orders, so that I think he should find some means of getting at the best that is in them. In the past these orders have been like the laws of the Medes and Persians; no discretion whatever has been allowed. In cases which I am not going to take time to recite there have been anomalies and hardships; the judges have admitted this to be the fact, but they have been unable to deal with them by reason of the terms of the orders. In some cases people have given their word to vacate at a certain time or to pay a certain rental for a property. Those promises have not been kept, but the courts have not been able to deal with the situation.

I was very glad to see that section 2 of order 707, passed on April 7, 1947, made some provision for levelling up rents as between landlords and tenants. That matter had been dealt with in the commercial rental order for a number of years, but had been left out of the residential order, I presume purposely. I cannot think of any reason why it should have been left out, except that apparently the administration felt they did not have the staff to deal with the matter. In that respect a great number of anomalies occurred, but apparently nothing could be done about them. I am suggesting that a good deal of the discretion which should and might have been exercised under section 36 of order 294 by the rental administrator, or the deputy rental administrator in each jurisdiction, should be extended so that, where these anomalies occur, there would be some way of rectifying them. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South that legally no emergency exists today under which these orders in council can be continued. However, we are permitting them to go on the statute books, and it seems to me that, where any discretion should be permitted in order to meet these anomalies, that ought to be done at this time.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 21, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRINCESS ELIZABETH

CONGRATULATIONS AND BEST WISHES TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the house know that Her Royal Highness Princess Elizabeth is celebrating today her twenty-first birthday. His Excellency the Governor General has sent a message of congratulations and best wishes to her Royal Highness, and I am sure it will be the wish of all hon. members to have it noted on Hansard today that the House of Commons desires to be associated in the closest possible manner with the expression of these congratulations and good wishes.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, what the acting leader of the government has just said expresses I am sure the views of every member of this house. On behalf of this party I want to associate myself with what he had to say.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister has expressed I think the views of every member of the house, and we in this party wish to be associated with this expression of congratulations.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, speaking for this group I am sure that the Acting Prime Minister has expressed the wishes of the whole house, and we wish to be associated with what he has said.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane) moved that the first report of the standing committee on external affairs, presented to the house on Thursday, April 17, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND REPORT REFERRED BACK

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane) moved that the second report of the standing committee on external affairs, presented to the house on Thursday, April 17, be concurred in.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this report contains numerous recommendations, and I move in amendment to the motion that the second report be not now concurred in but be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the report should be sent back to the committee for further consideration. The time has gone by when we should be sending abroad these missionary committees which amount to nothing. All the information on Palestine and UNO can be found in the library, but members are not studious enough to go into the library and learn something about the united nations, which is a failure. If the United States and Great Britain cannot solve the complicated Palestine question coming before the united nations, nobody can. The Palestine question is a very complicated one and is made more so by the presence of Jews in Germany as well as in Palestine. On the other hand the Arabs, who are very powerful, have aided Britain and have supporters in every country. We are spending money like water on these useless missions like the UNO all over the seven seas. I object to this report being adopted. It should be sent back to the committee.

Amendment (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

2. Other than three periodicals published by the Department of National Health and Welfare, all health education material such as books, pamphlets, folders and posters is produced in quantity at the federal level and shipped in bulk to provincial departments where it is used by public health nurses and others in closest contact with the public. Quantities for all V.D. literature are determined by the provinces and then shipped to them after printing. This is in accordance with a recommendation made by the Dominion Council of Health.

In addition a great many individual requests are received and filled by this department for such publications as "The Canadian Mother and Child". Such requests come from expectant mothers, doctors, public health nurses and others in that field of endeavour. Further, many requests for informational material are received from groups and organizations such as the Women's Institutes, Red Cross, Home and School Associations and others. The department makes every effort to fill such requests as received.

3. There are no mailing lists maintained for individual publications other than for the three periodicals mentioned below:

(a) Canada's Health and Welfare, circulation 85,000 (English and French).

This bulletin is designed as a clearing house for health and welfare information between federal, provincial and municipal departments and independent and voluntary health, welfare and social service organizations. It seeks to publicize nation-wide health and welfare policies and problems, to acquaint each province and municipality with advances in other provinces and municipalities and to instil in medical, public health, welfare and community leaders a greater appreciation of health and welfare services. It is distributed to all doctors, dentists, public health workers, social service and welfare workers, nurses, legislators both federal and provincial, teachers, municipal officials, clergy, trade unions, service clubs, women's organizations, libraries, newspapers, radio stations, and to many private citizens who request copies. The circulation list is, in common with other departmental periodicals, under constant revision.

(b) Industrial Health Bulletin, circulation 35,000 (English and French).

This monthly publication circulates to all plants employing fifteen or more people; all federal and provincial legislators; house organs published in Canada; newspapers, magazines, and other similar periodicals; trade union and industrial associations. (There are presently 3,259 English and 1,740 French copies circulated to trade unions alone).

(c) Canadian Nutrition Notes, circulation 6,700 (English and French).

This periodical is circulated to nutritionists, restaurant people and others interested in that field of activity. The circulation list was built up as a result of individual requests. The original issue of Canadian Nutrition Notes carried an invitation to all those interested to write to the Nutrition Division of this Department to be put on a circulation list.

Five other mailing lists are maintained by the Information Services Division of this Department as follows:

Press releases to newspapers, 250.

Trade paper and other special releases—40, National Health Radio Notes—125, "Canada's Health" column for English and French weekly newspapers—300, press fillers—1,120.

These, it will be seen, are not in fact publications but are, as the names indicate, press and radio releases.

MOUNTED POLICE—SERVICE OVERSEAS

Mr. ISNOR:

1. How many R.C.M.P. personnel served overseas?

2. How many were killed or died overseas?

3. Were they on loan from the R.C.M.P. to the army?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. With (a) the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Provost Company, (b) the former marine section (on transfer to Royal Canadian Navy), and (c) the former aviation section (on transfer to Royal Canadian Air Force), 395.

2. Twenty-five.

3. In the cases of the men who served with the provost company and those former members of the aviation section, they were on leave of absence without pay. In the case of members of the former marine section, an order in council was passed on the 29th December, 1943, P.C. 141/9868, directing that the time served by these men in the Royal Canadian Navy, during the second great war, should be considered as leave of absence, without pay, for pension purposes.

Note:—It is believed that a considerable number of other members of the force, who left it at the expiration of their engagement with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, joined the fighting forces and served overseas, but only very incomplete details are available regarding these.

MARINE INSURANCE BROKERAGE—PARK STEAMSHIP COMPANY

Mr. FLEMING:

1. What broker holds the marine insurance on Park Steamship Company?

2. When was this insurance placed through him?

3. What brokers previously held this insurance, and on what terms?

4. Why was it placed through the present broker, and on what terms?

5. What other insurance, if any, does such broker hold for other crown companies and government departments and government boards, and what premiums have been paid for such insurance?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Dale and Company Limited of Montreal. The insurance held by this broker covers liabilities of Park Steamship Company Limited in so far as damages caused by its vessels are concerned. The vessels themselves have never been insured.

2. 1942.

3. None.

4. The insurance was placed through this broker after due consideration of their organization and the service they could render.

5. None, in so far as this department is concerned.

EMPIRE DEFENCE POLICY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has any meeting or conference as yet been arranged between the governments of Great Britain and of Canada and the governments of New Zealand, Australia, South Africa and other parts of the empire and crown colonies or any officers thereof since the war with Germany closed on the absolute need of a common defence policy for the future defence of the empire?

2. If not, what action will be taken to secure such a conference or such a policy for the defence of the empire?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. The answer to the question in the terms in which it is put is a negative one, although of course, since the war with Germany closed, the governments of the members of the British commonwealth of nations have been and are in continuous touch with one another, both on the ministerial and the official level, on questions affecting their respective defence forces.

2. Answered by No. 1.

IMPORTS OF LUMBER FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. HODGSON:

1. How many thousand feet of lumber were imported from the United States (a) from January 1, 1946 to December 31, 1946; (b) from January 1, 1947 to April 1, 1947?

2. What were the different kinds of lumber and what were the quantities of each?

3. What price per thousand feet was paid for each different kind of lumber?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. (a) 58,937,000 F.B.M.; (b) The only figures available are from January 1, 1947 to February 28, 1947—13,484,000 F.B.M.

MERCHANT SEAMEN—MEDICAL CARE

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

1. What services are maintained or assisted by the Department of National Health and Welfare for the medical care and welfare of merchant seamen in Canadian ports?

2. How many seamen have been treated under the various authorities administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare, according to the last reports issued?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. (a) Such medical, surgical or other treatment as the case requires is provided under authority of Part V of the Canada Shipping Act.

(b) Grants are made annually to twelve institutions assisting sailors, in eight of the chief ports, namely Halifax, Sydney, North Sydney, Saint John, Quebec, Montreal, Vancouver and Victoria.

(c) Under authority of order in council P.C. 1862 of March 24, 1941, maintenance and medical care are provided for non-resident seamen who, because of mental or physical disabilities, were left in Canada during the war and whom it has not yet been possible to return to their own countries.

(d) Under authority of order in council 164/6991 of September 4, 1943 (as amended) treatment of Canadian fishermen and seamen who were granted such treatment during the war years is being continued until their entitlement is completed.

(e) Under authority of order in council P.C. 9002 of November 23, 1943 (as amended) treatment of repatriated Canadian merchant seamen who were prisoners of war is being continued until their entitlement is completed.

EMPIRE DEFENCE POLICY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to an address by the Rt. Hon. Viscount Bennett, former prime minister of Canada to the Women's Advertising Club in London, England, on April 15, that "Britain could no longer defend the commonwealth of nations?"

2. What has been done since the last session of parliament to secure a common defence policy for the empire, and what action has been taken in the matter?

3. Will any conference be held with the other dominions and the mother country on this matter, and when?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Not otherwise than through the publication in certain newspapers of reports of the address referred to.

2. The governments of the members of the British commonwealth of nations have been and are in continuous touch with one another on questions affecting their respective defence forces.

3. No arrangements have been made for any such conference.

CIVIL SERVICE—NEUROPSYCHIATRIC EXAMINATIONS

Mr. TREMBLAY:

1. How many neuropsychiatric examinations of civil servants did the mental health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare do in 1946?

2. How were they referred?

3. For what reasons were they referred?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Forty.

2. Almost all were referred by the civil service health division of this department.

3. Chiefly in connection with applications for retirement on grounds of nervous and other complaints for which an organic basis could not be found. A number were referred for an opinion on degrees of disability in cases of frequent absences from work.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What ambassadors or other representatives have been appointed to foreign countries by the government of Canada, and where?

2. What was the cost to the country for 1946 and 1947?

AID TO THE BLIND

Mr. BLACK (Chateauguay-Huntingdon):

What aid does the federal government provide for blind persons other than pensions under existing statutes?

PENITENTIARY ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER, ETC.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That a bill be presented to the house to amend the Penitentiary Act to make provision, inter alia, for the appointment of a commissioner and two deputy commissioners and for the payment of such salaries thereto as are approved by the governor in council; and that the Civil Service Superannuation Act shall apply to such commissioner and deputy commissioners.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Having regard to the notice of motion moved by the Minister of Justice, may I ask him whether the appointment of these commissioners and deputy commissioners would indicate that progress is being made in implementing the Archambault report, and whether the house may expect him to say something in that regard in the fairly near future?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall be prepared to make a statement on the matter at the time the bill is introduced or on second reading of the bill, but the present status of the Archambault report is pretty well set out in the report of General Gibson, which was laid on the table some time ago. It is not intended to implement in full the findings of the Archambault commission.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PENSION OR SUPERANNUATION BENEFITS TO SENIOR APPOINTEES SERVING OUTSIDE CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide pensions or other superannuation benefits for senior appointees of the Department of External Affairs serving outside Canada and the wives, widows and dependents thereof.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION

ARRANGEMENTS TO ASSIST POLISH VETERANS TO ENTER CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is it true that special arrangements are being made to assist more Polish veterans to enter Canada at this time? If so, what are they?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): It is true that special arrangements are being made to assist more Polish veterans to come to Canada at this time.

Mr. LENNARD: Why?

Mr. MITCHELL: Did the hon. member say "pourquoi" or "why"?

Mr. LENNARD: Why?

Mr. MITCHELL: I was looking down in the other corner. It is a fact that arrangements are being made. Originally we agreed with the British government to receive four thousand Polish veterans who fought in the last war. A team has left for overseas—they left on Saturday—for the purpose of examining and bringing the remainder of the four thousand to Canada under conditions similar to those under which the previous Polish veterans came to Canada. If the hon. member would like to know the name of the team I can give it now.

Mr. COLDWELL: It might be just as well.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask the minister a question with reference to the admission of 4,000 Polish soldiers to Canada? Will the Canadian government use its influence to see that all eligible British immigrants needing transportation from Britain to Canada be given transportation before the remainder of the 4,000 Polish soldiers are taken care of?

(On the motion for committee of supply:)

May I ask, Mr. Speaker, why the minister does not condescend to answer the question?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): There is no question of condescension. My hon. friend was just asleep at the switch, that is all. I think this can be stated, that the question of transportation for these Polish veterans is under the jurisdiction of the British government and their fare is paid by them. My hon. friend's question might better be directed to the British government than to me.

HOCKEY

WINNING OF STANLEY CUP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to address a remark to hon. members representing Montreal island. I would call their attention to the fact that the Maple Leafs won the Stanley cup on Saturday night, and last fall the Argonauts won the Grey cup in rugby.

BUTTER

AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the announcement last night that there are sixteen million more pounds of butter in Canada now than last year, will the minister say when a more adequate supply may reach Vancouver island, where there has been a shortage for many months?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I think the remark that most often met British Columbia members when they went home at Easter was the supply of butter for British Columbia. Members from that province have pretty well all taken part in asking for some information; therefore I am pleased to answer now the question just asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo.

The situation throughout British Columbia has been very difficult in recent weeks. There are several factors which have a bearing, among the most important being a tendency to store butter in expectation of realizing a profit when the present eight and a half cents per pound government subsidy is withdrawn by May 1. Announcement by the government on March 19 that the government will insist upon a full recovery of inventory profits after the subsidy is discontinued has helped the situation but has not overcome it altogether. A second important factor in the shortage has been slowing down of shipments from the prairie provinces. The administrative officials have been taking all steps available to keep the British Columbia market supplied with butter and are continuing to put forth every effort in this regard. Since January, 1947, all butter offered in Saskatchewan and Alberta has been moved into British Columbia and no shipments have moved into the eastern provinces since that date. Last week four carloads of butter were directed to British Columbia from Saskatchewan. In addition a supply of 8,000 boxes, or 450,000 pounds, of imported butter has been transported across Canada from the east coast into British Columbia.

According to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures on butter storage as at April 1, 1947, stocks of butter in storage in all parts of Canada are somewhat higher than at the same date last year. Even British Columbia has somewhat more butter in storage than one year ago. It is however, as you can imagine, extremely difficult to divert and order out supplies which are held by a very large number of operators, not only large packers but also retailers, restaurants, hotels and so on. The situation in eastern Canada is undoubtedly better than in British Columbia but, as I have stated, the costs of transporting butter from the east to the west is one important factor against doing so.

Mr. WARREN: I wish to ask a question, and I think it ought to be directed to the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). In view of the great shortage of butter in British Columbia, what has gone wrong with the cows of the Fraser valley?

Mr. MacNICOL: The Fraser valley can speak for itself.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEASURE TO PROVIDE SUPERANNUATION BENEFITS —MR. JUSTICE DAVIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question, arising out of the resolution of which notice was given today, to make provision for the payment of pensions or superannuation benefits to senior appointeees of the Department of External Affairs serving outside Canada. In view of the fact that Mr. Justice Davis, the new ambassador to China, has left to take up his duties, is the minister in a position to say whether he has tendered his resignation as judge of the court of appeal of Saskatchewan?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): I am not in a position to give that information. I am not aware of the resignation. I am not in a position to say definitely.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

QUESTION OF EXTENSION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he say whether a bill extending the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to British Columbia this year will be introduced this session?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): There is really no bill under consideration to extend the P.F.R.A. to British Columbia, but there has been under consideration the possibility of introducing two bills which would extend the principle of P.F.R.A. to all Canada. That is still under consideration and possibly will be brought in this session.

SUPPLY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

FINANCE

57. Departmental administration, $83,703.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May the item stand?

Item stands.

FISHERIES

75. Departmental administration, $184,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The item will stand.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

95. Departmental administration, $224,092.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Stand.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before the item stands, I do not think this is quite in accordance with the promise given to the house. The item should not have been called, let alone allowed to stand. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the acting leader of the house, gave this undertaking, as reported at page 1870 of Hansard:

I shall not ask to open more than two departments unless at the time I have the consent of the house to open more.

I think the house showed commendable restraint today in not raising any question but in allowing the government to go on with its business. We should be satisfied with the two items that have already been called and allowed to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If there is any objection I at once accede to the hon. member's suggestion, but there were three departments mentioned by my right hon. colleague. I move that the committee rise and report progress with respect to the two items that have been allowed to stand.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Cutting out Justice?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Progress reported.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Friday, April 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On P.C. 9029.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We were dealing with the wartime leasehold regulations. I think the minister had some amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say a few words with regard to the wartime leasehold regulations as amended by this new order in council. There have been meetings in the cities and municipalities over the week-end with respect to these matters and there is a great deal of dissatisfaction being expressed not only by landlords but also by tenants. This amended regulation will not improve the housing situation or the leasehold situation. Many people do not want to go into rented property because of the heavy monthly overhead cost. I do not know where we are going to be in the coming winter. The landlord has no chance to get into his property. He may have had long before the war, but he has no chance at all today; he cannot get into it. It is confiscation of property; that is what it is. Is it any wonder that no houses are being built? In the city from which I come, sixty-five per cent of the people used to own their own homes. Can soldiers or civilians move into wartime leasehold properties built by the government under these regulations at a fabulous rent per month which they never before paid? I fail to see how the situation will be improved by this amendment. With neither the landlord nor the soldier able to get into his own house, it amounts to confiscation of property. The tenant can go in and cause rack and ruin; the insurance companies will not carry the risk, and the mortgagee wants further payments on principal.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Eglinton had an amendment.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes. I submitted one amendment for the consideration of the house and indicated the contents of a further amendment which I proposed to introduce. I urged on the Minister of Justice consideration of the subject matter of my first proposal indicating that I was not attempting to be dogmatic about the form of it. Perhaps the minister has given the matter some consideration since then, and if he is prepared to make a statement on it I shall happily defer to him.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I made a short statement on this subject on Friday night.

This is a situation which concerns the Department of Reconstruction, for the reason that, by cooperation with the cities and municipalities, the Wartime Housing and Mortgage Company so far has been able to make it possible to keep a roof over the heads of Canadian citizens. I am exceedingly anxious that we shall continue to do so. The hon. member for Eglinton has moved an amendment to the wartime leasehold regulations whereby a veteran may secure possession of any house owned by him. No one in this house would deny that such a step is desirable if circumstances permit. The argument against this amendment is exactly the same as the argument for retaining eviction control generally. Throughout the country there is acute housing congestion, and the housing requirements are being met only by a very large amount of involuntary multiple occupancy.

I think it is fair to say that a large part of the multiple occupancy is that of the veteran and his family living with their in-laws. The exact size of this multiple occupancy is difficult to determine, but from sample surveys it would appear that there was multiple occupancy ranging from ten to twenty per cent, depending upon the municipality. There is a general impression that congestion is largely in the metropolitan areas. That is not correct. In many instances the multiple occupancy is much heavier in municipalities of 5,000 to 15,000 than it is in Toronto and Montreal.

For instance, in August 1946 it was found that in Carleton Place there were 1,100 families and only 900 residential units in which to house these families. This means that in Carleton Place there were 200 individual units housing more than one family, and about 400 families living in multiple occupancy. Another case in point is Smith's Falls, where in September 1946 there were 2,700 families and 1,946 housing units.

Under the present wartime leasehold regulations there are circumstances under which an owner may secure possession of a house owned by him. Experience has shown that where permits or orders are given for possession, there is a net loss of living accommodation. The extreme case is an owner living in multiple occupancy of rented premises who is given right of possession to a house owned by him which is also in multiple occupancy. The net effect of such a transaction is the loss of two units, because it is most unlikely that the residence which the owner leaves will go back into a state of multiple occupancy. In other words, the owner of a house and his family will take in his son and daughter-in-law and their family, but if the son and daughter-in-law leave, it is most unlikely that the owner of the house will take another family into multiple occupancy. The two families dispossessed by the returning owner are in the market for two units, which under present conditions are not available. There are, of course, certain instances in which an owner, given the right of possession to the house he owns, leaves his residence to take possession of the owned premises where there also is a single tenant. It is estimated that under present conditions 1,000 evictions involve the net loss of 750 units for this reason.

In February, 1947, a change was made in the leasehold regulations, known as board order 688, whereby individuals who had purchased a house between October 31, 1944 and July 25, 1945, may secure possession on three months' notice provided that a court of rental appeals find that the need of the owner is greater than the need of the tenant. As at March 31 there were 1,433 applications received under order 688, not including Alberta and Nova Scotia. The status of these applications as at March 31 was:

Applications granted	224
Applications dismissed	56
Applications pending	1,153
Total	1,433

I have outlined these figures in detail because, although they are very much smaller in number than would be occasioned by the proposal of the hon. member for Eglinton, nevertheless the granting of these applications will place an additional burden upon our efforts with the municipalities to find space for evicted tenants.

To illustrate the situation I should like to give the hon. members figures for shelter needs in Ottawa. There are 484 units of emergency shelter in occupancy in Ottawa. There are 36 notices approved by the wartime prices and trade board to vacate self-contained units, most of which have effect on May 1. There are 57 notices approved by the wartime prices and trade board to vacate shared accommodation by May 1. In addition to these 93 cases of eviction, there are 74 families living in distressingly over-crowded or substandard conditions which are described by the emergency shelter administrator as being urgent cases. In addition to these 167 cases there have been 38 applications received under board order No. 688 to which I referred earlier. Applications have been granted in twelve cases, and there are fourteen more cases pending. To meet the needs of approximately 190 cases in all, the balance of available units in Rockcliffe, six in number, will be completed on May 1. We are at work on 120 emergency shelter units at Uplands to be completed by June 1. The potential of available shelter in all is 126 units.

Hon. members will see that even under the present restricted rights of owners to secure occupancy of residences owned by them and before any such amendment as now proposed, the municipalities are having difficulty in meeting present needs. I have used Ottawa as an example, but I can assure the hon. members that Ottawa is no more congested than the average municipality.

During the last eighteen months we have been working very closely with the city of Toronto along the same lines. There also we are coming to an end of buildings available for conversion. In greater Toronto there have been 417 applications received under order 688, of which 58 have been heard, 34 granted, 14 adjourned, 5 with reserved judgment, and 5 dismissed. We are not at all sure that even under the present regulations immediate needs for shelter in Toronto can be met.

It is to be remembered that the municipalities themselves are bearing the main burden of looking after families without accommodation. The dominion has been assisting the municipalities by making buildings available and by financial grants. Nevertheless the problem is one which must be faced by the municipalities. A change in the wartime leasehold regulations as now proposed will, in my opinion, make it impossible for the municipalities to meet increased needs. A chaotic situation would be created. I would remind hon. members of my statement of last Friday in which I pointed out that the supply of surplus buildings available for conversion into shelters is running very low. It is going to test our ingenuity to look after even present needs. I believe that such a step by the dominion at the present time would be most unfair to the municipalities. Some of our officials feel that even the increase occasioned by board order No. 688 has created a situation which may prove beyond capacity to meet. I will not attempt to estimate the number of evictions which might be caused by the proposal now before the house. I can assure the house, however, that the evictions resulting would be many times those occasioned by board order No. 688.

Hon. members must remember that in a condition of heavy multiple occupancy changes in tenancy result in a net loss of units. The housing situation is so tight that we cannot afford to lose units, and indeed there may be no place for evicted families to go. No one denies that the rights of owners should be restored as quickly as possible. There is, however, a most extraordinary situation in the housing field, and at this time the most economical use of our short supply of housing must be weighed against the rights of the individual owner. The proposed amendment might create thousands of additional evictions at a time when the municipalities are putting forward their best efforts to deal with a very difficult situation. I firmly believe that any step which would increase the number of evictions at this time is against the public interest.

The government is making every effort to examine its orders in council in the light of criticism from the opposition. So far, in considering this measure in committee, changes have been made at the suggestion of the opposition which the government believed could be made with reasonable safety to the state. In the case under discussion I am convinced that the government would be derelict in its duty if it agreed to an amendment which in its opinion undoubtedly would have the effect of putting on the street families for whom no shelter can be made available. I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton would not wish to sponsor legislation which would have that effect. I would ask that he reexamine his proposed amendment in the light of the additional information I have just given, and consider withdrawing it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I wonder if I might add just a word. The committee will recall something of the history of rental control and of eviction control, and will remember that when the general freeze was put on in July, 1945, it was primarily to protect members of the armed forces and their families. Most of the troops were not then home, of course; at that time comparatively few had returned. It is also true that on their return a good many bought houses, but I thing we should remember that a great many returned veterans did not, and I am satisfied there are infinitely more veterans who are tenants than veterans who are owners of property.

As my colleague the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has pointed out, the fact is that there simply are not enough rental dwellings in Canada available for those who occupy that type of accommodation, and that is the problem we have to face. The rental administration, in view of the fact that there is a general freeze, has endeavoured to provide a reasonable and orderly way of seeing to it that those who now have a roof over their heads will continue to have such a roof, until building has increased to the point where some relaxation of the eviction controls can be made. I am convinced that it would not be in the interests of the veterans themselves to provide now for a relaxation as suggested by the hon. member for Eglinton. Already some relief has been given under order 688 in regard to purchases made between November 1, 1944, and July 25, 1945, but as my colleague has pointed out that has resulted in a considerable number of applications for eviction, and some dislocation. I am satisfied that if an amendment were made now to the order, as suggested, it would result in veterans ousting veterans; and I think it is obvious that it would put a premium on the veteran who was in a financial position to purchase property as against the veteran who was not.

Taking all those factors into consideration it seems to me the government could not agree to an amendment to the rental order which would permit veteran owners being given this special protection.

Reference was made by my hon. friend to the control of shared accommodation. He seemed under the impression that there was no means of evicting tenants occupying this type of accommodation except by application to the court of rental appeals. Well, a large proportion of family units do live in shared accommodation. I am advised that something in the order of twenty to forty per cent of families in urban centres now live in rooms. All these people can be evicted on six months' notice. In view of the acute shortage of housing accommodation, it is felt that is the minimum length of notice which should be allowed. That is permitted under article 428 of the board, which permits the landlord to recover possession of such accommodation on six months' notice, which may be terminated at any time during the calendar year if he desires the accommodation as an extension of his own residence, but he is not bound to continue to occupy such accommodation for any specific period after recovery of possession.

I have always believed, personally, that these special rules which are made for veterans often defeat the very purpose for which they are set up. In the present instance I believe my hon. friend would agree that we would have to restrict it to veterans who had purchased their houses before a certain date. If you allowed it to continue in the future you would have a wild scramble for houses, and it obviously would break down. There would be discrimination at once between the veteran who had the financial means to purchase a house on a certain date and the man who would like to purchase one and finds that he can do so now. But more serious is the fact that you still have the veteran who owns the house in effect ousting some other veteran. The veteran may not be occupying the house that he gives notice of eviction for, but undoubtedly it will result in the eviction of a substantial number of veterans.

I suggest to the committee that we leave the regulations as they are. I can assure the committee that the rentals administration and myself as minister are only too anxious to see that every relaxation is made which can be made fairly in the interests not only of the veterans but of all the people of Canada. Those relaxations will be made just as soon as we feel that can be done properly. Goodness knows it is no pleasure for the rentals administrator, and perhaps it is less pleasure for me as minister to have to resist what are undoubtedly deserving cases. Eviction control is a difficult and unpleasant thing to enforce, but I am satisfied the time has not yet come when we can do away with it.

As I said before, I am convinced that the suggested relaxation in favour of veterans who purchased their houses up to this time would not accomplish good for a considerable number of others; and I am satisfied that for the veterans themselves it would not be good.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would it not be possible to set up some authoritative body to deal with these emergency cases which are causing so much trouble?—perhaps not a blanket order in council, but an authoritative body with latitude to deal with the most urgent cases.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have been working on this matter for the last week or ten days, and giving the closest attention to the question whether there could be some extension of the powers of the court of rental appeals, or perhaps the appointment of commissioners or something of the kind to look into these hardship cases. I assure the hon. member however that it is a difficult matter. We are working on it now, and I hope we shall be able to work out something. Obviously it will be easier when conditions have improved somewhat—and they are improving all the time, as additional housing units are put up. My answer is that the question is being given active attention at the present time.

Mr. FLEMING: Perhaps I might be permitted to say something by way of clarification of the proposal. In the first place, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, in the statement he has read to the committee, has dealt in dark terms not only with the present situation but also with the situation which might arise if my proposal were given effect to by the committee. Times have changed. Previously we have been treated to the most optimistic and expansive statements in the house about the great headway that the government claimed was being made in the housing programme. Now, when a proposal is made with a view to bringing justice to veterans against whom, in effect, there has been discrimination, the picture is painted in dark colours. I mention this in passing, because it is a fact which may have to be referred to in the future.

I did not bring forward a proposal which would have the effect of increasing the difficulties of the problem. I brought before the committee two proposals, one of which was designed to give justice to veterans against whom discrimination does now exist. I coupled with that, in the second place, a concrete proposal which would have the effect of greatly increasing the available supply of housing accommodation.

I was interested in hearing the indication given by the minister this afternoon of the high proportion of families occupying shared accommodation. That is most significant. Where families are occupying properties owned by veterans who under this proposal would be entitled to occupation of it, not only would there be provision for such persons in the increased supply of shared accommodation available under my second proposal, but there would be a great deal more of it.

The Minister of Finance suggests that more veterans may be hurt by this proposal than would be helped by it. I do not know where he gets his figures. It is perfectly clear that the proposal is confined to cases where veterans are owners and desire the accommodation for their personal occupation. It does not touch at all veterans who are tenants of persons other than veterans. I submit that that would be the great proportion of veterans to whom the minister was referring when he spoke about the number of veterans who are tenants. The only such veterans who would be affected by this proposal are veterans who are tenants of veterans.

In these cases, obviously what the government ought now to be doing—or what it should be urging the wartime prices and trade board to do—is to bring about an extension of the effect of order in council P.C. 688. Surely before that order was made by the wartime prices and trade board, and before the government gave its approval to it, the situation must have been canvassed. That order had the effect of opening the door to recovery of possession by owners, regardless of whether they were veterans—and of course the great proportion were not—if they purchased the property between October 31, 1944 and July 25, 1945, the date of the freezing order.

In my humble submission the government took the measure which should have come second ahead of the measure which should have come first. They should have taken steps in the first place to put the veterans in at least as good a position—I would have said a preferred position—as that occupied by non-veteran owners. But surely the situation was canvassed at that time by the government to see that there was available a sufficient supply of housing accommodation to take care of any tenants who in the net result might have been dispossessed.

Something has been said to the effect that in view of the rate at which the number of families is increasing, the effect of dispossession is to lessen the total available housing accommodation per family. There may be something in that. It may be that in most cases veterans who are living in hovels, garrets or perhaps in a room or two, trying to keep their families together, but who have purchased houses and want possession of them for their personal use, would be living in larger quarters if they obtained possession of the places they have purchased. That is one reason why I have seen fit to put forward this constructive proposal with respect to freeing a great deal of housing accommodation which would be available today, on a shared basis, if it were not for the terms of the proposed order.

I come to the point raised by the Minister of Finance with reference to the terms upon which a landlord can recover possession of shared accommodation. He refers to the fact that possession can be recovered on six months' notice, but, Mr. Chairman, you know that that is not very helpful in inducing people to let one or two rooms in their house. The other provision for dispossession applies to a finding by the rentals board that the tenant is obnoxious. I do not need to emphasize again the extreme difficulty that is faced by a landlord in proving that a tenant is obnoxious within the terms of that rule. The terms of the order with reference to recovery by landlords of shared accommodation are so strict—and the minister must appreciate this—that they discourage many people from making available one or two or three rooms in their homes which are surplus to the needs of the occupant. It is an unquestioned fact, and it cannot be denied, that the order is discouraging people from renting shared accommodation. The occupants of homes who have more space than they need simply will not take people into their homes because of the great difficulty of ridding themselves of the tenant if he proves difficult and unpleasant.

I quite agree with the observations of the Minister of Finance about the necessity of fixing a deadline for purchase by the veteran. I made it clear when I spoke on Friday last, and certainly in answer to questions of the Minister of Justice, that that was my proposal, that this provision should not be extended to cover future purchases of homes by veterans because of the danger of some of them making brokers of themselves. So there should be a deadline, I suggest March 31, 1947. Then it would be quite clear that the period is closed now.

I should like to offer an observation with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on Friday last. I share his view as to the desirability of having amendments of the kind I propose made in the regulations issued under the order rather than in the order itself. There are difficulties of draftsmanship, some of which have been indicated already, if we must proceed to deal with the situation by amending the order which appears in the schedule to the bill. If we must have an amendment of this kind inserted in the order it would be very much better, I think, to include it in the scope of order 688, but if the government is not prepared to accept that suggestion one is left with no alternative but to move an amendment to the order as set forth in the bill.

Something has been said as to the situation that would be faced at once. Inherent in my amendment, and I laid stress on it, is the fact that there is a proviso in the amendment that any notice to vacate given under its terms would not become effective for three months. In that respect I simply add the concluding terms of paragraph 6 of order 688.

One final observation, and this has to do with the suggestion of the Minister of Finance as to the case of a veteran dispossessing a veteran. I do not know how many of these cases there are, but I think there are very few.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE: At least fifty per cent.

Mr. FLEMING: We have no figures on this. I have no doubt that the minister of reconstruction before he made his statement consulted the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and got estimates, but there are no precise figures. We are dealing with the opinions of certain people.

Mr. ABBOTT: To say that there are very few of these cases is a bold statement.

Mr. FLEMING: I would put it this way—relatively few. I am speaking from my own experience with a difficult situation in Toronto.

Mr. HOWE: Even though the soldiers were overseas their families in many cases were in rented accommodation since before the war. It is the families of veterans the hon. member proposes to turn out.

Mr. FLEMING: I contradict that flatly. The minister of reconstruction ought not to be making statements of that kind. It is not the families of veterans I propose to turn out.

Mr. HOWE: The freeze was put in to protect those families.

Mr. FLEMING: What I was about to say was this. The case can be fully dealt with if the government would simply apply to the kind of case to which I am referring the provisions of order 688 which relate to cases of equal or greater hardship. Surely in these cases if the situation were brought before a county court judge it would be possible to protect any who need protection and do it adequately. That is the scheme of order 688 at the present time. Let me remind the house of article 5 of order 688, and I repeat that this is the way in which this ought to have been handled instead of leaving it to the house to make amendments to order 9029, because the result could be achieved under the terms of the regulation much more neatly and with much less danger of misinterpretation. Article 5 says, and I am submitting that this is the way to deal with these cases:

> On the hearing, the court may require such further information in such manner as it may direct, may adopt such procedure as it deems proper and, according to what it deems reasonable and just in the circumstances as established, having regard to the relative needs of the landlord and tenant for the accommodation and the relative hardship resulting from any order that might be made by it, may make an order permitting the landlord to recover possession of the accommodation in accordance with the provisions of section 6 of this order, or dismissing the application. No costs shall be awarded to either party and the decision of the court shall be final and conclusive.

I think that if the government and the wartime prices and trade board will proceed along the lines I have suggested, no hardship will be done, and in the net result not only will you have eliminated a discrimination operating against a veteran purchaser but you will have made more housing accommodation available. Personally I do not know how you can hope to increase the supply of housing accommodation substantially and almost immediately in any other way than to provide that the present order as to possession by tenants of shared accommodation shall not apply to tenancies hereafter created. I am not proposing that it shall apply to any existing tenancies of shared accommodation, but if you confine the proposal to tenancies hereafter created I know that there is a great deal of housing accommodation that would become available.

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to say a word on shared accommodation. I am informed by the officers of the board that no occupant of shared accommodation whose conduct is really objectionable is protected by the court of rental appeals. I would point out that the word used in the order is not "obnoxious." The tenant's conduct need only be incompatible. That word was used deliberately in order to allow more latitude in evictions in the case of shared accommodation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Was that an amendment?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that was in order 477. Security of tenure and the rental ceiling are closely linked in dwelling accommodation. The government fully realized the irksome character of the measure which was being enacted in granting security of tenure beyond the law of the province to a tenant who occupied an integral part of the landlord's own home and shared its facilities. Acting on that principle on October 1, 1943, we removed security of tenure from that type of accommodation. Well, the results were most unfortunate. As I stated a few moments ago, between twenty and forty per cent of the population of urban centres live in that type of accommodation, so that any untoward increase in the rental of the accommodation has a far-reaching effect. By the end of July, 1944, the board found as a result of freezing from security of tenure that type of accommodation that they had lost all control of the rental price of shared accommodation. Therefore board order 428 was enacted giving the tenants of such accommodation security of tenure terminable on six months' notice in the fashion I indicated a few moments ago.

There is no doubt that the heavy demand for dwelling space still continues and still reaches down to the shared accommodation. I know the hon. member for Eglinton will agree with me in that; indeed he has already so indicated. Therefore there is no doubt that landlords fortunate enough to have available for renting shared accommodation which has not previously been rented, or which has become vacant, would be able to demand and obtain far higher rental than the board would approve or has approved. I do not think there is any question as to that. But the new tenants, without security of tenure, would keep on paying such excessive rentals as the tenants similarly situated did between October, 1943, and July, 1944. The landlords still saddled with tenants will be restive in their position of inferior advantage and will be seeking constantly to get their tenants out in order to take advantage of the admittedly illegal increase in revenue which the proposed amendment would permit. The resultant loss of control, disturbance and bickering makes the suggestion most unattractive. Therefore on balance, as I said before, while the government is most anxious to remove control on these matters, the shortage of dwelling space remains so acute that our rental officials, who have had extensive experience in the administration of these orders, assure me that to attempt to remove security of tenure from this type of accommodation would make it impossible to continue to exercise any real control over the rentals. It is for that reason in particular that I am reluctant to consider such amendments as that put forward by my hon. friend.

Mr. MICHAUD: I should like to bring out a point in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton as to shared accommodation. He referred particularly to the reluctance of people to rent rooms because, as he put it, the six months' notice is no great protection to the landlord. When either shared accommodation or regular tenancy is entered into for a period of five months or less it is not subject to board order 294 respecting housing accommodation. You can lease a house or rooms for a period of five months without being subject to order No. 294; but if it is renewed for a further period it comes under the order. Therefore persons who are prepared to lease rooms may try out their tenants or their roomers for five months and at the end of that period they will know whether the tenants are desirable or not. If they are not desirable they do not have to be kept the full five months; they may be put out at the end of one month. For this reason it would seem that a good deal of the objection to renting on such a basis is eliminated. If landlords are not aware of that, they should be made aware of it. There should not be this objection to renting rooms on the shared accommodation plan.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is that statement correct?

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me that the two ministers who have spoken have made an unanswerable argument to the wide provisions of the proposals made by—

Mr. HOMUTH: I am surprised at the statement made by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. I should like to ask the minister if this statement is a correct interpretation of the law.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I was looking over some papers at the time the statement in question was made.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is convenient that the minister was, then.

Mr. ABBOTT: What was the statement?

Mr. MICHAUD: The statement I made was the law some time ago at least when I happened to be dealing with such cases. If you rent premises for a period of five months or less they do not come under the order so far as eviction is concerned. But if you renew them they do.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Only once in a year.

Mr. MICHAUD: After the first five months you are under control. If the premises are rented for less than five months the landlord remains in control of his property and he can evict.

Mr. LOCKHART: The hon. member said the tenants could be put out in one month. I want to know whether that statement is correct. My interpretation of it is that if you rent from month to month—

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that a prospective landlord can make any provision he likes for eviction in his initial lease provided the term is for five months or less. I was not familiar with the detailed provisions of the order. Apparently he can have a trial period of five months or less and make any provision for eviction he wishes; but if he renews it or carries it on after that period then it becomes subject to the rule.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When did that order come in?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that that has been the law ever since the order was first enacted on October 1, 1940.

Mr. CASSELMAN: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: 1943.

Mr. KNOWLES: To get back to the matter that was being discussed between the ministers and the hon. member for Eglinton, as I see it the ministers have made a conclusive answer to the wide provisions that his proposals would entail. However, there is one part of what the hon. member for Eglinton was seeking to achieve which I supported the other night, and I should like to refer to it again and ask for comment from either of the ministers concerned. I have in mind a veteran who purchased a house after he went into the armed forces, and who is now a discharged veteran within the terms of the definition set out in board order No. 511. The point I was trying to make the other night was that that veteran should be put in the same position as the veteran who owned accommodation before he was inducted into the service. I have before me—

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a minute; in order to get the hon. member's position correctly, he says that the veteran who bought in the face of the freeze should be put in the same position as the veteran who did not; is that it?

Mr. KNOWLES: What does the minister mean by "in face of the freeze?"

Mr. ILSLEY: The veteran who bought after July 25, 1945 bought in the face of the freeze; that is, he knew he could not get possession of his premises if the law stayed as it was on July 25, 1945, whereas the veteran who bought before that had no such knowledge. Does the hon. gentleman say that the two veterans should be put in the same position?

Mr. KNOWLES: No; I am talking about the veteran who bought before July 25, 1945.

Mr. ILSLEY: I see.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad the minister has raised that point. That is the point I want cleared up. I believe the minister answered the hon. member for Eglinton quite forcefully with regard to purchases subsequent to that date. It is a sorry picture the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply had to paint today about the housing situation which faces us, but on balance the government does have the responsibility of causing the least possible disturbance and the least possible chaos, and I think anyone would have to be very careful about suggesting any release of the eviction control. When one rises to make a suggestion on this matter he has to have thought it through pretty carefully.

Board order 511 does enable the veteran to obtain possession of housing accommodation for his own use, and I quote directly from the order:

1. Where he owned the accommodation at the time of his induction into one of His Majesty's services and is now a discharged member entitled to war services gratuity under the War Grants Act.

That last phrase, of course, is a way of defining a discharged veteran so that this privilege is not given to all veterans; for example, to those who may have been in only a few months. To bring the matter to a head my suggestion is that it would be fair to the veterans concerned to insert in that order the words: "or purchased it before July 25, 1945", so that the paragraph would read:

Where he owned the accommodation at the time of his induction into one of His Majesty's services or purchased it before July 25, 1945, and is now a discharged member, entitled to the war service gratuity under the War Grants Act.

To put the matter in terms of a specific case, I have in my hand the correspondence regarding one, although a case I have upstairs is better. I brought this one down, however, because the relevant correspondence has board order 511 in it. The one upstairs is the case of a veteran who enlisted early in 1939 or 1940 and bought a house about 1942 or 1943. He was overseas at the time and the purchase was made by his wife. At that time there was no freeze on and it was possible for the purchaser of a home to get possession of it, but by the time the veteran came home he found he could not get possession of the home. This complaint is not against civilians; it is that veterans who went in later than he did can get possession because they owned their homes prior to their induction into the services, a privilege denied the class of veteran for whom I am now speaking.

I do not think this would affect very many. I thoroughly agree with the principle which the other two ministers have stated, namely, that we have to be very careful about releasing eviction control, and I urge it only where I feel there is a real grievance. I am speaking about this case in these forceful terms in order to get it across if I can, but what I really want is a comment on the matter from the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: I leave it to the ministers more directly concerned to comment upon the hon. member's remarks, but I should like to make the position clear. The hon. member has clearly delineated the class of veterans whose case he is placing before the committee, but he made this statement: the veteran cannot get his home. In some cases, perhaps in all, he can get his home. He has to prove that the hardship of keeping him out is greater than the hardship of turning the tenant out, but he has to meet the hardship test. The law is not that if he bought a house at any time from October 31, 1944 to July 25, 1945, he can get the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Remember, I am talking about cases as between veterans. The minister says he can get possession by meeting the hardship test.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the other veteran who may have enlisted later happened to own his own home before he went into the service and he does not have to meet the hardship test because he is provided for under board order 511. That is why I am asking that a simple amendment be made to board order 511. This does not open it wide, as has been suggested. As a matter of fact, it does not solve any great problem but it does meet a real grievance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was wrong in saying that if he bought the house at any time he can get it by meeting the hardship test. If he bought it before October, 1944, it was necessary for him to have given notice—

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: —but if he bought it after October, 1944, it was not necessary for notice to have been given.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hardship test applies only in that nine months period.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right. But should there not be a difference between the man who left a house, which he owned, to go overseas and the one who buys a house after he does go overseas? Should there not be a difference between the two? Is not a man entitled to feel that if he leaves his house and goes into the service he can get the house when he comes back. If a man buys a house after he goes into the service we have a different situation and it should be a question of balance of hardship as between him and the other man. Do not forget the tenants here, because some of these houses are occupied by the families of returned soldiers. There are a great many such people and I want hon. members to realize that in concentrating on the hardship to landlords they should not forget the hardship to tenants, because there is nothing more distressing than to see the streets filled with evicted women and children.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister is talking my language when he says that, and I agree with him thoroughly. I would not raise a case of this kind at all if I did not feel that there was a just grievance, and even then I would not raise it if I thought it would result in the government permitting widespread evictions such as the minister deplores. That must not happen. But in answer to the minister, I would point out that the veteran in question owned the house before he went overseas, which case is different from that of the veteran who purchased afterwards. I think the minister will realize that in making comparisons we are saying nothing whatever against the right of the veteran who owned his house before he went overseas. We do not want these remarks to detract from that right in any way whatsoever, either legally or morally. Bear in mind, however, the position also of the veteran who purchased a house after he went overseas. In many cases the purchase was made then because the veteran before the war was not in a position to buy a home because he was unemployed, perhaps never had a job, and so on. During the first two or three years he was in the services and was overseas, married and with allowances, he was able to save enough to make a down payment and to look forward to occupying a home when he came back and to having the same rights that civilans at home were able to exercise at the same time.

I think the Minister of Justice and I have the thing straightened out and know what we are talking about, and I should be glad if he or the other ministers would comment on the possibility of amending board order 511 as suggested. I know it does not go as far as the member for Eglinton would like it to go, but if we had an assurance that board order 511 would be looked at in this way it might meet the hon. member's point.

Mr. ABBOTT: I wish to add a word. This has been a useful and constructive discussion, but our difficulty in the matter is that we have no accurate statistics on which to go, and we cannot very well have them. We do not know how many servicemen are tenant occupants, we do not know how many veterans are owner occupants, because that information has not been made available. I am sure the committee will believe me when I say that other members of the government and I are just as anxious as any other member is to see that we make a relaxing order of this kind if we can safely do so. I am only guessing but I think there probably would not be a very large number of cases such as we have just been discussing, of soldiers who, either themselves or through their families, bought dwellings or had dwellings bought for them while they were overseas, and if that is the case it might be possible to amend the order as suggested without causing any serious dislocation.

The committee will realize of course that it is not appropriate to amend these orders on the floor of the house; that has to be done by the board, because that is the way the machinery is set up. The only assurance I can give the committee is that we will give immediate and sympathetic consideration to seeing whether that additional relaxation can be made.

So far as order 688 is concerned, remember, we knew that there would be of necessity a relatively small number of cases involved between these two terminal dates, and it was in conformity with the good faith principle of not changing the rules of the game after it had started that we felt we could make that relaxation. If the order can be amended to extend this right to apply for possession to a veteran who purchased his property after he had entered the service, we will do it. I cannot give any positive assurance, but I will look into it at once and see whether that can be done.

Mr. MICHAUD: I wish to say a word in connection with the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It applies to civilians as well as veterans. In the amending order of July 25, 1945, freezing evictions for purchasers of houses, there was provision for making application to a certain person within a certain time, and in New Brunswick it happened to be to the county court judge. I do not believe this is as a matter of right, but he happened to be the person to whom application was to be made. The purchaser of a house had the right to apply within a certain time to that county court judge, in our case, to show that he was desirous of securing the house for himself. Let me try to put it a little more clearly. The order stated something to this effect, that any notice given by a purchaser of a house was annulled by the order. The purchaser could go before the county court judge and ask to have this notice revived. In quite a few instances of which I am aware, persons who had purchased houses within a month or two months before July 25 did make the application; in all cases the order was revived and they were given the right to take possession of their houses pursuant to the notice. If we analyse the situation in the light of this proviso, it boils down to this: the people who had purchased houses before July 25 were either anxious to get possession or they were not.

Mr. KNOWLES: You mean October 31, 1944, do you not?

Mr. MICHAUD: July 25, 1945. As to the people who had purchased houses at any time before July 25, 1945, if they had given notice to the person in possession of the house to vacate, the order annulled that notice. But there was a period within which they had the right to apply to the proper officer to have this notice revived. In all cases which came to my attention the notice was revived, and therefore they could take possession of their houses according to the terms of the notice. If people who had purchased houses had not given notice, it is a fairly good indication that they had not purchased the house with a view to securing immediate occupancy. People do buy houses just for the purpose of keeping them rented. So it seems to me that only very few people would be affected—those who perhaps had bought houses within a few days before July 25 and did not have time to give notice, or did not feel in a hurry to give notice.

Mr. HOMUTH: They did not know when they might be back.

Mr. MICHAUD: If they did give notice, there was a remedy provided in the order in council for them to apply to have the notice revived. I know that in all cases which came to my attention the notice was revived and they were given permission to take possession of their houses.

Mr. HARKNESS: Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I have not been at all impressed by the arguments of the ministers against the amendment, which is designed to give to veterans the right to secure possession of their own houses. As a matter of fact the arguments of the ministers have chiefly tended to act as red herrings across the trail of simple justice. Instead of trying to bring in a large number of factors, most of which the Minister of Finance has just admitted are guesswork, I submit that the matter should be considered on that basis of simple justice; should a man who went to fight for his country, and who purchased a house while he was away, or after his return, be allowed possession of that house or not? On the basis of justice alone, without any of these extraneous matters brought in, I do not think there should be any argument in the matter. Ninety per cent of the population of this country would look at it as a matter of justice to these men to enable them to get back their houses or to secure possession of the houses they own. It is on that basis and that basis alone that we should consider the matter. All of the rest of the considerations which the minister has brought up are mostly guesswork, anyway.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not guesswork that one man can afford to buy a house and another cannot.

Mr. HARKNESS: The Minister of Finance expressed the opinion that this amendment would do the veterans more harm than good; in other words, that more would be thrown out of houses than would get houses. A little later he admitted that there were no statistics at all on the matter. I contend that he has no basis for making that statement. As a matter of fact in all the cases which came to my personal attention the veterans had bought houses which were not occupied by other veterans. I admit, as I think everybody will, that certain houses purchased by veterans are occupied by other veterans. But the number is relatively small; instead of being half or more than half, as the minister would have us believe, I think the number would run to about ten or fifteen per cent, and not more than twenty per cent. I am convinced that if this amendment were adopted, the percentage of veterans who would be displaced would be comparatively small.

I was surprised to hear the Minister of Reconstruction say, as I understood it, that multiple dwellings are all right for veterans but are a bad thing for other people. That in my opinion was the general sense of his long statement. It seems to me that the veterans have been forced to live in these multiple dwellings long enough, and that if we can get some of them out of multiple dwellings we should make an effort to do so. I believe we should let some of the other people try this multiple dwelling business rather than continue to make that the lot chiefly of the veterans.

Mr. MERRITT: The Minister of Finance has made unfavourable comparisons between a veteran who is able to purchase a house and one who is not. I should like to point out to him that his colleague, who is sitting beside him, is doing his best to get veterans to buy houses now. There is nothing wrong in a veteran being able to afford to buy a house.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say there was.

Mr. MERRITT: He should be encouraged to do so. However, what I rose to say was this. The ministers have shown that they have no real information on this subject. Many of us have thought for some time that the case of a veteran who had not arrived back from overseas at the time the freezing order came into effect is much more important than that of one who served notice in the six or nine months preceding that time. I myself had occasion on August 17 last—I have the letter here—to write on this subject, bringing to the attention of the wartime prices and trade board authorities two cases exactly the same as those referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I was very glad to hear the minister say this has been a constructive discussion, because I am certain there are many cases of hardship such as have been mentioned from this side during the debate, in which relief could have been granted if letters such as mine, asking that they be considered and setting out typical cases, were taken seriously under consideration. If that had been done in the past I feel it very likely that these veterans would have been given relief before those who were relieved on March 1. I hope the difficulties in this connection, now that we have had the restrictions for two years, will not prevent the ministers from finding some solution for the hardship cases, and finding out exactly, through the Department of Veterans Affairs or by some other means, what the effect would be, because these are the cases about which we are prinicipally concerned.

I want to say one thing more. It is all very well to put up telling arguments against the amendments that have been proposed by the hon. member for Eglinton. No one knows better than the hon. member himself that it is the job of those on this side of the house to criticize and the job of the ministers to govern. But by simply arguing against proposed amendments we do not get anywhere. Recently when I was in Vancouver I spoke to the past president of the apartment and rooming house association, who told me two things, one of which may interest the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This man told me that seventy-five per cent of the members of his association were small people who depended for their livelihood on the operation of one particular house; and he said that if future tenancies were freed from control and operators were permitted to get rid of people they considered undesirable, in shared accommodation, there would be ten thousand rooms opened in the city of Vancouver. That was his opinion from surveys made by his association. If there are ten thousand rooms in Vancouver which are not occupied now by reason of something in the rental regulations, then whatever it is in those regulations that prevents those rooms from being occupied should be found out and removed, whether it is the objection raised by the hon. member for Eglinton or something else.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should think a great many of those would be single rooms.

Mr. MERRITT: They might be, but he told me they were empty now.

Mr. ABBOTT: Single rooms for unmarried people.

Mr. MERRITT: And they are empty now because people do not want to be stuck with undesirables if they take them in.

Mr. BRUNELLE: This afternoon it seems that everyone has been referring to particular cases of hardship. I was glad to hear the Minster of Finance say he would try to establish a court or commission or some authority to take care of those cases. Since this is going to be done I want to suggest something to the three ministers who are here, and possibly to the officers of the board. I see at least three bureaucrats sitting before the minister. I have been looking at them since this debate began, and they seem to be quite ordinary, normal human beings and quite sympathetic looking. I would say they compare quite favourably with members of the opposition, whose faces have become quite elongated since they have had to change their whole policy in regard to controls.

As I say, I should like to suggest something to the ministers for their consideration when they come to establish that court or commission to look after these cases of hardship. Some changes were made in regard to eviction concerning people who acquired property between October, 1944, and July, 1945. As to those who acquired property after 1945, the minister stated they had been properly looked after and did not get the increase of ten per cent because, in having their rates fixed, the investigators had taken into consideration the increase in the cost of materials. I should like to tell the minister that the investigators did not always take into consideration the increase in the cost of materials. I understand that some verbal instructions were given different offices of the wartime prices and trade board, but those were only verbal instructions. From now on I hope definite instructions will be given these offices, so that they will know what to do in order to compensate for the increase in the cost of materials.

I would also point out to the minister that some hardship was created by taking the 1941 rentals as the basis, since at that time some cities were still suffering from the effects of the depression, because a mill had been closed or for some other reason. In some cities rentals were very low at that time, yet those rentals have served as the basis for fixing rates for those who have built new houses. So I would suggest that the minister give consideration to instructing those who may form this court or commission that they keep in mind the fact that after 1945 the investigators did not always allow for the increase in the cost of materials, and also the fact that in 1941 rates were different in different places, that in some cities rentals were abnormally low. It is my suggestion that these abnormal rates should no longer serve as the basis for fixing new rentals.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether there is any interim report as to the percentage of Canadian tenants who are taking advantage of the opportunity to sign two-year contracts at the increased rates. I have heard reports to the effect that the landlords are not signing these agreements. They are under the impression that we shall get rid of rental controls entirely in the very near future, and rather than run the risk of being stuck for two years with a ten per cent increase they are taking a chance on getting a greater increase later on. I imagine that if the amendment to clause 4 of the bill, moved by my deskmate, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is supported by the committee, it will give the people of this country a little more assurance that controls are not going to be ditched entirely.

While I am on my feet I should like to suggest to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that he pay a little more attention to the statistics coming from his own department. After our discussion Friday evening, I checked up the Curtis report on housing and community planning, published under the authority of the minister.

Mr. HOWE: Not this minister.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is a report on reconstruction; and I think the minister is responsible—

Mr. HOWE: The Curtis report was made long before there was any Department of Reconstruction and Supply. I can assure my hon. friend I had no responsibility for it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I suggest that the minister still has on his staff people who worked on the preparation of this report, and that the statistics still stand. At page 111 of the report there is a table setting out the percentage of wage-earner tenants in twelve metropolitan areas of Canada. These figures are based on 1941 statistics. Possibly the minister will argue that earnings have been higher recently. But I suggest that if these were the averages at that time—

Mr. HOWE: Do you think they have been higher recently?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think likely they were higher in 1946 than they were in 1941. I am not arguing that. But I said if this average prevailed in 1941 they would have to go up 100 per cent to bring the majority of people up in that category. The following is a table showing the family earnings distribution of wage-earner tenants in the low income group for the principal metropolitan areas, in 1941:

	Under $1,000 per cent
Halifax	71
Saint John	96
Quebec	88
Montreal	82
Ottawa	62
Toronto	49
Hamilton	44
London	58
Windsor	41
Winnipeg	81
Vancouver	88
Victoria	71

This suggests it is not an unusual thing for the wage-earner in Canada to have to budget on less than $1,000 a year. In this connection I would suggest that the leader of the opposition ought to read some of the statistics prepared under his supervision. If he would turn to part V of the Manitoba case before the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, prepared while he was premier of Manitoba, he would find that statistics are such that in Manitoba—

Mr. MANROSS: Bring yourself up to date.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That was a time when your leader prepared statistics. There were a large number in Manitoba at that time—and there still are—who are getting less than $1,000 a year. Both the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply should bring themselves up to date.

In one of the recent publications from the minister's department, "Sixty-Seven Homes for Canadians", we find at page 5 a table setting forth how easy it is to secure a home under the national housing plan. It states that anyone who is prepared to budget at $25 a month is able to provide for interest, principal, taxes, fire insurance, heating, water, maintenance and repairs. These items are covered by the $25 a month, and one can have a house for that amount. That is a house with a lending value of $2,150.

Well, I imagine that for that amount one could put in his foundation in most cities at the present time; but he certainly could not have a roof over his head. Then, if you can appropriate a larger sum, $80 a month, you can secure a house with a lending value of $8,000, repaying the interest and principal over twenty-five years. On this one can have a maximum loan of $6,400.

I believe that, with building costs in most centres of Canada as they are today, one would find that a $8,000 house is no better than a $4,000 house would have been five or six years ago. There are very few Canadians who are in a position to budget for $80 a month to cover interest, principal, fuel and all the rest of it.

I submit that the government is falling far short of providing adequate housing, but I shall not discuss that point at greater length at the present time. However, while I am on my feet I would express the hope that until the government has developed ways and means of embarking upon an adequate housing programme, until it has subsidized low-cost housing by cooperating with the cities and provinces, it is imperative that some protection be given to the people who now have shelter but who would be out on the streets if the landlords had their way.

Since the Minister of Finance is now in his place, would he be good enough to make comment on the question I asked in the first place in regard to the percentage of tenants who have been able to sign agreements for an increase of ten per cent for a two-year period? Also would he indicate whether, before the board granted the increase, the landlords were able to show that they were in straitened conditions, and that they were likely to be taken under control by the sheriff if some relief were not given.

Mr. ABBOTT: As to the first point, I am advised that thousands of forms have been taken by landlords, but we have no figures as to the forms actually used. I have no doubt that in due course some data will be available. Up to the present time, however, we have no idea how many landlords have sent these forms to their tenants.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Can the minister give any assurance that no further increase will be granted while these controls are in force?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the sort of assurance I am not prepared to give. To use the time-honoured expression, that, of course, is a matter of government policy. It will have to be decided at the proper time, and will be announced in due course.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Why was it necessary to have the controls drawn in this manner, under which the landlord is bound for a period of two years but the tenant is not bound for the same period? I believe that many landlords who are renting houses today have a just complaint in that connection. I can see the possibility of landlords evicting tenants without giving proper notice. However, under the contract they cannot do it. It seems to me that there would be no hardship on the tenant if he were required to live up to the terms of a contract for two years, just as the landlord is required to do so.

It, has been my experience, and especially in the city of Calgary, where the rentals control board is operating under the supervision of the wartime prices and trade board, that rentals have not been allotted fairly. I believe that the principle adopted by the rentals control board was that it would go into an area and adjust rentals according to the rates prevailing in that area.

I have in mind particularly visiting a house in the southwestern section of Calgary around Christmas time of last year. before we came to Ottawa to attend the session. This house had been occupied by a returned man, whose intention it was to vacate. The suite to which I am referring was situated on the third floor of the building and, with the exception of a cook-stove, was not furnished. Bathroom accommodation was on the second floor. This apartment was renting for $30 a month which, in my view, was a little high for that type of accommodation.

The second place I would bring to the attention of the committee was one on Sixth avenue, Calgary. This was much more centrally located, in an apartment building. This apartment had been occupied by a member of the air force, who was about to vacate. I had occasion to visit him. This apartment was in a practically new building, and was located on the main floor. It had never been my pleasure to visit a more pleasant apartment. In it were hardwood floors throughout, a separate bathroom, kitchenette, sitting room, private bedroom, fireplace, and other types of modern accommodation.

An hon. MEMBER: Where?

Mr. JOHNSTON: In Calgary. If you want to find a good place, come to Calgary.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad there was that private bedroom.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The rental for that suite was set at $35. There was no comparison between the accommodation offered there and that offered in the first one I described, nor was there any comparison in the matter of location. It seems to me that this is quite unreasonable, and that the landlord who owned the accommodation I last described had a legitimate complaint.

I was talking to another landlord and he told me that as soon as he got his present tenants out he was not going to rent his place again, and for that very reason. I know the landlord and the tenant have the right to appeal to the rentals control board, but I was told by one of the officials of that board that it is not much use taking the case to the board unless as the landlord can prove that he has additional expenses not contemplated when the lease was let, and he added that you would not get more than fifty cents or a dollar more anyway and that it was not worth the trouble to appeal. I think there should be a relaxation of these regulations. I have a few things to say in regard to the rental regulations when we come to the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. FLEMING: So that the points raised may be clear to the committee, may I say that there are three changes in the amendment circulated on Friday evening, two of them to clarify points raised the other day by the Minister of Justice and one raised this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence: (1) As to the veteran for whom this right to possession is now opened up, he must have served overseas; (2) as to the date of purchase, it must have been made by March 31, 1947; and (3) in the case of a tenant who is himself a veteran with overseas service, the provisions of order 688 shall apply so that he has the right to go to the courts and the judge shall determine having regard to the relative needs of the landlord and tenant for the accommodation and the relative hardship resulting from any order that might be made by the court as to who shall have possession. My amendment reads:

That P.C. 9029, as amended to date be further amended by the addition thereto of the following clause:

"Nothing in this order in council or in any order or regulation made thereunder contained shall apply to prevent recovery of possession of housing accommodation, in accordance with the law of the province, by the owner thereof, where required for his personal occupation and that of his family, where such owner was a member of the forces, with overseas service, as defined in the War Service Grants Act, 1944, and purchased the said accommodation on or before the 31st day of March, 1947; provided that any notice given to recover such possession shall be given in accordance with such law, but in no event shall such notice be shorter than three months; and provided further that where the tenant of such accommodation was himself a member of the forces, with overseas service, he shall have all the rights conferred by order No. 688 of the wartime prices and trade board, dated February 17, 1947, on the tenants referred to in the said order.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing I can add. I am unable to accept the amendment for the reasons I have given. I am just as sympathetic as my hon. friend to the veteran getting any preference to which he is entitled, but this rentals control order is extremely difficult to administer and, when those in charge of administering it assure me that to grant any such blanket exemption at this time would increase the present grave difficulties, I feel that I must be guided by their advice, which incidentally commends itself to my own judgment. This discussion has been most constructive and helpful, and I wish to repeat the assurance I gave earlier, that we shall continue to review these provisions and particularly one or two specific suggestions, one by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to see whether the orders can be relaxed to permit orderly relief for certain classes. But this amendment is far too broad in its scope and I am afraid I cannot accept it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not taken any part in the discussion. I appreciate what an enormous problem this is because I have a close connection with it and I know that the board has a problem which the average man does not realize. It is one of tremendous magnitude. I have listened interestedly to what the minister said, that they will continue to survey the problem, and I hope they do. They will find a lot to survey and perhaps they will be able to make some improvements.

I have in mind particularly those returned soldiers who purchased homes after their return when the war was over and who consequently were not here when they would have been protected if they had purchased earlier. They really have need of protection. I am wondering if the board could not send out an order to all realtors, real estate men and all others engaged in the business of selling houses to advise the veteran that he cannot obtain possession of the property he purchases if it is occupied? I know of a number of cases in which the veteran was given the impression by perhaps an overzealous salesman that he could get possession of the property. I do not know whether anything of that kind has been done by the board, but it is something that might be done. Certainly the young soldier coming back from overseas in 1946 could not possibly be expected to know what the housing regulations were unless the agent told him, and many of them bought thinking they would be able to get possession. Here is a case in point, taken from the press of March 7, 1947:

Re the injustice of the present freezing orders on housing, and in describing the position of the late returning veteran who was held in the service long after the war's end you have outlined a case similar to my own.

It is a similar case to those I mentioned a moment ago. The writer of this letter to the editor had read of somebody else being in the same boat, a man who had come home late from overseas, had purchased a house and then found that he could not get possession of it. It is not likely he would have purchased it had he known he could not get possession. The letter continues:

Both my son and I were discharged from active service late in 1945 and decided we would buy a house large enough for both our families. After selecting a suitable property for sale we were assured by the agent that relief from the freezing order was then being planned. We put all our gratuities into the purchase as we felt that even if the agent was misinformed that it was just a case of waiting a reasonable time until we would obtain possession of our property.

But now the government brings forth this gem of wisdom—

I suppose he is referring to some regulation.

—the November, 1944, to July, 1945, relief order, and we are left again with no mark to shoot at.

That bears out what I said a moment ago. Had those veterans been told by the real estate agents that they could not get possession they probably would not have bought the property. Therefore I would urge the minister and the wartime prices and trade board to issue instructions to all those selling houses to inform purchasers that, under the present regulations, they cannot get possession of the property if it is occupied.

I have been trying to get housing relief for a young soldier whom I know. He came back in 1946, after having been overseas for several years. Of course he could not possibly know what he was coming up against, and the party from whom he purchased his house did not tell him that he could not get possession. On going to see the place he found it occupied by a widow and her daughter. They told him they wanted to get out anyway, but they have not got out, and he cannot get in. He has a wife and child, and they are living in a basement, not the basement of a regular house but in a very unsatisfactory place. There are many cases of that kind. It is a difficult problem and I am not going to suggest what should be done.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is the previous owner still in occupation?

Mr. MacNICOL: The owners are not in occupation; the tenants are. I have another case of a man whom I know well. He had been occupying a house on Dufferin street, Toronto, for sixteen years with his wife and four children. His son came back from overseas. The father, who was also a returned soldier, is employed in one of the government hospitals in Toronto. His son came back from overseas and brought his bride with him, and they moved in with the father and mother with four children, making a total of eight. They had not protection. He was evicted. I myself saw the furniture piled out in the front of the house. The family all scattered. The father and mother went to live with another family in different rooms and the young man and his wife were settled in different parts of the city. The four children were scattered among friends everywhere. Every hon. member knows the situation is almost appalling. I do not wish to complain. I do not wish to think any one member is any more anxious than any other member about this difficult situation. They all want to see housing relief given. I do not want to think for one minute that the government or whoever is directing the wartime prices and trade board is not just as anxious as I am for all these people to have accommodation. I want to believe that it is. What can be done to relieve the situation, I do not know.

Mr. MacINNIS: More houses.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend says "more houses". That is a difficult problem. I built a lot of houses; I know something about building. I built my houses at a time when materials were easy to obtain. It was not a question of going to buy the material. No sooner have you excavated for the foundation than there were a dozen men around wanting to sell you brick or lumber or glass or the other materials for the house. But it is not so today. The material situation is appalling. Personally I do not at the moment see any solution for this problem. The suggestion offered by the hon. member for Eglinton may offer some relief. I listened to him and he referred to shared accommodation. There may be a great opportunity there. I know of many people who have rooms in their houses which they would rent, but they are afraid to rent them, because if they rent to undesirable tenants they cannot get rid of them. If there is any relief along the line suggested by the hon. member for Eglinton it should be considered. I heard the remarks of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, but there was some difference of opinion as to whether his statement of the law was right or not. At any rate, today people will not take other people into their homes unless they are compelled to do so, and nobody wants compulsion. They fear that they will not be able to get them out if they do not want them to stay.

The minister said something about—

Mr. ABBOTT: They could try them out for five months or less and get them out without any trouble.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister said something about incompatibility. I do not think the ordinary owner of a home knows about that. The wartime prices and trade board should send out information advising people as to how they can rent their rooms.

Mr. ABBOTT: Over one thousand applied in Toronto and were granted permission.

Mr. MacNICOL: I heard the hon. member for Waterloo South say that there are thousands and thousands of houses in which there are rooms which could be occupied, but the owners quite naturally are concerned about getting undesirable tenants, and therefore they will not rent their rooms. I think it is worth while looking into that situation and the remarks made by the hon. member for Eglinton.

I have in mind a case which I think is one of the most pitiable that could be imagined. This is a young man who has been married for three years. I do not know whether or not he is a returned soldier. Perhaps I should not mention him here, but he and his wife have already lost two babies in the apartment in which they live because the place is wholly undesirable. The conditions appear to be particularly bad. He searched the city as best he could but he could not get another place. He then bought a property, and apparently he was able to vacate the people in it because the regulations did not apply. On going there he found a mother with seven children in it and he did not have the heart to vacate them. He sold that property and bought another. In the other property there is a banker, his wife and a fourteen-year old daughter. He says if he could get possession of his own property he would then be able to take a family in with him. He would have to, to help pay for the property. But he cannot get the banker, wife and daughter out. Whether he will be allowed to get them out or not it is not for me to say. The wartime prices and trade board should make fuller investigations than they do. However I am not finding fault with them in particular because in one of the cases I have been following up, the wartime prices and trade board wrote me a letter. I am not finding fault with the contents of it. I shall read part of it but I shall not mention any names. It is as follows:

> The purchase of a home at any time is a serious matter for most people and one would have thought that it would have been prudent on the part of Mrs. C's son when embarking on such a serious matter to first make inquiries as to when he could expect to have the tenant vacate because since July 25, 1945, landlords of housing accommodation had been unable to give a notice to vacate to their tenants.

This young man is a returned soldier. He came back in the fall of 1945. You could not expect a young man such as that to know anything about the conditions he would be up against in purchasing this property and, of course, the real estate agent would not tell him because he would not then make the sale. I do not blame the real estate agent one bit in this regard.

Mr. MacINNIS: Terrible.

Mr. MacNICOL: No. I do not blame the real estate man. He has to live like other people. I do not blame him, because he was not instructed by the wartime prices and trade board that he should advise an individual purchasing a house that he could not get possession. I am going to recommend strongly that the department see to it that anybody purchasing a house be given full advice as to whether he can get possession. What is the good of purchasing a house if you cannot get possession of it? I continue with the letter:

> The government policy in this respect received wide publication at that time and the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, the then Minister of Finance, issued a formal statement which appeared in every Canadian newspaper advising that during the housing emergency landlords would not be able to evict their tenants.

That young man was overseas at the time and, of course, he could not know anything about it. He knew nothing about it when he came home, nor did the real estate agent tell him when he went to buy the house. The letter continues:

> Large advertisements also appeared in the newspapers at that time advising the public to this effect. Therefore it seems strange that a man in the position of Mrs. C's son would invest, no doubt, a substantial sum in the purchase of this home without first making inquiries as to the possibility of evicting the tenant.

I am not finding any fault with the wartime prices and trade board in this regard. They are setting out a straight story, but somebody should have been responsible for advising that young soldier who was overseas when the order came out that he could not buy a house and get possession of it. Somebody should have advised him. He could not be expected to know; he was overseas for several years.

I have a multitude of such cases in my part of the city. I would be safe in saying that no other riding sent more soldiers overseas than Davenport. I have a multitude of complaints. I know what a gigantic problem it is, but I believe that, as the two ministers have said, the greatest effort possible will be made to give relief. Finding fault will not help. We have to provide a solution for the problem. These three ministers, including the minister of reconstruction, are big men, and they should all put their shoulders to the wheel and do what they can to provide housing relief for our returned soldiers in the first place, because they are entitled first, and then to the people at large, because there are multitudes of sad cases among the ordinary population. The returned soldiers come first and others afterwards. If the minister will tackle the problem from that angle he will do something for the good of the country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one question I wish to ask the minister on the policy of the board with regard to rent. When decontrol is finally undertaken is it intended to proceed by removing controls over rentals by localities? The way it was introduced was, of course, by starting with congested localities first and ultimately extending it to villages and towns. I hear it said in villages and towns that this control is not so necessary there as in more congested areas. I would ask the minister to give a general indication as to the means whereby this control will ultimately be unravelled, and whether the government has communicated with the provinces, so that when the controls are removed from rentals the provinces will be given notice in advance to the end that, under provincial jurisdiction, wherever a province desires to do so, it may continue such control as it deems necessary.

In my own province legislation has been placed on the statute books covering both the question of prices and the question of rents. The idea is, of course, that when the federal government goes out of this field of peculiarly provincial jurisdiction the province will be in a position to enter that field. I think it would be worth while for the minister to give the general picture, because we have been talking here for over a day and a half and no one yet knows what the government's policy is on the question of decontrol of rentals, except that it is intended ultimately to decontrol.

What is the general perspective? The government had a general picture a year and a half ago at the time of the dominion-provincial conference. I should like to know whether its policy today is that which it placed before that conference in the proposals which it then submitted.

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as I can recall, there was nothing about rentals in the proposals. Answering the first question first, I am not in a position to say whether it will be desirable in the decontrol process to decontrol regionally. I think I indicated, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Eglinton a week or two ago, that consideration was being given to that phase and that possibly that might be a way in which we could effectively decontrol. However, as I said a moment ago on another subject, the whole question is receiving the most intense study at the moment.

I spent three hours the other day in a long meeting with the rental control officials and the officials of the prices board considering all these various questions, trying to project our minds into the future to see what the best method of decontrol would be, because we appreciate that this is a right which the dominion government can exercise only for a limited period while the condition of emergency exists. We are fully conscious of that fact. I cannot make any positive statement today as to just what that course will be. I agree that the provinces should be given ample notice of the plans of the dominion government in this respect and I intend to make sure that they have such ample notice, but they have not reached the point where I can give the committee any great information as to just what the timetable will be.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In that connection, in collaboration with the wartime prices and trade board, has the minister any statistics? Has any census been taken of the various towns and villages throughout the country? Have the local authorities been consulted to ascertain their position? I should think that in order to arrive at any decision, if decontrol is proceeded with regionally, to use the minister's expression, the first thing that would have to be done would be to make a general review of all villages and towns in the country to ascertain the attitude of the municipal officials and the degree of housing available.

May I bring this to the attention of the Minister of Finance? It has come to my notice on three or four different occasions, and though it is a minor matter it gives me an opportunity to bring it before the minister now. Persons who own houses and cannot get into them have to go and rent elsewhere. They have to pay income tax on the amount of rental they receive but are denied, under the income tax law, the right to deduct the expense they are put to by reason of being denied the use of their own places. There are quite a few cases; in one town I know of there are three. It may not run into large amounts; but, having regard to the fact that there are three in this small town, I believe it would certainly run into several thousands across the country. It is a matter that should be given consideration, so that anyone in that position should not be refused his ordinary rights while at the same time he is taxed on that income which he does not wish to receive by reason of the situation in which he finds himself.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is an interesting point and, so far as I know, it has not been raised before. I will give it some thought.

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived.

Mr. FLEMING: I wish to introduce another amendment in the same form as the copies I circulated on Friday evening. It has to do with the matter of tenancies hereafter created in respect of shared accommodation. The amendment reads:

That P.C. 9029, as amended to date be further amended by the addition thereto of the following clause:

"Nothing in this order in council or in any order or regulation made thereunder contained shall apply to prevent the recovery of possession of housing accommodation, in accordance with the law of the province, by the landlord thereof in the case of shared accommodation, as defined in the orders made under this order in council, where the tenancy thereof is created after the date of coming into force of this act."

May I make one comment? The matter has already been discussed and I have no desire to prolong that discussion. The amendment applies simply to the recovery of possession on shared accommodation. It has nothing to do with the rent ceilings on shared accommodation. It does not apply to existing tenancies of shared accommodation but only to those hereafter created. I need not say more about the advantages which I am sure would follow from the promulgation of such an order.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. ABBOTT: For the reasons I gave a little earlier, I am sorry I cannot accept this amendment either. I cannot agree that it has nothing to do with rental ceilings. When we took away the security of tenure feature in the case of shared accommodation in 1943 a chaotic condition resulted. We could not control rentals of shared accommodation and we had to reimpose that control. For that reason, in the light of experience. I cannot accept the amendment. I would point out however, as I did before, that a person renting shared accommodation for the first time can make a lease up to five months in duration with any conditions as to eviction that he sees fit.

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived.

P.C. 9029 agreed to.

On P.C. 9870—Authorizing incorporation of Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are a number of questions which I should like to ask the minister with regard to this item dealing with the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. First, I should like to ascertain the amount paid during the past year in subsidies to both producer and consumer. A general statement does appear in the last report of the wartime prices and trade board, but there is nothing to indicate what is the amount of subsidies paid, divided on the basis I have suggested, as of March 31, 1947, and during the preceding year. Then I should like to ask—

Mr. ILSLEY: Excuse me, but let me get this clear. The report gives the subsidies for the calendar year, does it not?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is the calendar year.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is. Does the hon. member wish it brought down to the end of March?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I want it to March 31, yes.

Then I would appreciate a statement from the minister on the general policy with respect to subsidies; and in that connection I should like to ask him a specific question, namely, whether the experience of the government is that within the last six months, during which period a number of subsidies have been removed, inflationary pressures are beginning to cease and the removal of the subsidies has resulted from that fact. If I understand the situation with regard to subsidies, the government's policy is to continue them so long as it is necessary in order to prevent inflationary prices. I mentioned milk. I still cannot understand what happened to the government in connection with that. This house passed a resolution calling upon the government not to remove the subsidy on milk. It was generally supported in all parts of the house. It represented a direction by parliament to the government and to the government's appointee, the stabilization corporation and its co-worker, the wartime prices and trade board. Yet immediately after parliament ceased to sit, its wishes were thwarted and denied. I should like to know from the minister the extent to which subsidies are now being maintained on agricultural products, which products are subsidized and to what extent.

The next point I should like to ask the minister about is this. To the extent of how many points in the cost of living index does a subsidy operate in the maintenance of price? I will give my reason for asking that question. Since the removal of certain of the subsidies, prices have gone up. If I understand the economic views of the wartime prices and trade board, it is that the only result of a subsidy is to keep down the price by six points in the cost of living index.

The next question I should like to ask is, what was behind the government's attitude in removing the subsidy on fluid milk and at the same time endeavouring to maintain the price of butter? I have never been able to understand how those two economic factors could possibly operate side by side. I will deal with some further matters when the opportunity arises. But the main point at the moment is this: Has the government during the last six months, or within the last three months, concluded that the inflationary danger is past and that prices are receding, or that the prospect is that they will recede to a reasonably normal level?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: First of all, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Lake Centre on the solicitude he now expresses for the government as to the price control policy. I think he realizes now that, if we are to have fair prices and if we are to have subsidies paid, they will be paid for the purpose of keeping prices down.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was asking questions. Let the hon. member make his observations in his own speech.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I was apparently giving the hon. member more credit than he deserves for his statement.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not regard it as credit, coming from the hon. member.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Well, I can say that it is free, anyway. I will not send the hon. member a bill for it, and that is more than he can say to me. But I wish to support the implication which the hon. member left anyway, if not the direct statement, that perhaps the government is going a little too fast—

Mr. MERRITT: He never left any such implication.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Then it is to his disadvantage if he did not; he should have. As I say, I wish to support the implication that the government is going too fast in the field of taking off subsidies.

The hon. member made reference to the resolution which passed this house last summer, to the effect that the milk subsidy should be retained. Of course it is history now that the government disregarded the views of the house and removed the subsidy, as soon as the house prorogued, or almost as soon as it prorogued. I shall not go into that because, as I say, it is history. But I think that is indicative of the way in which the government has been removing subsidies without taking into consideration the views of the house or of the people generally.

I want to give this illustration as an example of what happens if subsidies are taken off promiscuously, so to speak, without first viewing the whole picture. We had the announcement not so long ago that the price of binder twine, for example, is to jump approximately $7.50 a hundredweight. That, I understand, is the wholesale increase in the price, and it will work out somewhere in the neighbourhood of $9 a hundredweight by the time it comes to the farmer. It is quite true that in many cases in the west binder twine has gone out of vogue where combines are now used; but in many parts of Canada it is still a considerable item in the expense of the farmer during the harvest season. I do not know on what basis the government took the action which they did take in wiping out the subsidy and allowing this price increase. Surely there must have been some middle way, if they felt that the subsidy they were paying was too high or that the price was too low. There must have been some place in between where they were before and where they are now, where the government could have stopped. I cannot see any justification for the price of binder twine jumping $7.50 a hundredweight this year, and I think the government should reconsider its position in that regard and in many other instances along the same line. I could mention gasoline. I understand that part of the subsidy is still being paid, while part has been removed, and that under decontrol the price of gasoline has gone up from two to two and a half cents in different provinces.

All those things enter into the cost of production of farm products, and the farmer has no alternative but to ask the government to decontrol the products he produces or, on the other hand, to absorb the difference himself. Before we leave this order in council dealing with the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, I believe the government should frankly place before parliament the policy they intend to follow in connection with the retention or removal of subsidies, so that the producers of this country whose products are still under price control, may have some idea of what it is going to cost them to continue production. The farmers of western Canada have been very patient, but that patience can be tried too far, as the government has reason to know from what happened last fall. I refer to the non-delivery strike, which lasted only a short time but was an indication of what could happen if the farmers of Canada actually went to work and put on a real non-delivery strike. We all hope that will not happen, and I am sure the farmers would be the last to want it to happen; but if they keep getting it from both ends, with prices of the things they are buying steadily creeping up, costs of production steadily increasing, and subsidies being withdrawn, with the farmer having to absorb the difference, I am not so sure that they will continue to take it. Therefore I trust the government will give us some real hope for this year, some reason to believe they will not rush along the path they followed last year in removing subsidies without regard to the effect on the producers.

Mr. ILSLEY: Naturally, when subsidies are imposed, it is difficult to withdraw them. There is immense opposition to the withdrawal of every subsidy, and a government that took the easy course, the path of least resistance, once they got into a jungle of subsidies, would I suppose, remain there forever. The views I have expressed with regard to subsidies have been something like this, that a subsidy policy at a time of grave danger of serious inflation is a valuable policy, in that it prevents the spiral of inflation from developing. If that spiral once gets under way it may carry prices to grave heights; and a judicious expenditure of government money by way of subsidy may result in a very much greater saving to the consumer in prices than the expenditure by way of subsidy. I gave an estimate of the amount which it might be argued had been saved in prices to consumers by the expenditure of subsidies during the war years. But I believe there comes a time when the expenditure of government money in the way of subsidies becomes little or nothing more than a transfer of purchasing power from the taxpayers to the consumers. In the course of the payment of subsidies there comes a point when that becomes the case. When that time comes, then subsidies are not justifiable on the basis of prevention of uncontrolled or uncontrollable inflation at all. If they are to be justified it must be on another ground entirely; that is, that it is desirable to make a redistribution of purchasing power. That is always a debatable question.

As hon. members know, the taxation system of the country underwent a radical modification during the war. A much larger proportion of the revenues than had theretofore been the case was raised by direct taxation on the basis of ability to pay. This meant that persons in receipt of very low incomes paid no income tax; those in receipt of slightly higher incomes paid income tax at a low rate, and so on until in the higher brackets income taxes were imposed at a very high rate. That income tax being such a large proportion of the total tax, it meant that a redistribution of income was going on all the time under the taxation system. Just how far that redistribution of income and wealth should be supplemented by a subsidy policy is a difficult question. I think the general view of the government is that we should withdraw from subsidies as far as possible and as soon as possible, but that does not convey very much information to the members of the house, nor do I think the government can give any commitment with regard to the time when they withdraw from subsidies.

Some reference has been made to the alleged direction to the government by the House of Commons last August. I was not here then, but I have looked up the resolution which was discussed at that time. It read:

> This house desires to record its opinion that consideration should be given to the continuance of the milk subsidy so as to ensure adequate return to milk producers and make possible the consumption of milk for the nutrition of the Canadian people without any further increase in the price thereof to the consumers.

I would direct attention to two points in regard to that resolution. In the first place, it merely asked that consideration should be given the continuance of the milk subsidy. Any other form of resolution would have been out of order, because a direction for the expenditure of public funds cannot emanate—

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister recognizes that the house went as far as it could on a private member's motion.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but the house was not voting the money for the subsidy. The house could not vote the money for the subsidy without the necessary preliminaries having been completed.

Mr. KNOWLES: The house was simply expressing its view.

Mr. ILSLEY: The house was expressing its view. The resolution stated that consideration should be given; but note the last words: "without any further increase in the price thereof to the consumers." There would be only one way to carry out that condition, and I do not know whether it could be carried out even then; that would be for the wartime prices and trade board to retain control of the price of milk. We had decided, as a matter of policy in the spring—and I think decided rightly—that there were competent boards in the provinces, and that control of the price of milk should be restored to those provincial boards. We removed the consumer subsidy effective June 1, and in my opinion it was high time it was removed. It was a subsidy paid to twenty or twenty-five thousand persons every month, a subsidy into the administration of which abuses inevitably crept. It was a subsidy being paid then, at the stage I referred to a while ago, where it was simply transferring so much money from the pockets of the taxpayers to the pockets of the consumers of milk; at least that was our judgment.

Mr. KUHL: If the minister will permit a question, why does he insist it is necessary that the government have control over prices in order to pay subsidies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because a subsidy should be paid for a certain purpose. For the government simply to throw in $20 million or $25 million by way of subsidy, and leave no control over prices, is, in my judgment, a most imprudent thing to do.

Mr. KUHL: Could not the provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: That, again, would be a most imprudent thing to do. These questions were carefully considered by the government. I was Minister of Finance at the time, and they were considered after I came back to this country. That specific question was considered, namely as to whether the federal government is justified in throwing in $20 million or $25 million by way of subsidy and then permitting the control of prices to be exercised by another body, entirely; and not by the federal government, at all. We felt that, on principle, we simply could not justify that policy.

As subsequent events showed, we had incontrovertible evidence that if the control went back to the provinces the price of milk would go up to a greater extent than the subsidy. The condition of the resolution could not be met; that is, that the subsidy be kept on, without any further increase in price to the consumer. The consumers were in for some increase, anyway, whether the subsidy was paid or not, under the provincial milk boards. I am not taking exception to it.

Mr. LOW: Was it not a question of adjusting the level of the subsidy rather than throwing it back into the hands of the provinces? Your consumer subsidy was based on two cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LOW: Was it not merely a question of adjusting the level of the subsidy, rather than by increasing—

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the consumer subsidy of two cents was off. It was off in June. What the house was talking about was a subsidy of 1½ cents, which was called a producers subsidy. The resolution of the house was that the government give consideration to continuing the payment of that subsidy, which it said it was going to take off, and that it give consideration to the payment of the subsidy so that there would not be any further increase in the price of milk to the consumer. If we continued to pay the subsidy there would have been an increase in the price of milk to the consumer; not as great, perhaps, if we continued to pay the subsidy. But we did not know. We gave it the fullest possible consideration, but we could not comply with the condition at the end of the resolution. We felt that it would be imprudent, and an almost irresponsible thing to do; that is, to continue the payment of subsidies after the control had passed from us.

Mr. LOW: I should like to ask one further question before six o'clock, and would revert to the question of the subsidy on hemp, or twine. This subsidy is being removed, and is thus causing an increase in the price of twine. Does the minister not think the farmer has a right to the retention of that subsidy, in view of the fact that the selling prices of his goods are fixed by the ceiling? He is hamstrung. Does the minister not admit that the farmer has a right good case for the government to consider—

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I assume the hon. member is arguing that because there was a contract price on wheat—

Mr. LOW: Yes, that is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: —the prices of everything the farmer buys must be frozen.

Mr. LOW: Not necessarily. I would refer to those entering into his cost of production. Anything which enters into the cost of production can be controlled in some respects until such time as he has a chance to get a better price on a free market, and any such provision should be retained.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how deeply I should go into this matter.

Mr. LOW: I am just asking a question, if the minister does not think there is a good case to be made by the farmer.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have heard it argued time after time that that is so. But in my judgment the wheat contract stands on its own feet. It is either a good contract or a bad one, apart from other considerations.

Mr. LOW: But there is a responsibility on the government, just the same. They made the contract; they did not ask us.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is very true, but it does not detract from the force of what I said, that the contract is either a good one or a bad one. And there is a limit to the obligation which the making of that contract entails upon the government in other lines.

The specific commodity which the hon. member mentions, hemp and binder twine, is under the ceiling, as are most other things which enter into the farmers' cost of production and cost of living. But the proposition that no subsidy can be withdrawn because there is a long-term contract for certain goods is one which, in my opinion, is debatable.

Mr. LOW: But the farmer certainly has a just cause of complaint when subsidies which are keeping down the cost of things he has to buy are removed, while ceilings are retained on the things he has to sell.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no ceiling on the things he has to sell.

Mr. LOW: Yes, there is a fixed wheat price. And the coarse grains' price is fixed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a minute. I suppose we could argue this for a long time. But there is no ceiling on the price of wheat, except under the contract, and the domestic price.

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: But in class 2 there is no ceiling; that is not fixed. It runs up as high at $3, or something like that.

Mr. LOW: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only part of the output on which there is a ceiling—and it is only a small proportion of the total wheat crop—is the part sold in the domestic market. As I say, there are ceilings on nearly everything the farmer buys. But there must be some latitude with regard to dealing with subsidies.

I do not think the position can be taken too rigidly that the government cannot withdraw subsidies, if there are good reasons for the withdrawal of them, simply by saying that a wheat contract was made. As I have said, that contract was either a good one or a bad one. We think it is good, because it stabilizes the price for the farmer in future years. But to say that, because he does not get as high a price on the first two years as he would if there were a free market, it follows from that fact that subsidies should be absolutely frozen is, I think, not correct.

Mr. LOW: I do not say they should be absolutely frozen. But the government has, on various occasions expressed its intention of trying to help the farmer to get his just share of the national income. I have heard some Liberal members talk in terms of parity prices. I believe it is an actual fact that today the farming population should be receiving approximately thirty per cent of the national income, if parity is to be defined as the receipt by the farmers of a proportion of the national income which bears a proper relationship to their percentage of the population. But they are receiving only nineteen per cent. Surely the government has some responsibility to retain those subsidies which will help to adjust that disparity between what the farmers are getting and what they should be getting, so that we can have something like parity. I say that, no matter what the minister says, there is a good argument to be made along that line, and the farming population realize it is a good argument. They are certainly going to make themselves heard.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member will realize that other groups do not get their per capita share of the national income.

Mr. KNOWLES: Some groups must be getting a very big share, then.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The tax collector gets the biggest share.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it the position that there should be equality for everybody?

Mr. LOW: I did not say that. There should be equity.

Mr. ILSLEY: Equity is equality, according to the hon. member's argument. Under his argument, should not each group in the community gets its per capita share of the national income, which would make complete equality?

Mr. LOW: What I am saying is that when the government steps in and by its action stops one section of our people from getting its fair share of the national income it is incumbent upon the government to take action to equalize things.

Mr. ILSLEY: In what way did the government step in?

Mr. LOW: You stepped in and made the contracts.

Mr. ILSLEY: The contracts have advantageous features.

Mr. LOW: You do not know whether they have or not, and it will take five years to find out.

Mr. FAIR: The contracts have cost the farmers hundreds of millions of dollars and this robbery has continued ever since 1867 and for as many years before that as there were farmers in this country. The minister is not going to pull the wool over our eyes. That has been tried too often. It cannot be continued any longer.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Lake Centre asked for some information before six o'clock. It is impossible to give subsidies down to March 31 because the books are not closed; but for the calendar year 1946 the subsidies paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation were $69,765,801.63. The loss on commodity trading was $17,117,989.96, making a total of $86,883,790.59. I am told that the agricultural subsidies were the subject of a memorandum which was tabled about three weeks ago by the Minister of Agriculture. I am not in a position to give the total of these at the moment; perhaps I can get them in a minute.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister give a breakdown of the $69 million, showing the commodities in reference to which the subsidies were paid and also the commodities in respect of which there was a loss in trading of some $17 million?

Mr. ILSLEY: The figures are not broken down for the calendar year 1946. The last figures which are broken down are those for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946. That is the last full year for which we have the figures broken down. We also have them broken down for the nine months ended December 31, 1946. If the hon. gentleman wants to get a picture of one full year's operations, the last full year that I can describe to him at all in detail is the year ended March 31, 1946.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: For comparison the minister might also give the breakdown for the nine months ended December 31, 1946.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I have all this information but it is very long. I can give the totals first. First, with regard to subsidies paid, import subsidies for the year ended March 31, 1946, $41,602,181.16, and for the nine months to December 31, 1946, $31,299,057.45. Domestic subsidies for the year ended March 31, 1946, $37,915,007.54, and for the nine months to December 31, 1946, $16,141,566.99. The totals in subsidies for the year ended March 31, 1946, $79,517,188.70, and for the nine months to December 31, 1946, $47,440,624.44. Losses on commodity trading, for the year ended March 31, 1946, $16,230,165.59, and for the nine months to December 31, 1946, $12,132,620.96. Total of subsidies paid and losses on commodity trading for the year ended March 31, 1946, $95,747,354.29, and for the nine months to December 31, 1946, $59,573,245.40. There is no breakdown of the import subsidies, but there is a breakdown of the domestic subsidies and also of the losses on commodity trading. The breakdown of the domestic subsidies for the year ended March 31, 1946, is very long.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are the main items?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give the items that exceed $1,000,000, if that is satisfactory, and to expedite matters I will give the round figures:

Canned fruit and vegetables ..	$1,244,000
Coke	1,575,000
Milk	21,666,000
Soap and shortening materials	2,327,000
Synthetic and crude rubber	1,299,000
Wood fuel	2,083,000

Those are the only individual subsidies that run over $1,000,000. Would the hon. member like the ones that run over $500,000?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes; that would give the general picture.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are:

Tree fruits	$829,000
Jam and jelly	693,000
Softwood lumber	613,000
Woodenware	671,000

Those are the only ones between $500,000 and $1,000,000. The hon. gentleman asked for a breakdown of the losses on commodity trading. I may say that the figures I have given him are those for the twelve months ended March 31, 1946. As to the losses on commodity trading, I can give them in full without taking up too much time:

Industrial alcohol	$676,000
Artificial silk yarns	916,000
Bristles and horsehair	71,000
Broom corn	14
Citrus juices	163,000
Coffee	1,926,000
Cotton yarns and fabrics	1,871,000
Dairy products	22,000
Fertilizers	91,000
Dried fruits	4,251,000
Jute	60,000
Oils and fats	1,774,000
Plasticides	13,000
Rubber	8,000
Spices	204,000
Surplus stocks: clothing and cotton fabrics	2,000
Tea	527,000
Tin	98,000
Woodenware	30,000
Wool	3,696,000

The total is $16,230,000. The figures I have given will not add up to that exactly, because there were certain small credits or profits resulting in a balance of $16,230,000. The figures again are for the twelve months ended March 31, 1946.

Mr. PROBE: Before the dinner recess the minister gave a lengthy explanation from the legal point of view as to why the resolution dealing with milk subsidies, which was passed in August last by this house, had to be denied in the form of a continuance of producer subsidy. That followed, of course, the cutting off of the two cents a quart consumer milk subsidy on May 31 last. I have no doubt that the legal presentation was quite admirable, although I could not follow it, and I do not think the purchaser of milk would be able to follow either the argument of the Minister of Justice. It is very difficult as I see it and, I am sure, as the housewife sees it, to reconcile the discontinuance of the subsidy on commodities that are so important in the household economy, while at the same time subsidies are being continued or even begun on other commodities. For example, the Dominion Steel and Coal Company was in receipt of a subsidy, for what reason I do not think the minister can tell the committee, except that it was an agreement at a time when the company was not even producing coal.

A few weeks ago the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply informed this house and the country that an agreement had been entered into between the government of Canada and Crane Limited and a subsidy of $400,000 was being initiated, which, I presume, had something to do with an incentive bonus of some sort for the production of bath tubs and bathroom fixtures. I went to the trouble to look up "Moody's Manual of Investments" on Crane Limited this afternoon while the minister was speaking, and I find that Crane Limited is part of a huge international concern which has been paying dividends of a fairly reasonable nature and which has been doing pretty well, thank you, in the way of profits on the business which the company does. For example, the earnings on the preferred stock were as follows:

	Per share
1945	$33 18
1944	35 31
1943	35 84
1942	25 02
1941	19 34
1940	26 63
1939	23 92

There were equivalent earnings on the common stock. Those of us who listened to the undoubtedly excellent legal argument this afternoon as to why the milk subsidy should be discontinued by the government of Canada on behalf of the families of this country should, before we go on to agreement on the order in council which is being extended here for the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, have an explanation from the minister as to the details of this subsidy agreement with this huge international corporation for the production of bathtubs and bathroom fixtures, of which Crane Limited is the Canadian subsidiary. Will the minister give us the details of why and under what conditions this subsidy of $400,000 to Crane Limited is being paid and how long the subsidy will last?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the details of the Crane Limited subsidy before me. That is something within the knowledge of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, but I knew about it at the time. Subject to correction by him, my recollection is that the reason for that subsidy was that they required no further capacity for normal business in Canada, and that if they built additional capacity for meeting an emergent situation, a concession of some kind was required. If I remember correctly, the subsidy is conditional upon producing more than the normal amount they would produce. It was an incentive payment for doing something which they would not normally undertake in the course of their normal operations.

Mr. PROBE: Prior to the subsidy agreement, were they producing up to full capacity? I do not ask for details, but in general is there any clause in the agreement which deals with the price of commodities which Crane Limited will now be producing as a result of the facilities which the federal government is furnishing to them?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get the information. I suppose the order in council was laid on the table, was it not? It must have been. With regard to price, I will find out what the situation is.

Mr. PROBE: The reason I am concerned with the terms of this agreement with Crane Limited, and particularly with the possibility that Crane Limited might or might not be producing at full capacity, is that there are other corporations in this country which have been steadily decreasing their production with no apparent good reason. I refer at the moment to Canadian Western Lumber Company which was referred to in the house the other day. In 1945 this company made approximately $460,000 net profit and in 1946 they made approximately $1,019,000 net profit. That profit for 1946 is at a rate of thirty-four per cent on the capital of the company, which is $3,073,000. According to "Moody's Manual of Investments," this company, which has a sawmill capacity of 200,000,000 board feet in British Columbia, which has choice timber limits, since 1939 has steadily been decreasing its production of sawn lumber. In 1939, for example, it produced slightly in excess of 200,000,000 board feet, which was the annual capacity of that sawmill. Since then, the production of that sawmill has decreased annually, until in 1945 the production was 120,000,000 board feet, which is sixty per cent of the rated capacity of Canadian Western Lumber Company. Yet at the same time that its production has been going down, its profits have been going up. It seems to me that when we are on the subject of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, the minister should be ready to give us more facts with respect to the subsidy to this colossal corporation, shall I say, which is not making bathroom fixtures for the people of this country, as some of us have every right to know from personal experience. I feel that the minister owes the committee a statement. I realize that it is not entirely within his department, but he should have this information here.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. What is the information asked for? The hon. member does not want any information about this lumber company, does he?

Mr. PROBE: I am using this as an illustration of what might be going on with Crane Limited. I do not know whether Crane Limited is producing more tubs today than it did five years ago, or whether it is producing less, or whether this $400,000 which the people of Canada have given it is just a good will gesture, or whether it means something. Thus far, it does not mean anything to me, and I am sure it does not mean anything to anyone else who is interested in buying plumbing supplies. I think the committee is entitled to this information.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I can get hold of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply I will ask him to explain the whole matter to the hon. gentleman. I believe it is pretty well explained in the order in council, and if I had it here I think I could answer the question myself.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was it not for new plant?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to have a few words with the minister about the figures he gave the committee a few moments ago in reply to the questions of the hon. member for Lake Centre. As I understood it, he indicated that the total paid out in import and domestic subsidies for the calendar year 1946 amounted to something over $79,000,000. In addition, there was an item of over $16,000,000 representing losses on commodity trading, which made a total of roughly $95,000,000. I I should like to ask the minister, what is the relation of the items comprising that $95,000,000 to the items that comprised the $200,000,000, which he told us some weeks ago was the average cost of price control during the war? I notice in the estimates one other item that would have to be added, namely the cost of administration of the wartime prices and trade board, which, according to page 69 of the main estimates was $13,000,000 for last year. If that $13,000,000, or whatever the administration of the wartime prices and trade board cost, were added to the $95,000,000, making a total of $108,000,000, would that figure be comparable with the $200,000,000 the minister says was the average cost during the war?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: If not, would the minister indicate how one would arrive at a comparable figure?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the year ended March 31, 1946, there were, in addition, those subsidies paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, the agricultural subsidies and the wheat and flour subsidies, which were substantial. In that figure I also included the cost of administration of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then the total figure for 1946 might be pretty close to the wartime average of $200,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then can the minister give us any idea of what is to be the total spent in this way in 1947? I am looking at the estimates again, and I find that, whereas in 1946-47 we were asked to vote $90,000,000 for the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, for 1947-48 that figure is only $35,000,000. Would it be fair to take that as an indication of the extent to which the policy of subsidies is to be curtailed? That is a drop of over fifty per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The amount budgeted for is $35,000,000 to be spent by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, which includes both import and domestic subsidies and trading losses.

Mr. KNOWLES: So that very roughly it looks as though we are in for a reduction of about fifty per cent or more, as far as the general policy of paying subsidies is concerned?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think we should get into a discussion of the estimates at this time. I have no objection to a reference to them, but I hope a general discussion will not result.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was just referring to the estimates to help the minister answer my question.

Mr. ILSLEY: The figure for 1947-48 which will be comparable with the $95,000,000 in 1945-46 it is expected will be in the neighbourhood of $50,000,000. Of that, $35,000,000 is being voted. Then there are certain revolving funds, certain inventories and so on, from which more will be realized.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that this is another of the orders in council included in the general bracket to which reference is made in the amendment I have moved to clause 4 of the bill. I do so now to emphasize the fact that in connection with the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation we have a phase of government policy which, like that of price control—and, after all, they are related—we feel should be continued; or to put it in the reverse, should not be dispensed with as rapidly as would appear to be the intention of the government.

Once again I feel I must call the attention of the government to an item in the afternoon newspapers, which indeed is headlined in the Ottawa Journal; it is a statement by the President of the United States on the seriousness of the price situation in that country. Throughout the whole of this debate on price control and the payment of subsidies, we in this group have been trying to get the government to realize that it would be far better to keep their machinery in effect, to go a little more slowly with decontrol, than to get into the position in which the United States finds itself, where they have thrown overboard the machinery and now face such tremendous difficulties in trying to avoid the dangers of inflation and the "bust" that comes—after the boom.

Speaking of subsidies this afternoon, the minister said that in the main there were two justifications for a policy of subsidization: one, to counteract inflationary trends, and the other, as a means of redistributing wealth. He suggested that from his point of view it was now desirable to get away from the policy of paying subsidies. It seems to me that inflationary pressures are still with us, in view of the way prices are going up; and we also feel that the desirability of measures for the redistribution of wealth is still with us. So we urge the government to continue the policy of paying subsidies where this can be done to keep down the cost of the necessities of life. The minister said that, in his view—I do not accept it entirely, but I will argue on these terms for the moment—we are fast reaching the point where the payment of subsidies becomes merely the transfer of money from the taxpayer to the consumer. I say I will argue on these terms for the moment and, using some of the language the minister used this afternoon, remind him that this means taking it from the pockets of the taxpayers where it is collected according to ability to pay, which are the words he used this afternoon in describing the government's own taxation structure built up during the war, and putting it into the pockets of the consumers. These consumers buy according to need. That is particularly true in the case of milk, which we have discussed here for a while; in the case of butter, which apparently is going up to sixty cents a pound; in the case of soap and shortening and a good many other of the items which were listed in the long schedule the minister gave to us a while ago.

I urge upon the government to realize that they had a thoroughly defensible policy in the combination of price controls and subsidies. The only thing that is wrong is the speed with which they are dispensing with that policy. It is a strange position for us in this group to be in, when he are concerned about the government's holding on to its own way of doing things.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Just a matter of conscience.

Mr. KNOWLES: I appreciate the compliment; that is exactly the reason we take the position we do. We have a conscience, and a sense of responsibility to all the people of Canada which prompts us not to sit here idly and let these controls go off, and let the chaos and depression come which will be sure to follow the failure of the government to deal properly with these measures.

I rise at this time to urge upon the government again to pay attention to what I think is the voice of the people which we in this group have tried to express, which some hon. members in the Liberal party have tried to express, and which has been expressed to my hon. friends to my right, even though they voice it only by keeping silent on these matters.

I suggest that by the time we get back to section 4 of the bill and have a vote on our amendment to that clause, the case for it may be even stronger than it was when it was proposed last week.

Mr. ARGUE: I wish to say a few words at this time with respect to subsidies. I was interested, as was also the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in a few of the things said this afternoon by the Minister of Justice. I have before me what he said in relation to subsidies, and the timing of placing them in operation. The minister said that a policy of subsidies at a time of grave danger of serious inflation is a valuable policy in that it prevents a spiral of inflation from developing. That is what the minister said about subsidies, that the time for them was when a spiral of inflation was developing. If the minister and the government take off subsidies it follows that they cannot see that the spiral of inflation is developing.

But the situation in the United States is much different. This evening's issue of the Ottawa Journal carries the heading in which it attributes to President Truman these words, "Prices must be brought down". This was his statement in an address to an association of businessmen:

"But," the chief executive went on, "I must say in all frankness that the economic skies are not entirely clear. One cloud is shadowing our economic future.

"That cloud is the sharp and rapid rise in prices.

"Some say this cloud is certain to burst. They are sure of a recession or a depression. I do not share their belief that either of these is inevitable.

"I believe that we as a nation can prevent this economic cloudburst. But it requires prompt, preventive steps." Because of high prices, he said, too many families are spending savings, cashing war bonds, postponing medical care, and "they have gone into debt in an amount 50 per cent greater than a year ago."

"If we are to avoid a recession we must act before it starts," he said.

"Prices must be brought down."

Recalling his efforts last year to have congress extend price control, the President said private enterprise now has the responsibility for prices because:

"A group saw fit to sabotage price control and represented to the public that prices would come down in a free market."

The government of Canada is in a much different position from President Truman. The majority of members in the house are saying to the government that we must maintain subsidies as a weapon to maintain price controls. There is inflation in the United States. The United States price level is higher than the price level in Canada. I do not think any good reason can be shown why, if we take off all our controls, our price level will not go up to or nearly to the price level of the United States. Therefore I say the potential danger of inflation at this time in Canada is greater than it is in the United States, because not only will our prices go up with the American prices, but they will first of all go up to the American prices. That in itself will be inflation.

The minister then stated that there comes a time when the expenditure of government money in the way of subsidies becomes little or nothing more than a transfer of purchasing power from the taxpayers to the consumers. I do not want to put words in the minister's mouth, but I think that would mean something like this, that a particular time would come about when a subsidy of a given number of dollars, if removed, would be followed by a rise in prices of an amount not substantially greater than the subsidy. If the subsidy were one dollar, and if, after removal, the cost to the consumer went up by much more than a dollar, then I suggest that the minister would not say that was a time for the removal of the subsidy. I do not think he would reason in that way.

I should like to know the amount of the subsidy on crude oil in the area around Regina before April 1. On April 1 the government's tax of three cents a gallon on gasoline was removed. The people expected that gasoline prices would fall.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. ARGUE: The tax of three cents came off, and the people would normally think the price would fall by the three cents a gallon. But instead of that the price went up. It went up not only to the extent of three cents but, on tractor gasoline, which is the fuel most widely used on the farms in that area, it went up by another one and a half cents a gallon to the company, or a total increase in price to the company of four and a half cents a gallon.

What was the cost of the subsidy that went into a gallon of refined petroleum products? I am sure it would be considerably less than four and a half cents a gallon. The farmers are most anxious about the general rise in price levels, because when costs of manufactured articles go up the burden is placed upon the farmer in two respects. First, like every other Canadian, he must live and must keep his family. So that when there is a general increase in prices his cost of living goes up. Secondly, with the general increase in the price of manufactured articles, his production costs rise.

The farmer is most anxious about price controls. He believes his whole economic existence depends upon a fair relationship of his and other prices. Therefore he views with alarm a removal of subsidies and the consequent rise in prices.

This afternoon the minister said that, in his opinion, the wheat agreement could stand on its own feet. I believe that this agreement is sufficiently fair and in the right direction, so that it can stand on its own feet. But the price paid to the farmer by the wheat board is, in my opinion, not at this time sufficient to take care of the rapidly rising costs of production the farmer must pay. The farmer says, and I agree, "We have accepted stable prices for a number of years. We like stable farm prices. But at the same time we want to have other prices stable, and we do not want our price for wheat frozen at $1.35 when, through government policy, the cost of production to the farmer is rising by leaps and bounds."

[Mr. Argue.]

Going across the country, I find that the people of the nation are fearful of a depression. The conversation usually goes like this. Someone you meet will say, "We are experiencing inflation now, and in one or two years time we shall have a depression." When you get the people of this country thinking there will be a depression, and they think so because we have inflation now, inevitably there will be a depression. The inflation we are now experiencing is the direct consequence of the government's removal of subsidies and its decontrol policy generally.

Last year many of the farmers in Saskatchewan and Alberta went on a non-delivery strike. In the area I know best, my own constituency, the farmers went on strike at a number of points. Often it was not where there were united farmers locals, but a spontaneous strike that developed as a result of a meeting of the farmers in the area deciding that they would not deliver their products. When you can have a farmers' strike of the magnitude of the one we had last year, then with the increasing costs of the things the farmer has to buy and frozen prices of wheat the government should realize that another non-delivery strike may come about that will be supported by the farmers generally. I am not suggesting that there be one. I do not like strikes, nor do I hope there will be a strike. I am simply saying that the government should be realistic and do the right thing so that a farmers' strike will not be necessary.

Mr. MITCHELL: Much of the discussion to which I have listened up to now is like the Messiah versus the Messiah versus the Messiah.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Now we are getting the sermon on the mount.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is a schoolteacher and he should know something about those matters. The easiest people in the world to talk to are schoolteachers. Just make what you are talking about difficult to understand and they are lost in admiration.

We have listened to various viewpoints on control and decontrol. I think it is obvious that you cannot have a general policy of control without including wage control. But we have heard very little about wage control this evening. My hon. friends want subsidies to be retained, and at the same time they advocate a lowering of the income tax in certain brackets. But subsidies, from the very nature of things, must come from taxes. If the general policy of subsidies is a sound one, let us subsidize everything and let us get everything for nothing—if that is a sound proposition. The impact of the war was more powerful in maintaining prices and wage controls than the law of the land because it strengthened the will of the nation to live and maintain its way of life.

What I object to is an argument from only one point of view. To maintain a really stable price control, you must control everything. Some hon. gentlemen maintain that we should have control in the industrial structure. That inevitably involves control of wages. Then you have the demand that costs of basic food products in this country should be controlled. That, by the very nature of things, means control of the farmer. Then you have the viewpoint that we should maintain subsidies and at the same time reduce taxes. But subsidies can come only from taxation. I still believe that two and two make four. It can be argued, according to the audience you are trying to impress, that two and two make five, but in this House of Commons, where we get all viewpoints, two and two still make four, and hon. gentlemen who are arguing for controls in one direction should be consistent and argue for the general control of everything. They should not argue both for subsidies to be continued and for taxation to be reduced.

What I think is necessary in this country today is self-discipline imposed as free men. Men and women in the industrial structure, using that word in its broadest sense and including those engaged in commerce, employers of labour and those engaged in manual toil in industry, have a responsibility to discipline themselves, and so have those who are engaged in the agricultural life of this nation. Unless we have that measure of self-discipline under our system of free institutions, we cannot face up to the problem my hon. friends often talk about. Let us be frank and honest when we approach this problem, and go right across the board and deal with every section of society. If you control one group in society you must control every group in a similar way. Do not pick and choose to suit your own political viewpoint and your own constituents, but be fair and honest with all classes of society.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am afraid I must take issue with the Minister of Labour. It seems strange that it should be left to the Minister of Labour of all ministers to come to this house and advocate that wages should be controlled. One would think he would be here to defend labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe that wages should be just as high as the traffic can bear. But do not stop the traffic.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have no intention of stopping the traffic.

Mr. MITCHELL: What you want is labour to work for nothing and the farmers to get everything.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I want to point out to the minister—and he will understand it because he says that two and two make four—that the labourers in this country have always had wage control and it has not been government wage control either. They are getting wage control today, even though their wages have been officially unfrozen by the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: They never were frozen.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: As long as the means of production in which they work are in the hands of the interests who have control of setting both the wages labour shall receive and the prices of the products they produce, labour has its wages controlled at all times and it is not necessary for the government to control wages.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would you say the same thing about the farmers and their employees?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The minister says we cannot have it both ways; we can either lower taxes or else wipe out subsidies. But that does not necessarily hold true. If the surplus of industry which actually belongs to the people of Canada were distributed to the people it could take the place of taxes to pay the subsidies on things which are not economically produced.

I wish to quote from what the former Minister of Finance, who is now the Minister of Justice, said on July 5, 1946. I think he set out, as clearly and as briefly as anything I have seen so far, the objective of subsidies. It is contained in the report of the wartime prices and trade board to December 31, 1946, at page 66, and reads as follows:

> When all is said and done, the objectives of our national stabilization programme are the preservation of real social values, the protection of the value of real wages, of the real incomes of primary producers, of the real value of the income of pensioners, and teachers and office workers, and of the war-time savings of so many millions of Canadians.

These are the objectives as set out by the minister no farther away than July 5 of last year. Does the minister think these objectives are no longer desirable today, or does he think these groups which he mentioned do not any longer require any subsidy or any protection in the form of price control in order that they may have the full benefit of their wages? We of this group say that that time has not yet come; that the objectives which he set out on July 5 of last year are still desirable; that price control is still desirable in order to obtain these objectives, and that we must have subsidies where subsidies are necessary if we are to be able to maintain price control.

On page 15 of this report the prices board says this, which is significant:

The first major step in removing price ceilings was taken on February 1, 1946.

I believe the Minister of Justice has been subjected to a great deal of criticism which he actually does not personally deserve, because the minister who is now responsible for price control and the administration of these matters which we are discussing is the Minister of Finance. Although the Minister of Finance was in his place a few minutes ago, I do not see him there at the moment. He is the one who should be answering many of these questions and justifying, if he can, the steps which have been taken since January 1, 1947, or since last year when he took over. I believe that the Minister of Finance has done almost irreparable damage to the price structure of this country. All he has to do is to look across the line to the United States and see what the President of that country is saying as of today; that unless you maintain controls when you have them it may be too late to put them on again when the spiral of inflation has started.

Notwithstanding anything that the Minister of Labour has said tonight, I think the question is quite clear. If the government still believed in these objectives which were stated by the former Minister of Finance in July of last year, then there is no justification for the removal of subsidies on the essentials of life and to draw the red herring across the path about the control of wages is simply to beg the question.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to argue the point for the continuation of subsidies from a little different angle from that which has been used so far. I shall do it from the angle of production. The minister will agree with me that if we are to prevent inflation in this country the best way to do so is to have an increase in production so that there are more goods to distribute than there are dollars to buy them. That was one of the reasons why subsidies were introduced during the war. They were introduced to increase production. Certainly that was true so far as agricultural production was concerned and it was successful. Statistics will show that in the years 1944 and 1945 we had the largest agricultural production we ever had in Canada at any time. That was at a time when many thousands of our young men were overseas and were not engaged in active production. Yet today we find that, with these men back on the farms, our production has dropped. One of the major reasons for that drop in production is the uncertainty which has been created in the minds of the agricultural population of this country by the government's withdrawal of subsidies. We do not know what subsidies are to be dropped next week or the effect it will have on the price of a particular agricultural product. The result has been uncertainty. People will not start to produce, will not start to increase their hog production, their dairy production or any other of their agricultural production until they have some certainty of what the future has in store for them. I say that is one of the reasons why we have a drop in production at this time. The government themselves are to blame for it because of their present policy of withdrawal of subsidies.

Today the eastern farmer, the western poultry producers and others are simply not buying baby chicks. They are not increasing their poultry production; they are decreasing it because they do not know what the position is to be with regard to feed. They do not know whether the government is to carry on its present policy of freight rates or whether it is going back to the old freight rate structure in Canada under which we exported feed grains to Denmark and Holland at a cheaper rate. Those countries were able to buy oats and barley at four and five cents a bushel lower than the Ontario, maritime or British Columbia feeders could buy them. Until the government is prepared to come out and give some assurance to the country as to what its policy is to be, we shall not get the increase in production that we should have in this country if we are to prevent inflation.

One of the major causes of inflation is lack of production. The government has told Crane Limited that it wants more production of bathtubs, and, if the report is correct, it is prepared to give them $400,000 to increase the production of bathtubs. We want more production, and is the government prepared to continue subsidies, or what is it going to do with them? The government has given no assurance to the farmers of this country as to what its position is to be from now on.

Mr. PROBE: I see the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in his place now. I asked the Minister of Justice a question but I think the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply will answer it. It dealt with the conditions of the subsidy which was announced recently by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to be paid to Crane Limited. I should like to know the terms of that subsidy, the time which it runs and any factors with respect to production requirements or guarantees which go with the agreement to pay the $400,000 subsidy and the prices of the product which are to result, we presume, from the subsidy.

Mr. HOWE: The subsidy to Crane Limited arose out of a definite shortage of bathtubs, sinks and enamelware of that sort. Ways and means were sought to increase production and remedy that deficiency in the housebuilding programme. Many discussions were held with Crane Limited. It was found that, in order to bring production up to the required scale, an expenditure of about $850,000 was required for new equipment. It was finally decided that Crane would undertake that expenditure, provided that the government would give an incentive subsidy. The incentive subsidy was in the form of two cents a pound for material in excess of the quantity then being produced; it was not on the whole production of Crane. It was simply on the excess of the capacity of the plant before the addition was completed. The expenditure of Crane, as I remember it, was about $850,000. The subsidy was limited to $400,000. In other words, after Crane, through this incentive subsidy, had collected $400,000, which was estimated would take two years, the government's obligation would be discharged in full. That was one incentive subsidy.

A similar incentive subsidy was granted in connection with castiron soil pipe, which is one of the most aggravating deficiencies that we have had to contend with. I do not recall the magnitude of that transaction but it was on a similar basis. It was to be paid to the Anthes Foundry Company in the amount of about half of the capital expenditure to be made by the foundry in the form of an incentive basis of two cents a pound on the soil pipe produced in excess of the former capacity of the plant. Those are the only set of subsidies that have been incentives in connection with the housebuilding programme.

Mr. PROBE: Would the minister indicate whether, in his opinion, or from the records the plumbing industry in Canada was, at the time of the subsidy agreement, working at full capacity?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, definitely. That was carefully explored. The capacity of the industry at that time was not sufficient to keep up with housebuilding demands.

Mr. PROBE: What other companies, if any, share in this incentive subsidy for plumbing equipment, or for what reason was Crane Limited selected to receive the only subsidy, if that should be the case, for plumbing fixtures?

Mr. HOWE: The answer is that Crane was the only company in Canada that was willing to make a capital expenditure to provide the initial capacity on the terms I have outlined.

Mr. PROBE: Had Crane Limited made a deduction which was free of income tax in previous years, for the purpose of this plant expansion, or was this an entirely new arrangement?

Mr. HOWE: An entirely new arrangement. So far as I am aware—I should like to check this before I speak positively—Crane received no accelerated depreciation during the war years.

Mr. PROBE: One final question. Were regulations worked out with respect to the future price of plumbing products as a result of this subsidy payment to Crane?

Mr. HOWE: There is no change in price involved. The price was to be the ceiling price then.

Mr. PROBE: There is a control?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. There was at that time, and I think there is still.

Mr. FULTON: I wish to say a word on the question of subsidies, but before I do so there is one argument advanced by the C.C.F. and by hon. gentlemen opposite which I should like to answer, and that is as to the attitude of this party in the course of this debate. The argument is extraordinary. I remember when the resolution was introduced we gave our views on control at some length and we were even accused by some of filibustering. I remember the Secretary of State for External Affairs quoted with approval the use of that word in certain newspapers. We thought we had said what we had to say on the subject of controls, and indeed we were urged from all sides of the house to let the thing go, to get on with the business. Having made our views known, we did not think it necessary to say any more for the time being, but the first thing we knew we were accused, because of our silence, of "reaction tempered with opportunism". Everyone was saying, "Aren't you going to say any more?" First, they accused us of saying too much, and when we wanted to give the government an opportunity to go ahead with the bill. Then we were told we were tempering our arguments with opportunism. There is a good deal more than one might say on this subject, but if hon. members will read what we have already said they will find our views fairly well put forth there. However, if they keep pressing us we shall be glad to state those views all over again, and perhaps the time has come when we should do so.

I wish now to deal with one or two aspects of this question of subsidies. The hon. member for Melfort said that one reason why the farmers are not producing is the fact that they are not certain what future action will be taken with regard to subsidies; but an equally potent reason why they are not producing is that they cannot make a profit under the present price ceilings. That is certainly the case in my own part of the country, so far as the dairy farmers and the creameries are concerned. Three large dairy farms have gone out of production in my constituency and the situation is similar throughout the Okanagan. The Nanaimo creamery is closed for the first time in thirty-six years, and the hon. member from there tells me that the reason is they cannot get supplies because the farmers find that they cannot operate profitably under the present price ceiling.

The question of subsidies cannot be viewed altogether apart from price ceilings; the two go hand in hand. We have left the question of ceilings for the moment and are now dealing with subsidies, and the argument is being put forward only from one point of view. The Minister of Justice stated what I believe is accepted as the correct view with regard to subsidies, that is, that there comes a time when they can no longer be regarded as mainly anti-inflationary but become merely a transfer of money from the taxpayer to the consumer, and he put the proposition that when that point is reached, then the subsidy should be taken off.

My hon. friends to my immediate left answer that by saying that they think it is a good thing to continue the subsidies because in effect, they say, taxation is imposed on the basis of ability to pay, so that you are transferring purchasing power from those who can pay to those who have nothing with which to purchase. In other words, there is a redistribution of wealth. Let me ask my hon. friends this question before I go any further. Will they oppose a decrease in taxation? I shall be surprised if when the budget is introduced we do not find them urging strongly a substantial reduction in taxes.

An hon. MEMBER: For the lower income groups.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. FULTON: But you still have to raise taxes from some source and if, as they say, you should take it in the form of income tax and in that way effect the redistribution of wealth, will they argue for an increase in income tax? Will my hon. friends advocate an increase in income tax? Before they answer that question let me put some figures before them. They say that taxes are collected on the basis of ability to pay, but that is not strictly speaking correct. I have the latest figures, some for 1946 and others for 1945. In 1946 income taxes produced a total of $907,000,000, both personal and corporate. It may be said that these taxes are secured on the basis of ability to pay, but I would point out that it was necessary to collect over a billion dollars more. Even then we had to do a substantial amount of borrowing, and the bulk of that other billion dollars, which was necessary for controls and subsidies, came from excise and sales taxes which are collected on the basis of need. They hit hardest those who are neediest. They hit poor people the hardest, because they are the people who need most milk and bread, partly because they are the ones generally with the largest families. They are the people hardest hit by excise and sales taxes, and yet there was collected from them, in the form of excise and sales taxes in 1947, the sum of $737,000,000, or three-quarters of the amount collected in income taxes. It is nonsense to say that you can finance yourself in this way, lifting yourself by your bootstrap and redistributing wealth in this manner, paying subsidies by soaking the rich. It does not work out in that way. You had to collect nearly forty per cent of the total revenue by excise and sales taxes, and three quarters as much by excise and sales taxes at the peak year, as you did from income tax.

If the C.C.F. argue that we should still keep subsidies, we must either keep the sales and excise tax, which hits hardest the low income group; otherwise the only alternative is to increase the income tax, and if they think they can raise an extra $700 million by income tax without still hitting the poor I shall be glad to have them prove it, because no economist has yet found a way of doing that. But they proceed on the assumption, and they would lead the people to believe that they proceed on the assumption, that all you have to do is to soak the rich, and the poor will not have to pay. Of course the poor pay far more in proportion than the rich, so long as you raise taxes and keep them at this appallingly high level, because you cannot have all this tremendous revenue from direct taxation.

You must have a large amount of indirect taxation as well, and that is where the poor pay.

I am sure the Minister of Justice is keeping these considerations in mind. He is proceeding with decontrol and elimination of costly subsidies as fast as he thinks it proper to do so, though not as fast as some of us think he should. I should have been glad to hear him give this answer to the C.C.F. when they say that you do not have to do away with subsidies because it does not cost any more in taxation.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to answer the hon. member for Kamloops. This group do not argue that taxation can be increased on the rich to meet all the payments which would necessarily be made for subsidies or social services. Our argument has always been, and is now, that those payments can be met only by increased production, by the production of more goods and services in this country. We believe that under a planned economy we can get a greater production of goods and services in this country than we have had so far. That was exactly the argument I used. I stated that in 1944 and 1945, when we were nearer to a planned economy in Canada than at any time that I can remember in the thirty-five years I have been farming, the price the farmer received for his product bore a fairer relationship to the price he had to pay for the things he had to buy, and the amount the labourer received in wages bore a fairer relationship to the price he had to pay for the commodities he had to buy, with the result that we had greater production in this country. That is what a planned economy means. A planned economy means greater production so that we shall have more to share.

Mr. FULTON: It also means control.

Mrs. STRUM: Before we pass P.C. 9870, on the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, I wish to talk about the threatened increase in the price of butter, and the milk subsidy which this government withdrew. We have learned to our sorrow that when a rumour appears in the paper to the effect that rents are going up, that sugar is going up or that butter is going up, a few days later it becomes a fact. I think I should be remiss in my duty if I did not raise the point now in connection with the increase in the price of butter to the families of this country. I submit that the question is not control, subsidy or incentive. The question is, for whom are we to control and to whom shall we pay the subsidy? I submit it is to him for whom the cash register rings, because profits in this country have hit an all-time high, yet we have the gall to give subsidies to people like Crane Limited. That would be the equivalent of building a new pig pen on the farm of every farmer because we want more hogs, because his present pen is not big enough. Yet when we go to deal with the farmers, what do we do? We have the wheat contract for four years, but we are not taking one cent out of the treasury of Canada to cover our wheat contract. No. We add up the $1.55, plus $1.55, plus $1.55 for last year and the first two years of the contract, plus $1.25, plus $1 and we divide by five and get $1.35. So we say we will give an average price of $1.35 and it will not cost the Canadian people a cent. And we have, in effect, a price financed through the farmers' own contracts, not costing the Canadian people anything. We have, in effect, fixed for the next four years the return tc the farmer from his wheat, which amounts to price control; and then we decontrol all his costs—his twine, his fertilizer, his fuel.

He also is a consumer. The farmer will buy a car; and heaven knows cars have gone up in price. I found to my sorrow that not only has the ten per cent gone on, but another $300 must be paid for itemized things which were never listed separately before. We bought a car just before Christmas and we thought we were to pay $1,500 and something for a little Plymouth; but when we went to take delivery we found another $300 and some odd listed—$25 for unloading, so much for servicing, so much for this and so much for that—and it cost us $1,800 and something by the time we took it out.

We buy cars and we buy salt; we buy sugar and we buy shoes. Yet we find that the government can control the price of leather. Oh, yes, we can control the price of leather, but we decontrol the manufactured shoe, so that the man who is making shoes gets the advantage of control in his costs and the double advantage of being able to decontrol when he sells you or me a pair of shoes. So I submit that through the whole Canadian economy the question is not control. It is, whom shall we control, what shall we control and for whom shall we control? If you go downtown and try to buy a shirt, you have great difficulty in doing so. I do not need to tell hon. gentlemen that. You have had a hectic time for two or three years. But I find we are subsidizing cotton yarn. According to the Minister of Finance at page 1939 of Hansard, "a substantial subsidy is still being paid on raw cotton going into process.

I submit in all seriousness that you dare not raise rents and take subsidies off milk and butter and in every way possible assist the people who have things for sale and enable them to reach an all-time high in profits at the expense of the man who is on a fixed wage or fixed income through long term contracts for the things he produces. I submit it will be a mistake if you continue to do this; and I believe you will in spite of everything we can say, because I think the manufacturer has the ear of the government to a far greater extent than has the housewife, the mother or the farmer. I think the policies which are being carried out are big business practices, and the people who want taxes taken off are the big concerns of this country who are hoarding goods anticipating price rises. I notice that the stock of butter is up by millions of pounds over last year and yet, in spite of the fact that we have more butter, butter is to be sixty cents a pound. As I mentioned the other day, the whole experience of the United States has disproved the theory of this government that volume will decrease prices to the consumer. Volume has not decreased prices; it has merely accumulated profits; and if it brings on a depression, as it threatens to do, this government and this government only will be to blame.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have enjoyed the discussion up to the present time, but I believe the committee is, as usual, getting itself into real difficulties now, not knowing just what to do about a very bad situation. There obviously must be some way out.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is a way out.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There must be a way out in a country which is as rich as Canada is. May I for a moment refer to the speech made by the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Labour has his own natural way of expressing himself, but he generally manages to hit the nail right on the head and face facts realistically. I think all hon. members will recall fairly well what he said: how in the world are you to have money for subsidies if you decrease taxation? I believe nearly every hon. member would like to see subsidies, such as the one on milk, retained. The remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle quite clearly indicated that she would like to see the subsidy on butter retained. Of course she would assume that prices of butter are being held up because of the desire on the part of certain people to make a profit. In the light of what she said, I should like to recall the remarks made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley the other night as reported at page 2142 of Hansard. The hon. member quoted Dean Clement of the university of British Columbia, to the effect that last year butter fat cost 58·77 cents a pound to produce. He did not specify whether that was only in British Columbia; I presume it was, but he indicated quite clearly that he would very much like to know what would be the actual cost of the production of a pound of butter fat in Ontario. I believe, if all the hon. members of this house knew exactly what it cost in Ontario or in the maritimes or in any other part of Canada to produce a pound of butter fat, they would be greatly impressed. I believe we have been enjoying butter and a good many other things in Canada at a low cost for a long time, because the poor people who produce the butter and other things were simply absorbing part of the cost and producing at a loss. Now the time has come when, if we are to face the facts realistically and build for the future, we must cease calling upon any group of people to produce at less than cost.

The hon. member for Kamloops made some pertinent remarks, indicating that a number of producers whose raw products depended upon the activity of farmers had closed their doors because the farmers could no longer produce at the prices they were being offered, which prices were under their cost of production. We must face these facts. Merely talking about the difficulty will not solve the problem.

May I refer again to the remarks of the Minister of Labour. He said you just cannot have increased subsidies without increasing taxation. Let me say to the members of this house that when the minister made that remark he was wrong. That is one respect in which he just did not have the best information. Let me direct the attention of hon. members to this problem for a moment or two, and see how many can agree. The amount this country should be able to pay for butter ought to depend upon the milk, the apples, the potatoes, the lumber, the coal, the fish and all the other things Canada can produce. If Canada is able to produce a sufficient amount of all the other commodities the producer of butter needs, then certainly it is obvious that Canada should be able to pay that producer of butter enough of these various kinds of goods. Let us just face that set of facts squarely. If Canada is able to produce the goods of all kinds, to provide what is needed by the producer of any given commodity in order to enable him to make a living, then the time has come when this country must introduce a financial system under which it will be possible to pay that individual the price he needs to receive. The fault lies in our financial system. We do not have a financial system which can reflect the facts of this country. So many of us do not look upon the wealth of Canada as the lumber, the coal and all the other goods and services we can produce. So many of us look upon wealth as the dollars and cents we can take or not take out of the pockets of the people of Canada. Which is a completely fallacious standard by which to judge wealth. I believe everyone in the country will agree that the wealth of this nation is the lumber, the coal, the fish, the food of all kinds, the clothing, the shelter and the other things this country can produce. If the country can produce enough wealth, then certainly we ought to be able to have the standard of living we desire, at least the standard which our production would justify us in enjoying.

That is the first important point. The very minute we recognize that, we shall not at all agree with the Minister of Labour. Then we shall recognize the fact that we might be able to pay greater subsidies without increasing taxation. I do not care a great deal about issuing challenges, but I should like to throw out a challenge to any member of this house to disprove the remark I made. I should like to see any member who thinks he can do so get up and disprove my statement, when I declare that the amount we should be able to pay for butter or any other commodity, or any kind of service in this country, should depend upon the milk, the cream, the cheese, the coal, the potatoes and the other goods we can produce in this country. If anyone can disprove that statement, we are ready to listen to him. I defy any man in this house to do so. I would be prepared to give him as many weeks as he needs to prepare his argument, and I would be ready to pick holes in that argument when he presented it here.

Now I should like to say just a few words in connection with subsidies. I believe, with the C.C.F., that the minister and the government as a whole are proceeding far too rapidly with the removal of subsidies. A good many people who have only half thought through the problems of this country are beginning to argue that we should remove subsidies; and the line of reasoning they are using is precisely the line used by the Minister of Labour, which was based on fallacy.

Mr. MITCHELL: At the moment I am not talking about my hon. friend's theories on money. I do not think he understands them himself, but that is beside the point.

Mr. LOW: Come along and show him where he is wrong.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And quote your authorities.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us not get too serious. I should like my hon. friend to answer this question, if he will, and again I say that at the moment I am not talking about his monetary theories. Will he say whether or not at the moment the present subsidies come out of taxation on the Canadian people?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall be delighted to answer the minister. Certainly the present subsidies come out of taxation, because the present subsidies are being paid by a government which does not have enough wisdom to use a factual financial system. It is using a false system based upon debt, while it should be using a financial system based upon credit. The mere fact that the government has consistently gone into debt for many, many years, and now has the nation in such overwhelming debt that not a member on the Liberal side of the house or on any other side, except perhaps in the corner where the social crediters are, has the least idea how we can possibly get out of that debt, is the best proof of that statement. That debt is simply a wall over which they cannot see; and the fact that we are in this debt is clear evidence that we have been using a fallacious financial system. Of course the minister must not assume that all the wisdom to be found these days is reposing in the minds of the finance ministers of the Liberal government in Ottawa. He must not assume that, because those gentlemen do not know how to do things, those things cannot be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They did a fine job for the nation during the war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe I have given the minister a sufficient answer, unless he has another question to ask. I suggest to him that he go to the report of the royal commission on banking and currency for Canada published in 1933. That report is in the library in this building. Let him turn to page 22, paragraph 47 of that report. There he will discover that during the last war, between 1914 and 1917, some $26,000,000 were printed or created by the dominion government and used debt free. This nation has never paid five cents in interest on that $26,000,000, and that money discharged its percentage of the cost of the war just as effectively as any other dollars used during the war. If the minister understands that he will be in a position—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, and I am not suggesting that he is entirely out of order, but it does occur to me that at a later time there will be a better opportunity to discuss the financial system of the country. Would it not be more appropriate if we discussed the question of subsidies only at this time, and our financial system only in relation to subsidies? I am not saying that the hon. member was out of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I would not have discussed this matter of monetary theory, had not the Minister of Labour manifested such a deep interest in the subject.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I could say this to my hon. friend: If he is going to talk phony money to me, I am going to get under the desk.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All I can say to the Minister of Labour is that, although he has been a superb success as Minister of Labour in Canada, he has been a failure as financial adviser to the government of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: He should have been under the desk long ago.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I for a few moments discuss the question of subsidies? I believe that subsidies should be maintained and should be used definitely in Canada for an indefinite period of time, perhaps from now to the end. There are sound and fundamental reasons why that is so; and I particularly draw the attention of the Progressive Conservative party to the problem I am going to present to them for a few minutes.

If they will take the Searle letter of April 17, 1947—and I think all hon. members received it—and turn to the last page, they will find an account of the Searle index which poses a serious problem to every person who bears a share of responsibility for the conduct of affairs in Canada. In the Searle index of things farmers bought, it is shown that the cost of 147 items now stands at 165·1 per cent, using the 1913-14 figure as 100 per cent. This means that those same things cost the farmers of the west today 65·1 per cent more than similar items of the same quality in 1913-14. Those costs have risen twenty-five per cent since August 1939. Hon. members might attribute the rise of twenty-five per cent since 1939 to the war. But they cannot attribute to the war the other tremendous percentage increase, between 1913-14 and the outbreak of the war.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The index is quite clear that there is a general tendency for prices to rise, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has pointed out so well. There is a general tendency for the price of manufactured articles to rise. And unless primary products—oats, barley, wheat, milk and other things which the primary producer produces—are definitely subsidized, unless a floor is put under them, the tendency is for those prices to fall. In any capitalistic economy, any free economy, any private enterprise economy, such as we have in Canada, and as they have in the United States, this produces a discrepancy between the cost of secondary products and prices of primary products. Both by statement and by clear implication the hon. member for Qu'Appelle pointed that out.

One of the problems which must face the government and the country from this time forward is how they can possibly bridge the gap between prices of secondary products and those of primary products. I submit in all sincerity that there is no way known to man whereby that can be bridged, except by subsidies.

There must be subsidies to bring down the prices of secondary products, and subsidies to bring up the prices of primary products, if the price structure of the country is to be on a parity or to be what we call balanced. So that there is no escaping the conclusion that the subsidy is here to stay, and must be used from this time forward.

It is one thing for President Truman to say that prices of commodities must come down. It will be an altogether different thing for him to tell how they are to come down. While I do not wish to offend my C.C.F. friends, I wish to say this definitely for their benefit, and for the benefit of those who think along similar lines, that for them to contend that the reason for the increase in manufactured goods prices is entirely the fact that private enterprise does our producing is for them to make a ghastly blunder. And if they go forward with that false notion they will simply be the blind leaders of people who will blindly follow.

Let us face these facts and devise a solution. We do not need to wait for another election. There is intelligence, honesty and honour enough in the house to discover a solution. Let us find it and apply it. But we shall not find it by blaming it on things which are not to blame; and free enterprise is not to blame.

The cause of the difficulty is mainly that there has been such a tremendous increase in the use of machinery. Then, there have been so many other factors entering into the price of things as they come off the factory assembly line that the spread has been more or less automatic. I have not time to go into the matter in detail, nor do I think it would be in order to do so at this time. But any good textbook on economics will make the facts perfectly clear. To hon. members who wish to go into the matter with some care, I suggest that they read "Controlling Depression", written by Paul H. Douglas, Professor of Economics in the university of Chicago and published in 1935. This book is available in the library. It will explain the reasons for the price spreads clearly and give a possible solution. I say we must have subsidies in order to bridge the gap between the cost of secondary products and the price of primary products.

There is another matter, that of giving the consumer a chance. I am deeply sympathetic with the words of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. She appeals eloquently and inspiringly in the interests of the little people, the poor people, who have to buy and to live. We cannot allow prices to rise so that they will destroy these folk. I suppose every hon. member in the house has read the letter appearing in this evening's Ottawa Citizen addressed to the Minister of Finance and referring to $40 a week. Anyone who has not read it would do well to do so. Let him then go home and think seriously, realizing that the problem propounded in the letter is one which is facing people in the city of Ottawa right here, while we are in this chamber. And it is a problem which cannot be solved simply by talking.

Something must be done. Because of this rise in prices the people who are involved are suffering excruciating misery. We simply must take care of the consumers. So I say that when the government abolished the consumer subsidy on milk it committed a grave blunder, and set a precedent which could lead to many equally grave blunders.

It must be recognized that the consumers in Canada must be able to buy the goods the country produces. If they are not able to buy those goods they will fall into a state of semi-poverty and misery, while the people who produce the goods will be short of markets. That, again, will be bad for Canada and will lead to unemployment.

So far as I can see, the consumer subsidy is the only device whereby we can be sure the consumers will have the purchasing power they need.

I believe that anything further I have in mind might better be said at a future time. However I join with those who have pleaded so earnestly for a cessation in the dangerous rise in prices. I should like to give the C.C.F. full credit for the stand they have taken in this matter. They are entirely right. I do not agree with them in respect of technique, but only in this fact: Tonight they have advocated the payment of subsidies. I agree with them completely in that respect, but I do not think the subsidies ought to come from taxation, for taxation will destroy the incentive to produce. We might use a certain amount of taxation, but we must come to the point at which we shall create the means with which we shall pay the subsidy, and the means will be based upon the production this country is able to turn into the markets, and which it is capable of returning to the markets in increasing volume.

This much having been said, I draw my remarks to a close.

Mr. FAIR: There is an old saying that God loves the little people.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Springfield has the floor.

Mr. SINNOTT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I feel I would be remiss in my duty to the electors of Springfield if I did not say a few words at this time. No one was more disappointed than I at the discontinuance of the milk subsidy, and I do not think anyone will be more disappointed than I shall when the butter subsidy comes off. I do not think the people of Canada have objected at any time to the dominion government paying out $22,000,000 or $23,000,000 in milk subsidies, or to what it paid out in the butter subsidy to keep the price of butter down.

An hon. MEMBER: You are on the wrong side of the house.

Mr. SINNOTT: This is one side of the house where I am not subjected to any party whip. On this side of the house we as Liberals can get up and speak our minds and meet our fellow members the next day without being criticized. If we do not get reform from this side of the house it will be a sorry day for Canada, because this is the only place from which reforms have come for Canada from the beginning right down to the present day. William Lyon Mackenzie stood up for the common man, the worker and the farmer, and the Liberal party still does that today.

I agree with the speaker who has just sat down that this country of ours which can produce five times as much as we consume will never stand for another depression such as we had from 1930 to 1935. There was only one thing we were short of in that period and that was dollar bills. We had hogs, we had cattle, we had butter, we had meat, we had coal, and all we wanted of those things. The only thing we were short of was dollar bills, and the Liberal government will see that we are not short of them again.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Kamloops is not in his seat at the moment.

An hon. MEMBER: Give it to him just the same.

Mr. SINNOTT: I see he is over there now. It is clear from what he said that he was never a farmer. He said the farmers could not produce at present prices. But what about the consumer? You have to take him into account too. Compare prices today with what they were in the period from 1930 to 1935. In 1930 to 1935 hogs were selling at $4.35 per hundred pounds as compared with $18 today, and cattle were selling at $3.75 as compared with $15 today. I think it is a happy day for the farmer when he thinks of prices today in comparison with prices in 1930 to 1935. I trust that the hon. member for Kamloops, if he speaks again, will not delay the house for three weeks and then vote the opposite way.

Mr. FAIR: A few moments ago I started out to say that God must have loved the common people because he made so many of them. A few years ago, someone on the other side of the house might have thought that God loved the Liberals because He made so many of them, but that is not true today because we see their numbers dwindling.

Mr. McILRAITH: Where were you when the Cartier by-election was on?

Mr. FAIR: The hon. member for Ottawa West might tell us how the Cartier by-election was won.

Mr. HARTT: Is the hon. member interested to know how the Cartier by-election was won?

Mr. FAIR: Yes, and I want the true story when you give it.

Mr. HARTT: I am pleased to inform my colleagues in the house that the by-election in Cartier was won on the basis of the policies of the present Liberal government. The member for Cartier was elected on the strength of the policies carried out by the Liberal party since 1921. He had definite and absolute approval of every item of the policies by this government. That is why I was elected. The people approved the policies of control and decontrol, the spy inquiry, and the government's financial policies which have brought us through a great war to great prosperity.

Mr. FAIR: I want to congratulate the hon. member for Cartier on his maiden speech. I now have the pleasure of asking him a question which he can answer at his leisure after he has had time to think it over. What would the result have been had the fifteen hundred names been placed on the voters' list?

Mr. HARTT: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I say that my hon. friend is not in a position to prove to this house or to himself that anything wrong was done in connection with the lists. As a matter of fact, if he would take the trouble to compare the lists he would find there is a difference of 265 votes. Do not let him repeat the parrot cry of the Block Populaire and the communists.

Mr. FAIR: If the hon. gentleman thinks I raised the question of the Cartier by-election he is sadly mistaken. It was the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. HARTT: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. FAIR: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No; sit down.

Mr. HARTT: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HARTT: I am not intimidated.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HARTT: I do not think the hon. member—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. FAIR: This is not Montreal-Cartier. I want the right to speak here.

Mr. HARTT: I resent any insult against Cartier from any part of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would remind hon. members that when the Chairman rises all hon. members must take their seat. I call on the hon. member for Battle River and ask him to discuss these subsidies.

Mr. FAIR: I have been trying to do that for the last five minutes. Just as soon as I have an opportunity to speak I shall continue with the subsidies.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not mention Cartier again.

Mr. FAIR: I represent the common man and I wish to say a few words on his behalf tonight. I am in favour of subsidies. The government has done away with some which should have been continued for quite a while. When the hon. member for Lethbridge was speaking he mentioned a letter which was in the Ottawa Citizen this afternoon. I am one jump ahead. I shall read a letter taken from the Ottawa Citizen of this morning, and I intend to ask hon. members not to forget about it, because it is a challenge issued to a number of people who perhaps do not claim to be in the common people's class. Hon. members will find this letter interesting. I am going to place it on Hansard, because I think it is a good example perhaps to the Minister of Justice or whoever may want to do away with subsidies and they may answer some of the questions and arguments raised in this letter. The letter is as follows:

$40 a Week Budget

Editor, Citizen:—This is an open letter to Finance Minister Abbott and the gentlemen who got the $2,000 tax-free money.

We are the gentlemen and one lady who received the $2,000 tax-free exemption. It is up to us to do a little bit for the fellow who did not have that privilege and who cannot come into this chamber and speak for himself. I, as one of the common people, am going to speak for them tonight, and I hope it will not fall on deaf ears. I continue with the letter:

The following cannot lightly be brushed aside —not turned off by saying the writer is an atheist or communist.

May I digress for a moment and say that the policies of this and other governments are responsible for the rising of the communist programmes in this and other countries. Do not blame the other fellow. The letter continues:

Our young people served in the war, returned home to the usual great promises, got married, spent their savings and gratuity on buildings and furniture at outrageous prices. Today they are faced by a situation which is the outcome of our system of government and which means trouble, want, and sorrow for these young people who after years of war hoped to build up a home and family here in Canada. How many of these young people are getting $40 per week? Can you Mr. Abbott show how a couple with even one child can live for less in Ottawa?

The following will give you some idea of what can be purchased for $40 per week:

63 meals per week at 30 cents ..... (no extra meals for visitors)	$18 90
Rent	8 00
Heat	2 00
Light and power	1 00
Clothing and shoes	5 00
Insurance	1 00
Dentist	50
Doctor	50
Newspaper	18
Car fare	1 00
Church	50
Incidentals	1 42
	$40 00

Those items amount to $40, provided that a man can get a job at $40 a week and provided that he does not have sickness and some of the other difficulties which many people in the working class run up against. A little later on, he goes on to show that this amount provides nothing for shows, no tobacco or drinks, no entertaining, no holidays, no savings, no happiness, only worry. Then he asks: "How does it look to you, gentlemen?" It is signed "E. Richardson, Ottawa."

I have been on the production line of this country producing agricultural wealth for more than thirty years. I know the conditions that many of us have gone through, not because it was our fault but because it was the fault of governments in office. That same system prevails today. Some people give reasons of various kinds and I am going to give the committee one tonight. I expect to be challenged but, regardless of any argument that may be brought up, I think it will still hold good.

This is a little item which was given to me by a young lawyer friend in western Canada, in Lloydminster, in fact, a young man who spent some years in Ottawa during the war. He left here as a lieutenant-commander and is now practising law in Lloydminster. When speaking to me the other day he gave me this item. It illustrates perhaps some of the reasons why we have some of the mess in our country's government today. The article is as follows:

When a man gives you an orange, he simply says: "Have an orange." But when the transaction is entrusted to a lawyer, he adopts this form:

"I hereby give and convey to you, all and singular, my estate and interests, right, title, claim and advantages of and in said orange, together with all its rind, juice, pulp and pips and all rights and advantages therein with full power to bite, cut, suck and otherwise to eat the same or give the same away with or without the rind, skin, juice, pulp and pips, anything hereinbefore or hereinafter or in any other means or whatever nature or kind whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding."

Later on, another lawyer comes along and takes it away from you.

Perhaps some of the lawyers in the committee will tell us whether this is right. While this is considered a joke by many people, it is an expensive joke to the people of Canada. I think, if we got down to business and used some common sense instead of so much technicality in our money system we could have a commonsense system instead of the fallacious one we have used in the past, and then the people of Canada could enjoy the production of this land which could provide, under a sound business government, a better life for the common people and others than any other country on God's green earth.

Mr. MANROSS: After the talk about businesslike methods and the palaver we have heard tonight, is there any way we can find out how many are in favour of passing this item and how many are against it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure that hon. members were interested in the comments made by the hon. member for Cartier who declared that he was elected in the recent by-election on the record of this government.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It was agreed that we should discuss subsidies from now on and not the Cartier by-election.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was merely going to mention the fact that on April 1 the Minister of Finance announced the decontrol policy of the government and then, a few days later, we had the increase of ten per cent in the rentals which, I suggest, may have been a factor previously, but I shall not proceed with that argument.

Mr. KNOWLES: What was the date of the by-election?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The election was held on March 31.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It has been suggested that subsidies have been introduced to serve two purposes: to increase production and to keep down the cost of living for the people of the country. The government was justified in introducing that policy during the war, and the situation at the moment does not warrant reducing the appropriations for this important work. I have before me the national accounts, income and expenditure for the period 1938 to 1945. I find that the estimated distribution of income, recipients by income classes excluding agriculture and the armed forces, indicate that twenty per cent of our married men in the country received an income of $1,000 or less. That group of our people received 6·3 per cent of our national income. Let me repeat that. Twenty per cent of our wage earners received six per cent of the total income, while at the other end of the brackets three per cent of our people, with incomes of over $5,000, received fifteen per cent of the total national income. This suggests that the twenty per cent who get only six per cent of the national income are not able to protect themselves when prices rise. When the cost of milk goes up fifty per cent it means that they have to get along with less milk or butter or go without dental treatment. Further, you find in the maritimes that thirty-eight per cent of the population received less than $1,000, and only thirteen per cent of the total income, while at the other end the two per cent who get over $5,000 get a total of fourteen per cent. In the wealthy province of Ontario you find only fourteen per cent of the people getting incomes of less than $1,000, and four per cent of the total income; but you have three per cent of the people getting over $5.000, who grab fifteen per cent of the total income. That was for the year 1942.

I suggest, therefore, that, while that set of circumstances continues, it is important that the federal government, which is the only government that can look at the picture as a whole, should decide that it is important that the children in Nova Scotia should have milk, and should use a part of the national income to subsidize the production of food to make sure that the people in all parts of Canada are properly fed.

An hon. MEMBER: What did they do with the $300,000,000 baby bonus?

Mr. NICHOLSON: There are other things to buy besides milk.

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly; shotguns.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is suggested by some that shotguns be used to deal with the officials of the wartime prices and trade board, but no Progressive Conservative has risen tonight to suggest that we should not pay subsidies. The hon. member for Lake Centre elicited a great deal of information, but nothing has happened. The hon. member for Kamloops made an eloquent speech, but he did not suggest that we should get rid of another subsidy. He might have turned to page 81 of the wartime prices and trade board report, where you find a subsidy of $1,352 given in connection with fish hooks, and suggested that that should not have been paid. Nothing has been said, however. about a single item regarding subsidies in the past or the maintenance of subsidies at the present time.

I add my support in urging that the Minister of Justice, who is piloting this bill through, observe the complete silence to my right and at the same time listen to voices from our side of the house, and some from his own side, urging that the federal government should still look at the question of subsidies with a view to ensuring that Canadians, men, women and children, do not have to pay sixty cents a pound for butter, resulting in a diminished use of butter, and that the producers of primary products are not compelled to abandon the production of necessary commodities for the feeding of our people. The hon. member for Melfort pointed out that there was the necessary machinery, in connection with subsidies, whereby production of commodities could be increased.

During the war the federal government decided, rightly I think, to spend $70 million on milk and on goods that we should be importing from other countries, and if the price that was paid in the foreign country made it impossible to have these goods sold in Canada within the ceiling, subsidies were paid. It was considered that cocoa beans and coffee, citrus fruits and other commodities that were available in other parts of the world should be brought in and that subsidies should be paid. This same policy must be continued so long as costs increase so rapidly that our people cannot maintain that standard of living which is essential in this day and age.

Mr. MICHAUD: The hon. member for Battle River tried to make fun of the legal profession. I do not know that that contributes much to the debate; it takes up a great deal of the time of the house. The only thing I will say about the legal profession is that their sense of fair play is sufficiently developed that they know enough to leave other professions alone. The hon. member wound up his remarks by saying that we should discuss the question in a business-like manner. I am entirely in agreement on this point.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you a lawyer?

Mr. MICHAUD: Consult your parliamentary guide. We have discussed this particular order in council at least two and a half hours, and I have not heard anyone suggest that it should be revoked or amended. In my opinion a proper discussion of the subject should have included the suggestion of an amendment or the revoking of the order. It is all very well to say that members wish to express their views on the question of subsidies. I suggest that such views should be expressed in the debate on the budget. All we are concerned with in this item is either to leave it as it is or to revoke or amend it. If we have no other suggestions to make we might as well dispose of it now and pass on to the next item.

Mr. GILLIS: If you could settle the question of subsidies tonight you could prorogue the house tomorrow morning; the work of the government would have been completed. I am very much interested in subsidies. The Minister of Justice stated that there were two important functions that subsidies perform: one was to avoid inflation, and the other was to act as a means of redistributing income. I agree with him on that, but there is another important function that subsidies can also perform.

In a country like Canada, where you have a complete concentration of most of the major industries in the central part of the country, and most of the markets, since central Canada has the population, we find at the same time a flow of trade east and west, where practically everything that is produced has to be marketed in the central markets, so that in my opinion subsidies are necessary. Therefore the third important function that subsidies have to perform is either in eastern or in western Canada. Industries operating in that part of the country will not be economic industries under the present set-up. Some system of subsidies will have to be maintained by the federal government where industry that is essential to the country is uneconomic because of geographic reasons, and the removal of such subsidies deals a death-blow to any industrial set-up east or west.

May I point out to the minister the mess that we are in, both in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick, in connection with the coal industry. I say, without fear of contradiction, that the removal of the subsidy on Nova Scotia coal, or the refusal of the government to subsidize the wage increase demanded at this time by the mine workers in order to meet the rising cost of living, is responsible for that situation. If you take the loss in wealth, to say nothing of the loss from human suffering, and the blow it deals to the people, undermining their confidence in those who are legislating for them, you cannot compute what we have lost in that part of the dominion. The removal of subsidies was the reason in that case. The government subsidies came off on April 15 on fuels imported into Canada, and a week later there is an announcement by those who sell coal in Canada that coal prices have jumped from $2.75 to $4 a ton, an increase immediately that subsidies were removed to the consumers in central Canada. United States coal today is going into Nova Scotia and is selling at $28 a ton. That is plus freight in that province. A press item today states that United States coal, plus freight, is selling to the consumer in Nova Scotia at $28 a ton. That is with the subsidies removed. But he who is selling coal in Canada has a way of compensating himself when the subsidy is removed. He immediately announces a price increase to the consumer equivalent to what the subsidy was to him. The consumer then is paying the shot. But those in Canada who produce a commodity that was subsidized, when they ask for an increase to compensate for the rising cost of living because of the removal of subsidies and price controls, today have to go out and enter into what is, in effect, anarchy, and fight it out in the street with the boss. That is because of lack of government responsibility.

In my opinion this question of subsidies lies at the root of our economic problem. I do not think anyone can maintain price controls once that system of subsidies is removed; and I definitely believe that, if this economy is to survive under the present scheme of things, most of the basic industries in this country will have to be subsidized to some extent in order to hold down prices. I am not so much concerned about the secondary industries; I am speaking about the basic industries like fuel, power, agriculture and textiles. In my opinion they will have to be subsidized if prices are to be held down. As the hon. member for Mackenzie pointed out a moment ago, the lower income groups are today not in a position to purchase the commodities which they require at the price they are selling for. Taxing those in the higher brackets and redistributing that income by holding down prices to those in the lower income groups is, in my opinion, the only way to maintain any kind of stable economy under the scheme of things as we have it today.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. member permit me to say something?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we were to enter into an extensive system of subsidies such as my hon. friend is advocating, we should have to keep our taxation very high and it would not be on the high-income people alone. There are not enough of them. We should have to go right down into the low-income group. What fails to impress me about the attitude of my hon. friend right now, and the attitude of those around him, is that I have no confidence whatever in their willingness to support this or any other government in the kind of drastic taxation which would be necessary to carry out that subsidy policy.

Mr. GILLIS: As far as I am concerned, and as far as the membership of this group is concerned, we do not expect to get something for nothing out of this or any other economy. The answer to the minister's argument is this. Utilize the resources of this country and increase production. That is the complete answer. There has not been enough emphasis placed on increasing production. We are fully aware of the fact that you can only take out of that pool in proportion to what you put into it. But the main emphasis has not been on production, improving our machinery or developing our resources. The main emphasis has been on getting back as quickly as possible to what existed in 1939. In my opinion the government are retreating and retreating too fast. I am not afraid to pay taxes and I do not think the average workingman in this country is afraid to pay taxes. It is much better to have a man employed, with some kind of decent income, even if you are taxing him heavily, than to have him in the street, to be paying him relief, having him deteriorating at the same time and losing confidence in everything. I do not think people will quibble about taxes, provided that the taxes are put to the proper use. But I do know that in industry in Nova Scotia, the fact that the government took this adamant stand against subsidies is responsible for the fact that the whole economy of Nova Scotia and, to some extent, that of New Brunswick, is tied up at this time. A subsidy of $5,000,000 would have offset the wage increase, would have given all concerned in Nova Scotia an opportunity to go to work for a year. With a proper supervision of the spending of that subsidy by the federal government, if at the end of the year production could not be increased and there were valid reasons for this, then it would be up to us to do something with regard to the rehabilitation of the industry. But on this question of subsidy, I still say that if we can come to an understanding on it and apply that subsidy properly to the basic industries of this country, give our people some encouragement and go out for increased production, there is not any danger of inflation or of wrecking the economy because of the subsidies.

I have never met anyone on the outside who quibbled about maintaining a non-economic industrial industry which was necessary to the country in order to give the people employment and to put on the market a commodity which was necessary to the people. I have never found anyone who quarreled with that, and I have never found anyone who quarreled with paying taxes either. It is not the taxes that I am afraid of. As long as people are in income tax brackets, they have an income. What I am afraid of is getting back to the place where we have not sufficient income to pay taxes on it. It is much better for us to have people working, producing and building themselves up as citizens of the country than to get back to this system of relief. I am seriously suggesting—and this is my main reason for rising tonight—that the federal government should immediately reconsider the question of subsidy as far as Nova Scotia industry is concerned and getting it back into operation. I suggest that the government supervise the spending of any subsidies that may be put into force there; have a test there for a year at least and if, at the end of the year, there is not efficiency there, if the resources cannot be made at least fairly economic, then we should do something about getting the people into some other industry in which they can make some contribution to the national life of Canada.

Mr. QUELCH: In view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I rise to say a few words at this time. I agree with him absolutely when he says that the prosperity of the nation in the future will depend to a large extent on the payment of subsidies, that is, under a system of private enterprise, in order to maintain the production of the country at its maximum level and to maintain the demand of the people against that production, there will have to be a system such as that referred to by the Minister of Veterans Affairs as a compensatory system. A compensatory system is described very well by Stuart Chase in his book "Where will the Money Come From" where he advocates subsidies in order to maintain the effective demand of the people. I have heard several ministers state that subsidies cannot be paid without maintaining price control or price ceilings. I would say that depends, first, upon the purpose of the subsidies; and, second, upon the condition of production at the time the subsidy is paid; that is to say, it will depend upon whether goods are scarce or whether goods are surplus. If goods are scarce, then you will have to maintain a price ceiling. If, on the other hand, your production is surplus, the subsidies can be paid without any price ceiling being maintained by rigid controls.

May I explain what I mean? During the war a very large percentage of our production was shipped overseas, with the result that the money paid out on that production became a demand against the production left in the country, and that purchasing power became a great stress upon the price structure within the country. The government therefore desired to prevent the prices of goods from rising, and for that purpose put into effect price control. In addition, in order to make it possible for industry to pay their costs under that price control, the government subsidized industries where the costs were greater than could be met under the price ceilings. If the government had merely said to the industries concerned, "We will pay you a subsidy to make up for the increased costs, provided that you do not raise your prices," what would have been the result? In all probability some industries would have said, "To heck with your subsidies. We will increase our prices to an extent greater than the subsidies. Therefore we will recover our cost plus a profit, to an extent we could not recover it under your subsidy." In view of the fact that goods were so scarce at that time, after the subsidized goods had been sold the industries which had raised their prices would also have been able to sell their goods. That is why I say that when goods are scarce you will have to maintain price ceilings as well as subsidies.

What is to be the situation in the future? It will not be a question of reducing the demand against goods in short supply. The problem we shall face in future will be to increase the demand against expanding production, because we shall not be exporting fifty per cent of our production in the future and without bringing back imports in return. The total production of the country will be available to the people, plus the imports brought here in exchange for our exports. Just the other day Mr. Ruml issued a statement in which he said we shall probably have a depression on April 15, 1948. The analysis on which he based that statement is interesting. It supports 100 per cent the statement made by the governor of the Bank of Canada in 1946, to the effect that the great problem which will be facing this country in the near future will be lack of effective demand.

Mr. Ruml points out four reasons why demand will fall off at that time. He points out that today we have full employment. We have not quite full production because of strikes, etcetera, but we have a full demand against that production. The reason is that at the present time we are building up inventories. Those goods art not yet on the market, but the money paid out for building up those inventories is a demand against available production. In the second place, a large amount of money is being paid out for reconversion purposes; that is, to reconvert factories. That money is also a demand against available goods, because goods are not coming from those factories yet. Then he points out that at the present time a large proportion of our production is being exported with no goods being brought back in return under export credits. This means that money is being paid out in the production of goods that are not available for consumption in Canada; that is to say, the money paid out for the production of goods which have been exported becomes a demand against the goods remaining. The fourth reason he points to is that today we still have a large amount of savings built up during the war, which are a demand against out present production.

He points out that by 1948 the condition will be rapidly changing. Inventories will have been built up, and the goods will be coming on the market. Reconversion will be largely completed; the factories will be completed, and goods will be flowing from them. He points out that we cannot expect to continue to export goods abroad without bringing back imports in return, and that the savings carried over from the war will have been largely spent. Therefore he points out that by 1948 our production will be increasing in relation to demand; there will be a falling off of demand, so he prophesies that by April 15, 1948, people will say, "This is not a recession; it is a depression." He admits that very likely the government will take steps immediately to change that situation, and I am hoping that the government of this country will be prepared to do likewise. However the government knows very well that, once you allow a country to start on the road to depression it is not easy to stop it, because, once people lose confidence, it is very difficult to restore it.

So, Mr. Chairman, we have suggested that it is possible to maintain demand through the use of subsidies, and that in order to maintain those subsidies it will not be necessary to have price ceilings. We say the government can meet with industry and say, "If you are prepared to produce at a fair profit we will pay you a subsidy." That is to say, the government will set up a commission whose duty it will be to examine the relationship between demand and supply from day to day, week to week and month to month. If over a period of three months, say, they find that demand is lagging behind supply at the rate of perhaps ten per cent, so that demand is only ninety per cent of supply, then through the commission the government would say to industry, "We will pay you a subsidy of ten per cent on condition that you reduce your prices by ten per cent in order to restore the balance between demand and supply." If any industry refused, obviously the industries that did agree would be able to undersell the one that did not by ten per cent; and in view of the fact that the situation will not be the same as it was during the war, but one in which production is available, then an industry which refused to reduce its prices would have a great deal of difficulty in selling its goods in competition with goods which were being subsidized and sold at a lower price.

[Mr. Quelch.]

That is why I say in future, when production is expanding more rapidly than effective demand is being maintained, subsidies can be paid without the necessity of maintaining price control. It has been argued in this house that you cannot pay subsidies without increased taxation. During the war that was true; but the purpose in maintaining subsidies during the war was to maintain price control and thereby reduce the danger of inflation. Taxation also helped to reduce the danger of inflation; but now, after the war, it is necessary to take steps to safeguard the country against deflation, and the purpose of the subsidies would be to increase demand in relation to supply. The minister himself has said that at the present time the saving in subsidy will be no greater than the cost in taxation. Therefore, if you are going to try to increase the demand by subsidies, obviously you cannot pay for those subsidies by taxation, because you will not be increasing the demand in relation to supply but merely taxing people in order to pay the subsidies. When that situation develops; when we have to expand the purchasing power of the people in order to maintain demand against production, then obviously subsidies will have to be paid by national money, which, of course, will not be obtained by taxation.

I think that must be obvious, and that applies to the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops. Obviously he is still thinking of the situation that existed during the war, but that will not be the situation henceforth. The great problem we are going to face in this country will be the difficulty of maintaining an effective demand against our production. Before the war, we used to try to do that by maintaining a favourable balance of trade. It is generally recognized today, however, that if we want to have good relations with other countries in future we shall have to be prepared to accept the goods of other nations in return for our exports. Other nations will not be prepared to go into debt just in order that we may dump our unemployment problem on their doorstep. So I would suggest that in future, in order to maintain prosperity in this country, we can release the rigid price controls we have had in the past, maintain subsidies at the necessary level to maintain effective demand against our production, and finance those subsidies by national money.

P.C. 9870 agreed to.

On P.C. 7475.

Mr. ILSLEY: This requires an amendment along the same line.

Mr. FULTON: Would the minister move it?

Mr. ILSLEY: These are the amendments to which I consented yesterday with respect to the wartime prices and trade board regulation. I move:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 7475 of 26 August, 1942, as amended:

"Section 6(1) is deleted and the following substituted therefor:

6(1) No director, officer, clerk or employee of the corporation and no person acting on behalf of or under the authority or supervision of the corporation shall be liable for any act or omission in the exercise or performance or purported exercise or performance, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, of any power, discretion, authority or duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 7475 of 26 August, 1942, as amended:

"Section 6(2) is deleted and the following substituted therefor:

6(2) No proceedings by way of injunction, mandatory order, mandamus, prohibition or certiorari, shall be instituted against the corporation or any director, officer or employee thereof or any person acting under the authority of the corporation for or in respect of any act or omission of itself, himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations or otherwise heretofore conferred or imposed by the governor in council."

Amendment agreed to.

P.C. 7475 as amended agreed to.

On P.C. 5518.

Mr. FULTON: Would the minister be agreeable to accepting a small amendment which I hesitate to mention, but which I believe would clear up what might otherwise be a certain laxity in the wording? I refer to paragraph 8 at page 43 of the consolidation. This paragraph deals with offences, and subparagraph 2 states:

(2) Every person is a party to and guilty of an offence under this order who (a) actually commits it; (b) does or omits any act for aiding any person to commit the offence.

To meet the purpose I have in mind, I move the following amendment:

That the following be inserted in the schedule to the act in the column entitled "amendments" so as to pertain to order in council P.C. 5518 of 16 July, 1943, as amended:

"Section 8(2) is amended by deleting paragraph (b) and substituting therefor:

(b) does or omits any act for the purpose of aiding any person to commit the offence."

This means that the act would have to be committed with the intention of aiding in the offence. It would mean that no person who committed the act, not realizing the consequences of it, would be guilty. In other words, it is to make sure that the intention element is present.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would take it that that is implied by the present wording.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see anything wrong with it. I believe there is some similar wording in the criminal code. I am content to accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

P.C. 5518 agreed to.

P.C. 6497 agreed to.

On P.C. 34/4433.

Mr. FLEMING: It would seem that P.C. 34/4433 is to be effective temporarily, in view of the fact that it is included in this schedule. Is this not a matter which might probably be dealt with by permanent legislation, because recently we had a bill on this same subject before the house?

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman state his point again?

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that this order is to have only temporary effect. Could the subject matter of this order not have been properly included in the government employees compensation bill which was recently before the house? The effect of this order is to provide that the employees of three government corporations, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, the Wartime Food Corporation and the Canadian Wool Board, are to be deemed to be employees of His Majesty within the meaning and for the purposes of the Government Employees Compensation Act. Since this order is presumably to have a limited effect in point of time, could its subject matter not have been properly dealt with within the terms of the legislation recently before the house rather than carrying this order on for a temporary period?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. gentleman will remember, there was a provision in the government employees compensation bill for the inclusion, by order in council, of any other corporations which desired to be covered by the act. This had already been done in certain cases. I have not read the whole of this order but I presume, from what I have already heard, that the object of this order is to cover a case such as that.

Mr. FLEMING: I am indebted to the minister for his explanation. This order, P.C. 34/4433, was passed on June 10, 1944. It has the effect of bringing the employees of these three corporations within the terms of the Government Employees Compensation Act. What is the purpose of carrying on this order in council under the authority of Bill No. 104 when, under the authority of the new bill to which the Minister of Transport has just referred, an order in council could be passed under the terms of the Government Employees Compensation Act? This order was passed away back in 1944 without relation at all to the bill recently piloted through the house by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would think that what the hon. gentleman says is so; but these three corporations, if they have not already covered themselves and their employees by their own act are covered by this order and they were covered from 1944 until this day. If this order were not allowed to go through, their employees would not be covered unless a separate order in council were passed under the Government Employees Compensation Act. I would think this would be the better way to cover the employees of these three corporations.

Mr. FLEMING: With respect, I submit that it would be preferable to cover them under the Government Employees Compensation Act, making provision for the passing thereunder of an order in council to bring within its terms employees of these three corporations referred to in P.C. 34/4433. I would think that would be preferable.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I agree that that is the proper procedure for those corporations which are not already covered, but these are covered.

Mr. FLEMING: They are covered under the terms of an order in council which is to have a limited duration. That is my point. The whole basis on which the committee is dealing with the present bill is that the orders in council enumerated therein are to have limited duration. If the minister will indicate to the committee that it is the government's intention to pass an order in council under the Government Employees Compensation Act bringing the employees of these three state corporations within the terms of that act by order in council, this order in council in the consolidation can be dispensed with just as soon as the other order in council is passed. If there has not been time to do that the minister might indicate to the committee that this order is only to fill the gap until an order in council can be passed under the amended Government Employees Compensation Act.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. ILSLEY: That bill is not through the senate yet, is it? We shall have to assume that it will go through. I think we could do it the way the hon. gentleman suggests, but I do not see any particular reason why we should do it one way rather than another. If we knew the bill was through we could pass an order in council under that act and it would last as long as those temporary bodies last. This order will last for only one year, and then an order in council will have to be passed. But we have not got the other legislation through yet.

Mr. FLEMING: I want to be sure that we are not arguing at cross-purposes. Do I understand the Minister of Justice to agree that P.C. 34/4433 will remain in force only until there has been time for the government to pass the necessary order in council under the new Government Employees Compensation Act to replace P.C. 34/4433 on page 45 of the consolidation?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no objection and no advantage either way. If the hon. member would like us to revoke this order in council and pass a new one when we get the other legislation through, we shall do so.

Mr. GREEN: May I suggest that the minister give further consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member for Eglinton. There might be some virtue in reducing the number of orders in council from 57 to 56.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, what about the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? This was one of the orders he wanted to freeze. Does he want to yield?

Mr. KNOWLES: I was thinking about that. I would point out to the minister that the time when it might be desirable to replace this order would probably be within a month or so; parliament would be sitting and the minister could ask parliament for its consent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not want to bother with two addresses by both houses.

Mr. KNOWLES: It could be done in that way, but I am perfectly willing to yield this order. It is not in the class with the others under the wartime prices and trade board section.

Mr. GREEN: Let it stand until tomorrow.

P.C. 34/4433 stands.

Progress reported.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 22, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the following reports in English and in French: annual report of the Canadian National Railway system for the year ended December 31, 1946; annual report of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the year ended December 31, 1946; annual report of the Canadian National Securities Trust for the year ended December 31, 1946. Copies of these reports are being distributed to hon. members this afternoon. The auditors' report to parliament has been delayed in printing but I am informed that the English edition will be ready for tabling Thursday next and the French edition a day or two later.

By leave of the house I move:

That the annual reports for 1946 of the Canadian National Railway system, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited and the Canadian National Securities Trust tabled this day be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, together with the following items of the estimates for 1947-48:

Vote 434. Maritime Freight Rates Act, Canadian National Railways;

Vote 435. Maritime Freight Rates Act, railways other than Canadian National;

Vote 479. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals deficit, 1947.

And that the resolution passed by the house on March 4, 1947, referring certain estimates to the committee of supply, be rescinded in so far as the said resolution relates to votes Nos. 434, 435 and 479.

Motion agreed to.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO DISCONTINUANCE OF RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont): May I ask the Minister of Finance a question. When will the rationing of butter be discontinued in Canada?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): That is a matter of government policy that will be announced in due course.

IMMIGRATION

PRESS REPORT AS TO MEMBER RECRUITING PERSONNEL OVERSEAS FOR TEXTILE PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen). Has his attention been drawn to a news item, appearing on page 6 of this morning's Citizen, entitled "New immigration policy may come soon"? The item goes on to say that the member of parliament for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) is at the present time overseas in Europe, with the permission of the government, to recruit personnel for his textile plant. Is that a new immigration policy or is there another part that we have not yet heard about?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): I have not seen the newspaper item to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I would repeat what I said the other day to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). So far as any new policy on immigration is concerned, it will be announced in due course.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the statement regarding the member for Beauce correct?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): There is no secret about it. Like any other employer of labour, he has been given permission, in view of the shortage of labour in that area, to recruit, if possible, 100 workers for a textile mill or a woollen mill in Beauce.

Mr. COLDWELL: Under what regulations are these entries to be permitted?

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the normal regulations. It is a day to day affair. It is quite true that during the war there was no immigration, but the Department of Labour has to give approval where it is a question of immigration. In that case they are consulted.

Mr. COLDWELL: If approval is to be given, do you approve conditions of work, wages and so on?

Mr. MITCHELL: In the matter of wages and conditions, there will be the prevailing rates in the district, as far as I am concerned. Under no circumstances—I am speaking of ordinary circumstances—would I give my consent to the immigration of people from any country in the world to undercut local conditions.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Under what order is this permitted?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that the question is not debatable.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REPORT ON D.V.A. HOSPITAL AT SYDNEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Has the Minister of Veterans Affairs received Doctor W. P. Warner's report as to the future of the D.V.A. hospital at Sydney, Nova Scotia. If so, is the minister prepared now to make the statement which he promised to make on receipt of the report?

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall be glad to send a copy of the report to my hon. friend. The purport and conclusion of the report is that the hospital in question will be closed on the first of September, 1947, with out-patient clinical treatment for such as need it in the region concerned, care for the rest being given in Camp Hill hospital, Halifax. The basis of the hospital's policy is to give the best treatment to all veterans concerned.

UNITED NATIONS

UNRRA—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN ORGANIZED ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): On March 12 I asked a question seeking information as to what steps are being taken by the Canadian government to replace our contributions under the arrangements of UNRRA by some other form of organized assistance. At that time the minister indicated that a report had been received from the committee set up to investigate the possibilities and that the report was under active consideration. Is the minister in a position now to tell the house what decision has been reached?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): That is a matter about which it is still hoped there will be action on the basis of international cooperation, even if it is not handled by an international administrative body. Our representatives in Washington have been and still are in touch with the representatives of other governments, who were contributors to UNRRA, with reference to this, but there has not yet been developed anything sufficiently definite to warrant a statement.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Monday, April 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night it was considering P.C. 34/4433, Government Employees Compensation Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see any advantage whatever in delaying this order. I think it had better be passed. It can be done the other way, but it simply makes more trouble for everyone. It means an amendment to this act and the passing of an order in council. Why do that? Why not put it through this way?

Mr. FLEMING: I suggest to the minister that it has to be done the other way eventually, because the effect of this act is temporary. I do not know how long it is the government's intention to continue in existence the three corporations referred to in the order. It would seem to me that the government in any event, if it is going to continue to apply to these three corporations the provisions of the new compensation for government employees act, must pass a regulation to that effect under the terms of section 2(c) of that act. Therefore the only purpose that can possibly be served by the order in council now before us, 34/4433, is to continue these corporations under the terms of the Government Employees Compensation Act until such time as an order in council can be passed under that permanent legislation. This present order in council, apart from any further action on the part of parliament, will continue until May 15. Surely that is ample time to bring the Government Employees Compensation Act, the new act, into effect and to make the necessary order under it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see any advantage at all.

P.C. 34/4433 and P.C. 3122 agreed to.

On P.C. 328.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are a few questions I should like to ask in regard to this particular item, which has to do with the setting up of a corporation for the purpose of continuing the control over sugar. As the committee is aware, on March 31 the United States passed an order continuing sugar control and rationing until October 31, 1947, at which time, as was indicated when this extension was made, sugar control will come to an end in the United States. Today each country in the international pool receives an allocation of sugar under an international agreement. When President Truman signed the bill extending sugar control he said this:

While our supplies—

He was referring to the supplies in the United States of America.

—in 1947 will be larger than those available last year, they will still be substantially below pre-war per capita supply and still further below estimated demands . . . A premature ending of controls over sugar would bring about a scramble of competing countries for the inadequate supplies now in prospect.

Canada gets 82 per cent of her yearly sugar supplies from foreign sources. In a return which was brought down last month it was revealed that 47 per cent of Canada's sugar supplies came from the British West Indies and Fiji, 35 per cent from non-empire countries, and only 18 per cent from her own domestic beet sugar production. How is it that in spite of the opportunities which are ours, with our refining facilities, no real encouragement is given to sugar beet production? The six beet sugar plants have a maximum capacity of 150,000 tons of refined sugar, which is 26 per cent of Canada's 1946 allocation, and is 44 per cent higher than the goal set by the government this year. Some might say, "Well, what advantage would there be?—because Canada receives only a proportionate share of the world's sugar supply under international agreement." I suggest that if further encouragement were given by the federal government to sugar beet production in this country it would mean two things. For one thing, increased production—and I am informed that it could run about 50 per cent higher than the present figure—would mean a larger international pool, thereby assuring Canadian consumers of a larger share of sugar. It would also make available a wider distribution in the countries of Europe which require sugar.

I know there has been a change this year. One dollar per hundredweight increase in price has been allowed, and the government grants a 25 cent subsidy, but that is no additional encouragement. All that the government has done has been to pass on to the consumer the extra amount of one cent per pound; there has been no additional encouragement this year to the producer in this country to produce to the limit of the capacity available. For some reason it seems impossible to get consideration of the problem from those in charge of this corporation. Their attitude is that sugar is not a crop indigenous to Canada, if I might use that expression. But, sir, in Manitoba and in Alberta it is being widely extended; and in my own province of Saskatchewan there is an area in the Qu'Appelle valley peculiarly fitted by nature and the contour of the land to produce sugar beets and practically nothing else. I should like the minister to make a statement as to the government's attitude with regard to the encouragement and expansion of sugar beet production, so that this crop, which has become a kind of insurance crop wherever it is produced, may be extended in acreage and amount, to the end that there will be improvement in the opportunities for production and a larger quota available to consumers.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to say a few words in answer to my hon. friend. Pre-war beet sugar production was about 150 million pounds annually. The maximum production of beet sugar in Canada was in the year 1940, production for that year being 213 million pounds. Production in 1946 was 207 million pounds. The capacity of the factories in Canada is 300 million pounds.

It is not correct to say that no encouragement has been given to the production of beet sugar in Canada. In 1946 a subsidy of 60¾ cents per hundred pounds was paid. In 1947 that figure was increased to $1.25, of which 25 cents is now in the form of a subsidy and $1 in the form of increased price. As the hon. member has said, we in this country produce 18 per cent of our requirements at home. It is possible that by paying enough money in subsidies or by raising our tariffs high enough we could increase the production in Canada under peacetime conditions to considerably more than 18 per cent of our total consumption. A matter of policy comes in there, as to how intense a degree of protectionism, because that is what it is, we should apply to the production of beet sugar. That production can be increased, as I say, by the payment of enough money either by the taxpayers or the consumers; by the taxpayers in the way of subsidies or by the consumers in the way of prices. But a balance of some kind must be struck there, and a reasonable course taken. I do not know what my hon. friend would suggest. He must hold the same position, I should think, that a moderate course must be taken between the two extremes, because I do not think he would take the highly protectionist position that we should put our prices so high, our tariffs so high, our subsidies so high, that we would produce in Canada all the sugar we required, and exclude sugar from empire sources, particularly at a time when we are greatly in need of imports from empire sources in order to create dollars with which to make markets for ourselves abroad.

The policy of the government has been a reasonable one. We have not discriminated in any way against the beet sugar industry in Canada. The production figures I have given are reasonable. The hon. member for Stanstead said one of the great factories in southwestern Ontario is idle but the prime factor in that situation was lack of labour, and I understand prospects are that both factories will be operating there, with an improvement in production. The contracts signed in the last ten days have been greater than ever before in the history of the beet sugar growing area.

The suggestion has been made that if we had forced to a greater extent the growing of sugar beets in Canada, we would have increased the amount of sugar available for our consumers. Well, we get about six per cent of the world production of sugar, or the production that is available for Great Britain, the United States and Canada. To the extent that we increased production in Canada that would go into the pool under the international allocation arrangements and out of the pool we would get six per cent of the increase, which would not be very much. It is just a question how much of the money of the taxpayers or how much of the money of the consumers we would be justified in paying in order to force that result. I think the course we have taken has been reasonable.

Mr. MILLER: During the Easter vacation I was at a meeting of sugar beet growers in the city of Portage la Prairie. Representatives were there endeavouring to get the sugar beet growers to sign contracts for another year. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I think it is a fact that the sugar beet producers of this country are held down in the price they get, because the price for their product is not allowed to equal the price for sugar made from imported sugar cane. You do not need to raise the tariff in order to get a greater production of sugar in Canada, certainly not in Manitoba. The sugar beet growers have been down here at least four times since last December trying to get some satisfaction from the administrator. Finally I understand they had a conference with the Minister of Finance at which the last adjustment just mentioned by the Minister of Justice was arrived at. At every meeting of growers that I attend at which there are representatives of the association there is criticism of the present sugar administrator. I should like to know what will be his position in the future. Are we going to have the same sugar administrator? He does not have the confidence of the growers, who do not think he is giving them a fair deal as compared to cane sugar. The government must know that from the comments of the delegations of growers every time they come down here. The growers are being urged to produce more, and the factories are trying to get contracts. At the factory of the Manitoba Sugar Beet Company on the Red river they want to get production up to 150,000 tons, as compared to their present maximum of 90,000. If the price paid the sugar beet growers was brought up to equality with what is paid for cane sugar it seems to me you would have no difficulty getting more sugar beets produced, and consequently more sugar. Before I sit down I would like to know from the minister just what is to be the position of the present sugar administrator under the new set-up.

Mr. ILSLEY: The $1.25 puts them on a complete parity with the price of cane sugar.

Mr. MILLER: Not quite, does it?

Mr. ILSLEY: On the landed cost of cane.

Mr. MILLER: Does it not require about $1.55 to do that?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told the $1.25 makes the return equal. I do not know the ground of criticism of Mr. Noble.

Mr. MILLER: There is plenty of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know that there is criticism.

Mr. MILLER: The criticism is mainly that he is more a cane man than a sugar beet man; I don't mind saying that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, to be valid, criticism has to be based upon facts, not upon what a man may have done previously in his lifetime, or something of that kind. Mr. Noble was a high official of the Royal Bank, which had some branches in Cuba and I believe at one time had some interest in cane sugar plantations. That was the fact upon which the whole criticism of Mr. Noble was based; but that is not sufficient. If criticism of a man is going to be made, for it to be valid you must put your finger on some facts. I am convinced that Mr. Noble has been scrupulously fair in his treatment of the beet sugar growers.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I remind the minister that after the first war it was proved quite conclusively that some of the bank gentlemen who were mixed up with sugar did not know very much about it; they were out about $16,000,000, so it is no recommendation to say that a man worked in a bank.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not going to weary the minister with my views on subsidies; he knows them very well, but I should like to ask if he does not consider that the method of applying the sugar subsidy has resulted in a curtailment of production in southwestern Ontario, as distinguished from other areas in which the growing of sugar beets was carried on during the war. The total production is about on a level with what it was before the war, but in the great sugar beet area of southwestern Ontario production has decreased, whereas in Manitoba, Alberta and to some extent in Saskatchewan production has increased. Is it not a fact that the method of applying the subsidy has brought about this result? I am leaving aside the question of labour, because if I have correctly understood the situation the matter of labour has not been the determining factor in the abandoning by the farmers of southwestern Ontario of the cultivation of sugar beets.

Mr. ILSLEY: The fact that competing products were subsidized at all probably did mean that a larger acreage was devoted to competing products than to sugar. But all the acreage was used; and there were years when it was thought better to produce beans, tomatoes, and the like, than to produce sugar. That was not fully carried out, of course, but it was thought desirable to increase the production of some of these products, which used land that otherwise might have been used for sugar. That was a matter of nutrition, a matter of getting production of the proper foods. If sugar had been subsidized and the others had not been, probably there would have been a larger acreage of sugar, despite the labour situation. But the matter of labour was a serious one in that district of Canada, because it is contiguous to the large industrial areas in which high wages were being paid, and where it was difficult to get labour.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not going to question the judgment of the government or of the department in subsidizing other products, which may have made it attractive to farmers in southwestern Ontario to grow those products in place of sugar beets. But is it not a fact that, in the result, the farmer growing sugar beets in Manitoba, or any of the prairie provinces, received a better price per ton for his beets than did the farmer in southwestern Ontario?

Mr. ILSLEY: He did, on account of the fact that he enjoys freight protection.

Mr. HACKETT: I am aware of that. Again, I am not criticizing the government, but I am endeavouring to point out that the subsidy did not work out equally everywhere. The farmer in western Canada—and by that I mean Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta —was getting from 75 cents to something over a dollar more per ton for his beets than was the farmer in southwestern Ontario. That was a considerable incentive.

Mr. ILSLEY: The same rate of subsidy was paid everywhere. The price was higher in the west. They are entitled to a higher price because of the freight.

Mr. HACKETT: The point I wish to make is that southwestern Ontario, being the area par excellence in which the sugar beet can be produced, where the industry was firmly established, and where the people were acquainted with all the methods of good production, should have been treated differently. It seems to me that the growth of sugar beets could have been stimulated there to better advantage than by opening up new areas in which the whole population had to be taught the industry from the beginning. I shall not say poor judgment was used, but I shall say the government could have got a larger quantity of sugar with less effort from southwestern Ontario than from the new area, in which as it were it started the growth and development of a new sugar beet industry.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the comparison between Ontario and Alberta holds. I believe Alberta is placed just as favourably, and perhaps more favourably, in the production of sugar beets.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with the minister's statement to the effect that encouragement to the industry—

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if the hon. member would speak louder. I am interested in what he is saying, but down here we can hear nothing but a whisper.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The interruption supports the suggestion made by the hon. member for Fort William, that loud speakers be installed in the chamber, should have been carried into effect. I am waiting for the improved suggestion in that regard which he said would be forthcoming shortly.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to take up that question next Monday.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister stated that if any further encouragement were given to sugar beet production it would not mean any additional ration to the consumers, because under the international agreement Canada is entitled to only six per cent of the available supply. Theoretically that is true. But in the United States, when President Truman made the announcement to which I referred a few minutes ago, he said that a portion of the increase in the production of beet sugar would be passed on to the consumer, and that the consumer would be entitled to a sugar ration in the coming year larger than he would be entitled to under the proportionate share of the United States by virtue of the international agreement.

Today in the United States the ration share is 35 pounds per capita. That is the quota for householders in that country. Under the new plan enunciated by the President, and through encouragement given to sugar beet production, an extra ration to the extent of 15 pounds per individual will be passed on to the consumer. In other words, while under the international agreement the present quota is 35 pounds, if the sugar beet production of the United States is increased to the extent of 15 pounds per capita, that increase will be passed on to the consumer. While it is true the subsidy of 25 cents and the additional price of a dollar a hundredweight does afford some advantage to the producer, I suggest that the sugar beet production about which the minister spoke in such glowing terms would not have taken place in Ontario, had it not been for the subsidy of $112,500 granted by the Ontario government, which is to be made available this year to sugar beet producers. If, under the international agreement, the United States is in a position to add to the ration that the consumer will receive through increased beet sugar production, is there any reason why Canada should be in any different position?

My second point is that if encouragement is given to sugar beet production in Canada, and Canada continues to be restricted to six per cent of the international output, we would be conserving United States dollars which, if the exchange situation is as it is described in the press, is so necessary today. The amount invested in the course of the year in importing sugar into this country is some $23,000,000, U.S. funds, and that is very necessary to our international financial set-up. If we produced that sugar in Canada we would be saving that money as well as giving encouragement to the producers and providing a kind of insurance for agricultural production. Canada is producing more sugar beets today than heretofore; is there any reason why we could not extend the rationing, as has been done in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have increased our ration of sugar along with the United States.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have suggested that by reason of the increased production of sugar beets ration amounts could be increased.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how long this international allocation will continue and I assume my hon. friend is talking more about a long term policy than one for the next twelve months or so. I am told it is expected that the beet sugar production in Canada will reach an all-time high in 1947. It could be driven up further and the imports from empire countries—they are mainly from empire countries, certainly in time of peace—can be pressed down if we want to spend enough money to do it. But, as I said before, that is protectionism of the very highest type.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under this government we have had the highest protection in the history of the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not talking politics; I am talking about my hon. friend's proposal. It is not altogether desirable to crush out imports from the sterling area, and it is not altogether desirable to make different areas completely self-sufficient in everything. If you do that, you cut off international trade. I think the beet sugar growers should be treated fairly, and in my submission they have been treated fairly. They have not secured every subsidy that they applied for, and the same applies to every other group in Canada that has applied for a subsidy. So far as I know, their demands have not been fully met. When I was in the Department of Finance we received delegations and we turned down requests for subsidies of much greater magnitude than those that were granted. Very often the subsidy granted was not as much as what was asked for, and the same applied to practically every other agricultural product. The requests made exceeded what was eventually done. I think those are the only points raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. HACKETT: Before the war the plant capacity in southwestern Ontario was being operated to about one hundred per cent of its capacity, but according to the information I have it is being operated today only to the extent of sixty or sixty-five per cent. Would it not be to the advantage of Canada so to formulate our policy concerning the production of sugar beets as to bring these plants into full production?

Mr. ILSLEY: The information I have is that the company expects to operate both plants this autumn. They did not operate them both the last year.

Mr. HACKETT: Since 1941. What is the latest information the minister has as to Canada's allotment from the pool? The last figure I have is 504,000 short tons, which included 90,000 tons of domestically grown sugar.

Mr. ILSLEY: The allocation for 1946 was 504,000 short tons, what they call short tons raw value. For 1947 it was 611,000 short tons.

Mr. HACKETT: How much is charged to Canada because of the domestic crop? What is estimated for this year? It was 90,000 short tons out of 504,000 tons last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give the exact figure, but it is the impression of my advisers that it is 104,000 tons for 1947.

Mr. HACKETT: That is up 14,000 tons?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it be completely out of order to ask the minister to let this matter stand until eight o'clock? I have an exceedingly important committee meeting and I should like to get into this discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how important the committee meeting is, but this is pretty important too, and I think we had better go on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It happens to be an exceedingly important committee meeting on the Indian Act. The Indians from Alberta will not be here tomorrow. They are giving evidence before that committee between four o'clock and six. It is my duty to be with them in the committee. Also I should like to be in on this debate on sugar. I do not agree with what the minister is saying about the lack of discrimination against the beet sugar industry. I should like to have an opportunity to discuss that matter after eight o'clock tonight.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think we shall have to go on with this.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister is misinformed when he tells the committee that there has been and is no discrimination against the beet sugar industry. The whole record of the sugar administrator from the time he was appointed until he left office is one of discrimination against the beet sugar industry, to such an extent that it stands as a disgrace to this country and constitutes a danger to the whole beet sugar industry of Canada notwithstanding the plausibility of the arguments that are being offered by the minister. I have to leave now; I shall have to say what I want to say when the estimates come up, unless this matter can be deferred until eight o'clock or is continued until eight o'clock. If it is continued until eight o'clock I shall be pleased.

Mr. ILSLEY: I see no evidence whatever of any discrimination on the part of Mr. Noble against the beet sugar industry. I regard Mr. Noble as one of the best public servants of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: By the time I get through with him I think the minister will see that there has been plenty of discrimination.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Before the orders of the day were called today some reference was made to the hon. member for Beauce bringing certain Polish weavers to Canada. I understand also that some workers are being brought from Europe to assist beet sugar growers. How many are being brought in, where are they being brought from, and generally what is the picture that is developing in the country in connection with the matter of immigration? The hon. member for Vancouver East asked a question about this matter earlier in the day. Is the minister in a position to say how many are being brought in to assist in the sugar beet industry, and how many have been brought in for other industries?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think the last question is a little too wide. The first question with regard to sugar beets would probably be in order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Sir, I do not think we can unscramble the immigration omelet without getting the general picture. If we get it piece by piece I have no objection, but I want to get the general picture.

Mr. HACKETT: Were not prisoners of war used for that purpose up to this year? We had four thousand in Ontario last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some Japanese were used in certain parts of Canada on the beet sugar farms.

Mr. HACKETT: In the west.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and some prisoners of war as well. I do not know the number of workers that are being brought in for the purpose of working on beet sugar farms. I presume I can get that information from the Minister of Immigration or the Minister of Labour. I am informed that arrangements are being made for the immigration of some workers from Poland and from western Europe.

Mr. PEARKES: Are those who are being brought in having their passages assisted?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think we should tell the minister that some of us intend to inquire into this matter when the Minister of Labour is before us. We have that in mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I am not in a position to answer the question myself.

Mr. PEARKES: So long as we can raise the question when the Minister of Labour is before us, I shall leave it.

Mr. FERGUSON: The British are gallant people; they fought for this country and I believe a number of them would come to Canada to work in the sugar beet industry. Is any effort being made to get persons in the British isles to come here to work in this industry? A great effort is being made to bring heroic Poles. I should like to see some effort made to bring in British people.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have a question with regard to the importation of molasses from the West Indies. This is a commodity which for many years has been used extensively in the maritime provinces, in the fishing industry, on the farms and in the lumber camps. I am quite sure that to a considerable extent the minister was brought up on it. In those days he did not have, neither did the rest of us, the vitamins which are so necessary and which every drugstore sells today. These vitamins are contained in the natural molasses, and the people who used molasses in those days did not require vitamins in capsule form. Medical men have brought to my attention the handicap we suffered in the maritime provinces during the war years because of the restricted importation of West Indies molasses. Will the minister make some statement as to the increase in the importation of molasses into Canada, especially in the eastern provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: The allocation of molasses to Canada for 1947 is ten per cent higher than in 1946. It is being allocated for use in eastern Canada, in the maritime provinces and Quebec.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What was the percentage of that importation last year, and what is the expected importation this year in relation to the ordinary importation in the years prior to the war?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is getting back close to normal.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There is still a restricted importation in relation to the requriements of the people who desire to use it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it is not yet back to normal.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the minister any report to make to the committee, and especially to the people of Nova Scotia, as to the reestablishment of the sugar manufacturing company in Halifax which was shut down during the war years? Our entire manufacture of cane sugar is now taking place in other provinces rather than in Nova Scotia, where we have one of the oldest and best sugar refineries in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The government did not close the plant; the plant was closed by the company. I am unable to state what the present status is.

P.C. 328 agreed to.

P.C. 6289 agreed to.

On P.C. 4112.

Mr. McLURE: Will the minister explain why it is necessary to have this order in council reenacted?

Mr. BRIDGES: In order to give the proper background of this order in council it will be necessary for me to take some little time, but I shall give it if the hon. member wishes it. I know he is interested in this item.

The Pelagic Sealing Convention of 1911 entered into between Great Britain, United States, Japan and Russia respecting measures for the preservation and protection of the fur seals in the north Pacific ocean was ratified in Canada by the Pelagic Sealing (Convention) Act 1938. Chapter 17 of the act provided that the act shall continue in force until a day which may be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council following upon the termination of the convention.

On the 24th of October, 1940 in pursuance of article 16 of the convention, a notice of abrogation was given by Japan, and in accordance with the provisions of the convention, it expired on the 23rd of October, 1941.

A provisional fur seal agreement was entered into between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 8, 1942 and December 19, 1942 covering a portion of the waters of the north Pacific ocean.

It was stipulated by article 10 of the provisional agreement that it would remain in effect for the duration of the present emergency and twelve months thereafter.

The provisional agreement between Canada and United States was confirmed in Canada by order in council P.C. 4112 of May 30, 1944 passed under the War Measures Act. This order in council likewise fixed the tenth day of June, 1944 as the day for the expiry of the Pelagic Sealing (Convention) Act 1938, as provided for in section 17 of the said act.

On December 31, 1946 the President of the United States proclaimed that in so far as the United States was concerned the hostilities of world war II had terminated as of noon, December 31, 1946. As a result of this proclamation those portions of United States statutes respecting fur seals which specifically implement the 1942 provisional fur seal agreement between the United States and Canada, will cease to be effective at twelve o'clock noon December 31, 1947. The government of the United States is now considering an arrangement to replace the provisional fur seal agreement of 1942 and will communicate with the government of Canada at the earliest possible date with respect to such arrangement. In the meantime—and this is what my hon. friend wants to know—in order to keep in force the provisional fur seal agreement of 1942, the one we are working under, until December 31, 1947, it is necessary to continue in effect the present order in council P.C. 4112 of May 30, 1944.

Mr. McLURE: That is satisfactory. Then I understand, and this committee will understand, that there are just the two countries now in this treaty, Canada and the United States.

Mr. BRIDGES: That is right.

Mr. McLURE: Japan is out of it.

Mr. BRIDGES: Yes.

Mr. PEARKES: Has not Russia some interest in this treaty?

Mr. BRIDGES: Not under the agreement entered into by exchange of notes December 8 and 19, 1942.

P.C. 4112 agreed to.

On P.C. 2751.

Mr. BRIDGES: I have already announced that there are no longer canned fish allocations so far as the industry in Canada is concerned. I made this announcement in the house on March 13 last. I would therefore propose that this order be deleted from the schedule.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

On P.C. 251.

Mr. BRIDGES: This order brings up a subject which will probably provoke some debate, since it deals with the prohibition of the issuance of fishing licences to people of Japanese racial origin. It is my intention to ask that it stand at the present time and the committee will take it up when it considers those items in the schedule under the heading Department of Labour, which also deal with the evacuation and relocation of persons of Japanese race in Canada, and the one dealing with financial assistance to voluntary repatriates to Japan. I therefore ask that the order stand until then, the object being that we may have one debate instead of two on the Japanese.

P.C. 251 stands.

On P.C. 4600.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This order in council has to do with prosecutions taken under part 15 of the criminal code and the right of appeal is provided in respect of infractions of wartime regulations. I appeal to the minister to communicate with the officials administering the wartime prices and trade board and to point out to them the necessity of proceeding with proper regard to the rights of the individual. During the war arbitrary actions on the part of those charged with the investigation and prosecution of offences against these regulations were more or less tolerated. Now in the days of peace, even though this legislation be carried on for the time being, the rights of the individual must be assured.

I hold no brief on behalf of those who are deliberately breaking the law, but I suggest that the retail merchant or the honest business man who makes a momentary slip which constitutes a contravention of regulations, some of which he does not know of unless he is omniscient, should not be harassed. I shall not discuss in detail the cases I have in mind, but I suggest that in making investigations these officials should be instructed to use care. Particulars in support of my contention that frequently that is not done, I do not intend to place before the committee at this time, but I suggest that the minister ask the officials who are conducting investigations to use discretion, to warn people where a warning is possible, and to prosecute only where there is apparently a continuing intention to circumvent the law.

Some investigators arrogate to themselves the arbitrary power that characterizes many of those who exercise authority, however small or great. Some have developed a complex of harassing honest business men. I hope that will end and that the Minister of Justice will see that it does. Most of our people want to uphold the law, but on too many occasions the investigators proceed on the assumption that all the people want to break the law. That is a type of mind that can be easily developed and it is the type of mind that has no place in a democracy. It leads to bureaucratic omnipotence and domination. Against that type of mind I make this protest, and I say this to the minister in no critical sense at all at the moment. If it is desired to enter into a critical argument I am prepared to do so, but I am putting this forward in a constructive way. I ask the minister to inform these officials that the Canadian people are law-abiding. The record of prosecutions shows that. Tell these men to use that discretion which an honest people have a right to demand of their officials.

Mr. ILSLEY: The chief enforcement officer tells me that the investigators are instructed to be courteous and careful, and for the most part they are. There are 599 investigators and you do not get 100 per cent perfection from any group of men. Whether prosecutions are undertaken or not, the question is decided in Ottawa in every case, and decided carefully.

Mr. ISNOR: There is a good deal of merit in the suggestion thrown out by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I approach the question not from the standpoint of a legal mind but as a retailer, and I find that there are many of the smaller retailers who are subject to an unnecessary amount of detailed work because of the manner in which investigations are carried on. Fortunately my own stores are warned and given instructions, and they follow the bulletins very closely. Instead of being criticized, we have been complimented for the manner in which we have tried to cooperate. But I think it is unfair to say that the great majority of investigators proceed on the basis that all merchants or citizens are endeavouring to break the law. It is only fair to say that practically all the investigators—although, as stated by the minister, there are exceptions who do not use discretion—come into your store, look at your records, check them carefully, and are guided by the percentage of profit which you must use in the mark-up. It is helpful to the reliable and honest merchant to have this check-up from time to time. I am particularly concerned because of the effect this criticism has on the consumer. It creates in the mind of the average consumer the impression that the government, through its investigators, is protecting its own interests. Instead of criticizing them as a whole, I would say that the board is to be complimented on the ninety-five or ninety-nine per cent of good investigators whom they send out to do this work. I could enlarge on that as a result of personal knowledge and the experience gained through the investigators coming into my office and my stores and checking on the clerks and managers. On the whole they have done an exceptionally good job; and I think that word should be passed along to them.

Mr. HACKETT: I wish to ask the minister a question about a matter which he may tell me does not come in his department. But in view of his close relationship with finance, and his recent incumbency of the high office of Minister of Finance, he may be able to tell the committee what is being done to dissolve and diminish the staffs which were recruited for the purpose of administering wartime prices and trade board regulations and detecting breaches thereof. I speak with some interest, because many large office buildings in Montreal are occupied to a very large extent by staffs of the various government agencies which have to do with the administration of the wartime prices and trade board, the following up of the administration and the prosecution of those who have been in breach of the regulations. As the number of articles which are under control diminishes, is anything being done to lessen the number of employees, investigators and sundry other staff?

Mr. ILSLEY: At the peak of activity of the wartime prices and trade board the staff was 5,700; it is now 3,900. There were 133 offices at the peak of activity; now the number of offices is 49. The staff is reduced with the elimination of duties.

Mr. HACKETT: The elimination of what?

Mr. ILSLEY: With the elimination of functions, I should say. For instance, the abolition of meat rationing would result normally in the reduction of staff of, I think, about 200 or 300. When I was in finance I was told that if we were to abolish meat rationing we could reduce the staff by 200 or 300. For example, if price control over textiles were abolished there could be a substantial reduction, inasmuch as this control is so difficult and requires so many people to administer it.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the minister say if at this stage there is an official or group of officials whose allotted task it is to see to the dissolution of these staffs as rapidly as may be?

Mr. ILSLEY: The comptroller, Mr. Wilson keeps his eye on that.

Mr. McIVOR: What happens to those officials who lose their position? Are they absorbed into the civil service?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so.

Mr. HACKETT: They are not in the civil service. They must look for jobs elsewhere like anybody else.

Mr. ILSLEY: They go somewhere else for a job. The government does not undertake to place them in the civil service. They are almost wholly temporary employees. As a matter of fact, in the last few years the difficulty has been to keep them. Many people wanted to get out, and they have gone away in order to get permanent jobs.

Mr. PROBE: The preamble to P.C. 4600 suggests that there is some doubt in the mind of the minister as to the validity of many of the prosecutions. Perhaps the word "validity" is not just the right one, but there is some doubt that the prosecutions have always been on considerations which would be proper in law. From the fact that the possibility of appeal is being enlarged, I judge that in the past there may have been prosecutions which were open to criticism partly on the ground that they were erroneous and partly on the ground that the fine or penalty imposed on the offender has been out of proportion to the offence. By what machinery could a person have secured redress if he thought he was being over-penalized? Can the minister give any information as to the number of remissions or what amount in dollars have been the remissions in connection with prosecutions in which the penalties have been considered too heavy?

Mr. ILSLEY: The applications for clemency or remission have been very few.

Mr. PROBE: To whom are they directed?

Mr. ILSLEY: To the Department of Justice. I vaguely remember one application from one of the western provinces where the penalty did seem excessive, and where the fine was reduced. A very large fine was imposed on a man who lived in a remote district and who perhaps did not know about the regulations. I was Minister of Finance at the time. I recommended, as I recall it, that there be a remission or partial remission. I have no record here of the number but those cases are very rare.

Mr. PROBE: That is fine, if it is not extensive. I sent a letter to the Minister of Justice much on this line, but I have yet to receive any positive response in the matter, and I wondered what was the machinery.

Mr. ILSLEY: Was that recently?

Mr. PROBE: Within the last month or six weeks, I think. I would have looked it up had I known this was going to be reached.

P.C. 4600 agreed to.

On P.C. 6223.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are there any appeals at present before the courts, or any applications, with regard to the constitutionality of any portion of the wartime regulations?

Mr. ILSLEY: In two cases in the province of Quebec the constitutional point has been raised and the matter is pending. The chief enforcement officer does not know of cases in any other province at the moment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the nature of the cases in respect to which objection is being taken that the regulations under which the prosecutions were instituted are ultra vires of parliament?

Mr. ILSLEY: In both cases it is alleged that the 1945 act is beyond the powers of parliament.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What were the offences?

Mr. ILSLEY: One is a prosecution in respect of rentals, what has been described as a rentals bracket, and it is pleaded that the act is unconstitutional. The other is a prosecution in respect of a hog, but I do not know just what the facts are. I suppose it is in connection with some slaughtering permit.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In what courts are they? Speaking of the case of prosecution regarding a hog it was a case regarding chickens that finally upset the N.R.A. in the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not intend to speak disrespectfully of the hog. The matters are still in the lower courts.

P.C. 6223 agreed to.

On P.C. 1003.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry the Minister of Labour is not here because I intend to take perhaps ten minutes to deal with this matter.

The CHAIRMAN: I suggest that the hon. member might wait until the minister comes. I understand he is on his way.

Mr. HACKETT: Let us take the next item while we are waiting.

Mr. ILSLEY: He will be here in just a moment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Perhaps the Minister of Justice will be better able to answer my first query, in any event. It is this. What is there in the industrial or labour-management situation in Canada today whereby any legislation with respect to that matter can possibly be justified by reason of an emergency? As far as I know the situation in Canada, with one exception is quieter in that field than it has been for a good many years. Personally I know of no reason in the world which would bring legislation extending certain orders in council under the heading of any emergency whatever. Perhaps I may pause for an answer there to help my ignorance, so to speak, and then I may be able to cut out a good deal of what I intended to say. I should like to know what the emergency is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the basis of this legislation is a separate emergency in respect of every particular measure. There being a state of emergency in existence as a result of war, an economic emergency; there having been this extraordinary legislation, P.C. 1003, during the wartime period, I think a reasonable period of readjustment to peace-time conditions must be allowed, during which the legislation should continue. This legislation is peculiarly short lived; it is just here until a bill can be introduced. The whole matter of adjustment of the economy from conditions of war to conditions of peace is the problem with respect to prices and wages and labour relations and all the other important aspects of the economic situation. As I said before, I do not think an emergency can be dissected. I do not think you can carve out segments and say there is an emergency in respect of this and not an emergency in respect of that, at least while you are in the economic field. There is not a military emergency; I hope there is not, and I think there is not.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I do not intend to reopen the legal argument we had the other day, but surely from what the minister has now said his view is this. The dominion government can declare an emergency and then go into any field it wishes, just because it has said there is an emergency. That is what I gather from what the right hon. minister just said.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not a question of declaring an emergency. It is a question of there being an emergency; and when there is, it does not mean the government can go into any field it likes, but labour relations, the relations between employers and employees, are such an important feature of the economy of the country. If there are emergency conditions affecting the economy of the country, if it is not readjusted to peace conditions then legislation on the matter of labour conditions can be enacted during that period.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then it is just another step or two from there until the new bill is brought in. I think the minister will agree that when that bill is brought down it cannot take away from the provinces jurisdiction in matters of labour and industry. If that will be true in a couple of weeks from now, and I am sure the minister will agree it is true, there cannot be a state of emergency just to bridge this little gap. Would not the minister agree in that? Let me put it in this way. We are going to have a new so-called labour code brought in. Aside from the government or parliament assuming extraordinary power, to become an act that bill can do nothing more than legislate with respect to those persons now within the jurisdiction of the dominion government, and by "now" I mean in peace time; your transportation people, communications people, and so on. So that if we are going to have this bill brought into the house—and I noticed the Minister of Labour nodding his head in agreement a minute ago—then why clutter up this bill with the sort of thing we now have before us? Why do that, when we admit that in two weeks, we will say, we are going to bring down a labour code which shall be limited in its outlook and effect to those persons who come within the jurisdiction of the government of Canada.

Why waste our time now in prolonging P.C. 1003—because that is what this legislation amounts to. I hope I make myself clear. I am simply trying to say this: Why do we not drop this thing altogether, and get on with something which may be of considerably more importance? There may be an answer to what I am saying, but I must say I have made some inquiry and I can find no answer.

Let me put it in this way, that if we did not pass this now jurisdiction would be back with the provinces immediately. It is going to be there in a couple of weeks, anyway, if we bring down our new legislation. I think the Minister of Labour will agree with me on that. And if the jurisdiction is to be with the provinces, then why not put it there now, and not waste our time in carrying on with this discussion.

I spoke on second reading, and one of the things I had in mind was that there were some things which should be done and some which ought not to be done. To my mind this is the biggest "ought not" of the lot. I can see no virtue whatsoever in doing it. If there is no virtue in doing it, then I shall pause to be interrupted by someone who will tell me what it is. If there is virtue, then we can proceed with the discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps I can answer the hon. member. What he says is correct. With the exception of railway matters, which come under the jurisdiction of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, in normal circumstances under our constitution wages and labour legislation are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. My hon. friend will recall that it was back in 1941 or 1942 it was felt, after consultation with the provinces, that in connection with our price policy we should establish a system of wage control.

I was the first chairman of the national war labour board, and it was my duty to get the provincial ministers of labour, or those ministers having jurisdiction over labour in the provinces, to meet here in Ottawa, on which occasion they agreed to withdraw from that control and to place it under the jurisdiction of the dominion. Those boards dealt specifically with wages.

In the light of the growing tempo of the war, it was felt there should be a labour code governing the whole dominion, and the provinces again agreed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Not all of them.

Mr. MITCHELL: In the main. It is true that in minor details the machinery was somewhat different in the respective provinces. But the basic principles were the same throughout the dominion.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): For the period of the war.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is right; I am sorry I interrupted.

Mr. MITCHELL: The war is now over. Whether their judgment was right or not, there was a fairly general demand for the abolition of wage controls and a return to the old form of collective bargaining between the employer and the employee. The result was that in December the wage control order in council was repealed, and normal negotiations between employers and employees were carried on.

There is a period of time between the assumption of responsibility by all the provinces and the passage of our act which makes necessary the continuation of this order in council. It is to bridge the gap between the assumption of power by the provinces and the present time. I am assured by the provinces that they will take over their jurisdiction not later than May 15. That agreement has been arrived at between this government and those of the provinces, some of which have already assumed their jurisdiction.

But, so that there will not be a break in the continuity of dealing with industrial disputes on a dominion level, this order in council is necessary until the passage of the new legislation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does this order not run until May 15, anyway?

Mr. MITCHELL: My judgment is that, unless we move much faster than we are now doing, the measure will not have received royal assent by May 15.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That does not matter.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may say so to my hon. friend, it is most vital that there be a continuity of policy. I am not quarreling with the attitude of my hon. friends with respect to the procedure of government by order in council, but if May 15 should roll around and nothing were done the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act would automatically govern in the federal field. The question of certification, and the ramifications connected therewith, flowing from P.C. 1003, would be suspended. The only reason for the order in council appearing in this bill is so that we might move smoothly into our respective jurisdictions, and so that labour and employer organizations may know which way they are going between this moment and the time royal assent is given to the new bill.

Mr. HACKETT: That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is clear enough to me.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Allow me to ask my own question. What the minister has just said is that on May 15 the provinces have agreed to take over. But this order extends to May 15, does it not?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then what are we bothering about. If the new act was brought in on May 15 it is not going to have jurisdiction over anything concerning which the provinces have jurisdiction, is it?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right. But go a step farther. How about our own jurisdiction?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Our own jurisdiction will be taken care of by our own act.

whom this parliament has jurisdiction? It is something within our power. Does anyone suggest that there is any emergency at the present time with respect to those persons over

Mr. MITCHELL: My point is that I do not think our act will receive royal assent by May 15.

Mr. HACKETT: That does not matter.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not a lawyer, but I believe I can think fairly straight on labour matters. My mind is crystal clear on this. We must bridge the gap between the expiration of this order and the passage of the new act. It may be that some may be clever enough to show me how to get around this; possibly I am thinking in too simple terms. But to me it is obvious and clear.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Knowing the great capacity of the minister to absorb information, I am going to undertake to do just what he asks me to do. Insofar as our dealing with anything which concerns the provinces, we have that jurisdiction now, and will continue to have it until May 15. The new act which we shall then have passed—and we will assume it has been assented to on that date—will not have within its covers one thing which has anything to do with matters within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is true.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That gap has to be bridged.

Mr. KNOWLES: The new bill will have some provisions not in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is going to be somewhat different. Supposing May 15 should roll around?

An hon. MEMBER: It will.

Mr. MITCHELL: I hope it will for most of us, but do not be too sure.

Mr. MacINNIS: It will roll around anyway.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought you were speaking as a human being and I do not mean that in any narrow sense. Supposing that date should roll around and you have no legislation? There would be no certification and the employees would have no rights. The employers would say, "There is no legislation; you are back to the I.D.I. act and we do not have to deal with you".

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister just said that the provinces would take over.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

Mr. MITCHELL: I am talking now about federal jurisdiction. When May 15 arrives, unless there is some provision under this act we shall go back to the old I.D.I. act which does not provide for certification, which does not say, "You must bargain collectively". All those things are under P.C. 1003 and they were not under the I.D.I. act.

Mr. COLDWELL: And they did not come under the provinces.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That would cover only the railway people.

Mr. MITCHELL: It covers a good many people. I am speaking now from memory, but it covers transportation, communications, shipping on the great lakes, the telephone industry, radio and travel by air. In my judgment those are, from a national point of view, probably the most vital industries that we have in this country. To me it is absolutely clear that you must bridge this gap until the other legislation is given royal assent. May I say that in dealing with labour legislation it is better to take your time about it. I should not like to think that this new bill would be given first, second and third readings in a day under pressure because there was no legislation in existence. I hope that all parties in the house will give this matter the study which, in my judgment, is necessary. I intend to move an amendment at the proper time to eliminate the orders in council dealing with the provinces so that they will be on their own on May 15.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You would be content then to have P.C. 1003 and its small satellites continue only with respect to those persons who are under dominion jurisdiction in time of peace?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I shall have no objection to that. I understood the minister to say that the provinces had agreed to take back their baby on May 15. I was hoping that, that being so, we would not pass legislation which would interfere since they have signified their intention to carry on on their own after that date. If the minister will move that amendment it certainly will shorten many of the things I had intended to say.

Mr. KNOWLES: It has already been amended by P.C. 302.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I mentioned the little satellites around P.C. 1003, and that is one of them that I had in mind.

I want to detain the committee for only a minute or two, if I am in order, to say something about the situation which exists at the present time in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and by that I mean the coal strike which has been going on for a few weeks, or for a considerable time in any event.

I have always held the belief that no labour disturbance can last any great length of time without some measure of public support. I have read all the literature which I am sure all hon. members have received from the united mine workers in Nova Scotia and the operating company. They seem to come to one simple statement on each side. It is a fact that tonnage has dropped to approximately a ton and a half per man, a drop of practically a full ton since 1939. The men say that they cannot do better because of working conditions and because of the failure to modernize certain machinery. On the other hand, the management say that the machinery is just as good as or better than it was in 1939, that conditions are comparable and that it is the men's fault.

The minister went through the various motions he was entitled to go through under our legislation and finally ended up by appointing Mr. Justice Carroll as a commissioner. But it does seem to me that there is one thing which has not been decided and which must have great effect on what the Department of Labour or any Minister of Labour may do. I refer to the determination of the simple question as to who is right. Are the men right in saying that it is the fault of management, or is the management right in saying that it is the fault of the men because they will not work?

I do not want to be told to read the report of the royal commission on coal because not only have I read it, but I reread a portion of it when our father confessor over here on labour matters, the minister, told us to read it again. If the newspapers are to be believed, both the minister and his deputy have said that this is a matter in which the government is not interested, that it is purely a matter between management and men. If they were correctly quoted, both the minister and Mr. MacNamara made that statement. With that I respectfully but firmly disagree.

Year after year this parliament has voted some $8,000,000 as a subsidy to this operation and therefore it cannot be just a simple question between the management and the men. What the minister is reported to have said would normally be correct in different places and under different conditions, but I urge that, while we are paying $8,000,000, we cannot just wash our hands of it and say that this is a question which can be settled by the other two parties. This is a three-party show because we are in it to the extent of $8,000,000, although this subsidy was eliminated just in the last week or two.

The CHAIRMAN: I have been looking over P.C. 1003 and I am doubtful whether a discussion of the Nova Scotia coal strike is in order. The hon. member for Calgary West was in doubt himself because, if I remember correctly, he opened his remarks with the words, "If I am in order." It does not appear to me that a discussion of this type is in order.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I with respect tell you, Mr. Chairman, why I think it is in order? Before coming forward with any suggestion of my own, you will remember that I pointed out that our present legislation required that we do certain things in industrial disputes. I complimented the minister on these things having been done, even to the appointment of a commissioner. That certainly was in order because it was P.C. 1003 itself in action. Since P.C. 1003 has proven a complete failure in settling the difficulty down there, surely I can go a step farther and make a suggestion of my own because P.C. 1003 has failed. I have nothing more to add, sir, but I believe that I am in order. I shall be only two or three minutes in any event, but I am not suggesting that you should rule on that basis because I know how much trouble we get into when we do not follow the rules.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member conclude his remarks on this subject in a short time? He has pointed out the difficulty that we get into when we go beyond the rules. Frequently we get into trouble and bring on wide discussion.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to see the hon. member finish in two or three minutes. The only thing I am afraid of is that it may initiate a debate on the Nova Scotia strike. I do not think this is the place for it. I should be glad to have the hon. member make a suggestion, but I do not want to see a debate and diversion from the orders in council with which we are now dealing.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I shall conclude in five minutes beyond any question. My suggestion is that we get a committee of four people from elsewhere, two members of the union representing the workers and two representing management from other places. They could go down in these pits.

I know they are some distance apart. I know that Springhill is quite a distance from Cape Breton and so on. As I say, these men could go down in these pits and cover every working inside of one week. I see the minister smiling, but I am talking about fellows who know their way around coal mines, not men like some of the rest of us. They could come back with a straight answer on who is right or wrong in the story. Then we would know what to do and we would get somewhere in the settlement of the strike. If we could find that answer the strike could be settled in a week.

I am sure there is no hon. member in this committee who is not disturbed, whose sympathy is not simply lacerated on reading of children losing four and five pounds in weight because of the strike. I read that in the papers when I was down there, and I cannot vouch for it, but that is what they say. I know the funds of the miners are limited, but that is not a complete answer. Mr. Justice Carroll said that the men are not getting enough wages there. But until we find out whether they are working for these wages there is nothing that the committee can do. If it is the company's fault let us find it out; if it is the men's fault let us find it out and the strike will be settled in a week. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South will agree with me on that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary West is worthy of consideration, but I am not going to deal with it. One of the most striking indictments of conditions in that area of Canada was the statement made by the Minister of Labour a short time ago when he indicated the number of persons who had applied for work elsewhere than in Cape Breton and who were turned down on account of their physical unfitness. The number was simply phenomenal. It is a severe indictment of the conditions that have been prevalent in that area for a number of years. I do not think we should discuss the Nova Scotia mining problem at the moment; I think we should deal with it later at a more appropriate time.

I want to go back to the order in council. The Minister of Labour has indicated that he is going to bring down some new legislation. I wish to point out to him that we have evolved considerably from the conditions which existed in 1867, and the whole basis of legislative powers should be re-examined so that we may have a dominion code which will be applicable to labour from one end of this dominion to the other in more fields than the narrow one outlined by the minister. I have been looking up important matters lately to see just how this order in council is in conformity with what existed in bygone days. If we look at our revised statutes of Canada we find that legislation dealing with trade unions is on our statute books, passed I believe, in 1872 and introduced in the house by Sir John A. Macdonald. Anyone who knows the story of confederation knows that Sir John A. Macdonald held strong views as to the necessity of matters of this description being more completely under the authority of the national government than under the provincial bodies. Going back into our history, we find that up until 1886 various pieces of legislation were introduced both in the House of Commons and in the Senate dealing with labour conditions in a much broader and wider way than apparently many are inclined to recognize as the right of this house in 1947.

A few minutes ago the Minister of Labour pleaded for the continuation of this order in council until his legislation is introduced. I submit that not only should we continue this order in council until his legislation comes down, but when that legislation is before us an endeavour should be made to clarify our powers in conformity with new conditions which face this country in 1947.

The other day I was looking over some material in connection with this order in council and this legislation. I am not going to weary the committee with anything like a constitutional argument because I am not a lawyer and I am not equipped to do so. Rather I wish to discuss the historic background. But as I said a few moments ago, bills were introduced in the house again and again by private members and, in some instances, by the government of the country. For example, in 1882 a bill was introduced in the senate by Sir Alexander Campbell who was a father of confederation, who was a partner of Sir John A. Macdonald and who was also Minister of Justice at that time. Sir Alexander Campbell insisted that the bill dealing with labour conditions across the country was in strict conformity with the powers of the dominion and with the intention of the fathers of confederation. The other day I took the trouble to look up a speech which he made in the senate on April 19, 1882, on the labour employment regulation bill, and I think it might be well to put parts of it on the record, in view of this order in council and in view of the legislation which is to be introduced later. He said:

The hon. member for Amherst, if I understand his argument right, thought this was a matter that came wholly under the purview of the local legislatures, because it was a question of civil rights—of contracts between master and servant, hours of meals, and that sort of thing—and therefore belonged to the local legislatures, and that this bill did not come within the powers of parliament to pass it; but I venture to ask my hon. friend if that is not a very confined view of the bill? It is true that it does deal with the subject of contracts between master and servant, but is it not much more true, and true in a larger and better sense, that it relates to the welfare and well-being of the whole community?

And I mention that in 1947 this is more true of labour legislation. The hon. member for Calgary West has just indicated that a dispute in one province, largely in Nova Scotia, does affect the whole of our economy throughout the entire community which we call Canada.

Sir Alexander Campbell went on:

I listened with great pleasure to the arguments submitted to the house by the hon. senator from Prince Edward Island as to the effect upon the community of laxity with reference to the rules which this bill proposes to lay down. That hon. gentleman established, I think, to the satisfaction of the house that the result of the laxity of regulations or want of regulations, in this respect, in England, had a deteriorating effect upon the whole population who lived in the manufacturing districts. If that was the effect in England and if we are to presume that a similar one would follow the want of regulations and laxity of rules in this country, I ask if such an effect produced upon the whole population is not a very strong and even conclusive reason, why this parliament should deal with a question affecting the welfare and growth of the whole community, and the physical power and strength of those who form the nation? Surely if this subject relates to a question so generally important as that and which affects the whole country, it is a much larger one than if it related merely to contracts between master and servant. It is because this bill relates to subjects so important as that, subjects which go far beyond contracts between master and servant, which in their indirect effects concern the whole community and on which, to a certain extent, and so far as the population in manufacturing establishments go, the future of the country very much turns—whether we shall have a strong, healthy and moral population, likely to be creditable to the country or whether we shall have a dwarfed and immoral population and so perpetuate in Canada all the evils which this inquiry has brought out in England and which we are trying to legislate for now—I say if these subjects do not affect the peace, order and welfare of a whole community it would be hard to say what does. Therefore, as they have that effect, the house, I hope and believe, will take a much larger view of the matter than has been presented, and which would confine this to a simple matter of interfering between master and servant. It is a much larger question; it is to provide for the future welfare, morality and good government of the whole community . . .

I think and hope that the arguments which I have presented to the house will show that this bill is not merely for the purpose of interfering with contracts, but has a scope which is national in its character, and which may, and probably will be attended with the most useful results to those who are to come after us. Therefore it does come within the purview of the powers of this parliament, which it will be remembered has the right to deal with all questions affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, not specially assigned to the local legislatures.

Speaking of the two jurisdictions, that of the dominion and of the province, he says:

If the two conflict, and if it should be that it is both—and I think almost everybody in the house will say that it is both, that it is in a very narrow sense a question affecting civil rights and contracts, but that it is also in a much larger sense a national subject affecting the weal and good government of the people—if the two conflict, under the ordinary constitutional practice the lesser must give way, and we must legislate on the subject. To my mind, and to the best of my judgment, the house is quite seized with this measure, and it is within the powers of parliament to take what steps they deem in the interest of the country upon this question.

I think the time has come when we shall have to face up to the problem posed by order in council, to the situation when this order in council is removed from the statute books, and the question as to the necessary labour code which should follow. The important point I make is this. If we go back to the records we shall find that unfortunately the early speeches of the fathers of confederation in this house were not recorded in Hansard, and therefore all that one can do is to get summaries of them or to read, as best one can, some of the reports in newspapers of the day.

Mr. GARDINER: What year was that?

Mr. COLDWELL: That was before 1882. I was about to say that when we come to the eighties we get actual verbatim reports such as we are used to now. I have not outlined the various labour bills that were introduced from time to time, either in this house or in the senate, during the time the fathers of confederation were members of parliament. But when the discussion to which I have referred took place a government bill was introduced in the senate by the then minister of justice, and therefore with the approval of the cabinet, and at that time there were, I believe, five fathers of confederation in the government. They were Sir John A. Macdonald, Tilley, Tupper, Langevin and Campbell himself. I know of some of the judgments that were given later on; I know the views of Lord Watson, and so on; but the point I make is that the fathers of confederation visualized this country as a nation and not as a collection of more or less sovereign states. If you read the speeches and the writings of Sir John A. Macdonald you find that again and again he took the view that we were not doing something like that which some time before had been done in the United States but were doing something opposite to what they had done.

When I was teaching I used to read quite frequently the "Makers of Canada". This afternoon I recollected a statement to be found therein, I sent to the library and got a copy of volume X of the "Makers of Canada". I quote from page 59:

> According to Macdonald, it was the aim of the fathers of the constitution to form a strong central government. "In framing the constitution, care had been taken to avoid the mistake and weakness of the United States system, the primary error of which was the reservation to the different states of all the powers not delegated to the general government. We must reverse the process by establishing a strong central government, to which shall belong all powers not specially conferred on the provinces."

That was Sir John's idea at the beginning. I know Cartier disagreed with that point of view and a compromise was reached. No one wishes to upset the basis of confederation. No one wishes to set up so strong a central government that the provinces will have no jurisdiction in matters that are of provincial and local interest. But my point is that if the fathers of confederation, in matters of labour, as I believe they did, saw the need for nation-wide legislation to meet nation-wide conditions in the field of labour, today, with our rapid means of communication, with the mobility of labour, and with all the new industries and methods which are nation-wide in scope, not only do we require an order in council like P.C. 1003 to be continued but we need dominion jurisdiction in a field where we must have dominion-wide conditions.

I am not arguing that we should take from the provinces something which is properly theirs. I am saying that in the interests of all Canada this parliament should have the power to legislate on matters that concern the whole country. During the war we had some of that power. It has been inherent in this order 1003. I wish to see P.C. 1003 continued until we have the legislation which the minister says he is bringing down, and I take this opportunity this afternoon, because I hope that when that legislation does come down the matters that properly belong to the province and the community shall remain to them, but that we shall hold fast to the original concept of a nation which, as I believe, the fathers of confederation had.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I have done considerable reading on the confederation pact, and so on, and I know there was a compromise, but I think the time has come when in this important field of labour it is essential that we should have a nation-wide concept of conditions and a nation-wide code which will establish for all Canada a proper basis of labour relations and conditions.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I rise to support the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. What he said this afternoon will have the support of organized labour in my constituency. As a member of parliament I am speaking for Canada, but I am speaking as one having some understanding of the outlook of organized labour in British Columbia and of many employers in British Columbia. At the present time we have industry organized largely in a national and international way, and we are dealing with organized labour which is largely organized in a national and international way. Gone are the horse and buggy days when we had the village industry just supplying local needs, the village shop and the limitations of transportation and communication. Today we are developing more and more into a large organization, as I said before, based on a national or international grouping, just as are the transportation companies, the packing companies, the mining interests, the lumbering interests and many other interests. Because of that the people whom I represent, and many others in western Canada, are anxious to see a national labour code established. I fully realize the constitutional difficulties which surround this question, particularly at this time, because there is no common agreement between the dominion and provincial governments in connection with this and other legislation. But I do think this government should determine now the direction in which we are to go in the future in this respect. I think they should be bold because the need is urgent. I suggest that this government should bring in a national labour code, taking full cognizance of the development of industry and of society in general. If they cannot have that code accepted by all the provinces of Canada, by agreement, then I say it would be worth while to go ahead, introduce that code and have it accepted in those provinces that will accept it. I am of opinion that it would not be very long before all the provinces would accept that national labour code.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. HERRIDGE: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is he aware that the industrial relations committee last year brought in a unanimous recommendation for a labour code? Therefore I do not think there is any argument anywhere in this house in connection with this matter. I think the argument raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is wholly on the question of jurisdiction. I have not heard any dispute about the matter.

Mr. HERRIDGE: The industrial relations committee brought in a unanimous report, but the government has not seen fit, to date, to act upon that report.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want to protect the government. They have sent the new code all over the country. They will not give me one, but everybody else has one.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I do not intend to take much of the time of the committee, Mr. Chairman, but I just wish to express my view with regard to this matter. I think there would be a decided advantage in having a national labour code. That is not only my opinion, but that of many others in western Canada, both employers and employees. I think a national labour code would remove many of the causes of industrial strife throughout this country such as variations in wages, inequalities in working conditions, and so on. I believe a national labour code would result in a standardization of costs, which would be of great assistance in determining a national standard of living and stabilizing it. Many employers in British Columbia have suggested to me that a national labour code would be of great advantage to those who, in some cases, must compete with industry operating in eastern Canada at lower labour costs. I think it is time that this government gave labour throughout Canada, on a national scale, recognition in line with the increasing responsibility it is asked to accept. That is all I wish to say at this time.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MITCHELL: Before the item carries, I wish to move the following amendment, seconded by the Minister of Justice:

That Bill No. 104 be amended by striking out from the schedule thereto the following orders in council specified therein: P.C. 2301 of March 30, 1944; P.C. 2911 of April 27, 1944; P.C. 3062 of April 27, 1944, as amended; P.C. 3455 of May 9, 1944 as amended; P.C. 3491 of May 15, 1944 as amended and P.C. 5001 of June 30, 1944 as amended.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the minister just tell me what the effect of that amendment is?

Mr. MITCHELL: You do not want me to go into each branch?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may, I should like to explain in a general way. I do not want to read a memorandum a foot long. In British Columbia there was no regional war labour board. The minister was the board. That has been the general practice there. In Alberta there was some different arrangement, and that applied to Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and so on right down the line. These orders were passed to meet the peculiar conditions which existed in each of the provinces. Of course, on May 15 those boards will disappear as far as dominion jurisdiction is concerned. That is all that motion does.

Mr. KNOWLES: As a matter of information, may I ask the minister if he can tell us if each of the provinces will take over its functions, so far as labour matters are concerned, on May 15? Is their legislation ready?

Mr. MITCHELL: It has been agreed between the provinces and the dominion. As my hon. friend will remember, last fall the provincial ministers of labour and myself had a meeting and there was general agreement that the provinces should assume their jurisdiction and that the dominion should assume its jurisdiction. All the provinces have agreed that, at the latest by May 15, they will assume their jurisdictions.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to ask another question as a matter of information. Does the minister know if the acts which will come into effect in the various provinces measure up to what P.C. 1003 did provide?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say this: the provinces are sovereign in their own jurisdictions.

Mr. KNOWLES: I know that. I am asking for information.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am hopeful that they will. In British Columbia they have recently passed a bill which is substantially the same as P.C. 1003.

An hon. MEMBER: Far ahead.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says "far ahead". That is a matter of opinion. The same condition exists for labour in Saskatchewan. They have their own legislation which I am sure my hon. friends from Saskatchewan will say is substantially better than P.C. 1003.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, we do.

Mr. MITCHELL: The same as my hon. friend from British Columbia said.

Mr. KNOWLES: You will say that yourself, won't you?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a matter of opinion. I want to say this—

Mr. COLDWELL: Be careful.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will not be around, but we are heading for a peculiar form of government when everybody leans on the state. I will not be around, but I have seen them operate in other countries, and you cannot escape.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are not leaving us, are you?

Mr. MITCHELL: No. But my hon. friend, like myself, will shift off this earth some day.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not yet, I hope.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are taking the long view of this thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope it is long.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think there is any substitution for free men on both sides sitting down and negotiating an agreement without being pushed around by anybody.

Mr. COLDWELL: As long as they are free.

Mr. MITCHELL: As long as they are free. But that is beside the point.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should have said that Ontario passed legislation implementing P.C. 1003. Quebec has legislation of its own. My understanding is that New Brunswick has done the same thing. Of course Nova Scotia has had labour legislation for a great many years, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South knows, which is, I would say, substantially the same as our own. It does not, of course, go into such great detail.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister inadvertently passed over my own province. Will he complete the record?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sorry to have done that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was interested in the point made by the Minister of Labour about people leaning on the state. Unfortunately in this world it sometimes happens that it does not particularly matter what we think. As I see it, everything is a process of evolution, and we proceed in conformity with the developments that take place. What is happening today, not only in Canada but in many other countries—and in the countries that developed industrially earlier and faster it has happened before this—is that on the one hand we have large aggregations of industries, enormously powerful. Because those industries employ large numbers of people, in some cases running into the tens of thousands, those workers brought together in that way organize, first, for their own protection and then, later, for their own advancement. These are conditions over which we have no control. In the struggle between large industries on the one hand and large labour organizations on the other, the community would be torn to pieces unless the state stepped in to protect the community. That is the position we are in today, and it is no use trying to wish ourselves out of it because that cannot be done. We must bring to that situation the authority of the state as the protector of the people.

Mr. MITCHELL: Protector of the weak against the strong.

Mr. MacINNIS: Protector of the weak against the strong, and protector of the community against organized powerful groups. We are caught in that jam. It is a definite result of the progress of industrialization, and we cannot turn back the wheels of progress, even if it were desirable to do so. So we shall have to accept the disadvantages of industrialization along with its benefits, and do the best we can in the circumstances.

I also listened with attention to what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as to the desirability of a national labour code. I think the great majority of the people of this country believe we should have a national labour code. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary West, one of the recommendations of the committee on industrial relations last year approved such a code. But I think I have a very good understanding of what the minister is up against in his efforts to design legislation for that purpose. We are not likely to have a national labour code or, for that matter, many other things that may be desirable in this country as long as certain provinces insist on being sovereign states, and, in my opinion, hold up our progress. What an individual thinks in the matter is not of great importance, because some people would rather be big toads in a little puddle than polliwogs in a big pond. So that is pretty much the position we are in today, and until we learn to discipline ourselves for the common good I suppose there is nothing much we can do about the matter. But while it may be a thankless task, I suggest that the minister continue to do everything he can to get a national labour code for this dominion.

Mr. PEARKES: A remark by the minister about being pushed around by the government prompts me to make an observation.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say "pushed around by this government." I said "pushed around by governments."

Mr. PEARKES: I was not referring to the present government, but that remark prompts me to make a few observations and perhaps offer a suggestion. I presume it is necessary to continue these orders in council, partly because of the dislocation in industry caused by the transition from war to peace. All over the country men who have been employed in war industries are being employed in peacetime industries. I want to confine my remarks, however, to those men who have been employed in government industries, such as the dockyard employees at Esquimalt. They have suffered through this sudden change from war to peace, in that a large number of reductions have been made. The result must be obvious, but I am not primarily concerned about that. My concern is over the difficulty the employees at His Majesty's dockyard have experienced in obtaining conditions similar to those which have been authorized for men working in civilian shipyards in the same city and the same area. The difficulty arises because the men working at the dockyard have not had what I think is termed union recognition; that is, the union representatives have not had an opportunity of conferring with the officer commanding or the superintendent of the dockyard, and the superintendent does not attend the ordinary meetings of the shipyard council. I believe that has had a serious effect upon men working in such institutions as His Majesty's dockyard. Is it not possible now to have the union of men working in those dockyards recognized by the dockyard officials? I believe that in Great Britain the government dockyards recognize the unions working there. At the royal arsenal at Woolwich recognition is given the union. Only a couple of years ago it was stated in the press that recognition had been given by the royal household to the union of its employees. If any labour scheme or code is to be introduced in future I would urge that recognition be given all unions in government employment, including dockyards, crown companies and so on; and I would ask the minister to give that suggestion consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was going to suggest that my hon. friend was out of order, but I do not like to do that. I believe in every man being given an opportunity to say his piece. But if we are going into a general discussion of labour relations we shall be here until the resurrection.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a long time.

Mr. MITCHELL: It will be a long time for some of you; some of you will not be around.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what you said about yourself a little while ago.

Mr. MITCHELL: That may be true, too. But I can imagine that the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Vancouver East will have their say. I suggest that they ought not to go into a general discussion of a bill which will, I hope, be before the house in the not too distant future.

Mr. PEARKES: I suggest that the minister started this.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no intention of discussing labour relations. I understand that the minister has a bill coming down in the next few weeks, and I shall reserve all the time at my disposal to tear that bill to pieces. You can be reasonably sure it will not suit me.

I rise at this time particularly to say a few words respecting the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary West. He appears to think, and perhaps honestly so, that he has the solution of the Nova Scotia strike. His suggestion is that we get two miners from some other part of Canada, and two coal operators—you know, two impartial fellows—from some other part of Canada—"impartial coal operators"—and send them to Nova Scotia. He says that in a week's time they would have a report and settle the strike.

Let me say that that would serve no useful purpose. To begin with, the productive capacity of that industry cannot be examined while it is not in operation; and it has not been operating now for two months. The set-up cannot be examined until it is back in operation, so that it can be seen in a working condition, and one would have an opportunity to see what the bottlenecks are.

The hon. member for Calgary West suggested that no one in the house had any idea who was right or who was wrong. Well, I made up my mind about that twenty-five years ago.

Mr. MITCHELL: And you have not changed it, either.

Mr. GILLIS: Not a bit. I am more convinced today than ever. I arrived at those conclusions on an impartial basis, too. The miners' case is 100 per cent right; and I have put the facts of that dispute on record time and again. I do not think anyone from the west or from central Canada can render any better judgment on that question in a week's time than can someone who served the people in this dispute for twenty-six years.

The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is a generous man. I suggest that he should provide the $5 million subsidy immediately so as to get these mines back in operation. Then the government can appoint as many people as it likes during the term of the next contract to go to Nova Scotia and make an examination of the whole set-up, from the point of view of increasing production, and determining who is right and who is wrong in these recurring disputes.

I am prepared to go with them. I will show them the way around, because I konw my way around those collieries. If they do not come away from there convinced that that is about the toughest and most unreasonable company on the North American continent, and that those men are the greatest slaves that have existed since the time Lincoln abolished slavery in the United States. I shall be willing to come back to this chamber, sit here and say nothing; and that would be hard on me.

That is all I have to say. I leave only this thought with the minister, that when he drafts that labour code he should make sure that he has some administrative machinery. He might consider the possibility of establishing industrial councils. In that way he could bring men in from industry and management, and have a government referee. Get them in before the strikes occur. See if they cannot iron out the kinks before those kinks become too badly twisted. Heading off trouble is much easier than ironing it out after it is started.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Since I was a member of the committee on industrial relations which sat last year, I should like to say a word or two at this time. I well remember the work done by that committee, and its unanimous recommendation that there should be a national labour code. We all agreed at that time that this should be done.

In view of the minister's statement that new labour legislation is to be brought down, I should think it only proper that the major portion of this discussion might take place on that bill. I would add, however, in respect of the dispute in Nova Scotia, that while I was never down there, the matter was thoroughly discussed in the industrial relations committee last year. Despite what has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I think there is some merit in the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary West. It seems to me that we should be able to find a few competent and honest people who could go to Nova Scotia and find out whether or not the statements made in respect of efficiency or inefficiency in the operation of the mines are correct. That has been one of the major difficulties in the Nova Scotia dispute. There could be no harm done if that were done. I am not adverse, either to the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South that the government continue the subsidy until such time as a final settlement is made, because there is much distress in that area at the present time.

I shall not continue the discussion further at this time, but shall defer what I have to say until the minister brings down his legislation. The minister is eliminating the other orders in council, so that only one is left under these wartime labour relations regulations. In view of this fact, I believe this order in council might be permitted to pass, so that we might get on with further business.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to speak briefly respecting the amendment, which would delete a number of orders in council, including the one with reference to Manitoba.

A minute ago the minister gave a picture of the situation subsequent to the passage of the amendment in the various provinces, but inadvertently he did not mention Manitoba.

Mr. MITCHELL: It was not deliberate.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sure it was not. As I understand it, the government in Manitoba has made arrangements to carry on the provisions of P.C. 1003, following the suspension of these orders in council by this government. But in response to a request made by labour organizations of Manitoba to the provincial government, that that government bring down now an even wider labour code, the Manitoba government has said that it is going to wait to see what is in the labour code to be offered by the federal government.

Do I understand, from what the minister has said today, that the labour code to be brought in here will deal only with employees who come under federal jurisdiction? If that is so, then the labour organizations in Manitoba had better keep working on the provincial government for the labour legislation they are seeking.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not one who believes that everybody should be cast in the same mould. It is all very well to talk about centralization and uniformity, but I have never known a family of nine children who were all the same. In the first place, sometimes there are girls and boys. They have different dispositions. What I have endeavoured to do in my discussions with the provinces is to lay down basic principles for a labour code. By the very nature of things there will be slight variations in the provinces, just the same as with workmen's compensation and almost any other legislation which covers a broad field and which comes under provincial legislation.

I think the adoption of P.C. 1003 by all the provinces was the greatest advance in the recognition of the right of men and women to organize that there has been in this dominion since confederation. I do not know of any better legislation anywhere of that kind. I am speaking in a broad way because there may be differences and variations, but we certainly are not faced with the difficulties that confront some countries I could name not very far from here. I hope that every province will follow the lead given by this government and I am proud that it has been done by a Department of Labour under my jurisdiction.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was not suggesting that everyone should be cast in the same mould, but I was trying to get clear where labour organizations in Manitoba should look for the kind of labour legislation they want in that province. It seems to be clear that the federal labour code will not suffice, but that they must look to the provincial government for the wider code they are seeking.

Amendment (Mr. Mitchell) agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have read the British Columbia bill and I think it is an excellent piece of labour legislation. Do I understand that P.C. 1003 will lapse on May 15 and be superseded by provincial legislation?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I explained that to the hon. member for Calgary West. On May 15, several provinces will take over jurisdiction; in fact some have already done so. P.C. 1003 will continue in effect until the new bill dealing with labour matters is passed by both houses and given royal assent.

Mr. ADAMSON: Where a province has not passed enabling legislation, will P.C. 1003 still remain in effect?

Mr. MITCHELL: As I said before, each province is sovereign in its own jurisdiction in this matter and is at perfect liberty to pass any kind of legislation it desires.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some have done so already.

Mr. MITCHELL: What I have endeavoured to do is to lay down broad general principles in P.C. 1003 which I hoped the provinces would follow.

P.C. 1003 agreed to.

On P.C. 946.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The Minister of Fisheries suggested that P.C. 251 be dealt with at the same time as we were dealing with P.C. 946. Possibly we could deal also with P.C. 1665 and P.C. 469 when we are dealing with the Japanese question.

Mr. GREEN: There is also P.C. 7355 under the Department of Labour.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PISTOLS, MOTOR CARS, AND PAYMENT OF FINES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the criminal code (pistols, motor cars and payment of fines).

He said: The bill raises one of the gravest questions we have in this country. I do not apologize for taking up the time of the house at this time, because in the city from which I come over one hundred people were killed and several thousand injured on the roadways alone last year. It is one of Canada's greatest scandals. Every highway in the country is covered red by the abuse of motor cars by about only five per cent of those who drive. About ninety-five per cent of the people who drive cars are known to be careful.

This matter affects the life and health of the people. As I have said before, I should like to see the criminal code amended and consolidated every ten years like the Bank Act. A legal committee of the house should be appointed to consider the various bills, because when you look at the protection which the public has it is all in the criminal code. There have been numerous changes in the law since the criminal code became part of the revised statutes of Canada in 1906, chapter 146. It is now contained in the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 36, which supersedes the original code and is the basis of the statute which came into effect on February 1, 1928. There are also changes in the sections in view of decisions of the privy council. There are also some changes in sections 240A and 240B in accordance with 1926 Appeal Cases regarding appeals to the privy council in criminal cases.

In addition, I believe the time has come when this house should have, like the provincial legislatures, a legal committee to consider legal bills, because it is difficult for lawyers, magistrates and judges to know what the law is at the present time. In my opinion the government should take under consideration the question of a judges' committee or a departmental committee to examine, revise and consolidate the provisions of the code pursuant to judgments of the different courts having criminal jurisdiction, and also the suggestions which are made from time to time to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) by bar associations and by police constables' associations and others. The government should provide further that the committee should report its findings to the House of Commons and to the Minister of Justice and, finally, a select committee should be appointed to revise and consolidate the criminal code every ten years. That is my suggestion.

With regard to Bill No. 13, which is a bill to amend the criminal code to deal with pistols, motor cars and payment of fines, I wish to refer to a debate on the second reading of my bill to amend the criminal code (motor cars), which took place before the war. It is all set out in Hansard of February 17, 1938. The debate took all day and all evening. The bill had to do with a proposed amendment respecting the operation of motor cars. I introduced the bill. All leaders of the house spoke on the motion. I said, as reported at page 535 of Hansard:

I wish to call the attention of the house to the great slaughter occurring on our highways. Almost every road is coloured red with the slaughter of men, women and children. This slaughtering is done in a manner that is disgraceful and presents the most important problem with which we have to deal this year. I may say that it is one of Canada's chief problems, and parliament does nothing about it.

We are satisfied to devote a whole lot of time to flag waving, but the government of the day does not seem prepared to sit down and consider what must be done for these helpless men, women and children whose homes have been ruined and whose lives have been wrecked. All this goes on, and yet this high court of parliament sits here and does nothing to deal with these practical problems, which would be a work for the benefit of the people.

I believe a few facts should be drawn to the attention of the house. The subject of the bill has been discussed in the house for three or four sessions. One of the commandments of God is: Thou shalt do no murder. Many men of real worth, through carelessness and selfishness, are recklessly violating not only the laws of God but those of men. No invention has contributed more to the comfort of our people than has the motor car, but, like every other invention we must consider its use as one thing and its abuse as another.

During the past century scientific discoveries in medicine, chemistry and physics have resulted in untold good to humanity, but, as in the abuse of inventions, in war they were a curse to mankind.

As I say, nothing has contributed more to the enjoyment and education of the people than the motor car, but when you look at the abuse of it, that is another matter.

Looking into the question one finds invariably a tremendous annual loss from deaths, accidents, injuries and so on. One finds untold sorrow and suffering with intense pain and grief, almost exceeding anything the human imagination could conceive. The suffering brought about by these machines is equalled only by that inflicted by plagues, pestilence, famine, battle, murder and sudden death.

It would be misleading and unfair to attempt to attribute all the blame for these horrors on the highways to all people who drive and use motor cars. The fact is that ninety-five per cent of drivers are trying to obey the law. It is the remaining five per cent about whom I am complaining. They cause the trouble. One has only to see the records to understand the facts. As I study the records of cases I am driven to the conclusion that beyond any doubt the small minority are the major cause of the trouble. They appear to have exploited, for their own pleasure and profit, the generous tolerance of others. They use their cars in an irresponsible, careless and un-Christian way. The fault is grievous, and they can have no ground for complaint if they are put under restraint through application of the criminal code. Ignorance and thoughtlessness are not palliatives. Obedience is the only reparation they can make, and it is long overdue.

I quoted the other evening, in dealing with another bill, the observations of the late able and beloved Chief Justice R. M. Meredith, who was on the supreme court bench for about forty years on circuit in Ontario. He said, when addressing a York county grand jury:

And as now nearly everyone is a car owner, and car driver, young and old, of all sorts and conditions, it is difficult to get justice in even a civil action. Car-driver jurors have nearly all the speed fever; and self-preservation instincts are so strong that they will not be persuaded to decide against drivers who have been no more unlawful than they themselves often, if not commonly, are.

What then is the remedy? I think it should be: make the laws plain and reasonably severe and enforce them; and cancel licences freely. And at the other end of the matter, give no licence to anyone who is not proved to be mentally and physically, and from experience and knowledge of the highway laws, thoroughly capable.

I continued as follows:

First, we must consider the indifference shown by the five per cent of drivers to the rights and privileges of the people using the highways.

Then there is the indifference to the convenience of others; there is excessive speed, and congestion. Ever since man has learned to direct a machine more powerful than himself he has asserted his superiority over his neighbour. "Make way or take the consequences" is the cry of the reckless driver. Yet, this indifference is limited to only a small number.

That is the problem. I will not give the figures. They were set out in two reports which were made to the House of Commons last year, tabled for me, showing the number of fatal accidents in Canada at level crossings, on the highways, and they ran into the thousands; from drownings, from those who left infants in houses alone and the houses were burnt, from wilful and gross negligence, leaving children three or four years of age alone in the house and then the house burns down. I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) the throwing of pop bottles on to the ice at hockey games and all that kind of thing. These things should be under the control of the criminal code, along with many other matters. In this bill I refer to those who go around carrying wooden pistols and frightening girls in candy stores and taking their money. I refer to other cases. One can hardly pick up a newspaper without finding a report of young bandits going around the streets raiding houses and stores, gathering payrolls and all that kind of thing. It is, in my opinion, altogether too easy to get a pistol in Canada. They are not properly registered. If they are registered many of them are stolen and sold to second-hand stores. There should be a restriction on the carrying of loaded pistols. The very fact that the pistols are loaded would argue that these young people intend to commit some offence, and the carrying of such loaded weapons is very likely to lead to a potential murder. The man who carries a loaded weapon is a potential murderer.

Last year, as well as in previous sessions, I put on Hansard figures showing the number of those killed and injured on our highways as a result of motor car accidents, and I contended then, as I do now, that we should have complete records in this connection. The bureau of statistics has not a modern system so far as records of this kind are concerned, though it is making improvements from year to year. The fact remains, however, that there is no efficient method of getting at these results. I suggest that we should improve our system and at the same time carry out a campaign of education such as there is in the old country. The figures given by the board of transport commissioners show that in the period between 1940 and 1943 inclusive there were over 2,000 injured and 588 killed at level crossings. The information I have here goes on to discuss drowning and other forms of fatality.

In France, with a population of some 42,000,000 before the war, over 4,000 people were killed by motor cars in one year, though they were spending considerable sums of money in road building.

I may say that I have received many appreciative messages in support of this bill. I have a telegram dated February 18, 1947, from Mr. Alex Edmison, of the Prisoners John Howard Association, stating that he had received copies of the bill and wishing me every success. He feels that the proposed legislation of time to pay fines as a Summary Offenders Act would be of great benefit in reducing the crime rate in Canada.

I have also a letter from the Reverend John Coburn, secretary of the Canadian Temperance Federation, from which I quote the following paragraph:

> I think you will recognize that the police officers are up against an immense task. Magistrates and judges often seem to think that unless a man is drunk he has not committed a violation of the law. As you know of course, this is entirely erroneous. I am told that some states in the union have passed a law making a blood test compulsory on request of a police officer. According to Doctor Rodger's estimate, liquor is killing five people and injuring 84 every week on the highways of Ontario alone. I think if you and a number of the opposition members would let the Prime Minister know you are supporting the government in vigorous action, it will be helpful. Where so many human lives are at stake, this is too important a matter to be a mere party issue. On various occasions you have manifested a spirit of independence in your parliamentary work. I have no doubt whatever, you will do so in this case.

He refers to a brief submitted to the Prime Minister and the government.

To come now to the bill itself, the first section provides that anyone who, without lawful excuse, points a firearm, pistol or airgun, whether loaded or unloaded, is guilty of an offence. That is an amendment to sections 124 and 126 of the criminal code. Section 2 provides that "pistol" shall include anything in the shape or form and size of a pistol. Section 3 deals with the liability of the driver of a car to stop after an accident.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to discuss at this stage only the principle of the bill. He should not go into details.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I am merely pointing out the marginal notes and indicating the principle involved.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the bill is a collection of amendments to the criminal code and that these amendments are of considerable range, covering many subjects. The sections are of a heterogeneous nature, and if I were asked to state what the principle of the bill is I could not do so. I submit that the house should be somewhat liberal in its attitude toward the discussion of the bill. I do not know just how the hon. member who is proposing the bill can discuss the principle without referring to the individual provisions. I say this merely for Your Honour's information with respect to this particular bill, because in this instance I think it is rather hard to apply the ordinary rules.

Mr. CHURCH: We have spent fifty-two days of this session considering material things, but we do not seem to have an hour to devote to a discussion of the safety of the country. It seems that this parliament does not care a hoot.

An hon. MEMBER: The minister is on your side.

Mr. CHURCH: I want to thank the minister. I have seen the evils of hit-and-run driving, Mr. Speaker. As a former chairman of the police commission in my city, I think this is one of the most important matters that parliament can attend to, and I consider I have done my duty in bringing it to the attention of the house. It is of far greater importance than many of the material things that we have been talking about now for fifty-two days.

The next section of the bill deals with persons driving while under the influence of alcohol or narcotics. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, there is anything more scandalous than the hit and run driver and the drunken driver. I once saw a man drive down an important section of the city of Toronto and knock down two children. One of them was killed instantly and the other badly injured. The Right Hon. Viscount Bennett, on February 17, 1938, in the debate to which I referred, when he was in this house took a strong stand in support of the principle I am now advocating in this bill. He felt that something should be done to meet this grave situation, but nothing has been done since the war started. The casualty list is an appalling one, the number of men, women and children who have been injured in such accidents numbering nearly twice as many as those wounded and killed in the Canadian forces during the same seven years.

There is no doubt that there is some complaint about judges taking cases away from juries. In this connection I suggest that hon. members look up the debate that took place in this house on February 17, 1938. As regards persons driving under the influence of alcohol, the present law, I submit, is totally inadequate. When a person is arrested under such circumstances there is considerable doubt, having regard to the decision of the Ontario court of appeal, as to what is a voluntary statement or a free statement made to the police. I submit that this should be clearly set out. we should know what is a voluntary, what is a free statement on the part of the accused.

Regarding section 5, hit and run drivers, I suggest that when an accident occurs everyone in charge of a vehicle who is directly or indirectly a party to the accident should remain at the scene of the accident or return immediately and render all possible assistance. Many times such a person kills a child. The child has just as much right to live as he has; and if it is killed, and the driver runs away, I think it is a most cowardly form of murder. I think it is a terrible thing to see a small child knocked down on the highway, where the driver runs away and nothing is done about the matter. You cannot find him. Sometimes, because of the bad weather you cannot get the number. I believe this is a wise proviso.

With regard to section 7, causing death in a culpably negligent manner, additional penalties are provided. As we saw in this debate in 1938, it takes two people, in a second's lack of attention, to make an accident. If there is one, the person who kills a man should not drive a car for two years where it is found that the accident was largely due to his negligence.

There are only one or two other sections. The one on the trial of young offenders provides that the parents should be notified. I think it is only right that parents of children under age should know when they are charged with an offence and be given a chance to come to their aid, if possible, and that they should be given the protection of the law by the appointment of a lawyer.

The next section has to do with the trial of a female person. This has been up now for ten or twelve years. The suggested amendment in section 9 is:

> On the trial of any female person by a jury under any provision of this act, one-third of the jurors chosen to try the issue shall be female persons duly qualified on the same basis as male jurors.

A former editor, and a very great editor, the late Mr. Harry Anderson, when this bill was up in 1927 said that women were too temperamental. I do not think they are any more temperamental these days than are some of the men. Some of them would make better jurors than men, and I think we would have less trouble with juries making up their minds and coming to a verdict.

Section 10 deals with charge of manslaughter arising out of the operation of motor vehicles, criminal or culpable negligence being proved. It defines the powers of the judge and the powers of the jury. The function of the judge is to explain the law to the jury and the jury is bound to take what the judge says is the law. Questions of fact should be determined by the jury. After all is said and done, what is the way we approach this matter in this country? I have noticed in some of the papers—not all of them—in some cases trial by jury has at times been supplanted by trial by newspaper; that is, in some of the more sensational of our newspapers.

As regards section 11, jury to decide whether guilty or not guilty, on the trial with a jury of persons who cause death or serious injury, it is desirable that the functions of the jury should not be curtailed or abolished. There has been much criticism of many cases of gross negligence having been taken from the jury. The increased number of accidents requires that the law should be brought up to date.

The next section is: fine or penalty in discretion of court. The last clause deals with the law of England regarding fines, known as the Summary Offenders Act. After all is said and done, the gaols of this country are at times full of people who are not able to pay the fines. Why is the fine imposed? In England they are given time to pay the fine. I think it would be a blessing if we could adopt that practice in this country, because we are just back to the days of Dickens in his "Little Dorritt". There is imprisonment for fines for people who have not the money to pay them.

It is for these reasons I thought it wise to bring these matters before the house. I sympathize with and thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). He is one of the most able, hard-working and conscientious ministers we have had in this war and after it. But I think the time has come when we should have a legal committee which should have the proper time to consider these amendments which are most important for the safeguarding of the public. They are all only suggestions for the minister to consider and decide on, as improvements to help lessen loss of life from the motor car.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): In order to help the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) get his bill through the house, I shall of necessity have to be very brief, and so I shall be. I merely wish to refer to one reference in the bill, namely, motor cars. Like everyone else, I have been interested in the cartoons which have recently appeared in the Globe and Mail in Toronto and which were drawn by one of the most brilliant young cartoonists in Canada. I am told by my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), that Jack Boothe, the cartoonist, comes from his province. If he does, British Columbia lost a capable cartoonist and Ontario gained one. His cartoons every few days are headed "Why People Cannot Grow Old." A few days ago there was one in the paper giving a new angle to motor car accidents, and one I had not seen before. It showed a passenger in a car lighting a cigarette for the driver; of course, the driver was blinded not only by the flame but by the smoke, and an accident took place. That is one cause of accidents. Somebody should be responsible for that.

A few days ago I was standing in front of a building which I happen to own and two men came along to get into a car. Both of them were drunk. They staggered toward the car and, one after the other, tried to get into the car to drive it away. In the end they both got into the car, which meant that one of the drunks drove the car away. I presume the bill which the hon. member for Broadview has in mind would protect the public against the like of that. Certainly anything which this or any other house can do to cut down on deaths from motor car accidents, should be done. What can be done, I do not know. That is a legal problem, and I shall not discuss any of the legal aspects of the bill at all. As a humble member, and as the hon. member for Broadview had put my name down as the seconder of the motion for second reading, I felt that it was my duty to rise and support him. There is no more hard-working member in the House of Commons than the hon. member for Broadview. I have always found him standing up for the people. In this case he is doing that.

In conclusion, I would just say that during the recent session the Ontario government did take a step in the right direction, if I may say so here, in passing a bill requiring that part of the fee which is paid by the driver for the privilege of driving his car is set aside for the benefit of people who are struck and maimed—in the case of death, of course, to their estates—by those who strike them and run away, hit and run drivers and those who, if caught, are unable to pay anything. I think that is a good step. Somebody should pay for the accidents of folks who are not themselves responsible for being struck and who are struck by people who are incapable of paying anything.

With that I shall conclude. I heartily approve my hon. friend's efforts to protect the public from disaster.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, when we consider the cause of motor accidents I think it is the duty of the government and of all governments in Canada to remove the cause. Yet there are some governments which are stimulating that cause of accidents. Everybody knows that it is very unpopular to say anything about that great cause of motor accidents and destruction in Canada. But if we are sincere in our way of living, we have a right to try to drive out anything which will cause destruction of human life. I think everyone can see what I am driving at. I fear that when the cocktail bars in Ontario are in full swing men and women, young or old, coming home in the small hours of the morning will not have proper control of their automobiles. Therefore I am glad to see in the bill section 4, dealing with those driving while under the influence of alcohol or narcotics. I believe governments should consider this point. If our governments license and receive revenue from anything that causes the destruction of human life, I think they should be big enough to reconsider their position.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): I should like to speak briefly on this bill, but first I wish to congratulate the sponsor, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) on having introduced it. The bill contains many commendable features, all of which I do not propose to discuss at this time, but I would particularly mention the reference to driving while under the influence of alcohol or narcotics, hit-and-run drivers, and the liability of a driver to stop after an accident. These matters, I believe, are worthy of careful consideration on the part of this house. Everyone recognizes that many accidents result from faulty judgment on the part of a driver or a pedestrian, while many others result from mechanical deficiencies. We also know, however, that a substantial percentage of accidents are caused by drunken driving. In one medium size Canadian city in which there were fifteen fatal traffic accidents in 1946, three were directly attributed to drunken driving. Perhaps that figure does not sound very large, but it represents twenty per cent of the total; and, no matter what the figure is, it is too high.

This bill is not intended as a cure-all, but as a step in the direction of providing heavier penalties for persons who operate motor vehicles, while under the influence of liquor, and irresponsible drivers, whether or not they be under the influence of liquor. If the provision of stiffer penalties for infractions of the law will curb the mounting death toll on our highways and the streets of our cities and towns, I think this bill should receive the unanimous approval of the house. I feel sure it will have that effect; therefore I am rising at this time to give it my support. The motor vehicle is a dangerous weapon when operated by an intoxicated person. It is a murderous weapon when only half controlled by an irresponsible person. Under such management, vehicles are a danger to the public. Infractions of the law by such persons should be met with stiff penalties. Many accidents occur every year on the highways of this country and on the streets of our towns and cities. According to the bureau of statistics, the death toll from motor accidents for the past few years has been as follows:

1940	1,709
1941	1,852
1942	1,409
1943	1,437
1944	1,372
1945	1,530

That makes a total of 10,893 deaths during the period this nation was at war, or almost one-third the total number of fatal casualties suffered by our armed forces during that conflict. But that does not give the complete story. In the same period more than one hundred thousand people were injured in traffic accidents. These injuries caused the crippling of thousands of people. This was during a period of gasoline rationing, and during a large part of which a speed limit of forty miles an hour was in effect; and the toll is still mounting. The latest figures obtainable, which are for 1945, show 1,530 fatal accidents on our highways, or eleven per cent more than in 1944; and from the information already received from the various provinces which report to the bureau of statistics, I fear the figure for 1946 will be substantially higher.

Precautions must be taken against traffic violations, and this parliament has authority to amend the criminal code, which probably is as far as we can go. Of necessity, provincial and municipal governments must complete the task. I believe the amendments offered in this bill will assist local authorities in curbing irresponsible drivers. Acceptance of this bill by the house is the least we can do to meet the growing menace on our highways and on the streets of our towns and cities.

In reference to the difficulty which not infrequently confronts the law enforcement authorities in ascertaining whether or not a person apprehended at the scene of an accident is intoxicated, I would suggest that some standard be set up for the guidance of the police. I believe the criminal code should provide that the presence in the blood of an individual of alcohol above a certain percentage should be sufficient reason for declaring the person apprehended to be intoxicated. Local doctors on whom the police have to rely are often loath to state whether or not a person is in a state of intoxication. With a standard set as a guide, a doctor would only have to state his findings and offer his evidence before the court. I believe such an amendment to the criminal code would be desirable, and it might be opportune to suggest that it be inserted in this bill. In any event I commend the suggestion to the Minister of Justice for his serious consideration.

Motor traffic is certain to increase on our highways during the next few years. Probably the number of accidents will also increase. The law enforcement bodies should be given every assistance possible to cope with violations of traffic laws, and I feel that the bill as it stands has considerable merit. It will not wholly solve the problem of the increase in the number of accidents, but it will prove of some assistance in curbing irresponsible driving on our congested traffic lanes. Careless drivers endanger not only their own lives but those of innocent people on the roads and streets, who are unfortunate enough all too frequently to be in the way of such drivers. I shall support the bill.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the discussion on the bill has served a useful purpose, and perhaps if the discussion had been a little more extensive it would have been still more desirable.

There is no doubt that the situation which has been described by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and other hon. members is a serious one, and that it is important that the provisions of the criminal code be made as effective as possible. As I said briefly to Your Honour, it is impossible to deal with the bill as a unit because its sections deal with a variety of subjects. It would be awkward to go through the bill, section by section, and to deal with it in that way.

I should like to say, speaking generally about the bill, that there are some sections in it which I think should be incorporated as amendments in the criminal code. Then there are some sections which I believe should be discarded, for certain reasons which perhaps I shall not give fully to the house at the present time. There are other sections which this parliament should not enact until there has been some consultation with the provinces. I refer to provisions such as those relating to the constitution of juries, and another one which abrogates a very ancient principle. The suggestion is that a judge should not be permitted to withdraw a case from a jury, even if, in his opinion, there is no evidence to go to the jury.

Those are principles which should not be enacted by parliament, at least, in my opinion, without consultation with the provinces. The government has been giving consideration to the introduction of certain amendments to the criminal code, and a draft bill has been prepared containing a fairly large number of sections. It has not yet received the approval of council, but I anticipate that council will give its approval to a bill containing important amendments to the criminal code. I believe I would not be divulging any confidence if I were to tell the house that some provisions in the bill now before us are substantially the same as some of the provisions in the bill which the government is likely to introduce a little later in the session.

I gathered from the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview that, so far as he is concerned, this is not a new bill, and that he has introduced some of these proposals before in the house. I gathered, further, that he felt that previous governments, and possibly this one, had neglected the matter, and that they had not paid very much attention to the suggestions he had made through the years. I hope, when he sees the amendments to the criminal code, he will feel that to some extent he has been repaid for the zeal with which he has sought to remedy those conditions requiring correction.

There are some provisions in this bill which make the penalties much heavier than they now are. When hon. members are giving consideration to the bill I suggest they ought to give some thought to the question as to whether it is desirable to make penalties too heavy. For instance, in this bill there are penalties requiring, in some instances, a minimum imprisonment of six months which, in my judgment, is too stiff. If we were to enact those provisions I believe that, instead of improving the situation, we would make it worse, because it would be much more difficult to get convictions than it is at the present time.

There are sections in the bill which introduce important changes of principle. For instance, there is the proposal that the offence of driving a motor car while intoxicated should be changed to driving a car while under the influence of alcohol. If that suggestion were to be adopted it would constitute an important amendment. At the present time I am not able to accept it, although I am willing to give consideration to the arguments advanced tonight in favour of the change. However the implications of a change of that kind are far-reaching. It has been urged upon us by delegations, and it is worthy of consideration; but the implications are far-reaching because, if the state of being under the influence of alcohol means that there be just the slightest amount of alcohol in one's system, which I presume to some extent would put a person under the influence of alcohol, then the driving of a car under that condition would become a crime. The house should be careful not to go too far in the creation of crimes.

However I am not prejudging that question. Delegations have made their presentations on the point to the government and the matter is receiving consideration. All I can say is that I am not prepared to accept that principle tonight. It will have to be given some further consideration.

In all the circumstances I suggest that the hon. member permit the bill to stand until the amendments to the criminal code that the government is prepared to sponsor are placed before the house. They will not cover the whole ground. Some of these sections we are not prepared to accept at all; some we are prepared to accept, and some will be accepted in a modified form. But I do not think it is desirable for us to give the bill second reading and go into committee of the whole to deal with the sections one by one, when the whole matter of amendments to the criminal code is receiving consideration and will be dealt with by the house a little later.

Therefore I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I had intended saying a word in the matter. However, now that I have not the opportunity, possibly a question would be in order.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: During the last few months the question with regard to the admissibility of confessions and statement has been very much to the fore. As the minister knows, in two recent cases, the Sears case and the Dick case, murder convictions based upon statements or confessions were set aside by the court of appeal. The admissibility of statements has brought about a variety of decisions throughout the country.

I am wondering if, when the minister introduces his amendments to the criminal code, in the interests of securing uniformity some rules might be promulgated similar to those brought into effect some years ago in Great Britain in order to assure that miscarriages, either of guilty persons escaping or innocent persons being convicted, will be done away with. I think this is a matter of grave importance because, as the situation is today, there is a wide variety of judicial interpretations and practical applications which make it difficult for police officers to know just what are their rights in interrogating prisoners who are suspected of crimes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give consideration to the hon. gentleman's remarks. I was under the impression that most of the law was the same.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

PENITENTIARY ACT

INSPECTION OF PENAL INSTITUTIONS BY GRAND JURY, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. T. L. Church for the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

Mr. CHURCH: The Minister of Justice was going to make a statement. The bill is for others besides crown officers to inspect these places, without expense.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman moved the adjournment of the debate but, if he does not wish to continue what he was saying, and no one else wishes to say anything I am prepared to go on. This bill contains three sections and is identical with the bill introduced into this house by the hon. gentleman seventeen years ago. One section reads:

> The grand jury of any county in which a penitentiary is situated may visit, view and inspect the same, and make such inquiry as to it may seem proper into the state, condition and management thereof, the nature and efficiency of its accommodation, the employment, training and treatment of convicts, the conduct of its officers, prisoners and employees, and of all others having dealings of any kind or in any capacity with such penitentiary, and may examine and inspect the accounts, vouchers, records and books of the penitentiary; and the grand jury may thereupon make such findings and such presentments as it may deem to be required in the public interest.

By that provision penitentiaries which are federal institutions would be subject to inspection by grand juries which are provincial bodies. The argument of Mr. Lapointe when he was Minister of Justice was that federal institutions should be subject to inspection by federal officials rather than by provincial officials or provincial bodies and that it would be wrong in principle to have federal institutions inspected by grand juries. That position taken by Mr. Lapointe was probably a sound position, but it seems to me that the stronger reason for opposing the proposal that grand juries be empowered to visit and inspect federal institutions is the illogical nature of the proposal.

There are only two counties in Canada where grand juries would be eligible under this bill to inspect federal institutions. One is the county of Westmorland in New Brunswick where Dorchester penitentiary is situated, and the other is the county of Frontenac in Ontario where two penitentiaries, Kingston penitentiary and Collin's Bay penitentiary, are situated. There seems to be very little reason for delegating to the grand juries of Westmorland county, New Brunswick, and Frontenac county, Ontario, the responsibility of inspecting these particular federal institutions. There are no grand juries in the province of Quebec or in the western provinces where the other federal institutions are situated, and there is no particular reason why the federal parliament should endow the grand juries of these two districts with this inspectorial function.

It should be borne in mind that grand juries have no particular training in inspectional work, nor have they any particular knowledge of criminology or anything of that kind. These facts were pointed out by Mr. Lapointe in the argument he made against this provision in 1930 when he was reported on page 277 of Hansard of March 4, 1930 as follows:

> May I point out that such an inspection of a penitentiary as is proposed by this bill would occupy the activities of a grand jury working ten hours a day for several months. May I also mention the fact that the grand juries are composed of excellent men indeed, but they are men with no especial experience in criminology or the handling of criminals, or the management or care of such institutions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for public and private bills having expired, the house will revert to its previous business.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock I had called P.C. 946. It was suggested that we should discuss at this time not only that order in council but order in council 251, which is found at the foot of page 4, and orders in council 1665 and 469 at the bottom of page 6. The hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that we should also consider order in council 7355 on page 5. If it meets with the approval of hon. members we shall consider these orders in council.

Mr. THATCHER: Before the committee rose at six o'clock, the minister deleted six orders in council from the schedule to this bill. I regret that he did not see fit to delete order in council P.C. 946. The purpose of this order, which was first passed in the emergency years of the war, was to deal with the problem of people of Japanese origin. The purpose is clearly stated in paragraph 3 on page 109 of the consolidation. I should like to quote part of that paragraph. It is as follows:

> . . . it is deemed advisable, by reason of the state of war now existing, for the order and welfare of Canada to make provision . . . for the control of persons of the Japanese race in Canada.

During the war years there was justification for that order in council because it was necessary for the government in our war with Japan, to protect Canadians against the possibility of any fifth column activity. Whether there is any justification for it tonight, however, is a different question.

The powers given to the minister by this order in council are widespread. In the first place, it allows the minister virtually to control the lives of all people in this country of Japanese origin. Under it the department may determine where these people have to live. It can determine where these people must work and what wages they are to be paid. At least until recently it determined whether or not they could travel.

Tonight the government is asking parliament to extend for another year these orders in council which control the lives of these people. When parliament is arriving at a decision on this matter there are two facts which should be kept in mind, and I refer them particularly to hon. members from British Columbia. The first of these is the fact that the 1941 census showed that there were approximately 23,000 persons of Japanese origin in this country. Of these 17,200 were Canadian citizens either by birth or by naturalization. Therefore, for the most part, these orders in council are dealing with Canadian citizens. Second, we should remember that when this order in council was passed it was passed as a temporary measure, as an emergency measure needed to expedite the prosecution of the war. I was not here at that time, but I understand from some hon. members who were, that when the order was passed it was intimated that when the emergency war was over, the rights of these people would be returned to them. Today the war is over; it has been over for almost two years; there is no longer any danger of invasion, any danger of insurrection in which these Canadians, even if they wanted to, could play any part, and yet their rights have not been returned to them. Instead, a great many of them are spread across the country living in camps. I am particularly mindful of one group living about four miles south of my own city of Moose Jaw. They are living in an old airport. I do not say that the conditions of these people are intolerable, but certainly, huddled together as they are, their conditions are not good.

As I have said, we are dealing with the rights of Canadians tonight. With the emergency over, I cannot see why the government is asking parliament to extend these powers for another year. It cannot be because these people were disloyal during the war, because despite the way we treated them, despite the way they were uprooted from their homes, despite the way we took their privileges from them, there was not one Japanese Canadian during the war who committed any disloyal act.

When speaking to the house on August 4, 1944, the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 5915 of Hansard:

> It is a fact that no person of Japanese race born in Canada has been charged with any act of sabotage or disloyalty during the years of war.

Therefore we cannot be wanting to extend these powers tonight for the reason that these people were disloyal during the war. Nor yet can we say that these people were responsible in any way for the acts of aggression of the Japanese government. They are no more responsible for these acts than any other Canadian. The hon. member for Vancouver East put it aptly a few months ago when he said:

> They were not nearly as responsible as the government of this country which insisted on sending war materials to Japan while she was waging war on China.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

The government cannot say that they want this power extended for the same reason that they originally passed it, namely, for reasons of defence, because the empire of Japan is prostrated; it has been conquered; it has been crushed. These Japanese Canadians cannot be any menace. Therefore, why are they denied their rights as Canadians? There is only one answer, and it has to do solely with racial prejudice and intolerance. These people have committed no crime, nor have they been charged with any. They are denied the privileges of Canadian citizenship; they are persecuted solely because their skin is yellow. Lord Acton, the English historian, once said:

> The most certain test by which we judge whether a country is really free, is the amount of security enjoyed by minorities.

Today, Mr. Chairman, there is a Canadian minority which is not free; there is a Canadian minority which has no security. The Japanese Canadians are being treated in this country today by methods which are to say the least, akin to some of the methods which were used in Germany not so long ago.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend does not believe that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. THATCHER: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does the hon. member think that, in the Dominion of Canada where we are working toward an eight-hour day, people in competitive business should be exposed to a race of people who are quite prepared to work sixteen hours a day? Is not that the pith of the situation?

Mr. THATCHER: Can we not put laws through which would prevent that? Surely all Canadians should be entitled to the same privileges. We accepted these people as Canadians and we should let them enjoy the rights of Canadians.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will agree with the hon. member, but will he not answer my question? Does he think that a Canadian, a farmer in British Columbia, for example, should be exposed to the competition of people who work sixteen or eighteen hours a day as against what we are aiming at, an eight-hour day?

Mr. THATCHER: As I said to the hon. member, labour laws could be passed which would prevent that situation arising.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Will the hon. member permit another question?

Can he suggest a labour law which could be passed to regulate the hours of independent fishermen?

Mr. THATCHER: I do not think I shall answer that. This is a serious matter and is no time for levity. I should like to get on and then the hon. member can go ahead.

Today the government is asking parliament to pass a piece of legislation which gives the minister wide powers. Look at page 110 and you will see the powers of the minister. Under section 2 he can determine the localities in which persons of the Japanese race may reside, and tell them where to live. Under section 4 he may employ persons of the Japanese race for such purposes, at such wages and on such terms and conditions as he may deem advisable. I do not think anyone will say that section 4 is not stringent. He may require any person of the Japanese race, in any place in Canada, to proceed to any other place in Canada. I doubt if there is anyone in this house who can get up tonight and say that if we pass the order in council before us, this Canadian minority will have freedom. Time and again in the house and across the country I have heard members of the Liberal, the Conservative and the Social Credit parties as well as members of our own party decrying the dangers of regimentation and the dangers to personal freedom. Not long ago I heard the hon. member for Lake Centre, in an eloquent speech, make this statement:

> I assert that it is a member's responsibility to take a firm stand when he sees freedom being interfered with.

I think that is one of the best statements I have ever heard the hon. member make, and I hope that on this bill, with his usual effectiveness, he will take as firm a stand, in opposition to such an order in council, because this order in council provides for a degree of regimentation which I believe has been unheard of in Canada in peace time. And it is regimentation of Canadians.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do not lay it on too thick.

Mr. MacINNIS: He is reading the order in council.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right, but I would ask my hon. friend whether the Canadians in Japan and China were treated as well as we treated the Japanese in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: But these are Canadians.

Mr. THATCHER: It is Canadians that we are talking about, Canadian citizens. We have heard a great deal recently about a bill of rights, and I think the question before us tonight emphasizes how urgently we need that bill of rights. In the speech from the throne the government intimated that they were going to appoint a committee to study human rights and human freedoms. I hope that such a measure will soon be brought down and will be strong enough to prevent injustices of this kind from continuing. In August, 1944, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking in this house, said, as reported at page 5916 of Hansard:

> . . . it is not to be expected that the government will do other than deal justly with those who are guilty of no crime, or even of any ill intention. For the government to act otherwise would be an acceptance of the standards of our enemies and the negation of the purposes for which we are fighting.

And again:

> We must not permit in Canada the hateful doctrine of racialism which is the basis of the nazi system everywhere.

If the Prime Minister were in his seat tonight, I wonder whether he would class this order in council as, in his own words, "dealing justly with those who are guilty of no crime." If he were in his seat, would he say that this order in council is not "the hateful doctrine of racialism" which he so eloquently deplored? I believe that if the Prime Minister were in his seat tonight, he would not approve the passing of this order in council. The charter of the united nations was recently ratified by this parliament and signed by the government. Parliament, in taking that action, pledged this country to respect article 1 of the charter, which guarantees "fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race."

This order in council is based solely on racial discrimination. If parliament passes this order tonight, then Canada is guilty of breaking her word, her pledge to the united nations. Surely the word of the representatives of the people of Canada is more than a scrap of paper. Yet, I do not see how we can pass this order without making it a scrap of paper. Every member, before he votes for the passage of the order in council, should search his conscience. Canada has already needlessly made many of her citizens suffer. Let us not allow this discrimination to continue. I move, therefore, that order in council P.C. 946 as amended be deleted from the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT: I wish to ask the hon. member three questions. He can answer them one at a time. Does he know Japanese habits? Would he like to live alongside Japanese? Would he like to compete against Japanese labour?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is only two. What is the third one?

Mr. THATCHER: I do not think they are reasonable. I will not answer them.

Mr. SINNOTT: Answer my questions.

Mr. IRVINE: He would not like to live alongside you, maybe. What is the difference?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I never knew a Jap yet who could not count to three, and you failed.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Moose Jaw moves that order in council P.C. 946 as amended be deleted. May I point out that we are considering the orders in council individually and we carry or do not carry each order in council. The Chairman asks for a vote on each order. If we are continuing to do that, it would appear to me that this is a negative motion.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just before the house rose at six o'clock the Minister of Labour moved an amendment to delete several orders from the schedule. If that was in order before six o'clock I suggest that it is in order now. I believe other orders have been deleted in the same way.

Mr. KNOWLES: By the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Justice.

Mr. POULIOT: I wonder how the order in council could be deleted from the bill, because no order in council is attached to the bill. The schedule is entirely different from the bill. It is another booklet. As a rule the schedule is attached to the bill but in this case it is not, for the very reason probably that the government will have authority to amend each one of the orders in council, something that could not be done if the orders in council were attached to the bill as a schedule. In my long experience in parliament this is the first time I have seen the schedule detached from the bill. What the hon. member for Moose Jaw has said is interesting but I do not see how the committee could deal with his amendment. He may submit it and have it dealt with in a more formal way, but in the meantime I would point out to him that this is an unusual case of queer procedure.

Mr. THATCHER: I am not a lawyer and I do not know whether it is a bill or a schedule. I will send both to the Chairman and he can use whichever is right.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Vancouver East stated that this afternoon there was followed a procedure whereby a motion was made striking certain orders from the schedule. I am not so sure that was in order, but in view of the fact that that procedure was followed this afternoon I will not at the moment rule the present motion out of order. Does the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw that order in council P.C. 946 as amended be deleted from the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I should say something before that amendment is put, and that is that the government cannot support it. Let that be clearly understood. May I say this in a broad and general way to the hon. member for Moose Jaw? Possibly his mind does not go back to the time when conditions in the Pacific were as they were, where there was the possibility that his province might be a battle ground in western Canada, and it was deemed necessary by the United States government and by the Canadian government that people of the Japanese race should be removed from the Pacific coast.

Mr. COLDWELL: He admitted that was quite reasonable at the time.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am frank to admit that it is quite easy to get up and talk in the way he talked this evening.

Mr. MacINNIS: He made an excellent speech.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not saying that he did not make an excellent speech, but I think I have the right to express my opinion in the same way as he expressed his.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Meet his argument.

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely. Let me say this to the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I was a member of the government at that time when the British people were hanging on the ropes and we had to make decisions which, to say the least, took some courage under the conditions. I have no regrets over the policy we followed at that time. If I had to live through those days again, I would do the same thing and I would do it in the humane way that this policy has been carried through up to the present time. I again want to say to my hon. friend that I should like to think our boys in Hong Kong, the Canadians who were prisoners in Japan, were treated as well as we treated the Japanese in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: They were not.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend lives in Saskatchewan. He has had his say and I am going to have mine, and let the matter be weighed in the balance. What was the policy of the government when the removal of persons of the Japanese race was decided on by both our government and the United States government? Our policy was to remove them from what was called the protected area. They were located in camps in the interior of British Columbia. I believe that the present policy of relocation is in the best interests of the Japanese themselves. At the very moment there are 4,200 odd in Alberta; there are 490 odd in Saskatchewan. I am now speaking from memory. There are, I think, about 1,200 in Manitoba; 6,500 in Nova Scotia—

Mr. GREEN: No, no; in Ontario.

Mr. MITCHELL: In Ontario, I should say. There are well over 1,000 in Quebec and very few in the maritime provinces. This has been our experience. The Japanese themselves, so I am informed, are much happier over their condition today, based on that policy of relocation across the dominion. My hon. friend talked about sabotage. But it was necessary to intern about 700 Japanese in British Columbia because they would not comply with the orders of the government. It is true also that at one time over 10,000 had volunteered to go back to Japan. That was prior to the defeat of Japan. It is also a fact that roughly 4,000 have returned to Japan on a voluntary basis. I hope that by the end of this year the policy of relocation will be completed.

My hon. friend spoke of a section in this order in council having to do with the powers of the minister with regard to hiring. There is an obvious reason for that being in there, in the fact that we had to hire people to work in the relocation centres in British Columbia—people of Japanese race, such as nurses, doctors, dentists and others. As far as my knowledge serves me, the Japanese who were working in this province, in my hon. friend's province and in the other provinces, were working at the prevailing rates of wages. I sincerely believe that the policy followed by this government in the relocation of these persons of the Japanese race is in their own self-interest and that, if we take the long view, it will be to their great advantage. I believe it will be far better than having an intense concentration of them, shall we say, in the city of Vancouver where, for many years past, I am given to understand that there has been a great deal of feeling over that concentration for reasons best known to the people in that part of the country. In conclusion, I wish to say with all the emphasis of which I am capable that, in the carrying out of this policy, we have acted in a decent and fair manner.

There is one other point which my hon. friend raised, in connection with the movement of Japanese. As to the Japanese east of British Columbia, at the moment, there is absolutely no control over their movements. They can go wherever they wish to go. I thought I should mention that to my hon. friend before he said, or at least implied, that they could not do that.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is a new order?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a new order. You will see it.

Mr. COLDWELL: When was that order issued? What was the date?

Mr. MITCHELL: April 14.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just recently.

Mr. MITCHELL: A week ago. But in the light of the development of policy, you make decisions in conformity with what you think, in your best judgment, you should do in a given set of circumstances. That was done on April 14.

Mr. KNOWLES: Congratulations.

Mr. SINNOTT: The hon. member for Moose Jaw has made a strong plea for Japanese Canadians. I have every reason to believe that he is sincere, and I have every reason to believe that there is a good deal of land in Saskatchewan where they could go. Possibly he could make arrangements for most of them to go to his province. But we cannot forget too easily or too soon December 7, 1941, when the Japanese were over here making terms with our friendly neighbour to the south and at the same time a bunch of planes was on the way to destroy us. The Japanese race will never do Canada any good. Therefore we, as Canadians, should guard Canadians as long as we have the power to do so.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): When the hon. member for Springfield states that he has any reason to believe anything, he flatters himself. That is obvious from his last few remarks. I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the report of the Department of Labour for the year ended March 31, 1946, in which I find this statement:

> The Japanese, wherever they have resettled in the last four years, have added appreciably to the labour force in several essential basic industries. In general, they have conducted themselves well, have worked industriously, and have earned a good reputation among employers and citizens in their new communities.

I think that has been the general experience all over Canada. I know a few of them personally in Winnipeg. I would be very happy to live next to them, and I think I would find more intelligence in them than I would find in the hon. member for Springfield tonight.

Mr. SINNOTT: We are not all like you.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): In what the Minister of Labour said I think he put up rather a bad case for a worse order in council. He tried to transfer the war years to this year of 1947. He knows as well as we do that we are no longer at war; we are no longer under the threat of invasion. Therefore we have to consider these orders in the light of today, not in the light of conditions that existed several years ago. None of us will refuse to admit the danger which existed, but many of us refuse today to admit that the danger still continues.

In the matter of logic I think the minister is quite wrong. There is no one in this country who was not hurt and nauseated when we heard of the atrocities which were committed at Hong Kong, in Japan itself, and in China. But let me point out that atrocities were not committed only by the Japanese. Atrocities were committed by other enemy powers. Therefore, if there is to be logic at all in this order in council we should treat the descendants in Canada of those other enemy nations in exactly the same way that we are treating the Japanese Canadians. If we refuse to do so I say there is no logic in what we are doing, and we are attacking the Japanese purely and simply on racial grounds. This order in council is attempting by compulsion to tell Canadians where they are to live in Canada. It appears that at times the test of loyalty of these Canadians was their willingness to live where the government decided they should reside. Might I read again what has already been read in this house by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, because these words need to be repeated? I refer to the statement by the Prime Minister on August 4, 1944:

> Surely it is not expected that the government will do other than deal justly with those who are guilty of no crime, or even of any ill intention. For the government to act otherwise would be an acceptance of the standards of our enemies and the negation of the purposes for which we are fighting.

What do those words mean, if they mean anything? Surely they cannot be used in defence of legislation such as this. Are we dealing justly with people who have been guilty of no crime when we tell them where they must live, when we take from them their essential civil liberty? I say no; and I think the reason of the house will agree with me. Are we not, in effect, accepting the standards of those enemies whom we fought when we treat a minority in this country in such a way, purely because of racial phobia? In the same speech the Prime Minister went on to say:

> Japanese Canadians are persons who have been admitted here to settle and become citizens or who have been born into this free country of ours, and . . . we cannot do less than treat such persons fairly and justly.

When we take away their rights, as we have taken them away, those words mean nothing. They are the typical facades which we expect on modern Liberalism. Might I quote also something said by the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of National Health and Welfare and who was then Secretary of State, in a speech to the chamber of commerce of Granby:

> For subjects (for citizenship classes) I would take the whole of this great country—its history, its peoples, its geography, its resources. I would tell them how fish are caught in the St. Lawrence and how farming is conducted up the Peace river. Throughout I would have one basic theme—faith in Canada and love of Canada.

To those words I say "hear, hear" but only if they mean what they say. I should like the Minister of National Health and Welfare to rise in his place tonight and defend the policy of his government in view of those words, and in view of what he said during the debate last year on the citizenship bill. I must again recall to hon. members that we are not now dealing with a war emergency. Thank heaven we are past that; and as the hon. member for Moose Jaw said, these orders in council are in direct contradiction of the spirit and, indeed, of the words of the united nations charter. These orders in council are based upon racial discrimination, which now has been defined by the international military tribunal as a crime against humanity.

I repeat that in peace time, in normal times, no government has the moral right to decide where any Canadian shall live; and when we permit the government these wide powers the foundations of freedom are being undermined. Hon. gentlemen of the party to my right have been strong proponents of freedom in the last few weeks. Here is a case where freedom is grievously infringed. Then let the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario rise in his place and defend the freedom of the individual in this case. Let the hon. member for Lake Centre get up; let the leader of the official opposition get up and state the position of his party with regard to racial discrimination against minorities in this country. If we permit it against one minority we permit it against every minority. I should like an official declaration of policy from that party which professes to be so sincere in its devotion to liberty.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I not speak in a free parliament? I think the committee knows fairly well what my attitude has been over the years and what it will be in regard to this question. I should like hon. members to endeavour to understand the position of British Columbia. Fifty years ago one lone voice was endeavouring to place this position before this house. I want to tell my fellow Caledonian who has just concluded his remarks, my fellow Canadian—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): That is much better.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think they are equally good. I want to tell him that, as far as I am concerned, there is not the slightest trace of a racial tinge in my attitude toward this matter. As an immigrant from the old land I have had the honour of living for thirty-three years in our far western Pacific province. Time after time this issue was raised in this house and no support was received from hon. members coming from other provinces. What caused and compelled that support? The urgency and emergency of a war which very nearly destroyed British Columbia and nearly destroyed Canada. If the Japanese had been more fortunate after Pearl Harbor, what would have happened to our people in British Columbia? I do not want to be sentimental, but only last week I saw two lads, two young Canadian kids of about twenty-two years, who were under treatment with our department. They were very serious cases indeed, probably maimed for life. They were Winnipeg boys who had been to Hong Kong.

I will not tell the story as they told it to me; but I do say this, that the whole basis of any arguments I have ever advanced in regard to this issue has been the basis of security for the Pacific coast. That was the basis on which every single step was taken by the administration which successfully, and with the general support of the house, led us to victory in this war. There was not a single suggestion of basing any one of those proposals on a question of racial discrimination.

So far as I am concerned, and knowing something of what has been discussed and what has occurred in the last eighteen months under articles 55 and 56 of the charter, let me say that I am 100 per cent in support of those articles 55 an 56; but I have a duty, as I conceive it. I have a duty, being entrusted with the responsibility of representation by a kindly and a generous people. I know something of what happened before the war in British Columbia. I used to go up those coasts, the same as the hon. member for Vancouver South. I used to go up the British Columbia coast, and I know what was done, under maligned and sinister conditions, under conditions of espionage, to endanger the security of our people. I know, too, what was done to undermine the security of our white ex-soldier fishermen on the coast of British Columbia.

As a result of that, I had some little part in helping to restore fishing licences to those who had fought for Canada, to those who had fought our battles for freedom far away. I want to tell this House of Commons that if it is going to take away from British Columbia —my province, which has been so generous to me—this right of observance of adequate conditions for its own internal security along its coastline, then it is striking a mortal blow at the very heart and soul of confederation of the Dominion of Canada.

I want to make that clear. I may not be in political bodies very long, but I love my province, and I love the people of that province, which has been so generous to me for some thirty years. For many years we failed to get a hearing within these halls in which we are gathered tonight to represent the people. War—danger to our coast and to our people—gave us that hearing. And may I say here in his presence that the splendid administration in the last seven years of a very difficult problem by my colleague the Minister of Labour is something that should be commended by all the people of Canada, including the people of British Columbia.

I appeal to this house: Leave our security alone. I think I shall be as devoted to the essential principles of racial freedom and racial fairness according to the terms, purposes and purport of articles 55 and 56 of the charter as any living soul in the Dominion of Canada. But do not let the rest of Canada interfere with the wishes of British Columbia and destroy the policy with respect to the coastline of the province whence I come, a policy in which the people strongly believe with a fervour and a spirit that are unquenchable.

For that policy, Mr. Chairman, I will fight. By that policy I will stand. And I would hope that if the Liberal party in the House of Commons join, as I join, in regarding and supporting the essential principles of the charter with reference to racial freedom, they might also pay some attention to our Pacific problems in British Columbia, and help us to carry out what we consider, with very honourable exceptions—and I honour them—to be the mandate of our people, the mandate of our province, in maintaining the security of the Pacific sea for these children who are growing up today in the most glorious province in the world.

Mr. MacINNIS: The committee knows my position on this issue, and I suppose there is nothing very much I can say tonight which will clarify the situation or help hon. members to make up their minds. But I should like to tell hon. members that tonight, in the language of the street, they are on the spot. Either they are going to uphold freedom, or they are just going to talk about it.

It is strange to me that the hon. member for Lake Centre, who talks so much about freedom, happens to be absent from the house every time this issue comes up.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was hoping he would be here tonight, because—

Mr. KNOWLES: He was here at nine o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: —I was banking on his strong support in this debate, because I think it is right down his alley.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Talk about your own absentees, and play your own game.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let us look at this picture as it is and as it was when the Japanese were removed from the Pacific coast. As the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, has said, the Japanese issue—but it was not the Japanese issue, but rather the oriental issue—has been a live question in British Columbia for many years, ever since I remember.

But I want the committee to note this, that it is no longer an oriental issue in British Columbia. It is no longer an oriental issue with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. It is no longer an oriental issue with any of them, although it was an oriental issue until 1941. This group, and myself particularly, has been vilified and maligned and battered from pillar to post for advocating the franchise for orientals. At the last session of the legislature of British Columbia Chinese-Canadians were given the vote; East Indians were given the vote, and all that now remain are the orientals of Japanese origin. If to give these people the franchise was right in 1947—and I admit it was—it was right in 1935, in 1940 and in 1945. But the whole basis of my hon. friend's election campaigns in the elections of those years was racial intolerance, of course, racial hatred, and used for specific purposes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: When war broke out, the orientals, or persons of Japanese origin, were removed from the Pacific coast, not because there was really any fear.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Did you object?

Mr. MacINNIS: It was not done because there was any fear that they would cause sabotage or anything of the kind.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You are afraid to answer.

Mr. MacINNIS: There may have been the fear that if an invasion occurred it might have been difficult to differentiate between the invaders and the Canadian Japanese and consequently they were removed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What is a uniform for?

Mr. MacINNIS: We know a uniform can be used at any time. It is something you can put on and take off.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): By the Japs.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, and by the Germans.

Mr. HARKNESS: Will you answer the question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley: did you object to their being removed?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member desires to ask a question he must rise in his place and ask the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Did you object to their being withdrawn from the coast?

Mr. MacINNIS: No. I took the stand—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Thank you.

Mr. MacINNIS: —that is was desirable and perhaps necessary because of public feeling.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why did you want them withdrawn?

Mr. MacINNIS: As I have just mentioned, because there was public feeling that my hon. friend helped to create.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are you afraid of public opinion?

Mr. MacINNIS: Definitely not, and furthermore I do not court public opinion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not court public opinion. If I wanted to get in line with public opinion as my hon. friend tries to create it I would be just as anti-Japanese as my hon. friends are. I took the hard way because it was the right way. I am not a bit ashamed of it. I will do so again should the occasion demand.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They have no funds now.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, the last time the hon. member for Fraser Valley insinuated that I was getting funds from the Japanese on the Pacific coast I overlooked it because at that time I took it that he was in a condition where he did not know what he was doing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I have never insinuated that my hon. friend, stupid as he may be, was obtaining any funds from the Japanese or anyone else, and I say he is a liar if he says otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; the hon. member must not use that language; he should withdraw it.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw.

Mr. MacINNIS: If you do not insist, Mr. Chairman, I will not because I—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley should withdraw that remark.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly if I used language offensive in any way, shape or form to my hon. friend.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Withdraw.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a minute, I do not need any assistance from the man who collects campaign funds on Sunday in my riding. I regret if I insinuated anything against the hon. member for Vancouver East. I never insinuated in any way that he got personal campaign funds; I never insinuated that.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you insinuate?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a minute. I am sorry and I withdraw any implication whatsoever directly to my hon. friend, but I say this—what I meant to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: There is one word which the hon. member used and which I would ask him to withdraw.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I withdraw the word "liar". I am sorry, I meant to use the word "inaccurate".

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I was just trying to picture the situation that led to the removal of the Japanese from the Pacific coast. According to statements made to me by officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, it was done as much for the protection of the Japanese as for the protection of the people of the Pacific coast.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to correct my hon. friend; it was purely a defensive measure.

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree with the minister that it was purely a defensive measure. The war being over, we contend that it is time that the restrictions on these people were removed, that they were allowed to take up their rights and privileges as Canadian citizens. That is all we are asking. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has referred to the defence of British Columbia. Surely this country must be in a deplorable state if it is endangered by a few thousand persons of Japanese origin, even if they were all disloyal, and there has been nothing to show that any one of them is disloyal. A few old men and old women and children are being kept east of the Rockies or east of the coastal defence zone in order to protect British Columbia from invasion. Surely one has only to consider that contention to see how absolutely weak and senseless it is.

I say that there is a strong sentiment in British Columbia in favour of the removal of these restrictions. I have in hand a copy of a long letter which I am not going to read, which was sent to the Prime Minister of Canada by the Vancouver branch of the Canadian civil liberties union.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friends do not seem to consider this organization very important, but on looking at the letter head I find that the honorary chairman is Doctor G. G. Sedgewick, who is a professor at the university of British Columbia. The chairman is Professor Hunter Lewis, another professor at the university. There is also Doctor S. A. Jennings, vice-chairman, who is another professor at the university. And so on down a long list, most of whom I consider to be good Canadians. Referring to the question of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin, Professor Hunter Lewis had this to say in his letter to the Prime Minister:

They are that, in regard to Canadian citizens of Japanese origin, all federal restrictions imposed on them should be eliminated; the federal franchise should be extended to them; and Canadian citizenship should be restored to those who lost it through being "voluntarily deported".

Since our conclusions regarding these matters are neither partisan, nor lightly nor temporarily held, but are sincere convictions arrived at after serious and lengthy thought, we respectfully ask that you give not only them, but also the arguments supporting them, your full and sympathetic consideration.

I could read dozens of statements which appeared in the press of British Columbia and in other parts of Canada in support of our position. During the last month we have heard a great deal about restrictions and controls placed on the people of Canada. Outside of the persons mentioned in this order in council there are very few controls of any importance today. But here are controls over the lives and liberties of people who are as much Canadian as you and I. Today there is no reason, defence or any other, why these controls should be continued. As I think of the impositions which have been placed on these people, people who are innocent of the war, innocent of any part in it and innocent of any crime or misdemeanour during the war, I wonder what I might do under similar circumstances or what the Minister of Labour might do or any member of this committee might do under similar circumstances. They were treated by those who were over them—not all of them, of course—as if they were serfs and the people over them were lords. I have here a letter from a former commissioner of Japanese placement in Vancouver, addressed to a Japanese Canadian who asked permission to visit British Columbia to discuss various matters with those in the relocation camps. The letter is dated June 24, 1946. I have a copy and it reads as follows:

Canada
Department of Labour
Japanese Division
360 Homer street,
Vancouver, B.C.

24th June, 1946.

Mr. Kunio Hidaka,
Executive Secretary,
Citizenship Defense Committee,
506 Jarvis street,
Toronto, Ontario.

Dear Sir:—

We have received your letter of June 20 asking for reconsideration of your request to visit B.C.

We are of the opinion that the best interests are being served of those people of Japanese origin still residing in our B.C. settlements if arrangements are completed for their relocation at the earliest possible date. We believe that a visit to the settlements for the purpose which you have in mind, would only result in delayed relocation. We believe that such delay is not in the interests of people relocating.

Our regional offices in the eastern provinces have complete information on the descriptions of places and areas to which people may be planning to move, and can easily provide such information on request.

We therefore must adhere to our previous decision in declining to approve the issuance of the necessary permit for you to visit B.C. just at this time.

After all the "our's" and "we's" the letter is signed "T. B. Pickersgill, Commissioner of Japanese Placement." I think it was Mark Twain who at one time said there were three categories of people who could use the plural "we" when referring to themselves. One was a ruling sovereign; the second was the editor of a newspaper, and the third was a person who harboured a tapeworm.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And the fourth was the C.C.F.

Mr. MacINNIS: Since Mr. Pickersgill is not a ruling sovereign or an editor, I presume he comes in the third category. I refer to that because it shows the attitude which is taken toward these people.

In the United States persons of Japanese origin were also removed from the Pacific coast in much the same way and at the same time as they were removed in Canada. Restrictions have, however, been removed in the United States long ago. All the restrictions that we are discussing here tonight have long ago been removed in the United States. Is there any reason why we should be behind the United States in extending freedom to our citizens? I suggest to hon. members that they consider carefully before they vote down this amendment because, if we do vote it down, we might as well stop talking about liberty.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member for Vancouver East referred to Mr. T. B. Pickersgill as someone who has a worm inside him, or words to that effect. I have made this observation before. I know my hon. friend wants to be fair, because I have probably known him longer than anyone in the House of Commons. It is quite easy to say these things about a person when he is not here. I am sure that if my hon. friend knew Mr. Pickersgill he would agree with me that he is an efficient civil servant and a decent Canadian. It may be that that may have been an error; I do not know; but I do know that I picked him for the position because I thought he was a humanitarian and a good citizen. I put him on that basis. On reflection, I am sure my hon. friend will withdraw what he said about my good friend Pickersgill.

Mr. MacINNIS: In reply to the minister, I say I am judging the man's attitude from his letter. No man who felt the human factors in the position he was in in dealing with these people would write a letter of that kind.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the hon. member for Vancouver East a question? Is he in favour of allowing the Japanese again to fish on the Pacific coast?

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): May I ask the hon. member for Vancouver East a question? Is he in favour of allowing the Japanese again to fish on the Pacific Coast?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am in favour of allowing every citizen in Canada, Japanese, Chinese, German, Italian or whatever their former nationality may be, equal rights in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: The answer then is yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course the answer is yes.

Mr. GREEN: There has been some heat displayed in this debate, particularly by the hon. member for Vancouver East and perhaps by some of this companions in the C.C.F. party. In speaking tonight, I should like to do so quietly and sincerely. I give them credit for speaking sincerely and I think they should give other hon. members of the committee the same credit. Suggestions have been made by the C.C.F. that those who oppose their views are guilty of racial phobia, racial prejudice, intolerance and things of that kind. Surely in the Canadian parliament we can get away from cheap abuse of that kind. It does not help anybody and it is not true. I say that simply to keep the record straight. I mean every word that I am going to say. Perhaps the C.C.F. members will not agree with me but that cannot be helped. I hope that other hon. members of the committee will.

The plan agreed on in opening this debate was that we would deal with five orders in council; in other words, deal with the whole Japanese problem at one time. That was a wise suggestion. These five orders can be divided into four different categories. They cover four different questions. One is the question of whether or not Japanese are to be allowed to fish on the Pacific coast. The second is the question of relocation of the Japanese; whether there should be any restriction on their movements. The third has to do with help to those going back to Japan, Japanese who asked to be sent back, while the fourth relates to the property of Japanese which is in the possession of the custodian of enemy property.

I start with the last subject first. I think orders in council having to do with the power of the custodian over Japanese property in his possession should be carried on. I do not think there can be much dispute about continuing these orders in council, and in that connection I would say this. In the evacuation there can be little doubt that damage was done to the property of Japanese. No matter how carefully the goods and chattels were handled, there was bound to be damage, and I believe that every member would agree that adequate, in fact generous, compensation should be paid to the Japanese who suffered that damage. Certain steps will be necessary to assess the damage, and I suggest that those steps be taken as quickly as possible and that compensation be paid.

The next subject is assistance to the Japanese who wish to go back to Japan. I have here the figures of the Department of Labour as of March 31, 1947. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but these figures show that to that date 3,961 Japanese had been repatriated. The adults in that group asked to be sent back to Japan; they were not sent against their will but insisted upon being sent back. Anyone over sixteen years of age had to sign a request for repatriation and of course that very act showed where their loyalties were.

I do not think it can be successfully argued now that any of these people had a first loyalty to Canada. Their first loyalty was to Japan and they have been sent back. I understand that others still in Canada have asked for repatriation, that there are some now waiting to be repatriated, and it is expected there will be quite a few more when the hostels now in operation are closed.

Mr. MacINNIS: If these people had not been moved from the Pacific coast and put in camps with all their rights and privileges taken away, does the hon. member think they would have asked to go back to Japan?

Mr. GREEN: In my opinion they would have gone. We have always known that among Japanese on the Pacific coast there was an intense loyalty to Japan. At the time the registration was made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police before Japan struck, it was found that there were 1,500 children of Japanese in Canada actually over in Japan at the time. They were going over there in many cases to take military training. They could never cease to be subjects of Japan, and to a degree they were to be admired for the stand which they took. They insisted on being Japanese, but doing so made it very difficult for them to become Canadians. That is a fact which hon. members must face. I have here a clipping from tonight's Ottawa Citizen, which I quote:

> Canadian-Born Jap Sentenced to death. Hong Kong, April 22—(Reuters) Kanao Inouye, 30-year-old Kamloops, B.C. born Japanese, today was sentenced to death by the Hong Kong supreme court which convicted him of high treason.
> Inouye left Canada for Japan in 1935 for university education and military service but said shortly after the war he still was a British subject.
>
> He was remembered well by Canadian prisoners of war captured at Hong Kong in December, 1941, and was accused of ill-treating them on many occasions.
>
> When he appeared before a war crimes court he escaped several charges by pleading he was a British subject. Then he reversed his defence when he came up on the treason charges, saying he had always regarded himself as a Japanese.
> But Chief Justice Sir Henry Blackall said Inouye was a natural-born British subject and had remained so at all times.

Another feature to be considered in connection with loyalties is that there were over 700 male Japanese interned at one time during the war. When you consider that the total population of Japanese, male and female, adult and children, was about 23,000 and that over 700 were interned, that is a very high percentage of the adult males, and yet it was necessary to intern that number.

My friends of the C.C.F. always make a great point of there having been no sabotage. Usually sabotage does not occur until the right time. These people were moved off the coast and over 700 were interned; the Japanese never actually landed, and I suggest to hon. members that these facts do not warrant anyone saying that there would not have been sabotage had the opportunity arisen.

Mr. REID: And they were probably under instructions.

Mr. KNIGHT: The hon. member has brought forward certain cases of disloyalty in the last war. There was another war. Has he any figures in regard to the attitude of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin during the war of 1914-1918?

Mr. GREEN: They were our allies then, and quite a few Japanese Canadians served with the Canadian forces and served with great distinction. That is very much to their credit.

With regard to assistance in sending back those who wish to go to Japan, I think the government is wise in carrying out that policy and I hope the assistance will be forthcoming in the future for those who want to go.

To come now to fishing, and I really think this is the main question when we are dealing with the Japanese. When the Japanese first came to British Columbia I do not quite remember, although I was born in that province, but it was about the time I arrived; well, over fifty years ago—about fifty years ago.

Mr. COLDWELL: More or less.

Mr. GREEN: The Japanese who came were largely fishermen, and it was not many years until it was quite evident that there was grave danger that they would take over the whole fishing industry. There was friction between the Indians and whites and the Japanese. The Japanese were very aggressive, and, as I say, it was not long until there was grave danger that they would control the industry. So that eventually a policy was adopted by the Canadian government of cutting down the number of fishing licences issued to Japanese. I have here the report of the fisheries branch of the department of marine and fisheries for 1925-1926. At that time the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King was Prime Minister of Canada and our late friend, the Hon. Mr. Cardin, was minister of marine and fisheries. At page 53 of that report we find this statement under the heading "Reduction in Orientals":

> The department's policy of eliminating the oriental from the fisheries of the province with a view to placing the entire industry in the hands of white British subjects and Canadian Indians appears to be working out well as is shown by statement No. 10, which covers a very large proportion of the total number of licences issued which orientals were permitted to hold. In the salmon gill-net operations the orientals during the year 1925 held only 24 per cent and in the salmon trolling 10·5 per cent of the total number issued in the province.
> In the herring dry salting operations a further reduction of 25 per cent was made during the year, making a total of 50 per cent, and in the case of salmon dry salting a first reduction of 25 per cent went into effect and it is the intention to continue this percentage each year until these industries are entirely in the hands of whites or Canadian Indians.

That was the policy twenty years ago and more. I have never heard the members of the C.C.F. or any other members from British Columbia protest against that policy until today when we have the hon. member for Vancouver East saying that he wants the Japanese to go back into the fishing business on our coast.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Vancouver South is putting words into my mouth. What I said in answer to his own question was that I would not debar the Japanese from engaging in not only the fishing industry or any other industry. I did not say I wanted the Japanese to go back to the Pacific coast.

Mr. GREEN: Well, I leave it to hon. members to judge for themselves.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will also leave it to them. That may look nice in British Columbia, but they know me too well for that.

Mr. GREEN: Hon. members heard what the hon. member said.

An hon. MEMBER: So did you.

Mr. FULTON: The answer is yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GREEN: Then at page 74 we find statement No. 12 which is "Summary—British Columbia—comparative statement of the licences issued, season 1922-1925, as at December 31, 1925." These figures are interesting. They show that in the season of 1922, which was three years before this report, there were 3,115 licences issued to whites; 1,545 to Indians, and 2,933 to Japanese. That means, of course, that the Japanese had almost as many as the whites.

Mr. BENTLEY: The government must have wanted them to fish there, or they would not have given them licences.

Mr. GREEN: The figures show that in 1923 there were 3,717 licences issued to whites; 2,571 to Indians, and 2,627 to Japanese. In 1924, there were 3,678 licences issued to whites; 2,750 to Indians, and 2,525 to Japanese. Hon. members will notice that the Japanese licences had been reduced steadily. In 1925 there were 4,785 licences issued to whites; 3,146 to Indians, and 2,190 to Japanese.

By the time the Japanese struck in December, 1941, there were about 1,200 Japanese fishing boats on the Pacific coast. I have not the exact number, but it was about 1,200.

Mr. REID: The number was 2,095.

Mr. GREEN: Boats?

Mr. REID: Licences issued.

Mr. GREEN: I mentioned boats. The licences numbered 2,095, apparently. The first thing that was done when the Japanese struck was to call in every one of those fishing boats. I heard the calls going out over the radio for the Japanese fishing boats in area "A" to report at such-and-such a port and those in area "B" to report at such-and-such a port. Every Japanese fishing boat was called in at once. It was a very wise move and it was a move that was not questioned by anybody in British Columbia. I have never yet heard anybody in British Columbia question the wisdom of that move.

Mr. REID: Not at that time.

Mr. FULTON: Or anywhere else in Canada, for that matter.

Mr. GREEN: And also, I have never heard anybody question the evacuation of the Japanese from the coast. I have here a wire which was sent out from Vancouver on February 24, 1942, to all the British Columbia members and, I take it, to the Prime Minister. It reads as follows:

Owing to widespread public alarm over enemy aliens on the Pacific coast and especially respecting those astride vital defence points and with a view to stabilizing public opinion and in the interest of public safety the undersigned met and now urge—

1. That military authorities be immediately authorized to remove enemy aliens from any and all points considered by military authorities essential in the interests of proper and adequate defence and public safety.

2. That the evacuation of all those of Japanese origin from the Pacific coast area be proceeded with immediately and plans to this effect announced.

And that is signed by whom, do you think? It is signed by:

M. C. Robinson, chairman; Austin C. Taylor; J. H. Roaf; J. A. Clark; B. O. Moxon; J. P. Fell; B. Showler—

The head of the American Federation of Labour in British Columbia, and a splendid man.

—Harold E. Winch, M.L.A.—

The leader of the C.C.F. in British Columbia.

C. J. McNeely; Mrs. F. J. Rolston, M.L.A.; E. Buckerfield; Grant MacNeil, M.L.A.—

C.C.F. member in the British Columbia legislature, who was formerly a member of this house and whom we all respected highly.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is racial hatred!

Mr. GREEN: The signatures continue:

J. C. Hammett; James Hamilton; P. A. Woodward; Victor Spencer; W. G. Murrin; Henry Macken; A. E. Jukes; A. P. Allison; Oscar Erickson; C. S. Williams; J. Bruce Haggart.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What year was that?

Mr. GREEN: That was February 24, 1942.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is a very good group.

Mr. GREEN: It does not fit in very well with charges that we have all been acting on the basis of racial hatred.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did Mr. Winch sign that?

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Winch and Mr. MacNeil signed it; they were both C.C.F. representatives. Mr. Winch was leader of the C.C.F. opposition in British Columbia, and still is.

I have here also a clipping from an article by Elmore Philpott, one of our leading columnists. While he said he was supporting me in the last election—for which I am very thankful; it shows his good judgment—by and large he has been supporting the candidates of my hon. friends to the left.

Mr. COLDWELL: He was Liberal-minded in 1945.

Mr. GREEN: In February, 1942, he said:

> Nobody needs to be a secret service agent to know that a Japanese fifth column will work wherever the Japanese government wants it to work. It is not a question of the loyalty or disloyalty of individual Japanese, native born or otherwise. In a total population of some 25,000 there is no conceivable way of keeping the Japanese government from planting or employing active fifth columnists to do whatever it wants done.
> The entire Japanese population should be moved from this coast as soon as it is humanly possible. That means now—before an actual military action can take place.

But to get back to the boats: Many of the boats which were taken in were high-powered ones. I have spoken to men who inspected them, and they said it was amazing to find these boats which could go right across the Pacific. They were not ordinary fishing boats at all, but were boats with great power. I do not think there is anyone in British Columbia who will question the fact that Japanese naval men were trained in fishing boats on the Canadian coast. That was done on every other coast where they landed, and a person would be childish to think it was not also done on our own coast.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can the hon. member state for a fact that it was done on the coast?

Mr. GREEN: All I can say to my hon. friend is that I have been told that by people who are reliable, and I am convinced that it was done.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the hon. member for Vancouver East say that it was not done?

Mr. MacINNIS: That would not be accepted in a court of law. My hon. friend is a lawyer, and he knows very well that what he is saying would not be taken in a court of law.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. FULTON: The court might take judicial notice.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think either that there can be any question that had Japanese troops landed on the Pacific coast they would have obtained great help from at least some of the Japanese who were there at the time. There would have been a great many unpleasant happenings such as occurred in Nanking, Singapore and everywhere else they went. I must urge that the people of the Pacific coast are entitled to protection from such a situation ever arising again. I do not think Canadians in other parts of the country have the right to expect Canadians on the Pacific coast to face the possibility of such happenings ten years from now or even a hundred years from now. We were nearly caught once; let us not get into a position where we can be caught again. I have great faith in the common sense of the members of this house, and I believe the great majority will agree that my request is reasonable.

The Japanese are now out of the fishing on the coast, and that policy should be maintained. Of course this order in council is to be continued only for a year, with the possibility of the bill being extended for another year. I suggest that, as far as fishing is concerned, it should be made the permanent policy, and not a matter of only a short time; that the policy laid down twenty or twenty-five years ago should not be dropped at this time.

Finally, to come to the question of relocation, as I understand the government policy —and again I would ask the Minister of Labour to correct me if I am wrong—it is one of dispersal and resettlement. To get the Japanese dispersed is only part of the solution; they also have to be resettled, and I am afraid that part of the policy is far from complete. One reason I say that is that on March 31 of this year there were still 6,618 Japanese in British Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is east of the Rockies?

Mr. GREEN: No; that is in British Columbia west of the Rockies. That is about one in three, and is far greater than the proportion of Japanese we should have if they are to be dispersed on the basis of population. I am afraid what has been happening is that many of what I might call the more stubborn and scheming Japanese have refused to come east. Japanese have never been forced to come east at any time; they have been persuaded by the government to do so. I think the tough ones have remained in the interior of British Columbia, with the idea that as soon as the protected zone is removed they will simply move back to the coast. The result, of course, would be that those who have not been playing the game with the government would get the benefit, while those who accepted the removal and came back east and tried to get resettled will be landed back here in the east, and the others back on the coast will be laughing at them. I think that is the position; the tough ones are just refusing to move from British Columbia; they are just staying there waiting until they can get back to the coast. That impression is verified by a statement made by a Japanese spokesman in Alberta on September 10, according to a clipping of the same date from the Vancouver Province headed "3,500 Japanese evacuees eager to return to coast." It is a dispatch from Raymond, Alberta:

"Nearly every last one of the 3,500 Japanese evacuees in southern Alberta would rush back to the coast immediately if authorities permitted us to return to British Columbia."

That was the opinion expressed by a spokesman here for the Japanese as he described "the almost desperate anxiety" of his fellow countrymen to be permitted to return to their former places of residence and employment.

"Most of us have been in southern Alberta for more than four and a half years now and have helped raise five crops of sugar beets," the former operator of a small store in Vancouver explained. "But we have not become accustomed to this part of Canada or to the kind of work we must do. We would like to go back to the coast, where the climate is better and where we might be able to return to our former occupations."

Another reason I say the policy is not yet complete is that very few are moving east of the Rockies now. On the minister's own figures I find that only 132 moved east of the Rockies between January 31 and March 31.

Mr. MITCHELL: You would not expect them to move at this time of year.

Mr. GREEN: I must admit that I do not want to move here myself in the winter.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would not want to move into Saskatchewan or Ontario, for that matter, in January, February or March.

Mr. GREEN: Then I have a statement by the premier of Alberta on February 12 of this year, at Edmonton, in which he is quoted as follows:

Premier Manning said Tuesday the Alberta government has reminded the dominion government several times since the end of the war of the agreement that Japanese placed in this province after their evacuation from the Pacific coast would be removed.

So not only are the Japanese in Alberta anxious to move; the Alberta government is insisting that the dominion carry out its agreement with the province, which was that the Japanese relocated there would be removed at the end of the war.

An hon. MEMBER: Did they suggest where they might be moved?

Mr. GREEN: No, not yet. Then I have the opinion of the deputy minister of labour in regard to the present position of this dispersal policy. I am quoting from The New Canadian, published by the Japanese, dated February 8, 1947. It is a very interesting paper. The heading is: "May Seek Control of Evacuee Movement for Two Years". The dispatch reads:

Ottawa.—Special legislation which would give the Department of Labour power to control the movement of Japanese in Canada for at least two years more may be sought from parliament this session, it was indicated here February 4 by Arthur MacNamara, deputy minister of labour.

Mr. MacNamara said that such legislation might be sought in an effort to prevent a general movement of Japanese back to the province of British Columbia where the bulk of Japanese lived prior to Pearl Harbor.

"Our hope is that the Japanese who are spread throughout the east and west will settle down where they now are. However, it will take time to get them satisfactorily settled and merged into the economy of the other provinces," he pointed out.

"In this respect we feel that we should have control over their movements for at least two years more."

Personally I believe that the government can prevent congestion only by maintaining the whole of British Columbia as a protected zone; not only the coastal area, because that would be unfair to the interior of the province, but the whole of British Columbia. That would mean some Japanese would be there by permit, but there would be control over the movement. So I ask that the protected area be maintained. One year will certainly not ensure either dispersal or resettlement. I appeal to the committee to give consideration to these facts, and if they do so I am sure they will support the pleas of all the members from British Columbia with the exception of the hon. member for Vancouver East, and perhaps the other C.C.F. members who have not said "boo" about this matter yet.

Finally, there is one other feature of the Japanese question, and that is the matter of future immigration. It does not come directly under these orders in council, but I would remind members of the government that on August 4, 1944, the Prime Minister said:

. . the government is of the view that, having regard to the strong feeling that has been aroused against the Japanese during the war and to the extreme difficulty of assimilating Japanese persons in Canada, immigration of Japanese into this country should not be allowed after the war. It is realized, of course, that no declaration of this type can or should be attempted which would be binding indefinitely into the future. Nevertheless, as a guiding principle in the years after the war, it is felt that the migration of Japanese should not be permitted.

The question of the immigration of orientals is up this year. I do hope the government will keep in mind the statement of policy on Japanese immigration which was announced by the Prime Minister on August 4, three years ago.

Mr. HERRIDGE: As a member from the interior of British Columbia, and after what has been said this evening by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the hon. member for Vancouver South, I should like to add a few words in order that the committee may have the right perspective in the situation.

I admit, in the first place, that in the coastal areas there is a considerable body of opinion which is opposed to the return of the Japanese. But I think, at the same time, a great deal of that opinion has been artifically stimulated by speeches such as we hear in the house.

Before going farther, I wish to say this in fairness to the government and to the Minister of Labour that, under the circumstances, and speaking generally, I believe the government did a fair and reasonable job in handling the Japanese situation. In view of the hysteria and the pressure from within their own ranks, I think they were reasonably fair and decent about the matter.

But I rise tonight to support the point of view which has been advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I do so in the first instance, because I come from a riding in which there were large numbers of Japanese residing during the war, after the evacuation from the coast.

During my election campaign I made clear where I stood on the question of race, creed and colour. I ran my campaign on the basis of the principles set out in the Regina manifesto, and I do not intend to desert those principles, even if I lose every vote in my constituency at the next election.

As hon. members know, the Regina manifesto was opposed to any discrimination as to race, colour or creed. That is the fundamental basis of the attitude of the C.C.F. I believe the C.C.F. group in Canada is the only movement which has consistently adopted that attitude throughout these difficult years.

[Mr. Green.]

The question of the removal of the Japanese from the coast was brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver South. He read a telegram in that connection, in which were included members of several parties, including representatives of the legislature. Everyone knows that in British Columbia all parties supported the removal of the Japanese from the coast at that time. One must view the situation differently today from what he did at that time. Then we had an emergency situation, a situation in which there was some hysteria and a great deal of concern regarding the defence of our coast. We cannot justify our peacetime action on the basis of what we do under the urgent necessities of war.

Before going farther, may I say that not only because I believe in the principles of the Regina manifesto, but because I believe in the principles that Canada has supported in the united nations charter, I support the proposal made by the previous speakers.

I served in the first great war for three years, and I remember that on many occasions chaps like myself had discussions. That war was, in some respects, more bloody and more costly in loss of infantry than was the one through which we have just passed. The Canadian troops in the first great war suffered some ghastly experiences.

I remember one occasion when, along with some others, we captured a trench, and occupied it. To be specific, it was Regina trench, on the Somme. At that time we captured a German officer. Then we had to clear up the trench, and bandage the officer. That was the first time I began seriously to consider this question. We sat in that trench for the remainder of the night—that wounded German officer, along with wounded Canadians and others who were not wounded—discussing this whole situation. All of that small group of men that night decided that, whatever happened in the future, they would do what they could to prevent the recurrence of such a disaster to mankind.

After the first great war, along with many others I heartily supported the league of nations. We saw its ghastly failure, not through lack of interest of the little man or the common people, but through betrayal of those at the top. We have now gone through another war, and this time the united nations organization has been set up. Under it, certain principles have been established, and Canada has confirmed and endorsed those principles.

Now, right in this House of Commons tonight, we hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs rationalize or try to justify—and he is a minister of the cabinet—a desertion of those very principles, and at this early stage.

Canada is pledged to the principles of the united nations, including article 55, paragraph (c) of which reads:

> Universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

Because we have pledged ourselves to that, I take the stand as I do tonight, with other hon. members who have spoken. After listening to the Minister of Veterans Affairs rationalizing his point of view toward the charter of the united nations, and his attitude toward the Japanese situation, I would presume that that is what he would call a compensated argument.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask a question? What about paragraph 7 of article 2 which reads:

> Nothing contained in the present charter shall authorize the united nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under chapter VII.

This last chapter, as the hon. member knows, applies only to war.

Mr. HERRIDGE: In answer to that, I would say that the whole spirit of the principles of the united nations would indicate that questions of race, colour and creed were international questions, and not national questions within the confines of a nation itself.

We have heard the argument advanced which would indicate that the great majority of people in the coastal part of British Columbia are opposed to the return of the Japanese. I shall try to be as brief as possible, but in that connection I would quote from the Vancouver Daily Province of February 21, 1946. I shall quote only a portion of the editorial, but would ask hon. members to bear in mind that daily papers are not in the habit of publishing unpopular editorials.

This deals with the Japanese situation. It is a newspaper which, I believe, supports hon. members to my extreme right, and it has this to say when dealing with the Japanese question:

> There are certain rights which are vital and fundamental. They should not be subject to revocation or destruction or interference. They should be sacred. Citizenship is one of these rights. The people of the United States long ago, saw to it that their fundamental rights were safeguarded. They placed a Bill of Rights in their constitution, and no president, no state or federal administration, no congress or court can interfere with them.

We have no such Bill of Rights in Canada, and incidents have arisen repeatedly in the past few years to show that we should have one. There was the padlock law in Quebec. There was the attempt of the Alberta government to destroy the freedom of the press. There was the bid of the present federal government only a few months ago for unheard-of powers under the Emergency Powers Act. And now there is this judgment.

> Seven hundred thousand Canadians fought recently to protect fundamental rights. Tens of thousands laid down their lives. Are we going, now, to allow these fundamental rights to go by default? Or are we going to do something to guarantee them?

That is why I take the position I have taken tonight. I believe it is time we did something about guaranteeing them, and this is a step in the right direction.

The hon. member for Vancouver South I believe was born in a small city in my constituency, the city of Kaslo. Unless I am misinformed, when the matter of bringing the Japanese into the interior was first mooted the hon. member for Vancouver South used every effort to prevent the Japanese from being sent to Kaslo. The hon. member will correct me if I am wrong in my statement. That was done because it was stated to be in opposition to the wishes of the residents of Kaslo.

Mr. GREEN: Some of the people wanted them, the merchants for example, because of the business that would be done; the legion did not want them, it was about fifty-fifty.

Mr. HERRIDGE: That is the point I was about to make. As in other small districts, there was a minority opposition, and that opposition was based upon what they had read in certain papers and what had been said by certain gentlemen. After they came to know these people better, after they had cooperated with them they began to understand them. I can understand that because of what happened in my own small unincorporated village of some 750 people. There was a minority opposition to their coming to that place but, after they had worked in various households, in the mills and on the farms—quite a number of farmers took them —and after some of them joined the Canadian Legion, that attitude changed and it has largely disappeared. I should like to read an editorial from the Kootenaian published in Kaslo, B.C. Weekly newspapers are not in the habit of publishing editorials which are against the general opinion of their subscribers, because most weekly papers published in small districts exist on a very narrow margin. If it were not for advertising and things of that sort they could not exist. This is what was said in the Kootenaian of December 27, 1945, when the movement first commenced:

No wholesale deportation of our Canadian Japanese

We have lived with our Canadian Japanese in Kaslo for nearly four years, and we have seen them maintain their homes calmly under conditions that would have been the subject of much protest by any of the rest of us. We have watched neat, well groomed school children emerge daily from cramped, crowded family quarters, and we have noted the respect and companionship of our own school students for their Japanese classmates. We have worked in the same shop with a group of Japanese Canadian men, and have noted how naturally many of these have fitted into the business, industrial and athletic life of our city. We have seen professional and university trained men and women submit patiently to extraordinary restrictions in the war-time emergency just passed. We have noted the difference between the federal government's dispersal attitude toward our Japanese (as enunciated by Premier King in September of 1944), and the apparent total deportation policy of the coast men, entrusted by Ottawa with the handling of Japanese affairs in B.C. We have heard otherwise sane white residents of Victoria and Vancouver declare that every Jap should be driven out of Canada by force. And we have also read that excellent, fair and unanswerable letter which appeared in a recent issue of the Nelson News, where a Christian citizen, without bias in one direction or the other, points out our obvious duty as Canadians to fight any such Hitlerian action in connection with our Japanese, or any other racial minority.

Mr. GREEN: Is the hon. member aware of the fact that the editor was one of those who urged that the Japanese be brought in?

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am quite aware of that.

Mr. GREEN: And he came from the prairies.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I might say that this editor is a Liberal.

Mr. COLDWELL: With a small "l"?

Mr. HERRIDGE: With a small "l" as well. The editorial continues:

We review the issues which precipitated the war just over in Europe, and we wonder if these race haters actually think they can get away with such sectionalism in our young Canadian democracy. We look across the line to U.S., and note the comparative fairness of treatment of American Japanese, many of whom have been given full citizenship privileges, and all of whom were given an opportunity to enlist and to fight for the country of their adoption.

We note all these things, and many more, and we have decided that the anti-Japanese party in B.C. have never learned to view this as a national problem; their experience with Japanese competition, and their resultant dislike, has clouded their national vision.

[Mr. Herridge.]

The Canadian Japanese are ready to fight for their rights, and no less an authority than the Winnipeg Free Press sums up an editorial championing their fight against deportation, in the following paragraph:

"Neither the naturalization nor the immigration acts would appear to permit a general indictment to be made against Canadian citizens of Japanese birth, or even Japanese nationals resident in Canada. Each man, unless willing to go, must be tried and pronounced unfit to remain in this country."

Well informed Japanese Canadians have long since decided that their future as Canadian citizens depends on a dispersal throughout Canada. And the federal government should assign so many to each of the provinces with B.C. of course taking her quota. We firmly believe that their industry, thrift, cleanliness and adaptability will quickly win them friends wherever they go, and as a result our Japanese problem would solve itself.

I have had letters from people of all political faiths. I have received letters from dozens and dozens of members of the Progressive Conservative party in my riding, some of which expressed disappointment at the attitude taken by many of their own members. I have had letters from members of the Liberal party and from members of church groups, labour groups and from many other people. The point of view expressed by some hon. members is not a fair presentation of the situation. In the coastal region there are substantial numbers who are opposed to the return of the Japanese, but I would say that a great majority of the people in the interior would like to see the Japanese treated as Canadian citizens.

I wish to quote one or two authorities tc hon. members opposite, particularly the Minister of Veterans Affairs who is so oratorical when it comes to the principles of Liberalism.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have never deserted them, as my hon. friend did.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I never deserted the real principles of liberalism, with a small "l". The first authority I should like to quote from is, "Liberalism. Its principles and proposals." By Herbert Samuel, one of the great authorities of the Liberal party in Great Britain. I do not think anyone will question the authority of so prominent a Liberal. He has this to say on an issue like this:

That it is the duty of the state to secure to all its members, and all others whom it can influence, the fullest possible opportunity to lead the best life.

And again:

The trunk of the tree of Liberalism is rooted in the soil of ethics.

The next authority is, "Liberalism" by L. T. Hobhouse, and I quote:

So far as elementary rights are concerned there can be no question as to the attitude of Liberalism.

It stands for the freedom of the subject.

In conclusion, I appeal to the government and to hon. members opposite to return to the principles of Liberalism. I appeal to them to be liberal in every sense of the word and give these people justice, give these people their rights. During the whole debate this evening the face of the Minister of Labour has been beet red and I am sure he has been uncomfortable.

Mr. MITCHELL: The speech my hon. friend is making would not turn any man's face red; it would turn it green.

Mr. HERRIDGE: My speech was not the occasion of the minister's face turning red; it has been red since nine o'clock. I ask the members of the government—and there are a lot of men on the opposite benches who think differently from some of the members from British Columbia—to consider this problem from the point of view of the Liberal principles which they profess.

Progress reported.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 23, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Second report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Breithaupt.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF BUDGET TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table the budget of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the calendar year 1947. By leave of the house I move:

That the budget of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the calendar year 1947, tabled this day, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

INCOME TAX—EXPENSES INCURRED IN OPERATION OF MOTOR CAR

Mr. WEBB:

1. Has a general ruling been issued by the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue regarding the deductibility by a salaried taxpayer in ascertaining his net assessable income of expenses incurred in the operation of a motor car in connection with his business?

2. If so, what is such ruling?

Mr. McCANN: No general ruling has been issued.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—APPLICATIONS FOR CERTIFICATES

Mr. TUCKER:

How many applications have there been for Canadian citizenship certificates under the new citizenship act?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): 9,250.

WAR ASSETS—PRIORITIES

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

1. Does the war assets corporation grant priorities for the purchase of assets dealt with by such corporation?

2. If so (a) to whom; (b) in what order; (c) are there any formalities to be complied with in order to obtain such priorities; (d) are such priorities granted by right under the rules made by the war assets corporation?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes.

2. (a) and (b) Priority is given to requests received from Dominion Government Departments or Agencies; Provincial Governments; Municipalities; and Public Bodies; in the order stated, providing the requests cover only war surplus which

(i) is required by the claimant for its own use and is not intended for resale, and

(ii) is not required by the claimant for the manufacture of goods which are for sale in commercial markets.

There is one exception to the foregoing proviso:—

Government sponsored low-cost emergency housing projects are given first priority on certain buildings, lands and materials salvaged from demolished buildings.

(c) Yes, the priority claimant must provide satisfactory proof that it falls within one of the four priority groups listed above.

(d) No. Priorities in the order stated above were established on the recommendation of the Crown Assets Allocation Committee and subsequently confirmed by the Right Honourable the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

DISTRICT DIRECTOR OF POSTAL SERVICES, MOOSE JAW

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Has the position of "District Director of Postal Services" at Moose Jaw been abolished?
2. If so, for what reason?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): On Thursday last the hon. member for Queens asked about certain changes in postal service organization with particular reference to their effect on Prince Edward Island. I have also received an inquiry from the hon. member for Rosthern respecting the Moose Jaw postal district.

Briefly stated, we have set up positions of regional directors of postal service in an endeavour to promote increased efficiency. There are only five such positions of senior rank, obviously not enough to go around on a provincial basis. Actually it would be impossible to organize an efficient postal service on provincial boundary lines.

Thirteen positions of district inspector of postal service have been established to look after purely inspectional duties of former district directors. Inspectors will be maintained at Charlottetown and Moose Jaw.

At the same time we have restored the position of postmaster at the more important offices, including Charlottetown and Moose Jaw. This has meant changes in titles and a certain shifting of responsibilities, but I can assure my honourable friends that no harm will come to any province because of anything we are doing in our internal organization. Indeed, the changes are made, as I have already indicated, with a view to a better postal service.

DIRECTOR OF MERCHANT SEAMEN

Mr. HERRIDGE:

1. When did G. L. C. Johnson, director of merchant seamen, first enter Canada for permanent residence?
2. What is his citizenship status at the present time?
3. Was he granted citizenship? If so, on what date?
4. On whose recommendation was he appointed director of merchant seamen?
5. Were any seamen's organizations consulted previous to his appointment?
6. What marine certificates does he hold?
7. What seagoing experience has he had?
8. What administrative experience has he had?
9. What are his general educational qualifications?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. April 29, 1941.

2. Canadian.

3. As a British subject, acquired citizenship through domicile in Canada.

4. On the recommendation of Mr. Arthur Randles, at that time director of merchant seamen, and approved by the Minister of Transport.

5. No.

6. Foreign-going master.

7. Through regular stages of cadet and officer to permanent master at age of 28.

Served in naval transports during war of 1914-18.

After several years in command became a maritime pilot in Chinese waters.

Acted as nautical assessor in admiralty division.

8. Manager and secretary of Tientsin and Takubar Pilot Association, North China, for 12 years.

Regional director, Montreal and Vancouver Manning pools, 5 years.

Director of Merchant Seamen—14 months.

9. Private and public schools in Staffordshire, England until commencement of sea career at age of 16.

PAN-AMERICAN UNION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has there been any change since last session regarding Canada joining the so-called pan-American union?
2. If so, what changes have been made in this policy since then?
3. Can Canada, as one of the overseas dominions, join this union without the consent of the governments of Great Britain and the other dominions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

INCOME TAX—CAMPBELLTON, N.B., OFFICE

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Has a date been set for the opening of the proposed office of the Income Tax Department at Campbellton, New Brunswick?
2. Have offices been rented?
3. If so, from whom and what rental per month?
4. Are repairs and alterations necessary and what is the estimated cost for same?

EXAMINER OF PUBLICATIONS

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. Is an author or a publisher of a book printed or published in Canada compelled to submit it to any government department for censorship?
2. If so, under what circumstances, is he so compelled?
3. What is the name of the examiner of publications now on superannuation leave?
4. Whas are his background and training with reference to his work as a censor?
5. What is the name of the general executive assistant now carrying on the duties of censorship?
6. What are his background, standard of education, and training with reference to such duties?
7. Is the official mentioned in question number five responsible for the censorship of books entering Canada?
8. Does he personally read and pass judgment upon such books?
9. Is there a committee or group of assistants to aid this official in his work of censorship?
10. If so, what are the names of the members of such group or committee?
11. Are any individuals or groups of individuals ever (or customarily) consulted before prohibitive censorship is exercised in any given case?
12. If so (a) who are those individuals; (b) what are those organizations?
13. Is there any appeal from the decision of the Examiner of Publications?
14. If so (a) to what body is such appeal addressed; (b) what is the procedure followed in making such an appeal?

MILLTOWN, N.B., POSTMASTER

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Who is the present postmaster at Milltown, New Brunswick?
2. Does the present incumbent hold the office as a permanent or temporary employee?
3. Was a competitive examination held within the last year to fill this position?
4. If so (a) when; (b) what are the names of applicants; (c) who was the applicant obtaining the highest marks?
5. If present incumbent is a temporary employee, when will a permanent appointment be made?

CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS NATIONAL PARK

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Who is the superintendent or resident person in charge of the Cape Breton Highlands national park, stating his experience and qualifications?
2. What amounts were paid him during the years 1945 and 1946 in (a) salary; (b) travelling expenses; (c) car and other allowances or expenses?
3. Who were the park wardens for the years 1945 and 1946 stating where located, their duties, salaries, travelling and other expenses?
4. What was expended during the years 1945 and 1946 on the golf course for (a) improvements; (b) maintenance, stating the number of men employed in playing season?
5. What was the total amount expended on the park during the years 1945 and 1946 for (a) improvements; (b) maintenance, and on the highways?
6. Were any construction tenders called or contracts let in 1945, 1946 and 1947, and if so for what work, to whom let and for what amounts?
7. Who were the foremen in charge of the maintenance of highways, where located and remuneration and expenses paid?
8. Was J. P. MacMillan employed in 1945 and 1946 in connection with the park, and, if so, in what capacity and what remuneration and expenses were paid him?

COMMONWEALTH CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any government contracts been awarded to the Commonwealth Construction Company, Limited, of Winnipeg?
2. If so, what are the dates thereof, what is the nature of such contracts, and what amount of money is involved in each?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PASSPORTS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all regulations of the Department of External Affairs concerning the issue of passports?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: These are departmental regulations which are not intended for general circulation, but I shall be glad to table them and to table at the same time an order in council passed on March 6, 1947, which will require some modification of these departmental regulations with respect to diplomatic passports.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the right hon. gentleman, but what I wanted mostly to know was why the applications for passports are considered confidential when the passport is a public document.

SURVEY OF FLUID MILK DISTRIBUTION

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of the survey of fluid milk distribution in Canada, prepared by the accounting division of the wartime prices and trade board, for the year 1941, and any similar reports prepared for any subsequent period.

Mr. MAYHEW: The documents asked for in this motion are interdepartmental documents which are privileged. I must ask that this motion be dropped.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the parliamentary assistant one question? Is he aware of the fact that some twenty copies of this report were made available to the counsel of the milk distributors of Ontario?

Mr. MAYHEW: I made inquiry as to that report and I find that, so far as the department is concerned and so far as the government is concerned, there has been no official report circulated. If any has been released, it has been without the authority of the government.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if copies of the report were provided unofficially to the milk distributors, or got into their hands unofficially? If so, I think the house is entitled to what the milk distributors had.

Mr. MAYHEW: Not so far as we know. We have not recognized anything.

Mr. Knowles: Is it true that they got them?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Motion dropped.

BEAUHARNOIS LIGHT, HEAT AND POWER COMPANY

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or any department or officer thereof and any officer of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company regarding the company's application for the right to use additional water from the St. Lawrence river for light and power purposes of the said company, also a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and any of the provinces or the state of New York or the federal government of the United States of America, or any officer thereof with reference to the matters herein.

EMPIRE DEFENCE POLICY

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all telegrams, cables and other correspondence exchanged since the last great war, between the government of Canada and the governments of Great Britain and the other dominions or crown colonies of the empire, regarding a common defence policy for the defence of the empire in the future.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, there has been no correspondence since the great war between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain and the other dominions or crown colonies of the empire regarding a common defence policy for the defence of the empire in the future. There are constantly exchanges between governments with respect to their respective defence forces, but none of this correspondence could be published without the consent of the other governments. It is the view of the Canadian government that it would not be in the public interest to publish these exchanges at this time and that we should not request the consent of the other governments to do so. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would not withdraw his motion.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. CHURCH: May I say to the right hon. gentleman that I think we should have some papers connected with it. There are no meetings and no defence policies of any kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

INCOME TAX—FARMERS

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a statement showing the number of farmers filing income tax returns and the number assessed for the fiscal year 1945-1946, together with the number of farmers, by provinces, assessable, non-assessable, and assessed for the same year; and also the number of farms in Canada according to the 1941 census, together with the percentages, by provinces, of farmers filing returns and farmers assessable.

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports and other documents exchanged during the years 1946 and 1947 between the government of Canada or any officer thereof and the provisional government of Newfoundland and Labrador or their trustee and the government of Great Britain, with respect to the Quebec North Shore and Labrador railway company.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There has been no correspondence between the government of Canada or any officer thereof and the government of the United Kingdom during the years mentioned, 1946 and 1947, with respect to the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company, or between the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland or any officer thereof. The only thing that is on the file is a request from Canada's high commissioner in Newfoundland communicating to us a request made to him for a copy of Bill 106, which was passed as Bill "H" of the senate. I shall be glad to table a copy of the portion of the communication from our high commissioner dealing with that request.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried with the reservation made by the minister.

UNITED NATIONS

SECURITY COUNCIL—DELIBERATIONS OF MILITARY STAFF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I wish to direct an inquiry to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. A report from Lake Success, dated April 20, indicates that the military staff committee of the security council has decided to limit in size the proposed international police force to one that would have power to punish only small international wrongdoers and let wrongs committed by the larger powers perhaps go unpunished. Has Canada been invited, in accordance with article 47 of the united nations charter, to sit in on this military staff committee's deliberations? If not, how closely has Canada been kept informed as to the deliberations of that committee?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am afraid that the report referred to by the hon. member as a basis for his question is rather speculative. As a matter of fact we are informed that no report has been made by the military staff committee of the security council, and that its sessions so far have been held in camera. Answering the other portion of the question, Canada has not been invited by the military staff committee to participate in its present deliberations.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY RESPECTING AUTHORIZATION FOR ADMISSION OF EUROPEANS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Was an order in council passed authorizing Mr. Dionne's visit to Europe and for the admission of labour to Canada for employment in the textile industry?

Mr. GRAYDON: Which Mr. Dionne?

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Dionne, the hon. member for Beauce. If so, will the minister please table that order in council?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why, but I expected that someone would ask that question. I shall table the order, but I think I should read a few words from it so that they will be on record:

> . . . the Dionne Spinning Mill Company of St. George, Beauce, Quebec, have applied for the admission to Canada from Europe of one hundred women for training and employment as textile workers in the company's mills at wages as required by the law of the province of Quebec regulating the salaries and conditions of work of textile industries in that province.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister is tabling the order in council?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—ATTENDANCE IN HOUSE—JAPANESE QUESTION

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I was absent from the house last evening. I am seldom absent, but while I was away the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) made the following statement, as reported at page 2316 of Hansard:

> It is strange to me that the hon. member for Lake Centre, who talks so much about freedom, happens to be absent from the house every time this issue comes up.

My first point is that this statement is untrue; I have not been absent on previous occasions. Last evening I had an appointment that took me out of the house. Then there was a remark by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles): "He was here at nine o'clock". For the first time this identifies that hon. gentleman as the head of the secret attendance police of the house; he mentions the hour I was still here. I am going to be absent this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, by reason of a prior appointment. I want to say that my attitude has never changed, and aspersions such as those do not detract from that fact. I am opposed to any discrimination against Canadians, regardless of their race or creed.

BUTTER

HOARDING IN ANTICIPATION OF INCREASED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Will the Minister of Agriculture assure the house that steps will be taken to prevent firms who are hoarding butter from profiteering at the expense of the Canadian people, in view of the rumoured increase in the price of butter?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Action was taken some time ago to make that impossible.

Mrs. STRUM: Will the minister please tell us just what that means, and how it is to be applied?

Mr. GARDINER: I should not like to attempt to go into all the details at the moment. I think it can be applied very effectively by means of operations that will be carried out by the Department of Agriculture and the prices board.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO WAR VETERAN'S ALLOWANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Minister of Veterans Affairs say whether consideration is being given by the government to amending the War Veteran's Allowance Act to provide an increase in the amount of the allowance both for veterans and for the widows of non-pensioned veterans?

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is not the intention of the government to introduce at the present session of parliament any amendments to the War Veteran's Allowance Act.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

DISCOUNT ON CANADIAN BONDS AND STOCKS IN UNITED STATES MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): In view of the fact that Dominion of Canada bonds are selling in New York at a discount of approximately 11½ per cent, and interlisted stocks at a discount of 15 per cent will the Minister of Finance inform the house what steps the government propose to take to cope with the increasingly adverse and critical exchange position as between Canada and the United States of America?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I do not think that is a question to be asked on the orders of the day, but appropriate action is being taken. I suggest that my hon. friend's friends sell their bonds in Canada.

CHEESE

NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM AS TO PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): Several days before the Easter recess the Minister of Agriculture stated in the house that negotiations were going on between his department and the food ministry of the United Kingdom in regard to the price of cheese for this year. I wonder if he is in a position to make a statement as yet.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I think at or about the same time I said consideration was being given to the possibility of adjusting the prices of all dairy products around May 1, in order to carry out the announced policy of doing something in regard to subsidies. I also made the statement about the same time that the whole matter was being considered by the advisory committee, which represents the provincial governments and farm organizations across Canada. We received the recommendations of that committee just this morning. Consideration is being given the whole matter, and an announcement will be made in accordance with the previous statement.

[Mr. Knowles.]

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Last evening we were dealing with the labour department, and discussing order in council P.C. 946, and also P.C. 251, P.C. 1665, P.C. 469 and P.C. 7355.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. On April 1 the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs said, speaking of the consolidation which has been debated and discussed for the last three weeks, as reported at page 1919 of Hansard:

> . . . an office consolidation, which has no probative value whatsoever but is a compilation of the orders as they exist now, with the amendments made thereto. That consolidation is not a part of the bill. It is merely a document and one that could not be received in court, that would be no evidence of the orders in council.

I submit that according to the description given by a jurist of the experience and fame of the right hon. gentleman, it is evident that this committee has been engaged in a futile and frivolous discussion for the last three weeks. I entirely agree with the right hon. gentleman that this compendium has nothing to do with the bill, but it is precisely what has been discussed in vain by all hon. members who have taken part in the discussion. I do not see the use of members of parliament wasting their valuable time discussing something that will be of no value before the courts. Therefore, under standing order 59 I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member is omitting to take into consideration some pertinent and important facts in connection with this matter. The first of those is that the orders in council mentioned in the schedule annexed to the bill are in force at the present time, are the law of the country and are to remain in force until May 15. They are orders in council which have been promulgated and published in the manner in which the law requires that that be done. The list of them is mentioned in the schedule to the bill and, for the convenience of hon. members, the orders in council were tabled before the second reading of the bill. The compendium or office consolidation was a convenient document prepared so that hon. members would not have to have recourse to the various issues of the official gazette, or to the wartime orders publications, to have before them the text now in force.

The hon. member is right when he says that in the bill we are not dealing with the office consolidation. In it we are dealing with certain orders in council which are in force, which have been published and promulgated as required by law and with respect to which parliament is considering whether the expiry date should be May 15 or some subsequent date.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Temiscouata has moved under standing order 59 that the committee rise and report progress. The motion is not debatable. All in favour will please say yea.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no seconder.

Mr. POULIOT: Yea.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion (Mr. Pouliot) negatived.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I might add that we have before the committee an amendment by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. At the adjournment last night the hon. member for New Westminster was about to speak.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to enter into the debate at this moment because I was waiting until the order in council having to do with Japanese fishing licences was before the committee. However, since an amendment has been moved I feel it incumbent upon me, particularly in view of some speeches made last night, to make some remarks now which would be pertinent to the five or six orders in council and the amendment before the committee.

Let me say first of all, with the hon. member for Vancouver South, that what we have to say in the matter is not influenced by nor does it emanate from racial hatred, a cry which is thrown at us so often when we speak about the Japanese question. The situation in this respect reminds me of the condition in some quarters of the country where certain individuals will not allow one even to mention the name of Russia. They raise their hands in holy horror if the name of that country is even mentioned. I do not know whether that pertains throughout all the provinces, but I do know that in British Columbia I have been challenged at times for even mentioning the name of that country, and because I have asked questions about it the accusation has been made against me that I am out to engender bad feeling between the two countries. I deprecate any such accusation. I want those in the house and outside of it who do not see eye to eye with me at least to recognize that my views are just as fair and as sincere as are their own. And if they are out to uphold this great democracy, then surely they will grant us at least that concession.

With respect to racial hatred I shall say something now which I do not think I have mentioned in the House of Commons before. I wonder, however, if one were out to arouse hatred—and I am not—which of the two would be worse, class hatred, of man against man, or racial hatred. I remember that in British Columbia in 1935, long before some hon. members came to the house, there was a reign of fear and intimidation. That took place previous to and in the 1935 election campaign throughout the Fraser valley and was engendered by supporters and adherents of the C.C.F.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. REID: And I say that without fear of successful contradiction. Two or three people around my own home town said, "We are afraid of what may happen to us." I had even to take my children out of school on one or two occasions. Oh, the hon. member for Vancouver East can laugh, but I hope he will allow me to say the things I have to say in all sincerity. I did not interrupt him when he was speaking.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not interrupt my hon. friend. He went out of his way to make reference to me.

Mr. REID: But there was just the fear that he would. It was, as I say, a reign of fear and intimidation, and engendering of class hatreds; for they were pitting class against class.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member did not like my sinister silence.

Mr. REID: The hon. member was talking last evening about racial hatred in this country. Well, I come from a land where a man can stand on a platform or a soapbox and say what he likes. They believe in the good sense of the people there, and I am one of them who believe the same.

An hon. MEMBER: A good Labour government.

Mr. REID: I will have something to say about that at the proper time, when probably I will discuss the hon. member's remarks. But the people of that country leave it to the good sense of the citizens. I am one who would like to leave it to the good sense of the people here. As a matter of fact, I should like to leave this entire question to the people of British Columbia.

The suggestion has been made by hon. members opposite that at least fifty per cent of the people of British Columbia, and perhaps a majority of them, are against what we stand for. I am going to ask those who take the opposite view to answer some questions when their turn comes to speak. For the past fourteen or fifteen years I have been asking certain questions in the House of Commons about the Japanese. I have also asked the civil liberties league, and I have even gone so far as to ask the Japanese themselves these same questions.

When the debates were on in the house last year and in the previous year the periodical known as the New Canadian, which I believe is sent to most members of parliament—free of charge, of course—printed excerpts from all the speeches on the Japanese question made by hon. members in the house. The excerpt they printed about my speech was this: "Tom Reid, the member for New Westminster, says that we are an unassimilable race, and that we owe allegiance to Japan." There were no further remarks. I then wrote them saying, "You have made that quotation; do you deny it? Do you deny that you owe allegiance to Japan in the first instance, that your first loyalty is to that country, and that each one of you is registered with it?" There was no answer. One would have thought surely that those of Japanese stock, those who were born in this country, those who were educated in our schools, would have something in their make-up similar to that which we ourselves have. Having quoted from my speech in the House of Commons it was passing strange that they would not reply to my inquiry.

Then we have the civil liberties league, another of the leagues which have sprung up lately. I am sorry to see so many prominent persons in this country getting mixed up in that group. They held a large meeting last year, and another one this year. I suppose most members of parliament have received a communication from an organization at the university of British Columbia called the Christian brotherhood. They were commenting upon the fact that the provincial government had granted the right to vote to Indians and Chinamen but not to those of the Japanese race. I wrote to them also and I said, "Would you place before your organization this question: Can a person be truly a Canadian when he has a dual citizenship and whose allegiance in the first instance is to Japan, which government claims him?" The second question I asked was, "Why is it that no one of the Japanese race has yet come forward and openly stated, either in the press or on the public platform or privately, that he had no allegiance to Japan?"

Surely I cannot be accused of racial hatred when I ask those questions. They are practical questions. The oriental has a different psychology and make-up from ours. I do not understand them, and perhaps they do not understand us. If we were in the same position I do not think we would have any compunction about getting up and saying, "I was born in this land and I owe allegiance to no other government or to no other country than Canada. We owe no allegiance to Japan." I believe that many people might be prepared to accept such a statement from the Japanese. I ask this of the members of this house: Why, then, the silence? It is significant and it has a bearing upon the matter before us.

I am not going to take up much time trying to visualize what might happen in the future, but I believe that the Japanese nation, with its 95 million people, a nation which rose to great military heights prior to the war, is not yet finished. It is my belief that they are waiting until General MacArthur goes. When statements are made that the Japanese in this country have not said anything, it is my belief that they are acting just the same as the Japanese in Japan. There is some high authority saying to them, "Keep quiet, say nothing, do nothing, the time for us will come later." I think I am on fairly sound ground when I quote from an authoritative dispatch which was sent from Admiral Halsey's flagship some time ago. It reads:

> Asked to comment on the "new democracy" now being hailed by the Japanese press, Carney said:
> "The people who are going through this new process are exactly the same people who were guilty of atrocities during the last four years. There is no reason to think that under the same circumstances they wouldn't do it again."

He warns the democracies, especially the United States, to beware of what might happen in Japan once General MacArthur has left that country. I am going to propound one or two more questions and those who oppose our views can probably answer them after I sit down. Will anyone deny that Japan did not embark on a long range scheme or plan to conquer the countries fronting on the Pacific ocean? Will anyone get up and say that that is not correct? I do not think any man would be foolish enough to do that. Will anyone deny that the Japanese government saw to it that her nationals were placed in every country fronting on the Pacific ocean?

Mr. MACKENZIE: And in key positions.

Mr. REID: And in key positions. Will anyone deny that the Japanese government financed them, and that in turn the Japanese who came here were obligated to return those loans? I looked up the Japanese year book for 1934 and I found that the Japanese in British Columbia had returned something like 23,000,000 yen during 1932. That figure is not quoted from our records; it is from a Japanese year book issued in Japan, and it can be found in our library. Will any one deny that large numbers of military and naval men were sent by Japan to this country? Let me ask this question: Why did she send military officers to train young Japanese? In 1936 I visited a large hall owned and operated by Japanese. I had been told what was going on there and I went down one evening and found fifty or more young Japanese being taught by a military strategist and expert from Japan. It is true they did not have guns, but they were using fencing sticks. They were being taught to march up and down, and to carry out all the tactics incidental to military life. Will anyone say that that was being done just for fun, or to make them better Canadian citizens? In those years these military men were coming from Japan at the expense of the Japanese government, and they were being sent here for a special purpose.

There has been criticism of the government because in one fell swoop 1,100 Japanese fishing vessels were picked up. I have some idea of what would have happened if 25,000 Canadians had been living in a group in Japan. I have some idea that they would not have been allowed to go round as these people were. After all, there is some good in democracy. To those who sometimes point the finger of scorn at this country, to those who point to another country as an example, may I say that instead of democracy being on trial, communism is on trial. We are waiting to see if they can produce in communistic countries what we have produced here, if they can give their people the kind of life that our people here enjoy.

Be that as it may, will anyone now say that it was unwise to move the Japanese from the danger zone on the Pacific coast? No one will deny that. As the hon. member for Vancouver South pointed out when he read the wire which had been sent by men in prominent positions, men of all parties, including high ranking members of the C.C.F., urged the removal of the Japanese. Bear in mind we now know the plans of the Japanese. It was well that our government took the action they did at the time. We now know that in Japan there was a fight between the naval and military groups. The military group wanted to land in Alaska where there was no protection and nothing to stop them from coming right down our coast. But the naval and air force groups in Japan were too strong, the plans were changed, and so they struck at Pearl Harbor. We know what happened from then on.

What would have happened had the Japanese landed in Alaska when there was no protection there, or on our Pacific coast? Will anyone say that in these 23,000 or 24,000 Japanese there were not scores who would have been ready to help them? I suppose if we were in Japan and the same thing happened we too might be prepared to help the Canadian authorities. I am not altogether finding fault with them, but I do know that some of them were blatant about it when they were in the camp at Hastings Park. Complaints were made that they were not being properly treated, and those complaints were investigated by a representative of Switzerland. During the tour through Hastings Park prominent Japanese came boldly forward and said, "We want to be taken back to Japan." Some of them openly admitted that they were military men and that they had come to this country for that avowed purpose. Hon. members will remember that I mentioned in the house that during the war I was prevented from seeing guns that were located in Steveston, and yet inside the military area a Japanese family was living. Oh, yes; they said, this Jap was a school teacher and could be trusted. But strange to say, two months later the authorities had to pick him up and put him in an internment camp. Many stories of that kind could be recited. Why British Columbia is perturbed over this matter can be summed up thus.

For at least forty years prior to the war the people of British Columbia had been crying to Ottawa to do something about the Japanese but without avail. The people of Ontario and other provinces may think at the moment that the Japanese are all right. The people of British Columbia thought exactly the same at first, just as I did when I first came to British Columbia. As a rule they were good workers; they worked hard; they were obedient; they caused no trouble. It took quite a number of years before we realized that the Japanese were not the Chinese, who are a different race entirely. Once there were enough of them in British Columbia they began to assert themselves. With some as long as they worked for John Jones it was fine, but the minute they started up in business against John Jones, these same people wanted them taken back to Japan.

Since I came here in 1909 I have never changed my views on the oriental question in British Columbia. What we in British Columbia fear is that when Japan rises again, not today or tomorrow or a few years hence but at some time in the future, these Japanese will be useful to Japan because they will all be back in British Columbia once the restrictions are removed. Some people are advocating the lifting of all restrictions. They do not want the Japs in their province and this is a fine move to get them out without being accused of being pro-Jap. The Japanese, it is true, have been tried out in the beet fields in certain provinces and some of the people there are beginning to find out that they are not just the fine little fellows they were thought to be at the beginning when they came into the province to help out. As I say, the views I hold I have held right from almost the first days I came to this country, and that was away back in 1909.

I am going to speak for a few moments on the fishing industry in British Columbia. The question was raised last night by the hon. member for Vancouver South, and I want to compliment him on the speech he made. There are not many members who were in this house when I spoke here in 1933—not many. I hold in my hand the Hansard of 1933—and bear in mind that in those days there was never any question raised as to the Japanese being Canadian citizens; there was no question then of racial animosities. It is strange that this has all started since the inception of the C.C.F. party. Before that, no such accusations were made. When I spoke in the house in 1933 I was advocating that the number of fishing licences issued to the Japanese be curtailed, if not eliminated. I will tell you why. When it came to my knowledge that at Steveston no white Canadian could throw a net into the Fraser river and fish except at the peril of his life I made up my mind that so far as I was concerned I would bend my efforts to taking back that heritage and restoring it to our own Canadian people rather than having it in the hands of a people who were here for a special purpose and whose first allegiance and loyalty —this is on record—was to Japan. No cry went up then that I was raising a racial question. There was then no cry of Japanese being citizens of Canada and of their being deprived of their livelihood.

I want to quote what I said in this house on April 24, 1933. That is going quite a long way back. I think I am now one of the fifteen members who have been in this house before and since 1930. Parliament has changed a lot since then. I said at that time:

> As I have stated, the Japanese are becoming very arrogant on the Fraser river, and last fall I had drawn to my attention a case whereby they threatened bodily harm because a white man dared to go around one of the little islands in the mouth of the Fraser river endeavouring to catch some fish with a line.

Mind you, on a Canadian river! The Japanese were protesting against Canadians fishing in Canada's own waters! I went on:

> Another case occurred in the same year up north where a Japanese boat ran through a white man's boat and the two white men would have been drowned had they not been picked up by another fishing boat which happened to be near by. The Japanese use people of their own race all the time.

I went on to show that the Japanese were in complete control of the cod fishery of the Pacific coast. That was away back in 1932. Let us look for a moment at the fishing industry today. Here briefly is the record so far as fishing licences are concerned. In 1938 a total of 13,805 fishing licences were issued in British Columbia, and of that number 2,033 were Japanese and 3,144 were Indians. In 1941, the last year in which the Japs were fishing a total of 13,422 licences was issued, and of that number 8,023 were whites, 3,305 were Indians and 2,095 Japanese.

It was stated at one time that if the Japs were driven out of the fishing industry and out of the canneries in British Columbia the whole fishing industry of the province would collapse. Let us see just what happened. In 1946, last year, the number of fishing licences had increased from 13,423 in 1941 to 20,022, and no licences were issued to Japanese.

Mr. MacNICOL: How is production?

Mr. REID: The production is not always a guide, because there might be a good run of salmon in some years and a poor run in other years, but production in 1946 was very good. The runs sometimes fall off in certain seasons and so production is always a sound guide.

A good number of our returned men have gone into fishing in British Columbia. I have the honour to represent a place called Steveston, where there were more Japanese resident at one time than in any other part in British Columbia. It was known as Jap town. Before the war in a fourteen-room school thirteen rooms were occupied entirely by Japanese and one room by mixed pupils. That town, since the Japanese went, has gradually been coming back as a white man's town. I attended a meeting of the fishermen there. I did not make any remarks but just asked for their opinion about the Japanese. To a man they said that if the Japanese came back there would be serious trouble. "Never again", they said, "will we allow the Japanese to come back".

At the moment there are far too many in the fishing industry. Only a certain quantity of fish come up the Fraser river and only certain quantities can be caught off shore. As I have said, 20,022 fishing licences were issued in 1946. Where is there room for the Japanese to come back to fish? It is true that the Japs work long hours. A white man lives like a white man. He works eight or nine hours a day and then takes a rest. But the Jap takes his boy or his wife along with him and by taking turns they work day and night. It is contended that they are better fishermen than the whites, but that is not true. They fish longer hours because they bring their families into the work of fishing.

If this amendment passes and the Japs are brought back into British Columbia I prophesy that all who can come back will come back. In that event you cannot deny them a livelihood. But are we going to allow them to come back with their methods of work, with their long hours and with their families working, and with their low standards of living? Are we going to encourage them to come back into the fishing industry of British Columbia to the disadvantage of our own men, particularly numbers of veterans who have recently started up in the fishing industry? So far as I am concerned I am taking my stand right now, and I say no. I know that the member for Vancouver East says that we are taking the popular stand and that he is taking the unpopular stand. But opinions are changing. The civil liberties league is getting a lot of converts and getting a lot of help against those who like myself endeavour to point out to the country that the Japanese are an unassimilable race in this country and should not be allowed to congregate in any one province. Who, may I ask, has given authority to members to get up in this house and speak for the Japanese and say the things they do? I have before me a copy of the New Canadian of January 26, 1946, in which the editor says:

> The Japanese problem in Canada can and should be solved through a dispersal policy.

Now there is the voice of the Canadian-born Japanese themselves, and yet there are those in this house who will support this amendment which would nullify that proposal of the Japanese and once again allow all the Japanese to go back into British Columbia. I am putting this to the members from other provinces, both in the Progressive Conservative party and in the Liberal party as well. I ask them to realize that this matter is a serious one to the people of our province. I believe that if a vote of the people were taken there would be no question about it. Too little attention has been given to the plea that we from British Columbia have made. British Columbia should not have been called upon as a province to carry, and to have within that province, ninety-nine per cent of the Japanese who entered Canada.

Lest it may be said that it is the whites who are complaining against the Japanese, let me assure you that as a member of the committee on Indian affairs I know that there are Indians who have been complaining that the Japanese have deprived them of their livelihood, and these Indians have been endeavouring to get back into industry since the Japanese went out. During my travels last year I saw these people. In one part of the country that I visited I found that a group of Japanese had taken over four or five large farms, and what was the complaint of the Indians? The complaint was, "We had lots of work here as long as the white men owned these farms but the moment the Japanese took them over we were denied even a day's work"—and that was in the centre of British Columbia.

I am not particularly surprised that the member for Kootenay West champions the Japanese. It is not generally known to members from other provinces that the Japanese were located in the interior in many of what we call the ghost towns where buildings had been idle. No one was living there and those who owned property and had stores took the Japanese into their arms. They are making money out of them and they would hate to see anything happen to these good customers. Hence the member representing Kootenay West says, "We want them there". Of course they want them there, for the almighty dollar.

I have tried to keep this speech of mine free from rancour. I have put the argument before the committee and I trust that when the vote is taken we shall have full support for the government's order in council.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I believe this is the proper time to take the opportunity of expressing the views of my constituents in Comox-Alberni in regard to this Japanese problem. First of all, I think it would be only fair for me to congratulate the Minister of Labour on the excellent job he has done in handling this difficult problem. I believe he has done it with justice and, may I say, humanity. I should like also to congratulate the C.C.F. members on the extreme versatility they show at times in this house. They are authorities on every subject. I noticed the member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) the other night cast the usual C.C.F. innuendoes at the lumber industry in British Columbia. I assure you, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. PROBE: To keep the record straight, may I say that all the figures I gave with respect to the hon. gentleman's lumber friends were taken from Moody's Manual of Investment, 1946, and every word can be substantiated. I put that on the record before and I can put it on again.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The innuendo was still there. There is one thing I can assure you of, Mr. Chairman. Never in the history of the House of Commons was so little known by an hon. member about so large an industry. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) led off the debate for the C.C.F. party. At times I have been enthralled listening to his addresses on immigration—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And water.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): And probably water. As the house listened with rapt attention one could have heard a tap drip. But when the hon. gentleman ventures into a field such as the Japanese problem in Canada, particularly in British Columbia, I think he is a little out of his province. He would be the first to admit, I believe, that he could not tell a Japanese from a Hottentot. I sincerely hope that the C.C.F. members are far better informed on other subjects than they are on the Japanese.

Mrs. STRUM: Now we hear the drip.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): There is one drip in your party who should probably be heard in this house.

Mrs. STRUM: One is enough in any house.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): He is strangely silent at times, though he represents a fishing riding. He had a lot of time during the war to look around and see what conditions were. I refer to the member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald). I should like to hear him today.

Mr. MacINNIS: Only one can talk at a time.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The next time he speaks I hope he will not weasel around the question whether he wants the Japanese back in British Columbia. I want to be fair to him, and I am quite sure his constituents would very much like to hear his definite views on this subject, instead of saying that the real enemies of the fishermen are not the Japanese but the fish packers. Let us have his views on this subject, because that is not a real statement. You can weasel around on that question, but I say to him: Tell us whether you want the Japanese to return to the fishing industry on the west coast. If you do, I admire you for your stand. But in fairness to the house and to your constituents you should tell us.

I have been much impressed by the C.C.F. members over there. They make a loud plea for justice, tolerance and pity. There are many men of good will in this house and I am sure they are greatly impressed by those sentiments, but I wonder if my hon. friends are really expressing the views of their party generally in Canada. I have here a newspaper quotation of a statement made by Mr. Colin Cameron, who is president of the C.C.F. party in British Columbia. It is a masterpiece, but it does not quite tie in with the pity and tolerance they speak of all the time. Let me quote what Mr. Cameron said on Monday, April 14, as reported in the Vancouver Province. He is the leader of the party in British Columbia. He is a headache to you, I know, but let us be fair. He said:

> The bold and ruthless removal from private hands of the means of production will have to be the role of the C.C.F. party in this province.

Mr. IRVINE: What has that to do with the Japanese?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I was quoting it by way of illustration, because I was surprised at the word "ruthless" there. It startled me, and I went to Webster's International Dictionary and looked it up. I find that "ruthless" is there defined as "cruel, pitiless, merciless." I wonder how my hon. friends can reconcile those two points of view. I know the member for Skeena is itching to get on his feet and he can tell us. It makes it very hard to reconcile what the hon. member for Moose Jaw said in that classic speech of his in Moose Jaw last month.

How is he to reconcile this bold, ruthless removal from private hands of the means of production? I imagine that means from the farmers. They produce the odd thing. He said at that time that they were just going to take over about five per cent and were going to leave 95 per cent to these farmers here. In this case I am afraid he should have a chance to tell us how he reconciles the two viewpoints. Of course this man, Mr. Cameron, comes from my riding. I am not particularly proud of that fact.

Mrs. STRUM: Neither is he.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think he is. He tried to do a lot about it, but he could not. I should like to extend my personal sympathy to the leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It must be hard, as a matter of fact, to talk to a person in Saskatchewan and to have to reconcile Mr. Cameron's views with those of his good friends on the prairies. I feel that when he goes home at nights he must say to himself, "Forgive my enemies, but deliver me from my friends."

The hon. member for Vancouver East is also a man for whom I have a high regard, and I say that sincerely.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am now beginning to doubt myself.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think he is one of our able M.P.'s. He comes from Vancouver East. He was connected with the B.C. electric railway company there. He was a member of the union, and he and his friends were successful in making sure that this was an entirely white industry. What I particularly object to his doing is keeping his own union free from all oriental competition, but he says, "Fine; go over with Gibson in Comox-Alberni and work in the woods or work in the fisheries over there." I would hardly think that is fair. But when he was a respected alderman in the city of Vancouver I never heard him or any of his political friends there advocating that we should take Japanese or orientals of any kind into the police or the fire department. That sounds to me like rank discrimination.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear. It is tough to take, but you have to take it.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Last night he implied that possibly the evacuation of the Japanese from the west coast was prompted by war hysteria, but he would not commit himself definitely on that.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I do not think the hon. member is in any position to know anything about the matter. The people of Vancouver felt reasonably safe, I should think. I myself was living with my family on the west coast of Vancouver island in a Japanese settlement. We were particularly glad when the Canadian navy moved in there, impounded all those vessels and moved all those people away from the coast, because at that time we were patrolling the beaches there in anticipation of a Japanese landing. I know something of what actually happened out there, and I do not think it was prompted by war hysteria. I think it was an excellent job when we moved the Japanese away from the coast when we did. The secretary of the Tofino Japanese troller association, whose wife was a schoolteacher in the Japanese language school there, conveniently disappeared and went back to Japan just two months before war broke out. I can hardly bring myself to believe that this was entirely a matter of coincidence. Hon. members from Saskatchewan do a tremendous amount of talking about the Japanese. They certainly take up a lot of Hansard in talking about this matter, even more, I believe, than the British Columbia members. But I think Saskatchewan has done the least of any of the major provinces in the whole dominion with regard to assisting Canada and this government in relocating these people. It should be possible for the Saskatchewan government to offer some jobs to these Japanese people. They could pack filet mignons of horsemeat for them, or maybe they could be talked into working in these brickyards. There are also some fisheries up there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And box factories.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They could probably use the Japanese.

Mr. BENTLEY: They could, if they wanted to. It is a free country.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): These Japanese are clever people. I think they would take one look at Saskatchewan and decide, "Oh, no."

Mr. BENTLEY: That is their choice.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think I should take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Veterans Affairs on the stand which he took in this house yesterday and the stand which he has consistently taken with regard to this problem. I think he has led the whole British Columbia membership here, representing the members of all parties, with certain definite exceptions which he mentioned yesterday. I have sometimes heard rumours around this house that probably certain other cabinet ministers were just a little lukewarm about this Japanese problem in British Columbia. They have probably been listening to too much of this prattle from across the way. I should like to remind them that when the minister won his campaign in Vancouver and brought back four Liberals along with him, he won it on the basis that the Japanese were not returning to the British Columbia coast. I never heard any of the cabinet ministers or even the Prime Minister repudiate that stand during the election. We play for keeps in this game; if you win and want to keep, there are some liabilities involved and you must accept them. I might also say that the five Liberals from British Columbia are some of those who keep these hon. members in their position of drawing this motor car allowance. I should think the cabinet has had very good support from British Columbia.

I have heard some criticism of the disposal of the assets of the Japanese. I believe that in some cases they have suffered injustices and hardships in this regard. My own observations along the west coast were that their boats were, as a matter of fact, sold at inflated war prices. Their country created the war, and created the situation which raised the prices on those boats; and I think they have got out of the situation very well financially. I would, however, really urge the government that if any cases of hardship are shown, we should treat them with justice and with equity.

These restrictions on the Japanese are not bad. There are many eastern people among hon. members here, and they do not want to go to British Columbia. They are satisfied with the place where they live. If the Japanese want to re-enter the fishing business, I think they could go and fish for some of the whitefish in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I should like to see them go there. Strangely enough—and I say this in all sincerity—they would teach the people there many things about the fishing business. I have often thought that is really true. The Japanese are able fishermen and able boat builders. I have often thought, since I was in the maritimes—and I notice there is a province there where they have one Jap—the fishing industry there could very well use some of these skilled Japanese fishermen. If they go there I think they might contribute some modern methods to the fishing industry.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They do not like that.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): This distribution of the Japanese is a major national problem; and of course the C.C.F. attitude toward it is typically that of the C.C.F. Those gentlemen over there are theorists, but this is a practical problem. I appeal to all hon. members to realize that the government has a big job to do here. We want to distribute these people fairly across the dominion, and I think every member in the house ought to provide this government with time to do that. In my life I have found that time cures very many things. Today we are bickering about a problem which I believe time will solve. If we would leave them alone; if the Japanese themselves did not think they were getting such substantial support from one party in this house, they might well say, "If we disperse ourselves across Canada this whole matter will be dropped and by and by we may be able to go back to British Columbia if we still want to go there." Actually I believe if we would tell these people they would not be allowed to go back to British Columbia for five or ten years, the difficulty would be ended. Perhaps later we may be able to modify that, to temper justice with mercy; but if they were made to understand this, I believe they would scatter across Canada, settle down and become useful members of any communities to which they went. So I believe it would be in the best interests of Canada to tell them definitely they would not be allowed to go back to British Columbia for five or ten years.

Mr. IRVINE: I believe what is most lacking so far in this discussion is some sound reasons for the continuation of the order in council now before the committee. I propose to say a few words on this question, not that I think I can say anything someone else has not thought of already, but because I am deeply interested in the problem involved and I consider it my duty to express my views on one side or the other. In doing so I want to make it clear that I make no innuendoes and offer no aspersions against any hon. member who holds an opinion which may differ from my own. I have no hesitation in joining in the congratulations to the Minister of Labour on the way he has handled this matter. I understand that it was a very serious and difficult problem indeed. I would never think of myself charging the minister with any inhumanity. I know he is not inhuman. Neither do I think he would for a moment deliberately do anything unjust to anyone. I do not think that is part of this discussion. Therefore I am not going to follow the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. In the first place, he made a clever and humourous speech, which I enjoyed very much, and in the second place, the body of his remarks was directed at the C.C.F., not at the issue at all. The C.C.F. does not need any defence by me, so I shall not bother to say anything about that.

I was somewhat interested in the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster. His reasoning was strange. Indeed that is somewhat typical of those who have so far risen on the side of maintaining the present order in council, because I believe they are just as freedom loving as I am, and I believe they feel in their hearts that this cannot be justified under those principles of liberty with which this nation has been associated and which all its leaders have professed for many generations. I do not believe they can conscientiously square the continuation of this order in council with their own deep belief, and that is why their arguments are not very good.

Before I deal with these points, let me say that it is not a question of whether this or that should have been done during the war period. That has been cleared up by a number of speakers from this side of the house. We know very well that the situation was critical during the war. We know very well that no government charged with the responsibility for the protection of this nation could take any chances or afford to make a mistake. Under war conditions that may often mean that in the interests of the nation the individual has to be forgotten. I think that is true in all the countries of the world; and I have no doubt that, as a result of the action taken, many innocent people among the Japanese suffered, just as many innocent people in other parts of the world suffered through the actions of our enemies with respect to our people, the people of the United States and the peoples of other nations engaged in the war. That is all past; we all understand that. But now this is peace time; and we are asking that, since the war is over, with our enemies outside Canada, we should not continue war practices with our own citizens within Canada.

The hon. member for New Westminster took the view that he would rather see expressions of racial hatred than see man set against man, which he said would happen were we to cancel this order in council and extend to our citizens of Japanese origin the same rights we have taken unto ourselves. But strange to say, he went on to state that he had had serious struggles and fights with some C.C.F. members; and even his children at school had experienced some difficulty. That would be a man-to-man fight, I suppose. Then would the hon. member go so far as to advocate dispersal of the C.C.F. on political grounds in order to prevent a struggle which he thinks is worse than expressions of racial hatred; that is, a man to man fight? If he follows his own logic that is what he would advocate, and I know of no reason why he should not continue to do that if this principle is good. If this principle is adopted in this country no man can say where it may end. If this is a solution for a racial problem it may be accepted as a solution for a political problem, for an economic problem, for a religious problem, or for any other problem, and it is not a solution for any problem at all.

Then the hon. member went on to ask a question. I may be rushing in where angels fear to tread when I attempt to answer the hon. member when he asked: Why this profound silence on the part of a Japanese when I ask him if his greatest loyalty is not to Japan rather than Canada? Let me suppose that the hon. member for New Westminster had been an immigrant to Japan. Suppose they had taken all his goods out of his home and sent him, with his bagpipes, under guard to the top of a high mountain. Suppose they told him to stay there, told him how much he was to get for his daily work, how many hours he had to work, and all the rest of it. Then suppose a year or two later they came along and said, "Now, Mr. Reid, will you tell us to whom you owe your greatest loyalty? Is it to Canada or is it to Japan"? I am not sure the hon. gentleman would have remained silent. I think he would have replied unhesitatingly, "My greatest loyalty is to Canada, because I don't like the kind of treatment you are giving me". How does he expect a Japanese, as a human being, to give an answer different from what he himself would give under similar circumstances? So I think that very well disposes of the silence problem seems to have been bothering the hon. gentleman.

Then he went on to ask in his next question whether it was not so that Japan had a long-range plan to conquer Canada, the United States and the Pacific coast countries. I imagine she had. But I think it is also true that Germany, too, had long-range plans to conquer. Yet, so far that has not affected our attitude toward Canadian citizens of German origin. Neither do I suggest that we alter our present policy toward them. But I do say that, because the Japanese had a similar idea concerning world conquest, we should not treat them differently.

I say to my hon. friend there is only one logical conclusion to which we can come from his argument, and that is that in the one instance we deal with them on racial grounds, and that in the other we do not; that the German people are white people and that, therefore, we should accept them, while the others are yellow and that, therefore, in respect of them we must have a different rule.

Then he concludes by saying that if we pass this amendment we are virtually saying that all the Japanese must go back to British Columbia.

Mr. REID: That is where they will go.

Mr. IRVINE: That is a prophecy which may not be true. As a matter of fact, if the attitude of the majority of people in British Columbia be that of the hon. member for New Westminster, I do not believe they would want to go back. I do not know what the majority of people in that province think in the matter. However I am only expressing what I think when I vote for the amendment, and when I vote for it I do not vote to send all the Japanese back to British Columbia. Rather I am voting to give the Canadian citizen of Japanese origin the same right to stay in British Columbia that I have, the same right to stay in any other province of Canada that I have. If he has not that right, then he has not the rights of a Canadian citizen. And I want to know by what authority even this parliament dares to tamper with its own principles in respect of citizenship.

I come now to the argument advanced by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I say that so far no acceptable reason has been advanced from the government side of the house why in years of peace legislation of this kind should be continued. The Minister of Labour referred to the treatment given Canadians by Japanese. I have no doubt that that treatment was very bad, and certainly I will not try even to excuse it. But he implied in his argument that because of that practice we were justified in treating citizens of Japanese origin in a manner that would be in violation of our own accepted principles.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He never said that, though.

Mr. IRVINE: I am giving a true interpretation of his remarks.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He did not say that.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. member is there, and the record is on Hansard.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say to my hon. friend that I never implied that; and I say it sincerely.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. IRVINE: If my hon. friend did not mean to imply it, then I suggest that he ought to read his own speech. If he can find any other meaning in it, I should like to know what it is.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no objection to the inference the hon. member takes from it.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not trying to impute any wrong motive to my hon. friend; but I am saying that, at least to my mind, that is the only inference I can take from his remarks.

I say in that connection that our citizenship rights and principles must not be determined by what Japanese may do to Canadian citizens anytime, and particularly under war conditions. What we do to our citizens, no matter what their country of origin may be, must be an expression of those principles of which we boast so highly. That is the thing I want to emphasize.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs went on to say that the present treatment of citizens of Japanese origin in Canada was based on the security of the Pacific coast. That takes us back to the war situation. But the Pacific coast is a part of Canada. British Columbia is not responsible for the protection of the British Columbia coast. The government of Canada has the responsibility for the protection of that coastline, as well as the Atlantic coast. Knowing what he does about military matters —undoubtedly a great deal more than I ever knew or am likely to know—I am sure the Minister of Veterans Affairs must know very well that in the next war, if ever there be such a calamity, it may be more dangerous for Canada to have enemy aliens in Montreal, Toronto or Regina than it would be to have them in Vancouver. For if the atom bomb continues its threat to world peace, perhaps an aggressor would not even attempt to land on the Pacific coast. If we disperse these people and deprive them of their rights of citizenship, nursing in their hearts a canker of resentment against the people of Canada, then surely, if ever another war came, they would be more likely to be disloyal. And their disloyalty in a war in an atomic age might be even more serious for us if they were in the interior than if they were on the coast.

I suggest, too, that since they are human beings the Japanese will respond to human treatment, the same as we will. If we treat them as human beings we will develop in them that loyalty which some have asserted many of them have not got. I suggest, therefore, that the carrying out fully of our own principles will be the best way of solving this Japanese question. The whole question it seems to me is this: Shall we have one law for citizens of Japanese origin and another law for the rest of us? That is the real issue before parliament. And all the circumlocutions of my hon. friends opposite have been in an endeavour to side-step facing that definite issue. They cannot defend it. They do not want to defend it, because they are too honest. Yet they are retaining that thing which is an insult to their own souls and intelligence.

There can be no ifs, ands and buts when applied to the principles of freedom extended under Canadian citizenship. Every citizen must be treated equally. And as for dispersal by order in council—well, that is neither Canadian nor is it freedom, nor is it democracy, nor is it a solution of the problem we have brought upon ourselves. I notice that some of the provinces are beginning to shout to the government here, "You put these people in here for a while; you said you were going to take them out; take them out because we want to get rid of them."

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENTLEY: No, not Saskatchewan.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, I think you will have to stop this argument until I finish. It does not matter which province it is. I am not criticizing Alberta, because I think Alberta was justified in asking the government to do what it said it would do.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To fulfil their contract.

Mr. IRVINE: That does not settle anything. There are a lot of people in Alberta who would like to disperse the Social Crediters from Alberta.

Mr. LOW: They have already done that with the C.C.F.

Mr. IRVINE: There are a lot of Social Crediters who would like to disperse the C.C.F.

Mr. LOW: We have done that.

Mr. IRVINE: That will not solve the problem at all. There is no use in going back and saying that this is what should have been done ten, fifteen or twenty-five years ago. We are faced now with a difficult situation, a situation disruptive in character, a situation which is challenging our own principles. I say to the committee: Let us stay by our principles in this case. It may be that some slight difficulty may follow, but we shall be right in following them and the solution will ultimately come. But if we continue to violate our principles the problem will grow in magnitude rather than diminish.

I am arguing now not so much in the interests of our citizens of Japanese origin, although I have every respect for them, although I have every interest in them as I have in all human beings I am urging the repeal of this order in our own interests. We just cannot afford to do a thing like this. If it were merely the Japs who were involved we might be able not to say anything about it, but we are involved. It is more important to me that we do this thing in accordance with our own convictions, our own philosophy and our own democratic principles, than it is for anything else that may be considered in connection with the question.

In the next place, I am arguing for this because of the international implications which have been emphasized by several speakers, particularly by the hon. member for Kootenay West. As he pointed out, we are already pledged to respect all basic human rights, regardless of creed, colour or religion. That is the very soul of the Atlantic charter. I would not like to embarrass our representatives in the international court by making it necessary for them to defend anything of this kind, because it would be no more easy to defend it in that court than it is to defend it here. I think it is a credit to hon. members that so far they have not tried to defend it. They have not tried to give a reason why we should violate these principles of human rights, to which we have subscribed.

I suggest that the course we are now following cannot be defended logically. I am opposing it now, first, in our own interests; second, because of its international implications; and, third, because I am interested in keeping Canada's record clear and Canada's name clean. We cannot defend this course. I do not know whether we are supposed to bring up an ethical argument in parliament. I do not claim to be particularly ethical, but I think most of us like to have some claim to having certain principles from which we will not move. I believe we all have such principles and I believe we hold to them in a matter of this kind.

In conclusion, I should like to refer to a little bit of satire by one of our Canadian writers. Perhaps we can see a thing when it is put before us satirically, when the best kind of logic will not make an impression. This is an article by Bruce Hutchison which appeared in the Fress Press and I intend to quote only one small passage. In order to give point to the passage I want to tell what leads up to it. The Japanese who were sent from Canada have arrived in Japan and they have been telling the Japanese that they have come as missionaries of Canadian Christianity. By the way, this article is entitled, "Onward Christian Soldiers." They are saying, "We have come to preach to you Canadian Christianity." They go on to tell why they became missionaries. They said: "We have come because we were thrown out and kicked out—"

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, left out. The Japanese at home say, "Well, there is nothing new about that; that is what we have been doing all the time." But these Canadian Japanese say, "You do not understand Canadian Christianity," and I quote:

"Ah, but you do not understand the Christians," the missionaries will explain. You pagans persecute minorities and hate other races because you believe in it. The Christians do the same thing because they don't believe in it and constantly denounce it. It is no sacrifice for you to behave in this barbarous fashion. But for a true Canadian Christian it is a deep and bitter sacrifice. It means sacrificing all his principles and all the teachings of his religion. Therefore, it is very noble of them. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his principles for his friend."

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I have been following this debate closely, and I believe the time has come for me to participate in it and to express my viewpoint and take a definite stand on the issues involved. Yesterday, when speaking in this debate and addressing the hon. member for Moose Jaw, the Minister of Labour said it was easy for the hon. member to talk as he was talking. With that statement I disagree entirely. I do not think it ever is easy for a man to take a definite stand in a cause that is not popular, and certainly the cause of the Japanese is anything but popular at the present time. I take my stand with them, not because it is hard but because I believe in justice. I believe in the fullest expression of humanity, especially as far as minority groups are concerned.

I should like hon. members to allow their minds to range back over the years and think of how many wars have been fought in this world because of the oppression of minority groups. When you allow yourself to think along that line you will be amazed at the result of your thinking. I happen to represent a British Columbia constituency situated in the interior of the province. That does not mean to say that all my life in British Columbia has been lived in the interior. I have come into contact with the people of the Japanese race both on the coast and in the interior as much, I venture to say, as any other member of the house. I have a great deal of sympathy for the way British Columbia feels in this matter. The settlement of the Japanese has been allowed to become a provincial problem, when it never should have been. It should have been regarded as a federal problem.

In a recent debate in this house the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, on February 11, said, as reported at page 323 of Hansard:

We have a solemn responsibility towards the generations that come after us to see that we keep this Canada white.

I contend that the time for doing that is long since past if it ever existed. There was a time when such a policy might have been achieved, but it was definitely lost when the first oriental infiltration was permitted by the bringing in of cheap oriental labour because let us not forget that is why they were brought in. Today we have Chinese, Japanese, Hindus and negroes residing in Canada. We cannot get rid of them even if we would, unless we become definitely anti-social and do things of which Canadians might well be ashamed. The sooner we make the people of all these different races Canadian citizens and give them the full rights and responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizens, the better. I would make not only everyone of these peoples a Canadian citizen but make him swear allegiance to our king and make him honour and recognize our Canadian flag—when we have one. The hon. member for New Westminster said this afternoon that he had addressed a question to people of Japanese origin again and again: To what country did they owe their allegiance. I did not want rudely to interrupt the hon. member but, if he were in his seat now, I would ask him this question: Has the privilege ever been given to these people to swear allegiance to Canada?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Of course.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): If we look at this matter in a reasonable light and be realistic, if we will use these people as we would like to be used ourselves, I believe that many of our difficulties will vanish.

In the debate yesterday the hon. member for Calgary West asked a question about the Japanese working sixteen hours a day. Surely he knows that thousands and thousands of Canadian farmers are working fourteen, fifteen and sixteen hours a day because they are working for themselves. But today we have laws in Canada which prohibit men of any race from being made to work fourteen, fifteen or sixteen hours a day. I have listened carefully to the arguments put forth by hon. members from British Columbia against the Japanese and, while I do not accuse those hon. gentlemen of race prejudice, I wish they would come out into the open and admit that the question is not merely a racial one, but that it has its economic side. British Columbia objects to the presence of the Japanese because in the fishing industry, in logging and in agriculture, they hold down jobs which white men need.

I believe that a federal labour code setting forth hours of labour and standard wages for labour would go far toward solving this problem. In the past, employers of labour have been permitted to pay a lower rate of wages to an oriental than to a white man, with this result, that when work becomes scarce and men must be let out it is only natural that the employer of labour lets out the higher paid wage-earner first, and often the oriental has been permitted to keep his job because he works more cheaply. This should not be possible at all. Put them all on the same basis and a good deal of this discrimination will fade away.

During the war years I supported the action of the dominion government in handling the Japanese situation as they did and I too would like to pay my tribute to the Minister of Labour for what I consider the humanitarian and equitable way in which he tried to discharge that difficult task. I believe that the removal of the Japanese from the coastal area was a wise one. I go farther and say that their dispersal into all the provinces was a wise move, and I hope that the Canadian-Japanese for their own good will not insist on flooding back to the Pacific coast, for I for one am opposed to that. I fully agree with the policy which the Prime Minister announced on August 4, 1944, and I say, let us adhere to that policy. The war, thank God, is over now and I think hon. members will have noticed that, after the collapse of Japan, a lot of this war hysteria died down, because, after all, it was war hysteria, chiefly against the Japanese. Let us not revive or stir it up.

It is acknowledged on all sides that in this matter there is a strong division in public opinion. If we do not lose our heads, and lose our tempers, time will enable us to look at the situation in a dispassionate way and will keep us from making regrettable mistakes.

I cannot forget that in world war I the Japanese people were our allies, and monuments to Japanese who fought by our side in that great struggle and gave their lives are to be found in some of our Canadian cities.

In this more recent struggle the Japanese government supported the wrong horse and they have been made to pay for that error in judgment. I believe that they no longer constitute a menace to the peace of the world. I do not think we in this parliament should go out of our way to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children. I am sure that Canada is big enough and wise enough to take this problem in her stride, and deal with it justly and equitably; but if the continuation of this order in council is part of a move to fasten a permanent discrimination upon these people, as I think it is, then I will have none of it and will oppose it with all the power that God has given to me. As a minister of the Christian church I can do no other.

Mr. FULTON: The discussion of this order in council and the amendment moved by the C.C.F. has taken an interesting turn, and we see on the part of most speakers in that party the assumption to themselves of the quality of being the only ones who have been consistent throughout this debate in the stand they have taken. Last night the hon. member for Winnipeg North threw down a challenge to this party. He challenged us to make a declaration of policy, since, he said, we profess to be so sincere in our devotion to liberty. This afternoon we heard the hon. member for Cariboo talk about principle, and the implication of his remarks was that all others, certainly those who favour the continuation of this order in council, are "laying down their principles for their friends", while the C.C.F. is the only party that remains true to principle.

But if we look at the position with regard to this particular group of orders in council we can see what the true situation is as regards consistency. This is an emergency measure. It is one of those orders in council which are being continued as an emergency measure, and the C.C.F., which prides itself on its consistency, has asked throughout for the continuance of emergency controls. Yet when it comes to this group of controls, which does not happen to coincide with their policy, they say that we should remove them, and they introduce an amendment to bring it to an end at once. And in the face of this they say that they are the only consistent party in the house.

If these hon. gentlemen want controls ended why do they not take a consistent stand? Which way did they vote on the bill? They voted for the bill and we voted against it. By voting for the bill they automatically continue these measures. We have always pressed in this party for the discontinuance of war-time controls. Since I have been here, from 1945 on, that has been the one stand which this party has taken above all others. Every time we have taken that stand the C.C.F. have opposed us bitterly and, at times, somewhat violently.

We have contended that, the war being over, the rights and liberties of the Canadian people should be restored, and every time we have done so we have been attacked and vilified by the C.C.F., who accuse us of having certain questionable motives in our stand. What support have they given the hon. member for Lake Centre in any of his moves to have war-time restrictions removed and to have the rights of the Canadian people—for example, the right of recourse to the courts—restored to them?

The C.C.F. have never supported this move to restore freedom to the Canadian people, to take off war-time restrictions and to hurry the government along the path of restoring these liberties. We have had no support from the C.C.F. in that direction, and yet I would read the words of the hon. member for Vancouver East, spoken last night with regard to the Japanese, to be found at page 2317 of Hansard:

> The war being over, we contend that it is time that the restrictions on these people were removed, that they were allowed to take up their rights and privileges as Canadian citizens.

Unfortunately the hon. member is not in his seat at the moment. If he were I should like to ask him why it is that he confines his efforts in that direction exclusively to Canadians of Japanese origin. I think, if we look closely into the question of consistency, we shall find that the C.C.F. is the most inconsistent party in this particular regard. I wrote down some of the words of the hon. member for Cariboo this afternoon. He said: "This is peace time and we are asking that, now that the war is over, we should not continue war-time practices with our own citizens". We contended that the whole principle of Bill No. 104 was the continuation of war-time controls and we accordingly voted against the bill. The C.C.F. voted for it, but on this particular measure that party, which claims to be the only consistent party in the house, adopts the opposite attitude because it finds it not in accordance with its policies.

When we come to the consideration of this particular question under the orders in council which are now before us I think we should examine the facts of the situation, and it appears to me that here is a problem which requires to be settled on the basis of reason, namely, the problem of relocating the Japanese. It is a continuing problem. We cannot just let them all go back to British Columbia. We cannot dispossess all those people who are now doing fishing which the Japanese did before the war. We certainly cannot dispossess one lot of people, largely veterans, to put another lot of people back; nor on the other hand can we take off the orders in council and abandon the Japanese to their fate.

It seems to me that the government has to deal with this problem and to carry through this matter of relocating and resettling the Japanese in Canada. It therefore requires certain powers for the purpose, and I certainly could not find it consistent either with reason or with principle to vote that this particular order should be revoked.

In his speech this afternoon it seemed to me that the hon. member for Kootenay East was the only one of his party who recognized that problem and faced it in a manner which was consistent with the practical issues involved, and I was glad to hear him say that he recognized that not all members of other parties were motivated by race prejudice in approaching the question. Certainly the telegram read by the hon. member for Vancouver South last night did establish conclusively that the problem as it arose in the first place was not a result of one-sided action, nor was it a result of mass hysteria. It was the considered opinion of all parties in British Columbia at that time that the removal of the Japanese was in the best interests of Canada. That decision was taken deliberately as a matter of policy, and I suggest that we cannot now just revoke the order in council and leave the Japanese to shift as best they can. We have to carry that policy through to its logical conclusion and resettle the Japanese. In carrying that plan through, in carrying out the resettlement, we should not be motivated either by hysteria, nor should we allow any prejudice to enter into our decision as to how the settlement should be effected.

With deference, I should like to put forward a suggestion which I think might have some value in working out that settlement. The suggestion is very much in accordance with the idea advanced in his concluding remarks this afternoon by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and I am glad to find that he and I have been thinking along the same lines on this question.

The first fact which I think we should bear in mind in dealing with the question of resettling the Japanese is that they have not yet been assimilated; they have not yet become Canadians in the sense that you and I, Mr. Chairman, think of ourselves as Canadians. I am not trying at the moment, to apportion any blame for that fact, but I think it can be taken as a fact that they are not, as yet, like the majority of Canadians in outlook and standards.

That being so, I suggest that our policy should be directed toward bringing about conditions under which the Japanese at present in Canada can most readily be assimilated, and that is where the dispersal policy should be followed through to its logical conclusion. That is where again the hon. member for Kootenay East and myself appear to feel the same on that matter at any rate. I suggest that for a limited period—a period to be decided after investigation of the whole question and perhaps in consultation with the leaders of the Japanese groups in Canada—the limitation on their return to British Columbia should be continued, and that the Japanese should be dispersed throughout the provinces of Canada in proportion to the employment available in those provinces, and to the population of those provinces, in accordance with the total number of Japanese in Canada.

This would have two advantages. First, it would mean that British Columbia would not be called upon to reabsorb all the Japanese in Canada and, second, it would mean that there would be no resettlement in a single large community of this group of non-Canadians or of people who are not as yet assimilated in Canada. Surely experience with regard to immigration in the past has shown that it is not desirable for foreign groups to come in and settle in large community groups in Canada. They do not become assimilated. They continue their own language and their own customs, and they do not become Canadians. We passed a citizenship bill last session, and in the course of the debate on that bill it appeared to be unanimously felt by the house that the most desirable thing to bring about was that all people should regard themselves as Canadians pure and simple, and not in any way as hyphenated Canadians. This practice of settling in community groups is one which is calculated to prevent people from regarding themselves as Canadians. They will inevitably tend to regard themselves more as Japanese, or, at the best, as Japanese Canadians, if they are permitted to continue in a single community. There would thus be a twofold advantage to the policy of dispersement. It would be fair to the people of British Columbia and it would have the result that the people of Japanese origin would be more rapidly assimilated, would more rapidly become Canadians.

However, it seems to me we have to read this in the light of the admitted difficulty which is felt by all those who are considering this question, and that is that we all—and not only the C.C.F.—consider it desirable that there should be no racial discrimination, that there should be freedom and equality as between all those who live in Canada. Therefore, to continue a limitation upon the residence of the Japanese would be a denial of that principle or a postponement of the realization of that principle. That is certainly the difficulty which is present in the minds of all those of this party who are considering the question, just as much as it is present in the minds of members of the C.C.F. party. But we are prepared here to face the problem. We say that the Japanese are not as yet assimilated, that they should not be permitted again to settle in a community group. It would not be fair to them to send them all back to British Columbia and allow them to shift for themselves and it would not be fair to British Columbia to put her in a position where she may again have to absorb all those of Japanese origin.

Facing those two conflicting problems, I suggest that this is one way of reconciling the difficulties. Disperse them for a period to be fixed and let them know that if, during that period, they conduct themselves in such a manner as to indicate that they wish to become true Canadian citizens, then at the end of that period this restriction will be lifted and they will be regarded as Canadian citizens. If the period is adequate and the treatment of the Japanese is proper, it is surely reasonable to assume that they would settle down in other parts of Canada and, if they are going to become Canadian citizens, would enter into the life of the communities where they are settled and become Canadian citizens in those other provinces. When the restrictions were lifted there would therefore be no tendency for the Japanese to congregate again exclusively in British Columbia. I put that suggestion forward to the Minister of Labour as a method which he might consider in working out the final details of the policy which is now being carried on under this order in council. I suggest, however, that it would be desirable not to implement that policy by order in council but rather by a statute of the Canadian House of Commons so that the Japanese can know—

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. FULTON: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is he suggesting that we should have a quota basis for the other provinces by act of parliament?

Mr. FULTON: No, I am not suggesting that. What I am trying to do is to put forward a principle, the details of which might be subsequently worked out and on the basis of which this problem might be settled. I am certainly not saying that we should pass an act of parliament that Ontario, Quebec or Manitoba, let us say, will absorb so many Japanese. That is not the way we do things in Canada. I am surprised at the minister making that suggestion. It is obvious that the matter would require rather to be solved by consultation between the dominion and the provinces, and between the provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL: If the hon. member reads Hansard, he will find he has been talking about a quota basis.

Mr. FULTON: It is the principle I am suggesting. Application of the principle must, of course, be left to negotiation. But it is a principle which I think reconciles the two difficulties, the difficulty of imposing a limitation or restriction on persons of Canadian nationality and, on the other hand, the unfairness of allowing all those of Japanese origin to congregate again in British Columbia.

I hope that, in the rest of this debate my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party will not continue to assume for themselves either the sole rights to consistency or the sole rights to interest in the preservation of freedom and equality as between Canadian citizens.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to contribute a few words to this debate. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggested that I give an answer, yes or no, to a given question. It reminds me of that old question, "Do you still beat your wife, yes or no?" I will explain the question in my own way.

The oriental problem in British Columbia is not a new one. It is not new in Canada or, for that matter, on the North American continent. When the hon. member for Cape Breton South was speaking the other day he was telling us about the difficulties in the steel mills in the early days which were caused by the immigration at that time and the importing of large numbers of one given group, from a backward country, and throwing them into the steel mills. Then they would have to fight them in order once again to make the union work and build up conditions which were worth while living under. Years ago, along the boundary country among the miners the western federation of miners had to arm themselves with 30-30 Winchesters in order to keep out Chinese scabs. At that time the mine owners wanted to bring them in. It looks as though we are going into the same form of immigration at the present time when we allow industrialists to go over and pick up their own form of cheap labour, so that we can look for the same policy as we have had in the past.

During the depression the whole thing boiled up on the coast until it became absolutely impossible. To a large extent we have a monopoly in the fishing out there. H. R. MacMillan runs the major part of the packing companies, as he does the lumber industry out on the coast. Those packing companies played up to the Japanese. They gave them special conditions under which to live; they gave them equipment with which to work. No wonder they had good boats. I noticed the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke as though they had exceptionally good equipment, including boats in which they could sail over to Japan. Any 60 or 70-foot boat will sail over to Japan if you put enough oil in the hold.

Mr. GREEN: If I may ask the hon. member a question, is he in favour of allowing Japanese to come back and fish on the Pacific coast?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I will answer my own questions in my own good time, and when I see fit. I do not need any instructions from the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. GREEN: I was not giving instructions; I was asking a question.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I will answer it in time.

Mr. GREEN: If you are afraid to answer it, O.K.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He is afraid to answer it.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Don't use the word "afraid". I am not afraid to answer the question. I answered it very well during the time of the election. I have heard various members from the other side of the house speak as though the Japanese question was just a matter of defence. Oh, no; they could not be accused of race hatred. When I think about it I sometimes wonder if the last election was just a bad dream. That is all we had to fight on the coast, the Japanese question. The Liberal party even brought an American woman who had been in a Japanese concentration camp up to Prince Rupert to speak of the horrors she had encountered in that camp.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There are worse horrors in Prince Rupert now.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: One thing about it, that little attempt boomeranged, because she was such a hard-looking case it did not go over.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They have a harder looking case now.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: As I say, during the depression, with the companies playing up to the Japanese, giving them special concessions and at all times a better break than the white fishermen got, the white fishermen were driven down to poverty stricken levels. At that time even the halibut fleet, which is normally quite a stable industry, was driven down to the point where the men would make only $200 in the season. That condition was prevalent all through the fishing industry at that time. It became a political football. All the hatred and suffering of the fishermen were turned on the Japanese, quite consciously, because of political necessity. Now the fishermen are becoming well organized. They have their cooperatives; and what is happening now? At the last session of the provincial legislature an amendment to the cooperative act was put through, providing that fishermen on company-owned boats could not allocate their share of the catch to the cooperatives. They are paid in shares, a definite portion of the fish from the boats, and now they cannot allocate their share of the fish to the cooperatives. The large fish packing companies have declared war on them, and they are going to be driven right back into the same position they were in during the depression. They are beginning to find out where the real Japs are.

This Japanese question will not save the Liberal and Conservative parties at the next election, because they are both on the spot. We have a coalition government putting through that anti-fishing legislation. I grant that it may be Tory domination; I do not know whether the Liberals out there are weak-kneed, but that is what is happening. Furthermore, they are starting to get together in the federal field. In Skeena they are crawling into the same bed; they cannot stand on their own feet. The hon. member for Fraser Valley had better look out. The hon. member for New Westminster pointed to the terrific increase in the number of fishing licences issued since 1941. That industry has been changing; the gill net method of fishing is becoming antiquated. The struggle between the seiners and the gill netters is boiling up once again.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What does the hon. member mean by that?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Just this; that the gill net method of fishing is becoming antiquated, as I had it explained to me during the recess by the fishermen out in Prince Rupert. The point is they are going to be driven right back where they were. At the present time, thank goodness, the Japanese are not on the coast. Otherwise the fishermen would be taking out their hatred once again on those Japanese.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would you permit a question?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Certainly.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are you in favour of giving the Japanese fishing licences?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Do I still beat my wife?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I asked you a question.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I will answer the question to my fishermen, not to you. I can understand and sympathize with the position of the Minister of Fisheries, of whom I think a great deal personally. He faces a difficult problem.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about the question?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: When did you become my conscience?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I don't think you even have one.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: In the halibut fleet at the present time, for instance, the large companies are ramming in boats so fast that the independent fishermen are being squeezed to the wall. I have a letter here from the deep sea fishermen's union and, as I understand it, they are asking for that allocation per boat. They want that put through at this session of the house, because they are running into difficulties. There will be no independently owned fishing fleet on the coast, either in the salmon or in the halibut, unless the question is cleared up.

I want to just make my position clear at the present time. I believe this Japanese issue was used consciously by the large economic interests on the coast to sidetrack the main issue. It was picked up by those who had no basic idea of how to solve the problem, and they used it for their own political ends.

Mr. FULTON: Are you suggesting a solution now?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Certainly. The solution is quite clear; the fishermen take over the whole fishing industry ruthlessly, and that does not call for any apology.

Mr. FULTON: Does that settle the Japanese problem?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Yes, it settles the Japanese problem in this way, that the fishermen will control their own destiny and their own meal tickets, and will not be pushed around.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would you give the Japanese licences?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I will consult and work with the fishermen; they will control the licences and the fishing, and you will not have anything to do with the matter. That is the way to solve it. I heard the hon. member for Comox-Alberni criticize Colin Cameron for talking about taking over industry ruthlessly. We have only three basic industries in British Columbia: fishing, lumbering and mining. The fishing and lumbering are controlled by MacMillan; mining is controlled by Consolidated Mining and Smelting, and we will take it over.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And now you want the Japanese in there too

Mr. ARCHIBALD: We will solve the problem of the fishing industry by working in consultation with the fishermen, and by turning the fishing industry over to the fishermen themselves. That will solve the Jap issue, and it will take the only talking point you are capable of expressing right out of your mouth.

Mr. MERRITT: Perhaps I should say a few words on this matter, particularly in view of the speech we have just heard. The hon. member for Skeena has left no doubt in the mind of anyone in the house that he does not base his stand on this question on any of the high and moral grounds advanced by his party in support of their opinion.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I am basing it on my stomach.

Mr. MERRITT: And I respect the hon. member for being much more practical and facing facts much more clearly than his colleagues. But I want to call the attention of the committee to some of the things the hon. member has just said, and these from a member of the party of sweetness and light, who would have us think they are furthering great human ends by advancing this policy on behalf of the Japanese. Apparently the hon. member would permit the Japanese to go back to the Pacific coast and into the fishing business. At the same time he would ruthlessly dispossess white Canadians of their property.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is interpreting my words, and taking them out of their context. I said I would turn the fishing industry over to the fishermen, and take it out of the hands of H. R. MacMillan.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is not what you said.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Yes, it is.

Mr. MERRITT: We can leave it to Hansard. I wrote it down at the time, and the words I wrote were that he would ruthlessly take over the industry. He made an interesting remark to the hon. member for Fraser Valley, telling the hon. member in no uncertain terms, "You will not have anything to do with fishing licences."

So that apparently the idea of the C.C.F. is that there is room for discrimination and room for class hatred in this country, but there is no room for racial differences. I think the hon. member pretty well summed up the attitude of his party on this question.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Tell that to the fishermen.

Mr. MERRITT: I do not think it is an attitude which will have much appeal for practical men in this country.

Then, I should like to say one or two things about what other members of that party have said. Last night the hon. member for Kootenay West said that the present members in the Liberal and Progressive Conservative parties were not truly representative of the people of British Columbia. If we believed that we did not truly represent the feelings of British Columbians I do not think we would have witnessed so consistent a stand over so many years by the members of the two old-line parties, parties which, whatever one says against them, have their feet on the ground and do not always have their heads in some rosy clouds.

I do not want to take any stronger position than was taken by the hon. member for Vancouver East who, I am sorry, is not in his seat at the moment. Last night he was asked a question by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, and the discussion is reported as follows at page 2316 of Hansard:

Mr. Cruickshank: Did you object to their being withdrawn from the coast?
Mr. MacInnis: No. I took the stand—
Mr. Cruickshank: Thank you.
Mr. MacInnis: —that it was desirable and perhaps necessary because of public feeling.

If in 1942 it was desirable and necessary, because of public feeling, that the Japanese should be removed from the Pacific coast, I would not like the committee to be under any misapprehension as to the present feeling. After all, those of us who are members from British Columbia are in the best position to know it is desirable and necessary, because of public opinion, that the Japanese should not be allowed to return.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Is the hon. member trying to give the committee the impression this afternoon that all the people of British Columbia are opposed to the return of any Japanese to that province?

Mr. MERRITT: Oh, no; and I am glad the hon. member asked that question. I will say emphatically that I believe a large majority of the people in British Columbia do not want the Japanese to return to that province. I should not like to state any definite percentage, because, for instance, no Gallup poll has been taken. The hon. member and I may differ in our opinions. However I am giving my opinion, and it is that a very large percentage do not want the Japanese back.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why do they not want them back?

Mr. MERRITT: That is a good question, too. I think this afternoon the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has stated sensible and practical reasons why they do not want them back. I would commend to the hon. member who has asked the question the commonsense speech of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, which will do more to formulate a wise judgment in the mind of the hon. member than talking to his colleagues.

I might add a word to what the hon. member said. He has spoken from the intimate day-to-day point of view and has given incidents within his knowledge. I should like to call the attention of the committee to a major reason why the people of British Columbia feel the way they do. The attitude of the people of British Columbia is not confined to that province. One sees the same attitude in Australia and on the Pacific coast of the United States. It is all very well for hon. members to rise in their places and say, in such an airy fashion, that we should hate those who manage industry, but that we should love the Japanese.

The practical fact is that those who live in the van, if one may so describe it, and who immediately face the orient, have always felt a measure of insecurity and uncertainty in their position. I believe they feel it principally because the continent of Asia is heavily populated, and the standard of living of peoples on that continent is much lower than the one we follow. We know the theoretical position, carried to its ultimate, simply means a mass influx, a lowering of our standard of living and a changing of Canada from what we all want it to be to something quite different. It is not based upon any racial hatred or any such theory. It is a perfectly practical view, based upon long experience and after many examples of exactly what would happen if those airy theories were applied in the way hon. members of the C.C.F. want them applied. This would not be Canada; it would be a totally different country.

The time may come when the ideal which the hon. member has expressed, without tying it to anything practical, will be accepted throughout the world. But I say to hon. members, in all sincerity, that it is not accepted now. There is no use in trying to force that point of view upon people who do not want it. That is not the way to bring people around to one's point of view.

There is no use in bludgeoning them or criticizing them, following the tactics which some newspaper editors in the east seem to be developing. If you want to bring people over to your view you must educate them. Continue pressing your ideas upon them, in the proper democratic way; but refrain from this attempt to influence the house to do something which would be considered coercion by another minority, about whom the hon. member does not seem to think very much. I refer to the people of British Columbia who, from the practical point of view, would have to bear the brunt of what he has suggested. They are a minority in this country. This is not the way in which one deals with minorities in a democratic country. You do not just put through parliament a law which is entirely against their wishes and to which they cannot give support. If you are so advanced in your thinking as you seem to consider you are, then you should go and win over the people of British Columbia to your side. Do not come here to this chamber, which consists, in the main, of people who do not know this problem because they do not live with it, and try to get strangers to the problem to follow you, on a straight ideological basis, to a conclusion which could not be accepted by your fellow Canadians in British Columbia.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are you charging for the lecture?

Mr. MERRITT: No, I make no charge for the lecture; I make it gladly and freely and I hope it will have some effect upon the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GARDINER: The C.C.F. always charges fifty cents.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Especially on Sundays.

An hon. MEMBER: They usually get more than that.

Mr. MERRITT: I have tried to explain how I feel about this problem in the way of a lecture to my hon. friend which I hope he will take to heart. I want to try to offer, along with the other members of the old parties who have spoken in this debate, some practical answer to the problem. The suggestion I am going to make simply amplifies what has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Vancouver South.

During the forty years that we in British Columbia have been dealing with this problem we have not had a great deal of support from Canadians living east of the Rockies and who did not know the problem as we knew it. Naturally that has solidified public opinion in British Columbia against the oriental much more than would have been the case had the people there felt certain that they had the people of Canada behind them. We have always had to take a strong stand. We have always been left up in the air; we have always been uncertain as to when we would be able to check large-scale immigration. When we did succeed in checking that we were uncertain as to how long we would be able to hold it under control. So long as you live in that state of uncertainty, so long will public opinion in the west remain in the state it is in today, the state which members of the Liberal and Progressive Conservative parties have outlined.

In addition to there being a continuation of the policy of the dispersal of Japanese in Canada; in addition to their being prevented from returning to British Columbia for a period of years, we should have from the government a definite statement on oriental immigration. We should know what their policy will be and whether it is one which could be accepted in British Columbia. If we could feel sure that that policy would not be changed against the will of the people of British Columbia, then there would be a lessening of the pressure which exists and the problem of those Japanese who remain in Canada would become much easier of solution.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I think there is another way of handling the oriental problem in Canada, one which is not restrictive, one which is the reverse. If the number of white people in British Columbia were so much greater than the number of orientals there would be removed from our minds the fear that our standards might be challenged by that oriental group which unfortunately does not assimilate. You would then find us more ready to fall in with theory. With that addition I stand by what has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops in connection with a solution of this problem.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the hon. member permit a question for the purpose of obtaining information? He has said that he is endeavouring honestly to give this committee the feelings of the people of British Columbia in connection with this whole problem, as he sees it. In referring to the problem, he constantly used the word "oriental". Do I understand him to mean that there is still a feeling in British Columbia against all orientals, or is it just with respect to the Japanese? I am not expressing any views at the moment; mine are well known. I simply want to know what the situation is in British Columbia as the hon. member is seeking to report it.

Mr. MERRITT: That is a good question. The problem of trying to mix the yellow race and the white race or the white race and the black race, to be found in the United States, is not an easy one to solve. When I used the word "oriental" I was applying it to all those of the yellow race.

Mr. COLDWELL: Including Chinese?

Mr. KNOWLES: And East Indians?

Mr. MERRITT: Including Chinese; all people of a different colour from ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to restrict the discussion, but the orders in council refer only to Japanese and I do not think we should get into a wide discussion on all orientals.

Mr. MERRITT: Since the hon. member has asked the question, I should like to make it perfectly plain. There is a difference in colour which makes assimilation almost impossible, but that does not suggest that the white people consider themselves superior to those of the yellow race. I am perfectly certain that the Chinese and Japanese prefer their own colour to ours. Simply because that difference does exist in fact need not result in charges of "discrimination" or anything like that against any of them or against any person.

There is one last thing I should like to say if it will go anywhere toward satisfying the people who follow an ideological view. We must apply any ideology to our time. Right at this moment there is not an hon. member who will not admit that rent control is an unwarranted invasion of the rights of the Canadian people. I do not think the Minister of Finance who administers it would try to justify rent control on any ground other than that of avoiding the social upset which would follow the removal of restrictions on evictions.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am enjoying my hon. friend's remarks, but I think it would be better if we stayed with the orders in council instead of getting off into rent control.

Mr. MERRITT: If the minister had not interrupted me I think I would have joined up the two to his satisfaction and would have been sitting down by this time. If the deprivation of the rights of all landlords can be justified for a period of one or two years I think we can, without hurting our consciences very much, allow these orders in council to run along so long as rent control remains. It might be that as the housing situation clears up and permits of rent control being released, so will this situation clear up and these problems of principle may not then seem so important in the minds of members who are not faced with the practical consequences of the situation.

Mr. MAYHEW: Mr. Chairman, I notice it is ten minutes to six o'clock but I think I can say what I want to say in that time. In fact I would not be speaking at all, except that I have refrained for a number of years from taking part in the debates in this house on the Japanese question and because of that some of my hon. friends have probably misunderstood my position.

In 1942, after Pearl Harbor, I was one of those who wired Ottawa in connection with the picking up of the Jap fishing boats on the coast. However, that was not necessary because the navy was ahead of everybody and did an excellent job in picking up some twelve hundred fishing boats and bringing them into harbour.

I later tried to persuade the government that the Pacific coast area should be cleared of Japanese for defence purposes and I spoke on that in both 1942 and 1943. I asked that the Japanese be removed from the Pacific coast area in units of families, because I believed that was the most humane way of treating them and the best plan also so far as the government was concerned. By the removal of them in units of families into the interior of the province and to the prairies and to the central provinces they could help to feed our armies and our allies, but if we put them in concentration camps we had to feed them. One way they would have been helping us and the other way they would have been helping Japan.

Later on, when the Japanese were moved to camps along the Canadian National right of way I objected to their staying in that position because it was not a safe position. Since that time I have refrained, as I said, from taking part in the debates on this question. I refrained for two reasons. One was that Canada has treated the Japanese better than any other of the oriental races. We have permitted practical slavery among the Chinese people due to our laws, which I think should be cancelled just as soon as possible. We have not allowed them to come in with their wives, nor have we allowed the Hindus to come in with their wives. But the Japanese were allowed to bring their wives in and to set up homes and live like the rest of us, although they have failed to do that in a number of places.

When our security commission wanted to move the Japanese people to other provinces in Canada, what did we find? The other provinces immediately started bargaining with the security commission for these Japanese. They said, yes, you can move in men who are capable of working and earning a living, provided that, when the war is over, you move them out again. Furthermore, that was practically the attitude of all the provincial authorities and we have seen the same attitude in other places. The hon. member for St. Paul's said in this house that no Japanese would come to the city of Toronto if he could avoid it. The mayor of this city is reported to have said that no Japanese are going to come to Ottawa, and other people in responsible places have said the same thing. What has that meant? It has meant that the rest of Canada is trying to put British Columbia in the position where she should shoulder the whole blame, and I refuse to do that. They are trying to make out, because we in British Columbia say we do not want the Japanese back, that the people of British Columbia are un-Christian and a heathen people, implying that people in this part of Canada are all saints. I say, let the people in the other parts of Canada come forward and say: We will not force anything on you, but we will welcome these Japanese people and treat them as Christians, thereby proving our Christianity. I am quite sure that British Columbia will then say the same and will go as far as they will in our Christian treatment of the Japanese. One Christian act never made a Christian, and one act of felony never made a felon, but if people in other parts of Canada will adopt that principle of Christianity and invite the Japanese and treat them as they say they want British Columbia to treat them we shall not have any difficulty in handling the Japanese.

I had a good deal I wanted to say, but I will be content with what I have said.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 24, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Third report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Breithaupt.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL UNDER EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish to table copies in English and French of orders in council, including minutes of council and of the treasury board, passed under the authority of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, for the month of March, 1947, and copies in French for the month of February, 1947.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

CONCURRENCE IN PROPOSAL FOR TOLL CHARGES

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In view of the fact that the St. Lawrence seaway agreement has been resubmitted to the United States congress for approval, it is felt that it would be useful to provide a brief statement of the present position for the information of members of the house.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin agreement was signed on March 19, 1941. Since that time the agreement has been regularly submitted to congress, but has never been approved. In 1946 the senate foreign relations committee, after extensive hearings, made a favourable report on the bill but the matter never came to a vote in the senate.

The Canadian government was recently approached by the United States authorities regarding the possibility of reaching agreement in principle that the seaway be made self-liquidating through an agreed system of tolls the details of which could be worked out at a later date. The Canadian government has now concurred in principle with the proposal to make the St. Lawrence seaway self-liquidating by means of toll charges subject to the conclusion of arrangements satisfactory to both governments for the implementation of this principle.

[Later]:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): The minister referred to an agreement which had been made with respect to the seaway agreement. Can the correspondence be made available?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The consent of the United States government would be required. I am not sure how much of this was covered by correspondence. I know that there were negotiations which were conducted orally between the United States ambassador and the Department of External Affairs here, and there were other negotiations conducted orally between our ambassador in Washington and the state department there. There possibly has been an exchange of notes; if there has been, they will of course be tabled.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister referred to an agreement in principle on a system of tolls. If there is an agreement could we have its exact terms?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was a statement made that Canada would not object to the principle of tolls provided they could be arranged in such a way that there would be genuine benefit to transportation in a reduction of charges by the construction of the seaway. I am not sure that there was a formal exchange of notes, but if there was I shall be glad to see that the notes are tabled.

Mr. ADAMSON: Was the legislation introduced in congress in the form of a bill, or in the form of a treaty? Will it require a two-thirds majority or a simple majority?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should not like to express an opinion as to what is required constitutionnally, but my opinion is that a bill has been introduced.

EAST INDIANS

FRANCHISE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—EXCHANGE OF TELEGRAMS BETWEEN OTTAWA AND NEW DELHI

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There is a statement I should like to make to the house in explanation of the fact that a release to the press was made this morning at eleven o'clock of an exchange of telegrams between Ottawa and New Delhi with respect to the amendment of the Franchise Act of British Columbia and its effect upon the franchise of East Indians. The reason the release was made this morning instead of being communicated first here in the house was that it was desired to have it released simultaneously here and in New Delhi. Because of the difference in time even eleven o'clock this morning meant something like 9.30 p.m. in New Delhi. The telegrams are as follows:

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent,
Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Ottawa.

I would like to convey to Prime Minister of Canada, to Premier of British Columbia, and to yourself, my appreciation and thanks for action taken by legislative assembly of British Columbia in passing bill enfranchising Indians. I hope this is forerunner of increasingly friendly relations between Canada and India.

Jawaharlal Nehru,
Minister for External Affairs and Commonwealth Relations, India.

To which the following reply was sent:

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru,
Minister for External Affairs and Commonwealth Relations,
New Delhi.

Greatly appreciate your kind telegram regarding enfranchisement of Indians in British Columbia which has resulted from action by legislative assembly of that province. I join with you in hope that friendship between India and Canada will be strengthened by this action.

Louis S. St. Laurent,
Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. CHURCH: I take it from the Hindu statement with respect to votes for these Hindus in British Columbia that the government is automatically recognizing the new Nehru provisional Indian government.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORT OF AUDITORS REFERRED TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the report of George A. Touche and Company, auditors of the Canadian National Railway system for the year ended December 31, 1946. Copies in English are being distributed to the members this afternoon and I expect to be able to table the French edition in a day or two. By leave of the house I move:

That the report to parliament of George A. Touche and Company, auditors of the Canadian National Railway System, for the year ended December 31, 1946, tabled this day, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 154, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. JAENICKE: Mr. Speaker, on the 13th January, 1947, the judicial committee of the privy council decided that the dominion parliament may, in the exercise of the wide amplitude of power conferred by section 101 of the British North America Act, vest the Supreme Court of Canada with final and exclusive civil and appellate jurisdiction within and for Canada and may accordingly deny any appeal to his majesty in council either from the supreme court or from any provincial court and regardless of whether the matter in question is within the exclusive legislative authority of the dominion or of the provincial legislatures.

The purpose of the present bill is to give effect to this decision of the privy council, and also to a previous decision respecting appeals in criminal matters, namely, British Coal Corporation v. the King in 1935.

Section 54 of the Supreme Court Act, which it is proposed to repeal by this bill, reads as follows:

54. The judgment of the court shall, in all cases, be final and conclusive, and no appeal shall be brought from any judgment or order of the court to any court of appeal established by the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, by which appeals or petitions to His Majesty in council may be ordered to be heard, saving any right which His Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of his royal prerogative.

The right of appeal to His Majesty in council has been regulated in certain statutes of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of which two are important: the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, and the Judicial Committee Act, 1844. Both these acts are proposed to be repealed by this bill. The act of 1833 recites that:

. . . from the decisions of various courts of judicature in the East Indies and in the plantations, colonies and other dominions of His Majesty abroad, an appeal lies to His Majesty in council.

And proceeds to regulate the manner of such appeal. The act of 1844 recites that:

. . . the judicial committee, acting under the authority of said acts (the act of 1833 and an amending act) hath been found to answer well the purposes for which it was so established by parliament, but it is found necessary to improve its proceedings in some respects for the better dispatch of business and expedient also to extend its jurisdiction and powers.

The first section of the act of 1844 enacts that it shall be competent to Her Majesty by general or special order in council to:

. . . provide for the admission of any appeal or appeals to her majesty in council from any judgments, sentences, decrees or orders of any court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad.

This bill is in accordance with the decisions of the privy council here referred to, which themselves were based on the provisions of the Statute of Westminster, 1931.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

REPATRIATION OF CANADIANS FROM JAPAN

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

What public moneys have been expended or advanced to repatriate Canadian civilians from Japanese prison and concentration camps?

Mr. GLEN: The actual amount expended to date by the immigration branch in payment of accounts received is $73,780.04.

"HOUSING PROGRESS ABROAD", BI-MONTHLY REVIEW

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many copies of each issue of Housing Progress Abroad, Bi-monthly Review, are printed and issued by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

2. How many people are employed to compile and edit this review?

3. What is the total monthly salaries, or wages, of the above employees?

4. What is the total cost of printing and mimeographing this review?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. During 1946 five issues of "Housing Progress Abroad" were mimeographed (March 1, May 1, July 15, September 10 and November 7) averaging three hundred copies per issue.

2. One person was employed to compile and edit this review with part time assistance from other employees.

3. As nearly as can be estimated the total monthly salaries paid to compile and edit the review would not exceed $200.

4. $312.50 for 1946. This amount is made up of the cost of paper, stencilling and mimeographing.

WAR ASSETS—WOMEN'S SHOES AND SOCKS

Mr. FRASER:

1. Did war assets corporation, eastern division, receive within the last two months, about 5,000 pairs of women's white socks and about 15,000 pairs of women's oxford shoes?

2. If so, from what branch of the armed services were these received?

3. Will these socks and oxfords be sold by auction or through the firms that manufactured same?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No. The eastern division (maritime region) of War Assets Corporation, during the last two months, received, on national distribution, no women's white socks and only 2,553 pairs of women's oxford shoes.

2. Department of National Defence (Army).

3. No. They will be sold to jobbers, wholesalers, and direct buying retailers.

PEACE TREATIES

Mr. PROBE:

1. With what enemy countries during world war two has Canada signed peace treaties to date?

2. Will these treaties be presented to parliament for ratification? If so, when?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Italy, Roumania, Hungary and Finland.

2. It is anticipated that the treaties will be presented to parliament for approval at an early date, dependent on progress made with urgent legislation which must be given priority.

WEST NOVA SCOTIA REGIMENT

Mr. WINTERS:

1. Where are the headquarters of the West Nova Scotia Regiment?

2. For military purposes, is Halifax considered to be in the west Nova Scotia area?

3. Who is the commanding officer of the West Nova Scotia Regiment, when was he appointed, and where does he live?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Kentville, N.S.

2. Yes.

3. Lieutenant-Colonel T. M. Powers; appointed: 1st April, 1947. Resides at Halifax, N.S.

INDIANS AND ESKIMOS—CITIZENSHIP

Mr. CHURCH:

Has any action been taken to give by grant of letters patent to the Indians and Eskimos of Canada under the prerogative powers of the sovereign full citizenship in Canada, and to include their right to all social services now extended to all citizens of this country?

Mr. GLEN: Indians and Eskimos are natural born Canadian citizens and enjoy, subject to the disabilities and liabilities provided for in the Indian Act, all the rights and privileges of such citizenship; as well they enjoy certain special rights and privileges under the said act not enjoyed by other citizens. It is understood this matter will be the subject of consideration by the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

WEYMOUTH, GROSSES COQUES, BELLIVEAU'S COVE, ST. BERNARD, N.S., MAIL SERVICE

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has the contract for conveying mail from Weymouth, Grosses Coques, Belliveau's Cove and St. Bernard, Nova Scotia, been up for renewal and have or will tenders be called for, stating date?

2. Who are the tenderers, stating the amounts?

3. Has the contract been let, and if so, to whom and at what price?

4. Have or will returned men be given preference?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. As the services of the contractor are satisfactory and the contract rate reasonable, arrangements have been completed for the renewal of the contract for a period of four years under the existing terms, dating from the 1st July next.

2, 3 and 4. See answer to No. 1.

NORTHERN WEATHER STATIONS—PERSONNEL

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Have steps been taken to recruit Canadian personnel for the projected far northern weather stations?

2. If so, what salaries are being offered to (a) officials; (b) senior technicians; (c) junior technicians?

3. What salary schedules are being offered by the United States for similar positions at the same weather posts?

4. What other inducements, if any, are offered (a) by Canada; (b) by United States?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes.

2. (a) $4,500, officer in charge; $3,300, forecaster; (b) $2,580; (c) $1,980.

3. Information not available.

4. (a) $1,200 isolation allowance; free board and lodging; all essential winter clothing and equipment; (b) information not available.

GRATUITIES TO RED CROSS PERSONNEL WITH OVERSEAS SERVICE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has anything been done since last session to grant gratuities and other benefits to the Red Cross personnel who served overseas in the last war since it was before the 1946 committee on veterans affairs?

2. Will any action be taken in the matter?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. No.

2. This question relates to matters of policy and it is not the practice of the government to disclose policy in giving answers to questions.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

MILITARY SERVICE—ALIENS—RIGHT TO NATURALIZATION

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. How many aliens during the period of the war (a) received notice of call up; (b) thereafter agreed to serve in the Canadian army; (c) thereafter refused to serve on the ground that they were aliens?

2. Was an alien who refused to serve required to sign an undertaking that in doing so he was forever deprived of the right to be naturalized as a British subject?

3. If so, how many signed such an undertaking?

4. Have any of said aliens who declined to serve been naturalized since May, 1945 as (a) British subjects; (b) Canadian citizens?

5. If so, how many in each category?

6. Has consideration been given to allowing such aliens who signed such declarations to become naturalized?

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

DISCOUNT ON CANADIAN BONDS AND STOCKS IN UNITED STATES MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question. Yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) inquiring as to what steps the government proposes to take to cope with the increasingly adverse and critical exchange position as between Canada and the United States of America. The minister's reply was indefinite, and I now ask him to make a full statement to the house, informing us of the action which the government proposes to take to remedy this situation.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): The minister's answer is exactly what it was yesterday. That is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He is an isolationist.

Mr. COCKERAM: Mr. Speaker, this is twice the minister has refused to answer the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COCKERAM: No "order" at all. I have a right to speak in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COCKERAM: The minister has declined to answer the question and has reverted to his usual facetiousness. I wanted an answer by Abbott the minister, not Abbott of Abbott and Costello.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ABBOTT: He did not like the answer yesterday and could not think of a come-back quick enough.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has answered the question.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY RESPECTING AUTHORIZATION FOR ADMISSION OF EUROPEANS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour this question: is special permission being granted to any other manufacturer in Canada to bring in workers from Europe, under the present immigration regulations?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My understanding is that there is, although I have not the figures in front of me. I shall be glad to give them to my hon. friend.

Mr. COLDWELL: May we have the facts?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, surely. I meant to have brought the memorandum in with me, but I forgot to do so. I met a delegation and did not leave them until the first house bell rang.

[Mr. Cockeram.]

BUTTER

SUGGESTED SHIPMENT TO BRITAIN OF SUPPLY IN STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Will he be prepared to do something to provide the people who are suffering in Great Britain with some of the butter we have in storage? I should like an answer.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is not as much butter in storage in Canada as there has been on previous occasions. It will eventually all be required here. But I will take into consideration the suggestion made, and I may have something to say later.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES IN ARMED SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if the figures given by Arthur Blakely in a dispatch in the Montreal Gazette of today showing that there are 18,000 civilian employees in the army, 5,997 in the Royal Canadian Air Force and 8,131 in the navy, are correct?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): No; they are not correct. What the Gazette has given are the figures for December 31, 1946. At March 31, 1947, the number of civilians employed in the army was 11,535 instead of 18,000; for the R.C.A.F. it was 3,015 instead of 5,997 and for the navy it was 5,581 instead of 8,131. So instead of a total of 32,128, the total is 20,131, or a reduction of 11,997 or 37 per cent in the last four months.

ST. GEORGE'S DAY

CELEBRATION IN TORONTO—TRIBUTE TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would call your attention and that of the four leaders in the house to the fact that St. George's day was celebrated yesterday. I waited for the leaders to speak, but nothing was said. There is a St. George's day celebration in my city today, and at this time I should like to pay tribute, as a private member of the house, to what Great Britain did in the war, and what they have suffered.

They starved themselves at that time, and they are starving themselves today to help feed their enemies.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REGINA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BROADCAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue what decision the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has come to in reference to the request of the government of Saskatchewan for a ban against certain programmes put on by the Regina Chamber of Commerce, on the ground that they were of a political nature, dealing as they do with private enterprise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows perfectly well that the purpose of a question is to get information from the government, not to give it to the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what the question did.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the hon. member do that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is my question, Mr. Speaker. I asked what the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is going to do with regard to the objection raised by the government of Saskatchewan, the objection being that the broadcasting of—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member has put his question.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): I have had no notification of the question, but the matter will be given consideration and an answer made in due course.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask this further question of the Minister of National Revenue? In view of the fact that the broadcasts to which the hon. member for Lake Centre referred are practically political broadcasts put on by a non-political organization, and the further fact that the next one goes on on Sunday, will he look into the matter and inform the house so that action may be taken before Sunday—if these are illegal broadcasts?

Mr. McCANN: If the hon. member is anxious to listen to the broadcasts, we shall try to let him know in sufficient time, so that he may do so.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not want to listen to it.

Mr. McCANN: It is the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that political broadcasts are not to be dramatized on Sunday.

Mr. McIVOR: Or any other day.

Mr. McCANN: If it is considered that this is a dramatization of a political subject, then I am quite sure it will be banned.

Mr. COLDWELL: Even by a chamber of commerce.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

HIGH COMMISSIONER TO INDIA—APPOINTMENT OF HIGH COMMISSIONER TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. BRADETTE: Once a day.

Mr. GRAYDON: I could ask a lot more.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Put it on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is about the only contribution the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson) can make. From time to time he introduces the same theme. However, I am not easily discouraged. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Canadian High Commissioner to India has left Canada as yet. I asked this question some time ago, and the minister indicated he had not yet left. Has the minister any further information in the matter?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the High Commissioner to India was in early this week, either Monday or Tuesday, to take leave of me just before proceeding to his post. He told me the date he was embarking, but I would not venture to repeat it from memory. He was in, however, to take official leave before proceeding to occupy his post.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask whether the Indian appointment has been made of a high commissioner to Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: When the government is notified officially of the appointment the announcement will be made in the house, without any delay.

Mr. GRAYDON: There has been none yet.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; no official announcement has been communicated to the government as yet.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

REFERENCE TO CONTROL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport with respect to a motion moved by him yesterday and passed. Since when has the sessional committee on railways and shipping been owned, operated and controlled by the government?

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night it was considering the schedule to the bill and orders in council 946, 251, 1665, 469 and 7355, along with an amendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. STIRLING: The question before the committee is whether the five orders in council which have to do with Japanese in Canada should be continued for the life of Bill 104, roughly another year. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw suggests that P.C. 946 be deleted. P.C. 946 is the order in council which empowers the minister to exercise certain control over the movement of Japanese in Canada. It is obvious that if that order in council were deleted from Bill 104, no such power would continue, any settlement still being operated by the government would cease, any money being paid for the subsistence of Japanese in Canada would cease to be paid, and there would be nothing to prevent Japanese from moving about Canada at will.

The Minister of Labour referred in passing to the fact that an administrative order had been passed recently which modified order in council 946. That administrative order No. 5, new series, begins by describing the coastal area. I take it that the description which follows is the description of what was hitherto known as the restricted area.

Mr. MITCHELL: As the protected area.

Mr. STIRLING: The boundaries are the same?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. STIRLING: It sets out for the purposes of this order the boundaries of the restricted area. The order then goes on to say:

> (a) enter or reside in the coastal area; or
>
> No person of the Japanese race shall
>
> (b) enter the province of British Columbia; or
>
> (c) travel a distance of more than fifty miles within the province of British Columbia; or
>
> (d) if resident in any place in the province of British Columbia, take up residence elsewhere in the province of British Columbia;
> unless such person has obtained a permit in writing to do so from a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

So that any restriction on the movement of Japanese which had hitherto been applied under order in council 946 ceases east of the rockies. It seems to me that it would have been a simple matter to deal with these five orders in council on their merits, realizing that they are merely for the purpose of carrying on certain powers for a limited period. However, hon. members have seen fit to open up the whole Japanese question and to debate the whole issue, and that being so I feel it is necessary to restate once more in as few words as possible the position which I take on behalf of those whom I represent.

Those whom I represent inhabit that portion of British Columbia lying immediately east of the restricted area. Long before the war a certain number of Japanese, perhaps between five and seven hundred, had resided there for a considerable time. It is not easy to say exactly what the number is today.

Mr. MITCHELL: 6618.

Mr. STIRLING: I am speaking of the area which I represent.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, I am sorry.

Mr. STIRLING: The best check I have been able to make is to watch the issuance of ration cards in the last few years. The last figure I have for the district of which Kelowna is the centre is 665. At the beginning of the session I put on the order paper certain questions in connection with the number of Japanese residents, and in reply I received certain figures which have since been modified somewhat. As of January 31 there were 84 Japanese in the restricted area of British Columbia. I am given to understand that these were made up of infirm and sick persons in institutions and Japanese who had married white people and who were permitted to continue to reside in the coastal area. In the New Denver departmental project, one of the Japanese settlements in the southern interior, there were 949 persons. Those are the figures given to me and which appeared in Hansard at the beginning of February. Elsewhere in the interior of British Columbia there were 5,727 Japanese.

I suggest that that is altogether too high a number of Japanese to expect British Columbia willingly to accept if the solution of the Japanese question is to depend upon their distribution throughout the nine provinces. As I pointed out, in the one portion of the Okanagan valley from which I come a total of 665 ration cards were issued to Japanese. In the mining city of Greenwood, whose population has sunk to about one-tenth of what it was forty years ago, a settlement was arranged and paid for by this government, but I have not been able to get the exact number of Japanese located here. Besides that, there is a total of between 5,000 and 6,000 in what might virtually be described as one-quarter of the province of British Columbia. It is obvious therefore that that province is being asked to assume a larger part of the total than is reasonable. The province with the largest number of Japanese at the present time is Ontario, and that figure is in the neighbourhood of 7,000, between 7,000 and 8,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just under 7,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Then one-quarter of British Columbia, in the southeastern portion, is asked to accommodate, to retain, pretty nearly as many as the whole province of Ontario, and that surely is not reasonable. I consider that those whom I represent, suffering as they have from this Japanese intrusion, have taken an extremely reasonable and restrained view of the matter. It should be remembered that even before the restricted area was set up by the British Columbia security commission, Japanese were beginning to trek out of what would be described as the restricted area, and in the Okanagan valley as well as in the valleys neighbouring thereto the Japanese population began to increase in considerable numbers.

It is true that the British Columbia security commission accepted the view of the inhabitants of those towns that as these people had moved out of the restricted area it was reasonable that they should be dealt with by the commission and put into the restricted areas which they set up, the camps or settlements or whatever they were, and to a large extent they were so removed.

To place the matter in more or less official wording, as from those whom I represent, I wish to quote a resolution which was adopted by the Okanagan and main line associated boards of trade meeting in Revelstoke in January. The text of that resolution was:

That this association point out to the dominion authorities the danger of an influx of Japanese into the interior of British Columbia, following the expiry of the Emergency Powers Act on March 31, and urge legislation to prevent such a situation developing.

At that time the executive of the Kelowna board of trade wrote a letter similar to that which was addressed by the other boards of trade to the Prime Minister. I want to read a couple of sentences from that letter:

We have been advised that after March 31, 1947, all restrictions on the movement of Japanese in Canada will be removed and we are writing at this time to ask what action is being taken to implement the promises and assurances given by various government department heads that the Japanese would never again be allowed to congregate in one area. We strongly recommend that some government action should be taken to ensure that these people are evenly distributed, on a per capita basis, across Canada or some plan that will prevent them from again congregating in small areas in British Columbia. The people of this part of the Okanagan consider that there are already too many Japanese in this area and are most emphatic that no more be permitted under any circumstances. It is felt by this board that the government has had sufficient time to have formulated some plan, and I would respectfully request that we be informed of this at once. If nothing has been done, I would request that we also be informed of this.

To that, the replies from Ottawa appear to have been non-committal. The British Columbia cabinet ministers, including Premier Hart, replied sympathetically. Attorney General Gordon Wismer had written a strong supporting letter. That places the situation, so far as those whom I represent are concerned, in as succinct a light as I can put it.

The basis of their objection to the further intrusion of Japanese into that area is that they do not consider that the Japanese are assimilable. There are two courses which may follow the return of the Japanese to those areas. One is that they may nest themselves in cells, and that, I believe, the majority of Canadians who think realize is not a desirable way to deal with the future unity of this country. The other one is that there will be assimilation, that there will be intermarriage, that there will be children born of a type different from either of the two races who go to make up the marriage. Surely, looking at the world all over for two centuries past, there have been a sufficient number of dreadful examples of what has resulted from the creation of an Eurasian cast.

Mr. DAVID CROLL: I am enough of a realist on this particular question to recognize that this is a vexatious problem in British Columbia, but the implications concern all of us in Canada, and for that reason we have a responsibility to help British Columbia to solve the problem. It is not enough for us merely to discuss it; we have to do something about it. It is our duty to see that each of the provinces carries out its responsibility.

I appreciate that the great concentration of Japanese in British Columbia was unfortunate. The Japanese were not entirely responsible for that. They were brought there to a great extent. In any event, the concentration led to discrimination, to persecution in some instances—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Where?

Mr. CROLL:—both on racial grounds and sometimes on security or on economic grounds.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): In fairness to British Columbia the hon. member should cite those instances of persecution; for certainly there has never been any charge of persecution in our dealings with the Japanese.

Mr. CROLL: I have no instances of persecution at hand with me.

Mr. GREEN: Why say it, then?

Mr. CROLL: Instances have been brought to my attention from time to time, but I have not got them here at the moment. Looking at the picture generally, I do not think there can be any denial of it, but if the hon. member says it did not happen, perhaps he is in a better position to know.

Mr. GREEN: You just don't know the picture; that is the trouble.

Mr. CROLL: With respect to the government's position on dispersal, it has been charged, and I admit that it was harsh and in many instances the Japanese have said that it was cruel. But it is argued that it was necessary in the public interest. As a matter of fact I think dispersal has had a beneficial effect, because it has introduced the Japanese to the rest of Canada. For a long time they thought that British Columbia alone was Canada, and it has introduced Canada to the Japanese. They have been accepted; in many instances they have been welcomed. They have set up new homes; they have started their lives anew. Yesterday the hon. member for New Westminster quoted the New Canadian as saying that the Japs are advising their people that dispersal is in their own interest, and if my voice is of any use at all, I too think it is in their own interest. I agree with those who advise that course of action, but I am not at all convinced, as are other hon. members of this committee, that if this restriction is lifted the Japs will immediately flock back to British Columbia. There are just as many fish in the Atlantic, I am told, as there are in the Pacific.

Let me refer to an article which appeared yesterday in the Toronto Star, written by Edward Yoshioka, a young man who studied at Emmanuel college in Toronto and had to return to Vancouver to be ordained. In part he says:

> It does not seem right that Canadians have to go through all that.

He has to have a permit in order to go to Vancouver. He says:

> My parents even had to get permits just to travel from Kelowna to Vancouver to attend my ordination.

The paper goes on to say that he is the winner of three prizes this year for theological studies. He was born twenty-four years ago in Vancouver, of Japanese parents. His father, Reverend Yoshinosuke Yoshioka, is a United Church minister at Kelowna. He came to Canada in 1919 on a scholarship won in Japan. He also studied in Emmanuel college. These are the significant words. Speaking of Ontario and the university of Toronto particularly, where he completed his studies, he said:

> It has been wonderful here, and even during the war not one unkind incident occurred. Of course, conditions are more ideal here, but if only people would realize that though we may look different, we are just as good Canadians as they are, then life would be happier for everyone. These regulations and restrictions really don't work severe hardship, but it's the principle of the thing.

That is my theme too. I could go along with the government during the war by backing the action that they took because they felt it was in the national interest and a matter of national security. They made a good case on that point; but in time of peace I see no justification for this order in council. On the grounds of principle I protest, because this puts an abnormal restraint on a Canadian citizen. It is tinged with racial discrimination and must outrage the conscience of all Canadians. What is more, this is a precedent, a precedent which will plague us for many years to come. So far as government policy is concerned today it is the Japs; tomorrow, well, who knows. Therefore we must be on guard and be awake to the dangers inherent in this order in council.

It is well to call the attention of the committee that racial discrimination is a phobia. It is just as essential to control as is atomic energy, because it too can destroy but from within. I am impressed by the speeches that were made here by the various members from British Columbia. No one sitting here and knowing the men who spoke could be less than impressed.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): How much impressed were you by the member for Skeena?

Mr. CROLL: I am afraid I took in too much territory. In any event let us forget the racial part of it. I am prepared to forget the economic part of it. One distinguished member of the committee put it on the basis of security. He said: "We shall make sure this does not happen in British Columbia once again." The committee was impressed by that argument. Let me prick the conscience of the committee. A hundred and thirty-one Japs served in the Canadian army. A hundred and thirty of them were Canadian born; one was a naturalized Jap. Some of them were wounded, and I believe some of them were decorated. We deny them the right to go back to British Columbia, to go back to a particular zone, though they may have come from that zone. That is going a very long way, and I point out to the committee how serious a matter this is. Certainly we are ahead of the United States with respect to that particular confinement. The most obnoxious racial laws which were ever passed in any country in the world, which were passed in nazi Germany, exempted for a time soldiers who fought on the battle front. Yet in endorsing this order in council we go farther than they ever went. I do not compare my government with them; I do not intend to make that comparison with any other government in this country, but on this Japanese question in all the democratic countries in the world we are now the foremost in racial discrimination. There is no rhyme or reason in refusing to these men, who served and fought for this country, the right to go where they like in Canada, though there may be administrative reasons for doing otherwise with respect to other people. I am whole heartedly and everlastingly opposed to discrimination on the basis of race or creed, or to any other discrimination, I feel that there is enough unofficial discrimination without my giving approval to what appears to me to be official discrimination.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall not detain the committee long, but I cannot let the previous speaker's words pass without an answer. Originally it was my intention to get the views of a cross-section of the committee but when words such as "persecution, harsh and cruel" are used, and when this country is described as the foremost in the world when it comes to racial discrimination, I cannot let these words go unchallenged. It is all very well for an hon. member to rise in his place and make statements of that kind, but they should be backed up. In cold print I wonder what it would look like in Germany or in Russia. I know something about racial discrimination, because I visited these countries. I wonder how it would look in Great Britain or in South Africa. That is not the language to use in describing a movement of this kind, for the carrying out of which I have been charged with the responsibility. Let me say to my hon. friend that I do not take second place to him or to anybody in the country when it comes to treating my fellowmen in a humane way.

Mr. NICHOLSON: So long as they are not Japanese.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will my hon. friend wait just a minute? I come from a country which is pre-eminent in that regard, which has given shelter to people of all races and creeds.

Mr. MacNICOL: As no other country ever did.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, as no other country ever did. Let me say this to the hon. member for Spadina. Like myself, he was not born in Canada. The only nations in the history of the world that ever fought for a principle were the nations comprising the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. MacNICOL: And they sacrificed everything for it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course they did. And when they accuse this government, or this nation at the head of which this government stands, of persecution, of being cruel, of being foremost in the policy of racial discrimination, the charge is not true, Mr. Chairman; and nobody knows that better than the hon. member for Spadina. This whole policy has been conducted in a manner which stands out preeminently, when one considers the movement which is necessary under war conditions of certain people of certain racial origins. I saw part of the liquidation of the Kulaks in Russia not far from where my hon. friend was born. I was in Germany when Hitler put over his revolution. I was in that part of the world when the Turks sent the Greeks from Asia Minor into Greece. I have been in most of those countries, and I think I know something about what persecution is and what cruelty is. Our policy was investigated by a representative of the Japanese government. I think it was done by the Swiss or the Spanish, but it does not make much difference which it was. The point is that the policy was investigated and no complaint was found. I should like to know of any other government in the world which, when these people went back to Japan on a voluntary basis, would have paid their fares and given each grown-up $200 and each child $50. I should like to know of any other country which would have moved these people and taken care of them as they were taken care of under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour. Let me say this to my hon. friend, with all the sincerity of which I am capable. I believe that our policy is in the best interests of the Japanese people themselves. My hon. friends over here who have been critical—

An hon. MEMBER: What about over there?

Mr. MITCHELL: All right; my hon. friend over here too, but he was at the war and is in a somewhat different position from that of some of my hon. friends.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I think every veteran in this house should stand up and repudiate that statement. There is no question of our loyalty. We had members in the forces. We served.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just wait a minute. I want to say to my hon. friends that they have not got a first mortgage on the defence of liberty and freedom.

Mr. FULTON: They think they have, and are trying to foreclose it.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the trouble with them. They think they have a first mortgage. We have sat here for a day and a half and listened to some harsh criticism, and we have taken it.

Mr. MacNICOL: You have not replied to the hon. member for Spadina.

Mr. MITCHELL: The trouble with my hon. friends is they are so self-religious that they think they are the only people who are right; and when it comes to the expression of an opinion different from their own, they just cannot take it.

Mr. MacNICOL: You should reply to the hon. member for Spadina.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say this. Before the interruptions took place—

An hon. MEMBER: Make way.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend does not need to try to be funny, because he is funny enough anyway. Let me say that I would have felt in much better humour, if I can put it on that level, if the hon. member for Cariboo, who is an old friend of mine, and some of the other hon. gentlemen—with all the trials and tribulations which have been the lot of the Department of Labour in the past five or six years—could have stood up in their places and said they had formed committees in their communities east of British Columbia to receive these people of Japanese race and get them settled there. I should have felt in a much better frame of mind if they could have done that.

The hon. member for Victoria probably made the best speech, and the shortest one, on this problem. It reflected the basic principle of Christianity in everyday life. I think this—and I think it sincerely, Mr. Chairman—that our policy has been in the best interests of the Japanese. The hon. member for Spadina vindicated that today when he said he had read—I think it was in the Toronto Star—about a minister of the gospel of the Japanese race who spoke in glowing terms of conditions in Ontario. I do not have to live in British Columbia—I sometimes think, thank goodness.

Mr. MacNICOL: You cannot beat Ontario.

Mr. MITCHELL: But I do know something of the history of the intermingling of the orientals with the white people in that province. I say that not in a critical sense; but it has been a problem for a good many years. I believe in the early days the present Prime Minister went out under the direction of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and investigated it for the government of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With Sir William Mulock.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, with Sir William Mulock. I am speaking now from memory. But there is no question about it, the information I get from my officials is that the people of Japanese race who have come east are much happier than they were in British Columbia. Is it not the sensible thing to do, to continue that policy—because in time, when we have them spread across this dominion, they will play their part in all its institutions and activities. I think it is much better than what I myself saw in British Columbia prior to the outbreak of the war, where there was a highly concentrated section of the community in the city of Vancouver which if I remember rightly they used to call Little Tokyo. What I should like to be able to do is to continue this policy of dispersal—not by direction but by persuasion—which has been so successful up to the present time.

Notwithstanding the opinion of any man in this house or anyone outside of it without responsibility, if I had it to do over again in the light of the conditions which existed in 1942 I would do exactly the same thing, use exactly the same policies and treat our Japanese friends in the same humane way as that in which they have been treated under the jurisdiction of my department.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, despite the fact that there have been moments of heat, I think that those who have sat back and listened to this debate will recognize that it has been one of the best we have had on this subject for a good many years. Even though we have taken opposing stands and have got into some warm arguments, it seems to me that there has been a tendency to recognize sincerity and earnestness on both sides, which indeed befits a debate of this kind. Complimentary remarks have been made of some of those in this group who have stood firm on this matter through the years. I recognize likewise the sincerity and the earnestness of some of those who have taken a position with which I thoroughly disagree. I go even further and say that I take at their word those who support this order against Japanese citizens and who tell us that they are not doing so on the basis of any race hatred. I confess that in some cases as I listen to their speeches and read in Hansard the remarks that have been made it is a little difficult to believe that, but I take these members at their word. In particular when a member like the hon. member for Vancouver South stands up and speaks in the gentlemanly manner in which he did it is pretty hard to imagine that in his heart there is any hatred towards anyone.

I think too it is to be noted that there have been many efforts by those who have participated in this debate to make constructive suggestions. There has also been noted on the part of those on the other side a tendency to refer, as the minister did just now, to the Japanese as our friends. The hon. member for Vancouver South the other night made a plea for arrangements to provide restitution where the property of Japanese Canadians had been despoiled. All that is to the good. It suggests that in this parliament we have a reflection of the heart of the Canadian people, which is disturbed about this matter and which recognizes, as the hon. member for Spadina suggested, that the problem is a vexatious one but also, as he suggested, that there is a principle at stake and that we are determined to move toward the achievement of that principle with all that it means.

I think it is significant that those who have spoken in favour of the continuance of this order, P.C. 946, have all felt that they had to make a case for the position they were taking. A few years ago that was not necessary. All one had to do then was to throw out a few inflammatory slogans and the case was taken as established, because in those days there was much more bitterness about the subject than there is now. Today members make their case on various grounds. Sometimes it is on defence, sometimes on race but allegedly without race hatred, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard suggested last night. He was quite forthright in saying that from his viewpoint the problem goes beyond the Japanese and includes the Chinese and East Indians. I respect him for the honesty with which he made that statement, but as I say, when I look at it in print and realize its implications I must state my disagreement with him.

Mr. MERRITT: Surely the hon. member realizes that the question he asked me was what the problem was, not my views on it. Is not that his recollection?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. If that correction needs to be made to make everything perfectly clear, I am glad to make it. He said last night that he was endeavouring to give us what he believed to be the problem as British Columbia saw it, and he stated it in those terms. But you will notice, Mr. Chairman, that when he did so he was not throwing out slogans or telling us hair-raising stories, as was characteristic of previous debates on this subject, but was trying to make a reasoned basis for the position that he takes.

I want it to be perfectly clear that I disagree wholly with the members who are supporting this order, but I also want it to be clear that it seems to me that hon. members have made progress in their attitude toward this matter, and it provides a good basis from which to move on in the hope that even yet we shall achieve the full measure of the principle of which the hon. member for Spadina spoke a moment ago.

I do not blame the Minister of Labour for reminding us, as he did immediately following the remarks of the previous speaker, of the way in which the light of freedom burns in the United Kingdom, and that compared with other countries Canada has done a pretty fair job. I would be fully satisfied if we had in Canada the freedom so firmly established in the United Kingdom, but what we are concerned about, and this is what makes the difference in a democracy, is not how well we have done in comparison with other places, especially lands where conditions may be a lot worse, but how well our achievements match our ideals and our principles and the things that we espouse. As the hon. member for Spadina said, we have been in a bit of a dilemma here in this house in discussing this matter. I have felt in listening to the radio reports about this debate that the vexatiousness of the problem has been made clear and also the compulsion of the ideals that are in the minds and hearts of most of us who are here.

Having said all that, I wish we could realize that what we are voting for in this order in council is not the sincerity or earnestness that may be in the hearts of hon. members; it is not the hatred or lack of race hatred that may motivate our speeches or our votes. This is a specific order which does specific things, and the fact is that this order in council does deny to certain Canadian citizens rights which other Canadian citizens are permitted to enjoy. I feel that all of us have to look at this thing very closely and in that light. The members from British Columbia have the right to ask those who do not live in that province to try to look at this thing from their viewpoint, and I think we all were impressed by the appeal which the hon. member for Victoria made last night. I may say to the Minister of Labour that I had the privilege of being on a committee of the Winnipeg city council in 1942 which arranged to bring some Japanese Canadians from British Columbia to that city, and I imagine that others of us in this house have done that sort of thing. I have also had the privilege in a personal way of extending my welcome to some Japanese Canadians now living in my riding, and I can say with the member for Spadina that I know that some of them are quite happy to be there. But after we have done all that, after those of us east of the rockies have met the request that the people of British Columbia make to us and tried to look at things from their point of view, I think that they also should realize that what is at stake here is a principle affecting the whole of Canada and our interest in that principle is a matter of supreme importance. You cannot divide Canada into different sections and have one principle obtain in one part and another somewhere else. We in this group applauded with eagerness the exchange of telegrams which the Secretary of State for External Affairs read today expressing the appreciation of the government of India for the action of the British Columbia legislature in doing away with one bit of discrimination which has obtained out there all too long.

Speaking on this whole question of the principle of citizenship and of its being extended without any qualification to all people, I should like to make a brief reference to a recent book which has already been quoted in this house, the author of which has received a well deserved award. I refer to Arthur Lower's "Colony to Nation". In that book Professor Lower makes the statement that Canada is a supreme act of faith, and he goes on to underline that statement by pointing to the fact that normally one would not expect a nation such as ours to gain the position of strength it occupies, because of the difficulties we have had in welding various races together. But we have done so, he says, as a supreme act of faith.

He goes on to say that without tolerance, magnanimity, generosity and devotion to high principles, Canada just does not exist. I am deeply concerned that when we come face to face with a basic principle like this, always admitting that there are difficulties—and certainly there are in carrying out any high principle—we realize how fundamental it is to the very existence of this nation.

There are many principles without which Canada just does not exist. One of them, which is basic, is that there shall be no discrimination as between our citizens on the basis of race. There came to my desk today, as I imagine there did to the desks of all hon. members, a letter from the civil liberties association in Manitoba. The hon. member for Lake Centre, Mr. B. K. Sandwell of Toronto and I had the privilege not long ago of addressing a large meeting in the city of Winnipeg, held under the auspices of this association, when we discussed the whole question of civil liberties. I believe all will agree that this association has done a good job in the presentation of its six-point programme, each point of which is extremely important at this stage of our national life.

The first point, which is the only one I shall read at this time, because I am afraid the others would be out of order in this debate—although they are equally important—reads, under the heading "Declaration of Rights":

> No Canadian citizen shall be exiled, nor deprived of his citizenship in any part, nor be discriminated against in the exercise of his citizenship because of race, religion, colour, sex, language or political beliefs.

I know the Minister of Labour is likely to say it is easy to make speeches about these high-sounding principles, but that actually one has to face up to the difficulties. That is right. And so are we right; and so is the hon. member for Spadina right, and so is my friend Arthur Lower right in suggesting that, without loyalty to principles like this, Canada just does not go on.

It seems to me it is extremely important, when a principle of this kind is being discussed, that we have a discussion of this kind in which hon. members express, in an honest and straightforward manner, the views they hold, as has been done in this instance. However I think it is also important, if at all possible, that the major political groups in the country give some definite and responsible expression as to where they stand on an issue of this kind.

Last night the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said he was reporting to the house what he felt to be the views of his constituents. I am not quarreling with the statement he made as being a report on the situation as he sees it, but I should like hon. members to read for themselves a paragraph from page 3 of a letter from the Vancouver consultative council, under date of March 25, 1947, which was addressed to all of us. I will read only a sentence or two to indicate the tone of the letter:

> We are indignant that an impression has been spread that the citizen body of British Columbia is with substantial unanimity favourable to the perpetuation of such discriminatory measures. His Grace Archbishop Duke of this city selected a Catholic clergyman to act on the executive committee of this council and to serve as a member of a delegation which waited upon the Premier of British Columbia to protest against racial discrimination.

And then he goes on to refer to similar support given by private members and the responsible courts of other leading church bodies and leading persons in various political parties. The paragraph closes by saying:

> The mere fact that hundreds of citizens of British Columbia, without regard to their various religious and political affiliations, have together made financially possible the work of this consultative council is itself evidence that the section of British Columbians sharing the views reflected in this letter is far from negligible.

I accept the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard to the effect that he believes that the views he expresses are those of the majority of his constituents. But they are not the views of all the people of British Columbia. As this letter, over the signature, by the way, of Doctor Norman F. Black, would suggest, there is a considerable body of people in British Columbia who feel as we do.

Mr. GREEN: I suppose the hon. member knows that Doctor Black is a leading C.C.F'er. I just wish to have it on the record.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. I could go through and give the names of the members on that council and in the Vancouver branch, Canadian civil liberties union, but I shall not take the time. I am proud of the fact that members of the C.C.F. are found in groups of that kind. But there are people from other groups as well, particularly a large number of church and university leaders in British Columbia.

What I want to say to members like the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who tell us about the views of their constituents, is that members of parliament and political parties have a duty in a country like Canada, not only to report what they believe to be the views of their people, but to give a lead when matters of high principle are at stake. That is so in the present instance.

I suggest that it should not be left to the hon. member for Vancouver East and other C.C.F. members from British Columbia to go against the tide, if that is the case, so far as British Columbian opinion is concerned. This is a principle which is of concern to the whole of Canada; and I would say that members of parliament in the different political parties, even though they may think the views of their people back home are in one direction, should try to give a lead in support of a principle which means so much to this country.

I was genuinely pleased yesterday when the hon. member for Lake Centre stated his position in the matter. I say to him right now that if the night before in my reference to his being here at a certain hour I gave offence to him, then I apologize. The fact of the matter is that what counts, to some of us, is the advancement of a principle.

Mr. HACKETT: You always know where he stands, if you do not know where he is.

An hon. MEMBER: We do not know where his party is.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Why not?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am serious about this. It was a real thrill to us yesterday when he said clearly that he stands for there being no discrimination against any Canadian citizen on grounds of race. I hope I am not going too far if I take from that the understanding that he would be opposed to continuing this order in council.

It seems to me that there ought to be other statements from the Progressive Conservative party. I may be accused of something when I say this, but frankly—

Mr. HACKETT: Sit down and give us a chance.

Mr. KNOWLES: I say honestly that I am not now trying to divide the Progressive Conservative party into two camps.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not you; the last thing in your mind!

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friends can arrange their own divisions; I do not need to help them on that. But I do feel that, in view of the commendable statement of the hon. member for Lake Centre, it would help the advancement of this principle if the leader of the Progressive Conservative party would make a similar statement in that connection. Surely that is not asking too much.

Then, too, I feel we should have still something more from the government side, and particularly from the ministry.

I should like to hear from the Minister of Justice. I should like to hear from the Secretary of State for External Affairs who leads Canada's delegations to meetings of the united nations. I should like to hear from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or from any other minister for that matter.

An hon. MEMBER: How long do you want to stay here?

Mr. KNOWLES: When a principle is at stake, time does not matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): We should like to hear from the hon. member for Skeena as to where he stands.

Mr. MITCHELL: He was a pretty fair roller skater yesterday.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I try to state what seems to be the position so far as the government is concerned in connection with this matter. The only definite thing we have before us is a group of orders in council and our amendment to have P.C. 946 deleted. That amendment has been opposed, either the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Justice having stated that the government cannot accept it. In other words, the government's position is that this order in council must stay on the statute books of Canada for at least another year. We have had no indication from the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Justice or the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to what is to be the policy after the expiry of this bill which we are now passing. The only views from the ministerial benches that we have had with regard to the future are those that were expressed by the Minister of Veterans Affairs. If I do him any injustice he is quite capable of correcting it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Minister of Veterans Affairs will not mind what you do.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would suggest that the hon. member deal with the item before the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: Speaking the other night, and also during the debate at a previous stage, the Minister of Veterans Affairs made it clear that, so far as he personally is concerned, he wants at least some of these restrictions continued for a long time, if not for all time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is essentially Liberalism to have a variety of opinion within a party, not the regimentation that you have over there.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did my right hon. friend say that it is the essence of Liberalism to continue these restrictions?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not say that and I do not wish any duplicity from my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would be glad to have my right hon. friend restate his position if I am not stating it correctly. It seems to me that it is pretty clear what he wants is a continuation of at least some of the restrictions now in existence for a considerable period, if not for all time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: At the proper time my opinion will be communicated to my colleagues and my colleagues will take action according to the responsibility of government.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I appeal again to the hon. member to deal with the item before the committee and not attempt to forecast what will happen in the future.

Mr. KNOWLES: I agree with your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I shall refer only to such remarks as have been made on the future of this matter by the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Speaking on it some time ago, he told the house that if his views on this subject should ever differ from those of the government, he would no longer be a member of the government. The Winnipeg Free Press of April 7, 1947, had this to say about that situation:

This would not be so formidable a disaster that the people of Canada, the government and the Liberal party could not endure it. If Mr. Mackenzie's retirement could be borne with fortitude, the principle which he seeks to perpetuate is much more serious. It could be justified in war time only on grounds of national security. It cannot be justified in peace time. It cannot be maintained without establishing a precedent dangerous to all civil liberties in Canada and contrary to Canada's obligations under the charter of the united nations.

It is hardly necessary to point out that the Winnipeg Free Press is a strong supporter of the Liberal party. In other words, some Liberals do not accept the minister's views on this subject. I have said this because I feel that there should be some statement as to future policy made in connection with this matter. The Minister of Labour has said that all we are passing now is an order to continue for another year what he has been doing, but we have learned from experience that if you want to win something a year or two from now you have to start working for it now. If there had not been this debate I doubt very much if there would be much change in policy a year from now. Strange as it may seem, I take my stand in this instance with the Winnipeg Free Press, that the time to abolish these restrictions is right now. The time to save freedom is before we lose it. In the face of the government's stand against our amendment, we have taken the time to fight for this principle, in the hope that by so doing we shall make possible its achievement at as early a date as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is that your policy with regard to all restrictions?

Mr. KNOWLES: We are discussing a particular order in council, P.C. 946, which places definite restrictions on Canadian citizens. That is quite different from orders in council which impose restrictions upon economic forces, prices and so on in the interests of the Canadian people. The two things are in different categories, and the minister knows it very well.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, the government made it quite clear through the Minister of Justice that this legislation rests squarely on a national emergency—that if the government is seeking to enact legislation which for the time being sets aside the constitution and gives it power to invade a jurisdiction which normally is exclusively that of the provinces; if it seeks to legislate by order in council where normally only parliament can; if it seeks to suspend the rights and privileges of the individual and the rights of citizenship, it is because a national emergency exists.

I voted against the second reading of the bill because in my opinion no national emergency exists. I brought forward all the normal criteria by which the existence of an emergency is detected in peace, order and good government as well as in the realms of finance, industry, employment and trade. I canvassed the whole field, and no one attempted to contradict me when I showed that times are good, that employment is plentiful, that production is greater than it has ever been before; that foreign trade, both in imports and exports, is greater than it has ever been. Finding no vestige of evidence of the existence of a national emergency, I was forced to vote against this bill. I shall now say a few words about the orders in council which affect the Japanese.

The people of British Columbia are aroused over this question. They did not wish orientals to land on their shores. As I recall, it was in 1907 that the late Mr. Lemieux, once a much respected speaker of this house, went at the instance of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to Japan and there entered into some kind of understanding with the government of that country. It was called a gentleman's agreement, whereby the number of Japanese to come to Canada would be greatly restricted. Later, as some of us remember, there arrived off Vancouver a ship in which there was a large number of Indians, and although some of them bore on their breasts military decorations which showed that they had fought courageously and frequently in the defence of the British realm, they were not permitted to land. There were other instances in which the people of British Columbia expressed their wish that orientals should not come to their shores, but orientals did come. We are told that at the present time there remain in Canada about 23,000 Japanese, of whom about 17,000 are Canadian citizens.

The war was the occasion for the removal of the Japanese from the British Columbia shores of the Pacific. Some were moved to the interior of British Columbia, some to the eastern provinces. Now, two years after the cessation of hostilities—and I am dealing only with the Japanese who are British subjects—parliament is asked to continue the restriction and curtailment of the rights of these British subjects because of a national emergency.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, there is no national emergency. There is a keen desire, as manifested by many members from British Columbia—in fact, I think, by all members who represent constituencies which have returned followers either of the government or of the opposition—that these Japanese be not permitted to return to their former homes on the shores of the Pacific. Judging from the unanimity of Liberal and Conservative members, there must be a pronounced if not unanimous feeling among the white population of the coast. I submit that that hostile sentiment is largely economic in its origin. It may be tinged by racial feeling but judging from what I have heard in the house, it is almost entirely economic; it is because the Japanese work harder and longer hours, live more cheaply and have made inroads upon the normal vocations and profits of the white population that they are not wanted in British Columbia.

That hostile sentiment may create a crisis but not an emergency. It probably does create a political crisis; but I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the constitution of a country may not be suspended because of a political crisis. When there is a national emergency, when the life, the very existence of the country as a whole is in peril, then the constitution must yield to the doctrine of survival. But a political crisis is a mere incident in the every-day life of a country. A constitutional, representative government like ours comes in and is bound to go out, and it almost invariably goes out in a crisis, a political crisis. A political crisis is just as natural to our form of government as are three meals a day to a normal Canadian.

I submit that to contend that a national emergency has arisen because of this political crisis in one province is to make a travesty of our constitution and to endanger harmony among our people. Why does not the government deal with this crisis? Why does it not take this problem, which comes to it as a possible by-product of the war, if you will—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Long before the war.

Mr. HACKETT: My hon. friend will remember that I have said I know the people of British Columbia never wanted the orientals. They came, and the war provided the people of British Columbia with an opportunity to get rid of them. They were moved away, and now the people of British Columbia are doing all in their power to prevent their return. The point I am trying to make is that that is not a national emergency. It is a political crisis, and I say to the government, why not deal with it as such?

If it is desired that there should be no more orientals in Canada; to be specific, if it is desired that there be no more Japanese in Canada, we are masters here in this Canadian land. Let us enact legislation to prevent other Japanese from coming here. I see no difficulty in that course. This is our home land; we alone may determine who shall enter here. I have heard it said, not by one but by half a dozen hon. members, that the Japanese have some loyalty other than a loyalty to Canada. If that can be established —and it must not be established in the mass— if a Canadian citizen of Japanese origin has been a traitor to Canada, then the law provides a means for dealing with him.

Last year the hon. member who was formerly secretary of state put on the statute books the Canadian citizenship act, of which he was very proud. He conducted his bill through the house with great aptitude and persistence. By section 21 of this act Canadian citizenship can be revoked from anybody except a natural-born Canadian. How many of these 17,000 Japanese are natural-born Canadians I do not know, but let us divide the group in two. If any of these who have been naturalized have misconducted themselves, have been traitors to Canada, their Canadian citizenship can be withdrawn. The act provides the means, and they can be sent back to Japan. Their naturalization can be taken from them; they will cease to be Canadian citizens and will be sent back to the land of their origin. If there be Canadian-born citizens who are traitors, the law provides a summary way for dealing with them. But I submit that it is not wise, it is not well, to make wholesale charges of disloyalty against a national group. I am convinced that there are many Japanese, men and women, who are loyal Canadians, industrious and hard working, who are good citizens. If there be among the Japanese— and it is always well to remember that one of the twelve fell—one who has been unworthy of his citizenship, let him be detected, tried and dealt with in consequence.

I am reasonably certain that if the government were to say that no more Japanese were to be brought to Canada, much of the disturbance among the deputation from British Columbia would cease, and much of the unrest and worry which is being felt on the coast today would disappear. The difficulty is that the government is still waiting for something to happen. It is relying upon a fiction. It is creating an artificial emergency that it may shield itself behind its shadow and like Micawber wait another year in the hope that something will turn up. If the government would accept its responsibility and meet the problems which confront it rather than try to put them off for another year under the assertion that a national emergency exists when none in fact does exist, we would be farther along our way to stability and order.

It is right and natural—and I am certain that if some hon. members from British Columbia speak after me they will do so—for hon. members to ask, what do you know about the Japanese? My answer is, nothing. They may then say to me: It is very easy for you to be magnanimous and altruistic; it is very easy for you to be censorious of us; it is very easy for you to attempt the role of the statesman. We are under the harrow at home; our people are disturbed. They do not like this competition; they do not want the Japanese back. Under their breath they may say—they may tell me in intimacy, whether they are on this or the other side of the house: Our folk will vote against us unless we do as we are doing. I have been in parliament occasionally; I have been out of parliament a great deal. I do not know a great deal about the Japanese. I know a good deal about the irate electorate, and I have a great deal of sympathy for hon. gentlemen who are under its lash. But I want to make it clear that my experience with problems of this kind is not altogether negligible. I live, as do many hon. members of this committee, in the great metropolitan city of Montreal. Do not let British Columbia think it is the only province in the dominion which has had perplexities arising out of the meeting of races. Do not let British Columbia think that it is the only province in Canada which has to meet the perplexities arising out of the meeting of races.

It has been said that we cannot assimilate the Japanese, that they congregate in groups and should be dispersed. I must say that I do not like these words. People come to this land not to be assimilated, not to be dispersed. They come because they believe it is a haven in which they can live their lives, worship their God and bring up their children in the best that is in their own tradition, and in the respect and love of the land which gives them the right to lead their own free lives.

I open a book. It is not a law book; it is not a treatise on government. It is a record called "The Census of Canada." I open it at a page which gives the population and the racial origin of the great metropolitan area of Canada. I turn to the city of Montreal, the home of thirty-odd national groups. I find that in 1941 it had a population of 1,139,921 people. Of that number 281,875 were of British extraction. There are 850,000 others. The French people represent the largest group, a little over sixty per cent of the total population of Montreal. The remainder come from the four points of the compass, from the seven seas and the five continents. They have come there and learned how to accommodate themselves to a common life. It has not always been easy. The French came first and they made it a little uncomfortable for the Indians. Then the English came, and the Scotch came with them to see that the English did not get too rich. The Scotch were very mighty until the redistribution committee got after Muskoka-Ontario and levelled that fortress. Then there came from the mists of that green isle of the Atlantic, from that land of saints, scholars and fairies, the meek, the mild Irish. They did not inherit the earth this time, but they came to Canada about one hundred years ago, and some people did not like them. But they were woven into the Canadian web. Later, within my time almost, there came another element, an industrious element, thirsting for knowledge, a stiff-necked element, an element with an unquenchable spirit, one that has suffered in the last ten years as no race of men has ever suffered before, which indeed has been almost entirely exterminated on one or two continents. They came to the metropolitan centres and competed. They made it hard for the older races already there. They arrogated to themselves whole strata of business and drove out the English and the French. It was not easy to bear. Then after them came other central Europeans. This problem is not a new one. British Columbia has not made a great find. British Columbia is having just the kind of worry and embarrassment that the older centres have known and have endeavoured honestly to accommodate themselves to during the centuries.

Let me just say this in passing. It is the peoples who have learned to accommodate themselves to the presence of him who may not be his brother in colour and creed who have made of this land what it is. Oh, we have done great things. We have fought battles; we have developed a continent; we have manufactured; we have traded; we have won ourselves a status in many realms. But there is one thing of which we can be justly proud, and that is that we have found the way of making everyone who has come here feel that he had a dignity which everybody respected, and that once having acquired our citizenship he was inviolate in his rights. There have been no Jim Crow cars in Canada.

Mr. REID: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes.

Mr. REID: Do you think we in British Columbia did wrong by not marrying with the Japanese?—because the hon. gentleman spoke about what took place when there was intermarriage. That is the crux of the question.

Mr. HACKETT: I would say to the hon. member for New Westminster that I do not believe in a mixture of race and race of different colours.

Mr. REID: In Montreal that happened, though.

Mr. HACKETT: It may have happened.

Mr. REID: The Scotch married the French and improved the race.

Mr. HACKETT: I will not go into that.

An hon. MEMBER: Improved which one?

Mr. HACKETT: I am not going to say what happened. The point that I am trying to make, and I deal with the hon. member's question as a serious question—

Mr. REID: It is.

Mr. HACKETT: —is that the Japanese came here. I do not know that we invited them, but they came.

An hon. MEMBER: The Canadian Pacific brought them.

Mr. HACKETT: They served their apprenticeship. We issued to them a certificate which made them Canadian citizens. That may have been a great mistake. I am not debating whether it was a mistake or not; but if it was a mistake, it was our mistake. We did it. Having issued that document, having made all those people Canadian citizens we should respect their rights. In Canada there is no dominant element. Canada, after all, is a country of minorities. The French are in a minority; the English are in a minority; the Irish are in a minority and the Scotch are in a minority. We are a people of minorities. The test of the government of a country is the way it treats its minorities. It is only if we can respect the dignity which is inherent in the human soul, if we can respect that divine thing which makes us brothers in God, that our country can be great and we can be worthy of the reputation which it has achieved. After that most terrible conflict in South Africa when the Britain and the Boer had fought each other and hated each other for years, when some measure was sought whereby harmony might be brought to these tortured peoples, where did they go? They came to the Dominion of Canada to find out how we had solved their problem. More than that, when, after 500 years of conflict, it was determined at last that there should be an understanding between Ireland and Britain, it was written into the preliminary document which preceded the treaty that the Irish should have what?—the kind of freedom which Canadians have.

We have achieved a great reputation in many fields, but the reputation which we have achieved in accommodating ourselves to the necessity of a common citizenship is the highest and most glorious of all. I do not wish to be understood as saying that I favour admitting to Canada this race or that race. I am for excluding any race that cannot fit into our national life. But there are some things that cannot be undone. If there are Japanese in this country today, it is not their fault. If they are Canadian citizens, it is because we placed the badge of Canadian citizenry upon them; and bearing that badge, it behooves us in honour to respect it. Possibly if I had had more courage I would not have made this speech; there are no Japanese in my constituency. No pressure is on me. I have no one to reproach me but myself.

An hon. MEMBER: You are lucky.

Mr. HACKETT: I stand for the integrity of Canadian citizenship. Today it is the Japanese, tomorrow it may be the Jew; the next day it may be the Irish, and the next day somebody else. Citizenship is a very sacred matter. Neither the few nor the many should be permitted to undermine it. For the first time we are being asked to depart from those things which have made of us, I was going to say, a free people; for the first time we are asked to depart from the principles which the genius of two great races has evolved and which they have had the courage and the grace till now to apply.

I do not now say how I shall vote; I am waiting for somebody to deliver me from the necessity of separating myself from many whom I cherish and whose wisdom I admire and frequently rely upon. Unless I can be rescued from the position as I see it, I shall find myself forced to support the amendment, and I shall do so proudly.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Chairman, I believe I am the last British Columbia member to speak on this series of orders in council affecting the Japanese. I do not intend to try to begin to match the eloquence of the hon. member for Stanstead who has just finished a very fine speech. I wish to speak briefly about what the order in council in its present form will do. I need not recapitulate the speeches which have been made about the attitude of British Columbia to the Japanese. I think it is a fair statement, however, to say that most of us did want the entire Japanese population of British Columbia sent back to Japan because we have found that, though they are a decent, hard-working people, they do not become part of our life. But we cannot do that now because the supreme court of this country and the privy council have ruled that those Japanese remaining have the right to remain here, and so, faced with that, our task is to see that they are made into Canadians. In that task we failed before, and they failed even more than we did. They have hived together and sent their children to Japanese language schools or sent them back to Japan. It is true that there is not one British Columbia member who went to school in the province who did not sit in every classroom with Japanese students. But once they became adults, the gap started.

The only problem that I as a member of parliament am faced with today in regard to the Japanese is what is the best way to see that these Japanese do become real Canadians, Canadians not just by act of parliament but Canadians in thought and action and in loyalty to our way of living. All parts of this house are agreed that the old policy of the Japanese hiving together in Steveston and on the west coast of Vancouver island was bad, bad for us and bad for the Japanese too. Again and again in this house it has been said that the dispersal of the Japanese, spreading them all across Canada, is the only practical way of getting rid of the hostility towards them and of making them Canadians. The suggestion is that they should be allocated to the various provinces. That has been suggested very loosely by various speakers, but how are we to do it? Are we to take a roster of the Japanese and say that so many are going to Prince Edward Island, so many are going to New Brunswick and so many are going to Nova Scotia. Obviously that is impossible. It would take an order more restrictive than the present order in council to accomplish that.

The hon. member for Spadina rather loosely used the word "cruel" in speaking of the movement of the Japanese. I think it would be a real cruelty to force the Japanese to live in certain parts of Canada, and I say that as a British Columbian.

The second suggestion was that it be done by persuasion. But any of us who know the Japanese well know they are just as fond of the coast of British Columbia as every one of the nine members from that coast province is. Only last fall I spoke to a meeting of the Japanese in the coast town of Greenwood, where a large number of them had been relocated. A few of them came from my riding. They all want to go back to the coast of British Columbia and they were looking forward to March 31 when these orders in council expire, so that they could return. Therefore, if we remove this order in council and leave it to the persuasion of people who are in public life and to the good sense of the Japanese we shall find in a year that the Japanese will all be back on the coast and back in those two industries in which they work so well, fishing and farming. If, however, the Japanese are given to understand, as they are by this order, that they are free to go anywhere in Canada and can pass freely back and forth except in this one narrow coastal strip for a period of years they will disperse. The Japanese in Winnipeg, it has been said, are very happy; the Japanese in Ontario are very happy. I know they miss the mountains and the sea just as we who are here miss the mountains and the sea. But they are surrounded by people who, I think, are treating them a little more kindly than they have been treated in recent years in British Columbia because of the old feeling there. I say that this order in council is the simplest and most effective way of seeing that the Japanese will disperse and will become the good Canadians that the Chinese have become in exactly the same way. We have never had the feeling against the Chinese in British Columbia that we have had against the Japanese, and for this reason, that the Chinese are spread right across the country. There are more Chinese in the city of Toronto, I am informed, than there are in the city of Vancouver, and when that situation applies to the Japanese they will be gladly accepted right across this country. So I have no tangle at all with my conscience in voting for the continuance of this order in council restricting the Japanese from that little coastal zone in British Columbia, because I believe that this is the only practical way in which these Japanese can be dispersed and can have the chance to become good Canadians.

In closing, I wish to say just one word in defence of the Minister of Labour. I listened with the greatest of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Spadina. He spoke well, but he used two words I think just a little loosely. He used the word "persecution." I defy him to bring forward in this house one instance of Japanese being persecuted in British Columbia. There has been hostility against the Japanese; there has been perhaps indifference, perhaps an unwillingness to accept the Japanese into our homes as we accept other people. But persecution, no.

Then the hon. member for Spadina reflected on the way in which the Japanese had been handled. He said that their movement was a cruel movement. Any movement of people away from the homes where they have lived must involve heart-burning. When your people left the old land and my people left the highlands of Scotland there was heart-burning at giving up the old associations and leaving the old home. There is bound to be that. But there is a great difference between that and cruelty.

Lastly, on this matter of high principle of which the C.C.F. have spoken so often, there is one member of that party who knows the Japanese really well, because he represents the north coast of British Columbia. He represents a great number of fishermen in the Queen Charlotte islands and elsewhere. But we have not found much principle in the way he has weaseled—to use the word of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—against taking a stand as his colleagues have done. My point in voting against the amendment is that if it carried automatically we go back to the days before 1939 and we should find ourselves in British Columbia saddled with a problem which should be a national problem. Once again we would have the Japanese hiving in colonies in my riding, in Comox-Alberni and in New Westminster, and once again we would have hostility developing between that group and all other Canadian groups. And so, as the only practical way to ensure the dispersal of these Japanese across Canada, I am going to support this order in council.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If I may ask the hon. member a question, it seemed to me that he confined himself to the one order in council which deals with the coastal situation. Does he regard that as a complete solution of the problem from the British Columbia point of view?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Certainly from my point of view, and I was only giving my own outlook. So far as fishing licences in British Columbia are concerned, if the Japanese are excluded from the coastal area the question of granting them fishing licences does not arise. I should like to join with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in saying that I think the Japanese have a great future in fishing in the maritimes. I see no reason why they should not be given a licence there. But so far as fishing licences in British Columbia are concerned, if the Japanese are restricted from the coastal zone the matter of licences does not arise.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the hon. member put that restriction partly on the ground of security?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Not I, no. The hon. member for Vancouver South mentioned it, but I do not. My point is that we are now faced with the job of making Canadians of these Japanese. We cannot deport them, as many of us would have liked to do. We have them here; and the best way to make them Canadians is to spread them across Canada. And it is the only proper way for years ahead to assure security.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to ask another question, with no desire whatever to embarrass the hon. member. How can he suggest excluding them wholly from the coastal areas of British Columbia, if to some extent they are to be allowed in the coastal areas of Nova Scotia?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That was my point. I am sorry if I failed to make it, because I should be able to speak the same language. My point is that, because Nova Scotia is open to them now—I think there is one Japanese there—the moment the coast of British Columbia is opened we shall have 23,000 of them, less those who have been deported. It is the difference between the two coasts.

Mr. MICHAUD: The order in council under discussion involves a principle which, to my mind, is far-reaching, and for that reason cannot be treated lightly. I listened to most of the speeches in the debate, with the exception of a few made yesterday afternoon when I was unavoidably out of the house. I have taken the trouble to read some of them, particularly those of the hon. member for Cariboo and the hon. member for Kootenay East. I must say that, after listening to the debate in what I consider an impartial manner, I have not as yet been convinced to change the views I held originally in the matter.

The hon. member for Stanstead has expressed eloquently and ably the views I should like myself to express on this question. Today it is the Japanese; tomorrow it may be the Jews, and another year it may be another minority. I consider it is a dangerous precedent to carry on this order in council.

I must say I have a good deal of sympathy with hon. members from British Columbia who have expressed their views with great sincerity and their usual ability. As one hon. member from that province said, no one should cast any reflections upon them by imputing to them improper motives or accusing them of racial discrimination. I honestly believe they acted according to their conscience. They have expressed the views of their constituents, and that is what they were sent here for.

In this matter of racial discrimination I think it is fair to assume that nobody considers himself guilty of such an attitude of mind. Hon. members who spoke in favour of retaining P.C. 934 have done so through a sense of duty. For us from the other provinces outside British Columbia I feel it should not be difficult to make up our minds as to what is the right thing to do in the matter.

The majority of those men who have been restricted in their freedom are Canadian citizens. The others are residents of this country, legally admitted to Canada; and as such they should enjoy the protection and freedom of other residents, as long as they abide by our laws. The reasons advanced by those who would have the Japanese kept away from the British Columbia coast have not impressed me. In the first place, there is the economic reason. Frankly I am somewhat dumbfounded that such an argument should have been invoked. It boils down to this, that in order to solve a simple economic problem we must deprive Canadians of elementary human freedom and fundamental rights. This, in my humble opinion, is unfortunate and an admission of incompetence. For that reason I do not think I should endeavour to answer the economic argument.

Then there is the security problem. Here again I fail to see what we should have to fear. There will always be traitors within our ranks, and they may not always be Japanese. There were none of them involved in the espionage inquiry, and I feel that the most subversive elements of our people are not Canadians of Japanese origin. So why single them out among possible disloyal citizens?

So far as the alleged disloyalty of these people is concerned, I would rather take the word of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) than that of other hon. members who have thrown aspersions against them. Doubtless there is some truth in what has been said. But, after all, what does it amount to? What proportion of Japanese have been disloyal? Some of them fought on our side, and that should help to vindicate them.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) has said—and in this he was supported only a short time ago by the hon. member for Stanstead—the problem of the Japanese would be more easily solved if we knew exactly what our immigration policy is to be, and particularly as regards orientals.

Bear in mind that I do not find fault with the manner in which our immigration policy has been carried out to this date. I think we are going about it in the right way. To my mind, the doors of this country are as wide open as we can afford to open them at this time. One thing is certain, and it is this, that we do not have to open the doors to oriental immigration just now. If at some future time we should have to do so, we could impose a number of restrictions which would not aggravate the situation in British Columbia. But let us deal with each problem as it comes before us. We are now facing the problem of Canadians who are restricted in their freedom. Those restrictions were very likely justifiable in time of war, for the same reason that it was then justifiable to send prominent citizens of this country into concentration camps, because of their political views. I think we are all agreed on this point. I understand that those who have been sent to concentration camps have now been released.

What about restrictions against Japanese? Is the present legislation to be continued, to be made permanent? If not, when is it to be abandoned. We have a duty toward those Canadians, but as yet we have no duty toward possible future immigrants of oriental races. So let us restore to our fellow Canadians their full rights as citizens; and when we deal with immigration of orientals in due course, we shall do it in the light of the solution we give to the present problem.

Speaking as a member of a minority group in the house, I make a special appeal to other hon. members who may represent minority groups, or who may belong to them. I want to appeal particularly to hon. members who come from Quebec and urge them to search their consciences carefully and to think twice before voting on this important matter.

I submit that it would be a dangerous precedent to maintain P.C. 946 one day longer than it is necessary to do so. Some hon. members have referred to the charter of the united nations. I am not particularly interested in that charter, but inasmuch as it embodies some of the principles of the great charter of Christianity which does not need to be defended in any deliberative assembly, I wish the charter of the united nations all the success it can possibly achieve.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Stanstead and also the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. I think, if views such as they have expressed had been advocated in this parliament during the past fifty years we would not have many of the problems that are now on our doorstep. On reading the debates on matters of this sort which have occurred in previous sessions, I feel that we are making some progress. Hon. members from British Columbia who have spoken in support of retaining this order in council have moderated their opinion considerably since the question was dealt with previously. I have a great deal of sympathy with them in the problem they must face when they return to their constituencies and have to meet public opinion, but I think they are asking the rest of us to take a very serious step.

I spent the first twenty years of my life in a home where Liberal principles were taken seriously, and I can hardly believe that we now have to argue with a government which is resisting so stubbornly the proposal to remove P.C. 946. Take this clause, for instance, which gives the minister the power to:

(viii) make orders, rules or regulations respecting persons of the Japanese race as defined in these regulations, or of other persons resident anywhere in Canada who are wholly of the Japanese race, or who have a father or a mother who is or was wholly of the Japanese race, to prohibit such persons of the Japanese race or such other persons from moving or travelling anywhere in Canada, or from residing in any place or area in Canada, except subject to a permit issued by or on behalf of the minister and on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by him or by any person authorized to act on his behalf under these regulations.

As the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska pointed out, when we pass a statute of this kind which selects one minority group on racial grounds, a group which has not been charged with having committed any crime, and states that their liberties are to be interfered with, we are taking a backward step. At this stage I should like to ask the ministry this question: In view of the opposition that has come from all sections of the house, will they be prepared to ask for a free vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can answer that right away. Perhaps the hon. member's judgment is better than mine and perhaps the judgment of the hon. members who have spoken is better than mine, but I ask them to consider the confusion that would result if 23,000 Japanese moved back into Vancouver. Let us be practical about the matter. I think we have been reasonably successful in the reallocation of these Japanese and have done it to the distinct advantage of them as individuals and of the nation.

I ask my hon. friend to take his mind back to 1942 when this matter was first placed under my direction. I think it was the hon.

member for Vancouver South who read a wire addressed to the Prime Minister of this country by a number of people in all walks of life in British Columbia. If my memory serves me correctly, Mr. Winch was one of those who signed the wire, as was Mr. Birt Shewler, president of the trades and labour council. I do not know the people in British Columbia perhaps as well as do my hon. friends.

Mr. GREEN: And Grant MacNeil.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know Grant MacNeil; I know Mr. Shewler and I know Mr. Winch, but I do not know the other people. I remember quite vividly the discussion that took place within the government and outside the government. They were fearful of the possibility of bloodshed unless this movement was undertaken. Frankly I believe it was the sound thing to do. I should like to think, when it is completed, there will be a reasonable reallocation of these people right across the dominion, but I shudder to think of what may happen if this amendment is carried. Assuming it is carried tonight; tomorrow morning these people could start back to the coast and no doubt many of them would.

In Ontario there are, at the moment, close to 7,000 Japanese. I have never noticed them around because they constitute only a pebble on the beach in a population of 3,500,000. They have more or less moved into the life of this province. In Quebec there are well over 1,200 and they have moved into the life of that province. The same applies to Manitoba and the other provinces. We have to be careful and not get away from the principle involved. I have the figures in front of me but I do not want to clutter up the minds of hon. members with them. You do not need figures when you are dealing with a principle.

I have known the hon. member for Vancouver East for a good many years and I know he has never changed his opinion. When he expresses an opinion, it is a matter of conviction. I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Stanstead. Let us not lose sight of the practical feature of this matter. There is a possibility of something almost like a trek back to Vancouver and one or two other centres in British Columbia. Many of us in eastern Canada have never seen a Japanese and it is all very well for us to get up and talk about them when we are not confronted with this problem.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister interrupted to answer my question and he has gone on for ten minutes. I did not expect the minister would make a second speech.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was going to make another speech anyway and I might just as well make it now.

Mr. COLDWELL: All right, go ahead.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am charged with the responsibility for this matter, which is an entirely different matter from just making speeches. As I say, there will probably be a trek back to Vancouver and other centres in British Columbia where the Japanese were highly concentrated. I agree in the main with the hon. member for Stanstead, but you have to look at the other side of the medal. I think it is far better to attempt to establish the Japanese across this country than to be faced with the condition that might arise in some of the centres of British Columbia if this amendment were allowed to pass. That is the practical thing to consider.

I wish to say this to my hon. friend who has just spoken and to the hon. member for Stanstead. I take second place to no one when it comes to defending the freedom of the individual, and so far as we are concerned we are prepared to take the vote at any time. I cannot speak for the government but I cannot have any objection to any member arguing the question from the point of view of principle. I must point out, however, that, as the minister administering the department, I am faced with a practical situation and I would rather face up to it courageously. There is an emergency, whether you like it or not. You may argue, if you will, that there is no emergency, but I would ask my hon. friends this question. Suppose you had a tremendous influx into the city of Vancouver, in short order, if this amendment carried, would they consider that an emergency? Would you not call upon the government of the country, or upon the province or the municipality to face up to the problem?

In a broad and general way we have used every measure of common sense in approaching this problem in the interests not only of the people of British Columbia but of the Japanese themselves. I have studied the discussions that have taken place in this house ever since it was decided that their movement from the Pacific coast was necessary, and I hope we shall use the same good sense on this occasion as we have shown in the past, so that in the passage of time a point may be reached where everyone will be more or less satisfied.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not wish to delay the putting of the question. I simply want to say that my position has been clearly outlined by the members of this group who have spoken. We are against this sort of legislation and must protest.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are several questions I should like to ask the minister, and then there is a statement which I think it is fitting should come from this group. I will not ask the minister to answer the questions as I put them. He can do so afterwards.

It would be well for the committee to have these questions answered, however, before this general debate is concluded. Can the minister tell us the number of Japanese from whom property was taken as a result of the exigencies of war? What measures did the government employ to ensure that each unit of the property was appraised at its full financial value? What precautions has the government taken to see that the Japanese owners shall not be permitted to suffer financial loss? Has the minister prepared a detailed report on all financial relations between the Japanese and the government?

My reason for asking these questions is that, in my opinion, the members of the house should have a report as a result of the perusal of which they can determine for themselves whether or not we have been in any way unfair to the Japanese in a financial way.

In my judgment, no Japanese must be allowed to sustain any financial loss as a result of any exigency of the war for which that Japanese was in no respect personally responsible. I believe that is a sound principle upon which the members of the house ought to act and to act sternly and justly. It would indeed be a reflection on this country if it were to be proved that Japanese had suffered financial loss.

May I turn now to the matter of discrimination. Much has been said about racial discrimination. Social creditors are unalterably opposed to all forms of racial discrimination. But social crediters are aware—and let some hon. members bear this in mind, for it is a thing which they are overlooking—that certain forces are designing to discriminate against the white race.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. The light-minded and the superficial will laugh, but those who realize the truth of what I say will not. They realize that there is much behind the statement. Are the white Canadians in British Columbia and elsewhere to be the only people in Canada to be discriminated against? Have white Canadians no right to protection against racial discrimination? Will anyone seriously argue that the Indians of British Columbia, whose fishing rights were infringed upon by the Japanese, were not being discriminated against, right under the eyes of this government? How is it that we have heard no voice raised in this house in defence of the Indians against such discrimination?

Mr. LOW: They have no vote.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now is the time to show whether certain hon. members mean all this talk about their support of the Indians. Here is their chance to be practical, as the minister says. The trouble is that a good many superficial theorists are unable to think through far enough to see the practical application of some of the principles they preach.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Take a look at the canneries and see what conditions they have to live under.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not think the hon. member's question has any bearing on my general contention.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: It never has.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My position is clearly established. Will anyone seriously argue that the white people of British Columbia, who have seen the Japanese invading the British Columbia small-fruit industry, are not being discriminated against? Can it be successfully maintained that when Canadian governments in the past short-sightedly admitted Japanese to British Columbia soil, against the protests and pleading of the people of British Columbia, they did not discriminate against the white people of British Columbia?

We must be realistic in these matters. It is easy enough for the white race to stand up so straight that it falls over backwards, and that is what a good many members would seem to wish to do today, so that their children and their grandchildren will wake up some day and find their rights as Canadians destroyed, given away in a moment of foolish sentimentality. Can it be denied that the present government, if it permitted Japanese to return to British Columbia and multiply there, and extend their economic, social and political strength in that province, would not be guilty of rank discrimination against the white people of British Columbia?

Social crediters are opposed to discrimination against the white race in Canada as well as discrimination against every other race. Social crediters are opposed to discrimination against the people of British Columbia, and social crediters are opposed to discrimination against white Canadians yet unborn, generations and generations of them.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Now may I stop here to make a comment in support of the minister's remarks regarding those people who never saw a Japanese. Why, the men and women in this country who have never seen a Japanese, who have never lived near Japanese, have no right to pronounce upon the subject at all. Let them listen to the people who know about the Japanese, the people who have lived near them and have seen what happens, the people who understand. How is it that men fail to appreciate this truth? What sort of intelligence or logic would there be in my rising to pronounce upon problems peculiar to Prince Edward Island when I have never been there? I listen to Prince Edward Island people on those problems. Let Canadians listen to British Columbians on British Columbia's problems.

Mrs. STRUM: Aren't they Canadian?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are certain great fundamental principles which go down beneath the question of being Canadians. Bear in mind that the white people in Canada who sought out this land, who developed it and who fought and bled for it, are Canadians too; they have some rights—a thing which a number of hon. members are completely overlooking. Social crediters therefore propose to stand by British Columbia members and the minister in their courageous effort to safeguard and guard the rights of the white race in British Columbia. Social crediters will therefore vote against this amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Nobody is fond of speaking when he is not wanted to speak, but I wish to make a few brief comments. I find myself so much in agreement with the hon. member for Stanstead—we always like to vote together—that I find it difficult to vote against this amendment. But I intend to vote against it and I wish to say a word or two to explain why. I like to believe that I am a supporter of civil liberties, and I should like to challenge what the hon. member for New Westminster said yesterday. I do not think he intended to talk as if he felt that civil liberties were a thing that should be disregarded. I am sure he did not, but he spoke in a way that intimated he thought that people who had taken part in civil liberties associations were a lot of cranks. I should like to suggest to him that that is not so, although there was a tendency that I am very well aware of for all kinds of people to crowd into civil liberties associations and, in some cases, turn them from their original and valid purposes.

I wish to say two things about this resolution. It seems to me that, while it is not correct to say we have a war emergency at this time, at any rate we have a hang-over from a war emergency. It seems to me that we have not yet found a way to deal permanently with this situation. I am not going to take up the time to discuss whether it is the fault of the government or not. We should have been farther on the way, but we do not seem to be at the point where we can make a wise decision. To me there is great force in what is said by the people from British Columbia, that if this thing is decided in this way, if it is brought to an end now it means that the other provinces push back on them this whole problem. I do not think that is fair. I remember once the late Lord Tweedsmuir said the difficulty was not when you were faced with right as against wrong but when you were faced with one right against another right.

I find myself in genuine difficulty; nevertheless, for the reasons which I have given, while having full respect for the principles laid down by the hon. member for Stanstead which have to guide us in our eventual dealing with this matter, at the moment I do not think we are right in pushing it back on British Columbia. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Thatcher) negatived: yeas, 31; nays, 105.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is a specific case which I wish to bring to the attention of the committee to show the committee exactly where it has put itself by its vote on this amendment. This case may not be an isolated one. If the committee can find some way of justifying this treatment there may be some reason for having voted against the amendment. Yesterday I received a letter from Vancouver, written on behalf of a Japanese Canadian veteran of the last war who was evacuated from the west coast defence zone. The name of this man is Inouye. His regimental number is 228458-S. He was wounded and received an honourable discharge. Before evacuation he had a small farm near New Westminster, the legal description of which is given in the letter. For some reason or another, perhaps because he was a veteran, the farm was not sold. It is rented. The war being over for two years, this man is now seeking permission to return to his farm, but permission is refused. Permission cannot be refused on the score that he is disloyal. He has proved his loyalty by fighting for this country, as a matter of fact by offering his life in defence of the country. He had worked on this farm. It is the work of a lifetime. He was deprived of his farm, not because he was disloyal but because it was deemed necessary in the interest of Canada that for a certain time persons of the race to which he belonged should be moved from the Pacific coast. As a matter of fact this man comes in the category of persons who were referred to in 1920 by Captain Mackenzie, who is now the Minister of Veterans Affairs, when he said in the legislature at Victoria that these British subjects have vindicated the fundamental essentials of citizenship and an acceptance of that principle lay in the extension of the franchise. If that was right—and I submit it was right—by what process of logic or reason or of justice can this man now be denied the right to return to his farm?

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is his name?

Mr. MacINNIS: Inouye. It is not material; the name can be found. This may be an isolated case, but it may not. It demonstrates so clearly what this parliament, representing the principles of liberalism and the principles of freedom which the British people represent, denies to a man who fought for this country. Now I want to ask the committee this: what are you going to do with this man? Where stand all your professions of freedom, liberty and justice now?

Mr. IRVINE: On the practical problem.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, in a practical problem. Can anyone suggest that the return of this man to his farm in the Fraser valley, in British Columbia, is a danger to the security of Canada? Let us not forget that German submarines came up the St. Lawrence river; and yet we debar no person of German descent, regardless of what his loyalty or otherwise to this country may have been, from the normal freedoms of citizenship. As I mentioned before, here you have a man who was willing to make the supreme sacrifice for the country of his adoption, and you tell him, "You must remain in a concentration camp while somebody else lives on your farm."

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): He is not living in a concentration camp, surely?

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, what do you call those relocation centres?

Mr. Chairman, it is after six o'clock. Since that point has been raised, I should like to say a few more words about the matter.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just before the dinner recess I was saying a few words in regard to the case of a veteran of world war I which came to my attention. I thought I had just about finished, but the Secretary of State made an interjection which caused me to decide to say a little more. During the past two or three days I have listened to so much rationalization in this chamber that I really have had to keep fairly good control over myself in order not to get excited about it. I have listened to people who know their position is wrong trying to rationalize themselves out of it. You cannot rationalize yourself out of a wrong position. I have lived long enough to realize that the only way one can do right today is to have done right yesterday, and the only way you can do right tomorrow is to do right today.

I shall try to give expression to the few words I have to say tonight without rancour, without racial prejudice or anything of that kind. As a matter of fact I feel quite sure I do not harbour any racial prejudice myself. I believe the Scottish race is the finest race on earth.

Mr. MITCHELL: I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have come to that conclusion because so often I have heard them say so, at Caledonian societies banquets and Burns suppers. The Secretary of State took exception to my saying that the veteran of world war I, to whom I referred before the recess, who cannot now get back to his farm at New Westminster, was in a concentration camp. Perhaps that was an extreme statement of the case, but the fact of the matter is that he cannot travel beyond a certain radius without a police permit, and a person who cannot do that is pretty close to being in a concentration camp. Certainly he is not a free Canadian; certainly he does not enjoy the freedoms for which he fought between 1914 and 1918. I am informed that Mr. Inouye, the man I referred to, has written many times to the authorities in Ottawa, and cannot get anywhere. The party in Vancouver who wrote to me in regard to this case said he saw Mr. Mackinnon, the commissioner or placement officer, who told him there was nothing he could do about the matter; that at the present time there were some four or five war veterans in Vancouver but they were there under special permits, and they either had to leave when those permits expired or had to have the permits renewed.

I should like to know what would be the attitude of the war veterans in this house if a white war veteran could not go to Nova Scotia, for example, without a permit. I am quite satisfied that every war veteran here would rise in his place and object to that sort of thing. If that is the case, as I am sure it is, the only reason there is not the same concern in this instance is that this man's skin is brown, and that he is of the oriental race. That is not good enough for the members of this house, nor, in my opinion, is it good enough for this government.

I am going to refer for a moment to the dispersal policy, and I hope the Minister of Labour will not take what I am about to say as personal criticism of himself. On more than one occasion I have made the statement in the house, and in letters to the minister I have said on several occasions, that I thought, under the circumstances within which he had to work, he did a good job. But I am going to say that in dealing with this matter the Minister of Labour was not a free agent. I am going to say that the cabinet itself did not give him the support he should have had to deal with this matter, that the cabinet allowed itself to be blackmailed into dealing with these people as it has done. That is why we are in our present position. Certain political promises were made that these people would never return to British Columbia. Then, once we got them out of the province, every attempt was made to make conditions so tough for them that not only would they not go back to British Columbia, but they would leave the country altogether. I am not blaming the Minister of Labour for that, but I am surprised that in the cabinet there were not men who loved freedom enough to insist that these people should have a fair deal.

As to the dispersal policy, is it any wonder it was found difficult to disperse these people, since we tried to disperse them and at the same time attached to them the stigma of disloyalty? They were sent out of British Columbia as enemy aliens. Is it any wonder that other provinces did not want to take enemy aliens? The first thing the government should have done in its dispersal programme was to make clear to the provinces and the Japanese themselves that they were not enemy aliens. As a matter of fact, as the Minister of Labour has indicated, they were removed, not only for the protection and security of the west coast, but also for their own protection. And they should have been treated, not as enemy aliens but as wards of the state. Their property and persons should have been scrupulously protected.

But that is not what has happened. Their property has been despoiled. The minister suggested today that they would rush back to the coast. Very few of them can go back to the coast, because there is nothing for them to go back to. And I am not at all in agreement with him that they would suffer any violence if they went back. The same thing was said with regard to the Japanese evacuated from the Pacific coast in the United States if they returned. But they went back, and there was no violence; there were no disorders. A few people did try to make trouble. But the good sense of the people in the Pacific coast states of the United States recognized that these people were American citizens, and should receive the protection of the government of the United States. I am satisfied that Canadians are even more law-abiding than our American neighbours, and I am quite sure that nothing serious would happen if the Japanese should go back to British Columbia.

But I do not want them to go back. In so far as I have been able I have urged them to settle in other parts of Canada. I have numerous letters on file from those who did go to other parts of Canada, and who have told me that they are getting along well.

If the government wanted them to settle in the other provinces, would not the logical thing be that, as soon as they went into those provinces, all restrictions with the exception of returning to British Columbia should be removed? But what happened? They went into these provinces, but they could not buy property. They could not move from place to place. They could not make long distance telephone calls. People who are placed in that sort of position cannot acquire the social and economic roots which are necessary for permanent settlement. And it is only quite recently that those restrictions have been removed.

All this talk about dispersal is, in my opinion, too late. It is far more difficult today than it was during the last three or four years. In regard to irksome restrictions, I have in mind a particular case, which I mentioned in the house before. The government of Saskatchewan took into its employ a young Canadian-Japanese lawyer who had graduated from Dalhousie university in 1942. Because of conditions prevailing at that time, although he was ready to be called to the bar, the bar association in Nova Scotia, decided it was not desirable that he should be admitted to the bar at that time. He returned to Ottawa and did his best to get into the armed services. He could not do that. Then he got work somewhere in Saskatchewan, and a year or so ago was taken into a position of responsibility in the civil service of that province. Then he learned that, the war being over, he could now be admitted to the bar of Nova Scotia. But could he go to Nova Scotia as an ordinary Canadian citizen would? No; he had to have a permit from the mounted police to move from Saskatchewan to Nova Scotia to be admitted to the bar of that province.

Is it possible to get people to settle under conditions of that kind? It is folly and nonsense to think that can be done. So I say the first mistake that was made by the government when these people were removed was that they were designated as enemy aliens, and treated as such when there was no question whatever as to their loyalty.

I listened with pleasure and admiration to the great speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). There was one part of it particularly which appealed to me, and that was where he said that if a person were disloyal or subversive the thing to do was to bring him before the courts of the country and determine his guilt or innocence through those courts; but that the innocent should not be punished indiscriminately with the guilty.

We have been promised a loyalty commission. On August 4, 1944, speaking in this house on the same question, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said this, as reported on page 5916 of Hansard:

> What is clearly needed is the establishment of a quasi-judicial commission to examine the background, loyalties and attitudes of all persons of Japanese race in Canada to ascertain those who are not fit persons to be allowed to remain here. The commission I have referred to should, I think, be established in the fairly near future, in order that it may begin what will be a large and important task. The result of the work of the commission would be to establish a list of disloyal Japanese persons some of whom will be Japanese nationals, some British subjects by naturalization, and some British subjects by birth. The government's intention would be to have these disloyal persons deported to Japan as soon as that is physically possible.

That was on August 4, 1944. But no commission has yet been appointed to do the work proposed. Then in December, 1945, when the three famous, or infamous, orders in council were passed, one of them provided that a loyalty commission should be appointed. But the commission was not set up under that order in council. In December, 1946, it was again mentioned that a loyalty commission, or some sort of commission, should be appointed to look into the loyalty of these people. But no commission has yet been appointed for this purpose, although it is nearly three years since the Prime Minister said that what was clearly indicated was the appointment of such a commission.

In my opinion there is only one reason why no such commission was appointed, namely, that there was no disloyalty to investigate. And because no such commission was appointed, after several promises were made, the government should now say to people of Japanese origin in Canada, Canadian citizens as most of them are, and to those who are not Canadian citizens that, no fault having been found with them, they should now be allowed to take up their place in this country as citizens and as residents. That is what is indicated by the actions and words of the government itself.

I was glad that the hon. member for Vancouver North, when speaking this afternoon, made it quite plain that he was not basing his claim for the exclusion of the Japanese from British Columbia on the score of the security of the province. If I understood him aright he based his reasons for wanting to keep them out of the province squarely on economic grounds, on the ground that if they were permitted to return to the province they would interfere with the employment of white residents. All I can say to that is that if economic conditions in this country are such that a mere handful—there are only about three or four thousand men, women and children—of people coming into British Columbia will upset the equilibrium of the economic situation in that province, then this government must be making a bad job of rehabilitation. However I am convinced that his economic fears are as baseless and as groundless as are the security fears of the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

When an effort was made to disperse these people across the country, not only were they considered as enemy aliens but everything that could be said in their favour was suppressed and their opponents were allowed to carry on their vilification without restraint. I have in my hand a report which appeared in the News-Herald of Vancouver under date of February 8, 1946. Under the heading, "Suppressed report says Japs save beet sugar crop", the report states:

> There can be little doubt that unless Japanese labour had been recruited, the great bulk of the crop would not have been seeded, with the consequent loss to Canada of many thousands of tons of beet sugar. The Japanese performed an important and essential function in maintaining sugar beet production in Manitoba and Alberta. In 1943 it was estimated the Japanese in Alberta alone provided at least $750,000 worth of necessary labour.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

> The Japanese on the prairies have developed religious, cultural and recreational facilities in the areas where they settled. They have participated in community enterprises, church and youth organizations, sports teams, victory loan and Red Cross drives. While concentrating mainly on sugar beet work, the Japanese on the prairies also helped in general farm operations.

Why should a report like that be suppressed? Why not let the people of Canada know?

An hon. MEMBER: Who suppressed it?

Mr. MacINNIS: Evidently the government. I am accepting the report as it appeared in the paper.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no knowledge of any report being suppressed. What report was it?

Mr. MacINNIS: It is special to the News-Herald from Ottawa, and it appeared in the News-Herald of Vancouver on February 8, 1946. The first part of the report reads:

> One of the two federal government reports dealing with the evacuation and resettlement of Japanese in B.C. and which were withheld from the public during the war, says—

Mr. MITCHELL: I know nothing about it. I am looking after a large department and it may be that I do not know everything that is going on, but I think I know most of what is going on and I have no knowledge of the suppression of any report. It is just a newspaper story, probably speculation.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think a newspaper would report a story of this kind if there were not some basis for it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to say frankly to my hon. friend that there is no basis whatsoever for that story.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is amazing to me that the government or the Department of Labour did not say so at the time.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I got up and denied all the stories in the news columns of the papers of this country I would be on my feet twenty-four hours a day.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not necessary that that should be done; all that would be necessary would be for the Minister of Labour to send out a contradiction—he sends out reports every day—stating to the newspaper that the report of their correspondent in Ottawa was not true and should be withdrawn.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why did you not raise it in 1946 rather than now?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am in somewhat the same position as the minister. If I said everything that I should like to say on this question there would be no one talking but myself. Since I have not that opportunity and since it would not be fair for me to exercise it if I had, I have to say these things when I get the chance. However I am going to leave the matter there. I am convinced as strongly as I have ever been convinced of anything that we are adopting the wrong attitude in this matter and that we cannot build, not only a united world but a united Canada, on a basis of that kind.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think in an evolutionary way my hon. friend's mind travels very much like my own. I think I mentioned it this afternoon, but I want to say to my hon. friend that he has certainly shown a degree of sincerity which the hon. member for Skeena did not show yesterday.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I have shown as much sincerity as the minister ever did.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is one thing about my hon. friend, he has been consistent down through the years, even from before the outbreak of the war when he raised a question about a returned soldier. My mind goes back to 1941 or 1942 before the Japanese were in the war, when the British government, for reasons best known to themselves, insisted that the wives of all British subjects in Hong Kong should go to Australia. There were a great many resolutions passed by wives of British residents that they wanted to stay with their husbands, which is a natural thing for any woman to do. I remember the criticism of the British government at that time because of the action they had taken in regard to that matter, but time has vindicated their action.

My hon. friend speaks of enemy aliens. I had something to do with prisoners of war in this country, since those who worked in civilian pursuits came under my jurisdiction. At the outbreak of the war the British government, I would not like to say arrested, but took under their control many people of many races, and there were those in Great Britain, and possibly in Canada and in the United States as well, who contended that such persons should have been allowed their freedom. Well, that is the price you have to pay when war breaks out. The government is charged with the responsibility of the state, and you cannot conduct a war successfully from a soap-box or on the basis of sentiment. War is war, and you have to make decisions in the light of the conditions and circumstances as they exist at the time, irrespective of the complexion of the political party that happens to be in power.

I am still convinced that our policy was a correct one in connection with these people of Japanese origin. I recall flying to Vancouver when it was decided that this movement should be made. When I got off the train I met a certain group in that city and they spoke to me about a policy I was setting in motion. I said to them—I will not give the committee the whole story—"I don't know whether you know it or not, but you may be living in the twilight of a civilization, for I have had some experience with the Japanese. I served with them out in Singapore in the last war and they have merely the veneer of civilization. If they should come to the Aleutian islands or into British Columbia or further into western Canada they would, if necessary, wipe out every man, woman and child in that part of the dominion." There was a real threat at that time.

Hong Kong was lost in two weeks, Singapore in six weeks, and the Dutch East Indies in twenty-four hours. The Americans had lost every effective capital ship in the Pacific; the Australian army was in Syria, and the state of defence in Australia was of a character that would make even a courageous man quiver. That was the situation at that time.

My hon. friend speaks of enemy aliens. I do not think they were ever treated as enemy aliens.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought my hon. friend was talking about a soldier.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will come to that. If you do not like the whole story you need not listen to it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why do you not talk about that?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend made a forty-minute speech and I should like to go on with my speech now.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not. I have kept quiet.

Mr. MITCHELL: For the first time in your life.

Mr. COLDWELL: If you want to hear me on this you can.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is a free country.

Mr. MacINNIS: For some people.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not people of Canadian-Japanese origin.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is no objection to my hon. friend making a speech if he cares to do so. He makes lots of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: I can make more.

Mr. KNOWLES: And to the point too.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am giving the background. Probably my hon. friends do not like to hear the background.

Mr. COLDWELL: We would like to hear it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Go ahead.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was stating the position we were in. My hon. friend said that we treated these people as enemy aliens. If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had been sitting in another place instead of over there he would probably have had to take the same position as the British government did in this regard.

The hon. member speaks of concentration camps. I do not like the words "concentration camps". The hon. member for Spadina used what I term European language in reference to a question of this kind. A concentration camp, as understood in Europe, is something entirely different from the sort of camps in which these people were housed in Canada. There is no comparison whatever. Do not let us use the jargon of the communist party when we are talking about Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is not a concentration camp any place where you are put and which you cannot leave without a permit? The conditions may be bad or good, but if you cannot get out of it, it is a concentration camp.

Mr. COLDWELL: A place where people are concentrated.

An hon. MEMBER: What about a gaol?

Mr. MITCHELL: If that is my hon. friend's definition of a concentration camp, these people were not in any concentration camp because they could get out of it. Having been assembled in these locations in British Columbia, there was a constant movement of the Japanese to Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and, to a lesser degree, to the maritime provinces. I do not like to hear these words and phrases, which are jargon in Europe, used in reference to the Dominion of Canada. We have had no concentration camps as far as the Japanese in Canada are concerned, during the time they were under my jurisdiction.

I know what a concentration camp is. I have been to Europe and I have seen the countries where they existed. My hon. friend spoke of a young Jap who wanted to go to Nova Scotia, I believe. There is no law against that.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. gentleman beats all around the bush. There was no law against it, provided that he could get a permit from the mounted police. There was no difficulty in getting the permit but he had to get a permit.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is putting up a straw man and knocking it down.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do you have to get a police permit to go to Nova Scotia?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend may have to get one if he wants to go there.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not unless he comes under you.

Mr. BENTLEY: Why would the hon. member need to get one?

An hon. MEMBER: It is a free country.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who said that?

An hon. MEMBER: You did.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say that this is the freest country on earth; make no mistake about it.

I say to my hon. friend that we have, in my judgment, the fairest system of judiciary of any country on earth, not excepting Great Britain; and when it comes to freedom of speech I do not make any exception either to that statement.

My hon. friend spoke of a loyalty commission. It is quite true that the statement he referred to was made by the Prime Minister, regarding the establishment of a loyalty commission. If the hon. gentleman's mind will go back, he will remember that, prior to the defeat of Japan by the allies, over 10,000 Japanese in this country wished to return to Japan voluntarily. After the defeat of Japan, that number was reduced considerably, but upwards of 4,000 went back voluntarily, which, in my judgment is, to speak the language of my hon. friend, a pretty fair vindication of the policy of the government, and an assessment of the loyalty of the Japanese individually.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not agree with you.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are not asked to agree with that statement. I am putting forward that point of view. These people wanted to return to Japan and we paid their fares and gave them $200, on landing, for each adult and $50 for each child.

May I say this. I said it before and hon. members will forgive me for the repetition. I would like to think that our soldiers in Hong Kong, that the Canadian civilians in Japan or the Americans or the British were treated as well as we treated these people in the Dominion of Canada.

Let us be frank and honest about the matter. I said that my hon. friend himself is moving very much in the same direction as I am. During the dinner recess I looked up this quotation from a speech he made on August 31, 1946. It will be found at page 5722 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> These restrictions should be completely removed except as regards the return of persons to Pacific defence area.

These words were used less than a year ago. I say to my hon. friend that we are moving in an evolutionary way to meet this problem. Less than a year ago in this House of Commons my hon. friend said that the Japanese should not be permitted to return to the Pacific area. I agree with him absolutely that it is not in their best interests as a group; that they should be relocated across this dominion. I agree with him from that point of view. But it takes time to do these things. Since the policy was enunciated in 1942, the problem of the Japanese has not been such a difficult one so far as I and my administration are concerned, but I must say that it was intensified by some of the speeches which have been made in this house. I am frank to admit that some have to talk to the boys back home. I have no objection to that at all. I forgive them for it. I think I have covered all the points raised by my hon. friend, but I know he is thinking of this returned soldier.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before we leave this matter, I wish to ask the minister three questions. I am glad he forgives me for "talking to the boys back home". In regard to Mr. Inouye, will the minister investigate the case, and if he has any discretion in the matter will he see what he can do with it?

My second question is, has any official request been made by the government of Alberta for the removal of persons of Japanese origin who were moved to that province shortly after the evacuation? Has the position of these people in Alberta been clarified? Will they be removed from there, or may they stay there if they wish? If they have to be removed from there, what provision is being made for settling them elsewhere? This is an important issue, because they should not be removed when the beet growers have finished producing their beet crop and there is no work for them elsewhere. They should be removed, not at the best time for the beet growers, but at the best time for Japanese.

The third question has to do with the loyalty commission. I mentioned that there were three definite statements made in regard to the loyalty commission, one in August, 1944, one in December, 1945, and if my memory serves me rightly, another one in 1946. Surely either that commission should be appointed or a statement of the government made and publicized that there is no disloyalty to be investigated.

Mr. MITCHELL: The first question has to do with the soldier. I shall be glad to look into that matter.

The second question is the Alberta matter. At the moment no request has been received from the Alberta government. As I indicated yesterday, the Japanese there can move out at their will so long as they do not go back to British Columbia. Of course there is a problem in Alberta. The sugar beet crop in Alberta and in Manitoba and, to a lesser degree, in Ontario was saved by the fact that we had Japanese labour in those three provinces in the last three or four years. That is a matter of fact, not a matter of argument.

The third question had to do with the loyalty commission. I would think that when the order in council was repealed—I am merely expressing a personal opinion now—and the power of deportation was ended, the loyalty commission became unnecessary because there has been no suggestion to my knowledge of deportation by compulsion. All the people who have gone to Japan have gone there voluntarily. I hope that answers my hon. friend.

Mr. MacINNIS: One other question about Alberta; has any request come from the beet growers of Alberta that these people should stay there for another year? I believe there was a conference on the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have met the beet growers from Alberta. I am speaking from memory now. I cannot be too sure about it, but I am under the impression that they have also made representations to the government of Alberta. It is obvious that you have to get the crop off. The Japanese people assisted materially in getting the sugar beet crop off in Alberta.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask the minister a question. I have two cases, one of which has already been referred to in the house, that of Sergeant Buck Suzuki. The leader of this party brought that case to the attention of the house last year. This man was born in Canada. I am told that his parents have been in Canada for thirty years. He served with great distinction in the Malaya campaign. While he was fighting with the British forces overseas, presumably for democracy, his wife and children were moved to Toronto and his house and land, which were valued at $7,000, were sold for the sum of $1,963. I do not know whether Sergeant Suzuki received that amount or not.

The second case is that of Yasuzo Shoji. He was wounded twice with the Princess Pats in the first world war. In British Columbia he had a two-story house, nineteen acres of land, four chicken houses, at least 2,500 hens and an electric incubator. I am informed that everything was sold for the sum of $1,429.59. The cheque which was handed to this man, after deduction of expenses and taxes, was $39.32. We have heard expressions from every side of the house today that justice should be allotted to these people. We have done many things which I think afterwards we shall be ashamed of, if we are not now. The assets of loyal Canadians were seized and sold, and in many cases sold for a song. And now the demand is coming, as I say, from all quarters that justice should be allotted to these people. What plans does the government have to ensure that justice is meted out to them?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I do not know the details of the cases that my hon. friend has raised. I have heard of some of them. The suggestion is made by him that the assets of these Japanese, the evacuees from British Columbia, were sold for a song. That is by no means the case. The custodian of enemy property was placed in charge of the Japanese property and set up two commissions in British Columbia, one in Vancouver and the other for the rural area, each commission being headed by a judge and having on the commission a representative of the Japanese race. Each commission considered the sales and recommended sales at prices that were equal to the value that had been put on the properties by responsible, reliable real estate valuators of Vancouver. The amount that the custodian received for properties was in excess of the valuations which had been placed on them by the real estate advisers. That is, the total sales or the amount received in total was greater. There are some instances in which the Japanese owners claimed that they did not receive as much as they should have received, and consideration is now being given as to what form of commission should be set up in order that those cases may be heard so that full justice can be done, as was promised by the Prime Minister, in any cases where a proper sale price was not received.

Where chattels were sold, they were sold by public auction. Large advertisements were published and the prices which were recevied for the articles were extremely good. Altogether the prices which were obtained by the sales were well up to the values of the property that came into the custodian's hands. There have been cases where chattels did not come into the custodian's hands. In some cases articles were stolen; in other cases they disappeared or they deteriorated, as in the case of fishing nets and other articles. Where the custodian was responsible, we are prepared to accept representations from the previous owners and have a commission or committee, whatever is appointed, investigate and find out to what extent, if any, the government may be responsible.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I did not know that we had passed on to the Secretary of State department in dealing with these orders in council.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I may say to the hon. member for Vancouver East that the committee agreed to consider these orders in council together: 251 on page 4, 946 and 7355 on page 5; and 469 on page 6, and that we would try to pass them all together.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think we agreed to that, Mr. Chairman. We agreed to discuss them at the same time, but I do not think we agreed that we would pass them all in one vote. We have been dealing with these orders in council, as far as I remember, as sections of a bill, and I think there should be a separate vote on each order. I think it would be better to deal with P.C. 946 before we went on to the others.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is it the wish of the committee that we should deal now with these items separately?

Mr. COLDWELL: Put them one at a time, and we can see what happens.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: P.C. 946. Is that carried?

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

P. C. 946 agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: P. C. 7355. Is that carried?

Mr. COLDWELL: On division.

P. C. 7355 agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: P.C. 251 on page 4 of the bill. Does that carry?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not intend to make any lengthy speech on this order in council, but I should like to draw to the attention of the committee that on the west coast of the United States there is a situation which is similar to the one prevailing in Canada and they settled the matter some little time ago. The state of California passed a statute excluding Japanese residents from the commercial fishing business. That was in 1943. Objection to it was taken to the courts, and the superior court of the state dealt with the matter and decided that the statute passed by the state was ultra vires. I now make the claim that we have no right to deny to one citizen of this country any right that another citizen has.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall this item carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

P.C. 251 agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: P.C. 1665, on page 6. Does that carry?

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to ask the Secretary of State a question with regard to property which was owned by persons of Japanese origin who were removed from the coast. Is there still in the hands of the custodian any of that property which has not been sold?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes. There are fifty parcels remaining which are vested in the custodian. Twenty-five of them belong to Japanese associations, either community halls or churches, and twenty-five parcels belong to individuals. Of those twenty-five parcels belonging to individuals, I think about twelve are up at a place called Port Essington, which is practically a deserted village, and there is no sale for them at the present time.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall this item carry?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, Mr. Chairman, I think we should have an assurance from the minister that no more of this property will be sold without the consent of the owner.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I am quite prepared to give that consent.

Mr. MacINNIS: That consent being given, I think it should be satisfactory. Did I understand the minister to say a moment ago that a commission was to be appointed to look into the values received by the owners of these properties?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is under consideration at the present time. I know that we shall give an opportunity to the owners to make representations. Just what form that will take has not yet been decided.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall P.C. 1665 carry?

Mr. COLDWELL: On division.

Mr. FLEMING: On this item, may I ask the Secretary of State when the public accounts committee will be called to meet? The bill, together with the accounts of the custodian, was referred to that committee ten days ago. Could arrangements be made to call that committee at an early day?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I understand that the chairman of that committee has been away. I am taking steps to find out if somebody else cannot call a meeting of that committee, because we desire to have that matter discussed as soon as possible since this is emergency legislation which we want to have passed before May 15, if possible.

P.C. 1665, P.C. 469, P.C. 7167 and P.C. 7168 agreed to.

On P.C. 6638.

Mr. BROOKS: This is just a matter of administration, I take it, in connection with post-discharge benefits for a man who joined the interim force. The only object of this is to see that, if he continues on in the interim force after leaving the other one, he will not lose his gratuities and other benefits except for misconduct before he joined the interim force.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is right.

P.C. 6638 agreed to.

P.C. 3617 agreed to.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to know whether the claims commission set up under these orders in council dealt with claims made against the dominion government by the governments of other countries, arising out of the occupation or operations of the Canadian army in those countries during or after the war. If not, how were such claims dealt with? I have in mind France, Belgium and Holland. Did the governments of those countries make claims against the government of Canada, arising out of the occupation or operations of the Canadian armed forces in their countries during or after the war? If those claims were made, how were they dealt with? How much did they amount to in the case of Belgium, Holland and France, and how much has been paid to each of those countries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My understanding is that the claims referred to by the hon. member were not dealt with under these orders in council but by the government, through representatives who discussed the claims with the representatives of the foreign governments and arrived at a settlement. Those settlements were carried out by order in council but not under these orders in council which dealt only with claims resulting in injuries or damage caused through training, occupation, billeting, or manœuvring. The amount of each claim dealt with by this commission could not exceed $1,000, as my hon. friend will see.

Mr. HAZEN: I notice section 2(d) reads:

To function and cooperate with the British claims commission in the United Kingdom and any claims commission which may be set up under field service regulations, 1930 . . .

Of course I do not know what that refers to.

Mr. LAPOINTE: These commissions were set up for the purpose of dealing with claims similar to those with which this commission had to deal.

Mr. HAZEN: Is the hon. gentleman in a position to tell us the amount of the claims submitted by the countries I have mentioned, France, Holland and Belgium?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry I cannot say what they amounted to. I believe I can give the amount of the claims with which this commission has to deal. Those still outstanding under this order in council total £49,000. All told there are seventy-eight known claims outstanding in Britain at the present time, and it is expected that by June most of those will have been dealt with. Of course the number of claims is dwindling as the repatriation of our troops becomes complete.

Mr. HAZEN: There are seventy-eight claims totalling £49,000; is that right?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, that would be right.

Mr. HAZEN: How many claims have been settled, and what did it cost to settle them?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry but I have not that information before me. I am sure the amount must be quite considerable, because during the time Canadian troops were in England claims resulting from manœuvres, training and billeting were quite numerous, and claims officers were appointed in various divisional areas, as a rule, who were kept busy settling these claims which came into headquarters. I am sorry I have not the figures.

Mr. GREEN: This order in council refers to old age pensions, and I take it there would be no objection to having the discussion cover the other three orders in council having to do with old age pensions. Is that correct?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the committee would agree that we might discuss all these items together, concerning old age pensions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: Might I point out to hon. gentlemen that it is the intention of the government to have the resolution preceding the bill dealing with old age pensions appear on the order paper on Monday next, so that perhaps some of the discussion contemplated tonight might be postponed until the bill has been brought in.

Mr. GREEN: Of course, while the bill to amend the act may be introduced on Monday, it may not be debated for some considerable time. In any event I have a few remarks I should like to make tonight, having to do with these orders in council and the general question of old age pensions. The four orders we are now considering deal, in the first place, with an increase of $5 granted on August 10, 1943, under the War Measures Act; a further order in council passed on May 29, 1944, which restored the privilege, existing before the passing of the first order, of having an annual income totalling $125 over and above the pension; the other two orders in council refer to pensions in the Northwest Territories. I have nothing directly to say about them this evening, though my general remarks will apply to them as well as to old age pensions in other parts of the country.

In my opinion, there has been an utter failure on the part of the government to realize the plight of the old age pensioners of Canada, our other older citizens, and our blind. This failure has been most noticeable with regard to the amount of the pension, which is too low for a recipient to live decently in many centres of Canada. In addition, the regulations are too severe, so that in some cases applicants are completely disqualified from receiving the pension, and in other cases where pensions are granted the amount is reduced by reason of the stringency of the regulations.

When old age pensions were first introduced in Canada the lead was taken by the dominion government. That was back in the twenties. At that time it was not a question of waiting for the provinces to move. The dominion government took the lead. The same was true in the early thirties, when the government of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett increased the proportion of the pension payable by the dominion from fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent.

But in recent years the dominion government has not been taking the lead in old age pensions matters. It has been hiding behind the provinces. In support of that contention I would refer hon. members to the statement of policy made by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) on November 14, 1941; at that time he was Minister of Finance. He admitted in this statement that there had been requests from various parts of Canada for the dominion to pay a cost of living bonus to the old age pensioners. But he declined to grant that increase. All that he offered was that if any province saw fit to make a special supplementary payment, the dominion, very graciously, would not as a result reduce the dominion's contribution to the regular old age pensions payments.

At page 4428 of Hansard for November 14, 1941, the minister is reported as follows; and here, I think, we have the basic policy of the government on old age pensions:

> The dominion must, I am convinced, take the position that old age pensions of the non-contributory type now in effect are primarily a provincial responsibility, the role of the dominion being that of a contributor financially assisting the province to discharge this responsibility.

In other words, the government then took the stand, in November, 1941, that the primary responsibility for old age pensions was with the provinces, and that the lead must come from them.

In the following year, 1942, the situation of old age pensioners in Canada had become so desperate that some of the provinces began to pay supplementary grants. The first one to do so was my own province of British Columbia. They made provision in January, 1942, for the payment of an additional amount of $5, bringing the maximum in our province up to a total of $25 a month for single pensioners.

The then minister of finance here in Ottawa was questioned about that situation in February, 1942, and in explanation of the British Columbia provision we find him stating this, as recorded at page 498 of Hansard for February 11:

> The dominion government makes no contribution to the additional $5 a month. The position of this government was made clear in a statement which I made to this house in November.

Then a few days later, on February 17, the minister quoted from a speech by the premier of British Columbia, made at the time the supplementary grant was passed in that province. The premier used these significant words; and, mind you, this was five years ago:

> The government of the province has given careful consideration to this matter and is of the opinion that conditions in British Columbia warrant the increase of old age pensions to $30 per month, and, pending appropriate action by the dominion to that effect, it proposes to supplement the pension now paid by $5 per month. Of this amount $2.50 is the provincial share of the increase recommended—

That is one quarter of the recommended total increase of $10, which would have brought the pension to $30 a month.

> —and the other $2.50 represents a war-time cost of living bonus, which will cease if the scale of pensions is increased by the dominion before the cessation of hostilities.

Subsequently other provinces demanded an increase in the general rate of pension. For example, in May, 1942, Manitoba demanded an increase, and I have here the statement of the then minister of finance with regard to that request from Manitoba.

I have here also a statement by the minister on April 1, 1943, when, again, he was being pressed with respect to an increase in old age pensions. He was being urged to have the dominion take some steps toward increasing the pension, and we find him taking this stand as reported at page 1769 of Hansard:

> Essentially the question is one of jurisdiction; and the position which this government has taken, and which I announced in November, 1941, is that we regard the responsibility for old age pensions as primarily one of provincial jurisdiction, just to the same extent as mothers' allowances, for example.

I have never been able to bring myself to the belief that old age pensions and mothers' allowances are in the same category. I think that the dominion then, in 1943, was still hiding behind the provinces.

Then, two or three months later, in July of that year—

Mr. ILSLEY: What does the hon. member mean by "hiding behind the provinces"? Why does he use language like that, which is opprobrious. My statement was clear, and I have nothing to take from it.

Mr. GREEN: I repeat it. The policy of the dominion government was and is that of hiding behind the provinces on this question of old age pensions.

Mr. ILSLEY: From the very beginning, under all governments, old age pensions were regarded as primarily a provincial responsibility.

Mr. GREEN: But in the beginning the lead was taken by the dominion. The question as to whether there would be old age pensions in Canada was decided here; and now that the time has come, and long since passed, for an increase in the pension, the lead should come from here. It should have come from here, rather than having a dominion government sitting in Ottawa and waiting, waiting, waiting for action to come from the nine different provinces.

On July 23, 1943, a report was tabled in the house by a special committee on social security, in which report we find this recommendation:

> That the government review the existing regulations governing old age pensions, pensions for the blind, and war veterans' allowance, and consider the advisability of adjusting the eligibility age to a lower level and of increasing the amount of pension.

Someone on that committee must have known what was coming, because the next day the minister made a statement to be found at page 5355 of Hansard for 1943 to the effect that the dominion had finally agreed to let the ceiling for old age pensions be raised from $20 to $25, the difference of $5 being provided for by order in council under the War Measures Act. That is one of the orders in council we are considering tonight.

The provinces were still to be allowed to pay the supplementary grants. I think every province continued to pay those grants. I know my own province of British Columbia kept on paying the sum of $5, making the total amount in that province $30 a month.

On May 29, 1944, a further statement was made by the then minister of finance about old age pensions, and at that time the second order in council which we are considering tonight was passed, allowing a greater income over and above the pension; and there were also some improvements in the regulations.

On June 5, 1944, the Minister of Finance repeated the stand he had taken in November, 1941, that old age pensions were primarily a provincial responsibility. His words will be found on page 2632 of Hansard as follows:

> In November, 1941, I announced the government's policy to the house. I stuck to the principle that has always been preserved in this pension scheme, namely, that it was primarily a matter of provincial responsibility; I said that if any province wished to pay a supplemental allowance we would alter the regulations in such a way that they could do so without that supplemental allowance being regarded as income, and certain provinces did that.

The plight of the older people in Canada continued to be desperate. This year the province of British Columbia added a further $5 to the supplemental payment, so that they are now paying $10 over and above the national figure. Pensioners in our province may now receive a maximum of $35 a month.

[Mr. Green.]

The dominion maximum is still $25. The problem of old age and blind pensions is of great concern to the people of British Columbia and, I think, to the people of other parts of Canada as well. For example, a single pensioner living in the centre of Vancouver cannot get a proper room under $12 a month unless he is exceptionally lucky. It is practically impossible to get decent accommodation, that is without board, just the actual room, for less than $12 a month. Prices have been rising steadily and I do not see how these old age pensioners get along. In my opinion, it is practically impossible for an old age pensioner to exist in a city in Canada on the present pension, and I presume the situation is much the same in the smaller centres of the country.

I believe the people generally would be willing to pay the cost of adequate old age pensions. I have here the results of a Gallup poll which was taken on November 28, 1946, in connection with old age pensions. This question was asked:

> If it were your job to decide how much money old age pensioners with no other means of support should receive from the government each month, what amount would you set?

The vote was as follows:

	Per cent
$20 or less	1
$21-$30	12
$31-$40	21
$41-$50	27
$51-$60	15
$61-$99	13
$100 or over	6
No answers; no opinion	3
Qualified answers	2

The significant feature of that poll is that forty-eight per cent of the people were in favour of pensions between $31 and $50 a month. Another thirty-four per cent were in favour of pensions from $51 to $100. Sixty-one per cent of the poll favoured pensions over $40. A month later a poll was taken in connection with the age for eligibility, with the following results:

	Per cent
50 years	2
55 years	4
60 years	39
65 years	41
70 years	6
Miscellaneous	5
No answer; no opinion	3

In other words, eighty-six per cent of the people thought the age should be from sixty-five years down. These polls are significant, because they show clearly what public opinion on this question of old age pensions is at the present time.

It is a tragedy that there has been no increase in the four years since 1943. These people have only a few years to live and many have died who would have qualified if changes had been made.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And would have probably lived if changes had been made.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, and probably would have lived if changes had been made. The delay of the dominion government in facing this old age pensions problem is a disgrace to this nation and to this parliament. I daresay that there is not one hon. member who did not promise his constituents during the last election that he would have something done about old age pensions.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are several who made no such promise and I am one of them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They ought to have made that promise.

Mr. GREEN: I am quite certain that in my province there was not an hon. member who did not promise to do something about old age pensions and who did not intend to do something about them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I presume that every member who did that also promised lower taxes.

Mr. GREEN: I do not know about that. They may have done so. Perhaps if the dominion government had not been quite so extravagant it would have been possible to have both.

Then in 1945, nearly two years ago, we had the dominion calling a conference with the provinces. The dominion got out for that conference a nice green book, a copy of which I hold in my hand and which, by the way, I understand was given out to the press before being given to the premiers of the provinces. This book is entitled, "Proposals of the government of Canada." In those proposals hon. members will find the admission that old age pensions are much too low. That is to be found right here in the dominion's own proposals. Of course that was only confirming what was contained in the report by Doctor L. C. Marsh, published on March 16, 1943. Both those government documents suggested that the minimum should be at least $30 a month, and both suggested that the age should be dropped from seventy to sixty-five years.

The main objective of the dominion in making those proposals was to persuade or force the provinces to give up certain taxation powers which the dominion government had enjoyed during the war by virtue of agreements made with the different provinces. One subtle way of bringing pressure to bear on the provincial governments to give up those taxation powers was to hold out to the Canadian people the attractive social security programme to be found in this green book, including increased old age pensions. The dominion was hoping all the time that Canadians, when they saw those proposals, would demand that the provincial governments accept them and hand over the taxation powers. In fact the dominion was using the old age pensioners and the older people of Canada who would be reaching the age of qualification, as a pawn in the dominion's game with the provinces. Let me put it another way—

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure the hon. gentleman is too much of a gentleman to really be serious in making that observation.

Mr. GREEN: The minister of National Health and Welfare need not put it on the basis of gentlemanly conduct.

Mr. MARTIN: That is the way it should be.

Mr. GREEN: I do not make statements in this house which I do not believe, and I believe the statement I have just made. For the benefit of the minister I will repeat it. In my opinion the dominion, in effect, was using the old age pensioners and the elderly people of Canada who would be reaching the age of qualification, as a pawn in the dominion's game with the provinces. Or let me put it another way: using them as a club to force the provinces to accept and to give up taxation powers.

In any event, be that as it may, it is clear now that there is no possibility of agreement at an early date and it does not help the elderly people or the blind of Canada one bit for the dominion to try to place the blame on the provinces. The onus is right back on the dominion government to give a lead in settling the old age pensions problem. The onus is right where it was in 1926 and 1927 when the Old Age Pensions Act was first passed.

Finally, a word about the regulations. These regulations are much too severe. I do not need to rely only on my own opinion in making that statement. It is found right here in both government reports to which I refer, the report of August, 1945, and the Marsh report of 1943. These regulations should have been eased long ago. It does not require any big dominion-provincial conference to ease them. Demands have been made in this house at every session. I made them myself in 1945 and again in 1946, that the regulations be changed, and the Minister of National Defence, who was then Minister of Health and Welfare, promised on December 15, 1945, that he would call together a meeting of the representatives from the different provinces to deal with the regulations. He had not done so at the time the session of 1946 ended, but finally there was a meeting in December, 1946. As yet, however, there has been no announcement by the government of any change in the regulations. The minister from British Columbia, under whose jurisdiction old age pensions come, returned from Ottawa on December 6 of last year and I have here an interview with him upon his return. He hinted that the pension rules might be eased. He said that the committee which had met was purely advisory as to the dominion's Old Age Pensions Act. All the provinces apparently are waiting for the dominion to announce what changes are to be made in these regulations.

I do not need to go over the details of the regulations to show their unfairness. That is shown by the very fact that only forty per cent of the people of Canada over seventy years of age have been able to qualify under the regulations. That figure is taken from the dominion's proposals of August 1945, at page 37. Doctor Marsh gave the percentage as from forty to forty-five. There are some glaringly hard regulations. One is the method of computing income. Take the regulation under which an applicant can be deemed to have a certain income because he has certain property, whereas in fact he may not be getting one cent out of it. That has always been a most unfair regulation.

Then there are the residence rules. I suggest that the regulations should be changed so that twenty years in Canada after the age of eighteen would be sufficient to qualify, with perhaps three years' residence immediately preceding application. Why should not changes be made such as we made last year in the War Veterans Allowance Act? After careful consideration by a special committee on war veterans affairs last year, a recommendation was brought in that the recipient of war veterans allowance could have his own home of a value up to $4,000 without having it taken into consideration in applying for war veterans allowance. There should be the same provision for old age pensioners. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act there is provision for casual earnings up to $125 a year. I do not see why there should not be the same regulation under the Old Age Pensions Act. The two acts were supposed to be similar. The War Veterans Allowance Act was improved last year, and there was no reason why the Old Age Pensions Act could not have been improved at the same time.

In closing, may I emphasize the importance of the time element. Time means so much when one gets up to that age. Every member of this house regards time as very important right now. Those of us who are only fifty or forty years of age begin to realize the importance of time. Put yourself in the position of the applicant for an old age pension, who is seventy or sixty-five years old. Time is of the utmost importance, and there should never have been this long delay in meeting the tragic position of elderly Canadians and of the blind people across the country. I repeat that that delay has been a disgrace to the nation and, in particular, a disgrace to this parliament.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we all welcome the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that the resolution preceding the bill to amend the Old Age Pensions Act will be placed on the order paper, I believe he said, by Monday.

Mr. MARTIN: On Monday.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is fine.

Mr. BRIDGES: Why talk about it?

Mr. KNOWLES: The Minister of Fisheries says, "Why talk about it?" Mr. Chairman, we shall reserve most of what we have to say about this matter until this bill that has been foreshadowed is before us. But it is only because some people have been talking about this question for years and years, even long before I ever came to this house, that it has been possible to persuade governments to move even as far as they have. According to some reports that get into the press, I am supposed to be one of those who have too much to say about this question, and as I look over the record, I find that I have risen to my feet to speak about the Old Age Pensions Act a good many times.

Mr. BROOKS: Sometimes unnecessarily.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend says, "sometimes unnecessarily." I am sure he would not want his name attached to that remark. I do not think anything is more necessary than persistence in the endeavour to persuade the government to move in connection with this matter, and when, like other members, I was at home during the Easter recess and found the amount of interest there is in this question, the amount of concern that is felt not only by our old people but by citizens generally, I realize that I have not talked half enough about it. Neither have other hon. members, including my genial and now smiling friend the hon. member for Calgary West, risen often enough to demand action on this matter.

The orders before us have to do with continuing the basis as it now stands until the new legislation comes into effect. So far as I can see, no one will vote against these orders in council. One could not consider letting the present amount drop to the $20 provided in the act. But the point that some of us have been trying to make—and it seems to me it is important to make it now when the resolution is just about to appear on the order paper—is, in the main, the one that the hon. member for Vancouver South emphasized in his closing remarks, namely, that time is of the essence. It is not just a matter of the various ages which the hon. member for Vancouver South referred to; it is a matter of weeks and months in the lives of the old people who are now waiting for an improvement in their old age pensions. They certainly should not have to wait any longer; that is my plea to the government.

I rise particularly at this time to say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that, unless the resolution which is to appear on the order paper on Monday really goes some decent distance in improving the needs of our old age pensioners, he had better use the time between now and Monday to redraft it.

There are some discouraging rumours abroad in the country at this time. One of them is that the new legislation is to provide for an increase in the amount of the pension to $30 a month. All the strong words that the hon. member for Vancouver South used will have to be applied to that figure. It simply is not enough for our old people to live on.

Earlier this session the Prime Minister made a specific promise that when the new bill was brought in it would cover everything that we now have in the order in council which is before us plus something more. I suggest that $30 a month now is not something more than $25 was when the Prime Minister made that promise on February 4. On account of the increases in the cost of living, $30 a month now for old age pensioners is actually something less than they were receiving at the time the promise was made. Therefore I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to consider seriously the effect upon the morale of our old people, the effect upon the spirit of our Canadian citizenry generally before he brings in that resolution for such a meagre amount. What is needed for our old people is a pension on which they can live in dignified retirement. We of this group say it should be not less than $50 a month. We say too that the time has come to lower the age; that the pension should be payable at an age not later than sixty-five. It is also extremely important, if this is to become a pension and not just a form of charity, that the means test with all its viciousness be removed. Further, if an old age pension is to mean what it should to our older Canadians there should go with it a cost of living supplement to fluctuate as the cost of living index moves up and down. There should also be with it a provision for hospitalization and medical care.

Almost every time there is a debate on the question of old age pensions, remarks, sometimes by way of an interjection, are passed around as to there being sympathy in all quarters of the house, sympathy on the part of all members for our old age pensioners. No one denies that for a moment. There is an abundance of it here. I am quite satisfied that at any time across the years had members had an opportunity to vote for improvements in our old age pensions legislation, had there been a free vote the majority would have been overwhelming, if not unanimous. But the point that really matters to our old people is not the sympathy that is expressed or any claims as to who has a monopoly on concern for the old people; what counts is definite action to improve their lot by providing a pension on which they can live.

I do not wish to go over the history of this matter again; it has been done quite thoroughly tonight by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I do not altogether concur in his contention that the dominion is hiding behind the provinces. Actually that is only one side of the picture. I think he has used the wrong figure of speech. Buck-passing is the proper phrase. The dominion has been saying that it is a provincial matter; but in the provinces, even those provinces that have made some increases, it is felt that the matter is one which is up to the dominion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does that apply to the Saskatchewan government?

Mr. KNOWLES: The Saskatchewan government, like the British Columbia government, both of which have made increases, as well as others, have done so out of practical sympathy for the old people in their provinces, but they feel that the final responsibility for a proper Old Age Pensions Act rests here in Ottawa.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are the total pensions in these two provinces?

Mr. KNOWLES: The total pension in British Columbia is now $35 a month; the total pension in Saskatchewan is $30 a month, plus hospital, medical, optical and dental care free to all old age pensioners as well as to certain other groups.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In British Columbia it is the same.

Mr. GREEN: I believe they also get medical and dental care in British Columbia.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, there is something of that kind, but it is not as all-inclusive as in Saskatchewan. I am not concerned about pitting these provinces against each other. I say, as I have already said in answer to the hon. member for Lake Centre, that even the province of Saskatchewan, which is doing the best it can—and I am proud of it—for the old age pensioners, feels that the final responsibility for a proper Old Age Pensions Act rests with the dominion.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is it not a fact that Saskatchewan is now paying less than some other provinces?

Mr. COLDWELL: It has come up quite a bit since the present government came into office.

Mr. KNOWLES: Saskatchewan is paying in cash to the old age pensioner less than British Columbia, but one has to take into consideration the value of the over-all medical and hospital care which is accorded to old age pensioners in Saskatchewan, and the relative economic position of the two provinces. It is also to be noted, if one is going to discuss Saskatchewan, that the average amount paid to the pensioners of Saskatchewan has come up since the present government came into power. Under the former government the average amount paid in Saskatchewan was about third in the dominion. It has since come up to the top.

Mr. MARTIN: The fact is that the hon. gentleman who advocates $50 a month supports the only government in the dominion where his political ideology is in power and which has not paid as much as some other provinces.

Mr. KNOWLES: I deny that. When you add to the cash payment the value of the hospital and medical care on an over-all basis which is given to the old people of Saskatchewan, they are right up with all the rest of them.

Mr. TUCKER: I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. COLDWELL: We are not debating Saskatchewan, are we?

Mr. TUCKER: But I understood the hon. member's supporter was. He speaks about Saskatchewan as if he knew what was going on there. I wish to ask him this question. How much is taken off the old age pension when the old age pensioner in Saskatchewan has to go to the hospital. The hon. member speaks freely about Saskatchewan. I should like him to answer that question.

Mr. KNOWLES: So far as I know, nothing is taken off the old age pensioner.

Mr. TUCKER: That indicates you do not know anything about the matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member had better go out to the Saskatchewan legislature and ask the question there. He had the chance to do it but he did not take it.

Mr. TUCKER: I know the hon. member would like to get me out of the house but, believe me, I shall stay here just as long as the Liberal party wants me. I am not taking dictation from the C.C.F. Why did you not get your own premier out there to go out and take a seat in the legislature when he was elected C.C.F. leader in Saskatchewan?

Mr. COLDWELL: He was not asked to take a seat in the legislature.

Mr. TUCKER: He never asked for a seat.

Mrs. STRUM: We took forty-seven seats out of fifty-two.

Mr. TUCKER: You will not do that next time.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the hon. member for Rosthern if, as a citizen of Saskatchewan, he is not proud of the improvements in social legislation which have been made in his province in the last few years?

Mr. TUCKER: I dislike seeing the old age pensioners having to pay more than $5 for hospitalization—having their old age pension taken away from them in part when they go into the hospital.

An hon. MEMBER: They do not. You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not correct.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask if this is a private fight or a public fight? I really should like to listen to the hon. member. He is always interesting, even though he is usually wrong; but I want to know how far wrong he is.

The CHAIRMAN: I thank the hon. member for Calgary West for reminding me to remind the committee that all remarks should be addressed to the chair and that hon. members should not interrupt another hon. member who is speaking, unless they have his consent.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want it to be clear that, in the province of Saskatchewan old age pensioners and others receive, through the medium of a card which entitles them to it, their hospital and medical care and benefits free. These things were given them even before the general hospitalization plan was enacted.

Mr. COLDWELL: Old age pensioners and others.

Mr. WARREN: I do not often interrupt, Mr. Chairman, but may I ask if it is not true that the Saskatchewan citizens pay a per capita fee of $2 for that medical care?

Mr. COLDWELL: Not the old age pensioners.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to know of this interest in the situation in Saskatchewan. I should be quite willing to go on answering questions, but I think I might leave it. After all, there are a number of Saskatchewan C.C.F. members in this house.

Mr. MARTIN: Let us get to the old age pensions bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. KNOWLES: Absolutely. What I was starting to say before I had these interesting questions was that the old age pensioners have been the victims of this game of tossing the responsibility back and forth from one place to the other, and we feel that the time has come to settle that responsibility where it belongs, namely, with the federal government. I was going to mention that in the province of Manitoba the issue has come up. The hon. member for Vancouver South spoke of the demands that province made a few years ago for an increase in the pension, and it is true that at one time they added $1.25 before the federal government made its $5 increase of 1943. No further increase has been made in that province, and only recently—in fact, this very month—a resolution introduced in the Manitoba legislature calling for that province to make a $10 increase, just for the period of time until the federal government increased its pension, was turned down. The resolution was introduced by Mr. M. A. Gray, a C.C.F. member for Winnipeg. It was the combined vote of Liberals and Progressive Conservatives that defeated the motion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why does the C.C.F. not raise it to $50 in Saskatchewan?

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon. member aware that the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan asked the Saskatchewan government the same thing that he says someone asked the Manitoba government today?

Mr. COLDWELL: Think of your own responsibility in these matters.

Mr. MARTIN: I will.

Mr. KNOWLES: I can carry this on just as well as anybody else, but all this is doing, Mr. Chairman—even my part in a free-for-all of this kind—is demonstrating the fact that the old age pensioners are the victims of the back and forth political talk that we have in this house, that we have between dominion and provincial governments, and that we have right across the country.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The most political statement I have ever heard made here is the one you have just made.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am prepared to accept my hon. friend's remarks, provided that we can get down to the fact that the time has come for a government somewhere—and we contend that the responsibility rests with the government of the Dominion of Canada—really to do something about this whole question of old age pensions.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I go right along with you there.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is fine. At last we have agreement. Now I want to say this, and I will sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: I really should not get applause for that, because I have said it several times before and it always gets applause.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Stay with it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: The thing I am most concerned about now, in addition to the provisions of the act that the minister says will be on the order paper by Monday, is its effective date.

Mr. MARTIN: I said the resolution.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, the resolution. The hon. member for Vancouver South has referred to the importance of time. The promise to the old age pensioners of Canada that something specific would be done was made in the speech from the throne on January 30, 1947. That promise was confirmed by the Prime Minister on February 4 when he said that the amendments forecast in the speech from the throne would include all we have now, plus something more. It may be all right for us in this house to let time slip by, but it is not fair to the old age pensioners. My hon. friends over there are laughing. They have had the opportunity, the right and the authority, from the day this session started, to put old age pension legislation on the order paper, but they put it off, for one excuse after another. When we first asked questions about it the Minister of Justice said that the matter was the subject of discussion with the provinces. Then a little later, when we began pressing for it, we were told that it was a matter of priority. Now we are being told that we must wait until we get this debate over; in other words, an attempt is being made to blame the house for the government's own delay in placing this matter on the order paper. The fact is that it could have been placed on the order paper any time after the day the speech from the throne was read. I say now that the proper thing for the government to do for the old people of Canada, when they do bring down this legislation, is to make retroactive to January 30 the payments that are to be provided under this act. Nothing less will be fair to the old people of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This is really the first opportunity members of the house have had to discuss the old age pensions question, and be thoroughly in order and thoroughly fair to the other members of the house. I believe that should be borne in mind when we are appraising the amount of effort that some members have made with respect to the old age pensions question. We have been in session since early this year but have not had a chance, except on the speech from the throne, to discuss old age pensions. That is unfortunate. I feel, however, that it is only fair to give credit to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for the persistence he has shown in this matter.

I have no desire to occupy any great amount of the time of the committee, but I do wish once more to put our group on record with respect to old age pensions. Those who have been members of the house for some time will recall that, a good many years ago, I began to advocate $50 a month for people sixty-five years of age and over. There should be no means test. I do not intend to burden the committee with any amount of elaboration. I just wish to state the bare skeleton of the case, so that others may have the floor and speak also. There should, I repeat, be no means test. I consider that the means test today is a most irritating and unbecoming thing to be using in the Canadian system. To think that a man who is getting a meagre pension like $30 a month is denied the privilege of going out, even in his old age, and earning additional money without being in danger of losing his pension is a most discouraging, disheartening and altogether undesirable state of affairs. The means test should be abolished completely with respect to old age pensions. There should be no restriction whatever on the additional earnings of anyone who has gone beyond the age of sixty-five. Surely if a man or woman can go out and earn money in addition, after that age, he or she should be permitted to keep it.

Then I believe the pension must increase with the years. I know how unpalatable this will be to many hon. members who think in terms of orthodox finance, but we simply must face certain facts. The severe taxation structure in this country is rendering it harder and harder for anyone to save for his advanced years. It is at the same time rendering it harder and harder for young people to get enough money ahead to care for their parents. Consequently the pension simply must increase with the years.

Then the age at which people receive the pension must gradually decline. There is no use in making wisecracks about taxation and how it must be reduced. The simple, inescapable fact is, that the age at which people receive the old age pension must become lower and lower with the years, for the simple reason that it is becoming increasingly difficult for people over forty-five years of age to get jobs in this country as we begin to return to anything like normalcy. Let us face up to that situation and govern our thinking and planning in accordance with those facts.

In addition to the matters I have already referred to, hospitalization, medical and dental care must be given free to elderly people. I do not think I need say anything more about that; it is perfectly clear.

The question will be asked, where will the money come from? As the Minister of Justice indicated, it is obvious to every hon. member that it is going to be impossible to raise by taxation the money which will be necessary to give the elderly people what they ought to have, to provide the other social services the country ought to have, and to accomplish the many other things everyone in the house knows we should accomplish. It must be obvious beyond any shadow of doubt that there will have to be such a change in the financial system of this country as will render financially possible that which is physically possible.

Now may I say a word or two as to what is physically possible. May I once more remind hon. members that in 1944 this nation produced $11·8 billion worth of goods which, divided among twelve million people, amounts to about $983 for every man, woman and child in the nation. Let me recall what other hon. members have pointed out, that at the time we produced that $11·8 billion worth of goods we had some 700,000 of our finest producers overseas, and a very large percentage of our productive capacity engaged in war work, purely for destruction. Now those 700,000 and more are back from overseas. There is no longer any need for that productive capacity to be used in war production.

Mr. MICHAUD: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Gladly.

Mr. MICHAUD: The hon. member mentioned that in 1944 we produced $11·8 billion worth of goods. What kind of goods were those, and how many of those goods are in demand by the Canadian people today?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a very logical and fair question, and I accept it. But surely the same energy that went into the production of tanks will produce trucks, butter—

Mr. LESAGE: Wheat.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us go through it point by point; there is no contention between us. I should like to spend a minute or two on this, since hon. members are very much interested. Into that $11·8 billion worth of production went the beef we were producing, the wheat we were producing, various kinds of grains, pork, eggs and all that sort of thing. Surely we can produce just as much of those commodities now that we have those 700,000 young men back again as we could when they were overseas; there will be no doubt about that. The same factories which were producing guns can now produce nails, wire and the other things we require. The factories which were producing battledress and clothing of other kinds for our soldiers can now produce civilian clothing. One could go right on down through the list and show that we could just as easily produce $11·8 billion, or probably $12 or $13 billion worth of goods and services in this country on a peace-time basis as we could on a war-time basis. Do I answer my hon. friend?

Mr. MICHAUD: Well, not quite.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then let him ask more questions. I am completely prepared to give a reason for the hope within me.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am particularly interested in the things that are in short supply, the things we have to import. How would our capacity to produce affect those goods we have to import, those goods that are in short supply?

Mr. BLACKMORE: As far as I have been able to find out, there is no difficulty in getting the goods we need from outside, with very few exceptions. I will grant that bringing in goods from the United States is causing us a certain amount of embarrassment because we are finding it hard to get United States dollars. But if we look about in various parts of the world I think we shall find that we can obtain from elsewhere the goods we are now buying from the United States. I think we shall find it completely feasible to obtain the goods we need, but which we cannot produce in Canada, from countries that will be quite happy to accept our goods. I do not want to get out of order; I just want to use this as an illustration, and I draw the Chairman's attention to that fact. May I point out to the hon. member that, for example, under the sugar policy this country has been following for the last three or four years, the policy it is following today, there appears to be no anxiety whatever about getting goods from outside. We insist on bringing sugar from outside instead of producing it in Canada, where we could produce two or three times our total consumption if we began to use the resources at our disposal. I would say there is no doubt whatever that this nation can produce or trade for goods necessary to give every man, woman and child in the country a very high standard of living; and the fact that the $11·8 billion worth of goods we produced in 1944 would amout to $983 for each man, woman and child indicates quite clearly that what I have said is in moderation. The only problem we face is how to get the money and how to put the money into the hands of the people. We can produce the goods. The only difficulty with us is to distribute the goods.

I do not wish to go into this any farther at the moment, unless hon. members wish to ask other questions. However I will say to hon. gentlemen across the way who are interested in this matter that if they will bring up their questions when they will be completely in order, I will go to any degree of scientific exposition to show that what I am saying is correct, and I can call to my support the best economic knowledge obtainable in Canada. Perhaps no more need be said tonight.

I should like to go on and repeat once more that this old age pension question is a dominion problem. The Minister of Justice has said that it is a provincial problem. We will grant that under the British North America Act such matters as the old age pension come within the responsibility of the provinces, but it has been clearly proved that the majority of the provinces are unable to find the money, because they do not have the taxation fields; and in many cases the taxation fields they were given under the British North America Act have been invaded by the dominion. The result is that there is only one authority that has the taxing power to get the revenue with which to do the things which ought to be done by way of social services.

One more matter must be borne in mind. What I have said indicates quite clearly that I believe that the money must ultimately be created by the federal government, as hon. members have heard me argue many times. Only one authority in Canada has that power to create money, and that is the dominion government. That is so because the British North America Act gave the dominion government control over banking, currency and coinage. From every angle and from every consideration it must be obvious that the dominion government must assume responsibility for old age pensions.

I say once more, in closing, that we should not even consider old age pensions of less than $50 a month at the age of sixty-five, without a means test, and with free medical, hospital and dental care.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu 'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I hope we do not make this a political issue. It would be a great pity, because I believe if I had before me the election literature of all parties—and I have not—I could show that every party promised better old age pensions. I do not think it is a political issue at all; and I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not so sensitive about what he is to bring before the house next Monday that he found it necessary to go out of his way to pick a quarrel with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I believe the country must recognize the fact that, as the span of life is extending, people are going to live longer, and as our civilization proceeds and our industrial organization develops, people are not going to be able in the future to work as many years in industry.

The other day I had a letter from an old person in Vancouver who made the statement that a number of firms in that city had already given notice that, after a certain date, all persons of sixty-five years of age would be out of employment. The gap between the ages of sixty-five and seventy has already appeared. Where will people of sixty-five go to look for work, with all the veterans back, and when women are being dismissed because the veterans are back?

Every day letters come to my desk from able-bodied women who do not know which way to turn because they are being let out of government services and other kinds of employment. If those able-bodied young people cannot find work, where is the person of sixty-five years of age to go for his livelihood in the time before the old age pension becomes effective? In the face of rising living costs, I do not know what these old people are going to do.

A pensioner said to me today—and this was not an old age pensioner, but one in a different category—"It will not make any difference to me if butter goes off the ration, because at sixty cents a pound I am not going to be able to buy butter." Dry bread for old age pensioners will not be a very happy thing in this country. Appetites of old age pensioners are not good at any time; they require special diets. I submit that, with butter at sixty cents a pound and a pension of $30 a month, old age pensioners will be eating dry bread, and they are not going to be able to have much milk, meat or those other things which enter into an adequate diet.

We ought not to let this become a partisan issue. It is a problem which has to do with a very large section of our population, and one in which you and I are involved personally—because we are the people who raised our own salaries last year, and made $2,000 of it income tax free. I, for one, did not support this, and I served notice on my caucus that I would not vote for it. I think that last year we should have made provision for the old age pensioners before we made provision for ourselves. Last year, time and again the government stalled off dealing with this problem, saying that the time was not yet.

If this matter is to be brought up next Monday, with respect to the increasing of pensions, I trust that the government will see fit to do more than add $5 to the pension which is now so inadequate, in the face of rising living costs. Rents are up; milk is up; butter is up; bread is going up; sugar is going up. How can these people live? How can their families afford to help them, when the sons and daughters of these people are going to have the greatest difficulty in meeting their food budget and their own family needs?

The government was to be commended last year when it decided to pay family allowances in cash to all parents in this country. That was a sensible and businesslike way of attacking the problem of family allowances. I say it should now do the same thing in respect of old age pensions. All persons over sixty-five years should be paid a superannuation allowance, and the income tax mechanism should be used to recover excess income, beginning on the same level with other persons who pay income tax. I do not know why we should segregate and treat as social lepers the people who did the pioneering in this country, and laid the foundation of our prosperity of today.

I was sorry the hon. member for Rosthern tried to confuse the issue in my province. We realize we are one of the poorest provinces in Canada; but in spite of our lack of provincial income we have done much more than the previous government did, and more than our resources warranted.

Again I say this should not become a political issue. And in order that everyone in Canada at the age of seventy may receive the same treatment, it should be paid on a federal basis, and not be left to the discretion of the provinces to decide how they shall treat their pensioners. We did not do that in respect of family allowances. We said that all children in Canada have an equal claim to security. I think that likewise the pioneers in Canada have an equal claim to social security.

This should be universal superannuation, and they should begin to pay income tax on the same level as other people. In that way we would begin to put a floor under the family income of even old age pensioners.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss briefly another angle in connection with old age pensions which has always interested me. I agree with what has been said by the hon. mmebers for Winnipeg North Centre, Lethbridge and Qu'Appelle. There is another angle I would place before the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Finance and the government generally. It has to do with our whole system of living. I am assuming that we are earnest and sincere—and I believe we are—when we say we believe in the family unit. But the family unit presupposes that one member of the family will be the breadwinner; and, generally speaking, we look upon the man as being in that position. If he does not supply the necessities for his family, but is in a position to do so, we take the necessary court action to see that some of his earnings are diverted to that purpose.

There is another angle which enters into this matter. I do not know the percentage, but I should imagine it is a high percentage of the marriages which take place in Canada in which the man is several years older than the woman. If he is twenty-five and she is twenty-two we say to him, "Henceforth, and for the balance of your lives, you will be the breadwinner for the family, so long as you are able, and are earning. You must provide for your wife and family." Then, also, when a person reaches seventy years of age we say that we will pay an old age pension. So when the breadwinner becomes seventy years of age he—because in the majority of cases it is the husband—is entitled to the old age pension. He has a wife who is dependent upon him but he is told, "You must provide for this woman; while we recognize your needs and are going to pay you an old age pension, you will have to find some other means of carrying out your family responsibility and looking after your wife. Heretofore your earnings were supposed to do that but now your earnings have ceased. You are to receive from the nation for your pioneer work $30 a month—or whatever the amount will be; it varies in the different provinces—and either your wife will have to live on that with you, thereby reducing the standard of living for both of you, or she will have to go out and get a job." The wife is probably ill-equipped to do that. She will have spent all her life raising a family and will not be able to get a job except perhaps as a charwoman, and she would be too old to do that. The wife in many cases has not reached the age where she would be eligible for a pension.

It seems to me that that is manifestly unfair and uneconomical. It does not gibe with our belief in the family institutions of this country. When I have spoken of this I have heard it argued that if this is done there will be young women marrying these old age pensioners. I do not believe that is a sound argument, because most of the young women in this country are too sensible to do that. There may be the odd case and that may happen now and again, but it is not a major factor. I believe this government would be well advised to take this into consideration.

It is only fair that the wife and mother, who usually is younger than the husband, who has spent her lifetime in assisting her husband in his work and in the responsibilities of raising a family, should be recognized as being entitled to a pension.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think we might approach this matter in a different way from what has been suggested so far. Several of the hon. members who have spoken have advocated a definite amount in connection with old age pensions. We in this party have advocated for a long time that the old age pensioner should get $50 a month at sixty years of age.

The question of finance was brought forward a while ago by the Minister of Justice when he asked where we were to get the money, that it would have to come from taxation. I am not going to argue that point, but when some hon. members were speaking a while ago I was reminded of what was said a few days ago by the hon. member for Battle River. At that time he quoted a letter which had appeared in the Ottawa Citizen. I have that letter in my hand at the present time. The letter outlined the budget of a civil servant receiving $40 a week. I want to put this on record and then refer to it:

The following will give you some idea of what can be purchased for $40 a week:

63 meals per week at 30 cents	$18 90
(No extra meals for visitors)
Rent	8 00
Heat	2 00
Light and power	1 00
Clothing and shoes	5 00
Insurance	1 00
Dentist	50
Doctor	50
Newspaper	18
Car fare	1 00
Church	50
Incidentals	1 42
	$40 00

No shows
No tobacco or drinks
No entertaining
No holidays
No savings
No happiness, only worry
How does it look to you gentlemen?

I think we should get at this old age pension question on a different basis from what has so far been suggested. It is possible that these figures are a little too high, but let us look at them again. He mentions sixty-three meals a week at thirty cents. Can one buy a meal in this city for thirty cents? He mentions rent at $8. I do not know anywhere in Canada, and certainly I do not know anywhere in Calgary where one could get a room for $8 decent enough to live in.

Mr. McCANN: That is $8 a week.

Mr. JOHNSTON: But this is for a family of three. Then heat, $2, for a family of three. Light and power, $1. I do not think one could minimize that in any way whether the family were three, two or only one. Clothing and shoes, $5, and insurance, $1. I do not think one could cut that down at all. Dentist, fifty cents; doctor, fifty cents; newspaper, eighteen cents, and carfare, $1. Surely older people should have that. Then church, fifty cents. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Swift Current, it is not a case of just one person living on the $30, it is often a case of two persons having to live on that amount. The budget I have just outlined was for a family of three persons.

I am going to suggest to the minister that before he brings down his old age pensions bill, before he sets an amount in that bill, he consider having the bill referred to a committee, probably after second reading. Then that committee should set up a budget for an old age pensioner, not to allow anything lavish, but just from a practical point of view. It has been suggested that perhaps some of the members of the committee might try to live on that budget for a month to see how it goes. I think in that way we could get some reasonable amount, and I am sure the Minister of Health and Welfare will see that no $30 a month can meet the requirements.

I join with the hon. member for Swift Current in what he said with regard to pensions paid to elderly people, especially when the man of the family is the only one receiving a pension. I have had instances of that kind brought to my attention, instances where two people had to live on the $25 or $30 a month which the husband was receiving. When we speak of $30 or $35 as being given in some of the provinces we must remember that that is not the amount of the old age pension being paid all across Canada. In fact, the pensions being paid in some of the other provinces are a great deal less than $30 or $35 a month.

We should look at this matter from a humane point of view, and not adopt the attitude taken by the Minister of Justice a while ago when he said, "Well, what about taxes?" A while ago we were talking about the Japanese and the freedom that Canada gives to her citizens. Let me tell the committee that there is no freedom or justice in forcing our own white people who are old to live on the paltry sum of $30 or less a month. I should like the Minister of Health and Welfare to look over the list I have put on Hansard, to pare it down as much as he likes, and then bring in an estimate for an old age pension that will allow so much for rent, so much for heat, so much for light and power, so much for insurance, medical care and so on, and give them a little bit for food and clothing; then I think it is only fair and decent that we should allow them a little bit for recreation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why should an old age pensioner have a family living with him at that age? I cannot understand that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I did not suggest that he would have a family living with him at that age.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You said three.

Mr. JOHNSTON: What I quoted was on the basis of a family of three, and that was $40.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): He is pretty good at sixty-five.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am not taking issue with the hon. member for Calgary West if he wishes to criticize my remarks. I think this is too serious a matter. I cannot see for the life of me how people can possibly exist on what they are receiving, and I am serious in this. I do not know how they can exist on the amount we give them.

Mr. MARTIN: I know the hon. member has given this matter a great deal of thought, but I would point out to him that a bill will be introduced on the subject and that his present remarks could more properly be made when the bill is brought down. I say that in order to expedite the debate.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I appreciate the minister's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps I should have pointed out to the committee before this that the present discussion is strictly not in order. What should be done on second reading has nothing to do with the present order in council. I have not asked hon. members to stay strictly within the rules, but I think I should point this out to them.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I appreciate your calling attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman. Possibly the whole discussion has been out of order and should have been directed more to the orders before us. However the discussion has gone on generally this evening, and I merely wanted to bring these suggestions to the minister's attention in the hope that he might take them into consideration, and that when he does bring down the bill he will bring down one that is really worth while.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is one important aspect of this matter that I wish to develop before the order passes. In view of the fact that the cost of living is increasing rapidly and that the old age pensioners are in no position to protect themselves against such increase, I would suggest that the minister give serious consideration to including in these orders for their duration, if the bill is not to come into effect in the near future, the idea of a cost of living supplement in connection with old age pensions. I would remind the committee that Canada cannot afford to be niggardly with our elderly citizens. During the years of the war a very large number of young, able-bodied men and women from our farms, factories and mines served with distinction in the army, the air force and the navy, and those of us who remained at home were able to establish new records in the field of production on our farms, in the forests, in the mines and factories of the country. We were able to give away enormous quantities of our Canadian products. Now that the war is over, now that we have all our people available to produce goods and to perform services on the Canadian scene, I cannot think of any good reason why our people should find, in the year 1947, that they have to consume less food and wear shoddier clothing, and find it more difficult to visit the dentist—why in general they should have to put up with a lower standard of living.

I think the government deserves a great deal of credit for formulating, during the war, fiscal policies that distributed, on a more equitable basis than ever before, available supplies of butter, sugar and other commodities in short supply. We were able to supply the people with larger quantities of most commodities than they ever enjoyed before. I cannot see any reason why we cannot look forward to increasing our local consumption, and particularly by the people in the old age pension brackets.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare made some remarks regarding the treatment given old age pensioners in Saskatchewan as compared with other provinces. I would point out to him that he lives in a province where, throughout many years, the people have been able to organize the Canadian economy so that they can keep a lion's share of our national income here. Again I quote from one of the government publications. In Ontario you have only one per cent of the married men receiving incomes of less than $250 in 1942, whereas in the prairie provinces you have three per cent of the married people who reported that income in the same period. You cannot blame the C.C.F. government for the very low incomes that prevail, but the fact is that in the prairie provinces three per cent of the male wage-earners had an annual income of less than $250, when these statistics were compiled. For the group receiving less than $1,000 you have only fourteen per cent in Ontario as compared with twenty-one per cent in the prairie provinces.

Obviously, where the income is on a much higher level in the wealthy province of Ontario, it should be possible for the people out of their consolidated revenue to provide more generous pensions and better social services than we can in a poor province like Saskatchewan. But I will not admit that the old age pensioners of Ontario are better off than those of Saskatchewan. The minister carefully refrained from specifying that conditions were better for them in Ontario than in Saskatchewan. Taking into account cash payable to the pensioner, hospital, medical, dental and optical services provided everyone receiving an old age pension, I think the pensioners in Saskatchewan are a good deal better off.

I hope the minister will take into consideration the rising cost of living and the need for seeing that, as the cost of living goes up, the old age pensioners shall not be required to do without butter. I find that on January 1, 1945, the cost of food, taking 1935-39 as basic 100, stood at 130·2. In January, 1946, it was 132·8 and in January, 1947, it was 145·5.

The old age pensioners are not like businessmen, who can anticipate what will happen to the market. They are at the mercy of the federal government, which controls the quality and quantity of what they eat.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish to agree with what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has said. I am sure that this is completely non-political and that all parties in the house will agree that we have to do something more than we have been doing for old age pensioners. So far as I am concerned, I do not want to enter into any auction sale of so much a month so much higher and so much higher and have the bidding go on in that way, because the minute we mention sums of money without knowing the adequacy of the taxes—and I use the same word the Minister of Justice used—to take care of our various problems, then we are not true either to the old age pensioners or to ourselves. There is no use in saying: Here is a great big pot of gold, let us dip into it and dip into it, without having some method of keeping the pot filled. I am sorry to speak in favour of the government the way I am doing, but it is just a simple economic fact.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he not agree that we should be able to increase the consumption of foodstuffs by our old age pensioners now that the war is over?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I answer the hon. member directly? I would love to see the stomach of every old age pensioner enlarged by all the food he could consume. Do not let us have any doubt about that, but the hon. member asked me that question for a political reason. I am in favour—

Mr. KNOWLES: The point is it is food, not money, that counts.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The point I had in mind was that whatever is physically possible should be financially possible.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know a lot of funny stories too, but they are a lot funnier than that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What are we lacking in?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not think the hon. member would take me on, but still he lives away up in the north country; he does not see many people and perhaps not any newspapers and does not know what is going on. I shall tell him. I am going to answer all of you at once. What are we lacking? We are lacking in money which represents earning capacity. Do not let anybody have any doubt about it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is as clear as mud.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Real money, not funny money.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am talking about earned money which is real money. The hon. member for Lethbridge says it is as clear as mud. He is the one man in the House of Commons who knows what he means; I do not. We shall just leave it at that. But sir—and with respect may I just say I am not earning any votes in Calgary West by what I am going to say—I realize that this is a practical problem. We all believe and we are sincere in our belief that certainly the old age pensioners are not getting enough now. There is no question about that. In the generosity of our hearts we want them carried to the highest point we can, but I want to say something about legislation in the province called Alberta from which the hon. member for Lethbridge comes. These sentimental appeals are splendid for our aged people who built this country. There are a lot of them who still have enough to live on and they did a good deal to build up the province from which he and I come. We have a law there that the children of any family are liable for the upkeep of the parents. I hope other provinces have a similar law.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We have it in Quebec.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am so happy to hear that. Therefore I am trying, sir, with respect to all those who support me, to reduce this to a practical problem. In so far as I and we of this party are concerned, certainly everything that can be done should be done. I am not going to say that what is physically possible is financially possible. I have three mentors to my right who are helping me, but unfortunately they disagree with one another; they are not even agreed on it.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what we did in the war. We made financially possible the things that were physically possible.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Let us talk about what we did. In the war we taxed ourselves for half of what we spent and we borrowed the rest of it. Do you think we can carry on doing that forever? If we do the country will be broke before we are through.

Mr. KNOWLES: With sufficient production it can be done.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say that with sufficient production it can be done; but it will not be regimental production where I shall have a number instead of a name, even though Smith is the only name I have at the moment, and I would not use it if I had a better one. Coming squarely back—

Mr. KNOWLES: We like "Arthur" better.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Practically I like myself, no matter what you call me, so we shall let things rest at that. The only dollar we have which is any good is the earned dollar, the production dollar, if you care to put it in that way.

It is time that we in this House of Commons stop bidding for the votes of the old age pensioners, because they are organized in Canada. In the town from which I come they are well organized, but I still refuse to go into any election auction sale of $50, $60, $70, $80, or whatever it might be. I simply say, let us do everything that this country can do. I do not know the sum; therefore I look with much interest to the bill which the minister says he will introduce on Monday.

Mr. MARTIN: The resolution on Monday.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes. But may I also say, let us make it generous; let us do the best we can for these people. I agree with what someone said that they are in their present position through no fault of their own. They worked hard and in their later life they now find themselves in difficulty. Let us honour the people who helped to make this country. Let us go the limit that the finances will permit us to do.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he agree with the suggestion I made that possibly a committee of the house could make a budget and thereby ascertain correctly the amount that should be in the old age pension?

The CHAIRMAN: That question can be asked when the bill is before us.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think the hon. member would like to answer it now.

Mr. CASE: We should approach this problem in a practical and realistic way. We should examine the weaknesses of the present act. I have listened to the discussion this evening and, in the main, I have noticed that the tendency is to treat our old people as paupers. Of course that is a weakness of the present legislation. Old people have to be reduced to a state of pauperism before they are eligible for old age pensions. Therefore my first thought would be to remove that cause. In other words, the method that we are employing is putting a premium upon thrift, and a thrifty nation is a worthy nation financially and physically, if I may use that term. I would suggest that in any approach to dealing with this problem we should remove the means test, so that these old people will be privileged to set something by for themselves in the days that are to come.

As the hon. member for Calgary West said, while we are all prone and glad to pay tribute to the pioneers who laid the foundation of this great country, yet we must constantly remember that others made a contribution who are not recipients of old age pensions at the present time. I would seek to remove the present stigma which goes with pensions. I do not know whether that is done or not, but I would remove all reference to old age pension and I would call it a retirement allowance. I would seek to emphasize the word "retirement", indicating, as it were, that when one reached the age of seventy he had reached the retirement age and that this was a retirement allowance. It must be remembered that when one receives a retirement allowance or an old age pension, even under the present regulations, no one can avoid admitting that one who has lived a lifetime must have made some contribution to the welfare o fthis country. It could be considered a reward for services. On the other hand, if I were to compare the man who made himself a million with the other, it must be admitted that the former has taken more from the country in comparison with the other who has made his contribution throughout his life.

Those are the thoughts I have in mind. When the resolution is introduced I hope that the minister will take into consideration the one great weakness, as I see it, which does put a premium on thrift, and will still leave to the individual the hope that he can provide for himself, remove the means test and give the old age pension to everyone, and call it a retirement allowance.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MARTIN: Having listened all night, I think that I should say just a word or two before the order is passed, but not with the intention of trying to cover everything that has been said. As I have already interjected, a bill will be brought in when there will be a full opportunity to discuss the measures which have thus far been discussed.

However there are one or two things I wish to say at this stage, in view of what has already been said. As the hon. member for Calgary West has just pointed out, no one in this committee has any monopoly on interest, not only in the aged but in all the people of this country. No matter in what part of the house we sit, let it be assumed that no one has a monopoly on interest in this important problem. I want to say this for one thing, and one does not like to say it, but sitting here as the minister responsible for this particular measure, I take second place to no one in this committee—not that I have any prior right over anyone—because of my own background, a background which is similar to that of so many members of this committee. None of us have had silver spoons in our mouths from the beginning. The vast majority of members of this committee came from poor beginnings. That is why I say that every man in this chamber is aware of the problem. When one is in government, one must consider the problem in all of its contexts. One has to consider the matter in terms of other measures of social security and not only in terms of a particular measure such as the one we are now considering. To the hon. gentleman who has just spoken I say that the government has given this matter a great deal of thought. I do not suspect for one moment that the measure to be brought in will meet the point of view of everyone, but in the light of all our responsibilities toward the aged, toward the young and toward other groups, it does represent what, under all the circumstances, seems most practicable for us to do at this time. The government that is proposing to bring in legislation is a government which has not been without great interest in social reform. It was this party which brought in old age pensions in the first instance. I am sure that will not be forgotten.

Mr. COLDWELL: Under a bit of spurring.

Mr. MARTIN: It was this party that brought in unemployment insurance, as a result of which we now have a fund of $400 million contributed to by employees, employers and by the state ,as a means of cushioning unemployment. It was this government that brought in family allowances, as a result of which some $260 million are being distributed among the families of the nation, reaching over 3,600,000 children every month and reaching over 1,600,000 families.

Mr. KNOWLES: That goes to everyone.

Mr. MARTIN: I am not saying we have done all of this by ourselves. Many hon. members of this house have collaborated in this great measure. I merely mention it so that the record will indicate that no hon. member or no group in this house has a particular monopoly in this important issue. I refrain from saying at this stage what I could say by way of reply to some hon. gentlemen, pointing out, not their particular record, but the record of their group in this house and in provincial fields; but I take it that there will be ample opportunity to do that sort of thing later if provocation is later given. What I say right now is what I said at the beginning, because the debate thus far has been put on this level. The government proposes to bring in a measure which is not final in form, but which is within the context of the fundamental proposals, not only with regard to old age pensions but with regard to the whole field of social security, which were made to the provinces in August, 1945. In the light of these facts, I assure every hon. member that the measure to be introduced represents, on the part of the administration, an honest attempt to deal with this problem as practicably as is possible in the light of all our obligations. When the measure is introduced I ask hon. gentlemen to realize these facts, and to realize that it is proposed by responsible men who have as deep an interest in human welfare, in the old and in the young, as anyone else. It is not easy to sit in one's seat—and certainly it is not easy for me to sit in my seat when I think of my own personal experience and that of my own family not very far from here, an experience which every member in this house can duplicate—and have it suggested that only one particular group is concerned about the aged. No, that is not so. We are all interested, every one of us in this house. I suggest that when we come to deal with this measure we should approach it in the light of our common interest in the problem.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister a question about the orders which we are now passing? They all involve agreements between the dominion and the provinces. We have had it made clear to us that these orders in council will stay in effect until they are superseded by the legislation to be brought in. Will the new legislation be dependent upon agreements with the provinces?

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: Good.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HAMEL: I wish to say a few words before this carries. Because of the importance of the matter now under discussion for the welfare of our old citizens, I consider it my duty to put our stand on the record right now. Of course I do not intend to speak at length on the problem, especially because a resolution is announced for Monday. Nevertheless I want to say tonight that we favour a substantial increase in the old age pension, one which will cover the increase in the cost of living and will also assure an improvement in the condition of the old age pensioners. So far as the means test is concerned, we think it should, in principle, be abolished.

The last point I wish to make clear tonight is that the age of the pensioners should be reduced. For the future, as soon as unemployment seems to face our country, this age should be considerably reduced. But in the present situation, because of the tremendous needs of manpower, especially in housing activities, I think it would be fair to fix the age at sixty-five for a year or two, particularly for those who at this age are still able and willing to enter the regular labour market.

P.C. 6367 agreed to.

Progress reported.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 25, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

REDISTRIBUTION

PETITION AGAINST ENLARGEMENT OF YUKON CONSTITUENCY TO INCLUDE MACKENZIE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I present to the house the petition of upwards of 400 Canadian and British subjects residing in the district of Mackenzie in the Northwest Territories, and in Yukon Territory. The petition reads:

To the Honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call the attention of the house to citation 713 of Beauchesne, 2nd edition:

Whilst a member has clearly a right to ask that a petition be read, it is a privilege, like many others, subject to the approval of the house itself. In case of opposition, the Speaker will put a motion formally to the house.

Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentlemen shall have leave to read the petition?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The petition reads:

To the Honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled

The petition of the undersigned Canadians and British subjects residing in Yukon Territory humbly sheweth

That parliament is now considering Bill No. 18, which if enacted, will be The Representation Act 1947.

That it is proposed by said legislation to include with Yukon electoral district the district of Mackenzie and the electoral district so created shall elect one member of the House of Commons.

That in the opinion of your petitioners it is not desirable to include the district of Mackenzie with the electoral district of Yukon for the reason that it will create a constituency of the enormous area of over seven hundred thousand square miles in extent, unwieldy and impracticable in every respect.

That Yukon territory and Mackenzie district have nothing in common, no community interest of any sort. They are separated by ranges of high mountains. They have no direct intercommunication and are entirely foreign to each other.

Your petitioners therefore pray that the Mackenzie district be not included in or with the electoral district of Yukon and that the words in section 2 of Bill 18 "including the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories" be struck out; and your petitioners will ever pray.

I have a similar petition from residents of the Yukon, the signatures to date running upwards of 400. I should like to inform the house through you, Mr. Speaker, that many more similar petitions to the same effect are on their way to Ottawa.

EAST MALARTIC MINE

INQUIRY AS TO RECENT DISASTER—EFFECTIVENESS OF SAFETY DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Labour in a position to give the house any information with regard to the Malartic mine disaster? Will an investigation be made, with particular reference to the effectiveness of the safety devices in use in that mine and other mines of the area? I regret I did not send notice to the minister.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Much as I am personally interested in the disaster at the Malartic mine, the hon. member probably knows that the question of safety measures in mines is under provincial jurisdiction. I have no doubt the provincial government concerned will make the necessary investigation.

STRAIT OF CANSO

BRIDGING PROJECT—PROPOSALS BY ENGINEERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport two questions arising out of numerous inquiries I am receiving? Is he in a position to make a statement to the house as to when his department may be expected to proceed with the project of bridging the strait of Canso?

Mr. FRASER: After the budget.

Mr. GILLIS: You fellows have been laughing at that since 1906; it is becoming serious. My second question is this: Have any companies or firms in Canada or the United States made proposals with regard to the bridging of the strait?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I really believe that is a question—

Mr. GILLIS: I have completed the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: —which should be put on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF WORKERS FROM EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) asked if there had been other arrangements for specific employers to bring labour from Europe to Canada, apart from the Dionne spinning mill at St. Georges, Quebec. I promised to give the information. It is as follows:

Under P.C. 371, dated January 30, 1947, provision was made for the admission of farm labour. As a result of this order, various sugar beet companies sought the admission of workers going to sugar-beet growing farms. Approval has been given for the admission of 571 men who will work for sugar farms under contract with the Dominion Sugar Company, Chatham, and 169 men who are destined to farms having contracts with the Manitoba Sugar Company. Application for the admission of a further 450 men has yet to be dealt with. In addition, it is believed that there will be applications for the admission of another 400 men to work on sugar beet farms in southern Alberta.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Are these persons coming in as regular immigrants for permanent residence, or under contract with the companies? If the latter, what are the terms of the contract?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are coming in as permanent residents. I have no knowledge of the contract that might be made with the companies.

Mr. GILLIS: The same old story.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question in connection with bringing immigrants to Canada. On April 22 he said, at page 2279 of Hansard, he would give his consent to the immigration of other people from any country in the world. Did the minister mean from enemy countries also?

Mr. MITCHELL: If I can say this to my hon. friend—

Mr. FRASER: In a kindly way.

Mr. MITCHELL: —just a minute now; we have had speeches on both sides of the house advocating immigration, and as soon as we set the policy in motion, you understand, there is a slight reservation on the part of some hon. gentlemen—some. I want to correct, if I said that—

Mr. FRASER: It is right here in Hansard.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know that "the world" covers a lot of territory, but my hon. friend can rest assured of this, that discretion and judgment will be used by this government in the question of immigration.

Mr. HOMUTH: I trust your discretion, not the government's.

SOAP

REQUEST FOR REESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAMME TO SALVAGE FATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HAROLD W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, since soap is in such short supply, and hospitals and housewives are protesting such shortage, and since there is a vast wastage of fats in every household, will not the minister reestablish the organization for the salvage of fats in Canada?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): On April 15 I made a statement in connection with the alleged shortage of soap. It is true that during the war an organization for the collection of fats from domestic establishments did function under the Department of National War Services. We have in effect in Canada an order, which is not in force in any other country, requiring packing houses to defat carcasses before they are sent to butchers. In that way a very substantial amount of animal fat is obtained.

It was found that the practice of collecting fats from domestic establishments or houses did not produce a great deal of fat. The difficulty is that in large centres adjacent to soap manufacturing plants the collection is feasible, but in smaller places, where it is collected in tins and all kinds of odd receptacles and then turned in to butcher shops, the condition of the fat and the smell after it had been in process of collection for a short time brought forth violent protests from people who were asked to collect it. In the result it accounted for only a fraction of one per cent of the amount of fats we use.

While I am glad the hon. member has brought up the question, I think better results can be accomplished by individual householders conserving as much as possible their use of fat, and I take this opportunity of appealing to housewives to do this. But from the point of view of effecting any substantial increase in the amount of animal fats available for the production of soap, collection would not be worth while.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JAQUES—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF A VOTE IN HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct a statement which appears in today's press, as follows:

> The C.C.F. party voted solidly for the amendment. They were supported by four Liberals, two members of the official opposition, several independents and—strangely—Norman Jaques, Social Credit member for Wetaskiwin.

May I make the correction, Mr. Speaker? I did not vote, because I was paired with the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote). Had I voted I would have voted with the Social Credit group against the amendment.

CIVIL SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES—COST OF LIVING BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. On February 17 the house was informed that the government was giving consideration to the request of superannuated civil servants for a cost of living bonus or other supplement. Can the minister indicate what progress has been made in connection with this matter?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): This matter has been brought to my attention several times, particularly by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). The matter is still under consideration, but I am not in a position to make a statement at this time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TRANSFER OF SASKATOON OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he is contemplating the transfer to Winnipeg of the employment offices now located in Saskatoon. In view of the inconvenience to the public and employees generally will he reconsider this move?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The public will not be inconvenienced by the transfer. The transfer of the division of the unemployment insurance commission to which my hon. friend refers is being made on the basis of efficiency and economy. If there should be any inconvenience to the public at Moose Jaw—

An hon. MEMBER: Saskatoon.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sorry; I did not mean to cast any reflection on Saskatoon. My hon. friend can rest assured that there will be no inconvenience to the people of Saskatoon. When the move is made we shall be glad to consider the situation in the light of our experience, and if it is found necessary to make a further change, it will be done.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NEW CLOCK AT SOUTH END OF CHAMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I notice we have a new clock at the south end of the chamber, but it seems to be smaller and harder to see than the one that was there before. I should like to ask the minister if this clock will go as fast as its predecessor.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I suggest that we give it a trial.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

BRANDON MILITARY HOSPITAL—CARE OF TUBERCULAR INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the early days of the war a hospital was erected in Brandon by the Department of National Defence. It was operated for some time and then it was turned over to the Department of Veterans Affairs. Recently that department has transferred it to the Department of National Health and Welfare. Since the situation is urgent I should like to ask the minister what immediate steps are being taken to complete repairs and replace equipment destroyed in a bad outbreak of fire that occurred in the hospital a few weeks ago.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Arrangements have been completed between the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of National Health and Welfare for the transfer of the Brandon military hospital in order to look after the hospitalization of tubercular Indians. The terms of the transfer have not yet been completed but it is expected they will be within a short time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REGINA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BROADCASTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked questions with reference to the Regina chamber of commerce broadcasts. The station which carried the broadcast about which the question was raised is the privately-owned station CKCK at Regina. The question involved is not one of C.B.C. regulation, but of whether these programmes offend section 22, subsection 3 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, which prohibits dramatized political broadcasts. On receiving the scripts of the series the corporation has found that it already has a legal opinion on the first five when broadcast at another point. According to the legal opinion, these scripts are not dramatized political broadcasts in the meaning of section 22(3) of the act. In view of this, the corporation is not considering making any request to stop the series.

The corporation has also asked for legal opinion on the rest of the scripts of the series. It will take no action unless the opinion on the remaining scripts is different from the opinion already given.

Mr. HOMUTH: That was in the newspapers this morning.

Mr. McCANN: I did not know you could read.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On P.C. 1609.

Mr. HAROLD W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, P.C. 1609 was enacted in war time. In the beginning, regulations with respect to construction materials were passed in the interests of the war effort. The government decided to curtail the amount of material which might be used in building construction, as well as the amount of labour which could be made available. In the same way the types of houses and the cubical content were rationed, so to speak, to fit the national war economy. That was the purpose for which these regulations were passed.

During the war we had in Canada a priority system with respect to building materials. It did not work very well, because it was tied in with the regulations in the United States and some of the commodities which it was sought to regulate could not be regulated. As a matter of fact the priorities system broke down and was practically discarded.

The priorities officer who regulates construction materials was appointed in 1942, so as a matter of fact we have had almost five years of experience under this order in council, to know whether it works in the interests of the people of Canada, or not.

At the present time P.C. 1609 is being used for the purpose of channeling building materials under a priorities system to certain special groups of government controlled housing. No provision is made for the control and regulation of construction materials for any other purpose. In opening the debate in respect to P.C. 1609 my purpose is to say to the government, that it must show cause as to why these regulations should be continued.

The minister has told us on many occasions, that there are five groups of government controlled agencies which get priorities on building material. We know those groups to be Wartime Housing Limited, Integrated Housing, Veterans Land Act, Housing Enterprises Limited, and Emergency Housing. I propose to analyse these various housing groups to show what purpose they serve in the national economy, having regard to the regulation of construction materials.

I have before me a return brought down by the minister in reply to a question of mine in respect of housing in Canada in the year 1946. I had asked how many houses were completed under these several housing groups. I have given these figures before, but for the purpose of this discussion I should like to give them again.

Under Wartime Housing there were completed in Canada 6,816 units; under integrated housing, for the whole of Canada, 566 units; under Veterans Land Act, 2,599 units; under Housing Enterprises, 28 units; and emergency shelters, 1,643. That makes in all 11,652 units. That was the total of all the houses that were completed in Canada in 1946, according to the minister's own figures, by housing agencies with which the government had direct connection.

During that same year, 1946, according to the bureau of statistics, there were created in Canada 59,846 housing units. It is clear therefore that the housing units built through government agencies amounted to only a small part of the over-all housing picture for 1946—about nineteen per cent.

It is evident that so far as building materials and their regulation are concerned the end does not justify the means when only 11,652 housing units were built under the priority system, while 48,000 houses were being constructed by builders and private owners who had to compete in the open market and get their materials where they could.

The 566 housing units created under integrated housing is not very much of a showing in a whole year—1946. In the Toronto area only 9 builders out of 450 are building under the integrated housing plan. It seems to be the attitude of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that these are the only builders who are entitled to consideration. In fact the minister himself has said on more than one occasion that if you want to build you should get into one of these government priority groups. Otherwise he is not very much concerned whether you get the materials you need. I will read his statement on that in a moment.
